The coronation being over, the king received an addreſs of thanks from the commons, couched in the warmeſt expreſſions of duty, gratitude, and affection; and declaring, that they would take ſuch meaſures in ſupport of his crown, as would convince the world that he reigned in the hearts of his ſubjects. The ſum total of the money expended by the States-general in William's expedition, amounted to ſeven millions of gilders; and the commons granted ſix hundred thouſand pounds for the diſcharge of this debt. The next object that engaged their attention, was the ſettlement of a revenue for the ſupport of government. Heretofore there had been no diſtinction of what was allotted for the king's uſe, and what was aſſigned for the ſervice of the ſtate, ſo that the ſovereign was abſolute maſter of the whole ſupply. As the revenue in the late reigns had been often embezzled and miſapplied, it was now reſolved that a certain ſum ſhould be ſet apart for the maintenance of the king's houſhold, and the ſupport of his dignity (called at this time the civil liſt) and that the reſt of the public money ſhould be employed under the inſpection of parliament. Accordingly, ſince this period, the commons have appropriated the annual ſupplies to certain ſpecified purpoſes; and an account of the application has conſtantly been ſubmitted to the inſpection of both houſes.

Through the communication of Nottingham, the tories made proffers of ſervice to his majeſty; but complained at the ſame time, that as they were in danger of being proſecuted, they could not, without an act of indemnity, exert themſelves in favour of the crown. The king, wrought on by their remonſtrances, ſent a meſſage to the houſe by Mr. Hampden, recommending a bill of indemnity as the moſt effectual means of putting an end to all ſources of diſcord. He deſired it might be drawn up with all convenient expedition, with ſuch exceptions only as ſhould appear neceſſary for the maintenance of public juſtice, the ſafety of himſelf and the queen, and the welfare of the nation. But the whigs proceeded ſo ſlow in the bill, that it could not be brought to maturity before the end of the ſeſſion. It being now neceſſary to paſs an act for aſcertaining the ſucceſſion of the crown, a bill for this purpoſe was brought into the lower houſe, with a clauſe diſabling papiſts from ſucceeding to the crown; to this the lords added, " or ſuch who ſhall marry papiſts," abſolving the ſubject in that caſe from their allegiance. About this time the princeſs Anne brought forth a ſon, who was baptized by the name of William, and created duke of Glouceſter afterwards.

It was well known by William, who was equal to moſt princes in political abilities, that the moſt effectual way of preſerving peace at home, was to find his new ſubjects employment abroad. The great ſcheme he had formed, when only Stadtholder, of a confederacy againſt France, began about this time to take effect. He was ſtrongly importuned to join this confederacy as king of England, and found no great difficulty in perſuading the Engliſh to draw the ſword againſt their old enemies and rivals. After the proper ſteps for that purpoſe were taken, both houſes joined in a dutiful addreſs to his majeſty, deſiring him to take ſuch meaſures as would be ſufficient to reduce the French king to ſuch a condition, as to render him incapable of diſturbing the peace of Europe, or prejudicing the trade and proſperity of England, aſſuring his majeſty that he might depend on his parliament for every aſſiſtance that was neceſſary.

Agreeable to the requeſt of both houſes of legiſlature, the king declared war againſt the French monarch on the ſeventh of May. This declaration was drawn up by the maſterly hand of Somers, afterwards lord chancellor. Lewis was charged with having unjuſtly invaded the territories of the emperor, and denounced war againſt the allies of England, in open violation of the treaties concluded under the guarantee of the Engliſh crown; of having encroached on the fiſhery of Newfoundland; invaded the Caribbee Iſlands; forcibly ſeized the provinces of New York and Hudſon's Bay: countenanced the ſeizure of Engliſh ſhips by French privateers; prohibited the importation of Engliſh manufactures; diſputed the right of the flag; perſecuted many Engliſh ſubjects on pretence of religion, contrary to expreſs treaties and the law of nations; and ſent an army into Ireland to ſupport the rebels in that kingdom. Ireland was far from imitating the examples of England and Scotland, in acknowledging William's title to the crown; and it was more than two years before that kingdom was entirely reduced. The earl of Tyrconnel, on the firſt news of James's retreat from England, ſecured the moſt important places in Ireland of which he was governor; and joining his natural hatred of the proteſtants to what he thought motives of policy and prudence, he treated them in ſo rigorous a manner, that they were forced to retire to their brethren in the north, who ſeizing on Kilmore, Coleraine, Iniſkilling, and Londonderry, declared for William and Mary. Tyrconnel, perceiving the ill effects of his cruelty, thought proper to temporize with William; yet he continued to ſolicit James by letter, to tranſport himſelf over to Ireland with a powerful body of troops; aſſuring him that ſuch a ſtep would effectually ſecure his intereſt in that kingdom; whereas a neglect or delay in following this advice, muſt entirely ruin his affairs. On receiving theſe letters, James ſent them to Lewis, and preſſed him for his aſſiſtance. Neither the French monarch nor his miniſters had any great expectations from this expedition: but as his honour was concerned in ſupporting his unfortunate gueſt, it was reſolved to furniſh him with five thouſand forces, under the command of M. de Lauſun. This army was embarked on board the fleet then lying at Breſt, conſiſting of fourteen ſhips of the line, ſix frigates, three fire-ſhips, and a proper number of tranſports. Lewis alſo ſupplied James with arms for forty thouſand men, in order to equip his friends in Ireland; preſented him with a large ſum of money; ſuperb equipages, plate, and every thing neceſſary for the camp and houſhold. At parting he embraced him with great affection, making uſe of this remarkable expreſſion: "Farewell brother! the beſt thing I can wiſh you, is, that I may never ſee you again."

On the fourteenth of March James ſailed from Breſt, attended by the count d'Avaux, in quality of ambaſſador, and ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction. After eight days ſail, he arrived ſafely at Kingſale in Ireland, whence he repaired in a few days to Cork; where he was received by the earl of Tyrconnel, who had collected an army of thirty thouſand foot, and eight thouſand horſe, for his ſervice. But adverſity had not yet taught James wiſdom and precaution: he acted with as little prudence, as he could have done, had he no oppoſition to encounter; and was ſo far from endeavouring to conciliate the affections of the proteſtants, which in common reaſon and common policy he ought to have done, that he gave repeated proofs of his thorough hatred, and frequently puniſhed them with death on the moſt trifling occaſions. One of the magiſtrates of Cork was executed by his orders, for having declared for the prince of Orange. In ſhort, inſtead of endeavouring to win over his adverſaries by mildneſs and popularity, he only exaſperated them the more, by his cruelty and arrogance: and thus, by his own imprudent conduct effectually ruined his affairs, at the very time when he flattered himſelf with their being in the moſt proſperous ſituation. Having refreſhed his forces, he marched for Dublin, and entered the city in triumph. He was met at the caſtle gate by a proceſſion of popiſh biſhops and prieſts, in their pontificals, bearing the hoſt, before which he kneeled down in public. He publiſhed ſome proclamations, promiſing protection to all his proteſtant ſubjects, who ſhould preſerve their loyalty: but theſe placed ſo little confidence in his promiſes, that they determined to ſtand in their own defence. Soon after he publiſhed another proclamation for the meeting of the parliament, on the ſeventh of May at Dublin; created Tyrconnel a duke, and Dorrington, in the room of the duke of Ormond, received the royal regiment.

Dorrington's firſt expedition was againſt Kilmore, where the noble defence made by the proteſtants ſo exaſperated James, that he determined to uſe them with the utmoſt ſeverity; and was warmly ſeconded in this reſolution by Tyrconnel, who ſeemed to thirſt for the blood of theſe poor unfortunate people. Alarmed by this cruel uſage, and the report of a general maſſacre, intended to be perpetrated on all the proteſtants, they ſhut themſelves up in Londonderry, the capital of the county of the ſame name, and ſent immediately to England for aſſiſtance. Some arms and ammunition were accordingly ſent them, but no conſiderable reinforcements till the middle of April, when two regiments arrived at Loughfoyle, under the command of the colonels Cunningham and Richards. By this time James had reached the neighbourhood of the town, at the head of an army of twenty thouſand men; but he met with an oppoſition little expected; and which was chiefly owing to the bravery and reſolution of one man, a proteſtant clergyman of Donaghmore, who had raiſed a regiment for the defence of himſelf and his brethren. This clergyman gave Lundy, the governor of Londonderry, the firſt notice of the approach of James. Lundy immediately ſummoned a council of war, at which Cunningham and Richards, the two commanders lately arrived from England aſſiſted, and who, either from a diſlike to the ſervice they were ſent upon, or ignorant of the ſituation of the town and the diſpoſition of the inhabitants, gave it as their opinion, that the place was not tenable, that it would be imprudent to land the regiments; and that the principal officers ſhould retire from the town, in order that the inhabitants might obtain more favourable conditions. A meſſenger, in conſequence of this opinion, was diſpatched to James, with propoſals for opening a negociation; and lieutenant-general Hamilton, who commanded in that prince's ſervice, undertook, that the army ſhould not, during the continuance of the treaty, advance nearer than four miles of the city. Mr. Walker, the clergyman already mentioned, had, in vain, uſed all his rhetoric to perſuade the governor to take the field, and come to a general engagement. He was deaf to all his arguments, and liſtened only to his own puſillanimous apprehenſions; which were greatly heightened, when he found that James, diſregarding the promiſe his general had made, was advancing at the head of his troops to the town walls. The inhabitants and ſoldiers in the place, were ſo exaſperated at the cowardice of their governor, and the two colonels, that they flew to arms, and would have made their lives pay the forfeit of their perfidy, had not the former kept himſelf concealed in his chamber, and the other two found means to eſcape on board their ſhips. In the mean time, major Baker, their deputy governor, fired ſo warmly from the walls upon James's troops, that they were obliged to retreat to St. John's town in ſome diſorder. Walker and Baker made uſe of this reſpite, to preſs Lundy to exert himſelf as became a loyal ſubject and a good ſoldier, and to undertake the defence of the place: but ſuch was the governor's cowardice or treachery, that he abſolutely refuſed to have any thing to do with the government, and ſoon after made his eſcape in diſguiſe. He was, however, ſeized in Scotland, ſent thence to London, together with Cunningham and Richards, where they were all ignominiouſly diſmiſſed from the ſervice.

The inhabitants now unanimouſly agreed to beſtow the government of the place on Mr. Walker, and major Baker, who immediately prepared for a vigorous defence; determining to bury themſelves under the ruins of the place, rather than ſurrender to the enemy. Accordingly they formed the citizens, amounting to ſeven thouſand men, into different regiments, taught them the proper management of arms, firing of cannon, and all the other manœuvres neceſſary for their own defence, or the annoyance of the enemy. On the twentieth of April, James's army opened the trenches, and their batteries began to play on the town, which was but poorly fortified, with only twenty pieces of cannon on the walls, and thoſe wretchedly mounted. The beſieged, however, animated by the example and ſpirited harangues of Mr. Walker, held out with aſtoniſhing reſolution, againſt a force, far ſuperior, employed to reduce them. James being obliged to return to Dublin, to meet the parliament he had convened, left the command of the army to the marquis de Roſane, one of the French generals, a man of more than ſavage haughtineſs and cruelty of diſpoſition. Incenſed with the oppoſition he met with from an handful of half ſtarved peaſants, as he contemptuouſly called them, vented his rage in the moſt inhuman manner, and informed the beſieged, that unleſs they inſtantly ſubmitted themſelves to their lawful ſovereign, he would not leave one ſtone upon another in the town, nor a ſingle perſon alive to carry the news of their deſtruction. It is a mark of true courage to look upon the threatenings of arrogance and vanity with contempt. The governor and garriſon anſwered his threats only by doubling their reſiſtance, though their proviſions were now all expended, and they were reduced to the dreadful neceſſity of ſupporting life by eating the fleſh of horſes, dogs, cats, and every other kind of loathſome food. They, however, ſupported their courage, and a proclamation was publiſhed, prohibiting, hibiting, under pain of death, any perſon to talk of ſurrendering. Perceiving that menaces had no effect, the French general formed a deſign for forcing them to comply, which ſeemed to be rather the dictates of a fiend than of a human being. He ſent detachments of his ſoldiers through the adjacent country, with orders to ſeize all the proteſtants they could find, without diſtinction of age or ſex, ſtrip them naked, and drive them in that condition, under the walls of Londonderry. This order was executed with a brutality equal to that of the giver of it. Upwards of four thouſand of theſe miſerable objects were thus expoſed to the view of the beſieged; who, from their ramparts, beheld, with an horror not to be deſcribed, the forlorn condition of their fellow proteſtants, many of whom were every moment expiring with fatigue, cold, hunger and the cruel uſage they had received from their bloody perſecutors. This ſight, however, had a very different effect upon the garriſon, from what Roſane expected. They felt the deepeſt compaſſion for the diſtreſs of their brethren; but their compaſſion was mingled with ſuch indignation againſt the author of that infernal action, and ſuch apprehenſions of what would be their own fate, if they ſhould fall into his power, that they unanimouſly determined to periſh rather than ſubmit to ſuch a barbarian. They now thought themſelves excuſed from obſerving the ſtrict rules of war, which had been ſo flagitiouſly broken by the enemy: and accordingly erected a gibbet on their walls, and ſent to acquaint the French general, that unleſs he immediately ſet at liberty the proteſtants he had driven under their ramparts, they would immediately hang up every priſoner they had taken in their ſallies during the ſiege. Convinced by their whole behaviour, that they would certainly carry their threats into execution, Roſane ordered the proteſtants to be releaſed, after they had been detained three days, without taſting any kind of food. Numbers of them periſhed by famime and fatigue in their return to their houſes, and many of thoſe who ſurvived, had the additional misfortune to find their habitations and effects deſtroyed, by the roving parties about the country; ſo that the greater part of thoſe unfortunate people fell victims to the infernal malice of a popiſh foe. It is reported that James was requeſted by the biſhop of Meath to countermand this order, but without effect. At this time the intrepid garriſon of Londonderry was reduced from ſeven thouſand, to five thouſand ſeven hundred men; and theſe were driven to ſuch extremity of diſtreſs, that they began to talk of preying upon one another. But before this dreadful reſource for prolonging life was attempted, the long wiſhed for ſuccour arrived. Major general Kirk, who had rendered himſelf ſo infamous in England, during James's reign, and who had ſince abandoned his former maſter, and ſerved under king William, arrived in the Lough with a reinforcement of nine thouſand men; and being ordered to relieve the garriſon at all events, he ſent three ſhips up the river, laden with proviſions, under the protection of the Dartmouth frigate. But the enemy, to prevent any ſhips from ſailing up to the town, had erected ſtrong batteries on both ſides of the ſtream, and thrown a ſtrong boom acroſs the channel. One of the ſhips, however, taking the opportunity of a ſtrong gale of wind in her favour, advanced with full ſail, broke the enemy's boom, and the other veſſels following her, they all anchored in ſafety before the town. James now deſpaired of ſucceeding in his enterprize, and raiſed the ſiege that very night, after loſing near eight thouſand men in this fruitleſs attempt. Kirk landed at the town, and Walker, at the earneſt requeſt of the inhabitants, paſſed over to England, to return their grateful thanks to their majeſties for their generous ſuccour. He was received by the king and queen with that honour and reſpect, ſo juſtly due to his diſtinguiſhed valour. The inhabitants of Iniſkilling, on receiving intelligence that Londonderry had denied entrance to the troops in James's ſervice, reſolved not to admit any garriſon of his party: and having raiſed a regiment of twelve companies, they ſhut their gates, and appointed Guſtavus Hamilton their governor. He was a zealous proteſtant, and an officer of known courage and conduct. Having thus determined to oppoſe the popiſh army of James, they proclaimed king William and queen Mary. The lord Gilmoy, who had declared for James, appeared before their walls and ſummoned them to ſurrender; but was, by the noble reſiſtance they made, obliged to raiſe the ſiege, which, on their refuſal to capitulate, he had undertaken. Nor was this the whole; for the day before Londonderry was relieved, the brave Iniſkillingers advanced, with their handful of men, againſt ſix thouſand Iriſh, and totally defeated them at a place called Newton Butler; killing near three thouſand of the enemy, having only twenty killed, and about fifty wounded of their own men.

Purſuant to James's proclamation, the Iriſh parliament met at Dublin, and was opened by that prince with a ſpeech from the throne. He firſt thanked them for their zeal and loyalty; laviſhed the higheſt encomiums on the humanity and generoſity of his good brother and ally, the king of France, diſplayed towards himſelf, his queen, and his ſon, in affording them an aſylum, after being expelled their lawful dominions, and in having now enabled him to viſit one part of his realm in perſon. He then declared his fixed reſolution to grant to all his ſubjects, full liberty of conſcience, which he conſidered as the only certain method of ſecuring their happineſs, as well as his own, looking upon himſelf as the common parent of all his people. He concluded with aſſuring both houſes of his hearty concurrence with them, in enacting ſuch laws, as might tend to the tranquillity and ſettlement of his dominions. Every method having been uſed to fill the houſe of lords with popiſh peers, ſo that there were only ſeven or eight proteſtant lords ſent to parliament; and hardly a member of that religion among the commons; it is not at all ſurprizing to find that parliament openly profeſſed itſelf a ſlave to the king's pleaſure. That man was looked upon as factious or rebelliouſly inclined, who dared to move any thing after it had been declared contrary to the king's pleaſure. He had therefore no ſooner left the houſe, than the commons came to a reſolution of preſenting an addreſs of thanks, and of deſiring the count d'Avaux to offer their moſt grateful acknowledgements to the French king, for the friendly aſſiſtance he had given to their ſovereign. They next ordered a bill to be brought into the houſe for recognizing James's title, and to expreſs their abhorrence of the prince of Orange's uſurpation, as well as of the diſloyalty and treaſonable conduct of the Engliſh. This addreſs being preſented to James, he publiſhed a declaration to all his loving ſubjects in the kingdom of England; promiſing that he would, for the future, take no ſtep without the concurrence and conſent of his parliament; offering a free pardon to all who ſhould abandon his enemies, and join him in twenty-four days after this declaration was publiſhed; and charged all the blood that might be ſpilt in this conteſt, upon thoſe who ſhould perſevere in rebellion. Had the people not been well acquainted with the little dependence that ought to be placed on his promiſes, James now gave them a convincing proof, that they were never intended to be kept any longer than they anſwered his convenience; for a bill of attainder was paſſed againſt all thoſe who were abſent from the kingdom, and refuſed to acknowledge the authority of king James, or held any correſpondence with the rebels; or who had any ways aſſiſted the prince of Orange, ſince the firſt of Auguſt laſt. By this act no leſs than three thouſand proteſtants were attainted by name, among whom were the two archbiſhops, one duke, ſeventeen earls, ſeven counteſſes, as many biſhops, eighteen barons, thirty-three baronets, fifty-one knights, and eighty-three clergymen, all of whom were declared puniſhable by death and forfeiture. A bloody proſcription which has not its parallel in the records of the moſt tyrannical government; eſpecially when it is remembered that all the proſcribed were excluded from all hopes of pardon, and all benefit of appeal, unleſs enrolled by the king's order, before the firſt day of the enſuing month of December. Ireland was declared independent of England by another act.

In the mean time William was buſy in his preparations for the relief of his proteſtant ſubjects. He was informed that another ſtrong fleet, as a convoy to ſome tranſports laden with arms, ammunition, &c. was ſoon to ſail from France to Ireland; and therefore the king detached admiral Herbert from Spithead, with twelve ſhips of the line, one fireſhip, and four tenders, in order to intercept the enemy. The Engliſh admiral having for ſome time been blown about with contrary winds, reached at length the Iriſh coaſt, and on the firſt of May diſcovered the French fleet, conſiſting of no leſs than twenty-eight ſhips of the line, moſt of them from ſixty to ſeventy guns, and five fire-ſhips, lying at anchor in Bantry-bay. The French admiral no ſooner ſaw the Engliſh fleet, than he immediately gave orders for getting under ſail, and giving the enemy battle. Herbert having for ſome time endeavoured to gain the weather-gage of the French, and finding it impoſſible to ſucceed, thought it highly imprudent to fight the enemy ſo ſuperior in force, while he laboured under ſo particular a diſadvantage. He therefore ſtood off to ſea, and maintained a running fight, till the evening began to approach, when the enemy tacked about, and returned to Bantry bay. This trifling ſkirmiſh was, by the French, repreſented as a ſignal victory, though with all their ſuperiority of ſtrength, they neither took nor ſunk a ſingle veſſel. William, however, was ſo ſatisfied with the behaviour of his admiral on this occaſion, that when the latter returned to Portſmouth, his majeſty, in an excurſion he made thither, to haſten the naval preparations then carrying on in that port, dined on board Herbert's ſhip, and declared his intention of creating him an earl in conſideration of his ſervices. At the ſame time he conferred the honour of knighthood on captain Cloudeſly Shovel, another ſea officer, who had ſerved in this expedition, and beſtowed a gratuity of ten ſhillings on every private ſailor. Yet with all the aſſiduity of the king in haſtening the naval and military preparations, James had been ſix months in Ireland before the army was embarked for that kingdom. At length eighteen regiments of foot, and five of dragoons being ready, together with a ſuitable train of artillery, they were embarked for that kingdom, under the command of the duke of Schomberg; and on the thirteenth of Auguſt, were landed near Carrick-Fergus. Their firſt attempt was againſt Belfaſt, which they took poſſeſſion of with very little oppoſition; the enemy retiring at Schomberg's approach, to Carrick-Fergus, which they determined to defend. But the intrepidity of the Engliſh was too powerful to be reſiſted for any length of time; and accordingly the place was ſurrendered in four days. This was followed by a ſeries of other ſucceſſes. Ewry, Dundalk, and ſeveral other places, yielded at the firſt ſummons: and the general's progreſs would have been much more rapid had not he been diſappointed in receiving the remainder of his forces and train of artillery which he had left behind him in England. James having aſſembled his forces, advanced towards Schomberg, who was encamped near Drogheda, and on the twenty-third of September arrived within two miles of the Engliſh intrenchments. But the duke, finding his army every day diminiſhing by ſickneſs, which had carried off many brave officers, and great numbers of ſoldiers, while the enemy who were at leaſt double his number, were in perfect health, and their troops much better diſciplined than his, prudently declined an engagement: while James, not chuſing to attack the duke in his trenches, drew off his forces; and both armies retired into winter quarters on the approach of that ſeaſon.

The earl of Torrington, late admiral Herbert, having again ſailed for Ireland, with the combined fleets of England and Holland, attempted to ſurprize the city of Cork: but being deceived by falſe intelligence, that James with his whole army was encamped in the neighbourhood, he did not think it prudent to land his forces; and after continuing a ſhort time on the coaſt, returned to England, and anchored in Torbay; his men being very ſickly. There was indeed the greateſt reaſon to aſcribe this misfortune to the villainy of thoſe intruſted with the care of victualling the navy; for the Dutch ſeamen were in perfect health during the whole cruiſe. The French, though they did not dare to ſend out a fleet, did infinite damage to the Engliſh trade, by their privateers, which ſwarmed in the channel; and the Dartmouth ſhip of war had the misfortune to fall into their power.

On the nineteenth of October the Engliſh parliament met, when the king explained the neceſſity of a preſent ſupply to carry on the war; deſired they would be ſpeedy in their determinations on that ſubject, as they would have the greateſt influence on the princes and ſtates concerned in the alliance againſt France, as a general meeting was appointed to be held at the Hague in the month of November. The houſes were then prorogued for four days, when they again aſſembled; and the commons taking the king's ſpeech into conſideration, unanimouſly reſolved to aſſiſt his majeſty in reducing Ireland, and joining his allies abroad, for a vigorous proſecution of the war againſt France. Accordingly they voted a ſupply of two millions, to be raiſed by a land-tax of three ſhillings in the pound, and additional duties upon coffee, tea, and chocolate. Several motions with regard to grievances having been made in the houſe of commons, the marquis of Halifax, who thought himſelf particularly aimed at, determined to retire from court, and quit the adminiſtration. Accordingly he reſigned the privy ſeal, reconciled himſelf to the tories, and became the chief patron and protector of that party: while the whigs laboured to prevent their obtaining any ſtate preferments.

A. D. 1690.

In hopes of finiſhing the war, William formed a reſolution of going over to Ireland in perſon. Accordingly he came to the houſe of lords, on the ſeventeenth of January, declared his intention, and prorogued the parliament till the twenty-ſecond of April; but on the ſixth of February he diſſolved it, and iſſued writs for calling a new one to meet on the twenty-ſixth of March. During this ſeſſion of parliament, the bill of rights already mentioned was paſſed into a law; together with the act of ſettlement. The revenue of the princeſs of Denmark was ſettled, which had been left unfiniſhed the preceeding ſeſſion. On the twentieth of March the new parliament met at Weſtminſter, and the king opened the ſeſſion by a ſpeech from the throne, in which he gave them to underſtand that he ſtill perſiſted in his reſolution of going in perſon to Ireland; deſired they would ſettle his revenue on him as they had done on his predeceſſors; or at leaſt eſtabliſh it on a fund of credit, on which he might raiſe the neceſſary ſums, for ſupplying his preſent occaſions. He told them he would ſend them an act of grace, with ſome few exceptions; being deſirous of taking from his ſubjects every ſhadow of pretence of raiſing diſturbances during his abſence. He adviſed them to avoid diſſentions; recommended to their conſideration an union with Scotland; and declared he ſhould leave the adminiſtration in the hands of the queen during his abſence; and therefore deſired they would provide an act for that purpoſe, if it was thought neceſſary. The commons proceeded to ſettle the revenue, and make it a fund of credit for the ſupplies that were ſtill wanting for the enſuing campaign. They began with voting a ſupply of one million two hundred thouſand pounds, between that time and Michaelmas. But William could not prevail on them to ſettle his revenue for life. The parliament being ſenſible how deſirous the king was to ſet out for Ireland, diſpatched the buſineſs before them with the greateſt facility; and the royal aſſent being given to ſeveral money bills, the act of indemnity, and ſome other acts of a ſimilar nature, together with a bill for inveſting the queen with the adminiſtration of the government during the king's abſence, his majeſty, with a ſhort ſpeech from the throne, put an end to the ſeſſion.

All due preparations being made, the king embarked on the fourth of June, at High-lake near Cheſter, and landed on the fourteenth at Carrick-Fergus, attended by prince George of Denmark, the duke of Ormond, the earls of Oxford, Scarborough and Mancheſter, and many other perſons of diſtinction. He repaired immediately to Belfaſt, where he was met by the duke of Schomberg, the prince of Wirtemberg, major general Kirke, and other principal officers. On his arrival in Ireland the whole face of affairs was immediately changed. The military operations had been for ſome time ſuſpended by the addreſs of the duke of Schomberg, who carefully avoided coming to an engagement with the enemy, before his majeſty's arrival to head his troops in perſon. James, wearied with a perpetual ſtate of uncertainty, ſeemed deſirous to determine his fate by one deciſive action. William was equally willing to put a final period to all conteſt for the crown of England. Thus determined, the two rivals, with their whole forces, moved towards each other, to decide at once the quarrel that had long divided the kingdom, and deſtroyed ſo many of the innocent inhabitants. William, after refreſhing his troops a few days at Belfaſt, marched to Liſburn, where the duke of Schomberg had fixed his head-quarters, and thence to Hilſborough, ordering the whole army to encamp at Loughbrillen. Here he reviewed his forces, and found they amounted to thirty-ſix thouſand effective men, well armed, and equipped with every particular. In the mean time, James committed the care of guarding Dublin to a body of militia, under the command of Lutterel, and joined his army, now nearly equal to the Engliſh in number, excluſive of about fifteen thouſand men, left in different garriſons. Having advanced to the banks of the river Boyne, he pitched his camp in a very advantageous ſituation. His front was defended by that deep and rapid river, a riſing ground and deep moraſs; ſo that the Engliſh could not attack him without expoſing themſelves to the moſt imminent danger. The jacobite officers therefore were very preſſing with James, not to venture an engagement; but rather reinforce his garriſons, withdraw to the Shannon, and wait the event of the naval preparations then making in France for attacking the Engliſh, and ſending ſuccours to Ireland. But James, determining to decide the conteſt by a general battle, refuſed theſe ſalutary counſels, and made the neceſſary preparations for a deciſive engagement. King William was equally prepared to receive him; but thought proper, before the battle began, to reconnoitre the ſituation of the enemy. Accordingly he advanced to the oppoſite ſide of the river, where, being ſingled out by the enemy, they brought down two field pieces by a hollow way, and planted them againſt his perſon. The firſt ſhot killed a man and two horſes cloſe by his ſide; and the ſecond rebounding from the ground, grazed his right ſhoulder, and produced a conſiderable contuſion. William did not betray the leaſt emotion on this occaſion; but after cauſing his wound to be bound up, he remounted his horſe, and kept on his former pace, only ſaying, "There was no neceſſity for the bullet to come nearer." This accident, however, though of no great moment in itſelf, occaſioned ſome confuſion among his majeſty's attendants; which being obſerved by the enemy, and they no longer ſeeing the king on horſeback, concluded that their balls had effected the intended purpoſe, and that William was killed. They therefore gave a general ſhout, which was echoed through the camp. The news was even ſpread to Dublin, whence it was ſent to Paris, where, contrary to the cuſtom of the French court, the people were ſuffered to expreſs their joy by bonfires and illuminations. When the ſlight wound he had received was dreſſed, the king returned to ſhew himſelf to his army, in order to quiet their apprehenſions. About nine o'clock at night, William called a council of war, and declared his intention of croſſing the river, and giving battle to the enemy. Schomberg ſtrongly oppoſed this meaſure; but the king being abſolutely determined, his plan was adopted by the majority of the council. Schomberg therefore acquieſced, and propoſed that part of the army, horſe and foot, ſhould be ſent that night to Slane-bridge in order to paſs the Boyne, and poſt themſelves between the enemy and the paſs at Duleck. This advice, which if purſued muſt have aſſured the Engliſh of ſucceſs, was objected to, and over-ruled by the Dutch officers; at which the duke was ſo diſguſted that he retired to his tent, whither the order of battle, after being ſettled in the council, was ſent to him. This he conſidered as an additional affront: but the reſpect he owed his ſovereign, kept him from complaining. He only ſaid, with ſome marks of diſcontent, that it was the firſt order of that kind he had ever received. It was reſolved, that next morning lieutenant-general Douglas, with the right wing of the infantry, and Munhardt, count Schomberg, the duke's ſon, ſhould paſs the river at Slane-bridge, in order to poſt themſelves between the enemy's camp and Drogheda; while a body of foot were to force a paſſage over the ford at Old bridge. A council of war was alſo called by James, where it was propoſed by lieutenant-general Hamilton, to ſend a ſtrong party of dragoons to take poſſeſſion of a ford, a little below the town of Drogheda, the ſecuring of which was of the greateſt importance. James, however, by an obſtinate perverſeneſs, would have only ſixty dragoons on that ſervice. The cannonade, which had continued pretty warmly ever ſince the two armies had come in ſight of each other, ceaſed towards the cloſe of the evening. William rode through the whole army by torch light, and retired to his tent, after having given the neceſſary orders for the proper diſpoſitions, and directed his ſoldiers to wear green boughs in their hats during the enſuing action, to diſtinguiſh them from thoſe of the enemy, who wore in theirs pieces of white paper. Near ſix the next morning, being the firſt of July, general Douglas, with young Schomberg, the earl of Portland, and Overkirk, marched to Slane-bridge, and paſſed the river with very little oppoſition. On their gaining the oppoſite bank, they perceived a conſiderable body of the enemy, formed into two lines behind a deep moraſs, which ſecured their front. Douglas, on reconnoitring their diſpoſition, thought it adviſeable to halt for the coming up of a freſh reinforcement, which he knew were on their march to join him; and on their arrival, he ordered the infantry to move towards the moraſs between them and the enemy, while count Schomberg with his cavalry, who could not poſſibly march that way, was ſent round it in order to attack the Iriſh in flank. The enemy no ſooner perceived the motions made by the Engliſh, than they wheeled about, and retreated towards the paſs of Duleck; but being cloſely purſued by the cavalry under young Schomberg, numbers of them were cut to pieces in their retreat, or rather flight. In the mean time William, who was ignorant of what had paſſed between this part of the army and the enemy, but ſuppoſed that his men had, by this time, effected their paſſage over the river, ordered his main body, compoſed of the Dutch guards, the French proteſtant regiment, the Inniſkilling foot, and four battalions of Engliſh, to paſs the river at the Old bridge ford, and attack the enemy. They accordingly forded the river, though the waters were breaſt high; and having gained the oppoſite bank, notwithſtanding a body of muſqueteers ſent to oppoſe them, they drew up into files, and attacked the Iriſh with ſuch fury, that unable to ſupport the charge, they abandoned their intrenchments and retreated. James had imprudently removed his artillery from the bank of the river, which greatly facilitated the landing of the Engliſh; but before all the battalions could form, they were charged with great impetuoſity by general Hamilton, at the head of a conſiderable body of horſe and foot, and the diſpute was, for ſome time, very obſtinate. At laſt the Iriſh foot, who that day behaved very ill, gave way, leaving their horſe to ſuſtain the whole fury of the combat. In the firſt attack, La Caillemote, the friend and inſeparable companion of the intrepid duke Schomberg, received a mortal wound, at the head of the French proteſtants; and, as he was carrying back by four ſoldiers to the Engliſh camp, he encouraged his countrymen, who were ſtill croſſing the river, by calling out to them, "To glory, my good lads, to glory." Schomberg paſſed the ſtream with ſo much hurry, that he could not be perſuaded to put on his arms. Having reached the oppoſite bank, he rode full ſpeed to the French proteſtants, and after putting himſelf at their head, called out, by way of animating them, "Follow me, gentlemen; theſe are your perſecutors:" pointing, at the ſame time, to the French papiſts in the enemy's army. Theſe words were hardly pronounced, when the duke found himſelf ſuddenly attacked by a party of James's guards, who, after being routed, were returning on a full gallop to the main body of their army. The French refugees miſtaking them for ſome of their own troops, ſuffered them to paſs; when ſome of them riding up to the duke, ſurrounded him, and gave him two deſperate wounds on the head. Perceiving their error, and eager to ſave their general, the French proteſtants made ſuch an indiſcreet fire, that they ſhot the duke dead upon the ſpot. The ſmall part of the enemy's guards were immediately cut to pieces; but this was a poor recompence for the loſs of ſo conſummate a general, who thus fell in the field of honour, at the age of eighty-two, crowned with military glory. At the ſame time this accident ſo diſconcerted the Engliſh troops, that they ſeemed for a time to have loſt all their courage; their arms continued inactive; they gave ground apace; while the enemy, elated with this advantage, recovered freſh ſpirits, and returned to the charge with an order that ſeemed to inſure them the victory. They were juſt ready to fall upon the center, when William, who during the whole of the action might be ſaid to be every where, directing the whole by his conduct, paſſed the river at this critical juncture at the head of the left wing, conſiſting of the Daniſh, Dutch, and Inniſkilling horſe, and advanced on a full trot to attack the enemy on their right, who were by this time within muſquet ſhot of the center of the Engliſh infantry. The ſight of William advancing in that regular and undaunted manner to attack them in flank, ſo diſconcerted the Iriſh, that they made a ſudden halt, faced about, and retired to a ſmall village called Dunmore, about half a mile from the paſs, where they made ſo vigorous a ſtand, that the Dutch and Daniſh horſe, though headed by the king in perſon, unable to ſuſtain their terrible fire, gave way; and even the Inniſkillingers themſelves ſhewed a backwardneſs to advance. Shocked at this timidity, William rode up to the latter, and aſked, in a ſharp tone, if this was the behaviour he ought to expect from them. Stung by this reproach, and being acquainted that it was his majeſty that now headed them, they inſtantly reſumed their wonted courage, and returned to the charge with redoubled vigour. At the ſame time the Dutch horſe, rallying their ſeparated men, returned to the charge; and the enemy, after an hour's bloody conflict, were beaten back with conſiderable loſs. In this action, lieutenant-general Hamilton, who had been the principal ſupport of the Iriſh during the whole engagement, was taken priſoner. This accident ſo diſpirited them, that they abandoned the field with great precipitation; but the French and Swiſs guards retreated in good order, William not thinking it prudent to puſh the purſuit beyond the field of battle. In the mean time young Schomberg, having been informed of his father's death, was inſpired with ſo much ardour to revenge his fate, that nothing could oppoſe the fury of his arm. Animated at once with a juſt reſentment, and a noble thirſt for honour, he drove the enemy ſeveral times beyond the village of Duleck, ſtrewing the ground with their dead bodies. Nor could any thing reſtrain his fury, till he received poſitive orders from the king to put a ſtop to the ſlaughter, and return to the ſpot where the foot had halted, and where during night they continued under arms.

In this manner the famous battle of the Boyne concluded, in which the loſs of James amounted to about fifteen hundred men, among whom were the lords Dongan and Carlingford; Sir Neal O'Neal, the marquis of d'Hocquincourt; beſides ſeveral priſoners, the chief of whom was lieutenant-general Hamilton. The Engliſh loſt about five hundred men; an inconſiderable number for the acquiſition of ſo important a battle, had not the famous duke Schomberg, the moſt conſummate general in Europe, been one of the number. William himſelf had nearly ſuffered the ſame fate; for a cannon ball carried away part of his boot. All hiſtorians unite in giving William the higheſt praiſe for the admirable conduct, courage, reſolution, and preſence of mind he diſplayed, during the whole courſe of this memorable action. On the ſucceſs of this, every thing dear to James as a king, or a man of honour, depended; yet he remained an idle ſpectator during the whole engagement, with a few ſquadrons of horſe on the hill of Dunmore, till the count de Lauzun, after the retreat of the French and Swiſs guards, came up to him, and, repreſenting the danger of his being ſurrounded, deſired him to think of a retreat. This advice was readily followed: James went firſt to Dublin, where he reſigned all his authority in that city, and next to Waterford. James having unguardedly ſaid, while he haſtened through Dublin, that he would never more truſt his fate to an Iriſh army, his ſoldiers, upon hearing it, exclaimed, that complaints of cowardice came ill from the mouth of one, who had been the firſt to fly from the battle, and the only perſon, not of foreign birth, who had fled from the kingdom; and that if the Engliſh would change kings with them, they would fight the battle over again. The day after the battle, William made himſelf maſter of Drogheda, and a few days after entered Dublin. But the puſillanimous James embarked on board a veſſel, which he had ordered to be kept in readineſs for him; and arriving ſafely in France, choſe St. Germains for his reſidence.

During the abſence of the king, Mary found that ſhe ſtood in need of all her prudence and authority; and ſhe behaved with a reſolution very uncommon to her ſex. Advice having been received that a French fleet was ready at Breſt for making a deſcent on the Engliſh coaſt, admiral Herbert, earl of Torrington, who lay in the Downs, had orders to ſail directly for Portſmouth, and go in queſt of the enemy. The admiral ſailed immediately to St. Helen's; but while he lay there, advice arrived from Weymouth that the French fleet, conſiſting of ſeventy-eight ſhips of the line and two fire-ſhips, had entered the Engliſh channel. Torrington, though joined by a Dutch ſquadron, did not think himſelf ſtrong enough to give the French battle, as the whole of the combined fleet did not amount to more than fifty-ſix ſail. But having received expreſs orders from the queen to hazard an engagement at all events, he immediately put to ſea with the combined fleet in order to intercept the enemy, ſhould they attempt to ſail up the channel. On the thirtieth of June the two fleets engaged near Beachy-head. The Dutch ſquadron, which compoſed the van, began the engagement about nine in the morning: but their courage exceeded their prudence; and they advanced too far out of the line. The blue ſquadron of the Engliſh alſo engaged with great bravery; but Torrington kept his ſtation, and continued to fight at a diſtance. The French obſerving that the Dutch had advanced far out of the line, collected all their force and totally ſurrounded them. The Dutch exerted their uſual valour; but the enemy being ſo far ſuperior in number, they muſt undoubtedly have fallen a ſacrifice to their raſhneſs, had not their admiral Callenbourgh ordered them to drop their anchors without lowering their ſails, there being then but very little wind. This ſtratagem had the deſired effect. The French, having no ſuſpicion of the deception, were hurried away by the tide, while the others lay ſtill. By which means the Dutch were ſoon out of danger, after having loſt Dick and Brackel, their two rear-admirals, and being obliged to ſink ſeveral of their ſhips, to prevent their falling into the hands of the enemy. In this action the Engliſh loſt two ſhips, two captains, and about four hundred men. The Engliſh admiral retreated, without much oppoſition, to the mouth of the Thames; while the French, after ſtaying about five weeks in the channel, inſulted our coaſts, and burnt the ſmall town of Tinmouth in Devonſhire, with ſeveral merchant ſhips, and then retired to their own ports. Torrington, on his arrival, was ſent for immediately up to London, when he was deprived of his command, and committed to the Tower as a priſoner.

In ſpite of this untoward event, the queen had the pleaſure of finding her wiſe meaſures approved by the majority of the nation; and of receiving addreſſes from the city of London, and many other reſpectable corporations and counties in the kingdom, all declaring unanimouſly, that they would ſpend the laſt drop of their blood in defending her, her royal conſort, and the preſent government. At the ſame time, the agitations of the people were greatly leſſened by the news of the complete victory gained by his majeſty on the banks of the Boyne. The friends of the revolution, after the late defeat at ſea, enjoyed, in their turns, the pleaſure of ſeeing their adverſaries ſorely mortified.

William, having received letters from the queen and council, informing him that his victory at the Boyne had produced the moſt ſalutary effects, determined to continue in Ireland ſome time longer. He now undertook the ſiege of Limeric, a town ſtrongly fortified, and defended by the principal part of James's army. General Douglas, who had in vain purſued them, and made an unſucceſsful attempt upon Athlone, joined the king; and on the twenty-ſeventh of Auguſt, the tenth day after the trenches were opened, he ordered a general ſtorm at a breach twelve yards wide. The troops advanced boldly, carried the counterſcarp, mounted the breach, and ſome of them entered the town; but the inhabitants animating the garriſon, and more troops pouring into the town from the country, after a diſpute of three hours, during which the king loſt five hundred of his Engliſh troops, and upwards of a thouſand foreigners, he was obliged to deſiſt.

His army being now put into winter quarters, William embarked at Waterford with prince George of Denmark, and on the ſixth of September landed at Pill near Briſtol. He immediately ſet out for Windſor, where he was received by the queen and his ſubjects with the higheſt expreſſions of joy. Towards the latter end of this month, the earl of Marlborough, with five thouſand Engliſh troops, diſembarked in the neighbourhood of Cork, and he was joined by the duke of Wirtemberg. The object of theſe forces was the inveſtment of Cork and Kinſale. Preparations were made for beſieging Cork; and the trenches being opened, the batteries played with ſuch fury, that a breach was effected in a very ſhort time. Colonel Mackillicut, governor of Cork, demanding a parly, hoſtages were exchanged; but as he rejected the propoſitions of the Engliſh general, hoſtilities were renewed with additional fury; and in one of the attacks, the duke of Grafton, a young nobleman diſtinguiſhed by his intrepidity, and many other qualifications, who ſerved as a volunteer under Marlborough, was mortally wounded. But upon the Engliſh general making preparations for a general aſſault, the garriſon of Cork ſurrendered; and after taking poſſeſſion of the place, the earl detached brigadier Villiers with a party of horſe and dragoons, to ſummon the town and forts of Kinſale to ſurrender; and he followed the brigadier at the head of the remaining part of his army. The old fort was immediately taken by ſtorm; but the other, which was under the command of Sir Edward Scot, ſuſtained a ſiege for the ſpace of ten days, at the expiration of which time Sir Edward capitulated on honourabe conditions. The reduction of theſe maritime places, intercepted all communication between that quarter of Ireland and France. The earl of Marlborough having atchieved theſe important enterprizes in the ſpace of thirty days, he embarked with his priſoners for England, where he received the congratulations of the public on occaſion of the rapid ſucceſs of his expedition. On the other hand, count Lauzun, commander of the French troops, remained in a ſtate of total inactivity in the neighbourhood of Galway; and he tranſmitted to the court of France ſuch deplorable accounts of his ſituation, that tranſports were ſent to convey his troops home.

Lauzun embarking with them, left the command of the Iriſh troops to the duke of Berwick, who was ſome time after ſucceeded by M. St. Ruth. Upon the arrival of Lauzun at Verſailles, he was diſgraced for having neglected to act in conjunction with the Iriſh troops. Tyrconnel, who had accompanied him in his voyage, applied to the court of France for a ſupply of officers, arms, ammunition, cloaths, and accoutrements; urging, that if his requeſt was complied with, the Iriſh army would continue reſolutely to ſupport the cauſe of James. In the mean time, the Iriſh troops formed themſelves into parties of free-booters, and under the denomination of Rapparees, committed great devaſtations in the country. Thus were the miſerable people of Ireland harraſſed and diſtreſſed beyond all poſſible explanation.

The parliament having met on the ſecond day of October, his majeſty's ſpeech imported, that he had exerted his utmoſt endeavours for reducing the Iriſh to obedience; that his troops had highly merited his approbation; that much injury would reſult to the nation on account of the war not having been proſecuted with ſufficient vigour; that the ſupplies had not been adequate to the unavoidable expences of the nation; that without unanimity in the councils of the kingdom, ſucceſs was not to be expected; and that theſe important ſubjects would be only diſregarded by the enemies of their king and country. The rumour of a conſpiracy among the Jacobites; the late attempt of the French to land on the coaſt of England; the ſingular intrepidity that the king had manifeſted in Ireland; and the puſillanimity of James, contributed to animate the reſentment of the nation againſt the adherents to the abdicated monarch. The houſes of parliament therefore preſented addreſſes reſpectively to the king and queen, extolling his bravery and prudence in war, and her wiſdom and fortitude in the adminiſtration of government, amidſt all the dangers that prevailed during the abſence of her conſort. The commons voted a ſupply of four millions for the ſupport of the army and navy. On the fifteenth of January the parliament was adjourned to the thirty-firſt of March.

A. D. 1691. The king, attended by a numerous retinue, embarked at Graveſend, on the ſixteenth, and ſailed for Holland under a convoy of twelve ſhips of war, commanded by admiral Rooke. On the following day, being informed by a fiſherman that he was within a league and a half of Goree, his majeſty quitted his yacht, and went into an open boat, being accompanied by the duke of Ormond and ſeveral others of the nobility, with a deſign of landing immediately. However, they were unable to reach the ſhore; and, night coming on, they loſt ſight of the fleet. The ſea ran ſo high, that his majeſty and all his attendants were ſeveral times covered by the waves: for eighteen hours they were expoſed to the inclemency of the contending elements, and the danger of being taken by the enemy. Upon hearing ſome of the ſailors expreſs their apprehenſions, his majeſty exclaimed, "What, are you afraid to die in my company?" At day-break the king landed upon the iſland of Goree; and having received ſome refreſhment he returned to the boat, and in the afternoon arrived in the neighbourhood of Maeſland-ſluice. He was met at Hounſlar-dyke by a deputation of the States; and about ſix in the evening he reached the Hague, where he received the congratulations of the States-general, the States of Holland, the council of ſtate, the colleges, and all the foreign miniſters. At the interceſſion of the magiſtrates, the king made a moſt magnificent public entry; and his arrival was celebrated by illuminations, bonfires, and other demonſtrations of joy. The confederates againſt the court of France having reſolved upon holding a ſolemn congreſs at the Hague, king William attended that auguſt aſſembly; to whom he repreſented the dangers to which the ſeveral princes and ſtates were expoſed from the growing power and exorbitant ambition of France; he declared that he would neither ſpare his credit, his troops, or his perſon, in concurring with ſuch meaſures as they ſhould deem expedient; and ſtrongly enforced the neceſſity of acting with vigour and diſpatch; concluding with an aſſurance that, in the ſpring, he would come at the head of his forces to fulfil his engagements. The former delay in their councils, and the jarring of their particular intereſts, had given great advantage to the common enemy; but the addreſs of king William animated them to a perfect unanimity of ſentiment, and their plan of operations was ſpeedily concluded, according to which two hundred and twenty-two thouſand men were to act againſt France the enſuing campaign. Soon after the king embarked for England, where he arrived in the month of April. He next turned his attention to the intended campaign in Ireland, the plan of operations for which being adjuſted, his majeſty returned to Holland, and prepared to take the field. Luxemburgh acted with ſuch caution, as to prevent the allied army taking any advantage of him, though their numbers were greatly ſuperior to his own. The king, finding that he could not bring the enemy to an engagement, gave the command of the army to prince Waldeck; and then returning to the Hague embarked for England, where he landed in October, by which time the war in Ireland was almoſt at an end, though the French had juſt ſent the catholics a ſupply of ammunition, cloaths, and proviſions, under the command of M. St. Ruth, a brave and experienced general.

On the other hand, general Ginckle, who commanded the Engliſh forces, took the field, and inveſted the town of Ballymore, which was defended by a thouſand men under colonel Bourke. The batteries ſoon made a large breach in the walls of a place of no great ſtrength, ſo that nothing remained but to give a general aſſault. But the garriſon ſaved the Engliſh that trouble, by ſubmitting at diſcretion. Seven hundred and eighty men, beſides four field officers, and near three hundred of the rapparees, or Iriſh freebooters, were made priſoners of war. Ginckle, after putting the place in a poſture of defence, marched to Ballymore paſs, where he was joined by the prince of Wirtemberg. Thus reinforced, it was determined to advance towards Athlone, a town ſituated on the other ſide of the Shannon, and defended by the French and Iriſh army, encamped in it's neighbourhood. The Engliſh town, ſituated on this ſide of the river, was taken in two days: many of the Iriſh were ſlain in the attack; and more of them periſhed by falling into the river, in their haſty retreat over the bridge to the Old town. Thus puſhed on by ſucceſs, batteries were erected againſt the Iriſh town, and did ſuch execution, that the caſtle and other ſtrong places were ſoon reduced to heaps of ruins. The garriſon, however, made ſo ſtout a reſiſtance, that the Engliſh general thought proper to call a council of war, to conſider whether it was adviſeable to continue the attack, or abandon the ſiege. The duke of Wirtemberg, the generals Mackay, Talmarſh, Ravigny, and Tettreau, declared themſelves ſtrongly for continuing the ſiege; and propoſed to paſs the Shannon in order to attack the enemy, offering to conduct the attempt in perſon. Their opinions prevailed, and a detachment was ſent to paſs the ſtream, at a ford a little below the town. The river was deep and rapid, the bottom ſlippery and full of large ſtones, and the paſs defended by a battery erected for that purpoſe: but notwithſtanding all theſe difficulties, the Engliſh troops, whoſe courage and intrepidity always increaſe with dangers and difficulties, regardleſs of every thing but glory, threw themſelves into the Shannon, and paſſed the river through the thickeſt of the enemy's fire. Having reached the oppoſite bank, they threw in their hand grenades, and then diſcharged ſuch a volley of ſmall ſhot, that the enemy, unable to ſuſtain the charge, abandoned their works. In the mean time, a reinforcement was ſent to this brave detachment, and the Engliſh, in leſs than an hour, made themſelves maſters of the town, with the loſs of about fifty men. The French general, from a propenſity to that vanity and preſumption ſo common to his countrymen, treated the attempt of the Engliſh to force the paſſage of the Shannon, with a contempt that did little credit to that prudence and circumſpection for which he had been hitherto diſtinguiſhed. In vain did Sarsfield, the Iriſh general, preſs him to ſend ſuccours to the town; he laughed at that officer's apprehenſions; nor was he convinced, till too late, that Engliſh courage was equal to the moſt arduous enterprize. When they had taken poſſeſſion of the town, St. Ruth ordered ſome detachments to march and drive the Engliſh from their conqueſt; but the thunder of the cannon from the ramparts, which was now turned againſt the French, ſoon convinced him of his error, and that his own ſafety depended upon a precipitate decampment. Ginckle, as ſoon as the fortifications of Athlone were repaired, marched in purſuit of the French and Iriſh army, which made a ſtand near Aghrim, a ſmall town about ten miles from Athlone. Here the French general encamped in a very advantageous ſituation; and having, by draughts from different garriſons, increaſed his army to twenty-five thouſand men, while the Engliſh, under general Ginckle, did not exceed eighteen thouſand, reſolved to hazard a general engagement. Ginckle, notwithſtanding his inferiority in numbers, reſolved alſo to fight the enemy. The morning for the attack proved ſo foggy, that it was obliged to be poſtponed till noon, when the Engliſh croſſed the river Suc, oppoſite the enemy's camp. The center of the French and Iriſh was poſted on a riſing ground, uneven in many places, and interſected with banks and ditches, lined with infantry, and ſecured in front by a large bog, almoſt impaſſable: their right was defended by entrenchments, and two Daniſh forts; and their left by the caſtle of Aghrim. When the Engliſh had effected their landing, they marched up to the edge of the great bog, and endeavoured to force the only two places by which it was paſſable, in order to gain the ground on the other ſide. The enemy made a very furious reſiſtance, and repulſed the Engliſh horſe ſeveral times; but at laſt, the troops on the right ſucceeded in their attempt by means of ſome field pieces properly placed, and excellently ſerved. So much time, however, was unavoidably ſpent in theſe manœuvres, that the general was deſirous of deferring the battle till the next morning; but the confuſion he obſerved in the enemy's camp, convinced him that ſomething extraordinary was in agitation, and made him apprehenſive that they intended to retreat during the night. He therefore changed his opinion, and ordered his troops to prepare for the charge. At five in the evening, the Engliſh attacked the right wing of the Iriſh, from whom they met with ſo warm a reception, that it required the utmoſt efforts of their courage and reſolution to make them give ground. The Iriſh infantry that lined the ditches, were well ſupported by the horſe poſted behind them, and maintained their poſt with the moſt intrepid obſtinacy; nor would they ſtir from one ſide of the ditch, till the Engliſh preſented the muzzles of their pieces on the other; and even then, by their lines of communication, they immediately took poſt in the next ditch, where they continued to make the ſame reſolute defence. St. Ruth perceiving that his men were in danger of being overpowered, immediately reinforced them from his center and left wing. Mackey, perceiving this motion, inſtantly ordered two regiments to march round the bog, and fall on the enemy's left wing, weakened by the late detachments; and, at the ſame time, for the center to advance through the middle of the bog, though up to the waſte in mud and water. After gaining, with unſpeakable difficulty, the other ſide, they found themſelves obliged to aſcend a rugged hill, interſected with ditches and hedges, lined with muſqueteers, ſuſtained at proper diſtances with ſquadrons of horſe; there the enemy made ſuch a reſolute ſtand, and fought with ſuch perſeverance, that they puſhed the aſſailants into the middle of the bog; which St. Ruth perceiving, cried out in a bravado, "That he now had the Engliſh at his mercy, and would drive them back to the very gates of Dublin." General Talmarſh haſtened, at this critical moment to their relief, with a freſh body of forces, and gave orders for the broken regiments to halt and face about, which orders were immediately obeyed with unparalleled alacrity and reſolution. The Engliſh now attacked in their turn the Iriſh, who had advanced upon them into the middle of the bog, with ſuch fury, that three hundred of them were killed before they could gain the firm land; and marching forward gained the old ſpot, from whence they had been precipitately driven. In the interim, Ravigny's regiment of French proteſtant horſe, and Sir John Lanier's, being poſted on the right, moved to the left, and did the utmoſt ſervice. The Engliſh cavalry was likewiſe expoſed to a dreadful fire from the enemy's dragoons poſted under a cover, and obliged to preſs through a very dangerous paſs; but all theſe difficulties were not ſufficient to repreſs their ardour: they ſurmounted every difficulty, and at laſt lodged themſelves in a dry ditch in the hotteſt of the enemy's fire from Aghrim caſtle, and ſome old walls and houſes adjoining. At this time the battle ſeemed doubtful; but major-general Mackey, having timely reinforced the left wing with a body of horſe and dragoons, at laſt turned the balance in favour of the Engliſh. Ravigny, who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his diligence, courage, and activity during the whole action, putting himſelf at the head of his own regiment of horſe, ſcoured the ſide of the bog, bearing down all before him. St. Ruth perceiving the execution of this body of horſe, determined to attack Ravigny in a hollow way, through which he knew he muſt paſs in his return to ſuſtain the center. Accordingly, he ordered a brigade of his own horſe from the right wing to march to the left; and putting himſelf at their head, began to deſcend the hill towards the place which he ſaw the Engliſh endeavouring to paſs. When he came near the ſpot where the hotteſt part of the battle was fought, he was killed by a cannon ball. This incident decided the fate of the day. The French and Iriſh were ſo much diſcouraged by the death of their general, that Sarsfield, who was ſecond in command, endeavoured, in vain, to recover them from their diſorder. Ravigny, obſerving their confuſion, preſſed boldly forward, and falling upon them ſword in hand, drove them, with very little reſiſtance, to the top of the hill, where they had at firſt pitched their camp: but their whole line giving way at once, they threw down their arms, and betook themſelves to flight. The Engliſh purſued them cloſely for three miles, and made a moſt dreadful ſlaughter: but night coming on, attended with a thick miſty rain, prevented the Engliſh from cutting off the fugitives from taking ſhelter in an advantageous poſt between them and Loughbreak. It was, however, computed, that no leſs than ſeven thouſand of the Iriſh fell in the action; while the Engliſh loſt no more than ſix hundred killed, and nine hundred and ſixty wounded. Ginckle having allowed a few days for the refreſhment of his troops, marched to Galway, one of the moſt conſiderable places left in the hands of the Iriſh; and immediately ſummoned the lord Dillon, the governor, to ſurrender the place. He, at firſt, refuſed to comply; but ſeeing part of the Engliſh army paſs the river, and ſeize a fort the Iriſh were rebuilding, he changed his reſolution, and having ſafely conducted his garriſon to Limerick, ſurrendered the place on advantageous terms.

On the twenty-fifth of Auguſt general Ginckle took into conſideration the now critical affairs of the Iriſh. The next day the Engliſh made themſelves maſters of Ireton's and Cromwell's forts, now called Mackey's and Naſſau's, from their being taken by theſe commanders. Two days after, Caſtle Connel, and Caſtle Garrick, two ſmall forts ſtanding on the Shannon a few miles below the town, were taken, and the garriſons of both made priſoners of war. Theſe forts being taken, the batteries againſt the town were opened, and the attack carried on with the utmoſt vigour till the ſeventeenth of September. But the reſiſtance of the enemy was ſo obſtinate, and the place ſo well fortified, that a council of war was held in the Engliſh camp, to conſider whether it would not be more eligible to paſs the river, and cut off the enemy's forage and proviſions, and turn the ſiege into a blockade, than to hazard the lives of ſo many brave men in fruitleſs attacks. The former expedient was preferred, and ſome ſteps taken for putting it in practice. This inſpired the Iriſh with the moſt flattering hopes, taking it for granted from perceiving theſe motions in the Engliſh camp, that they were preparing to raiſe the ſiege. But theſe flattering appearances were of ſhort duration; for on a ſecond conſultation of the Engliſh, it was reſolved to preſs the ſiege, and, at all events, make themſelves maſters of the town. Accordingly, the Engliſh, on the night of the eighteenth, threw a bridge over the river, about a mile above the camp, and a ſtrong party of horſe and foot were ſent over it. This ſudden movement ſtruck the enemy who guarded the oppoſite ſide of the river with ſuch a panic, that they threw down their arms and ſought their ſafety in flight. On the twenty-ſecond, general Ginckle himſelf paſſed the Shannon, at the head of a ſtrong party of horſe, and dragoons, ten battalions of foot, and fourteen pieces of cannon; leaving Wirtemberg, Mackey, and Talmarſh, to command the troops on the hither ſide of the Shannon. Theſe meaſures being taken, the ſiege was preſſed with redoubled vigour, and the batteries played againſt the town with great fury. In a few days, the Engliſh made themſelves maſters of ſeveral out-forts, and made a lodgment at the foot of Thomond bridge; the Iriſh finding themſelves cut off from all hopes of relief, determined to capitulate, which they accordingly did on the twenty-ninth of September. By theſe articles, called the treaty of Limerick, the Iriſh were indemnified and reſtored to the enjoyment of the exerciſe of their religion, which they poſſeſſed in the reign of Charles II. They were admitted to all the privileges of ſubjects, on their taking the oaths of allegiance, without being obliged to take the oath of ſupremacy; and not only the French, but as many of the Iriſh as choſe to go over to France, had free liberty to follow their inclinations. On the other hand, Limerick, and all other towns, forts, and caſtles, which yet remained in the hands of the catholics, were to be delivered up within a limited time. Accordingly, the place was put into the hands of the Engliſh on the fifth; the French and many of the Iriſh were ſent away in tranſport veſſels; while the remainder of the army in the field ſubmitted to be included in the amneſty. By this train of ſucceſſes, Ireland was entirely ſubjected to the crown of England, and a ſolid peace eſtabliſhed between the two kingdoms, which has ſubſiſted to the preſent time without the leaſt interruption. On Ginckle's return to England, he was received with the higheſt applauſe, and, together with all his general officers, elegantly entertained by the city of London. The commons alſo, at the meeting of parliament, preſented to the general, as a token of the important ſervices he had performed for the ſtate, the thanks of their houſe. Soon after his majeſty created him earl of Athlone, and baron of Aghrim, that he might convey to his poſterity the honour of his glorious atchievements. At the ſame time, he was preſented with lands in Ireland to a very large amount, in order to enable him to ſupport his new dignities.

About the middle of October, both houſes of parliament met for the diſpatch of buſineſs. The ſeſſion was opened by a ſpeech from the throne, wherein his majeſty told the two houſes, that he hoped the ſucceſs his forces had met with in Ireland, would be a great encouragement to them to aſſiſt him with freſh ſupplies: he recommended to them the neceſſity of keeping a ſtrong fleet at ſea, and an army of ſixty-five thouſand land forces, that they might annoy the enemy in the moſt ſenſible part; adding, that they had now an opportunity of eſtabliſhing the future quiet and proſperity of the nation; and which, if now loſt, might never more be recovered. Both houſes preſented addreſſes of congratulation to the king on his happy return, and alſo on the ſucceſs of his arms in Ireland; promiſing to aſſiſt him in carrying on a vigorous war againſt France, in order to procure an honourable peace for his own dominions, and ſecure his friends from the ambitious deſigns of the common oppreſſor. A proclamation was alſo publiſhed for a public thankſgiving on the twenty-ſixth of November. Addreſſes were alſo preſented to the queen, acknowledging her prudent care in the adminiſtration of affairs during the abſence of the king.

It was however ſoon evident, notwithſtanding theſe expreſſions of gratitude, that a ſtrong party was formed by the tories againſt the government, who could not approve of the maxims or conduct of the king. They inveighed both in public and private againſt the folly and extravagance of keeping on foot a ſtanding army; they inſiſted that England ought only to aſſiſt the allies with a certain quota of auxiliary troops; and that the management of affairs at ſea, were chiefly to be regarded. To this the advocates of the court replied, that without the interpoſition of England, the grand alliance would never have taken place; nor could a ſtop have been put to the ſpreading conqueſts of Lewis, who would ſoon have reduced both Flanders and Holland, and conſequently have deſtroyed the commerce, and even the liberties of England. The arguments againſt continental connections were ſo well adapted to the taſte of the public, that the preſent government was, in general, greatly cenſured. Another cauſe of murmurs was the evident partiality the king ſhewed to the Dutch over the Engliſh; and it was almoſt univerſally aſſerted, that the former were the only perſons favoured and truſted, while the Engliſh were wholly overlooked. It muſt, indeed, be confeſſed, that William took too little pains to remove the general diſguſt which ſpread itſelf among both the Engliſh officers and nobility, or to gain the affections of his Britiſh ſubjects. He continued in his cloſet the greater part of the day, with one or two of his particular friends, who were his own countrymen; while the ſullen ſilence he generally obſerved when any of the Engliſh nobility were admitted to an audience, was nearly as diſguſting as an abſolute denial. The earl of Marlborough, thinking his ſervices were not ſufficiently rewarded, began to ſpeak the language of diſcontent. However the commons, on the ninth of November, voted upwards of a million and a half for the ſervice of the navy and ordinance, and above two millions for the land forces during the enſuing year; beſides the ſupplies voted the preceding ſeſſion for the civil liſt, and other contingencies; ſo that about five millions were raiſed this year. The king, on the twenty-fourth of December, came to the houſe of peers, and gave the royal aſſent to ſeveral acts; after which his majeſty made a ſpeech to both houſes, thanking them for their reſolution of ſupporting him; but preſſed them to haſten the remainder of the ſupplies, that the enemy might not take the field before him, as they had done the laſt campaign. But this diſpatch, ſo greatly deſired by the king, was retarded by ſeveral incidental affairs to which the houſe was obliged to attend.

A. D. 1692. As ſoon as the funds for the enſuing campaign were ſettled, the king came to the houſe of peers on the twenty-fourth of February, and gave the royal aſſent to the money, and ſeveral other bills, after which he cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſhort ſpeech, wherein he thanked his parliament for the zeal and attachment they had ſhewn to his government, and the liberality and diſpatch with which they had provided for the neceſſities of the ſtate, and informed them of his reſolution of repairing ſpeedily to the continent. The moſt remarkable tranſaction which happened during this ſeſſion, was the diſgrace of the earl of Marlborough, whom the king cauſed to be informed by the ſecretary of ſtate, that having no farther occaſion for his ſervices, he muſt reſign all his commiſſions. His counteſs was alſo forbid the court; and the princeſs of Denmark was deſired to diſmiſs her from her family, which ſhe refuſing to comply with, it occaſioned a quarrel between her and the queen, ſoon after which her royal highneſs removed from court to Sion-houſe, which the duke of Somerſet had lent her.

Lewis entered into a correſpondence with the jacobite party in England, by whoſe aſſiſtance he hoped to make an invaſion on the coaſt of Suſſex. With this view he drew together a great number of tranſports, and a conſiderable body of forces, both which were in perfect readineſs before our court received the leaſt intimation of it. The fleet of tranſports, which conſiſted of three hundred ſail, was amply provided with every thing neceſſary for the invaſion. Count d'Etrees, with a ſquadron of twelve men of war, was to eſcort the embarkation; while Tourville cruized in the channel with the grand fleet, which was ready to put to ſea, but detained by contrary winds. Previous to theſe preparations, James had ſent over colonel Parker, and ſome other agents of his, to inform his friends in England of his motions. Theſe perſons employed themſelves, with the utmoſt privacy, in inliſting men in the counties of York and Lancaſter, and the biſhopric of Durham. In the mean time Mr. James Fountaine, lieutenant-colonel to the lord Montgomery, and colonel Holman, were forming two regiments of horſe in London, who were to join James on his landing. But their violent zeal betrayed them; for having, from ſome ſlight cauſe, imagined that rear-admiral Carter was diſaffected to the government of king William, they opened the whole ſcheme to him. He was no ſooner poſſeſſed of this important ſecret, than he divulged it to the queen and council, who ordered him to continue the deception, which he did ſo effectually, that the credulous conſpirators gave into the ſnare, to the deſtruction of their plot and fleet. They immediately ſent an expreſs to James, to acquaint him with their having corrupted Carter; and at the ſame time ſent a liſt of the ſhips which compoſed the Engliſh fleet, and deſired that Lewis would ſend expreſs orders to Tourville to attack them before they could be joined by the Dutch ſquadron from Holland. The French king, elated with ſuch favourable appearances, commanded Tourville to put to ſea, and fall upon the Engliſh fleet, without waiting for the ſquadron under count d'Etrees. James now went to La Hogue on the coaſt of Normandy, where he held himſelf in readineſs to embark with his army. When queen Mary received intelligence of theſe proceedings, ſhe publiſhed a proclamation, requiring all papiſts to quit the cities of London and Weſtminſter; a ſecond for aſſembling both houſes of parliament; and a third for apprehending the earls of Scarſdale, Litchfield, Newburgh, Middleton, and Dunmore; the lords Griffin and Forbes; Sir John Fenwicke, Sir Theophilus Oglethorpe, Sir Andrew Forreſter, and ſeveral others, who were ſuppoſed to be in James's intereſt; and on the ſixth of May, the earls of Huntingdon and Marlborough, with the lords Brudenell and Fanſhaw, were ſent to the Tower; and Mr. Edward Ridley, Mr. Knevitt, Mr. Haſtings, and Mr. Robert Ferguſon, to Newgate, on violent ſuſpicion of high treaſon in abetting and adhering to their majeſties enemies. Orders were ſent to admiral Ruſſel, then lying at St. Helen's, to haſten to ſea; and the queen in perſon reviewed the trained bands of London and Weſtminſter, amounting to about ten thouſand men. Immediately on his arrival at Holland, William had haſtened the naval preparations there with unuſual diligence, ſo that the Dutch fleet was ſoon ready to put to ſea; and thirty-ſix ſail, under admiral Allemonde, joined our fleet at St. Helen's about the middle of May, which was ſoon after further reinforced by the ſquadron under Sir Ralph Delaval from the Mediterranean, and admiral Carter from the channel. Admiral Ruſſel immediately weighed anchor, and ſteered over to the coaſt of France. On the nineteenth of May, about three o'clock in the morning, the ſcouts to the weſtward of the fleet made the ſignal for diſcovering the enemy. The admiral immediately gave orders for forming the line of battle, which by eight was in good order; the Dutch ſquadron being in the van, our red ſquadron in the center, and the blue in the rear. Tourville was aſtoniſhed at the ſight of the combined ſquadrons, and might eaſily have avoided an engagement; but having received poſitive orders to fight, he reſolved to obey them at all events, and bore down upon our fleet with great reſolution. About half an hour after eleven, Tourville, in a firſt rate ſhip called the Riſing Sun, carrying one hundred and four guns, brought to, and began the fight with admiral Ruſſel in leſs than muſket ſhot. In this poſture the French admiral continued about an hour and a half, plying his guns very briſkly; but then began to tow off in great diſorder, his rigging, ſails, and topſail-yard, being greatly damaged. The wind about noon ſhifted to the north-weſt, ſo that five of the enemy's blue ſquadron poſted themſelves two a-head and three aſtern of their admiral, where they continued a very briſk fire till after three. The admiral, and his two ſeconds captain Churchill and captain Aylmer, had all theſe ſhips to contend with. About four, the fog became ſo thick, that the enemy could not be ſeen; and, as ſoon as it cleared up, the French admiral was diſcovered towing away to the northward. Admiral Ruſſel immediately crowded ſail after him, making ſignals ſignals to the reſt of the fleet to chaſe. While this paſſed between the admirals, Sir Cloudeſley Shovel had got to the windward of Tourville's ſquadron, and engaged them; but the fog becoming thicker than before, they were obliged to come to an anchor; the weather ſoon after clearing up, the French followed their flying admiral, while the Engliſh purſued them with all the ſail they could ſet. Soon after the blue ſquadron of the Engliſh fell in again with the enemy, engaged them about three quarters of an hour; when the latter, after loſing four ſhips, bore away for Conquet-road. In this ſhort action, admiral Carter was mortally wounded; but on his leaving the deck, requeſted his lieutenant to fight the ſhip, as long as ſhe was able to keep up.

The ſucceeding day being dark and foggy, it was eight o'clock before the Engliſh diſcovered the enemy's fleet; when a general chaſe began, the French crowding away to the weſtward. Both fleets came to an anchor near cape La Hogue about four in the afternoon.

The Engliſh reſumed the chaſe the next morning with all the ſucceſs they could deſire. About eleven, the French admiral ran the Riſing Sun aſhore, near Cherbourg, where ſhe was burnt, together with the Admirable, a ſhip of one hundred and two guns, the Conquerant, of eighty, and three others of leſſer force, by Sir Ralph Delaval. Eighteen ſhips of the French fleet took ſhelter in La Hogue; where thirteen of them were burnt by admiral Rooke, who, at the ſame time deſtroyed a great many tranſports, loaded with ammunition; amidſt a terrible fire from their forts, and in ſight of king James's camp. In the mean time Sir John Aſhby, with the blue ſquadron, and ſeveral Dutch ſhips, purſued the reſt of the French fleet, which endeavoured to eſcape through the race of Alderney, among ſuch rocks and ſhoals, that the Engliſh could not venture to follow them without the moſt imminent danger of being daſhed to pieces. Beſides the Riſing Sun, of one hundred and four guns, the French loſt another ſhip of one hundred and two, one of ninety, two of eighty, four of ſeventy-ſix, four of ſixty, and two of fifty guns. Could Sir John Aſhby have come up with that part of the enemy's fleet which took ſhelter in St. Malo's, it would, in a great meaſure, have annihilated the French power at ſea. It muſt, however, be conſidered as a very ſignal victory, and has accordingly rendered the memories of the great men who atchieved it, immortal. From this period to the concluſion of the peace, the French did not any more attempt to engage the Engliſh at ſea; contenting themſelves with diſtreſſing our trade with their privateers and ſmall veſſels.

Sir John Aſhby being ordered by admiral Ruſſel to ſcour the French coaſt as far as Havre de Grace, returned to England to refit his ſhips, none of which were loſt in the late glorious engagement, and ſupply the fleet with proviſions. The news of the fleets being come to an anchor at Spithead no ſooner arrived in London, than the queen ſent down thirty thouſand pounds to be diſtributed among the ſailors, and gold medals for the officers, to expreſs the ſenſe ſhe entertained of their courage and fidelity. She alſo gave orders that the bodies of admiral Carter and Captain Haſtings of the Sandwich, the only two officers of note who loſt their lives in the engagement, ſhould at the charge of the crown be honourably interred.

On the fourth of November the parliament met, when the king in his ſpeech to both houſes, thanked them for their laſt ſupply, congratulated them on the late victory obtained at ſea, condoled with them on the bad ſucceſs of the laſt campaign on the continent; and obſerved, that the diligence of the French in augmenting their forces, was ſo remarkable, that it was abſolutely neceſſary to have as great a force to oppoſe them. He intimated a deſign of making a deſcent upon France, and demanded large ſupplies for proſecuting the war with due ſpirit.

Several noblemen, among whom was Marlborough, having been committed to priſon, and admitted to bail by the court of King's Bench, the peers declared their reſolution of aſſerting their violated rights. The judges were ſummoned to attend the houſe, and upon witneſſes being examined, touching the evidence againſt the commitment of the lords, who had been remanded to the Tower, a vehement debate took place; and the opinion of the judges proving unſatisfactory, the matter was referred to a committee of the whole houſe, who paſſed a reſolution, purporting, that in purſuance of the Habeas Corpus act, it was the duty of the judges, on gaol delivery, to diſcharge the priſoner on bail, if committed for high treaſon, unleſs it be made appear, upon oath, that there are two witneſſes againſt the ſaid priſoner, who cannot be produced until the ſeſſions or goal delivery. A warm debate then took place, as to the manner of reſtoring the lords to liberty; and the controverſy being maintained with great vehemence, the fears of the courtiers dictated an expedient, which was productive of the deſired effect. The houſe being purpoſely adjourned to the ſeventeenth day of the month, the king releaſed the noblemen from priſon; and both houſes were made acquainted with the late proceedings. After another ſpirited debate, a formal entry was made in the journals, purporting, that the houſe being informed of his majeſty's having given orders for the diſcharge of the lords under bail in the King's Bench, no further debate on the ſubject ſhould take place. The reſentment of the peers being thus appeaſed, they proceeded to the conſideration of his majeſty's ſpeech. Having paſſed a bill for regulating trials in caſes of high treaſon, the commons preſented addreſſes to the king and queen, wherein they acknowledged the goodneſs of the Almighty in reſtoring the king to his people; congratulated his majeſty upon his happy delivery from the machinations of his enemies, profeſſed and ſecret, and aſſured him, that they would, on all occaſions, exert their utmoſt endeavours in ſupport of his government. It was hence expected, that the ſupplies would be the next matter taken under the conſideration of parliament; but the houſe, inſtead of proceeding upon this buſineſs, inſiſted upon examining the treaties, public accounts, and eſtimates, that they might be better qualified to aſſiſt his majeſty with their advice. Complaints were likewiſe made, by ſome members, reſpecting the partiality ſhewn to foreign generals, and they ſeverely animadverted on the miſconduct of count Solmes, and his behaviour at the battle of Steenkirk. After warm altercations and debates, which had more the appearance of rude obſtinacy than genuine patriotiſm, it was reſolved, that a petition ſhould be preſented to the king, praying him to appoint a native of England to the command of the Engliſh army, and to beſtow ſuch vacant commiſſions as might happen among general officers, only upon Engliſhmen. Two millions of money were then voted to diſcharge the ſubſidies of the electors of Hanover and Saxony, to defray the expences incurred by the continental war, and for the ſubſiſtence of the land forces. With reſpect to the above parliamentary complaints, the king anſwered in general terms, that whatever was amiſs ſhould be rectified as ſoon as poſſible.

A. D. 1693.

On the fourteenth of March, the king put an end to the ſeſſion, during the courſe of which, lord Mohun was indicted and tried by his peers, as an accomplice in the murder of Montford, a celebrated comedian;

the marquis of Caermarthen acting as lord ſteward upon this occaſion. The judges having been conſulted, the peers proceeded to give their judgments ſeriatim, and Mohun was acquitted by a great majority. Admiral Ruſſel was now created treaſurer of the houſhold, but the command of the fleet was veſted in the hands of Killigrew, Delaval, and Shovel. William having viſited the fleet and fortifications of Portſmouth, gave inſtructions for annoying the enemy by ſea and land, and left the adminiſtration in the hands of the queen, embarked on the laſt day of March near Graveſend, and arrived in Holland on the third of April. Lewis had by this time taken the field, attended by madame de Maintenon, and other miniſters of pleaſure; but after having gratified his vanity, by reviewing his army, he committed the command of his forces to the duke of Luxemburgh. This general, conſcious of his ſuperiority over the confederate forces, and knowing that William's army muſt be greatly weakened, reſolved to attack the king in his camp, or at leaſt to fall upon his rear in his retreat. Accordingly he made a motion towards Liege, as if he intended to inveſt that place, pitching his camp at Heidelſhaim, about ſeven leagues from that of the confederates. On the twenty-ninth of July, he began his march in four columns, and paſſed the Sare without oppoſition. The king had left his camp a few days before to relieve Huy, which the French had inveſted. But on his march he was informed that Huy had ſurrendered, and that the van of the Engliſh enemy's army was advancing towards him. William, on this intelligence, changed his march; directing his rout to the neighbourhood of Heſpen, near Landen, where he halted, to procure more certain accounts of the intention of the enemy. And being informed that the whole French army was advancing againſt him, he reſolved to keep his ground, and immediately drew up his forces in order of battle. But his diſpoſition was ſo erroneous, that Luxemburgh cried out on obſerving it, "Now I believe that Waldeck is dead;" alluding to that general's known ſagacity in chuſing his ground for an engagement. Early the next morning, the French appeared on the high ground, and ſoon after deſcended in good order into the plain; though the cannon of the allied army played on them very furiouſly the whole time. About eight they attacked the villages of Lare, and Neer-winden with great impetuoſity. Luxemburgh and the princes of France, at the head of the houſhold troops, carried the latter village ſword in hand two different times; but the inſtant the marſhal turned another way, the allies recovered it. At length, the French outnumbering the confederates, preſſed on with reſiſtleſs fury, freſh men ſtill ſupplying the ranks that were broken by the well-ſerved artillery of the king's camp. The battle now increaſed and continued till near ſun-ſet, when Luxemburgh having carried the village of Neer-winden a third time, and the confederates being wearied out with the heat of the day, the enemy with great difficulty and loſs forced their camp with their horſe. William, who through the whole day ſignalized himſelf by the greateſt efforts of courage, ſeeing all loſt, and fearing he ſhould be ſurrounded by the French troops, drew off his army, and retreated in as good order as ſo preſſing a ſituation would admit. The enemy had little reaſon to boaſt of a victory ſo dearly obtained, having loſt eight thouſand common men, and two thouſand officers, either killed or mortally wounded. On the ſide of the allies twelve thouſand men were killed, the duke of Ormond, after receiving ſeveral wounds, was taken priſoner; the count de Solmes had his leg ſhot off by a cannon ball, of which he died in a few hours; and they loſt ſixty pieces of cannon and nine mortars. The French were ſo much weakened by this engagement, that they either were not able, or did not think it prudent to purſue the confederates; while William having ſent orders to the duke of Wirtemburgh to join him, and the diſperſed ſoldiers returning to their colours, the army was ſo well recruited, that in a few days the king again took the field, and offered the enemy battle, which they did not think proper to accept. Nothing remarkable happened during the remainder of this campaign, except the reduction of Charleroy, which ſurrendered to the enemy on honourable terms, after ſuſtaining a ſiege of twenty-ſix days.

The Engliſh met with the ſame ill fortune by ſea this year, as the allies did by land. About the middle of May, the fleet aſſembled at St. Helen's, and were ſoon after joined by the Dutch. It was reſolved that Sir George Rooke ſhould convoy the merchant fleet going to the Mediterranean, amounting in all to above four hundred ſail, belonging to England, Holland, Denmark, Sweden, Hamburgh and Flanders; but ſuch was the indolence either of the admirals or the higher powers, that this fleet did not ſail till the beginning of June; when it was agreed that the combined fleets ſhould accompany the trading veſſels fifty leagues to the weſtward of Uſhant, where they were to leave Sir George Rooke, with a ſquadron of twenty-three ſhips of war, to proceed with them to their deſtined ports. The admirals, having received no intelligence of the enemy's motions, reſolved at random to purſue a plan without conſidering the event. Admiral Rooke had no ſooner arrived off Cape St. Vincent, on the coaſt of Portugal, than he diſcovered the French fleet, under the command of the counts de Tourville and d'Etrees, amounting to eighty ſail. In this exigence, a council of war being called, it was reſolved that orders ſhould be ſent to the ſmall ſhips that were near the land, and therefore not likely to keep up with the fleet, to endeavour in the night to ſlip into the neighbouring ports of Faro, St. Lucar, or Cadiz, while the admiral ſhould ſtand off to ſea with an eaſy ſail, for the protection of the reſt. About ſix in the evening the French admiral came up with the leeward and ſternmoſt ſhips of the confederate fleet; theſe were Dutch men of war, commanded by the captains Schrijver and Vander Poel, who finding it impoſſible to avoid an engagement, ſtood in for the ſhore, and therefore drew the enemy after them, which ſaved the reſt of the fleet. The Dutch captains, however, made a very obſtinate defence, and for five hours together bravely fought firſt eleven, and afterwards ſeven of the enemy's ſhips; till being at length overpowered with numbers, they were obliged to ſubmit. In the mean time admiral Rooke ſtood off all night with a freſh gale, and the next morning had the pleaſure of ſeeing fifty-four ſhips of the convoy about him. At the ſame time he diſcovered five ſail of the enemy's fleet to leeward, and one to windward; the laſt continued to follow him all the next day. On the nineteenth, the admiral made a ſignal for the captains of the men of war and merchant men to come on board his ſhip, in order to procure an account of the condition they were in, and concert proper meaſures for their ſecurity. The reſult was, the admiral bore away for the Madeiras, where he hoped to meet with a part of his ſcattered fleet, and having ſupplied himſelf with wood, water, and other neceſſaries, he ſet ſail for Ireland, and arrived on the third of Auguſt at Cork with about fifty ſail, including ſhips of war and trading veſſels. The trade of the Engliſh and Dutch ſuſtained a ſevere loſs; ſeven large Smyrna ſhips were taken, excluſive of four which were burnt or ſunk at Gibraltar: and M. Tourville and the count d'Etrees took two Dutch men of war, burnt a rich pinnace and an Engliſh man of war; they alſo took twenty-nine merchantmen, and deſtroyed about fifty more. The value of theſe ſhips and their cargoes was computed at a million ſterling: but had the French admirals exerted themſelves properly, the loſs to the confederates muſt have been four millions at leaſt. The French admiral ſtood away for Cadiz, in order to make an attempt upon that place, but found it impracticable. They then bombarded Gibraltar, where the merchants ſunk their ſhips to prevent their falling into the hands of the enemy. From Gibraltar they entered the Streights, and proceeded along the coaſt of Spain; burnt ſeveral Engliſh and Dutch ſhips at Malaga and Alicant; and about the latter end of September returned to Toulon.

For ſome time paſt the trade of England had ſuffered very ſeverely from the privateers of St. Malo's. Never did one port ſend out ſo great a number of thoſe, or even acquire in ſo ſhort a ſpace of time, ſo much wealth, without engaging in any branch of commerce. The ſea was covered with their ſhips from the Channel to the Mediterranean; and their very names were become a terror to the merchants of London, Amſterdam, and Cadiz. The repeated complaints of the ſufferers by this depredatory war, ſo alarmed the Engliſh government, that a reſolution was taken to deſtroy St. Malo's, the port of theſe formidable enemies to the trade of the confederates. Purſuant to this reſolution, commodore Benbow, and captain Philips a famous engineer, were appointed commanders of this expedition. Every thing being ready, they put to ſea, with a ſquadron of twelve men of war, four bomb-ketches and other veſſels, and arrived before St. Malo's on the ſixteenth of November. After bombarding the town for three days, they took the advantage of a freſh gale of wind, a ſtrong tide, and very dark weather, on the night of the nineteenth, when they ſent in a fireſhip of a particular conſtruction, with a deſign to lay the whole town in aſhes. This would undoubtedly have been the conſequence, had not the effect been prevented by an accident; for when ſhe had arrived within piſtol ſhot of the town where they intended to have moored her, a ſudden guſt of wind drove her upon a rock, where ſhe continued immoveable. At laſt, the engineer who was on board perceiving her ſides beginning to open, and fearing ſhe might ſink, ſet fire to her. The exploſion was ſo terrible, as to ſhake the whole town like an earthquake. The inhabitants were ſtruck with ſuch conſternation, that a ſmall body of troops might have taken the place; but the miniſtry, by an effect of their uſual inattention, occaſioned, perhaps, ſomewhat worſe, had ſent out this ſquadron, without a ſingle ſoldier on board. Sir George Rooke's ſquadron was by this time arrived in England, and laid up: and with Benbow's expedition ended the naval tranſactions of this year; as little to the honour of the Engliſh as any during the whole courſe of the war. This continued ſeries of misfortunes, threw the whole nation into confuſion: every individual in the kingdom exclaimed againſt the miniſtry, and even openly accuſed them of treachery to their country. The weight of this accuſation fell chiefly on the earls of Nottingham, Killegrew, and Delaval; two of the admirals, the marquis of Caermarthen, and the earl of Rocheſter. But whether they were guilty or not of the charge is uncertain; they were at leaſt known to have been firmly attached to the late king, and not yet thoroughly reconciled to the preſent government, though they poſſeſſed ſome of the moſt lucrative and honourable poſts in the ſtate. While the Engliſh were thus repining under their loſſes, the French were ſtarving amidſt their victories. That kingdom laboured under a moſt dreadful famine, which ſwept away many thouſands, and reduced the whole nation to poverty and diſtreſs. In this alarming conjuncture, Lewis thought it incumbent on him to free his country, if poſſible, from that deſtructive war, which his own unbounded ambition had occaſioned. In order to this, he attempted to make a ſeparate peace with ſome of the allies; but as his demands were ſtill ſo exorbitant as to afford the confederates no proſpect of a juſt and honourable peace, they rejected his offers.

About the latter end of October William returned to England; when his firſt care was that of ſilencing the murmurs of his people, by making a thorough change in his miniſtry. The earl of Nottingham was now laid aſide, and his place ſupplied by the earl of Shrewſbury. The command of the fleet was taken from the hands of the commiſſioners, and committed ſolely to the care of the intrepid admiral Ruſſel. In a word, the tory party were obliged to make way for their antagoniſts the whigs; thoſe only who were known to be firm friends to the revolution being continued in office. Theſe meaſures were chiefly owing to the repreſentations of the earl of Sunderland, who had acquired a conſiderable influence with his majeſty, and found means to perſuade him that the whigs only were his true friends: while the tories, under the maſk of pretended loyalty, were in their hearts devoted to the intereſt of their late ſovereign. The parliament, on the ſeventeenth of November, met at Weſtminſter; when the ſeſſion was opened by a ſpeech from the throne, in which his majeſty took notice of ſeveral diſadvantages the allies had ſuſtained, and alſo of our own miſcarriages at ſea. The former, he obſerved, were occaſioned by the ſuperior number of the enemy, in all places; and with regard to the latter, he declared he would make them the object of a particular and ſtrict enquiry; promiſed to inflict the ſtricteſt juſtice on all who ſhould, after a fair trial, appear to have been wanting in their duty; and alſo uſe his utmoſt endeavours to appoint ſuch perſons who ſhould, for the future, conduct the naval affairs in the moſt beneficial manner. He recommended to the parliament the increaſing the Engliſh forces both by ſea and land, the allies having taken the ſame reſolution; and concluded with requeſting the commons to take ſuch early reſolutions, that their ſupplies might be effectual, and the preparations in ſuch forwardneſs, as could not fail of inſuring the ſafety and honour of the nation. The commons, in anſwer to this ſpeech, unanimouſly reſolved, "That they would ſupport their majeſties and their government, and grant a ſufficient ſupply for a vigorous proſecution of the war." But before they proceeded on that ſubject, they thought proper to make a ſtrict enquiry into the cauſes that occaſioned the miſcarriages of the fleet laſt ſummer. This enquiry took up a conſiderable ſpace of time. Great exceptions were made againſt the many delays, by which the houſe ſuſpected a train was laid to prevent the Smyrna fleet from ſailing out of the Engliſh harbours, till the French had ſufficient notice of the deſign, in order to be ready to intercept them. Our want of intelligence was much complained of; the inſtructions which the admirals who commanded the fleet had received from the cabinet-council, were conſidered as badly drawn up, and worſe executed. The orders appeared ambiguous and defective; nor had the commanders ſhewed any zeal to do any thing more than ſtrictly to obey them, which they had done with the moſt ſcrupulous attention; they had uſed no methods to procure certain intelligence concerning the French fleet, whether it was at ſea, or ſtill in Breſt harbour. Inſtead of which, they had truſted to general and uncertain reports, though a fleet of the utmoſt conſequence to the nation was intruſted to their care; nor had they failed far enough with Rooke to ſee him paſt danger. To theſe charges they anſwered; but though their reaſons were thought far from being ſufficient to juſtify the meaſures they had purſued, yet, as they had obeyed their orders, they could not be puniſhed; and accordingly a vote paſſed in their favour. On the twenty-fifth of November the commons proceeded to take into conſideration the eſtimates and ſupplies for the enſuing year, when they voted five hundred thouſand pounds to pay the arrears due to the ſeamen; two millions for the ſervice of the fleet; and two millions five hundred thouſand pounds for the army, which it was reſolved to augment to the number of eighty-three thouſand one hundred and eighty-one effective men, officers included; and there appearing a deficiency of one hundred and eighteen thouſand pounds in the late annuity act, the ſum was agreed to be made good by enlarging the time for paying in the ſum of one million, intended to be raiſed by that act; and towards raiſing the money for the maintenance of the fleet, it was agreed, that any perſon might add a ſecond life to that already named in the annuity act, upon paying in the additional ſum of thirty-five pounds per cent. and a third life for the farther ſum of twenty pounds per cent.

A. D. 1694. During this year the nation ſuſtained another misfortune, by the loſs of Sir Francis Wheeler, with a number of ſhips under his convoy. He had received inſtructions to eſcort the merchant ſhips, bound to Turky, Spain, and Italy; to cruiſe thirty days in a certain latitude for the protection of the homeward-bound Spaniſh fleet; to leave part of his ſquadron at Cadiz, as convoy to the trade for England; to proceed with the reſt to the Mediterranean; to form a junction with the Spaniſh fleet on his return, and to act in concert with them, till he ſhould be joined by the fleet from Turky and the Streights, which he was to convoy home. In January, Sir Francis arrived at Cadiz, and leaving admiral Hopſon there, he ſailed for the Mediterranean. While he was in the Bay of Biſcay, a violent tempeſt aroſe, in which many of his ſhips were driven on ſhore or ſunk; the admiral's ſhip foundered, and all his crew, except two negroes, periſhed. The remaining part of the fleet ſuſtained ſo much damage, that they were under the neceſſity of returning to Cadiz to be refitted; and they were in a ſhort time, put into a condition that appeared formidable to the enemy. On the twenty-ſixth of April the king came to the houſe of peers, and after giving the royal aſſent to the bills that were ready, put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſhort ſpeech from the throne, in which he thanked the commons for the large ſupplies they had given him; and as the poſture of affairs rendered his preſence neceſſary abroad, he recommended to both houſes to do every thing in their power to preſerve the public peace during his abſcence. Affairs in England being ſettled, his majeſty embarked for Holland on the ſixth of May; and after a very ſhort paſſage ſafely reached the Brill, and immediately ſet out for the Hague, where, after preſiding at an aſſembly of the States he repaired to Loo, continuing there till the opening of the campaign. Lewis IV. had, in order to relieve his ſubjects from the miſeries they ſuffered, offered the Spaniards a ſeparate peace, provided they would declare the duke of Anjou, one of his grandſons, heir to their crown. But theſe overtures being rejected, Lewis propoſed both by ſea and land, to invade the kingdom.

Previous information of the enemy's deſign on Barcelona being received, William reſolved to ſend a ſtrong fleet up the Mediterranean, at once to aſſiſt the Spaniards, and prevent the French ſquadrons from coming into the ocean. By an extraordinary diſpatch, Ruſſel ſailed from St. Helen's on the third of May with the combined ſquadrons, conſiſting of fifty-two Engliſh, and forty-one Dutch ſhips of the line, beſides frigates, fireſhips, and other ſmall veſſels. On his arrival off Breſt, he found that Tourville, with his ſquadron, had already quitted that harbour; and Ruſſel determined to purſue him. But being informed by the captain of a Swediſh ſhip, that there was a fleet of merchantmen lying in a harbour near Conquet-bay, he detached captain Pritchard in the Monmouth, with the Roebuck and Reſolution fire-ſhips, to attempt the taking or deſtroying them. This ſervice Pritchard performed ſo effectually, that out of fifty-five ſail, he burnt or ſunk thirty-five, and drove the man of war which was appointed to convoy them, on the rocks, where ſhe was loſt. Admiral Ruſſel not having been able to find the Breſt fleet, returned to St. Helen's; but ſoon received orders to proceed to the Mediterranean with the principal part of his fleet. On his arrival off the rock of Liſbon, he was joined by rear-admiral Neville from Cadiz and the Dutch vice-admirals Callemberg and Evertzen, with ſixteen ſhips of the line. By this additional reinforcement, the ſhips under his command amounted to ſixty-three. Ruſſel now made the beſt of his way to Barcelona, in order to ſave that city, together with the whole province of Catalonia, from falling into the hands of the enemy, who had by this time blocked it up both by land and ſea. On his appearing before the town, the French admirals, who were in no condition to withſtand ſo powerful a fleet, returned with great precipitation into the harbour of Toulon, and Noailles abandoned his enterprize. Thus the Spaniſh dominions were freed from the danger that threatened them by this well-timed expedition, and the French fleet, which had ſo arrogantly boaſted of being able to give laws to all the military power of Europe, was blocked up cloſely in the harbour of Toulon.

The confederate army, commanded by the king of England in perſon, took the field, and encamped at Mont St. André. It conſiſted of thirty-one thouſand horſe and dragoons, and fifty-one thouſand foot, all veteran troops, beſides a body of ſeven thouſand men under count Thian, near Ghent. The French were not greatly inferior in numbers: but the dauphin of France, who commanded in perſon, declared that he had orders not to ſtir out of his camp, while the allies continued in theirs; ſo that theſe two powerful armies continued inactive, waiting to take ſome advantage of each other, till near the end of the campaign, when William attempted to paſs the Schelde and force the enemy to a battle, but was prevented by an almoſt incredible march of the enemy, who thereby defeated the deſign formed by the allies of penetrating into French Flanders. William having in vain, by marches and counter marches, endeavoured to bring the French to an engagement, gave orders for beſieging Huy, and the place was accordingly inveſted by count Tilly in the beginning of September; and after a defence of ten days ſurrendered to the allies, who put a ſtrong garriſon in the place. This conqueſt ſecured the biſhopric of Liege from the incurſions of the French; and the ſeaſon for putting an end to the campaign now advancing, both armies retired into winter quarters. Soon after admiral Ruſſel ſailed for the Mediterranean; the Lord Berkley, with thirty ſail of men of war and tranſports, having on board between ſix and ſeven thouſand ſoldiers under general Talmarſh, was ordered to make a deſcent at Camaret-bay near Breſt, in order to deſtroy the harbour, or, at leaſt, to render it unfit for the French ſervice.

Lord Berkley, general Talmarſh, the marquis of Caermarthen, lord Cutts, and ſeveral other experienced commanders, arrived on board the fleet before this place on the ſeventh of June. It was immediately repreſented to general Talmarſh by ſeveral of the officers, what diſadvantages muſt attend an attempt upon a place ſo well prepared for annoyance as well as defence, and they warmly adviſed him not to expoſe himſelf or his men. But Talmarſh, firm in his reſolution, told them, that their advice came too late; that the honour of the Engliſh nation was at ſtake, for which reaſon he muſt, and would land. The marquis of Caernarvon, with the utmoſt intrepidity now ſtood in with eight men of war, and came to an anchor very near the ſhore, in order to cover the deſcent of the troops. He ſoon found his ſhips expoſed to the fire of ſeveral batteries, which till then they had not diſcovered. But he, not at all daunted by the danger of his ſituation, returned the fire of the enemy very briſkly. Eight hundred men under the command of Talmarſh, got ſafe to ſhore; but they were no ſooner landed, than the general found the enterprize impracticable, and made a ſignal to retreat. This command came too late; for it being ebb tide, the boats ſtuck faſt upon the mud. The men were now expoſed to the fire from the batteries, by which ſix hundred of them were killed; and a ſquadron of the French coming down to the ſhore, obliged thoſe that were left alive to lay down their arms, and demand quarter. Talmarſh eſcaped to a boat, which brought him back to his ſhip; but that brave officer had received a wound in his thigh by a ball, and died before he reached England. The ſhips that covered the deſcent were now in a terrible ſituation, having loſt a great number of their men, and had moſt of their maſts and rigging cut in pieces by the batteries; notwithſtanding which the marquis, with infinite hazard and difficulty, brought them all off, a Dutch frigate of thirty guns excepted, which fell into the hands of the enemy. A council of war was now called, wherein it was reſolved to return immediately to Spithead, where on the fifteenth of June they arrived.

William having ſettled the affairs of the confederacy at the Hague, and the campaign being now cloſed, embarked on the eighth of November at Helvoetſluys, and the next day landed at Margate. On the twelfth the parliament met, and the king opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, wherein he obſerved, that the deſigns of the French had been diſappointed by ſending a fleet into the Mediterranean, and this year a ſtop had been put to the progreſs of their arms; and earneſtly recommended the providing ſupplies to proſecute the war with vigour, as the only effectual means to procure an honourable peace. He reminded them, that the act for tonnage and poundage, given for the civil liſt, would expire at Chriſtmas; and hoped they would continue that revenue to the crown, and alſo take care for diſcharging the debt for the tranſport ſhips employed in the reduction of Ireland, which ſtill remained unpaid. Upon which the ſupplies, which amounted to near five millions, were granted this ſeſſion without oppoſition. In order to raiſe this ſum, the land-tax of four ſhillings in the pound was continued; the ſubſidy of tonnage and poundage renewed for five years; and certain rates and duties were impoſed upon marriages, births and burials, bachelors and widows. An act was paſſed for laying additional duties upon tea, coffee, and chocolate, towards diſcharging the debt for the tranſport ſhips; and another, impoſing duties upon glaſs wares, ſtone and earthen bottles, coals and culm. Nor did the commons, while they were thus ſhewing their loyalty to their ſovereign, forget what they looked upon as their own intereſt and that of the nation: the triennial bill was now again inſiſted on; and the king, unable to reſiſt the repeated applications of his ſubjects, or unwilling to ruffle a parliament that appeared in ſuch a favourable diſpoſition, gave the royal aſſent to this bill. It enacted, that a new parliament ſhould be ſummoned every third year; and that the preſent parliament ſhould ceaſe and determine before the firſt day of January 1696, unleſs their majeſties ſhould think proper to diſſolve it ſooner. The people expreſſed great joy on paſſing this act: for they fondly imagined that the door was now effectually ſhut againſt all thoſe methods of corruption, which had hitherto flowed from long parliaments; but they ſoon found themſelves deceived: the candidates had ſtill the ſame ends to anſwer: miniſters ſtill had ſome favourite points to carry; and as the time was now ſo greatly abridged, the latter, in order to obtain a majority, were obliged to bid higher.

At this time, Dr. John Tillotſon, archbiſhop of Canterbury, was ſeized with a fit of the dead palſy, in the chapel at Whitehall, and died on the twenty-ſecond of November, deeply regretted by the king and queen, and by the nation in general, who eſteemed him as a prelate poſſeſſed of every amiable quality, and engaging virtue. A ſolid judgment, a ſincere piety, an univerſal philanthropy, diſtinguiſhed his life, and ſtrongly characterize his ſermons, which nothwithſtanding the obloquy of frantic enthuſiaſts, may juſtly be conſidered as perfect models of ſacred compoſition. So generous and charitable had he been in a poſt, from which his predeceſſor Sancroft had raiſed an eſtate, that he died poor, and had not the king forgiven his firſt fruits, his creditors could not have been indemnified. He was ſucceeded in the archiepiſcopal ſee by Dr. Teniſon, biſhop of Lincoln, who was indulged with the privilege of recommending Dr. Gardner as his ſucceſſor.

Her majeſty did not long ſurvive this favourite prelate; in about a month after his deceaſe, ſhe was ſeized with the ſmall pox, and the ſymptoms appearing dangerous, ſhe prepared herſelf for death with great compoſure. She ſpent her time in exerciſes of devotion; ſhe received the ſacrament with all the biſhops who were in attendance, and expired on the twenty-eighth of December, in the thirty-third year of her age, and in the ſixth of her reign. The king was ſo afflicted with her death, that for ſeveral days after the melancholy event, he could neither ſee company, nor attend to the buſineſs of the ſtate. Her obſequies were performed with great magnificence; the body was attended from Whitehall to Weſtminſter-abbey, by all the judges, ſerjeants at law, the lord mayor, and aldermen of the city of London, and both houſes of parliament. The common council of London alſo came to a reſolution to erect her ſtatue, with that of the king, in the Royal Exchange. The princeſs Anne, hearing of the queen's indiſpoſition, ſent a lady of her bedchamber, to beg the favour to be admitted to her preſence; but the requeſt was refuſed on pretence, that the phyſicians had directed, that her majeſty ſhould be kept as quiet as poſſible. However, before her death ſhe ſent a forgiving meſſage to her ſiſter, and after her deceaſe, the earl of Sunderland effected a reconciliation between the king and the princeſs, who viſited him at Kenſington, where ſhe was received with uncommon civility. He aſſigned her St. James's palace for her reſidence, and as an additional mark of his reſpect, preſented her with the greater part of the queen's jewels. But a mutual jealouſy and diſguſt ſubſiſted under theſe exterior appearances of friendſhip and eſteem. The king admitted her into no ſhare of buſineſs, nor did he order his miniſters to attend her, or give her the leaſt information of public affairs.

Aſſured that his majeſty's intereſt was extremely weakened by the queen's death, both houſes of parliament attended him with the following addreſs:

"We your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the lords ſpiritual and temporal in parliament aſſembled, do with inexpreſſible grief, humbly aſſure your majeſty of the deep ſenſe we have of the loſs your majeſty and the whole kingdom doth ſuſtain by the death of that excellent princeſs, our late ſovereign lady the queen; moſt humbly beſeeching your majeſty, that you would not indulge your grief on this ſad occaſion, to the prejudice of the health of your royal perſon, in whoſe preſervation, not only the welfare of your own ſubjects but all Europe is ſo much concerned. We farther beg leave, on this ſad occaſion, humbly to renew to your majeſty, the hearty and ſincere aſſurances, of out utmoſt aſſiſtance, againſt all your enemies both at home and abroad, and of all other demonſtrations of duty and affection, that can poſſibly be paid by the moſt fathful ſubjects."

This addreſs was received by his Majeſty with the utmoſt pleaſure; he returned them his ſincere thanks for their kind expreſſions and aſſurances, eſpecially their tender concern for the great loſs he had ſuſtained, which he aſſured them was inexpreſſible.

The example of the two houſes was followed by the whole nation, and his majeſty was preſented with ſeveral conſolatory addreſſes.

CHARACTER of MARY the SECOND, QUEEN of ENGLAND.

Mary II. was in her perſon tall and well proportioned, with an oval viſage, lively eyes, agreeable features, a mild aſpect, and a natural majeſtic mein, that commanded reſpect, adorned with an affable diſpoſition. Her apprehenſion was clear, her memory retentive, her judgment ſolid; equally formed to bear adverſity and proſperity; and with the courage of the other ſex, ſhe poſſeſſed all the ſoftneſs of her own. Her excellent goodneſs in a uniform tenor of life, and her beneficent actions, illuſtriouſly viſible, afford a more effectual amplification of her worth and praiſe than the moſt lively and graceful colours of language can impart. She was a zealous proteſtant, and her heart was ſo firmly attached to the path of pure religion, that ſhe was neither ſeduced nor terrified from it, in a court deeply affected with ſuperſtition, and ever watchful to propagate it. The diſpoſal of her in marriage to a prince of the proteſtant religion, appears an act of divine providence, to bring about the miraculous deliverance of this nation from popery, and its conſtant attendant, ſlavery. In the public worſhip of God, and a regular daily exerciſe of private devotion, this queen was a bright example of unaffected piety. When her reſidence was at the Hague, a lady of quality coming to the court, to pay her a viſit on a Saturday in the afternoon, ſhe was told, the princeſs was retired from all company, and kept a faſt, in preparation for receiving the ſacrament the next day. The lady ſtaying till five o'clock, the princeſs came out, and contented herſelf with a ſlender ſupper, it being incongruous to conclude a faſt with a feaſt. But her religion was not confined to either the chapel or the cloſet; it was influential on her practice. She was not fettered with ſuperſtitious ſcruples, but her clear judgment and free ſpirit were for union of Chriſtians in things eſſential to Chriſtianity. Her boſom was like the Pacific ſea, that ſeldom ſuffers or is diſturbed by a ſtorm. She was ſo exempt from the tyranny of the angry paſſions, that we may have ſome conjecture of the felicity of the ſtate of unſtained innocence, of which one ray was ſo powerful. She was ſo remote from ſenſual paſſions, that nothing impure durſt approach her preſence. She was a ſtriking pattern of conjugal affection, the will of her huſband being the ſole rule of her actions, redoubling his comforts and dividing his cares. Her deportment was becoming the dignity and dearneſs of the relation. Of this the king gave teſtimony by his flowing tears after her death; and by declaring, that in all her converſation he diſcovered no fault. She had an excellent underſtanding that qualified her for government. Of this her preſiding in council, in times of danger, and preſerving the tranquillity of the kingdom, by her prudent and active meaſures, are convincing proofs. Her charity, that celeſtial grace, was like the ſun, nothing within her circuit was hid from its refreſhing heat. A lord propoſed to her a very good work that was chargeable: ſhe ordered that a hundred pounds ſhould be paid towards it. Some time interpoſing before the receipt of the money, he waited upon the queen, and pleaſantly told her, that intereſt was due for delay of payment; ſhe ordered that fifty pounds more ſhould be given, which was done accordingly; yet her benevolence lies under the imputation of two defects; her aſcending the throne of her father without any ſeeming compunction, and treating her ſiſter as a ſtranger. With reſpect to the firſt, candour will ſuggeſt, that her connection with her father, was far inferior to her conjugal and religious obligations; with reſpect to the latter, it may be obſerved, in extenuation, that family connections are of all others the moſt delicate, and are frequently influenced by ſuch a variety of minute and unknown circumſtances, that an indifferent perſon cannot aſcertain which party is juſtly cenſurable. As an inſtance of her impartial regard to merit of character, we ſhall cite her reply to one of her courtiers, who happened to inveigh againſt the ſeverity of hiſtorians, who had treated the memory of ſome princes with great rigour: "that if theſe princes were ſuch as hiſtorians repreſented them, they richly deſerved the treatment they had received; and that thoſe who trod in their ſteps, might naturally expect the ſame fate; for truth, though it might be for ſome time ſuppreſſed, would moſt certainly in the end prevail." Her redemption of time was the effect of a conſcientious principle. She conſidered her glaſs was continually running, and all the particles of ſand were to be accounted for. In her ſickneſs patience had its perfect work. She had no fearful apprehenſions about her future ſtate; becauſe her care had been to prepare for her letter end in the beſt time of her life. This mixed cordial drops in the bitterneſs of death: and when this king of terrors drew near, among other things ſhe was heard to ſay, "I believe I ſhall now ſoon die, and I thank God, I have from my youth learned a true doctrine, that repentance is not to be put off to a death bed."

A. D. 1695.

In the month of May, William acquainted the peers with his intention of proroguing the parliament till the eighteenth of June; and ſending for the commons, the king cloſed the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech from the throne: "My lords and gentlemen, I am come to give you thanks for the ſupplies provided for carrying on the war, in which we are engaged; and at the ſame time, to conclude this ſeſſion, which cannot be continued any longer, without manifeſt injury to the ends for which the ſupplies were given; the ſeaſon of the year rendering ing it abſolutely neceſſary for me to be abroad; and it could be wiſhed our buſineſs at home would have allowed me to have been there ſooner. I will take care to place the adminiſtration of affairs, during my abſence, in ſuch perſons, on whoſe care and fidelity I can entirely depend; and I doubt not, my lords and gentlemen, but every one of you, in your ſeveral ſtations, will be aſſiſting to them. That is what I require of you; and that you will be more than commonly diligent in preſerving the public peace." The lord keeper having prorogued the parliament, the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and other perſons of high rank, were appointed to compoſe a regency. In a few days after, the king embarked at Graveſend, and repaired to the allied army in Flanders. The French were obliged to act on the defenſive during the whole campaign, owing to the ſuperior numbers of the allies; and to add to their mortification, they loſt their commander, the duke of Luxemburg, who was ſucceeded by the marſhal Villeroy, and Boufflers commanded under him. Conſcious of their own inferiority, they drew a line between Lys and the Scheld, for ſecuring their late conqueſts; and made a diſpoſition for covering Dunkirk, Tournay and Namur, which they apprehended might be attacked by the allied army. In the mean time the confederates formed two large armies in the Netherlands, one of which was commanded by the king in perſon, the other by the elector of Bavaria, who had under him the duke of Holſtein-Ploen, the earl of Athlone, and many other officers of ſkill and experience. By ſeveral well-concerted movements, William having drawn the enemy to the confines of Flanders, ſuddenly gave orders, that forty ſquadrons from the elector of Bavaria's camp, ſhould inveſt Namur, which ſervice was performed on the third of July. This place was ſtrong by art and nature, before it fell into the hands of the enemy; ſince which it had received ſuch additional fortifications, that it was now ſuppoſed to be altogether impregnable. On the eleventh of July the trenches were opened, and on the following day the batteries began to play with incredible fury. Equal reſolution ſeemed to inſpire thoſe who beſieged, and thoſe who reſiſted their attack. Lord Cutts, and major-general Ramſay, on the eighteenth, made an aſſault on the advanced works of the enemy. Six Engliſh battalions, eight foreign regiments, and nine thouſand pioneers, ſuſtained them in this conteſt, which continued for two hours; but at length the enemy was repulſed, and driven to the gates of the town. King William, a hero of the firſt rank, was ſo tranſported with the magnanimous behaviour of the Britiſh troops, that laying his hand on the elector of Bavaria's ſhoulder, he exclaimed in an ecſtacy of joy, "See my brave Engliſh!" On the twenty-ſeventh, the counterſcarp was attacked by the Engliſh and Scotch, under the command of Ramſay and Hamilton, when the beſieged party made an obſtinate reſiſtance; but the beſiegers, being ſuſtained by the Dutch, made a lodgment on the foremoſt covered way, before the gate of St. Nicholas, as alſo upon that part of the counter-guard. The valour of the enemy, on this occaſion, could only be exceeded by that of the aſſailants. Their officers in particular, behaved with amazing reſolution. Mr. Godfrey, deputy governor of the Bank of England, who came to the camp to confer with his majeſty about remitting money for the payment of the army, was killed in the trenches, together with ſeveral other perſons. On the thirteenth of Auguſt count Horn ſummoned the beſieged to ſurrender, and informed count de Lamot, that the garriſon could not expect relief, as marſhal Villeroy had retreated towards the Mehaign. No immediate anſwer being given, the elector determined to make a general aſſault. In this action two thouſand men were killed or wounded; the courage of the elector of Bavaria was ſignalized in a moſt extraordinary manner; he rode through the hotteſt of the enemy's fire, encouraging the ſoldiers by preſents of money, and the officers by promiſe of preferment. The garriſon of Namur, now having loſt all hopes of being relieved, count Guiſcard deſired to ſpeak with the elector of Bavaria. His highneſs complied with his requeſt, and the governor offered to ſurrender the fort of Cohorn; but the elector replied, that if he intended to capitulate, he might treat for the whole. Boufflers being made acquainted with this anſwer, before night the capitulation was ſigned.

When Villeroy was informed that Namur had ſurrendered, he paſſed the Sambre near Charleroy, with great precipitation, and retreated towards Mons, having in his way reinforced the garriſon of Dinant. The French garriſon, on the fifth of September, marched out of the caſtle, conſiſting of only five thouſand five hundred and eighty-three men, though its original number had been fifteen thouſand. Boufflers was arreſted in the name of the king of England, by way of repriſal for the garriſons of Dixmunde and Denſe, which had been detained by the French king, in violation of the cartel eſtabliſhed between the two nations; but a meſſenger arriving from the court of France, promiſing that the garriſon ſhould be reſtored, Boufflers was ſet at liberty. King William now reſigned the whole command to the elector of Bavaria, and retired to Loo with the higheſt military character; ſoon after which the armies ſeparated, and the campaign ended. During the ſummer of this year, the Engliſh fleet was ſo ſuperior to that of the enemy, that the ſhips of war remained inactive in their harbours; however they fitted out a number of privateers, which had great ſucceſs in cruiſing againſt our trading veſſels. They took ſeveral merchant ſhips bound from Barbadoes, and five Eaſt Indiamen, valued at a million of money. William having adjuſted with his allies the plan of operations for the enſuing year, embarked for England, where his people hailed him as a conqueror, with the loudeſt acclamations of joy. He inſtantly ſummoned a council at Kenſington, in which it was determined that a new parliament ſhould be ſpeedily convoked.

On the eleventh of October a proclamation was accordingly iſſued for aſſembling a new parliament on the twenty-ſecond day of November, which having met, the commons choſe Paul Foley, Eſq; for their ſpeaker. While the people were buſied in elections, the king was prevailed on to conciliate the affections of his ſubjects by a more familiar and complacent behaviour. With this view he honoured the diverſions of Newmarket with his preſence, and there received a compliment of congratulation from the univerſity of Cambridge. Then he viſited, at their reſpective ſeats, the earls of Sunderland, Northampton, and Montague; the duke of Newcaſtle, the lord Brooke, and the duke of Shrewſbury; and afterwards made a public entry into Oxford, having been met at ſome diſtance from the city by the duke of Ormond, chancellor of the univerſity, the vice-chancellor, the doctors, and the magiſtrates, in their formalities. He proceeded directly to the theatre, where he was welcomed in an elegant Latin ſpeech; and received from the chancellor, on his knees, the uſual preſents of a large Engliſh Bible, and Book of Common-Prayer, with the cuts of the univerſity, and a pair of gold fringed gloves. The conduits ran with wine, and a magnificent banquet was prepared; but the duke of Ormond having communicated to his majeſty an anonymous letter, importing, that there was a deſign to poiſon him, he departed immediately for Windſor. The univerſity, verſity, however, inſtead of reſenting this abrupt behaviour, choſe Sir William Trumbul, ſecretary of ſtate, for one of their repreſentatives in parliament.

Though the two houſes preſented addreſſes to his majeſty, offering to ſupply him with the neceſſary ſums for proſecuting the war with vigour; yet the public were exceedingly diſguſted by a ſyſtem of politics, in the purſuit of which the nation had incurred a vaſt expence of blood and treaſure, and they now complained loudly of the enormous weight of taxes with which they were burdened. The commons, either from principle, or motives of reſentment, reſolved, that the king ſhould grant ſome conceſſions in favour of the people in conſideration of the ſupplies, and therefore they introduced that long conteſted bill for regulating trials in caſes of high treaſon and miſpriſion of treaſon; and at ſo critical a juncture, the court party thought it imprudent to oppoſe this and other acts of popularity. They then proceeded to an examination of the public accounts and eſtimates; and for the ſervice of the enſuing year, voted a ſupply of above five millions. The ſtate of the coin, which had been ſhamefully diminiſhed by the clippers, was the next ſubject of conſideration; and a new coinage was ſpeedily determined.

A. D. 1696. By this time Lewis was heartily weary of the war, after having almoſt depopulated his country; but before he put a final period thereto, he reſolved, in concert with the Engliſh jacobites, to reſtore, if poſſible, James, his good friend and ally, to the government of England. On the eighteenth of February James ſet out for Calais, when the troops, artillery, and ſtores, were ordered to be put immediately on board the proper veſſels; and the ſcheme of an invaſion, and the deſign of taking off the king, were publicly mentioned in France ſo early as the beginning of this month. The principal contrivers of the aſſaſſination-plot, were the earl of Ayleſbury, lord Montgomery, ſon to the marquis of Powis, Sir John Fenwick, captain Porter, captain Charnock, and Sir John Friend. The duke of Berwick came privately to England, in order to haſten the preparations of the conſpirators, and to confirm them in their reſolution. He informed them, that James was ready to make a deſcent upon England at the head of a large body of French troops, diſtributed commiſſions, and gave them inſtructions for procuring men, arms, and horſes, to join him on his arrival. Upon his return to France, he found that all neceſſary meaſures had been purſued for the intended expedition. James had repaired to Calais; and monſieur Gabaret was advancing with a naval force, which was to be joined by a conſiderable number of tranſports then lying at Dunkirk. After divers conſultations, it was determined to attack and murder the king in a lane between Brentford and Turnham-Green, on his return from Richmond, where he uſually hunted on Saturdays. But on the day preceding that appointed for the perpetration of the horrid deed, the particulars of the plot were diſcovered to brigadier Leviſon by Pendergraſs, an Iriſh officer, whoſe evidence was confirmed by captain Fiſher, captain Porter, and La Rue, a Frenchman. At firſt, the king diſbelieved the report of the conſpiracy; but finding it authenticated by different witneſſes, he admitted Pendergraſs into his preſence, and prevailed upon him to deliver a liſt of his accomplices. James, upon receiving intelligence of the failure of the aſſaſſination-plot, and that admiral Ruſſel was diſpatched to the coaſt of France with a fleet conſiſting of a hundred and fifty ſail of the line, relinquiſhed his deſign of invading England; and, diſembarking with his troops, returned to St. Germain's. Moſt of the conſpirators being ſecured, the king, after their examination, in a ſpeech to both houſes, communicated the nature of the conſpiracy againſt his life, as well as the deſign of a foreign invaſion; profeſſed his reliance on their good will and affection; and hoped they would take ſuch ſteps for their common ſafety, as ſhould appear to them moſt expedient. That very evening the two houſes waited upon him at Kenſington with an affectionate addreſs, in which they expreſſed their deteſtation of the execrable deſign which had been formed againſt his ſacred perſon, of which they beſought him to take extraordinary care. They aſſured him, they would defend his life, and maintain his government, againſt the late king James, and all other enemies; and declared, that in caſe his majeſty ſhould come to a violent death, they would revenge it upon his adverſaries and their adherents. The king was highly pleaſed with this warm addreſs, and aſſured them, in his turn, he would take all opportunities of recommending himſelf to the continuance of their loyalty and affection. They next proceeded to conſider of ways and means for raiſing the ſupplies. A new bank was eſtabliſhed, commonly called the Land-bank, becauſe founded upon land ſecurities. This ſcheme, ſuppoſed to have been projected by the famous doctor Chamberlain, was chiefly managed by Foley and Harley, and was generally believed to be a tory plan, intended to ruin the bank of England. The company of the latter petitioned againſt the bill, and were heard by their counſel; but their repreſentation had no effect, and the bill having paſſed both houſes, at laſt received the royal aſſent. On the twenty-ſeventh of April the king cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſhort but gracious ſpeech, and the parliament was prorogued to the ſixteenth day of June. Before this period, many of the conſpirators, upon the evidence of Pendergraſs, Porter, and others, were brought to condign puniſhment.

It was reſolved by the allied army to make an immediate retaliation upon the French, for their baſe deſign upon the life of king William. Lewis had been ſo confident of the ſucceſs of the expedition, that he had even regulated his military operations in Flanders upon that ſuppoſition, and had eſtabliſhed a vaſt magazine at Givet, with a view of ſtriking ſome ſtroke of importance early in the campaign, while the allies ſhould be weakened by the abſence of the Britiſh troops. Upon this magazine the confederates determined to wreak their vengeance; and with this view the earl of Athlone, and lieutenant-general Coehorn, ſet out from Namur with forty ſquadrons, thirty battalions, fifteen pieces of cannon, and ſix mortars. Athlone, with part of his body, inveſted Dinant; while Coehorn, with the remainder, advanced to Givet. He forthwith began to bombard the town, which in three hours was on fire, and by four in the afternoon wholly deſtroyed, with the great magazine it contained. Then the two generals, joining their forces, returned to Namur without interruption. The king having appointed the ſame regency as governed the kingdom during his laſt abſence, embarked at Margate on the ſeventh of May, and arrived that ſame evening at Orange-Polder, from whence he repaired immediately to the Hague. The French had taken the field early in the ſpring; but no enterprize of importance was attempted in the courſe of this campaign. Lewis was obliged to act on the defenſive; while the active plans of William were defeated by want of money. All the funds of this year proved defective; the land-bank failed, without having produced any other effect than that of injuring the credit of the national bank by its oppoſition. Lewis having exhauſted the wealth and patience of his ſubjects, began to be ſenſible of his utter inability to continue the war, and therefore reſolved to convert his attention towards effecting an immediate peace. With this view he ſent an ambaſſador to the States-general; but the Dutch refuſed to enter into any conferences on the ſubject, until they had obtained the conſent of king William and the allies. Lewis, in order to expedite this negotiation, purſued offenſive meaſures in Catalonia, where his general, the duke de Vendome, attacked and worſted the Spaniards in their camp near Oſtalric, though the action was not deciſive; for notwithſtanding he had made vigorous efforts againſt their intrenchments, he was obliged to retreat.

No naval buſineſs of conſequence had been lately atchieved; the Engliſh nevertheleſs rode maſters of the ſea. In the month of June, lord Berkley ſet ſail for Uſhant, in order to annoy the French coaſt. He pillaged and burned the villages on the iſlands Guoy, Horeal, and Heydic; made prize of about twenty veſſels; bombarded St. Martin's on the iſle of Rhee; and treated the town of Olonne in the ſame manner. Theſe enterprizes, however inconſiderable, kept the whole coaſt of France in perpetual alarm. Rear-admiral Bembow was ſent with a ſmall ſquadron to block up Du Bart in the harbour of Dunkirk; but that bold adventurer found means to eſcape in a fog, and ſailing towards the Baltic, fell in with the Dutch fleet, under convoy of ſix frigates. Theſe he took, together with half the trading veſſels; but falling in with the outward-bound fleet, convoyed by thirteen ſhips of the line, he was obliged to burn four of the frigates, turn two adrift, and part with all his prizes but fifteen, which he carried into Dunkirk. The king, being tired of an inactive campaign, embarked for England on the fourth of October, and on the ſixth arrived at Margate, from whence he repaired immediately to Kenſington. The parliament meeting on the twentieth of the ſame month, his majeſty opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he obſerved, that propoſals had been made for a negotiation; but that the beſt way of treating with France would be ſword in hand; that he hoped they would be expeditious in raiſing ſupplies for the ſervice of the enſuing year; that the civil liſt could not be ſupported without their aſſiſtance; that he flattered himſelf they would contrive ſome means for the recovery of the national credit; and that unanimity and diſpatch were now more than ever neceſſary for the honour, ſafety, and advantage of the kingdom. The commons having taken this ſpeech into conſideration, reſolved, that they would ſupport his majeſty's government, and effectually aſſiſt him in the proſecution of the war. They likewiſe preſented a ſpirited addreſs, in which they declared, that, notwithſtanding the blood and treaſure which had been already expended, they would not be diverted from their reſolution of obtaining by a war, a ſafe and honourable peace; and that therefore they would continue to ſupport his majeſty againſt all his enemies both at home and abroad. They then deliberated upon the eſtimates, and granted above ſix millions for the ſervice of the enſuing year. They paſſed a bill for remedying the ill ſtate of the coin; and another, explaining an act of the preceding ſeſſion, for laying duties on low wines, and ſpirits of the firſt extraction. In order to raiſe the ſupplies of the year, they reſolved to tax all perſons according to the true value of their real and perſonal eſtates, their ſtock upon land and in trade, or their income by offices, penſions, and profeſſions. A duty of one penny per week for one year was levied upon all perſons not receiving alms. Without ſpecifying any further particulars, it will be ſufficient to obſerve, that in the general charge, the command did not exempt one member of the commonwealth, that could be ſuppoſed able to bear any part of the burthen. The Bank of England having been of ſingular utility to the government, the parliament reſolved to ſupport the credit of that inſtitution. It was accordingly agreed to ingraft upon the capital the ſum of eight hundred thouſand pounds by new ſubſcriptions, at the rate of eight per cent. intereſt, to be paid by tallies and Bank notes. In a few days, a million was ſubſcribed and paid in that manner; and from this time the credit of the Bank recovered ſo rapidly, that in a few weeks their notes, that bore no intereſt, were equal to money, and their bills, that bore intereſt, were in higher eſtimation.

Thus public credit being reſtored, and the bills paſſed for the ſupplies of the enſuing year, the attention of the parliament was next engaged by the caſe of Sir John Fenwick, one of the conſpirators who had been apprehended at New Romney, while he was making his eſcape to France. He had, when taken, written a letter to his lady by one Webber who attended him; but this man being ſeized, the letter was found to contain ſuch circumſtances as plainly proved him guilty. The affair was now ſubmitted to parliament; and the commons having deliberated on the whole matter, brought in a bill of attainder againſt him, which, though not without a violent oppoſition, was actually carried through both houſes, and at laſt received the royal aſſent. This had no ſooner paſſed, than Fenwick exerted his utmoſt efforts to procure a reprieve from his majeſty; but all his applications proving ineffectual, he began to prepare himſelf for his approaching fate. He was indulged with the axe, in conſideration of his rank and alliance with the houſe of Howard, and ſuffered on Tower-hill, with ſeeming compoſure and reſignation. He owned his loyalty to king James, and prayed for his reſtoration; but mentioned with abhorrence the deſign upon the life of king William, which he juſtly termed a moſt villainous project. The king, on the ſixteenth day of April, cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he thanked the parliament for the liberal ſupplies they had granted him, and expreſſed his ſatisfaction with the meaſures, they had taken for the retrieval of the public credit. About this time the earl of Dorſet reſigned the office of lord-chamberlain, which he had enjoyed ever ſince the revolution. He was ſevere and poignant in his writings; but humane and generous in his private conduct. He was ſucceeded by the earl of Sunderland, whoſe popularity became as great as before.

A. D. 1697. On the twenty-ſixth day of April William embarked for Holland, in order to be preſent at the negotiation for a general peace. The plenipotentiaries met in congreſs on the tenth day of February, and the conference was opened by the French miniſter Callieres, who in his maſter's name agreed to the following preliminaries; that the treaties of Weſtphalia and Nimeguen, ſhould be the baſis of the preſent negotiation; that Straſburgh ſhould be reſtored to the emperor, and Luxemburgh to the Spaniards, together with Mons, Charleroy, and all the places taken by the French in Catalonia ſince the treaty of Nimeguen; that Dinant ſhould be ceded to the biſhop of Liege, and all re-unions ſince the treaty of Nimeguen be made void; that Lorraine ſhould be reſtored according to the conditions of that treaty; and, that upon the concluſion of the peace, Lewis ſhould acknowledge the prince of Orange as king of Great Britain, without reſtriction, limitation, or reſerve. In the interim, the French king, fearing that the houſe of Auſtria would inſiſt on the treaty of the Pyrenees, reſolved to make his laſt efforts in Flanders and Catalonia, and reduce the Spaniards to his own terms. The campaign was opened with the ſiege of Aeth, which ſurrendered in a few days. In Catalonia, the duke of Vendome inveſted

Barcelona, which after having been gallantly defended for the ſpace of nine weeks, fell into the hands of the French; and the Spaniards, after the loſs of this important place, became as eager for peace, as they had been averſe to a negociation. But the claims of the powers were ſo numerous and complicated, that the negociation was protracted to the twentieth day of September, when the articles were ſubſcribed by the Engliſh, Dutch, Spaniſh, and French ambaſſadors, notwithſtanding the remonſtrances of the Imperial, and other German miniſters, who ſtill refuſed to accept of the terms which France had offered. The treaty between England and France imported, that Lewis ſhould not diſturb or diſquiet the king of Great Britain in the poſſeſſion of his crown or government, nor aſſiſt his enemies, nor favour conſpiracies againſt his perſon; that king William ſhould pay a yearly penſion to queen Mary D'Eſte of fifty thouſand pounds, which, during her reſidence in England, had been ſettled as her jointure; that a free commerce ſhould be reſtored between the two kingdoms; that commiſſioners ſhould be appointed to meet at London, to determine the pretenſions of each crown to Hudſon's Bay, taken by the French during the late peace, and retaken by the Engliſh in the courſe of the war; and to fix the limits of places to be reſtored, as well as the proportion of exchanges to be made; that in caſe of a freſh war, ſix months ſhould be allowed to the ſubjects of each crown for removing their effects; that the ſeparate article of the treaty of Nimeguen, relating to the principality of Orange, ſhould be fully executed; and that the ratifications ſhould be exchanged in three weeks from the day of ſigning. William having finiſhed this important affair, returned to England, and was received in London amidſt the ſhouts and acclamations of the people, in a kind of triumph.

When the parliament met in December, he gave them to underſtand, that there was a conſiderable debt on account of the fleet and army, and that the revenues of the crown had been anticipated; he expreſſed his hope, that they would provide for him during his life in ſuch a manner, as would conduce to his honour and their glory; he recommended the maintenance of a conſiderable fleet and ſtanding army, as eſſentially neceſſary for the ſafety of England; and finally aſſured them, that, as he had reſcued their religion, laws, and liberties, when they were in the extremeſt danger; ſo he ſhould place the glory of his reign in preſerving and leaving them entire to lateſt poſterity. The parliament, after congratulating his majeſty on the concluſion of the peace, and aſſuring him they would be ever ready to ſupport his government, proceeded to conſider that part of his ſpeech which related to the maintenance of a ſtanding army, a practice to which they were inveterately averſe, and the recommendation of which from the throne, they could by no means approve. This point was debated with great vehemence; but at length the king, finding all his remonſtrances ineffectual, ſubmitted with his uſual prudence to this, as he had formerly done to other diſappointments, and affected to acquieſce in a very conſiderable reduction of the army. To compenſate for this diſagreeable circumſtance, they voted a ſupply of two hundred and fifty thouſand pounds, to be diſtributed amongſt ſuch officers and ſoldiers as ſhould be diſbanded; and alſo granted the annual ſum of ſeven hundred thouſand pounds for the maintenance of the king's houſhold, to be continued during his life. Of this ſum, one hundred thouſand pounds were intended to enable his majeſty to pay the jointure of queen Mary D'Eſte, and to maintain a court for the duke of Glouceſter, now in the ninth year of his age; but it is affirmed by ſome, that the jointure was never paid, and that the king would not allow more than fifteen thouſand pounds a year to the duke, to whom biſhop Burnet was preceptor according to appointment.

A. D. 1698.

A gentleman of Dublin (whoſe name was William Molyneux), having publiſhed a pamphlet, in which he endeavoured to prove that Ireland was independent of the parliament of England, a committee was appointed to enquire into the nature and tendency of this performance. Upon the report of the committee it was reſolved, that the book was of dangerous conſequence, as it tended to leſſen the dependence of Ireland upon England, to the imperial crown of which it was unalterably annexed. They therefore preſented an addreſs to his majeſty, beſeeching him to give effectual orders for preventing any ſuch encroachments for the future, as well as the pernicious conſequences of what was paſt, by puniſhing and diſcountenancing thoſe who had been guilty of ſuch pernicious attempts. This addreſs was graciouſly received, and the king promiſed to comply with their requeſt. About this time a ſociety for the reformation of manners, was formed under the king's countenance and encouragement. Conſiderable collections were made for maintaining clergymen to read prayers at certain hours in places of public worſhip, and adminiſter the ſacrament every Sunday. On the third of July the king prorogued the parliament, after having thanked them in a ſhort ſpeech for the many teſtimonies of their favour he had received; and in two days after the prorogation it was diſſolved. In the latter end of July king William embarked for Holland, on pretence of enjoying a receſs from buſineſs; but in reality to treat with the French king, remote from the obſervation of thoſe who might have penetrated into the nature of his negociation. He had appointed a regency to govern the kingdom in his abſence; and as one of the number, nominated the earl of Marlborough, who had regained his favour, and been appointed governor to the duke of Glouceſter. His majeſty at his departure left ſealed orders with the miniſtry, directing, that ſixteen thouſand men ſhould be retained in the ſervice, notwithſtanding the vote of the commons, by which the ſtanding army was limited to ten thouſand. He alledged, that the apprehenſion of freſh troubles, which might ariſe at the death of his catholic majeſty, induced him to tranſgreſs this limitation, and hoped that the new parliament would be more favourable. His enemies, however, availed themſelves of this opportunity to depreciate his character by malicious inſinuations. Having aſſiſted at the aſſembly of the States-general, and given audience to divers ambaſſadors at the Hague, William repaired to his palace at Loo, where he was viſited by count Tallard the French miniſter, who had inſtructions to negociate the treaty concerning the Spaniſh ſucceſſion. The earl of Portland, by his majeſty's orders, had communicated to ſecretary Vernon the principal conditions that Lewis propoſed; he himſelf wrote a letter to lord chancellor Somers, deſiring his advice with regard to the propoſitions, and full power under the great ſeal, with blanks to be filled up occaſionally, that he might immediately begin the treaty with count Tallard. The purport of Portland's letter was imparted to the duke of Shrewſbury and Mr. Montague, who conſulted with the chancellor and ſecretary upon the ſubject; and the chancellor wrote a letter to the king, containing the iſſue of their joint deliberation: but before it reached his majeſty, the firſt partition was ſigned by the earl of Portland, and Sir Joſeph Williamſon. Lewis, who had made a practice of ſacrificing honour and conſcience to his pride and ambition, foreſaw that he ſhould never be able to accompliſh his deſigns upon Spain; while William was left at liberty to form another confederacy againſt him. He therefore determined to amuſe him with a treaty, in which he ſhould ſeem to act as umpire in the concerns of Europe. The plan ſucceeded; the king of England lent a willing ear to his propoſals, and engaged in a ſcheme for diſmembering a kingdom, in deſpite of the natives, and in violation of every human and divine law.

On the third day of December William arrived in England, where a new parliament had been choſen and prorogued on account of his majeſty's abſence. Though the majority of members were attached to the new eſtabliſhment, many of them had imbibed ſuch jealouſy of the court during the former unpopular reign, that they ſeemed not to have been much devoted to the perſon of their ſovereign; yet their choice of Sir Thomas Lyttleton for their ſpeaker, ſeemed to preſage a peaceable ſeſſion. On the tenth of December the two houſes being convened, the king in his ſpeech obſerved, that the ſafety, honour, and happineſs of the kingdom, would in a great meaſure depend on the ſtrength which they ſhould reſolve to maintain by ſea and land. The members of the preſent parliament were ſo provoked at the king's preſuming to tranſgreſs an act, to which he had given the royal aſſent, that they inſtantly reſolved that all the forces of England, in Engliſh pay, exceeding ſeven thouſand men, ſhould be diſbanded; as alſo thoſe in Ireland, exceeding twelve thouſand; and that thoſe retained ſhould be natives of theſe kingdoms. As this vote deprived the king not only of his Dutch guards, to whom he was remarkably attached, but likewiſe the regiments of French refugees, who had ſerved him with uncommon fidelity; he was ſo ſenſibly affected with it, that he threatened to abandon the government, and had even compoſed a ſpeech, which he intended to have delivered on the occaſion; but was diverted from his purpoſe by his miniſtry and confidents, and reſolved to paſs the bill by which he had been ſo much offended. Accordingly, when it was ready for the royal aſſent, he went to the houſe of peers, where, having ſent for the commons, he told them, that though he might juſtly complain of the harſh treatment in being deprived of his guards which had attended him in all his fortunes; yet as he believed nothing could be more fatal to the nation than any diſtruſt or jealouſy between him and his parliament, he was come to paſs the bill according to their deſire. At the ſame time, in diſcharge of the truſt repoſed in him, he declared it as his opinion, that the nation was left too much expoſed, and that it was incumbent upon them to provide ſuch a ſtrength as might be neceſſary for the ſafety of the kingdom. They were ſo mollified by this inſtance of condeſcenſion, that they preſented an addreſs, in which they thanked him for this freſh mark of his royal goodneſs, and ſolemnly aſſured him, that they would defend his perſon and government at the hazard of their lives and fortunes. Theſe aſſurances induced him to make another effort in favour of the Dutch guards, but it proved ineffectual; he was obliged to acquieſce, and they were tranſported to Holland.

A diſſolution of the army being thus effected, the commons voted fifteen thouſand ſeamen, and a proportionable fleet for the ſecurity of the kingdom; and granted one million four hundred and eighty-four thouſand pounds for the ſervices of the year, to be raiſed by a tax of three ſhillings in the pound upon lands, perſonal eſtates, penſioners and officers. But the members of this parliament ſeem to have been actuated by a peeviſh and malicious ſpirit, which nothing could ſatisfy. The perſon againſt whom their reſentment was at preſent levelled, was the earl of Oxford, who now acted as treaſurer to the navy, and one of the commiſſioners of the admiralty. The commons drew up an addreſs, complaining of ſome important articles of miſmanagement in the conduct of the navy; and the earl, by a reſignation of his employments, was wiſe enough to avoid further proſecution.

On the fourth day of May, king William cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech; hinting diſſatisfaction at their having neglected to conſider ſome points which he had recommended to their attention; and the parliament was prorogued to the firſt of June. In a little time after the prorogation the king appointed a regency, and on the ſecond of June embarked for Holland. Here he enjoyed himſelf at Loo, where he was viſited by the duke of Zell, with whom he had long intimately correſponded. During his reſidence in this place, the earl of Portland, and the grand penſionary of Holland, frequently conferred with the French ambaſſador count Tallard, upon the ſubject of the Spaniſh ſucceſſion; but no alteration was at this time made in the late treaty of partition. His majeſty, having ſettled with the States-general the number and ſtrength of the Dutch fleet, embarked for England on the ſixteenth of October, and next day arrived at Margate, from whence he immediately repaired to Kenſington. The parliament meeting about the middle of November, the king, in his ſpeech to both houſes, adviſed a further proviſion for the ſafety of the kingdom by ſea and land, and the repair of ſhips and fortifications; exhorted the commons to make good the deficiencies of the funds, diſcharge the national debt, and provide the neceſſary ſupplies. He aſſured them of his reſolution to encourage virtue, and puniſh vice; and that he would decline no difficulties nor dangers where the happineſs of his people might be concerned. He then concluded with theſe words: "Since, therefore, our aims are only for the general good, let us act with confidence in one another, which will not fail, with the bleſſing of God, to make me a happy king, and you a great and flouriſhing people." But this parliament, inſtead of an addreſs of thanks, according to the uſual cuſtom, preſented a remonſtrance, importing, that a jealouſy and diſguſt had been raiſed of their duty and affection, and that they deſired he would ſhew marks of high diſpleaſure towards all perſons who had preſumed to miſrepreſent their proceedings, and that if any ſhould attempt to impoſe upon him by ſuch calumnies, he would conſider and treat them as his moſt inveterate enemies. The next object which engaged the attention of the commons, was an enquiry into the forfeited eſtates in Ireland, which the king had diſtributed according to his pleaſure. The commiſſioners appointed to examine this affair, were Anneſley, Hamilton, Trenchard, Langford, the earl of Drogheda, Sir Francis Brewſter, and Sir Richard Leving. The firſt four were actuated by all the virulence of faction; the other three were ſecretly guided by miniſterial influence. They began their enquiry in Ireland, and proceeded with ſuch ſeverity, as ſeemed to flow rather from reſentment to the court, than from a love of juſtice and abhorrence of corruption. They in particular ſcrutinized a grant of an eſtate which the king had made to Mrs. Villiers, now counteſs of Orkney, ſo as to expoſe his majeſty's partiality for that favourite, and ſubject him to an additional load of popular odium and indignation.

A bill of reſumption being now framed, finiſhed, and paſſed, the commons ordered an account of the whole tranſaction to be printed and publiſhed for their vindication; and reſolved, that the procuring or paſſing exorbitant grants by any member now of the privy-council, or by any other that had been a privy-counſellor, in this or any former reign, to his own uſe and benefit, was a high crime and miſdemeanor. As the members of the lower houſe were apprehenſive that this bill would be ſtrongly oppoſed by thoſe of the upper, they tacked it to the money bill; ſo that the one could not be rejected, without defeating the other. The lords propoſed ſome alterations; the commons refuſed to give their conſent, and ordered a liſt of the privy-council to be laid before them. They now ordered their houſe to be cleared of ſtrangers, and the doors to be ſhut, that no member might go forth; they then took into conſideration the report of the Iriſh forfeitures, with a liſt of the privy-counſellors; and a motion was made to addreſs his majeſty, to remove lord-chancellor Somers from his preſence and councils for ever. This was, however, carried in the negative by a great majority. The king conſidered this bill as an invaſion of his prerogative, an inſult on his perſon, and an injury to his friends and ſervants, and at firſt determined to hazard the conſequences of refuſing the royal aſſent; but was diverted from his purpoſe by the remonſtrances of thoſe in whom he chiefly confided; nevertheleſs he could not diſſemble his reſentment; he became moroſe and peeviſh; and his enemies laid hold of this circumſtance, to brand his character with the utmoſt infamy. Though the motion againſt the chancellor had miſcarried, the commons reſolved to addreſs his majeſty, that no perſon, who was not a native of his dominions, except his royal highneſs prince George of Denmark, ſhould be admitted into his majeſty's councils in England or Ireland. This reſolution was levelled againſt the eſtates of Portland, Albemarle, and Galway; but before the addreſſes could be preſented, the king came to the houſe of peers, and having paſſed ſuch bills as were ready for his aſſent, the parliament was prorogued to May the twenty-third.

A. D. 1700. A bill for the more effectual ſuppreſſion of piracy was brought in by the commons, which paſſed into a law; and underſtanding afterwards that Kidd, the pirate, was brought over to England, they alſo preſented an addreſs to the king, deſiring that he might not be tried, diſcharged, or pardoned, till the next ſeſſion of parliament; and his majeſty complied with their requeſt. A bill was alſo brought in, that no perſon born after the twenty-fifth day of March next enſuing, being a papiſt, ſhould be capable of inheriting any title of honour or eſtate within the kingdom of England, dominion of Wales, or town of Berwick upon Tweed; and that no papiſt ſhould be capable of purchaſing any lands or tenements, either in his own, or in the name of any other perſon in truſt for him. This bill was vehemently oppoſed in the houſe of lords; notwithſtanding which, it was finally carried by a great majority, and at laſt received the royal ſanction; but after all, it was deficient in neceſſary clauſes to enforce execution, ſo that in the ſequel the law was very little regarded.

In the beginning of July, William embarked for Holland, after having appointed a regency to manage the government. On the twenty-ninth of the ſame month, the young duke of Glouceſter, the only remaining child of ſeventeen, whom the princeſs Anne had borne, died of a malignant fever, in the eleventh year of his age. His death was much lamented by the greater part of the Engliſh nation, not only on account of his promiſing talents and affable diſpoſition, but alſo as it left the ſucceſſion undetermined, and might create diſputes of fatal conſequences to the nation. Indeed, the preſent ſtate of affairs in England afforded but an uncomfortable proſpect. The nature of the partition-treaty was no ſooner known, than condemned by the moſt intelligent part of the nation. They firſt of all complained, that ſuch an important affair ſhould have been concluded without the advice of parliament. They obſerved, that the ſcheme was unjuſt, and the execution of it hazardous. All their exceptions were diffuſed by the malcontents, ſo that the whole kingdom echoed with murmurs and clamours; while the tory faction began to think in earneſt of eſtabliſhing the ſucceſſion of the Engliſh crown upon the perſon of the prince of Wales. Such was the ſituation of affairs when the king arrived in England; and ſoon after he received advice, that the king of Spain was actually dead. By his laſt will, Charles had declared the duke of Anjou, ſecond ſon of the dauphin, ſole heir of the Spaniſh monarchy. In caſe this prince ſhould die without iſſue, or inherit the crown of France, he ordered that Spain ſhould devolve to the duke of Berry; in default of him and his children, to the archduke Charles and his heirs; and in failure of them, to the duke of Savoy and his poſterity. It remains to this day a doubt, whether this will was ſigned by the king of Spain, or was only a forgery: thus much is certain, that when the teſtament, real or pretended, was notified by the French court, it afforded a new ſcene of hypocriſy and diſſimulation. The whole tranſaction had been concerted and executed by the intrigues and policy of the artful Lewis; and he was now determined to conclude the cheat, with the ſame dexterity with which it was begun. After the will was accepted, Lewis cloſetted the duke of Anjou, to whom he ſaid, in the preſence of the marquis de Rias, "Sir, the king of Spain has made you a king. The grandees demand you; the people wiſh for you; and I give my conſent. Remember only you are a prince of France. I recommend you to love your people; to gain their affection by the lenity of your government; and render yourſelf worthy of the throne you are about to aſcend." The new monarch was congratulated on his elevation by all the princes of the blood; nevertheleſs, the duke of Orleans and his ſon proteſted againſt the will, becauſe the archduke was placed next in ſucceſſion to the duke of Berry, in bar of their right as deſcendants of Anne of Auſtria. The emperor exclaimed loudly againſt the will, as being more iniquitous than the treaty of partition, and threatened to do himſelf juſtice by force of arms. The Spaniards, conſcious of their own inability to defend their dominions, reſigned themſelves entirely to the protection of the French monarch. William's real motive in affecting an indifference, was to conceal his reſentment until he ſhould have ſounded the opinions of other powers in Europe, and ſeen how far he could rely on his new miniſtry. His chief favourite was the earl of Rocheſter, who had undertaken for the tories, and was declared lord-lieutenant of Ireland. Lord Godolphin was appointed firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury; lord Tankerville keeper of the privy-ſeal; and Sir Charles Hedges ſecretary of ſtate: but the management was entruſted to Mr. Robert Harley, who had hitherto oppoſed the meaſures of the court with equal ability and virulence. Theſe new miniſters, knowing they had intereſt ſufficient to procure a majority, prevailed on the king to diſſolve the preſent parliament by proclamation, and iſſue writs to convene a new one, which was accordingly complied with.

A. D. 1701. On the ſixth of February the new parliament having met, according to appointment, was prorogued to the tenth day of the ſame month, when Mr. Harley was choſen ſpeaker by a great majority. The conduct of this parliament is ſtrongly marked with faction and prejudice, and diſcovers a total diſregard to the intereſt of England, and the general liberties of Europe. On the thirtieth of March, the king acquainted the commons with the declaration of the French monarch, "that he would grant no other ſecurity than a renewal of the peace of Ryſwick; ſo that the negociation ſeemed to be at an end. William alſo communicated two reſolutions of the States-general, requeſting that the ſtipulated ſuccours might be immediately ſent. D'Avaux, the French ambaſſador, employed every artifice to perſuade the States of the cordial kindneſs of his maſter towards them. But the Dutch had too dearly experienced the French monarch's pretended love to their republic, to be eaſily perſuaded of the truth of his profeſſions; and therefore wiſely exerted themſelves in providing for their own ſecurity, by reinforcing their garriſons, and ſoliciting ſuccours from foreign powers. At the ſame time they wrote a letter to king William, wherein they expreſſed the moſt ſincere zeal for the intereſt of England, and earneſtly preſſed that the ſtipulated number of troops ſhould be immediately ſent to their aſſiſtance. Accordingly the three Scottiſh regiments, which the king had retained in his own pay, were directly ſent them from Scotland. The king communicated the letter of the States-general to the houſe of commons, who, having taken it into conſideration, came to the following reſolution; "That they would effectually aſſiſt his majeſty to ſupport his allies in maintaining the liberties of Europe, and immediately provide the ſtipulated ſuccours for the States-general." The addreſs from the houſe of peers on the ſame occaſion, manifeſted the ſame warmth and affection.

The king was ſo well pleaſed with this diſpoſition in both houſes to ſupport him in his views, that he expreſſed his ſatisfaction in an anſwer he ſent to each houſe ſeparately. Notwithſtanding theſe appearances of friendſhip and union, the commons were proſecuting their favourite project of revenge againſt their antagoniſts. They had appointed a committee to examine the journals of the houſe of lords with regard to the partition-treaty, and to report their proceedings to the houſe. Sir Edward Seymour, a violent tory, was appointed chairman of this committee; and on his report the commons voted, "That William, earl of Portland, by negociating and concluding the treaty of partition, which was deſtructive of the trade of this kingdom, and dangerous to the peace of Europe, was guilty, and ſhould be impeached of high crimes and miſdemeanors." Purſuant to this reſolution, Sir John Leviſon Gower was ſent up to impeach the earl at the bar of the houſe of lords, and at the ſame time to aſſure them, that the commons would, in due time, exhibit articles againſt him. They alſo reſolved to impeach lord Somers, which he being informed of, deſired to be heard before that houſe. This was granted, and he made a defence; wherein he obſerved, that he had only acted in compliance with the king's commands, which it was certainly his duty to do. When his lordſhip withdrew, the houſe fell into a long and warm debate upon the juſtification he had offered, but the tory party prevailed, and a reſolution paſſed, "That John, lord Somers, by adviſing his majeſty to conclude the treaty of partition, was guilty of a high crime and miſdemeanor." The commons then paſſed votes to the like effect againſt the earl of Orford and lord Halifax, and on the fifteenth of April a general impeachment was brought up againſt all three to the houſe of lords. A few days after the impeachment, they drew up an addreſs to the king, wherein they requeſted he would be pleaſed to remove John lord Somers, Edward earl of Orford, and Charles lord Halifax, from his council and preſence for ever; as alſo William earl of Portland, who had tranſacted theſe treaties. The lords were highly incenſed at this ſtep of the commons, which they conſidered not only as an inſult upon their tribunal, but alſo a violation of common juſtice; and they preſented a counter addreſs, wherein they entreated the king not to paſs any cenſure on thoſe lords, until they were tried upon the impeachments the commons had preferred againſt them. The latter, fearing that they might fall into diſgrace with the nation for having preferred impeachments which they could not properly ſupport, uſed every art to delay the trials of theſe noblemen; and when a day was at laſt appointed, they laid hold of ſome frivolous pretence to abſent themſelves from the trial, ſo that the four lords were acquitted, and the impeachments diſmiſſed, there being no proſecutors againſt them.

Still conſtant in their endeavours were the whig party to villify and depreciate their adverſaries in the minds of the people. They openly charged them with being penſioners to the French king; enemies to the preſent government; and that all their views and actions tended to the reſtoration of James and his family. They tried to procure petitions from London and the principal counties in England; but the county of Kent alone could be prevailed on to ſend up an addreſs. It contained the moſt indecent reflections on the houſe of commons, and was ſigned by the deputy-lieutenant of the county, ſeveral juſtices of the peace and others, and was boldly delivered to the houſe by five gentlemen of the county, who, upon being called in and queſtioned at the bar of the houſe, owned the petition and their hands to it. The houſe then took it into conſideration, and voted it to be a ſcandalous, inſolent, and ſeditious libel, tending to deſtroy the conſtitution of parliaments, and to ſubvert the eſtabliſhed government of theſe realms; and ordered the five perſons who had preſented it to be taken into cuſtody as promoters of the ſaid petition. Their confinement added fuel to the flame which had been blown up among the people; and ſoon after a paper came out, entitled a memorial from the gentlemen, freeholders, and inhabitants of the county of ——— in behalf of themſelves, and many thouſands of the good people of England. Herein they charged the commons with breach of faith in not paying the public debts; with impriſoning gentlemen who were none of their members; blamed them for voting the partition-treaty fatal; mentioned a new clauſe of rights; admoniſhed the commons to act according to their duty; and concluded with obſerving, that "Engliſhmen are no more to be ſlaves to parliaments than to kings."

His majeſty came to the houſe on the 12th of June, and gave the royal aſſent to the act of ſucceſſion, intitled, an act for the farther limitation of the crown, and better ſecuring the rights and liberties of the ſubject. On this occaſion he made a ſpeech, wherein he expreſſed his warm acknowledgments to both houſes, for the care they had taken to eſtabliſh the ſucceſſion of the crown in the proteſtant line, and for their repeated aſſurances of ſupporting him in ſuch alliances as ſhould be for the preſervation of the liberty of Europe, and the ſecurity of England and Holland. He then told them that the ſeaſon of the year required his preſence abroad, and recommended diſpatch in the buſineſs before them. Notwithſtanding the commons were exceedingly chagrined by the remonſtrance lately preſented them, they thought it beneath their dignity to take notice of it in the houſe; but in order to guard againſt its conſequences, they drew up an addreſs, wherein they repreſented to his majeſty, "That ſeveral diſaffected and evil-minded perſons have gone about to raiſe tumults in ſeveral parts of the kingdom, to diſturb the public tranquillity, they therefore humbly beſought his majeſty to provide for the public peace and ſecurity." They likewiſe preſented an addreſs in anſwer to the king's ſpeech, wherein they thanked him for having approved of their proceedings; declared they would ſupport him to the utmoſt; and deſired him to engage in ſuch new alliances with the emperor, and other ſtates, as he ſhould deem neceſſary for bridling the exorbitant power of France, and maintaining the independency of Europe. They next proceeded upon the buſineſs of ſupplies, and granted the ſum of a million and a half for the public expences. They voted thirty thouſand ſeamen, and reſolved that ten thouſand troops ſhould be ſent to the aſſiſtance of the States-general. They paſſed a bill for taking away all privilege of parliament in legal proſecutions during the intermediate prorogations; and introduced another for appointing commiſſioners to examine and ſtate the public accounts. On the twenty-fourth of June, after his majeſty had given the royal aſſent to ſeveral acts, he cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, wherein he returned both houſes thanks for the great zeal they had expreſſed for the public ſervice, and their ready compliance with what he recommended to them at the opening of the parliament; and particularly thanked the commons for the ſupplies, and for the encouragement they had given him to enter into alliances for the preſervation of his country.

On the firſt of July, having given the command of the ten thouſand auxiliaries, voted by the commons for the ſervice of the States-general, to the earl of Marlborough; placed the earl of Pembroke at the head of the admiralty; appointed Sir George Rooke to command the fleet; ſettled the regency, and other matters relating to domeſtic government, William embarked for Holland. Immediately on his arrival at the Hague, he aſſiſted at an aſſembly of the States-general, whom he addreſſed in a moſt affectionate ſpeech. He now ſpent ſome time in reviewing the frontier garriſons of the States, and gave ſuch orders as he judged neceſſary for the better defence and ſecurity of the country. When he returned to the Hague, he was informed that the count D'Avaux, the French ambaſſador, had delivered a letter from Lewis to the States, accompanied with a memorial of his own, to notify his being called home by his maſter; and wherein he obſerved, "That the ties between their High Mightineſſes and the king of England were too ſtrict, and they had too well made known their blind ſubmiſſion to the ſentiments of that monarch; and no doubt but that they had already taken a reſolution to make the ſame declaration to the moſt chriſtian king's ambaſſador." A very ſpirited anſwer to this memorial, was returned by the States-general on the firſt of Auguſt.

A new war between France and Holland appeared now to be inevitable. The latter therefore exerted all their endeavours in making preparations for their own defence; they repaired their fortifications, augmented their army, and hired auxiliaries from various quarters. The king of Denmark engaged to furniſh three thouſand horſe, one thouſand dragoons, and eight thouſand foot, in conſideration of receiving a ſubſidy of three hundred thouſand crowns a year during the war. The emperor, who was the perſon moſt affected by the acceſſion of the duke of Anjou to the crown of Spain, aſſembled an army, the command of which he beſtowed on prince Eugene, who was then eſteemed one of the greateſt and moſt fortunate generals.

William applied his principal attention in putting his navy on the moſt reſpectable footing, ſenſible of the fatal conſequences that flowed from the want of this precaution at the beginning of the laſt war. Accordingly, by the latter end of July, the Engliſh had a fleet of forty-eight ſhips of the line, beſides frigates, fire-ſhips, and ſmall veſſels, at Spithead, ready for the ſea, under the command of Sir George Rooke. That admiral cruiſing up and down the Channel, over-awed the French during the remainder of the ſeaſon. About the latter end of Auguſt, vice-admiral Bembow was ſent with a ſtrong ſquadron to the Weſt Indies. The French ſuſpected that this fleet was deſtined to the Mediterranean; and in order to confirm them in this belief, and cover its true deſign, William formally demanded a free uſe of the Spaniſh harbours. The demand was, however, civilly evaded, though the French ſhips had free admittance. The king now projected the grand alliance between the emperor Leopold, England and Holland, againſt France, for recovering the Spaniſh monarchy to the houſe of Auſtria, and for the ſecurity of England and Holland, in point of commerce and navigation, and of the houſe of Hanover's ſucceſſion to the crown of Great Britain, and to procure a ſufficient barrier for the Dutch. This triple alliance was framed in the nature of propoſals, upon which France might come in; and accordingly it was communicated to the French ambaſſador, and on their being rejected, it was determined to have recourſe to arms. The death of that weak and unfortunate prince, James the Second, which happened at this time, brought affairs much ſooner to a criſis than perhaps they would otherwiſe have been. He was ſeized with a vomiting of blood, and died at St. Germains on the ſixteenth of September, in the ſixty-eighth year of his age, and the thirteenth of his exile. On this event it was conſidered in the French council, what ſteps ſhould be taken with regard to his ſon. Lewis was inclined to give him the ſame titles his father had borne; but the miniſtry adviſed their maſter to remain paſſive, and ſuffer him to aſſume what title he pleaſed. They enforced their advice with ſuch reaſons of ſound policy, that Lewis reſolved not to acknowldge the ſon of James the Second as king. The ſame day, however, Mary of Modena, widow to the deceaſed king, went to Madam de Maintenon's apartment, to ſpeak to the French king. She found him there; and with a flood of tears, conjured him not to treat her ſon, herſelf, and the memory of a king he had protected, with ſo much indignity as to refuſe a title, the only remains of their former greatneſs. She obſerved, that as her ſon always received the honours of prince of Wales, he ought to be treated as king after the death of his father; and that even William himſelf could not complain of this, provided he was left to enjoy the throne of which he had deprived him. She then obſerved, that whether he acknowledged the ſon of James or not, the Engliſh would, nevertheleſs, declare war againſt France, and that he would only feel the regret of having ſacrificed the moſt noble ſentiments to a fruitleſs precaution. The entreaties of the royal widow were powerfully ſeconded by Madame de Maintenon. Lewis reſumed his former ſentiments, and James's ſon was proclaimed king of England, Scotland, and Ireland, by the title of James III. which title the king of Spain, the duke of Savoy, and the pope, likewiſe acknowledged.

As ſoon as William was informed of this tranſaction, he diſpatched a courier to the king of Sweden, as guarantee of the treaty of Ryſwick, to complain of this manifeſt violation of that treaty. At the ſame time he recalled his ambaſſador, the earl of Mancheſter, from Paris, with orders to return without taking leave; and M. Pouſſin, the French reſident, was told to depart the kingdom. Lewis, in a manifeſto which he publiſhed and diſperſed throughout Europe, endeavoured to vindicate his own conduct. He pretended to aſſert, that there was nothing in what he had done contrary to the treaty of Ryſwick; affirming, that he did not intend to aſſiſt king James the Third, as he ſtiled the pretender, in recovering his crown during the life of his preſent majeſty king William. Having concluded alliances with ſeveral foreign princes againſt France, particularly that with the emperor and Holland, the king began to prepare for his return to England, but being detained in Holland, partly by his bad ſtate of health, and partly in concerting meaſures with the States for attacking the French frontiers the next campaign, he did not arrive till the fifth of November. The firſt thing which engaged his attention and that of the council was, whether the preſent parliament ſhould be diſſolved and a new one called. After ſome debate the latter meaſure was carried.

A. D. 1702. The parliament met on the thirteenth of December, and the commons having choſen Mr. Harley for their ſpeaker, the king opened the ſeſſion with a moſt gracious and patriotic ſpeech. In anſwer to which the two houſes preſented ſeparate addreſſes to his majeſty, which were moſt graciouſly received by him, and at the ſame time he gave them aſſurances of the great ſatisfaction he conceived of their duty and affection. Forty thouſand men were appointed for the naval ſervice, and the like number for the land. In order to raiſe his majeſty a preſent ſum of money for thoſe purpoſes, the commons reſolved, that whoever ſhould advance or lend the ſum of ſix hundred thouſand pounds for the ſervice of the fleet, and fifty thouſand pounds for the preſent ſubſiſtence of the land forces, ſhould be repaid with intereſt at ſix per cent. out of the firſt aids. It was alſo unanimouſly reſolved by both houſes, to preſent an addreſs to his majeſty, beſeeching him to inſert an article in all his treaties of alliance, importing, that no peace ſhould be made with France, until his majeſty and the nation had reparation for the great indignity offered by the French king, in owning and declaring the pretended prince of Wales, king of England, Scotland, and Ireland. A bill for attainting the pretended prince of Wales, was brought into the houſe of commons, which being carried up to the other houſe, paſſed with the additional clauſe of attainder againſt the late king James's queen; but when the bill was ſent back to the commons, they excepted to the amendment, as irregular, and propoſed that the queen ſhould be attainted in a ſeparate bill, to which the lords aſſented. The commons then took into conſideration the conduct of the Kentiſh petitioners, who inſulted the laſt parliament; when they reſolved that Thomas Colepepper, Eſq; had promoted that ſcandalous and ſeditious petition in the houſe of commons, commonly called the Kentiſh petition, containing groundleſs reflections on that houſe, for which he ſhould be committed to Newgate, and the attorney-general ſhould proſecute him for that crime, and likewiſe for being guilty of corrupt, ſcandalous and indecent practices, in endeavouring to procure himſelf elected burgeſs for the town of Maidſtone in Kent. But while the houſe was thus maintaining its own dignity, care was taken that the rights and privileges of the ſubjects ſhould not de injured; and for this purpoſe it was reſolved by a conſiderable majority, that it was the undoubted right of the people of England, to petition or addreſs the king for the calling, ſitting, or diſſolving of parliaments, and for the redreſſing of grievances; and that every ſubject under an accuſation, either by impeachment or otherwiſe, had a right to be brought to a ſpeedy trial.

Before his return from Holland the king had engaged in a negociation with the prince of Heſſe d'Armſtadt, who aſſured him, that if he would lay ſiege to and take Cadiz, the admiral of Caſtile, and ſeveral other grandees of Spain, would declare for the houſe of Auſtria. The emperor and the Dutch had determined upon the ſiege of Keyſerwaert, which the elector of Cologne had delivered into the hands of the French. The elector of Hanover had reſolved to diſarm the prince of Wolfenbuttle and Saxegotha; the king of the Romans and prince Lewis of Baden undertook to inveſt Landau, and the emperor promiſed to ſend a powerful reinforcement to prince Eugene in Savoy. William alſo ſuggeſted a plan for effectually reducing the exorbitant power, and chaſtizing the inſolence of France. Thus every thing ſeemed to be in train to humble the pride of a treacherous enemy; but his majeſty did not live to attempt this important enterprize; yet, though his conſtitution was greatly impaired, he endeavoured to conceal the effects of his malady, and to recruit his ſtrength by regular exerciſe. But on the twenty-firſt of February, as his majeſty was riding from Kenſington to Hampton court, his horſe fell, by which accident his collar bone was broke. Being conveyed to Hampton court, the fracture was reduced by Ronjat, his ſurgeon. In the evening his majeſty returned to his palace at Kenſington, where he had no ſooner arrived, than it was found, that the motion of the carriage had cauſed the ends of the fractured bone to ſeparate; but they were ſoon replaced under the inſpection of Bidloo, his phyſician. The king appeared to be in a fair way of recovery, till the firſt of March, when ſymptoms of an inflammation were diſcovered on his knee, which cauſed great weakneſs, and exquiſite pain. On the following day the bill of attainder againſt the pretended prince of Wales, and a bill enacting, that the ſolemn affirmation of the people called quakers, ſhould be accepted in the courts of law and equity, inſtead of an oath, received the royal aſſent by commiſſion. On the ſeventh of this month, the king's lameneſs was ſo far abated, that he was able to walk ſome time in the gallery of his palace at Kenſington; but ſeating himſelf on a couch, he fell aſleep, and was ſeized, upon his waking, with a ſhivering fit, which was preſently followed by a fever and diarrhœa. Sir Richard Blackmore, and other celebrated phyſicians, attended his majeſty, but all their endeavours to afford him relief proved ineffectual. On the eighth he granted a commiſſion for paſſing the malt tax bill, and the bill of abjuration; but he was ſo weak, as to be incapable of ſubſcribing the commiſſion, and therefore affixed to it a ſtamp prepared for the purpoſe, in the preſence of the lord keeper, and the clerks of parliament. During the intervals of his fits, the king ſent for ſeveral noblemen, and ſpake to them about private affairs. Upon the arrival of the earl of Albemarle, he was admitted into the royal preſence. His majeſty ſaid to him, with unuſual coolneſs, "I draw towards my end." In the evening he thanked Dr. Bidloo for his tenderneſs and care, ſaying, "I am convinced that you, and the other learned phyſicians, have done every thing that the art of man could effect, for procuring me relief; but finding all your efforts muſt prove fruitleſs, I ſubmit to my fate without reluctance." Early in the morning of the tenth, his majeſty had received the holy ſacrament from the hands of Tenniſon, archbiſhop of Canterbury, and continued in prayer with that prelate and Dr. Burnet, biſhop of Saliſbury, till about eight o'clock, when he was ſeized with the agonies of death. The king thanked lord Overkirk for the zeal and fidelity with which he had promoted his intereſts, during a ſeries of ſeveral years, and delivered the keys of his cloſet and eſcritoir to lord Albemarle, telling that nobleman, he was worthy to be intruſted with them. The earl of Portland, after whom his majeſty had made repeated enquiries, did not arrive till he had entirely loſt his faculty of ſpeech, and therefore he could only expreſs his friendſhip for that nobleman, by graſping his hand, and ardently preſſing it to his boſom. Soon after he expired in the arms of Mr. Sewel, one of the pages of the back ſtairs, who ſupported him as he ſat in his bed. Thus died, on the tenth of March, William III. in the fifty-ſecond year of his age, and the fourteenth of his reign. The lords

Lexington and Scarborough, who were then in waiting, no ſooner perceived that the king was dead, than they ordered Ronjat to take off from his left arm a black ribband, which bound next to his ſkin a gold locket, containing ſome hair of the late queen, expreſſing the tender regard he had for her memory. The royal corpſe, after having been opened and embalmed, lay in ſtate at Kenſington; and on the twelfth of April was depoſited in a vault of Henry the VIIth's chapel, in Weſtminſter abbey. In the beginning of May, a will which he had intruſted with monſieur Schuylemburg was opened at the Hague; in which it appeared, that he had declared his couſin, the prince Friſon of Naſſau, ſtadtholder of Friſland, his ſole and univerſal heir, and appointed the ſtates general his executors. By a codicil, he bequeathed the lordſhip of Breevert to the earl of Albemarle, and a legacy of two hundred thouſand guilders.

An Impartial Character of King William the Third.

This prince was of a middle ſtature, ſlender, and, by reaſon of an immature birth, of a delicate conſtitution; being ſubject, from his infancy, to a cough and aſthma. He had an aquiline noſe, a high forehead, ſparkling eyes, and a grave, ſolemn aſpect. But by the aids of temperance and exerciſe, he underwent much fatigue both in the field and in the cabinet. He was endowed with a retentive memory and a ſolid judgment; in conſequence of which his plans, though ſeldom remarkably ſucceſsful, were never ineffectual. He was temperate, juſt, ſincere, religious, and a ſtranger to violent tranſports of paſſion. He was very reſerved, ſpoke but little, and wanted in his manners that pleaſing addreſs, which among the admirers of Charles II. atoned for a number of his vices. He likewiſe was a ſtranger to that king's inſincerity, and never appeared delighted with thoſe he deſpiſed. The defects of literary ſcience were in him ſupplied by natural ſagacity; and there were a ſimplicity, an elevation, an utility, in all the actions of his life. The laſt treaty which William ſigned was the grand alliance; the laſt act of parliament he paſſed, was one which completed the ſecurity of the Hanover ſucceſſion; and the laſt meſſage he ſent to parliament, while he was in a manner expiring, was to recommend an union between two parts of the iſland which had been long divided. In fortitude and equanimity he rivalled the moſt renowned heroes of antiquity. Being a predeſtinarian, he believed every bullet had its commiſſion; yet in battle his ſpirit was conſtantly reſtrained from acts of raſhneſs, by a deliberate judgment, and a remarkable preſence of mind. He was a zealous aſſerter of the reformed religion, recommending a conformity thereto by his own exemplary conduct. He maintained invariably a regard for the natural rights and liberties of mankind as rational, ſocial beings. Influenced by this benevolent principle, he exerted the moſt heroic efforts in the deliverance of our anceſtors from the bondage of ſlavery; and commenced champion of the general liberties of Europe, the cauſe of reaſon, of nature, of God, and of man. That the Seven United Provinces did not loſe their liberty by the growing power of France; that this iſland did not ſink into the moſt abject ſlavery; that the proteſtant religion was not aboliſhed by law in every country in Europe, appears under God, to be owing to him. To him it was owing, that mankind now ſee the ſingular ſpectacle of a monarchy, in which the ſovereign derives a degree of greatneſs and ſecurity from the liberty of his people, which treaſures and arms have not been able to beſtow upon other princes. In a few words, William III. was a happy inſtrument in the hand of Providence, a good man, an illuſtrious ſovereign; and will ever hold a place among the greateſt princes recorded in the annals of time.

The character of this prince (a too common practice with former hiſtorians) has been ſet in quite oppoſite lights, ſome having beſtowed on him the moſt exalted encomiums, and others the moſt inveterate obloquy. In ſuch inſtances, which too frequently and ſhamefully occur, it has been our conſtant endeavour to perſevere in the middle way. Having pledged ourſelves to give the public both an impartial and complete hiſtory of England; we reſt ſatisfied with the full perſuaſion of having punctually hitherto fulfilled our engagements. We have been ſufficiently diffuſe, and upon a candid comparative view of our labours with ſimilar works, (whoſe limits and ſize being too confined, contain not even half the whole hiſtory of England) we flatter ourſelves, our readers will find we have brought together all the moſt remarkable tranſactions, memorable events, and ſingular occurrences, into a ſtriking point of view. At the ſame time we can aver, that ſcarce a number has been publiſhed, that has not contained either in the matter or the embelliſhments, much intereſting information, which may with ſtrict truth be ſtiled new and entertaining, and which is not to be found in any work of the like kind hitherto publiſhed, or now publiſhing, by thoſe whoſe only deſign in oppoſition, is to anſwer pecuniary and ſelf-intereſted purpoſes. Having thus, by labour and aſſiduity, eſtabliſhed what was our only ambition, an honeſt reputation, we ſhall ſtill adhere to that unſhaken truth and honeſt impartiality, which can alone render a hiſtory complete and entertaining.

A. D. 1702. ANNE, princeſs of Denmark, ſucceeded to the throne by virtue of an act of ſettlement made in the preceding reign; and was proclaimed queen on the tenth of March, when in the thirty-eighth year of her age. Her firſt act of ſovereignty was to convene the privy council, to whom ſhe declared her concern for the loſs the nation had ſuſtained in the death of his late majeſty; her regard for the religion and liberties of her country; her deſire to maintain the ſucceſſion in the proteſtant line; and the government in church and ſtate, as by law eſtabliſhed; and laſtly, her fixed reſolution to curb the inſolence of France, and purſue the intereſt of England, together with that of the confederates, for the ſupport of the common cauſe. As by an act paſſed in the late reign the parliament continued ſitting, even after the king's death, both houſes unanimouſly voted an addreſs of condolence and congratulation. The lords and commons then aſſured her majeſty, that they firmly reſolved to enable her to maintain her alliances, and the ſucceſſion in the proteſtant line, and effectually ſupport the credit of the nation. On the eleventh of March, the queen went to the houſe of peers, where, with the uſual ſolemnity, ſhe delivered her firſt ſpeech to parliament, in which ſhe expreſſed her ſatisfaction at their unanimous concurrence with her in opinion, that too much could not be done to reduce the exorbitant power of France; and deſired at the ſame time, they would conſider of proper methods for forming an union between England and Scotland. She declared it would be her conſtant endeavour to make the beſt return for their duty and affection; and as ſhe knew her heart to be entirely Engliſh, ſhe could very ſincerely aſſure them, that there was not any thing they could expect or deſire from her, which ſhe ſhould not always be ready to do for the proſperity and happineſs of England, and that they ſhould find her a religious obſerver of her word. Theſe aſſurances were highly pleaſing to all parties; and addreſſes were preſented by the clergy of London, by the diſſenters in and about that city, and by all the cities, towns, and corporations of England. In return, ſhe declared her attachment to the church; promiſed protection to the diſſenters, and engaged all her ſubjects affections by the affability with which ſhe received their compliments.

When the news of William's death was publiſhed, the States immediately aſſembled: and for ſome time gazed at each other in ſilent aſtoniſhment. They wept; interchanged embraces, and vowed that they would act with unanimity, and expend their precious blood in defence of their country. Soon after penſionary Fagel imparted a letter which he had received from the earl of Marlborough, containing aſſurances in the queen's name, of union and aſſiſtance. But what chiefly revived the ſpirits of the Dutch, was the arrival of the earl of Marlborough, whom her majeſty had appointed generaliſſimo and ambaſſador extraordinary. The earl ſucceeded in every part of his negociation, and having concerted meaſures for the enſuing campaign, embarked for England on the third of April. In the mean time the commons having voted the queen the ſame revenue for life, which had been enjoyed by king William, ſhe came to the parliament on the thirtieth of March, and generouſly informed them, that ſhe would give one hundred thouſand pounds for the public ſervice. Her majeſty was crowned on the twenty-third of April, and about the ſame time, the council ordered the princeſs Sophia to be publicly prayed for. On the fourth of May war was declared againſt France; and in this proclamation, the French king was charged with having taken poſſeſſion of great part of the Spaniſh dominions; with deſigning to invade the liberties of Europe; and with having offered an inſult to the queen and her throne, by preſuming to declare the pretended prince of Wales king of England, Scotland, and Ireland. The deſign of this war was to reſtore the balance of Europe, by taking the Spaniſh dominions out of the hands of the French monarch, and placing the archduke Charles, the ſecond ſon of the emperor Leopold, on the throne of Spain, whom the allies acknowledged as king, in oppoſition to the duke of Anjou. This was the ſcope of the grand alliance which William had formed with the emperor and the States General, and to which acceded the kings of Portugal and Pruſſia, the duke of Savoy, Holland, and other powers. After war was declared, the queen appointed lord Godolphin high-treaſurer, prince George of Denmark, her royal conſort, lord-high-admiral, and Sir George Rooke, vice-admiral of England. On the ſecond of July the parliament was diſſolved, as it muſt have expired by the act ſix months after the death of the king. By this time the campaign had been opened in Germany. The confederates began with the ſiege of Keyſerſwaert, a ſtrong town on the Rhine, which the elector of Cologne had put into the hands of the French, and notwithſtanding a vigorous defence, the place ſurrendered about the beginning of June. In the mean time the French prevailed in the Netherlands; but the States having put their forces under the command of the earl of Marlborough, he aſſembled the confederate troops about the beginning of July, and marched againſt the enemy, who retired before him, till they had entirely abandoned Spaniſh Guelderland. Not being able to bring them to an engagement, the earl took Venlo on the twenty-fifth of September, Ruremond on the ſixth of October, and Liege about the end of that month. In November the army breaking up, Marlborough repaired to Maeſtricht, from whence he propoſed to return to the Hague by water. He accordingly embarked in a large boat with twenty-five ſoldiers, under the command of a lieutenant. But in the night a French partizan, with thirty-five men from Gueldres, lurking among the ruſhes, in expectation of prey, ſeizing the rope by which the boat was drawn, hauled it aſhore; they then ruſhed into the veſſel, and ſecured the ſoldiers before they could put themſelves in a poſture of defence. Thus the earl of Marlborough, with general Opdam, and Gueldermalſen, one of the deputies of the States, were taken priſoners. Theſe laſt were happily provided with paſſports. The earl had neglected this precaution, and it appeared as if nothing could ſave him: but recollecting he had an old paſſport for his brother, general Churchill, in his pocket, he, with admirable preſence of mind, produced it as his own; and the French being in ſuch confuſion as to neglect examining the date, were ſatisfied with rifling their baggage, and carrying off the guard as priſoners. The governor of Venlo being informed that Marlborough had been ſurprized, and conveyed to Gueldres, immediately marched with his whole garriſon to inveſt that town. The ſame imperfect account being carried to Holland, the whole province was filled with conſternation; and the States immediately aſſembling, reſolved, that all their forces ſhould inſtantly march to Gueldres to his relief: but before theſe orders could be diſpatched, the earl arrived at the Hague, to the inexpreſſible joy of the people.

The public expectations were much diſappointed in reſpect to the operations of the combined fleets. The late king, juſt before his death, had formed a deſign of reducing Cadiz, and the queen determined to put this project in execution. The fleet conſiſted of fifty ſail of the line, commanded by Sir George Rooke, and the duke of Ormond was appointed general of the land forces. Toward the latter end of June the fleet ſailed from St. Helen's, and on the twelfth of Auguſt anchored at the diſtance of two leagues from Cadiz. On the fifteenth the duke of Ormond landed his troops in the bay of Bulls, and repulſed a body of Spaniſh infantry. He then ſummoned the governor of St. Catharine to ſurrender, and received for anſwer, that they were prepared for his reception. A battery was now raiſed againſt Montagorda fort, oppoſite to the Puntal; but the attempt miſcarried, and the troops were reimbarked. On his return to England, Rooke received advice, that the galleons from the Weſt Indies had put into Vigo, under convoy of a French ſquadron. He therefore reſolved to ſail thither and attack them. The paſſage into the harbour was well ſecured and defended. As the firſt and ſecond rates of the combined fleet were too large to enter, the admirals ſhifted their flags to ſmaller ſhips. To favour the attack Ormond landed with twenty-five hundred men, and took by aſſault a fort and platform of forty pieces of cannon, at the entrance of the harbour. No ſooner was the Britiſh enſign diſplayed at the top of the fort, than the ſhips advanced to the attack. Vice-admiral Hopſon, in the Torbay, crowding all his ſail, ran directly againſt the boom, which was broke by the firſt ſhock; and the whole ſquadron entered the harbour, through a terrible fire from the enemies ſhips and batteries. Theſe laſt however were ſtormed and taken by the grenadiers, who had been landed. The French, after an obſtinate reſiſtance, finding themſelves unable to contend with ſuch an adverſary, reſolved to ſet fire to their galleons and ſhips of war, that they might not fall into the hands of the victors. They accordingly burned and ran aſhore eight ſhips, and as many advice boats; but ten ſhips and eleven galleons were taken. Though they had ſecured the beſt part of their effects, before the combined fleets arrived, yet the value of fourteen millions of pieces of eight, in plate and rich commodities, were deſtroyed in ſix galleons that periſhed; and about half that value was brought off by the conquerors; ſo that this victory proved a dreadful ſtroke to the enemy, and a valuable acquiſition to the allies. Sir George Rooke, being joined ſoon after by Sir Cloudeſley Shovel, left this officer to bring home the prizes, and deſtroy the fortifications, while he returned in triumph to England. But the Engliſh were not ſo ſucceſsful in America as in Europe. By the death of admiral Bembow, England was deprived of one of the braveſt ſea officers ſhe ever produced. This great man having received information that M. de Caſſe, with a French ſquadron, was expected at Hiſpaniola, reſolved to go in queſt of him. On the nineteenth of Auguſt he came up with the French ſquadron, conſiſting of ten ſail, viz. four of ſeventy guns, one of forty, and the reſt ſmall frigates. Bembow had only ſeven ſhips with him, viz. the Breda of ſeventy guns, the Defiance of ſixty-four, the Ruby of fifty-four, and the Pendennis, Greenwich, Windſor, and Falmouth, of fifty each. The admiral in the Breda, with the Falmouth and Ruby, began the attack, but the other four ſhips fell aſtern, and ſcarce fired a ſhot; notwithſtanding which the admiral purſued the enemy, and maintained a running fight for five days, when one of the enemy's principal ſhips appeared quite diſabled. But the French having by this time diſcovered that Bembow was not ſeconded by the reſt of his captains, came down furiouſly upon him, and in the height of the engagement, he had the misfortune to have his leg ſhattered to pieces by a chain-ſhot. Undaunted by this accident he ordered his cradle to be brought upon deck, and ſtill continued the fight, till the captains, who had ſo baſely deſerted him, came on board, and deſired him to deſiſt, alledging the enemy was too ſtrong. The admiral, apprehenſive from their former conduct, that if he withſtood their importunities they might go over to the French, returned to Jamaica. Enraged at the baſe behaviour of his captains, he immediately iſſued a commiſſion to rear admiral Whetſtone, and other officers, to hold a court-martial, and try them for cowardice. Hudſon of the Pendennis, died before the trial; Kirby of the Defiance, and Wade of the Greenwich, were convicted and ſentenced to be ſhot; Conſtable of the Windſor was caſhiered and impriſoned; Vincent of the Falmouth, and Fogg, the admiral's own captain, were convicted of having ſigned a paper, that they would not fight on the preſent occaſion; but as they had behaved gallantly in the action, the court only inflicted on them the puniſhment of ſuſpenſion, nor was that to take place till the lord high admiral's pleaſure ſhould be known. Wade and Kirby were ſent home in the Briſtol, and, upon their arrival at Plymouth, ſhot on board the ſhip; a dead warrant for their immediate execution having lain there for ſome time. In the mean time admiral Bembow was ſo deeply affected by this miſcarriage, that he became melancholy, and his grief having augmented the fever, occaſioned by his wound, ſoon put a period to his exiſtence.

The queen, on the ſecond of July, iſſued writs for calling another parliament; it met on the twentieth of October, when the commons choſe Mr. Robert Harley for their ſpeaker. In an addreſs of thanks, returned by the lords to the ſpeech, they congratulated her majeſty on the ſucceſs of her arms under the earl of Marlborough in general terms. But the commons were more particular, for in their addreſs they caſt ſeveral invidious reflections on the late reign; and among other things obſerved, "that the wonderful progreſs of her majeſty's arms, under the earl of Marlborough, had ſignally retrieved the ancient honour and glory of the Engliſh nation." The word retrieved, occaſioned ſeveral warm debates in the houſe, ſome affirming, that it evidently implied a reflection on the memory of the late king, as if the honour of the nation had been loſt, or had greatly ſuffered in his reign, and the word maintained, was propoſed to be inſerted in its room. But the tories who introduced and ſupported the firſt expreſſion, gained their point, and upon a diviſion, retrieved was carried by a great majority. November the twenty-firſt, the queen ſent a meſſage to the houſe of commons, by Mr. ſecretary Hedges, informing them, "that her majeſty, conſidering there was but a very ſlender proviſion made for the prince her huſband, if he ſhould ſurvive her; and that ſhe was reſtrained from increaſing the ſame by the late act of parliament, for ſettling the revenue, thought it neceſſary to recommend the making a further proviſion for the prince to their conſideration." In conſequence of this meſſage the commons unanimouſly reſolved, "that the yearly ſum of one hundred thouſand pounds be ſettled upon his royal highneſs, in caſe he ſhould ſurvive her majeſty." The earl of Marlborough now received the thanks of both houſes for his ſignal ſervices; and on the ſecond of December her majeſty declared in the committee of council, that ſhe was ſo ſatisfied with the eminent ſervices of lord Marlborough to the public and herſelf, both in the command of the army, and the entire confidence he had ſettled between her majeſty and her allies, the States General, that ſhe intended to create him a duke, and alſo to grant him a penſion of five thouſand pounds per annum, upon the revenue of the poſt-office, for the ſupport of his honour during the life of her majeſty.

By order of the houſe of commons, commiſſioners for ſtating the public accounts, having examined thoſe of the earl of Ranelagh, pay-maſter of the army, laid them before the houſe, with their own obſervations, in which they bore very hard upon the earl; and the commons, after a full hearing of all parties, came to ſeveral reſolutions againſt that nobleman, who, to avoid any farther enquiries into his management, reſigned his place; but this was not ſufficient to appeaſe the commons; for they expelled him their houſe, of which he was a member, and even addreſſed her majeſty to order the attorney-general to proſecute him, but the queen did not think proper to comply with their requeſt. Violent animoſities were produced between the two houſes, by this enquiry; and the queen being informed thereof, ſent a meſſage to the lords, deſiring they would diſpatch the buſineſs in which they were engaged; but the quarrel between the two houſes ſtill continuing with a warmth that left little hopes of an accommodation, the queen reſolved to put an end to the ſeſſion with all convenient ſpeed.

A. D. 1703. Her majeſty informed the commons, that the States General had preſſed her to augment her forces, as the only means to render ineffectual the great and early preparations of the enemy. The commons immediately reſolved, that ten thouſand men ſhould be hired as an augmentation of the forces to act in conjunction with the allies; but at the ſame time they intreated her majeſty to make it a point with the States General, that they ſhould put an immediate ſtop to all commerce and correſpondence with France and Spain; and on the twenty-ſeventh of February, her majeſty came to the houſe of peers, and gave the royal aſſent to ſeveral acts; after which the lord-keeper prorogued the parliament by her majeſty's command.

About the middle of April Marlborough having croſſed the ſea, immediately aſſembled the allied army, and opened the campaign in Flanders with the ſiege of Bonne, which place was attacked in three different quarters at once. The garriſon made a very vigorous defence, but at laſt, the fort having been taken by aſſault, and the breaches being practicable, the marquis d'Alegre, the governor, ordered a parley to be beat; hoſtages were immediately exchanged, and two days after the garriſon marched out, and were ſent to Luxemburgh. The duke now advanced towards the French army with an intent to give them battle; but upon his approach, Villeroy thought proper to retire within the lines, having firſt blown up the works about Tongeren. It was next reſolved to attack the French lines; which ſervice was effectually performed by general Coehorn and baron Sparre, though not without conſiderable loſs in the attack. The duke of Marlborough finding it impoſſible to bring the French to an engagement, ſat down before Huy, of which he made himſelf maſter in about ten days. On the tenth of September, the confederates inveſted Limburgh, which ſurrendered on the twenty-eighth, and put an end to the campaign in Flanders. On the thirtieth of October, the duke of Marlborough returned to England. The command of the grand fleet was this year given to Sir Cloudeſley Shovel, Sir George Rooke being ill at Bath. It conſiſted of thirty-five ſhips of the line, and the admiral had under him Sir Stafford Fairborne, vice-admiral of the red; Sir George Byng, rear-admiral of the red; and Sir John Leake, vice-admiral of the blue. While this fleet was at ſea, intelligence was brought to the lord high-admiral's council, that a conſiderable fleet of French merchant ſhips, with their convoy, were in Concalle bay, on the coaſt of Normandy. Orders were immediately given to admiral Dilkes to ſail in purſuit of them, which he did on the twenty-ſecond of July, and executed his commiſſion with ſuch ſucceſs, that upwards of forty ſail, three of which were equipped as men of war, he took, burnt, and ſunk.

Still Lewis was able to make head againſt the united efforts of the grand alliance; it was therefore reſolved to weaken him by detaching from his intereſt two of his principal allies. The project ſucceeded; and Lewis with amazement heard, that the duke of Savoy was in actual treaty with the emperor. He immediately ſent orders to the duke of Vendoſme to ſeize and diſarm the troops of Savoy, that were in his ſervice, to the number of twenty-two thouſand men. The duke, by way of repriſal, commanded ſeveral French officers that were in Turin, and the French ambaſſador himſelf, to be put under arreſt. This proceeding produced a ſecond order from Lewis to the duke of Vendoſme, to invade Savoy immediately. In return, the duke publiſhed a manifeſto, ſetting forth the neceſſity and juſtice of his proceedings, and ſent expreſſes to the confederated powers to ſolicit their aſſiſtance againſt the impending ſtorm. The queen aſſured him of her protection, and both ſhe and the States ſent ambaſſadors to the court of Turin. In the mean time the duke concluded a treaty with the court of Vienna, who promiſed him all that France and Spain had refuſed him, viz. Monſerrat, Mantua, Alexandria, Valencia, and the countries between the Po and the Tanaro, with more money than he received from France in ſubſidies. The money was to be furniſhed by England, for the emperor had ſcarcely ſufficient to pay his troops. In return, the duke of Savoy acknowledged the archduke Charles as king of Spain, and prepared for the event. France had ſcarce received intelligence that ſhe had loſt this ally, but ſhe alſo heard that Portugal had deſerted her. Mr. Methuen, our ambaſſador at that court, had ſpared no pains to detach his moſt Faithful majeſty from his unnatural connections with the grand monarch. His arguments had their full weight with his Portugueſe majeſty, who was moreover allured by the proſpect of a match between the infanta his daughter and the archduke Charles, to whom the emperor and the king of the Romans, ſhould transfer all their pretenſions to the crown of Spain. A treaty was now ſet on foot and ſoon concluded at Liſbon, between the emperor, the queen of Great Britain, the king of Portugal, and the States General. In this treaty it was ſtipulated, that king Charles ſhould be conveyed to Portugal by a powerful fleet, having on board twelve thouſand ſoldiers, with a great ſupply of arms and ammunition, and that twenty-eight thouſand Portugueſe ſhould be ready to join him immediately at Liſbon. About the middle of September king Charles ſet out from Vienna for Holland, and paſſing through the territories of the elector of Hanover, was met by that prince, who complimented him on his acceſſion. At Duſſeldorp he was viſited by the elector Palatine and the duke of Marlborough, the latter of whom made him compliments of congratulation in the name of our queen. On the ſecond of November his majeſty arrived at the Hague, where he repreſented to the States, that the province of Limburgh belonged to him as king of Spain, and deſired he might have the civil government thereof; which the States complying with, his majeſty appointed count Zinzendorf to take poſſeſſion of the town and province of Limburgh in his name. Having paid his viſit at the Hague, the archduke arrived in England, where he was royally entertained by the queen and prince George at Windſor, for three days; and in the following year he ſailed with the combined fleets for Portugal. The parliament meeting on the ninth of November, the queen opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, wherein ſhe took notice of the declaration by the duke of Savoy, and the treaty of Portugal, as circumſtances very advantageous to the allies. The treaty with Portugal being now laid before the lower houſe, and duly conſidered, they voted forty thouſand men, including five thouſand marines, for the ſea ſervice of the enſuing year; the like number of land forces to act in conjunction with the allies, beſides the additional ten thouſand; and they reſolved that the proportion to be employed in Portugal ſhould amount to eight thouſand. For the maintenance of theſe armaments, as well as for the diſcharge of the ſubſidies, payable to her majeſty's allies, they granted the ſum of three millions eight hundred and eighty one thouſand ſix pounds, fifteen ſhillings. They likewiſe preſented an addreſs to the queen, in which they aſſured her, that they would provide for the ſupport of ſuch alliances as ſhe had made or ſhould make with the duke of Savoy.

On the twenty-ſixth of September, about eleven o'clock at night, there aroſe the moſt dreadful tempeſt that had ever been known in the memory of man, attended with ſuch flaſhes of lightening and peals of thunder as filled every mind with the utmoſt terror and conſternation. The houſes in London ſhook from their foundations, and ſeveral of them falling, overwhelmed the inhabitants in their ruins. The Thames overflowed ſeveral ſtreets, and roſe to a conſiderable height in Weſtminſter hall. London bridge was almoſt choaked up with the wreck of veſſels that were beat to pieces in the river. The loſs ſuſtained by the capital alone was computed at near two millions, and the city of Briſtol ſuffered to the amount of two hundred thouſand pounds: but the greateſt loſs fell upon the navy, of which there periſhed no leſs than thirteen ſhips, upwards of fifteen hundred ſeamen were drowned, among whom was Beaumont, rear admiral of the blue, who had been employed all this year in obſerving the Dunkirk ſquadron. Theſe loſſes, however, though they affected us greatly at home, ſerved in ſome meaſure to raiſe our reputation abroad; for orders were immediately iſſued for building a greater number of ſhips than deſtroyed; and the queen, by gracious bounties, gave ſuch ſpeedy relief to thoſe ſeamen who eſcaped with their lives, and to the diſtreſſed widows of ſuch as were drowned, as gained her both popular eſteem and univerſal love.

About this time Simon Frazer, lord Lovat, and two other perſons, were ſent over from St. Germains to Scotland, with inſtructions to learn the ſtrength and ſentiments of the clans, and endeavour to perſuade ſome of the nobility and leading men to enter into a deſign the French had formed of reſtoring the pretender to the crown of that kingdom. Sir John Maclean, who had lately come over from France to England, had been apprehended at Folkſtone in Kent, from whence he was brought to London in cuſtody of the queen's meſſengers. A perſon named Keith was apprehended at the ſame time, as was Mr. Lindſey, who had been under ſecretary to king James and the pretender. James Boucher, who had been aid de camp to the duke of Berwick, was taken on the coaſt of Suſſex, coming over from France. Such a number of rebels and outlaws coming over at this time, tended to confirm the truth of a conſpiracy being in agitation, though they made uſe of the ſpecious pretence, that their only deſign was to live peaceably at home, under her majeſty's government for the future. But one Ferguſon, who had been concerned in almoſt every jacobite plot, came in voluntarily and declared, that Frazer had been employed by the duke of Queenſberry, to draw ſome perſons whom that nobleman had a diſlike to, into a plot, but that there was in reality no ſuch thing in agitation. Theſe aſſurances, however, gained little credit, and the houſe of lords, taking theſe matters into conſideration, reſolved that a committee ſhould be appointed to examine into the particulars, and ordered that Sir John Maclean and the other emiſſaries, ſhould be taken into the cuſtody of the black rod, and no perſon admitted to ſpeak to them. This ſtep greatly offended her majeſty, ſhe thinking it too officious an interpoſition to take them out of the hands of her meſſengers, informed the lords, " that ſhe thought it would be inconvenient to change the method of examination already begun, and, that ſhe would, in a ſhort time, inform the houſe of the whole affair."

A. D. 1704.

On the twenty-ninth of January the lords proceeded in their examinations of the Scottiſh plot; and the earl of Nottingham acquainted them, that the queen had commanded him to lay before them the account, containing all the papers hitherto diſcovered in relation to that affair; but that there was one circumſtance that could not be properly communicated without running a riſk of preventing a diſcovery of much greater importance: but the lords not ſatiſfied with this reſerve, preſented an addreſs, deſiring that all the papers, without diſtinction, might be ſubmitted to their inſpection, in order to enable them to penetrate to the bottom of this conſpiracy before the concluſion of the ſeſſion. Upon this the queen, a few days after, ſent the papers ſealed to the houſe; and all the lords were ſummoned to attend on the eighth of February, that they might then be opened and peruſed. The houſe accordingly met, and having finiſhed the examinations, voted, that there had been dangerous plots between ſome perſons in Scotland and the courts of France and St. Germains; and that the encouragement for this plotting aroſe, from not ſettling the ſucceſſion of the crown in the houſe of Hanover. Theſe votes were ſignified to the queen in an addreſs, and the lords promiſed, that when this ſucceſſion ſhould be once ſettled, they would endeavour to promote the union of the two kingdoms upon juſt and honourable terms. Her majeſty in the mean time performed an act of generoſity which greatly endeared her to her ſubjects, and was a convincing proof of the great regard ſhe had for religion, by conferring on the poor clergy a more extenſive and magnificent bounty than any of her predeceſſors ever had done: and which at this day amounts to above twenty thouſand a year, and is ſtill increaſing. On the twenty-ſeventh of February, her majeſty ſent a meſſage to the commons, importing, " that having maturely conſidered the mean and inſignificant maintenance appointed for the clergy: in various parts of the kingdom, ſhe had remitted the arrears of the firſt fruits and tenths, to the ſaid poor clergy: that ſhe would grant her whole revenue ariſing out of this fund, as far as it ſhould become free from incumbrances, towards an augmentation of their maintenance; and that if the houſe of commons could diſcover any method by which her good intentions towards the clergy could be rendered more effectual, it would be at once a great advantage to the public, and very acceptable to herſelf." Having received this meſſage, the commons voted an addreſs to the queen, in which they expreſſed their thanks for her pious concern for increaſing the maintenance of the poor clergy out of her own revenue, and aſſured her majeſty they would exert their utmoſt endeavours to render her intentions more effectual; and a bill was brought in, for enabling her majeſty to grant in perpetuity the revenue of the firſt fruits and tenths, for the maintenance of the poor clergy. At the ſame time they repealed the ſtatute of Mortmain, ſo far as it might be free to all men, either by deed or their laſt wills, to give what they thought proper, towards the augmentation of benefices. This was oppoſed with great warmth by ſome of the lords, who alledged, it would be opening a door for the clergy to practiſe upon the weakneſs of dying men: but after a debate of ſeveral hours, it was carried in the affirmative by a great majority; and paſſed into a law ſoon after.

At this time the emperor's affairs were in the moſt deplorable ſituation; and the houſe of Auſtria ſaw itſelf on the brink of ruin, without a timely and powerful aſſiſtance. The elector of Bavaria was maſter of Paſſau; thirty thouſand French under the command of marſhal Marſin, who had ſucceeded

Villars, over-run the country on the other ſide the Danube; ſeveral flying parties were in Auſtria: Vienna itſelf was threatened on one ſide by the French and Bavarians, and on the other by prince Rogotſki, at the head of the mutinous Hungarians, fighting for their liberty, and aſſiſted with money by the French and Turks. In this forlorn condition, Leopold had no other reſource than that of imploring the aſſiſtance of her Britannic majeſty. He therefore, about the beginning of April, ordered Wratiſlaw, the Imperial envoy at London, to preſent a memorial to the queen, diſplaying the imminent danger that threatened Germany, and earneſtly imploring her relief. This memorial was ſtrongly ſupported by the duke of Marlborough, who repreſented the abſolute neceſſity of ſpeedily ſuccouring the emperor. The queen, who was entirely guided by that general, returned a favourable anſwer to the emperor's memorial; and the duke embarking for Holland, arrived at the Hague, about the beginning of May, where he had a conference with the States General; and the Dutch readily agreed to ſend immediately a body of troops to the relief of the emperor. Having obtained every thing he wiſhed, the duke purſued his rout into the heart of the empire, and by forced marches, arrived on the banks of the Danube near Donawert, oppoſite to the Bavarian lines, where about eight thouſand French, and as many Bavarians, lay intrenched. On the firſt of July the duke of Marlborough encamped with his right at Amerdghem, and his left at Onderingen. The elector of Bavaria immediately ſent a detachment of his beſt troops to reinforce count d'Arco, who was poſted at Schellenburg, ſituated on a riſing ground on the Danube, where, for ſeveral days he had been raiſing intrenchments, it being a poſt of vaſt importance. Marlborough, however, knowing that the works were not completed, reſolved to attempt driving the enemy from their poſts. Accordingly, on the ſecond of July, he advanced, with a detachment of ſix hundred foot, thirty ſquadrons of Engliſh and Dutch, and three battalions of Engliſh grenadiers, the reſt of the army following him with all imaginable diligence. By unavoidable accidents it was near three in the afternoon before the duke could paſs the river Werimitz, which runs by Donawert, with the artillery. At length the attack was begun with unparalleled courage by the Engliſh and Dutch; the Imperialiſts not being yet arrived. The enemy made a moſt vigorous defence, but after an engagement of about an hour and an half, in which time the Imperialiſts came up, the intrenchments were forced, and the allies made a terrible ſlaughter of the enemy, who with the utmoſt precipitation ran towards Donawert and the Danube, and upon being cloſely purſued, the greateſt part followed the example of their generals, who ſwam over that river. Our loſs amounted to about ſix thouſand men, among whom were many brave officers. That of the enemy was computed at about eight thouſand. We took ſixteen pieces of cannon and thirteen colours and ſtandards. The day after this action the army took poſſeſſion of Donawert; the Bavarian garriſon quitted it upon their approach; having firſt broken down all the bridges, but wanted time to fulfil the orders they had received for deſtroying the ammunition and proviſions.

The elector of Bavaria paſſed the Danube, to prevent the victors cutting off his retreat into his own country. The confederates having croſſed the river on ſeveral bridges of pontoons, a detachment was ſent to take poſt in the country of the elector, who had retired under the cannon of Augſburg. The allies advanced within a league of that city, but finding the enemy too ſecurely poſted, to be attacked with any proſpect of ſucceſs, they encamped in ſuch a manner as to cut off all communication between him and his dominions. Marlborough now propoſed very advantageous terms of peace to the elector, on condition of his abandoning the French, and his ſubjects preſſed him to comply, rather than expoſe his country to ruin and deſolation. A negociation was therefore begun; but when he appeared ready to ſign the articles, hearing that marſhal Tallard was marching with a great body of forces to join him, he declared, that he thought himſelf obliged in honour to continue firm in his alliance. The allies exaſperated at this diſappointment, ravaged Bavaria. The duke ſoon after removing his camp, the elector of Bavaria marched to Biberach, where he was joined by count Tallard, and they paſſing the Danube, encamped at Blenheim. The duke of Marlborough and prince Eugene having alſo joined their forces, marched up to the enemy, whom they found advantageouſly poſted on a hill near Hochſtet. On the twelfth of Auguſt the confederate generals went out to take a view of the enemy, and diſcovered by their glaſſes that their whole army was in motion, the quarter-maſters having marked out a camp from Blenheim to Lutzingen. About four in the afternoon they diſcerned plainly the enemy's tents pitched, and that they were very advantageouſly poſted; their right being covered by the Danube, and the village of Blenheim; their left by a wood and the village of Lutzingen; and their front by a rivulet, the banks whereof were ſteep and marſhy. The confederate generals perceived the difficulties which would attend an attack of the enemy in this ſituation; but they ſaw alſo the danger of being inactive in their camp, till their forage might be conſumed and their proviſions exhauſted: they, therefore, on the thirteenth advanced into the plain, and ranged their forces in the order of battle. All neceſſary diſpoſitions having been made, and orders communicated to general officers, the cannonading began about nine in the morning, and continued on both ſides till one in the afternoon. The French and Bavarians amounted to about ſixty thouſand, with one hundred pieces of cannon. On their right were poſted the marſhal Tallard, and the French troops he brought with him; and on the left the elector with his Bavarians, and the French troops under the command of marſhal Marſin. The number of the confederates did not exceed fifty-five thouſand. Their right was commanded by prince Eugene; their left by the lord Cutts, Orkney, and the generals Churchill, Lumley, and Ingoldſby; and the duke of Marlborough as commander in chief, took his ſtation in the centre. The action was begun at noon by major general Wilkes, with a body of Engliſh and Heſſians, who having with great difficulty paſſed a rivulet, attacked the village of Blenheim with great bravery; but were repulſed after three ſucceſſive attempts. Meanwhile the troops in the centre and part of the right wing paſſed the rivulet in different places; and formed on the other ſide without moleſtation. They were, however, at length, charged by the French horſe with ſuch impetuoſity, and ſo terribly galled in flank by the troops poſted at Blenheim, that they fell into diſorder, and part of them repaſſed the river; but a reinforcement of dragoons coming up, the French cavalry were, in their turn, broken, and driven to the very hedges of the village of Blenheim. The left wing of the confederates being now formed, aſcended the hill in a firm compact body, and charged the enemy's horſe with ſuch fury, that though they rallied ſeveral times, they could not ſtand their ground, but fled with precipitation. Tallard now ordered ten battalions to fill up the intervals of his cavalry, which the duke obſerving, ſent three battalions to the troops of Zell, to ſupport his horſe. Nevertheleſs the line was diſordered from the fire of the French infantry, and was obliged to recoil; but advancing to the charge with redoubled ardour, they routed the French cavalry, whoſe battalions being thus deſerted, were cut to pieces. Tallard rallied the remains of his broken cavalry behind ſome tents that were ſtill ſtanding; but they being vigorouſly attacked in flank, were totally routed. Part of them endeavoured to gain a bridge they had thrown over the Danube between Hochſtet and Blenheim; but were ſo cloſely purſued, that thoſe who eſcaped the ſlaughter threw themſelves into the river, where they were drowned. Tallard, being ſurrounded, was taken priſoner, together with the marquis de Montperoux, three major-generals, and many other officers of diſtinction. While the left wing of the allies was thus victorious, the centre, overpowered by numbers, was repulſed; but the duke of Marlborough brought up ſome freſh ſquadrons from the body-reſerve, and obliged the enemy to retire. He had no ſooner defeated the right wing, than he prepared to reinforce prince Eugene, when he underſtood his highneſs had no occaſion for his aſſiſtance, he having put the enemy to flight. The rout now became general in the French army; every one fled with the greateſt precipitation; and ſo extreme was the terror and confuſion, that officers and ſoldiers ran headlong into the Danube. The confederates, being now maſters of the field of battle, ſurrounded the village of Blenheim, in which were poſted twenty-ſeven battalions, and twelve ſquadrons. Theſe, being cut off from all communications with the reſt of the army, laid down their arms, and ſurrendered priſoners of war. Such was the event of the celebrated battle of Blenheim, or, as the French call it, the battle of Hochſtet; where the allies gained one of the moſt glorious and complete victories that was ever acquired in any war, or by any general. The French and Bavarians left ten thouſand dead on the field of battle; the greateſt part of thirty ſquadrons of horſe and dragoons periſhed in the Danube; thirteen thouſand were made priſoners; one hundred pieces of cannon were taken, with twenty-four mortars; one hundred and twenty-nine colours; one hundred and ſeventy-one ſtandards; ſeventeen pair of kettle-drums; three thouſand ſix hundred tents; thirty-four coaches; fifteen barrels and eight caſks filled with ſilver, and three hundred loaded mules. Of the allies, about four thouſand five hundred were ſlain, and about eight thouſand wounded or taken. After this memorable victory, Ulm, Landau, and Taerbach were taken, and all Bavaria ſubmitted to the conquerors. Count Tallard, and ſeveral other officers were brought to England, and ſent to Nottingham, where they remained ſome years. The queen ſettled the manor of Woodſtock upon the duke of Marlborough, where Blenheim-houſe was erected for him at her majeſty's expence, as a monument of this glorious victory. The emperor wrote him a letter with his own hand, expreſſing his obligations to him, and offering to create him a prince of the empire. The duke, however, declined that honour, till he had obtained the conſent of the queen, which being obtained, he was advanced to that high dignity, and Mildenheim was beſtowed upon him as his principality: but the name of Marlborough being the nobleſt title he could bear, he was never known by any other.

Nothing extraordinary occurred during this campaign in Flanders; but in Italy the French were greatly ſuperior to the duke of Savoy, who was obliged to continue on the defenſive, and ſee Vendoſme reduce Vercelle and Ivrea. Soon after the French made themſelves maſters of the valley of Aoſta, whereby the duke's communication with Germany was entirely cut off. On the fourteenth of October Vendoſme laid ſiege to Verrua, a ſtrong fortreſs ſituated on the other ſide of the Po, betwen Caſal and Turin. This place held out five months againſt all the efforts of the French general: the duke of Savoy, having poſted his little army on the other ſide of the Po, at Creſcentino, where he had a bridge of communication, by which he ſupplied the place occaſionally with freſh proviſions. But the communication being at length cut off, the duke retired to Chivas, and Verrua ſurrendered to the enemy. The duke of Savoy complained greatly of his allies having on this occaſion abandoned him.

Equal ſucceſs attended the arms of England by ſea. Admiral Rooke, who was ordered to carry Charles III. to Portugal, having landed that prince at Liſbon, cruiſed for ſome time on the coaſt, and on the twenty-firſt of May the fleet ſteered for the iſles of Hieres. In their paſſage they ſaw the Breſt ſquadron ſailing towards Toulon. Sir George immediately gave chace; but the French ſhips had greatly the advantage of his, being all clean, by which means they got ſafe into Toulon, and Sir George proceeded to Liſbon in order to wait for a reinforcement. On the ſixteenth of June he was joined by Sir Cloudeſley Shovel with his ſquadron, and a council of war being called, it was reſolved to ſteer up the Mediterranean in queſt of the French fleet; and after cruiſing for near a month without being able to meet with it, a ſecond council of war was held, wherein it was reſolved to make a ſudden attempt upon Gibraltar. The fleet arrived ſafe in that bay, and about three o'clock in the afternoon, one thouſand eight hundred Engliſh and Dutch, with the prince of Heſſe at their head, were landed to the northward of the town. His highneſs had no ſooner ſecured this poſt, than he ſent a ſummons to the governor to ſurrender the place; but he returned for anſwer, "That he would defend it to the laſt extremity." Next day the admiral gave the ſignal for cannonading the town, which was performed with ſuch vigour, that fifteen thouſand ſhot were expended in five hours. In the mean time captain Whitaker was ſent in with ſome boats, and burnt a French privateer of twelve guns in the Old Mole. By this time the admiral, perceiving that the enemy were driven from their fortifications at the ſouth Mole-head, by the fire from our ſhips; and conſidering that if he could poſſeſs himſelf of theſe works the town muſt unavoidably be taken, he ordered all the boats of the fleet to be manned and armed, and gave the command of them to captain Whitaker, with orders, if poſſible, to make himſelf maſter of theſe works; but while captain Whitaker was preparing to execute theſe orders, captain Hicks of the Yarmouth, and captain Jumper, who lay next the Mole, puſhed on ſhore in their pinnaces, and ſome other boats; whereupon the Spaniards immediately ſprung a mine, which blew up all the fortifications upon the Mole, killed two lieutenants, with about forty men, and wounded ſixty. The ſeamen, however, kept poſſeſſion of the platform, till captain Whitaker and his men landed. They ſoon made themſelves maſters of the redoubt between the Mole and the town, and turned the cannon they found therein againſt the enemy. The admiral then ſent a letter to the governor, and a meſſage to the prince of Heſſe, deſiring him to ſend a peremptory ſummons, which his highneſs accordingly did; in conſequence of which on the twenty-fourth in the morning, the governor capitulated, and the prince of Heſſe took poſſeſſion of the place; and the fleet, having left as many men with that general as could be ſpared, ſailed to Tetuan to take in wood, water, and proviſions. This was no ſooner accompliſhed than the admiral again put to ſea, and, on the eleventh of Auguſt, got ſight of the French fleet, which be purſued with all the ſail he could make. On the thirteenth he came within three leagues of them to the weſtward of Cape Malaga, where they brought to, formed their line, and lay ready to receive him. Their line conſiſted of fifty-two ſhips, and twenty-four gallies; they were very ſtrong in the center, and weaker in the van and rear; to ſupply which moſt of the gallies were divided into thoſe quarters. Our line conſiſted of fifty-three ſhips; Sir George Rooke, with the rear-admirals Byng and Dilkes being in the center; Sir Cloudeſley Shovel and Sir John Leake led the van, and the Dutch formed the rear. The action began about ten in the morning, when our van and rear immediately preſſed forward to a cloſe engagement, and ſoon obliged that part of the French line with which they were engaged to give way; but the center of the French bore extremely hard upon Rooke's diviſion: the fight was, however, maintained with great obſtinacy till night, when the French bore away to leeward with their diſabled ſhips, towed by their gallies. The wind ſhifting in the night, the enemy got the weather-gage; but their fleet and our's lay by all the day within three leagues of each other repairing their damages, and at night they again made ſail to the northward. The two following days Sir George endeavoured to renew the fight, but the French as carefully evaded it; and at laſt, crowding all the ſail they poſſibly could, actually ran away from the combined ſquadrons. Sir George ſailed to Gibraltar to refit; and leaving a ſquadron of eighteen ſhips under Sir John Leake, ſet ſail for England, where he arrived in the month of September, when her majeſty was pleaſed to confer the honour of knighthood on George Byng and Thomas Dilkes, Eſqrs. and captain Jennings, commander of the St. George. The reduction of Gibraltar no ſooner reached the court of Spain, than Philip, the reigning king, ſent the marquis of Villadartas with an army to retake it. He accordingly inveſted the place on the twenty-fourth of October. During the ſiege, which laſted four months, the prince of Heſſe gave every proof of his great capacity as a general, in its defence. The garriſon was ſupplied with men and proviſions from the ſquadron under Sir John Leake; but that admiral being obliged to ſail to Liſbon for freſh ſuccours, M. de Pointis, the French admiral, came out of Cadiz with thirteen men of war, and blocked up Gibraltar on that ſide next the ſea, whereby the town was reduced to the laſt extremity: but Sir John returning ſooner than the enemy expected, ſurprized de Pointis, took three of his ſhips, and ran two others on ſhore, which the enemy burnt. The beſiegers, having now loſt the beſt part of their army by ſickneſs and the ſword, thought proper to raiſe the ſiege on the tenth of March, leaving only a detachment of their forces at ſome diſtance to block up the place.

On the twenty-fourth of October the parliament met. The ſeſſion was opened by a ſpeech from the throne, and both houſes waited on her majeſty the next day, with ſeparate addreſſes of thanks. The lords congratulated her on the great and glorious ſucceſs of her arms under the command of the duke of Marlborough, without mentioning Sir George Rooke; but the commons congratulated her majeſty, “as well upon the victory obtained by Sir George Rooke, as upon that obtained by the duke of Marlborough.” The houſe then deliberated upon the different articles of the national expence, and ſhewed ſuch zeal and application in ſupporting the war by neceſſary ſupplies, that thoſe requiſite for maintaining both the army and navy, were voted before the end of November; and on the ninth of December the bills for the ſame received the royal aſſent, when the queen, in a ſhort ſpeech, thanked the commons for their diſpatch, which, ſhe ſaid, ſhe conſidered as a ſure pledge of their affection towards her.

A. D. 1705. Doctor Delany, vice-chancellor of Oxford, accompanied by the principal members of the univerſity, attended the queen with an addreſs of congratulation upon the ſucceſs of her arms in Germany, under the admirable conduct and invincible courage of the duke of Marlborough; and at ſea, under that brave and faithful admiral Sir George Rooke. The latter part of this addreſs gave umbrage to the queen, as it ſeemed to raiſe the admiral upon a level with the general, whoſe great victories had captivated her admiration, and whoſe wife had alienated her affection from the tories; her majeſty, therefore, returned a cool anſwer to the addreſs; and ſoon after Sir George Rooke was diſmiſſed from his command, without the leaſt regard for his long and faithful ſervices. He was ſucceeded by Sir Cloudeſley Shovel, who was then declared rear-admiral of England. The commons now took into conſideration the treaty which the duke of Marlborough had concluded with the king of Pruſſia, for taking eight thouſand of his troops into Engliſh pay, which were to ſerve in Savoy. They alſo took notice how very deficient the allies were in furniſhing their reſpective quotas towards carrying on the war, as well by ſea as land; and beſought her majeſty to uſe her intereſt with them, that next year they might furniſh their complete proportion, according to their reſpective treaties; to all which the queen returned favourable anſwers; and, after giving the royal aſſent to ſeveral bills ſhe diſſolved the parliament, and a proclamation was iſſued for calling another. In the beginning of May count Gallas, envoy extraordinary from the Imperial court, received advice of the death of his maſter, the emperor Leopold V. who was ſucceeded by Joſeph, king of the Romans, his eldeſt ſon. The envoy had alſo orders to aſſure her majeſty, that the new emperor would not only obſerve all the treaties concluded with his predeceſſor, but alſo do every thing in his power to render thoſe alliances more permanent.

Ever ſince the battle of Blenheim, Marlborough had employed his thoughts in forming a plan for improving the advantage he had gained by that action; and, after the moſt mature deliberation, none appeared ſo rational as that of making an impreſſion on the frontiers of France. Accordingly the Moſelle was pitched upon as the ſcene of action, and large magazines were formed at Triers. As forage was very ſcarce in that part of the country, and therefore impoſſible for the allied army to ſubſiſt long between the Moſelle and the Saar, Marlborough ſent repeated remonſtrances to quicken the march of the Imperialiſts: but neither his remonſtrances, nor thoſe of the deputies of the States, prevailed.

The French in the interim did not fail to puſh their ſuperiority in the Netherlands. They inveſted Huy; and carried on their attack with ſuch vigour, that in leſs than fourteen days the garriſon were obliged to ſurrender themſelves priſoners of war. This diſagreeable news no ſooner reached the allied army, than the deputies of the States repreſented to the duke of Marlborough, “That it was impoſſible to ſubſiſt the army any longer in their preſent ſituation; that the Germans, by their delays had rendered the beſieging Saar-Louis impracticable, and defeated the whole ſcheme for a campaign on the Moſelle; that it was to no purpoſe to continue in theſe parts, when their forces might be better employed in the Netherlands in ſtopping the progreſs of the enemy.” The duke was ſufficiently perſuaded of the truth of theſe repreſentations; but being willing to remain till the laſt extremity, he did not decamp till the ſeventeenth of June, when he found all his hopes of penetrating into the bowels of France rendered abortive. He therefore marched for the Netherlands by the ſhorteſt way; while the Imperial troops, the Pruſſians, and the Wirtemburgers, moved towards the Upper Rhine. The duke proſecuted his march with ſuch expedition, that he ſaved Liege; the enemy having, on receiving advice of his approach, ſent back their artillery to Namur, and retired with great precipitation to Tongeren. On the other hand, the duke continuing his rapid march, retook Huy, and drove the enemy behind their lines, which Marlborough reſolved to force. The French, conſiſting of near one hundred battalions, and one hundred and forty-ſix ſquadrons, were poſted behind their lines. The force of the allies was nearly equal, their army conſiſting of ninety-five battalions, and one hundred and fifty-nine ſquadrons. In order to divide the forces of the enemy, it was reſolved to make a falſe motion; and accordingly the army under M. d'Auverquerque decamped from Vignamont at five in the morning, and marched towards Burdine on the other ſide of the Mehaigne. At the ſame time the duke made a motion, as if he intended to ſupport Auverquerque, in attacking the lines near Meſſeline, that being the weakeſt part. This feint was attended with the deſired ſucceſs: The French ſent off large detachments to thoſe parts where they expected the greateſt danger; and conſequently left thoſe parts, on which the duke had a real deſign, in a very weak condition. Marlborough ſaw with pleaſure the French running into the ſnare he had prepared for them; and the ſame night marched at the head of his army, which was joined by that of M. d'Auverquerque, his army having repaſſed the Mehaigne; and the combined army proceeded with all poſſible expedition to ſupport a detachment, ſent to attack the enemy's lines in the neighbourhood of Heyliſhem. The deſign was ſo ſecret, and ſo ſuddenly carried into execution, that the enemy had not the leaſt thought of it; eſpecially as this was the ſtrongeſt part of their lines, and therefore leſs ſuſpected than any other. The confederates paſſed the lines with very little oppoſition, but were afterwards attacked by twenty-four ſquadrons of Bavarian horſe, and twenty battalions. This occaſioned a ſharp action, but they were ſoon defeated and put to flight; leaving their ſtandards, colours, and artillery behind them. The marquis d'Alegre, and the count de Horne, lieutenant-generals, were taken priſoners, together with one major-general, two brigadier-generals, and ſeventy-four other officers. In the morning of the ſame day, the army marched to Tirlemont; the French, in the mean time, decamping and breaking down their bridges with ſuch precipitation, as to leave near fifteen hundred men on this ſide, who were taken priſoners, together with a battalion of Montluc in Tirlemont. Nothing farther of moment happened in Flanders during the preſent campaign. The duke put his army into winter quarters; and after concerting the operations of the next campaign with the emperor and the States-general, embarked for England, and on the thirtieth of December arrived at St. James's.

Nothing of any conſequence occurred during the campaign upon the Rhine; but the naval operations of the allies were conducted with equal ſpirit and ſucceſs. The moſt remarkable atchievement was the reduction of Barcelona by the earl of Peterborough, and Sir Cloudeſley Shovel, who, in the latter end of May, ſailed from St. Helen's with the Engliſh fleet, and on the twentieth of June landed at Liſbon, where they were reinforced by Sir John Leake, and the Dutch admiral Allemonde. On the twenty-ſecond, they arrived in the bay of Barcelona; the troops diſembarked to the eaſtward of the city, where they poſſeſſed themſelves of a ſtrong camp, and were well received by the country people. On the twenty-eighth, king Charles landed amidſt the acclamations of an infinite multitude from the neighbouring towns and villages, who threw themſelves at his feet, exclaiming with tranſport, "Long live the king." The inhabitants of Barcelona were ſtrongly attached to the houſe of Auſtria, but were over-awed by a garriſon of five thouſand men, commanded by the duke of Popoli, Velaſco, and other officers, who had eſpouſed the cauſe of king Philip. Notwithſtanding theſe circumſtances rendered the attempt apparently hazardous, it was propoſed by the prince of Heſſe d'Armſtadt, who ſerved in this expedition as a volunteer, and approved by the earl of Peterborough, and Sir Cloudeſley Shovel. It was thought expedient to ſurprize the caſtle of Montjuic, to effect which the neceſſary preparations were made; and at ſix o'clock in the evening a detachment of one thouſand men was ordered to march by the way of Serria, and a thouſand more followed at midnight to ſupport them if there ſhould be occaſion. The out-works were carried by aſſault, but with the loſs of the gallant prince of Heſſe, who was ſhot through the head, and expired in a few moments. The earl then bombarded the fort; and a ſhell happening to fall into the magazine of powder blew it up, together with the governor, and ſome of the principal officers; an accident which ſo alarmed the garriſon, that they ſurrendered without further reſiſtance. Poſſeſſed of this important poſt, the Engliſh general erected his batteries againſt the town, and the bomb-ketches fired with ſuch expedition, that in a few days the governor capitulated, and on the fourth of October, Charles entered in triumph. All the other places in Catalonia, except Roſeas, declared for him; ſo that the largeſt and richeſt province of Spain was conquered by an army ſcarce double in number to the garriſon of Barcelona. Charles wrote with his own hand a letter to queen Anne, containing a circumſtantial detail of his affairs, the warmeſt expreſſions of gratitude, and the higheſt encomiums on her ſubjects, particularly the earl of Peterborough. The ſeaſon of the year requiring the fleet to return home, king Charles reſolved to continue in Catalonia, for the encouragement of the people of that province, together with the earl of Peterborough, and the land forces, as well as all the marines that could be ſpared on board the fleet. Admiral Shovel ſailed for England leaving twenty-five ſail of Engliſh ſhips, commanded by admiral Leake, and fifteen ſail of Dutch, under the command of admiral Waſſenaer, to winter at Liſbon. He alſo left four Engliſh and two Dutch frigates at Barcelona, to attend king Charles. The only miſfortune which attended the arms of England this year, was the capture of the Baltic fleet, homeward bound, with their convoy of three ſhips of war, which were taken by the Dunkirk ſquadron, under the command of the count de St. Paul, who was killed in the action. When an account of this event was communicated to the French King, he replied with a ſigh, "Very well; I wiſh the ſhips were ſafe again in any Engliſh port, provided the count could be reſtored to life." This officer was reputed the beſt ſeaman in France after the death of Dubart.

The Engliſh became now wholly attentive to the election of members for a new parliament; and after a violent oppoſition, a majority of whigs was returned. The parliament meeting on the twenty-firſt of October, a warm conteſt aroſe about the choice of a ſpeaker. Mr. Bromley was propoſed by the tories, and Mr. John Smith by the whigs; the latter of whom was elected by a conſiderable majority. The queen, as uſual, made a ſpeech; and both houſes preſented addreſſes in the warmeſt terms of duty and affection. On the ſixth of December was held that famous debate in the houſe of lords, concerning the danger of the church. On that day the queen repaired to the houſe, in order to hear the debates. They were opened by the earl of Rocheſter; and the reaſons he aſſigned in ſupport of his opinion, that the church was in danger, were, the ſecurity act in Scotland; the abſence of the heir to the crown; and the parliament's not paſſing the occaſional bill. He was anſwered by lord Halifax, who aſſerted, that the ſecurity act being merely of a political nature, was foreign to eccleſiaſtical affairs, and unavoidably paſſed to prevent an immediate rebellion. He ſlighted the ſecond reaſon as trivial; and with reſpect to the third obſerved, that the matter had been ſufficiently canvaſſed, and the houſe had given their opinion of it already. The biſhop of London alledged, that the church was in danger from the profaneneſs, irreligion, and licentiouſneſs of the times, as well as the pernicious tendency of ſeveral ſermons which had been lately preached, in which rebellion was countenanced, and reſiſtance to the higher power encouraged. Burnet, biſhop of Sarum, anſwered him; and affirmed, that extraordinary care had been taken of late in promoting religion, erecting ſchools for the inſtruction of youth, and giving away books to excite piety; in which uſeful works, one thouſand two hundred pounds had been expended the laſt year. The archbiſhop of York declared, that he apprehended danger from the increaſe of Diſſenters, particularly from the many academies they had erected; to which lord Wharton anſwered, by complaining of the ſchools and ſeminaries held by nonjurors. The biſhop of Ely complained of the heat and violence in the univerſities. The biſhop of Lichfield alledged the abuſive language uſed againſt the biſhops. The biſhop of Bath and Wells the invidious terms of high church and low church. Lord Somers cloſed the debates by a healing ſpeech. The queſtion, whether the church was in danger? being put, it was carried in the negative by a great majority. The houſe then reſolved, "That the church of England, as by law eſtabliſhed, which was reſcued from imminent danger by king William III. of glorious memory, is now, by God's bleſſing, under the auſpicious reign of her majeſty, in a moſt ſafe and flouriſhing condition; and that whoever went about to inſinuate to the contrary, was an enemy to the queen, the church, and the kingdom." This vote being communicated to the commons, and their concurrence deſired therein, it was carried in the affirmative by a majority of forty voices; whereupon both houſes joined in addreſſes to the queen, exhibiting the ſaid reſolution, and deſiring her majeſty to make it public; and a proclamation was publiſhed to this intent.

A. D. 1706. At this time the credit of the duke of Marlborough was very high; for the emperor having propoſed a loan of five hundred thouſand pounds on a branch of his revenues in Sileſia, the whole ſum, by the intereſt of the duke, was immediately ſubſcribed by the merchants of London. Indeed, at this juncture, public credit was in great repute; the kingdom was bleſſed with plenty; the forces were well paid, notwithſtanding the great quantity of coin exported for the maintenance of the war, the paper currency ſupplying the deficiency ſo well, that few murmurs were heard in the kingdom. All the funds being eſtabliſhed, her majeſty came to the houſe of peers on the nineteenth of March, and after giving the royal aſſent to ſuch bills as were ready, ſhe made a ſpeech to both houſes; after which the parliament was prorogued till the firſt of May following. On the ſixteenth, commiſſioners appointed for forming a union of England and Scotland, met at the Cockpit, and their commiſſions being opened and read by their reſpective ſecretaries, namely, Mr. George Doddington for the Engliſh, and Sir David Nairn for the Scots, and introductory ſpeeches delivered by the lord-keeper of England, and the lord-chancellor of Scotland, it was agreed, that copies of the ſeveral commiſſions ſhould be prepared and ſigned by the ſecretaries, and interchanged; after which the commiſſioners adjourned to the twenty-ſecond of April, on which day they again aſſembled, and the lord-keeper, in the names of the lords-commiſſioners for England, delivered to the board four preliminary articles, the ſubſtance of which was as follows: that all propoſals made by either ſide ſhould be in writing; and every point, when agreed, reduced into writing; that no point, though agreed upon, ſhould be obligatory, till all matters ſhould be adjuſted in ſuch a manner as would be proper to be laid before the queen, and the parliament of each nation, for their approbation; that a committee ſhould be appointed from each commiſſion, to reviſe the minutes which might paſs, before they ſhould be inſerted in the books by the reſpective ſecretaries; and, that all the proceedings during the treaty ſhould be kept ſecret. A fœderal union was propoſed by the Scots, in the nature of that ſubſiſting between the Dutch united provinces, or the cantons of Switzerland; but the Engliſh would hear of nothing leſs than an incorporating union, ſo as effectually to take from any future Scotiſh parliament, the power of repealing the articles of this treaty; and, on the twenty-fourth of April, the lord-keeper of England propoſed, "That the two kingdoms of England and Scotland ſhould be for ever united into one nation, by the name of Great-Britain; that it ſhould be repreſented by one and the ſame parliament; and that the ſucceſſion to this monarchy, in failure of heirs of her majeſty's body, ſhould be ſubject to the limitations mentioned in an act of parliament made in England in the twelfth and thirteenth years of the reign of the late king William III. entitled, An act for the farther limitation of the crown," &c.

Theſe preliminaries were agreed to by the commiſſioners for Scotland, with this proviſo only, "That all the ſubjects of the united kingdom of Great-Britain, ſhould have full freedom and intercourſe of trade and navigation, to or from any part or place within the ſaid united kingdoms, and plantations thereunto belonging, and that there may be a communication of all other privileges and advantages which do or may belong to the ſubjects of either kingdom." To this the commiſſioners of England acquieſced, under ſuch terms as, in the further progreſs of this treaty, ſhould be found for the common advantage of both kingdoms. Theſe general preliminaries being agreed upon, the commiſſioners proceeded to particulars; and at length articles were ratified by both parliaments, though not without great oppoſition on the part of that of Scotland. This celebrated treaty imported, that England and Scotland ſhould, from the firſt of May one thouſand ſeven hundred and ſeven, be united into one kingdom, by the name of Great-Britain; that the ſucceſſion ſhould be veſted in the princeſs Sophia and her heirs; that all papiſts, or perſons that marry papiſts, ſhould be for ever excluded from inheriting the crown; that the united kingdom ſhould be repreſented by one parliament; that all ſubjects of Great-Britain ſhould enjoy a communication of rights, and all advantages, and be under the ſame reſtrictions and regulations; that Scotland ſhould be exempt from the temporary duties on ſome commodities; that the ſum of three hundred ninety-eight thouſand and eighty-five pounds ten ſhillings, ſhould be granted to the Scots as an equivalent for ſuch part of the cuſtoms and exciſe, charged upon that kingdom in conſequence of the union, as ſhould be applicable to the payment of the debts of England, according to the proportion which the cuſtoms and exciſe of Scotland bore to thoſe of England; that as the revenue of Scotland might increaſe, a further equivalent ſhould be allowed for ſuch proportion of the ſaid increaſe, as ſhould be applicable to the payment of the debts of England; that the ſum to be paid at preſent, as well as the money ariſing from the future equivalents, ſhould be employed in reducing the coin of Scotland to the ſtandard and value of the Engliſh coin: in paying off the capital ſtock and intereſt due to the proprietors of the African company, which ſhould be immediately diſſolved; in diſcharging all the public debts of the kingdom of Scotland; and in promoting manufactures and fiſheries, under the direction of commiſſioners appointed by her majeſty, and accountable to the parliament of Great Britain; that the laws concerning public right, policy, and civil government, ſhould be the ſame throughout the kingdom; but that no alteration ſhould be made in laws which referred to private property, except for evident utility of the ſubjects within Scotland; that the court of ſeſſion, and all courts of judicature in Scotland, ſhould remain as then conſtituted by the laws of that kingdom, with the ſame authority and privileges as before the union, ſubject however to ſuch regulations as ſhould be made by the parliament of Great Britain; that the rights and privileges of the royal boroughs of Scotland, ſhould remain entire after the union; that Scotland ſhould be repreſented in the parliament of Great Britain by ſixteen peers, and forty-five commoners, to be elected in ſuch a manner as ſhould be ſettled by the preſent parliament of Scotland; that all the peers in Scotland, and the ſucceſſors to their honours and dignities, ſhould, from and after the union, be peers of Great Britain, and ſhould have rank and precedency immediately after the Engliſh peers of the like orders and degrees, who might be created after the union; that they ſhould be tried as peers of Great Britain, and enjoy all the privileges of peers, as fully as enjoyed by the peers of England, except the right and privilege of ſitting in the houſe of lords, and particularly the right of ſitting on the trials of peers; that the crown, ſceptre, and ſword of ſtate, the records of parliament, and all other records, rolls, and regiſters whatſoever, ſhould remain as they were within that part of the united kingdoms called Scotland; and that all laws and ſtatutes in either kingdom, ſo far as they might be inconſiſtent with the terms of theſe articles, ſhould ceaſe, and be declared void by the reſpective parliaments of the two kingdoms. Such was the ſubſtance of that famous treaty which was ſoon after concluded, and which under the ſame monarchy happily united the different parts of this iſland.

Towards the latter end of April the duke of Marlborough repaired to Holland, and having conferred with the States-general, aſſembled the allied army, which amounted to ſeventy-four battalions of foot, and a hundred and twenty-three ſquadrons of horſe and dragoons, well ſupplied with artillery and pontoons. The court of France being informed that the Daniſh and Pruſſian troops had not yet joined the confederates, ordered the elector of Bavaria, and the marſhal de Villeroy, to attack them before the junction might be effected. In purſuance of this order, they poſted themſelves at Tirelemont, being much ſuperior in number to the allied army. About the beginning of May, the duke of Bavaria, and the marſhal Villars decamped, and paſſing the Dyle, marched directly towards the confederate army. The duke of Marlborough was ſeldom ſurprized for want of intelligence; and no ſooner was he informed of this movement, than he diſpatched an expreſs to the Dutch troops to join him, who arrived within a league of his camp. On Whitſunday, about four in the morning, the duke of Marlborough advanced with the army in eight columns towards the village of Ramillies, he being by this time joined by the Danes. The next day, the French general perceiving the allies ſo near, took poſſeſſion of a ſtrong camp, with the village of Ramillies nearly in the center. The confederate army was poſted near Folbz, with a moraſs in their front, and their left drawn up near the village of Franqueine upon the Mehaigne, where the duke alſo placed the Daniſh horſe, foreſeeing the ſtreſs of the action would lay there. The confederate army being drawn up in order of battle, about three in the afternoon, four battalions of the left wing began the attack againſt the enemy's brigade of foot, which they drove from their poſt on the Mehaigne; while Monſieur d'Auverquerque charged with the horſe of that wing. The ſucceſs was for ſome time doubtful; which the duke of Marlborough perceiving, ſuſtained them with the body of reſerve, and ſome ſquadrons drawn from the right. The duke then rallied ſome of the broken ſquadrons, in order that they might renew the charge, when his horſe falling, he was ſurrounded by the enemy, and muſt have been killed or made priſoner, had not a body of infantry came ſeaſonably to his relief. On his remounting, a cannon ball carried off the head of colonel Brienfield, his gentleman of the horſe, while he held his ſtirrup. The duke now ordered lieutenant-general Schultz to attack the village of Ramillies with twelve battalions of foot, and twenty pieces of cannon; while veldt-marſhal Overkirk on the left, ordered colonel Wertnuller, with four battalions, and two pieces of cannon, to diſlodge the enemy's infantry from the hedges of the village of Franqueine; both which orders were ſucceſsfully executed. By this time the right of the enemy's horſe being entirely defeated, the Dutch and Daniſh horſe of the left wing of the allied army fell upon the right of the enemy's infantry, and cut in pieces no leſs than twenty battalions, making themſelves maſters of their colours and cannon. The remainder began to retreat in good order, under cover of the cavalry of their left wing; but the Engliſh horſe having croſſed the rivulet which divided them from the enemy, fell upon them with ſuch impetuoſity, that they abandoned their foot, and were terribly ſlaughtered in the village of Anderkirk. The French king's own regiment begged for quarter, and delivered up their arms and colours to the victors. The French now gave way on all ſides, their cavalry flying three different ways; but were ſo cloſely purſued, that very few eſcaped. The elector of Bavaria, and the marſhal de Villeroy, ſaved themſelves with the utmoſt difficulty. Several waggons belonging to the enemy's vanguard breaking down in a narrow paſs, obſtructed the way ſo much that the baggage and artillery could not proceed; nor could their troops defile in order. The victorious horſe being informed of this accident, preſſed on them with ſuch rapidity, that great numbers threw down their arms and ſubmitted. The purſuit was continued five leagues from the field of battle, and laſted till two in the morning. Never was a victory more complete. The confederates took the enemy's baggage and artillery, a very few pieces excepted; about one hundred and twenty colours and ſtandards, ſix hundred officers, ſix thouſand private ſoldiers, and about eight thouſand were killed or wounded. Among the ſlain, were prince Maximilian and prince Montbaſon. The loſs of the allies did not exceed three thouſand men, including prince Lewis of Heſſe and M. Bentinck, who were both ſlain during the action. This victory was attended with the immediate conqueſt of almoſt all the Spaniſh Netherlands; the cities of Louvaine, Mechlin, Bruſſels, Antwerp, Ghent, and Bruges, ſubmitted without reſiſtance, and acknowledged king Charles. Oſtend, though it had a ſtrong garriſon, ſurrendered after a ſiege of ten days. Menin, eſteemed the moſt finiſhed fortification in the Low Countries; and though garriſoned by ſix thouſand men, ſubmitted to the ſame fate. The garriſon of Dendermonde

'monde ſurrendered themſelves priſoners of war; and Aeth on the ſame conditions ſubmitted.

About the ſame time Barcelona was blocked up by the French fleet under the count of Toulouſe, while Philip beſieged it by land. The inhabitants, animated by the preſence of king Charles, made a vigorous defence; but were ſo hard preſſed, that he was in danger of falling into the enemy's hands; but Sir John Leake ſailing to his relief, the French admiral no ſooner received intelligence of his approach, than he retired with precipitation; and the earl of Peterborough arriving with a body of troops, Philip abandoned the ſiege, and retired in great diſorder, leaving behind his tents, with the ſick and wounded. On the ſide of Portugal, the earl of Galloway, with an army of twenty thouſand men, undertook the ſiege of Alcantara; and in three days the garriſon, conſiſting of four thouſand men, were made priſoners of war. He afterwards took ſeveral other places, and advanced even to Madrid, which ſubmitting to king Charles, he was proclaimed there. But that prince loitering away his time in Barcelona, his competitor recovered his ſpirits; and his army, under the duke of Berwick, received ſuch reinforcements as enabled him to return to Madrid, upon which the allies were obliged to retire from that city with as much haſte as they had entered it.

The allies in Italy were as ſucceſsful as thoſe in Flanders. The duke of Savoy had been reduced to the utmoſt extremity, and Turin, his capital, had been beſieged by the French. The city was reduced to great diſtreſs; moſt of the ammunition being ſpent, and the French having made a lodgment on the counterſcarp. In this dangerous ſituation, the duke of Savoy and prince Eugene ſaw themſelves under a neceſſity of marching immediately to the defence of the place. Accordingly they paſſed the Doria on the ſixth of September, and encamped on its banks. The next morning at break of day, the army moved towards the enemy. Never perhaps was a bolder march than the allied army made on this occaſion; having a continual fire to ſuſtain from forty pieces of cannon, which the enemy had pointed to gall them. The duke of Orleans perceiving that all their efforts were not ſufficient to ſtop the intrepidity with which the duke and the prince marched towards him, propoſed to quit the intrenchments, and give them battle. He was joined in this propoſal by the greater part of the general officers in the French army: but marſhal Marſin producing a written order from Lewis, which left every thing to his deciſion in caſe of an action; and giving his opinion to remain in the lines, the duke of Orleans was forced to acquieſce. When the confederate army came within half cannon ſhot of the French line, they drew up in order of battle, and began the attack with their artillery. On this the whole army moved in a moment; the infantry marched up with their muſkets to the foot of the intrenchments; and prince Eugene putting himſelf at the head of the left wing, began the charge, which was made with ſuch aſtoniſhing vigour and activity, that in leſs than two hours he carried the enemy's line. The ſame was done by the duke of Savoy in the center and on the right; ſo that by noon the allies were maſters of the French camp, and the defeat of the army was become general. The duke of Orleans behaved with great preſence of mind, and received ſeveral wounds in the action. Marſhal Marſin was taken priſoner, after having his thigh ſhattered by a cannon ball, and died in a few hours after the amputation. The French loſt in the action near ſeven thouſand men, beſides three hundred officers, and about eight thouſand private men taken priſoners; two hundred and fifty pieces of cannon, one hundred and eight mortars, ſeven thouſand eight hundred bombs, thirty-two thouſand hand grenades, forty-eight thouſand cannon balls, four thouſand cheſts of muſket balls, eighty-ſix barrels of gunpowder, all their tents and baggage, five thouſand beaſts of burden, ten thouſand horſes belonging to thirteen regiments of dragoons, and the mules of the commiſſary, all fell into the hands of the victors. The mules were ſo richly laden, that this part only of the booty was valued at near one hundred and thirty thouſand pounds ſterling. The loſs of the confederates did not amount to three thouſand men, killed, wounded, or diſabled in the attack, excluſive of two thouſand of the garriſon of Turin, who during the courſe of the ſiege had fallen.

It is here neceſſary to record an action, which muſt appear the more extraordinary, and entitle the author of it to the greater praiſe, as his birth and education were but mean, and conſequently not calculated to produce thoſe ambitious views, to which ſo many daring and heroic actions owe their origin. During the above ſiege, the enemy had broke into one of the largeſt ſubterraneous galleries belonging to the citadel, and the French engineer was rewarded with two hundred Louis d'ors for making the diſcovery. The French now concluded they ſhould make their way into the citadel by means of this ſecret paſſage, and accordingly poſted two hundred grenadiers there. One Micha, a Piedmonteſe peaſant, who ſerved as a pioneer, and who, by his good natural parts and long practice, had acquired ſuch a ſkill in his profeſſion as to be made a corporal of that corps, was then working near the ſpot with about twenty men, in order to complete a mine; but hearing the French buſy over his head in ſecuring their poſt in the gallery, he immediately perceived that his work was become uſeleſs, and that the enemy was poſſeſſed of a poſt that would be of infinite advantage to them: at the ſame time he was convinced, that it would coſt him his life to prevent them, his mine having no sauciſſon, by which he might ſpring it with leſs danger. There was, however, no time for deliberation, and he inſtantly formed a ſcheme that would have done honour to the greateſt hero. He ordered his companions to withdraw out of the mine, and to fire a muſket as a ſignal when they reached a place of ſafety; at the ſame time requeſting them to acquaint the duke, his maſter, that Micha implored aſſiſtance for his wife and children. His companions immediately retired; and on this intrepid pioneer's hearing their ſignal, he ſet fire to the mine, and thus ſacrificed his own life to the ſervice of his country. The two hundred French grenadiers were blown up into the air, and the ſecret paſſage, on which the enemy had placed ſuch flattering hopes, was totally obliterated. His companions faithfully delivered his meſſage to the duke, who not only provided for his widow and children, but ſettled a perpetual annuity of ſix hundred livres a year upon the deſcendants of this valuable man.

Now the duke of Savoy entered his capital in triumph; and the duke of Orleans retired into Dauphiny, having found it impoſſible to procure ſubſiſtence for his troops.

At this time Lewis was humbled to ſuch a degree as might have excited even the compaſſion of his enemies. He employed the elector of Bavaria to write letters in his name to the duke of Marlborough, and the deputies of the States General, containing propoſals for opening a congreſs. He had already tampered with the Dutch, in a memorial, preſented by the marquis d'Alegre. He offered to cede either Spain and the Weſt Indies, or Milan, Naples and Sicily to king Charles, to give up a barrier for the Dutch in the Netherlands, and to indemnify the duke of Savoy for the ravages which had been committed in his dominions. The powers that formed the confederacy were fired with the ambition of making conqueſts; and England in particular thought herſelf entitled to an indemnification for the immenſe ſums ſhe had expended. Animated by theſe concurring conſiderations, queen Anne and the States General rejected the offers of France, declaring they would not enter into any negociations for a peace, but in concert with their allies. The parliament met at Weſtminſter on the ſecond of December, where her majeſty opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne. Both houſes preſented an addreſs to the queen for her gracious ſpeech, and congratulated her on the glorious ſucceſs obtained by the duke of Marlborough; voting at the ſame time an addreſs of thanks to that general, for his many eminent ſervices to her majeſty, and the kingdom. They then immediately granted the ſupplies for the enſuing year, beſides which they voted ſupplies for the equivalent granted by England to the Scots, purſuant to the treaty of union.

A. D. 1707. On the twenty-eighth day of January her majeſty went to the houſe of lords and paſſed ſeveral public and private acts, and then made a ſpeech, acquainting them, that the union being perfected by the parliament of Scotland, ſhe had ordered the ſame to be laid before them, for their concurrence in it. She alſo intimated, that Scotland being to have an equivalent for what that kingdom is obliged to contribute towards the debts of England; ſhe deſired them to make proviſions for the payment thereof. In the houſe of lords, previous to the entering upon conſideration of the articles of the union, a bill was ordered to be brought in for the ſecurity of the church of England; an act for the ſecuring Preſbytery in Scotland, having paſſed there before the articles of the union. The purport was, that the act of uniformity ſhould be in force for ever; that every king or queen hereafter, at their coronation, ſhould take an oath to preſerve the ſettlement of the church, and the doctrine and diſcipline thereof; and that this act ſhould be held a fundamental and eſſential part of the union of the two kingdoms, and their mutual tranquillity.

The ſiege of Toulon was now the grand deſign of the allies, for which every thing elſe was neglected, except Naples. The latter end of June the duke of Savoy, and prince Eugene, began their march thither, with an army of between forty and fifty thouſand men; Sir Cloudeſley Shovel, with the combined fleet and tranſports, having taken on board their heavy cannon, with the proviſions and ammunition neceſſary for the undertaking. On the eleventh of July the army paſſed the Var, with very little oppoſition; here the duke of Savoy made a halt to refreſh his troops, and in order to be joined by his cavalry, which was not yet arrived; and to this delay the miſcarriage of that enterprize has been attributed; for the intention of the allies to beſiege Toulon being now no longer doubted, the enemy drew their troops thither from all parts; and not only repaired and augmented the fortifications of the town, but perfectly covered it by a fortified camp, in which they had no leſs than forty battalions. The confederate army being arrived before the place, prince Eugene obſerved the diſpoſition of the enemy; and finding he muſt fight an army intrenched in the outworks, and on the heights that ſurrounded the place, and which were furniſhed with an infinite number of guns, was for retreating forthwith. But the duke of Savoy was poſitive in his opinion for carrying on the enterprize, and accordingly the neceſſary diſpoſitions were made for attacking the hill of St. Catharine, which the enemy had fortified; and in this firſt attempt the allies were ſucceſsful. They alſo attacked and carried two ſmall forts near the harbour; but by the ſixteenth of Auguſt the enemy's forces were ſo increaſed, that they ventured to attack their camp, and recovered the hill of St. Catharine. At length the duke of Savoy, being convinced of the impoſſibility of taking Toulon; and receiving intelligence that the enemy had now ſixty battalions in their intrenchments, beſides a numerous cavalry, agreed to deſiſt from the enterprize. However, by way of retaliation for the ruin of his capital city of Turin, he gave directions for the bombarding of Toulon both by ſea and land; and both himſelf and prince Eugene advanced to an eminence to behold the dreadful conflagration.

Sir Cloudeſley Shovel, with fifteen ſail of men of war, ſet ſail for England; and on the twenty-firſt of October arrived in ſoundings; but by miſtake ſteering a wrong courſe, his own ſhip, the Aſſociation, ſtruck upon the rocks of Scilly, wherein periſhed himſelf and every ſoul on board. Such alſo was the unhappy fate of the Eagle and Romney. The Firebrand was daſhed in pieces on the rocks, but the captain and twenty-four of his men ſaved themſelves in his boat; the Phœnix ran aground, but the crew ſaved themſelves. Sir George Byng, in the Royal Anne, by ſkilful ſteerage changed her courſe in a moment, and ſaved the ſhip when in the moſt imminent danger of ſtriking. The admiral's body being caſt a-ſhore was taken up by ſome country people, ſtripped, and afterwards buried in the ſands; but, upon enquiry, was found and brought into Plymouth, from whence it was conveyed to London, and interred in Weſtminſter-abbey, where her majeſty erected a monument for him at her own expence. Sir Cloudeſley was born of obſcure parentage in the county of Suffolk, but by his aſſiduity in his public, and integrity in his private capacity, acquired no little renown.

During the ſummer, while the allies ſeemed to proſper in every quarter, fortune ſeemed to favour the enemy; for beſides the miſcarriages already recited, the earl of Galloway loſt the battle of Almanza in Spain, in which he too haſtily engaged againſt a much ſuperior force. Marſhal Villars made himſelf maſter of the German lines at Biehl and Stolhoffen, and would have proceeded farther, had not the elector of Hanover, with the Imperial forces, ſtopped his progreſs. In the Netherlands, the duke of Marlborough was unable to bring the French, under the duke of Vendome, to an engagement, and both ſides only preſerved what they had in poſſeſſion at the campaign's commencement.

The firſt parliament of Great Britain aſſembled at Weſtminſter, on the twenty-third day of October, when the queen, in a ſpeech to both houſes, mitigated the miſcarriages in Provence and Spain, repreſenting the neceſſity of making further efforts againſt the common enemy; and exhorting them to be upon their guard againſt thoſe who endeavoured to ſow jealouſies in the commonwealth. The commons, in their addreſs, expreſſed their continuance of their former zeal and devotion towards her majeſty's government; but in the houſe of lords, the earl of Wharton expatiated upon the ſcarcity of money, the decay of trade, and the miſmanagement of the navy. He was ſeconded by the lord Somers, and all the leaders of the tory party, who propoſed, that previous to every meaſure, they ſhould conſider the ſtate of the nation. The deſign of Wharton and Somers was to raiſe the earl of Orford once more to the head of the admiralty; and the tories, who did not perceive their drift, hoped in the courſe of the enquiry to fix the blame of all miſmanagement upon the whig miniſters. A day being fixed for this examination, the houſe received a petition from the ſheriffs and merchants of London, complaining of great loſſes by ſea, for want of cruizers and convoys; and theſe complaints were proved by witneſſes. The commons made ſome progreſs in an enquiry of the ſame nature, and brought in a bill for the better ſecuring the trade of the kingdom; and at the ſame time cheerfully granted the ſupplies for the ſervice of the enſuing year. They alſo reſolved, that there ſhould be but one privy council in the kingdom of Great Britain; that the militia of Scotland ſhould be put on the ſame footing with that of England; that the powers of the juſtices of the peace ſhould be the ſame through the whole iſland; that the lords juſticiary in Scotland, ſhould go circuits twice a year, and that the writs for electing Scottiſh members to ſerve in the houſe of commons, ſhould be directed, and returns made in the ſame manner as practiſed in England. When the queen paſſed theſe bills, ſhe recommended an augmentation in the aids and auxiliaries granted to the king of Spain and the duke of Savoy. At the ſame time, William Gregg, a clerk in Mr. ſecretary Harley's office, was committed to Newgate for high-treaſon, in correſponding with the enemy, and on the nineteenth of January, he was brought to his trial at the Old Bailey, and confeſſed the indictments. It was ſuppoſed by many that the ſecretary would have been found to have had a ſhare in that correſpondence, but Gregg, with his laſt breath, honourably acquitted him.

A.D. 1708. Towards the latter end of January, his royal highneſs, the lord high-admiral, thought fit to make theſe ſeveral promotions of ſea officers. Sir John Leake was nominated admiral of the white ſquadron, and admiral in chief of her majeſty's fleet; Sir George Byng admiral of the blue; Sir John Norris, vice-admiral of the white; Sir John Jennings, vice-admiral of the red; lord Durſley, vice-admiral of the blue; Sir Edward Whitaker, rear-admiral of the red; and John Baker, Eſq. rear-admiral of the white. Mr. Harley reſigned his office of ſecretary of ſtate, and was ſucceded by the right honourable Henry Boyle, chancellor of the exchequer: Sir Thomas Manſell, comptroller of the houſhold; Sir Simon Harcourt, attorney-general, and Mr. St. John, ſecretary of war, alſo reſigned their places. About this time Lewis meditating revenge for the invaſion of his kingdom, and beſieging a place of ſuch conſequence to him as that of Toulon, determined to retaliate the injury, and convince others of the diſtraction which an inroad produces. He was invited to make the experiment by the general diſcontent of the Scots, occaſioned by the union; and which gave the pretended prince of Wales reaſon to believe he ſhould not be an unwelcome gueſt in that kingdom. Lewis determined not to omit ſo fair an opportunity, and it was accordingly reſolved to offer the chevalier de St. George very powerful aſſiſtance if he would undertake to make England the ſeat of war. This offer being readily embraced, a fleet of men of war and tranſports was expeditiouſly fitted out at Dunkirk, and ten thouſand land forces, with many officers, a great quantity of ammunition, artillery, and arms, were embarked. Major general Cadogan, her majeſty's envoy in Holland, gave immediate notice of thoſe preparations; and then went to Bruſſels, and concerted matters in ſuch a manner with M. d'Auverquerque, that ten battalions of the Engliſh forces in Flanders were immediately drawn down to the coaſt, ready to be ſent to England. At the ſame time the Engliſh admiralty uſed ſuch diligence in fitting out a fleet, that three and twenty ſail of men of war, under the command of Sir George Byng, and the lord Durſley, appeared before Dunkirk on the twenty-ſeventh of February, when the enemy thought it impoſſible for England to have any fleet at ſea. On the ninth of March the pretender arrived at Dunkirk: but the ſight of the Engliſh fleet induced the French admiral M. Fourbin, to ſend to court for freſh inſtructions. But Lewis ſent peremptory orders to his admiral to venture out of the harbour. Sir George Byng being informed that the French had left Dunkirk, immediately ſailed in purſuit of them, and at the ſame time the forces were embarked at Oſtend, and convoyed to England by admiral Baker. Theſe forces, together with ſeveral regiments of horſe, marched for Scotland with all expedition. In the mean time Sir George Byng had, by his vigilance, rendered theſe precautions unneceſſary, arriving at the Frith of Edinburgh almoſt as ſoon as the enemy, whereupon they took the advantage of a land-breeze which ſprung up in the night, and bore away with all the ſail they could poſſibly carry. As ſoon as the day appeared the combined fleet gave chace, but were out-ſailed, and, except the Saliſbury, a man of war, formerly taken from the Engliſh, all the French ſhips eſcaped, and got back to Dunkirk in a moſt ſhattered condition. Lord Clermont, lord Griffin, Mr. Middleton a lieutenant general, his aid-de-camp, a colonel, two lieutenant colonels, five captains, and two lieutenants, French officers; fifteen Iriſh officers, five companies of French infantry, two hundred and fifty ſeamen, and all the officers of the ſhip were taken priſoners in the Saliſbury. The lords Griffin and Clermont, with moſt of the other principal perſons, were ſent up to London, and committed to the Tower; as were alſo the duke of Hamilton, lord Belhaven, and ſeveral of the Scottiſh nobility and gentry, on ſuſpicion of carrying on a correſpondence with the court of St. Germains; but moſt of the latter were ſoon after admitted to bail. On the firſt of April, the queen went to the houſe and gave the royal aſſent to ſeveral bills; after which ſhe prorogued the parliament; and on the fifteenth diſſolved it by proclamation. At the ſame time new writs were iſſued for calling another, and a proclamation was publiſhed, commanding all the peers of North Britain to meet on the ſeventeenth of June, at Holyrood-houſe, in Edinburgh, in order to elect ſixteen peers, purſuant to the twenty-ſecond article of the treaty of union, to repreſent them in the enſuing Britiſh parliament.

As it was agreed on at the Hague, that prince Eugene, and the Duke of Marlborough ſhould unite their forces, and act jointly in the Low Countries, during this campaign; they took the field in the middle of May, and marched to the general rendezvous, having left no other troops at Ghent, and Bruges, than the county militia. Theſe places on the appearance of a detachment of French troops, ſurrendered to them without oppoſition. The enemy advanced as far as Dutch Flanders, and laid the whole country under contribution. The dukes of Burgundy and Berry, and the chevalier de St. George, who this year took the field with the duke of Vendome, finding their ſtrength ſo much ſuperior to the confederates, reſolved upon the ſiege of Oudenarde, and accordingly inveſted that place on the ninth of July, which occaſioned a battle two days after. Marlborough, being apprized of the enemies deſign, was immediately in motion, and marched with amazing expedition to the relief of that place. He had been joined by the elector of Hanover in marching towards the Moſelle. At the approach of the confederates, the French raiſed the ſiege, and paſſed the Scheld at Gavre; which the duke perceiving, and being determined to bring them to a battle, detached general Cadogan in the night with ſixteen battalions and eight ſquadrons, to take poſt on the other ſide the Scheld, near Oudenarde, and to lay bridges neceſſary for the paſſage of the reſt of the army, which began to march about eight in the morning, and proceeded with ſuch expedition, that by two in the afternoon the horſe had reached the bridges, and ſoon after the whole army began to paſs: but the enemy perceiving the deſign of the allies, ſtruck off to the right towards Ghent. General Cadogan, however, fell upon ſeven battalions of foot, which the enemy had thrown into the hedges, and into the village of Heynim; and being afterwards reinforced by the foot, the attack was made with ſo much vigour and ſucceſs, that the enemy was ſoon driven out of the village, and being cloſely purſued, a whole brigade threw down their arms and ſurrendered themſelves priſoners. The event of this ſkirmiſh convinced the duke of Burgundy that it would be impoſſible to avoid a battle: he therefore endeavoured to diſengage his troops from the hollow ways and defiles, through which they were marching, in order to bring them into the plain, where they might be properly formed; but the confederate generals were too well acquainted with the art of war to give them time to effect this purpoſe. The allied army was immediately formed, and advanced in order of battle to the charge. Hereupon the enemy faced about and formed, but in great diſorder. The battle began about three in the afternoon, but could not be deemed a general engagement till ſeven in the evening, when the action became very furious and doubtful on both ſides, for the French being continually reinforced, they continued the fight with great vigour and reſolution for ſome time; at length the confederates drove the enemy from one poſt to another, till darkneſs put an end to the combat. The engagement was chiefly between the infantry; while the horſe, who, by reaſon of the broken ground, could not act, were detached to the wings, and advanced ſo far, that they attacked the enemy in flank and rear, which throwing them into the utmoſt confuſion, occaſioned a general rout. Part of them retired with the baggage and artillery towards Deynſe and Ghent, and another part by the road to Courtray. About nine in the morning they reached Ghent, and marching through that city, they encamped at Lovendegen on the canal. In this action three thouſand of the French were ſlain on the field of battle, two thouſand deſerted, and ſeven thouſand were taken priſoners, including a great number of officers, together with ten pieces of cannon, above a hundred ſtandards and colours, and four thouſand horſes, while the loſs of the allies did not amount to two thouſand men. The electoral prince of Hanover, in this engagement, charged at the head of Bulan's dragoons with great intrepidity: his horſe was ſhot under him, and colonel Luſky killed by the ſide of him.

The French lines being thus levelled, on the thirteenth of Auguſt, the confederate forces inveſted Liſle. This was not only the ſtrongeſt town in Flanders, but was provided with all neceſſaries, and with ſtores of ammunition, while the garriſon was reinforced by twenty-one battalions of the beſt troops of France, commanded by marſhal de Boufflers in perſon. Prince Eugene commanded at the ſiege, and the duke of Marlborough covered it with the reſt of the army. The dukes of Burgundy and Vendome being now joined by the duke of Berwick, reſolved, if poſſible, to relieve the place, and made ſeveral marches and counter-marches for that purpoſe. Marlborough being apprized of their intention, marched out of his lines to give them battle; but the enemy declined an engagement, and the allies returned to their camp, which they fortified with an intrenchment. On the ſeventh of September, the beſiegers took the counterſcarp of Liſle by an aſſault, after an obſtinate conteſt, in which they loſt one thouſand men. The French generals continued to hover about the camp of the confederates, which they even cannonaded. Marlborough again offered them battle in vain. On the twenty-third of September the tenaille was ſtormed, and a lodgment made along the covered way. On the twenty-third of October the town ſurrendered, and marſhal de Boufflers retired into the citadel with the remainder of his garriſon; but on the tenth of December the citadel ſurrendered. What facilitated its reduction was the famous battle of Wynendale, fought by major-general Webb, who, with ſix thouſand men, guarded a convoy from Oſtend. He was attacked by the count de la Motte with about twenty-two thouſand; when Webb, after a warm action, which laſted two hours, obliged them to retire in the utmoſt confuſion, after leaving ſix thouſand men killed; but the loſs of the allies did not exceed nine hundred and twelve officers and ſoldiers. After this glorious victory Ghent and Bruges were recovered. The campaign in Catalonia was no leſs ſucceſsful. Sir John Leake took Cagliari, the capital of Sardinia, upon which the whole iſland ſubmitted. Afterwards general Stanhope, with a body of land forces, aſſiſted by a fleet commanded by Sir John Leake, inveſted Port Mahon, which in three days capitulated; and the whole iſland of Minorca ſubmitted to the Engliſh government. While the arms of Great Britain were thus attended with a train of ſucceſſive good fortune, the people were afflicted with the loſs of prince George of Denmark, who died of an aſthma, on the twenty-eighth day of October, in the fifty-ſixth year of his age. He was a prince poſſeſſed of many amiable and engaging qualities, but deſtitute of great talents, and little qualified for making a figure in the world. He had always lived in great harmony with the queen; who during the whole courſe of their marriage, and eſpecially in his laſt illneſs, approved herſelf a pattern of conjugal fidelity and tenderneſs. The queen having conſented to an act of grace, wherein all treaſons were pardoned, except ſuch as were committed on the high ſeas; the lord chancellor, on the twenty-firſt day of April, made a ſpeech, in her majeſty's name, and the parliament was then prorogued.

By this time the French king was reduced to ſuch a ſtate of humiliation, that he made overtures of peace, in conſequence of which a treaty was begun at the Hague, and forty preliminary articles were agreed upon; but as by one of them king Philip was to quit the Spaniſh dominions, the French court refuſed their conſent; and after having offered the duke of Marlborough a large ſum of money for his intereſt in procuring a peace, which he generouſly rejected, the treaty came to nothing, and the confederates reſolved to open the campaign without further delay. Accordingly prince Eugene and the duke of Marlborough proceeded to Flanders, and towards the end of June, the allied army encamped in the plain of Liſle, to the number of one hundred and ten thouſand fighting men. At the ſame time the marſhal Villars, accounted one of the moſt fortunate generals in France, aſſembled the French forces on the plain of Lens, where he began to throw up intrenchments. The confederate generals having obſerved his ſituation, and finding they could not attack him without incurring great danger, reſolved to inveſt Tournay, the garriſon of which Villars had imprudently weakened. To conceal their deſign they made a motion towards Ypres, and while the attention of the enemy was wholly diverted to that quarter, they ſuddenly laid ſiege to Tournay. The town itſelf was eaſily taken; but the citadel was ſo ſtrong by nature and art, and lieutenant de Surville the governor ſuch an excellent officer, that though he had only a weak garriſon, he ſuſtained the ſiege for the ſpace of a month with incredible valour. As the beſiegers proceeded by the method of ſap; their miners frequently met with thoſe of the enemy, under ground, and fought with bayonet and piſtol. The volunteers on both ſides preſented themſelves to theſe ſubterreneous combats, in the midſt of mines and countermines big with ruin and deſtruction. Sometimes they were kindled by accident, and ſometimes ſprung by deſign; ſo that great numbers of theſe brave men were ſtifled below; and above four hundred of the confederates were blown up by one exploſion. The beſiegers at length having effected a breach, and made the neceſſary diſpoſitions for a general aſſault, the governor offered to ſurrender. Articles were drawn up and tranſmitted to Verſailles; but Lewis refuſed to ratify them, except on condition that there ſhould be a ſuſpenſion of arms in the Netherlands till the fifth of November. This condition being rejected, hoſtilities were renewed and proſecuted with great ardour and animoſity. Surville being now reduced to extremity, deſired to capitulate, and ſent certain articles to the duke of Marlborough; but he received for anſwer, that no terms were to be expected, and he muſt therefore ſurrender at diſcretion. Soon after, the proviſions in the citadel being exhauſted, Surville and his garriſon ſurrendered themſelves priſoners of war. Tournay being thus reduced, the confederates, with a reſolution to inveſt the city of Mons, paſſed the Scheld.

The allies came ſo near the enemy, on the ninth of September, that the two armies cannonaded each other. The French army, amounting to one hundred and twenty thouſand men, were poſted behind the woods of La Merte and Frainciere in the neighbourhood of Malplaquet. The confederates, nearly of the ſame number, encamped with the right towards Sart and Bleron, and the left on the edge of Lagniere; the head-quarters being at Blaregnies. The enemy, inſtead of attacking the allies, fortified their camp with triple intrenchments, inſomuch that being naturally ſtrong, it now ſeemed inacceſſible. But on the eleventh, the confederates, favoured by a thick fog, erected batteries in the center and on each wing, and the weather clearing up, began the attack about eleven o'clock with the utmoſt fury. Eighty-ſix battalions on the right, commanded by general Shuylemburg, the duke of Argyle, and other generals, and ſupported by two and twenty battalions under count Lottum, attacked the left of the enemy with ſuch vigour, that in leſs than an hour they were driven from their intrenchments into the woods of Sart and Trainiere. The prince of Orange, with ſix and thirty Dutch battalions, advanced againſt the right of the enemy poſted in the wood of La Merte, and covered with three intrenchments. Both ſides fought with the moſt intrepid reſolution: the Dutch compelled the French to quit the firſt intrenchments; but were repulſed from the ſecond with great ſlaughter. The prince of Orange renewed the attack with great fury; and the enemy at laſt ſeeing their lines forced, their left and center giving way, and Villars, their general, dangerouſly wounded, retreated towards Bavay, under the conduct of Boufflers. The confederates took forty colours and ſtandards, ſixteen pieces of artillery, and a great number of priſoners, but purchaſed the victory at the price of twenty thouſand of their beſt troops killed in the action. Lottum, general Tottau, count Oxienſtern, and the marquis of Tullibardine, were killed. Prince Eugene was ſlightly wounded on the head; and lieutenant-general Webb received a ſhot in the groin. The prince of Orange had two horſes ſhot under him, but eſcaped unhurt; as did likewiſe the duke of Argyle, though ſeveral muſket balls penetrated through his cloaths, hat, and perriwig. The French being thus drove from the neighbourhood of Mons, the allies were left at liberty to beſiege that city, which capitulated on the twenty-ſixth of October, when both armies retired into winter quarters. On the Rhine, nothing of importance happened, except one ſharp action between a detachment of the French army, and a body of Germans, in which the latter were defeated, and afterwards obliged to repaſs the river. While the brave Marlborough was thus purſuing his conqueſts in Flanders, and ſupporting the glory of the Britiſh arms, a party was ſecretly forming againſt him at home, chiefly by Harley and St. John. Harley had, by means of Mrs. Hill, afterwards Mrs. Marſham, private acceſs to the queen; and by her, and his own intrigues, gave her majeſty an ill opinion of the whigs, particularly of the duke and ducheſs of Marlborough, in order to put a ſtop to the progreſs of his glory, and to the humiliation of France. Mrs. Marſham was related to the ducheſs, who had introduced her into the queen's ſervice; and ſhe, by Harley's inſtructions, ſupplanted her benefactreſs. Thus, by undermining the brave Marlborough and his friends, the way was paved for Harley and his aſſociates to advance themſelves.

The parliament being aſſembled, on the fifteenth day of November, Mr. Dolben, ſon to the late archbiſhop of York, complained to the houſe of commons, of two ſermons preached and publiſhed by Dr. Henry Sacheverel, rector of St. Saviour's, Southwark, as containing ſeveral dangerous poſitions. Sacheverel was poſſeſſed of little genius or learning, but much bigotry and intemperate zeal, which he evinced in a flagrant degree againſt the diſſenters. The complaint of Mr. Dolben was ſeconded by Sir Peter King, and the ſermons were voted ſcandalous and ſeditious libels; in purſuance of which reſolution, the doctor, and Henry Clements, his publiſher, were ordered to attend the bar of the houſe. Accordingly, on the fourteenth of December, Sacheverel was brought to the bar, where he acknowledged himſelf the author of both the ſermons, and declared that he had received encouragement from the lord-mayor, to print that intitled, "The perils of falſe brethren." The lord-mayor denied that he had ever given ſuch encouragement; upon which the commons ordered Mr. Dolben to impeach the doctor at the bar of the houſe of lords, in the name of all the commons of England, appointed a committee to draw up articles againſt him, and commanded the uſher of the black rod to take him into cuſtody. On the ſeventeenth, he petitioned the houſe that he might be admitted to bail; but this indulgence was refuſed, and the commons ſeemed determined to carry on, with great rigour, the proſecution.

A. D. 1710.

Three weeks were employed with this extraordinary trial, during which all other buſineſs was ſuſpended; and the queen herſelf was every day preſent, though in quality of a private ſpectator. The invectives contained in the ſermons againſt the revolution, the toleration, the union, the diſſenters, and the adminiſtration, were ſo explicit, and the doctor's acknowledgment of himſelf as author ſo frank, that there was no need of further proof on that ſubject. At laſt, after violent debates, Sacheverel was found guilty by a majority of ſeventeen voices, and four and thirty peers entered a proteſt againſt this deciſion. He was prohibited from preaching for the ſpace of three years, and his two ſermons were ordered to be burned by the hands of the common hangman, in preſence of the lord-mayor and the two ſheriffs of London. The tories conſidered the lenity of this ſentence as a victory obtained over the oppoſite party; and they celebrated their triumph with bonfires, illuminations, and other demonſtrations of joy. During theſe tranſactions, the French king made freſh offers of peace; but theſe, like the former, appear to have been only deſigned to amuſe and divide the allies. Meanwhile the confederates did not retard the operations of the campaign; for the duke of Marlborough took Doway, Bethune, Aire, and St. Venant.

In Spain, the horſe and dragoons in the army of king Charles, commanded by general Stanhope, attacked the whole cavalry of the enemy at Almenara. Stanhope charged in perſon, and with his own hand ſlew general Ameſſaga, who commanded the guards of Philip. The Spaniſh horſe were routed, together with nine battalions that eſcaped by favour of the darkneſs; and the main body of the army retired to Lerida. General Staremberg purſued them to Saragoſſa; and an engagement enſuing on the ninth of Auguſt, the enemy were totally defeated: five thouſand of their men were killed, ſeven thouſand taken, with all their artillery, and a great number of colours and ſtandards. King Charles entered Saragoſſa in triumph, and then proceeded to Madrid; but in a little time was obliged to retire from thence, his rival becoming ſuperior by freſh reinforcements. After this, general Stanhope, with eight Engliſh battalions, and as many ſquadrons, being quartered in the little town of Brihuega, was ſuddenly ſurrounded by the whole Spaniſh army under the duke of Vendome, and, after a ſhort but vigorous reſiſtance, was obliged to ſurrender himſelf and his troops priſoners of war. This was followed by an obſtinate battle near Villavicioſa. Six thouſand of the enemy were killed on the ſpot; but the allies had ſuffered ſo ſeverely, that Staremberg, ordering his cannon to be nailed up, marched to Saragoſſa, and retired into Catalonia from thence.

The tories in England began to execute the ſchemes they had formed for effecting the ruin of the whig miniſtry. A popular ſpirit of averſion to thoſe who favoured the diſſenters, had been excited by Sacheverel's trial. Addreſſes were preſented to her majeſty from all parts, aſſerting in the ſtrongeſt terms, her hereditary right, and condemning all reſiſtance as a rebellious doctrine, founded upon antimonarchical and republican principles. The queen began to expreſs her partiality to this party, by mortifying the duke of Marlborough, whoſe intereſt was not now even ſufficient to prevent the diſmiſſion of his ſon-in-law, the earl of Sunderland, from the office of ſecretary of ſtate, in which he was ſucceeded by the lord Dartmouth; and the office of lord-chamberlain was transferred from the duke of Kent, to the duke of Shrewſbury. On the eighteenth of Auguſt the earl of Godolphin was deprived of his office, and the treaſury put into commiſſion, under the direction of Mr. Harley, appointed chancellor of the Exchequer, and under-treaſurer. The earl of Rocheſter was made preſident of the council, in the room of lord Somers; Henry St. John, ſecretary of ſtate, inſtead of Mr. Boyle; the lord-chancellor having reſigned the great ſeal, it was put into commiſſion, and afterwards given to Sir Simon Harcourt; the earl of Wharton ſurrendered his commiſſion of lord-lieutenant of Ireland, which the queen conferred on the duke of Ormond; the earl of Orford retired from the board of admiralty, and Mr. George Granville was appointed ſecretary of war, in the room of Mr. Robert Walpole; the command of the forces in Portugal was conferred on the earl of Portmore; and the duke of Hamilton appointed lord-lieutenant of the county-palatine of Lancaſter. In a word, there was not one whig left in any office of ſtate, except the duke of Marlborough; and even he would have reſigned his command, had not his particular friends repreſented to him, that ſuch a ſtep could not fail of being prejudicial to the intereſt of his country. The whig parliament was alſo diſſolved; and ſuch precautions taken, as ſufficiently influenced the electors in favour of the other party. On the twenty-fifth of November the new parliament met, when Mr. Bromley was choſen ſpeaker without oppoſition. The commons diſcovered the ſpirit by which they were actuated; they exhorted her majeſty to diſcountenance all ſuch principles and meaſures as had lately threatened her royal crown and dignity. Soon after, Meredith, Macartney, and Honeywood, were deprived of their regiments, becauſe they had drank confuſion to the enemies of the duke of Marlborough, while in a ſtate of intoxication.

A. D. 1711.

Both houſes of parliament, in an addreſs to the queen, declared that Mr. Harley's fidelity to her majeſty, and zeal for her ſervice, had, in their opinion, drawn upon him the hatred of all the abettors of popery and faction. They intreated her to take all poſſible care of her ſacred perſon, and for that purpoſe to give directions for cauſing all papiſts to be removed from the cities of London and Weſtminſter. In compliance with this requeſt, a proclamation was publiſhed, ordering the laws to be ſtrictly put in execution againſt papiſts. The earl of Rocheſter dying about this time, Harley became ſole miniſter, was created baron of Wigmore, and raiſed to the rank of earl, by the antient titles of Oxford and Mortimer. He was ſoon after appointed lord-treaſurer, and had the ſole direction of affairs. About this time the emperor Joſeph died of the ſmall-pox without male iſſue, ſo that king Charles's immediate aim was to ſucceed his brother on the Imperial throne. At the ſame time the houſe of commons paſſed a bill for building fifty new churches in the ſuburbs of London and Weſtminſter, and allotted for this purpoſe the duty upon coals, which had been granted for the building of St. Paul's, now finiſhed and complete.

On the eighteenth of February the duke of Marlborough, who was continued in the command of the army, ſet out for Holland, the queen having aſſured him that the payment of the troops ſhould be duly remitted. About the middle of April he aſſembled an army at Orchier, between Liſle and Douay; and mareſchal Villars drew together the French forces in the neighbourhood of Cambray and Arras, and encamped behind the river Sanſet, in ſuch an advantageous poſt, that it could not be attacked without the moſt imminent danger. The duke therefore paſſed the Scarpe, and pitched his camp between Douay and Bouchain. His intention was to reduce Bouchain, which was judged impracticable, inaſmuch as it was ſituated in the middle of a moraſs ſtrongly fortified, defended by a numerous garriſon, and in the neighbourhood of an army ſuperior to that of the allies, who were likewiſe expoſed to the excurſions of Valenciennes and Conde. Notwithſtanding theſe difficulties, and the diſſuaſions of his particular friends, he reſolved to undertake the ſiege; and accordingly, on the tenth day of Auguſt, the place was regularly inveſted. Mareſchal Villars had taken every precaution his ſkill and experience could ſuggeſt, to baffle the attempts of Marlborough: he had reinforced the garriſon with ſix thouſand choſen men, commanded by officers of approved courage and ability; he made ſeveral attempts to raiſe the ſiege, but they were rendered ineffectual by the ſuperior prudence and capacity of the Engliſh general. Perhaps a more difficult enterprize was never undertaken than the ſiege of Bouchain; Marlborough was obliged to caſt up lines, erect forts, raiſe batteries, throw bridges over a river, form a cauſeway through a deep moraſs, and provide for the ſecurity of convoys againſt a numerous army on one ſide, and the garriſons of Conde and Valenciennes on the other. Such difficulties required all the ſkill and experience of a conſummate general, and all the valour and intrepidity of the confederate army, who had perhaps never exhibited ſuch amazing proofs of courage upon any other occaſion; for in twenty days after the trenches were opened, the garriſon was obliged to ſurrender themſelves priſoners of war. This was the laſt military atchievement ment of the immortal Marlborough; who ſoon after the taking of Bouchain returned to the Hague, and arrived in England about the middle of November. Though the miniſtry, and a great part of the Engliſh nation were, or affected to be, blind to the merit of their accompliſhed general, the allies laid not under the ſame prejudices. They frankly acknowledged, that their many valuable acquiſitions were in a great meaſure owing to the courage and conduct of that greateſt of generals, whoſe character they adored, and whoſe memory they ſtill revere. During theſe tranſactions, prince Eugene, at the head of the German forces, protected the electors at Frankfort from the deſigns of the enemy, and Charles was elected emperor unanimouſly.

In the mean time a negociation for peace was carried on between the court of France and the new miniſtry, who were determined at all events to put a period to a war, which they were equally unwilling and incapable to continue. The earl of Jerſey ſent a private meſſage to the court of France, intimating the queen's ſincere deſire of a peace; and intreating that Lewis would propoſe to the Dutch a renewal of the conferences, in which caſe the Engliſh plenipotentiaries ſhould have ſuch inſtructions, as would render abortive all the endeavours of the States General to prevent the concluſion of the treaty. This meſſage was extremely agreeable to the French court, who returned a letter of compliment with aſſurances of their king's pacific diſpoſition, though he was averſe to a renewal of the conferences with the States General. The ſtates of Holland were greatly alarmed at this procedure, and ſent over Buys, as envoy-extraordinary, to intercede with the queen, that ſhe would alter her reſolutions; but all his endeavours had no effect; ſhe retained her reſolutions; and the earl of Strafford, ambaſſador in Holland, declared in the queen's name, that any delay in the States to concur with her majeſty, would be conſidered as an abſolute refuſal. Intimidated by this declaration, they agreed to open the general conferences at Utrecht on the firſt of January, granted paſſports to the French miniſters; and the queen appointed Robinſon, biſhop of Briſtol, and the earl of Strafford, her plenipotentiaries at the congreſs. The miniſtry, conſcious of the unpopularity of their conduct, employed a number of mercenary writers to vindicate their meaſures. This produced a paper war between the whig and tory parties; and ſuch a torrent of falſhood, ſcurrility, and abuſe, was poured forth on both ſides, as ſeemed to bid defiance to truth, decency, and good manners. The miniſtry, as is generally the caſe, would not allow the ſame liberty to their antagoniſts which they aſſumed to themſelves. They cauſed fourteen bookſellers, printers, and publiſhers, to be apprehended and proſecuted; though at the requeſt of the attorney-general, a man of ſenſe and candor, they were bound over on their recognizances to the laſt day of term. Some individuals of the tory party themſelves were diſpleaſed with the preliminaries, and certain peers joined with the whigs in remonſtrating againſt them. The court being informed of this deſign, prorogued the parliament to the ſeventh of December, hoping that the arrival of the Scottiſh peers would be ſufficient to turn the balance in their favour. When the parliament, according to prorogation, met, the queen opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which ſhe obſerved, that notwithſtanding the arts of thoſe who delighted in war, both the place and time were appointed for opening the treaty of a general peace; and that the States General had expreſſed their entire confidence in her management.

The queen being retired, a motion was made in the houſe of lords for returning her majeſty thanks for her ſpeech; and the earl of Nottingham propoſed that a clauſe ſhould be inſerted in the addreſs, "That no peace could be ſafe or honourable to Great Britain or Europe, if Spain or the Weſt Indies were allotted to any branch of the houſe of Bourbon." This motion occaſioned a violent debate, in the courſe of which the earl of Angleſey repreſented, the neceſſity of eaſing the nation of the burthens incurred by an expenſive war. The duke of Marlborough, at whom this reflection was levelled, made a long ſpeech in his own vindication; he appealed to the queen, who was then in the houſe incognito, whether he did not, on all occaſions, inform her and her council of all the propoſals offered by the enemy for a peace, and had not deſired inſtructions for his conduct on that ſubject? He declared upon his conſcience, that he was deſirous of a ſafe, honourable, and laſting peace; and very far from entertaining any deſign of prolonging the war for his private emolument, as had been falſely inſinuated by his enemies. At laſt, the queſtion being repeated which the earl of Nottingham propoſed, it was carried in the affirmative by a majority of ſix voices. The ſame clauſe was propoſed to be inſerted in the addreſs of the commons, but rejected by a great majority. The commiſſioners for examining the public accounts, having diſcovered that the duke of Marlborough had received an annual penſion of five or ſix thouſand pounds from the contractors for bread to the army, the queen declared in council, that ſhe thought proper to diſmiſs him from all his employments, that the matter might be ſtrictly and impartially examined; and accordingly on the thirty-firſt of December, her majeſty ſent his grace a letter written with her own hand, ſignifying her royal pleaſure to reſume all the places with which ſhe had entruſted him. This diſgrace of the duke of Marlborough, inſtead of weakening, ſerved rather to ſtrengthen the oppoſition in the upper houſe; and the miniſtry being determined at all events to procure a majority in that aſſembly, perſuaded the queen to venture on a meaſure which no Engliſh prince had ever before attempted. This was the creating of no leſs than twelve new peers; a proſtitution of honours which reflects equal diſgrace on the queen who beſtowed them, and thoſe who received them from her majeſty.

A. D. 1712.

The duke of Marlborough being thus diſgraced, the duke of Ormond was made commander in chief of her majeſty's forces; the duke of Northumberland appointed captain of the ſecond troop of horſe-guards; the earl of Rivers maſter of the ordnance; and the duke of Beaufort captain of the band of penſioners, in the room of the duke of St. Alban's; brigadier Hill, brother to the lady Maſham, was made lieutenant of the Tower, in the room of lieutenant-general Cadogan; the duke of Somerſet was removed from his poſt as maſter of the horſe, and the counteſs of Sunderland, and lady Rialton, two of the duke of Marlborough's daughters, reſigned their places as ladies of the queen's bedchamber. On the ſeventeenth of January, her majeſty being greatly indiſpoſed, ſent a meſſage to both houſes, importing, that the plenipotentiaries were arrived at Utrecht, and employed in forming meaſures for procuring ſatisfaction to all their allies; that the terms of peace ſhould be laid before the parliament before they were finally concluded; that, in the mean time, ſhe was reſolved to make preparations for an early campaign, and therefore hoped, that the commons would grant the neceſſary ſupplies for that purpoſe. They now proceeded to take the affairs of the duke of Marlborough into conſideration; when after a long debate, it was reſolved by two hundred and ſeventy voices againſt one hundred and ſixty-five, "That the taking ſeveral ſums annually by the duke of Marlborough from the contractors, for furniſhing the bread and bread-waggons for the army in the Low Countries, was unwarrantable and illegal." It was alſo reſolved "That the two and a half per cent. deducted from the foreign troops in her majeſty's pay, was public money, and ought to be accounted for; and that the ſaid reſolution ſhould be laid before her majeſty by the whole houſe." This being accordingly done on the twenty-ſixth, the queen gave orders to her attorney-general, to proſecute the duke for the money that was deducted in the above manner.

About the beginning of April the duke of Ormond went over to Holland, and, on the twenty-firſt of May, he, in concert with prince Eugene, aſſembled the army between Douay and Marchiennes, which, upon a review, was found to conſiſt of two hundred and ninety-five ſquadrons, and one hundred and forty-three battalions. With this force the two generals marched towards the enemy; and paſſing the Schelde, encamped at Solemnes, and Neuſville. But prince Eugene propoſing to attack the French army under marſhal Villars, or to inveſt the town of Queſnoy, the duke of Ormond, who had by this time received freſh orders, from Mr. ſecretary St. John, gave the prince and the deputies of the States to underſtand, that her Britannic majeſty, having a proſpect that the negociations for peace would prove ſucceſsful, had given him orders not to act offenſively againſt the enemy. Surprized at this declaration, the deputies of the States immediately tranſmitted advice thereof to the Hague; and the Dutch plenipotentiaries at Utrecht received orders to complain to the biſhop of Briſtol, in the name of their maſters, againſt the orders which had been given to the Engliſh general. That prelate returned for anſwer, "That he was inſtructed to intimate to the States General, that as their high mightineſſes had not thought proper to concur with her majeſty in the meaſures ſhe had taken for procuring a ſalutary peace, they ought not to be ſurprized if ſhe now thought herſelf at liberty to procure that convenience for herſelf." The plenipotentiaries of the States then remonſtrating, that ſuch a ſtep would be contrary to all the alliances between the queen and the States General; the biſhop ſaid, his inſtructions further imported, "that, conſidering the conduct of the States towards her majeſty, ſhe thought herſelf diſengaged from all alliances and engagements with their high mightineſſes." The States now wrote a letter to the queen, and ordered their envoy at London to deliver it into her own hand, affirming, that all the difference between her majeſty and them was the diſparity of ſentiments; and if for ſuch a cauſe, confederates, united by the ſtrongeſt ties, might quit their engagements, no engagements could be relied on for the time to come." The envoy preſented this letter to her majeſty, and, according to private orders he had received from the States, copies of it were inſerted in the public papers, by which means it was diſperſed throughout the kingdom.

Her majeſty on the fifth of June went to the houſe and communicated the plan of peace to her parliament. As ſoon as the queen was retired, the commons voted an addreſs of thanks and approbation. But a violent debate enſued in the houſe of lords upon their taking the ſpeech into conſideration. The majority, however, agreed to an addreſs, in which they thanked the queen for her great condeſcenſion in communicating theſe conditions to her parliament, and expreſſed an entire ſatisfaction in her conduct. On the twenty-firſt of June, the queen by a ſpeech from the throne, put an end to the ſeſſion.

In the mean time, the trenches were opened before Queſnoy, and the ſiege carried on with uncommon vigour, under cover of the duke of Ormond's forces. But on the twenty-fourth of June, the duke declared to prince Eugene, and the deputies of the States attending the army, that he had received orders from the queen his miſtreſs to publiſh, within three days, a ſuſpenſion of arms for two months between his army and that of the French, and to make a detachment to take poſſeſſion of Dunkirk, which the king of France would deliver up to the Engliſh as a ſecurity for the performance of his promiſes. He alſo propoſed that the like ſuſpenſion of arms ſhould be publiſhed in the confederate army; adding, that if they perſiſted in their operations againſt Queſnoy, they muſt take care to oppoſe the attempts of the enemy, as he could no longer cover the ſiege. The deputies deſired he would delay his march five days, that they might have time to conſult their principals. Accordingly the duke waited till the twenty-eighth of June, when he ſent his adjutant with a written order to the generals of the foreign troops in the Britiſh pay, to hold their forces in readineſs to march; but to his unſpeakable ſurprize, they all refuſed to obey his orders, four ſquadrons and a battalion of the troops of Holſtein Gottorp, and a regiment of dragoons of the troops of Liege excepted. As a reaſon for this refuſal, they alledged, that being commanded to act againſt the French, they could not ſeparate from the confederacy without expreſs directions from their maſters. On the third of July, the town of Queſnoy ſurrendered, and the garriſon were ſent to Holland, being made priſoners of war.

When the Britiſh forces had departed, Villars left his camp at Chateau Cambreſis, and having divided his army into eight columns, he paſſed the Schelde at Sourche and Neuſville. As ſoon as prince Eugene, who at this time had beſieged Landrecy, received intelligence of the enemy's motions, he marched to Denain, viewed the intrenchments, and reinforced a body commanded by lord Albemarle, with ſix battalions. In the mean time the enemy advanced, in one cloſe column, very near the works, then filed off, ſeemingly to attack them in front; and ſeveral feints were afterwards made as if they intended to retreat; but at laſt they began the attack with ſo much fury, that, after one diſcharge, the intrenchment was abandoned. The allies having made a vigorous but vain reſiſtance, retired towards the bridge on the Schelde; which being broke by the weight of the baggage, the greateſt part of thoſe who attempted to paſs it periſhed in the river. The thirteen battalions who defended the intrenchments, were all killed or taken priſoners. Among the latter were lord Albemarle, five princes of the houſe of Naſſau, the prince of Holſtein Gottorp, the prince of Anhalt, and all the officers of the detachment. The French found in the camp twelve braſs cannon, a number of horſes and a very conſiderable booty. Villars immediately inveſted Marchiennes, where the principal ſtores of the allies were lodged. The place ſurrendered upon the laſt day of July, and the garriſon, conſiſting of five thouſand men, were ſent priſoners to Valenciennes. He then undertook the ſiege of Douay; and prince Eugene, in order to prevent his ſucceeding in this attempt, raiſed the ſiege of Landrecy, and marched towards the enemy, fully determined to give them battle. In this, however, he was prevented by the States, who thought it too hazardous an undertaking: and the prince had the mortification of ſeeing Douay fall into the hands of the French: nor could he prevent their retaking Queſnoy and Bouchain, though he did every thing in the power of an able and experienced general to prevent it. While theſe military tranſactions were going on, the Britiſh miniſters at the congreſs, continued their inſtances to the Dutch, and other allies, to join in the ſuſpenſion of arms; but they rejected the propoſal, and continued their preparations for proſecuting the war with vigour. But the Portugueſe who had hitherto continued obſtinately to refuſe their concurrence to the pacific meaſures then carrying on, thought proper now to agree to a ceſſation of arms; and accordingly a treaty for that purpoſe was ſigned at Utrecht between their miniſters and thoſe of France on the ſeventh of November, which terminated the war on that ſide. About the ſame time the duke of Argyle was ſent from England to take poſſeſſion of Port Mahon, and the iſland of Minorca, for her Britannic majeſty; and the duke of Ormond returned to London, having put his troops into winter quarters.

Now party diſputes were carried on in England, with more acrimony than ever. The tories threw out many ſevere reflections againſt the duke of Marlborough, whom they repreſented as a perſon that omitted no opportunity of fomenting the animoſities between the two factions. Marlborough therefore perceiving his enemies growing every day more and more implacable, thought proper to retire to the continent. He had already loſt his friend the earl of Godolphin, the late treaſurer, who died in September, and left behind him a moſt amiable and upright character.

Still the States of Holland refuſed to join in a ſuſpenſion of arms. At laſt the earl of Strafford preſented a new plan of peace, in which the queen promiſed to inſiſt, that the city of Tournay and ſeveral other places, ſhould be ceded to the States. Their high mightineſſes having conſidered the new plan, and ſenſible of the circumſtances to which they had reduced themſelves by haughtily contemning all former propoſitions made them by her majeſty, determined now to ſubmit themſelves to her will.

A. D. 1713. A new treaty of barrier and ſucceſſion was ſigned at the Hague on the nineteenth of January, and ſent over to England to be ratified. By this treaty the States engaged, "to aſſiſt and defend the ſucceſſion of the crown of Great Britain, according to the act of ſettlement, againſt all oppoſers:" and her majeſty ſtipulated and agreed, "that the States ſhould garriſon Furnes, Fort Knocque, Ypres, Menin, the town and citadel of Tournay, Mons, Charleroy, the town and caſtle of Namur, the caſtle of Ghent, the forts La Perle, Philip, and Damme: that fort Rodenhugſen near Ghent ſhould be deſtroyed, and that the revenues of thoſe towns which had been taken from France, over and above what was neceſſary for the ſupport of the civil government, ſhould belong to the States, for the maintenance of their garriſons: that a million of florins yearly, or an hundred thouſand crowns every three months, ſhould be paid alſo to the States, out of the cleareſt and moſt certain revenues of the Spaniſh Low Countries which the late king Charles was in poſſeſſion of at the time of his death, towards the expence of the other garriſons. That the Engliſh and Dutch fleet ſhould be upon the ſame foot in point of trade in the Netherlands. That England ſhall aſſiſt the Dutch with ten thouſand men, and twenty men of war, in caſe they ſhould be attacked: and the States ſhould aſſiſt the Engliſh with ſix thouſand men and twenty men of war; and if this ſhould not be ſufficient, they ſhall aſſiſt each other with their whole forces:" This treaty ſeems to have had a conſiderable influence upon the other powers: for even the emperor's plenipotentiaries talked in more moderate terms; and the plenipotentiaries of Great Britain acted as mediators for the reſt of the allies. On the firſt of March the inſtruments relating to Catalonia and Italy were executed, and on the fourth of the ſame month the dukes of Berry and Orleans renounced their right to the crown of Spain in the parliament of Paris, to which renunciation the duke of Shrewſbury and Mr. Prior, her Britannic majeſty's miniſters, and the duke d'Oſſuna, miniſter from the court of Spain, were witneſſes. On the twelfth of April the treaty of peace was ſigned at Utrecht. The earl of Strafford and the biſhop of Briſtol were the firſt who ſigned; then the miniſters of the duke of Savoy, who were followed by thoſe of the king of Portugal: then the plenipotentiaries of the king of Pruſſia; and, laſt of all, thoſe of the States General. When the buſineſs was completed, the miniſters withdrew, and having notified this tranſaction, immediately diſpatched expreſſes to their reſpective courts.

The French king by this treaty "acknowledged the proteſtant ſucceſſion of the houſe of Hanover to the crown of Great Britain, and engaged for himſelf, his heirs and ſucceſſors, not to ſuffer the pretender to return into France, nor give him in any way ſuccour or aſſiſtance.

"That the crowns of France and Spain ſhould never be united under one head, and renunciations made on both ſides in due form; and that they ſhould never be united under any pretence whatſoever.

"That the trade between France and Spain ſhall be on the ſame footing as in Charles II's time.

"That the fortifications of Dunkirk ſhould be demoliſhed, and the harbour filled up never to be repaired. That the queen and kingdom ſhould be fully reſtored to the bay and ſtreights of Hudſon, and ſatisfaction made to that company for damages ſuſtained.

"That the whole iſland of St. Chriſtopher be only hereafter poſſeſſed by the Engliſh, and alſo Nova Scotia or Acadia, with the port now called Annapolis Royal.

"That the iſland of Newfoundland ſhould belong of right wholly to Great Britain; the French to have huts to dry their fiſh, and liberty to fiſh from cape Bonaviſta to the northern point of that iſland, and ſo down to the weſtern ſide as far as Port Riche; and they were to retain Cape Breton and the other iſlands in the mouth of the river St. Laurence.

"The French in Canada not to moleſt the five nations of the Indians ſubject to Great Britain; and England to do the ſame by them.

"All letters of repriſal, marque, and countermarque, to be annulled.

"That juſtice ſhould be done to the Hamilton family concerning the duchy of Chatteleraut; to the duke of Richmond, concerning ſuch requeſts as he had to make in France; and to Charles Douglas, concerning certain lands to be reclaimed by him."

At the ſame time a treaty of navigation and commerce was concluded; whereby a free trade was eſtabliſhed according to the tariff of 1664, except in a few commodities, which in 1699 were ſubjected to new regulations. It was agreed that the duties impoſed upon the productions of France imported into England ſhould not exceed thoſe laid on the ſame commodities from other countries; and that commiſſioners ſhould meet at London to adjuſt all matters relating to commerce. It was likewiſe ſtipulated, that the emperor ſhould poſſeſs the kingdom of Naples, and the duchy of Milan in the Spaniſh Netherlands: that the duke of Savoy ſhould enjoy Sicily with the title of king: that the ſame title with the iſland of Sardinia ſhould be given to the elector of Bavaria, to indemnify him for the loſſes he had ſuſtained: that the States General ſhould reſtore Liſle and its dependencies; and that Namur, Charleroy, Luxemburgh, Ypres, and Newport ſhould be added to the other places they already poſſeſſed in Flanders: that the king of Pruſſia ſhould have Upper Guelders in exchange for Orange, and the other eſtates belonging to that family in Franche Comté. The king of Portugal declared himſelf ſatisfied with the treaty, and, as has already been obſerved, the emperor on the firſt of July was to give his anſwer.

On the ninth of April the parliament met, when the queen in her ſpeech, informed both houſes, that the treaty of peace was ſigned, and that in a few days the ratifications would be exchanged: ſhe expreſſed her hopes that what ſhe had done for the proteſtant ſucceſſion, and the perfect friendſhip that ſubſiſted between her and the houſe of Hanover, might convince ſuch who wiſhed well to both, and had the quiet and ſafety of their country at heart, how vain all attempts were to divide them. Addreſſes of thanks and congratulation were immediately preſented by both houſes of parliament, and their example was followed by the houſes of convocation, and all the principal corporations in the kingdom. The ratifications of the treaty being exchanged, on the fifth day of May the peace was proclaimed with the uſual ſolemnities, in the cities of London and Weſtminſter.

The treaty being laid before the parliament, after ſeveral violent debates, it was approved, and a public thankſgiving appointed, which was celebrated with great ſolemnity; and on the ſixteenth of July, by her majeſty's command, the lord chancellor prorogued the parliament to the twenty-eighth of Auguſt, but it never ſat more; for on the eighth of Auguſt, a proclamation was iſſued for diſſolving the preſent parliament, and declaring her majeſty's intention of calling a new one. Accordingly, on the eighteenth of the ſame month, writs were iſſued in due form, and the new parliament appointed to meet on November the twelfth.

The queen, who ſtill continued in a bad ſtate of health, was on the 2nd of March carried in a ſedan to the houſe of lords, when ſhe made a ſpeech to both houſes; "I have done, ſaid ſhe, and ſhall continue to do my beſt for the good of my ſubjects. Let it be your endeavour, as it ſhall be mine, to unite our differences; not by relaxing from the ſtricteſt adherence to our conſtitution in church and ſtate, but by obſerving the laws yourſelves, and inforcing a due obedience in others." The people were now greatly alarmed by a total removal of the whigs from all employments civil and military, and their poſts filled by profeſſed tories, ſome of whom were ſuppoſed to be attached to the pretender. Theſe ſteps threw the whigs into a violent commotion, apprehending that a deſign was formed to ſecure the pretender's ſucceſſion to the throne of Great Britain. Baron Schutz, the Hanoverian reſident, held ſecret conſultations with the chiefs of the whig party, and communicated their obſervations to the elector. They alſo maintained a correſpondence with the duke of Marlborough, and the health of the queen being now ſo much impaired, that every day was believed to be the laſt of her life, they concerted meaſures for oppoſing all efforts that might be made againſt the proteſtant ſucceſſion on the death of her majeſty; and at the ſame time they employed all their arts to excite and encourage the fears and jealouſies of the people. The houſe of lords reſounded with debates on the danger that threatened the proteſtant ſucceſſion, and the archbiſhop of York, with the earl of Angleſey, joined the oppoſition to the miniſtry. The latter affirmed, that the honour of his ſovereign and the good of his country were the only rules by which he regulated his conduct; and when truth and juſtice bore witneſs to his actions, he ſhould not be intimidated from purſuing a wicked miniſter from the queen's cloſet to the Tower, and from the Tower to the ſcaffold. About this time baron Schutz demanded of the lord chancellor a writ for the electoral prince of Hanover to ſit in the houſe of peers as duke of Cambridge. The chancellor anſwered, that he would immediately acquaint her majeſty with this requeſt, but it required ſome conſideration to make out writs for peers who did not reſide in the kingdom. The envoy replied, in a menacing tone, that he doubted not but his lordſhip knew the nature of his office, but, if the prince's abſence was the only objection, he was reſolved to come over, and in all probability would be landed before the writ was made out. The queen being informed of this tranſaction, was ſo offended with the baron for applying to the chancellor before he had ſignified his intention to her, that ſhe forbad him the court: wrote a letter to the princeſs Sophia; and another to the electoral prince, complaining of his having formed ſuch a reſolution without knowing her ſentiments on the ſubject; and aſſuring him, that nothing could be more dangerous to the tranquillity of her dominions, and the right of ſucceſſion in his line, and conſequently more diſagreeable to her, than ſuch a proceeding at this juncture. Both theſe letters were printed and publiſhed in England with a view to inform the friends of the Hanoverian family, why the duke of Cambridge had laid aſide his deſign of reſiding in Great Britain. This ſtep the queen conſidered as a perſonal inſult, and alſo as an attempt to prejudice her in the opinions of her ſubjects; ſhe therefore ordered the publiſher to be taken into cuſtody. The princeſs Sophia did not long ſurvive this event, for on the eighth of June ſhe was ſeized with an apoplectic fit, as ſhe was walking in the gardens of Herenhauſen, and died in the arms of the electoral princeſs, before any aſſiſtance could be procured. She was the fourth and youngeſt daughter of Frederic king of Bohemia, and Elizabeth his conſort, daughter of king James I. On the ninth of July the queen put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne; and the parliament was prorogued to the tenth of Auguſt.

The queen's conſtitution was now entirely deſtroyed, the anxiety of her mind having completed the ruin of her health. The diſſenſions among her miniſters were arrived to ſuch a height, that, forgetting their duty to her, or regard for their country, they ſeemed to meet in council merely with a view of oppoſing each other; and to ſuch an extravagant height did their animoſities arrive at laſt, that it is believed a quarrel which happened between the treaſurer and lord Bolingbroke, in her preſence, proved in ſome meaſure the cauſe of her death; for ſhe was heard to declare, that ſhe ſhould never outlive it. In the mean time lord Bolingbroke's art prevailed, and on the twenty-ſeventh of July, the earl of Oxford was diveſted of all his employments, and removed from the treaſury; upon which he retired meditating new projects for his future re-eſtabliſhment. His fall was ſo ſudden, that no plan had been formed for ſupplying the vacancy occaſioned by his diſgrace. The court was in the utmoſt confuſion, and her majeſty no longer able to ſupport the burden of government, ſunk into a ſtate of inſenſibility, and thus found a refuge from her anxiety in lethargic ſlumbers. Every method was tried that the art of healing could beſtow, but in vain. Her diſorder gained ground ſo faſt that her phyſicians deſpaired of her life. The privy-council aſſembled, when the dukes of Somerſet and Argyle, being informed of the deſperate ſtate in which ſhe lay, entered the council-chamber without having been ſummoned. The members were ſurprized at their appearance, but the duke of Shrewſbury thanking them for their readineſs to give their aſſiſtance at ſuch a critical juncture, deſired them to take their places. Some of the lords now recommended the duke of Shrewſbury as the fitteſt perſon to fill the important office of lord high treaſurer: when this opinion was ſignified to the queen, ſhe expreſſed her approbation, and delivered into his hands the ſtaff, bidding him uſe it for the good of her people. He would have reſigned the lord chamberlain's ſtaff, but ſhe deſired him to keep them both: ſo that he was at one time poſſeſſed of three of the greateſt poſts in the kingdom, thoſe of lord treaſurer, lord chamberlain, and lord-lieutenant of Ireland. This advancement of Shrewſbury produced an entire alteration in the face of affairs: it baffled the deſigns of Bolingbroke, extinguiſhed the hopes of the Jacobites, and revived the ſpirits of all who wiſhed well to the proteſtant ſucceſſion. The dukes of Somerſet and Argyle propoſed, that all privy-counſellors, in and about London, ſhould be invited to attend, without diſtinction of party. The motion was approved, and the lord Somers, with many other friends of the houſe of Hanover, repaired to Kenſington.

Their firſt conſideration was to provide for the ſecurity of the kingdom. Orders were diſpatched to four regiments of horſe and dragoons, quartered in remote counties, to march up to the neighbourhood of London and Weſtminſter. Seven of the ten Britiſh battalions in the Netherlands, were directed to embark at Oſtend for England; an embargo was laid upon all ſhipping; and directions were given for equipping all the ſhips of war, that were in a condition for immediate ſervice. Nor was the elector of Brunſwick forgot. A letter was ſent to that prince, acquainting him with the meaſures that had been taken, and requeſting of him to repair, with all convenient ſpeed, to Holland, where he ſhould be attended by a Britiſh ſquadron to convoy him to England, in caſe of her majeſty's death. At the ſame time inſtructions were tranſmitted to the earl of Strafford, to require the States General to prepare for performing their guaranty of the proteſtant ſucceſſion. Meaſures were likewiſe taken to ſecure the ſea ports, and over-awe the Jacobites in Scotland: the command of the fleet was beſtowed upon the earl of Berkeley, and the heralds at arms were kept in readineſs to proclaim the new king, as ſoon as ever a vacancy of the throne took place.

Thus, while all neceſſary precautions were taken for ſecuring the ſucceſſion in the houſe of Hanover, the queen, on the thirtieth of July appearing ſomewhat better, roſe from her bed about eight in the morning; and walking a little about her chamber, caſt her eyes on the clock, and continued to gaze upon it for ſome time. One of her ladies in waiting begged to know what ſhe ſaw there more than uſual, to which her majeſty only anſwered, by turning her eyes upon her with a dying look. Soon after ſhe was ſeized with a fit of an apoplexy; from which ſhe was ſomewhat relieved by the aſſiſtance of Dr. Mead. She continued all night in a ſtate of ſtupefaction; but gave ſome ſigns of life between twelve and one o'clock, and expired a little after ſeven in the morning, on Sunday the firſt of Auguſt 1714.

Queen Anne had lived forty-nine years, five months, and ſix days, and reigned twelve years and five months wanting a week. There had been a new vault made on the ſouth ſide, and towards the eaſt end, of Henry VII's chapel, to depoſit the body of king Charles II. in which that prince, queen Mary, king William III. and prince George of Denmark, were laid. Here the remains of queen Anne were likewiſe depoſited, and there being no more room left, the vault was cloſed up with brick-work. She had been married to his royal highneſs prince George, brother to the then king of Denmark, July twenty-eighth, 1683, by whom ſhe had ſix children; a daughter, ſtill-born, the twelfth of May, 1684. Lady Mary, born the ſecond of June, 1685, and who died in February, 1690. Anne Sophia, born May the twelfth, 1686, and died February following. William, duke of Glouceſter, born July the twenty-fourth, 1689, and died in 1700. The lady Mary, born in October, 1690, but lived only to be baptized; and George, who alſo died ſoon after he was born. Prince George, her huſband, died October the twenty-eighth, 1710.

Impartial Character of Queen Anne.

This queen, in her perſon, was of the middle ſize, and well proportioned. Her face was rather round than oval, her hair of a dark brown, her features regular, her complexion ruddy, her aſpect rather comely than majeſtic, but her preſence very engaging. Her voice was clear and melodious, which appeared particularly in the graceful delivery of her ſpeeches to parliament. Her capacity and learning were not remarkable, but ſhe was a virtuous, juſt, and pious princeſs. In domeſtic life ſhe was a pattern of conjugal fidelity and affection; in ſocial, ſhe approved herſelf a ſincere friend, and munificent patron. She was a tender mother, an indulgent miſtreſs, a mild and merciful princeſs. During her reign, both the church and ſtate experienced a profuſion of royal bounty. While her ſubjects laboured under the burthen of an expenſive war, ſhe generouſly aſſiſted them with a conſiderable part of her revenue. She applied the firſt fruits and tenths, belonging to the crown, to the maintenance of the poor clergy. She promoted the deſign of erecting churches; and gave every encouragement to charity ſchools for the education and ſupport of indigent youth. Her political character is ſufficiently marked by the tranſactions of her reign. The greateſt part of this was glorious; and while her huſband, the prince of Denmark, lived, the influence of his ſteadineſs made it ſhine with diſtinguiſhed luſtre. The ſame ſplendor might have continued to its cloſe, had ſhe not evinced the ſtrongeſt prepoſſeſſions in favour of the tories, whom ſhe was taught by her favourites to regard as her true friends, yet who made an ill uſe of her confidence, and, at her death, were reviving the perſecutions of former reigns, and throwing every thing into confuſion. At the ſame time this queen imbibed moſt incurable prejudices againſt the whigs, whom ſhe conſidered as the avowed enemies both of the church and monarchy. To theſe falſe notions was owing her unhappy conduct in reſigning herſelf into the hands of the former party, during the laſt four years of her reign, whereby a moſt ſucceſsful war was terminated by a moſt inglorious peace. Upon the whole, had this queen purſued, uninfluenced, her own good intentions, ſhe might have been ranked among the beſt of ſovereigns. She was the glory and happineſs of her people, and famous for her piety and charity, which was unlimited. Her reign may indeed be called bloodleſs, not one perſon having been executed, at leaſt beheaded for treaſon, during the whole courſe of it, which cannot be ſaid of any other reign ſince the time of Edward I. who died in 1307. In queen Anne the line of Stuarts terminated, whoſe misfortunes and miſconduct ſtand recorded as awful leſſons of inſtruction to all their ſucceſſors, and the people in general.

THE HOUSE OF HANOVER, OR LINE OF BRUNSWICK.

From the Acceſſion of GEORGE I. to that of GEORGE III.

GEORGE I.

George's arrival in England—He is proclaimed king—The diſgrace of the tories, and their excluſion from the royal favour—The impeachment of Bolingbroke and Ormond, who leave the kingdom—The firſt rebellion in favour of the Pretender—Battles of Preſton and Dumblain—The Pretender obliged to fly back to France—The earl of Oxford arraigned and acquitted—The Quadruple alliance—A victory obtained over the Spaniſh fleet—Vigo taken—South-ſea juggle—Gibralter beſieged—The king viſits his German dominions—Is taken ill on the road to Linden—His death, character, &c.

A. D. 1714. THE crown was now allotted to George I. elector of Brunſwick, a prince of the houſe of Hanover, not through hereditary right, but the election of a free and brave people; a title more honourable to a ſovereign than all the pride of royal anceſtry, or the boaſted claims of conqueſt. The right of this family to the throne is founded on that liberty they were choſen to preſerve; on that liberty which is the undoubted right of every ſubject: and while the ſovereign glories in being its protector, his throne will be fixed on the moſt ſolid foundation. The death of the queen, in a moment baffled all the expectations of the Jacobites; and their confuſion was completed by the diligence and activity of the lords juſtices, who had been appointed expreſsly by act of parliament, to adminiſter the government till the arrival of the ſucceſſor. Hence they found themſelves without any leader able to give conſiſtency to their deſigns, and force to their councils. Dr. Tenniſon, archbiſhop of Canterbury, no ſooner heard of the queen's death, than he went to the privy-council, and produced on inſtrument, wherein the following lords had been nominated by his electoral highneſs to the regency: the dukes of Shrewſbury, Somerſet, Bolton, Devonſhire, Kent, Argyle, Montroſe and Roxborough; the earls of Pembroke, Angleſea, Carliſle, Nottingham, Abingdon, Scarborough and Oxford; lord viſcount Townſend, lord Hallifax, and lord Cowper. Upon this orders were immediately iſſued for proclaiming king George in England, Scotland, and Ireland; which was performed the ſame day in London and Weſtminſter. The regency then appointed the earl of Dorſet to ſet out for Hanover with the news of his majeſty's acceſſion, and to attend him in his journey to England. They ſent the general officers in whom they could confide to their reſpective poſts; reinforced the garriſon of Portſmouth; and appointed Mr. Addiſon their ſecretary, in the room of Bolingbroke, who was obliged to ſtand at the door of the council-chamber with his bag of papers, and underwent various kinds of mortification. Every thing contributed to ſecure the ſucceſſion purſuant to act of parliament; and the duke of Marlborough's arrival in England on the day of the queen's death, gave real joy to all the friends of the proteſtant ſucceſſion. The parliament being continued after the queen's demiſe, agreeable to an act for that purpoſe, met in the afternoon of the day ſhe died, though it was Sunday; and four days after the lord chancellor, in the name of the regents, made a ſpeech to both houſes, informing them what ſteps they had taken reſpecting their new ſovereign, whereupon both houſes agreed to addreſſes of condolence, and congratulation; promiſing to ſupport his undoubted right to the crown, againſt the Pretender, and all other perſons whatſoever, and deſiring the king's ſpeedy preſence among them. Theſe addreſſes being preſented to his majeſty, he returned the following anſwer to the lords, and a ſimilar one to the commons: "I take this firſt opportunity to return you my hearty thanks for your addreſs, and the aſſurances you have given me therein. The zeal and unanimity you have ſhewn upon my acceſſion to the crown, are great encouragements to me, and I ſhall always eſteem the continuance of them as one of the greateſt bleſſings of my reign. No one can be more truly ſenſible than I am of the loſs ſuſtained by the death of the late queen, whoſe extraordinary piety and virtues ſo much endeared her to her people, and for whoſe memory I ſhall always have a particular regard. My beſt endeavours ſhall never be wanting to repair this loſs to the nation. I will make it my conſtant care to preſerve your religion, laws, and liberties inviolable, and to advance the honour and proſperity of my kingdoms. I am haſtening to you according to your deſire, ſo affectionately expreſſed in your addreſs." On the twenty-firſt of Auguſt the lords of the regency gave the royal aſſent to the bill, "for the ſupport of his majeſty's houſhold, and the dignity of the crown," and to ſuch other bills as were ready; the houſes then adjourned to the twenty-fifth, when they were further adjourned to the twenty-third of September, by command of the king. On the twenty-fourth of Auguſt, the remains of the late queen were magnificently interred in the chapel of Henry VII. in the ſame vault with thoſe of her late huſband, prince George of Denmark. On the twenty-eighth Mr. Murray arrived from Hanover, with orders for the council, particularly one for removing viſcount Bolingbroke from his poſt of ſecretary of ſtate; which was done on the thirty-firſt, not without ſome marks of diſpleaſure; the ſeals having been taken from him by the dukes of Shrewſbury and Somerſet, and the lord Cowper, three of the lords regents, and all the doors of his office ſealed and ſecured.

The king embarked for England on the ſixteenth of September, and arrived the next day at the Hope. On the eighteenth his majeſty and the prince landed at Greenwich in the evening, where the lords of the regency, and the earl of Northumberland, captain of the life-guards, received them. They walked to the king's houſe in the park, attended by many of the nobility, and immenſe crowds of rejoicing ſpectators; and on the twentieth of the month, the king made his public entry into London, with great magnificence, more than two hundred coaches of the nobility and gentry, each with ſix horſes preceding the royal carriage. A total change was now effected in the ſeveral departments of the ſtate. The great ſeal was intruſted to lord Cowper, the privy-ſeal to the earl of Wharton, and the government of Ireland to the earl of Sunderland. Lord Townſend and Mr. Stanhope were appointed ſecretaries of ſtate; the duke of Marlborough was made generaliſſimo, and the duke of Devonſhire ſteward of the king's houſhold; Mr. Poulteney was appointed ſecretary at war, and Mr. Walpole pay-maſter to the army and Chelſea hoſpital; the treaſury and admiralty were put into commiſſion, a new privy-council was appointed, and the prince royal was declared prince of Wales. All the corporations and the two univerſities preſented addreſſes of congratulation to his majeſty, who expreſſed great ſatisfaction upon receiving theſe inſtances of attachment to his perſon and government. He declared in council, that he was determined to maintain the churches of England and Scotland according to their eſtabliſhment by law; and this he conceived might be done, without abridging the proteſtant diſſenters of the indulgences they enjoyed under the toleration act; and further ſaid, that he would exert his utmoſt endeavours, effectually to ſecure the property of his ſubjects. In the beginning of October the princeſs of Wales, with her two daughters, the princeſſes Anne and Amelia, arrived in England; and on the twentieth of the ſame month, the king was crowned with great pomp and magnificence. Upon this occaſion, there were great demonſtrations of joy throughout the kingdom; but the diſſatisfaction of the tories, on their being deprived of their places, ſoon ſhewed itſelf, by their reviving the clamour of the church's danger, and great tumults were raiſed in different parts of the kingdom, where the cry was, "Down with the whigs! Sacheverel for ever!" Hence breaking of windows, and pulling down of meeting houſes, were again practiſed, as at the beginning of Sacheverel's mobs. During theſe commotions, the Pretender ſent a printed manifeſto to the dukes of Shrewſbury, Marlborough, Argyle, and many other noblemen. In a pamphlet written by Dr. Poland, the abſurdity of the allegations contained in the manifeſto was clearly expoſed. The copies of the repreſentation being delivered to the ſecretaries of ſtate, his majeſty refuſed an audience to the marquis de Lamberti, miniſter from the duke of Lorrain, being convinced that his maſter had countenanced the above proceeding.

On the ſeventeenth of March the new parliament met, wherein the king complained, that ſome men diſſaffected to his ſucceſſion, had repreſented his principles and the general tenor of his conduct, in a manner highly injurious; he adverted to the perplexed ſtate of public affairs, the interruption of commerce, and the enormous national debt: and expreſſed an earneſt hope, that ſuch perſons might be elected into parliament as had already proved themſelves zealouſly attached to the proteſtant religion, becauſe they would be the moſt likely to reſcue the ſtate from the embarraſſments in which it was then plunged.

A. D. 1715. The king on the twenty-firſt of March came to the houſe of peers, and delivered to the chancellor a written addreſs to both houſes, which was read to the following effect: his majeſty thanked his faithful ſubjects for the zeal they had manifeſted in defence of the proteſtant ſucceſſion: ſome conditions of the peace he obſerved, were not fully executed, and that the whole might, therefore, be conſidered as precarious till the preſent treaties could be guarantied by defenſive alliances; he obſerved, that the Pretender threatened again to interrupt the tranquillity of his dominions; that great part of the trade of the nation was already rendered impracticable, and that if the evil was not ſpeedily repaired, the deſtruction of the navigation and manufactures of England muſt enſue; and that ſince the ceſſation of arms, a very great addition had been made to the public debts. He then informed the commons, that the revenues formerly granted were ſo incumbered and alienated, that the produce of the funds was not equal to the ſupport of the civil government; and that ſince his people were ſo happy as to have a prince of Wales, an expence would be neceſſarily incurred, to which the nation had not been accuſtomed for many years; and theſe circumſtances, his majeſty hoped, would be taken under the ſerious conſideration of his faithful commons. He obſerved, that this being the firſt ſeſſion in his reign, all the ſtates of Europe impatiently waited for the reſult of the parliamentary deliberations; exhorted them not to permit party contentions and animoſities, to divert their attention from the common intereſt of their country; and concluded with aſſuring them, that the civil and religious conſtitution of church and ſtate, and the happineſs and proſperity of his people, ſhould be the invariable rule of his government, and the principal care of his whole life.

On the twenty-ſecond of April, in the morning, was a total eclipſe of the ſun, which had not happened in this kingdom for ſome centuries. The darkneſs was for a ſhort time ſo complete, that ſeveral ſtars appeared, and birds betook themſelves to rooſt. The eaſtern limb of the ſun was no ſooner covered, than the total darkneſs came on inſtantaneouſly, as did the light in the ſame manner return, when the moon left its weſtern limb. Obſervations were made on this extraordinary phænomenon by Mr. Whiſton, and other aſtronomers of equal eminence.

Soon after the ſitting of parliament they began to call the late miniſters of queen Anne to an account; which ſo alarmed lord Bolingbroke, who had taken his ſeat in the houſe of peers, that he rode poſt to Dover, and embarked for Calais. A ſecret committee was formed for conſidering the ſeveral papers relating to the negociations of peace, of which Walpole was made chairman. On the report of this committee being laid before the houſe, Bolingbroke and Oxford were impeached of high treaſon, and the earl of Strafford, one of the plenipotentiaries for the peace of Utrecht, of high crimes and miſdemeanors. It was thought Ormond's name being uſed as a ſignal for mobs and riots, contributed to haſten his impeachment; "High church and Ormond for ever!" being then as much the cry of the Jacobites and tory-mobs, as High church and Sacheverel had been before. It was, however, believed, that had he ſtaid he would have found favour; but taking the advice of his tory friends, he left the kingdom, and followed lord Bolingbroke to France. Upon this they were both attainted of high-treaſon, and a bill paſſed againſt them. The earl of Oxford, however, did not fly, but was committed to the cuſtody of the black rod, and then to the Tower. Mobs and tumults becoming now more frequent, an act was paſſed, declaring, that if any perſons to the number of twelve, unlawfully aſſembled, ſhould continue together one hour after being required to diſperſe by a juſtice of the peace, or other officer, and hearing the proclamation againſt riots read in public, they ſhould be deemed guilty of felony, without benefit of the clergy. This act ſtill remains in force under the title of the riot act.

His Majeſty having acquainted the parliament with the deſigns carried on in favour of the Pretender abroad and at home, addreſſes, expreſſive of loyalty and affection, were preſented by both houſes, the common-council of London, and the counties and corporations of England. The habeas corpus act was ſuſpended by parliament for ſix months. The duke of Powis, the earl of Jerſey, the lords Lanſdown and Dunbar, and other ſuſpicious perſons, were apprehended; the coaſts were ſtrictly guarded, and an expreſs ſent to the States general for diſpatching their forces agreeable to their engagement. The earl of Mar, who, at the deceaſe of queen Anne, was ſecretary of ſtate for Scotland, and was one of the firſt who made profeſſions of loyalty to king George, expecting to be powerfully reinforced from England, began to act openly in North Britain. But being diſappointed of the encouragement and ſupport that had been promiſed him, he retired in diſguſt to the place of his nativity, and urged by ambition and reſentment, reſolved to take an active part in the Pretender's intereſts. With ſuch unabating perſeverance did he proſecute his deſign, that on the ſixth of September the adventurer's ſtandard was erected in Aberdeen, Dundee, Perth, and ſeveral other towns; and about ſix thouſand men appeared in arms, determined to ſupport his claim. A ſtrong party of the rebels made an attempt to ſurprize the caſtle of Edinburgh; but by the prudence of colonel Stuart, governor of the fortreſs, they were repulſed with conſiderable loſs. About this time died Lewis XIV. king of France; and this event proved ſo alarming to the rebels, that great numbers of them were deſirous of poſtponing all further meaſures till the Pretender ſhould have landed in England; but encouraged by the hope that an inſurrection would be fomented in their favour in England, it was decided by a majority, that at all hazards the enterprize ſhould be attempted. The dukes of Argyle and Roxborough, the earl of Sunderland, the marquiſſes of Annandale and Tweedale, and ſeveral other Scottiſh noblemen, repaired to the north, in order to collect their vaſſals, and exert their utmoſt intereſt to oppoſe the Pretender; and the duke of Argyle was appointed commander in chief of all the forces in Scotland. The earl of Derwentwater and Mr. Forſter, with about two hundred and fifty more rebels, rendezvouzed at Plainfield, adjacent to Rothbury, where in a ſhort time they were joined by about thirty horſemen under lord Widdrington, and another party of horſemen from Scotland; they proclaimed the Pretender at Warkworth, Morpeth, and Hexham, with the uſual formalities; but upon the approach of general Carpenter, at the head of ſeveral regiments of cavalry and infantry, the enemy was thrown into ſuch conſternation, that they debated whether it would be moſt prudent to maintain their ground, or avoid an engagement. The former meaſure was ſtrongly recommended by Mr. Mackintoſh, who urged, that the longer the battle was poſtponed, the more formidable would become the power they had to encounter; but Forſter, their general, and the other principal officers, were for deferring the battle till they ſhould be joined by a ſtrong body of horſe: and therefore they marched to Longhoolm, Brampton, Penrith, Appleby, Kendal, Kirby, Dounſdale, and Lancaſter, and in moſt of theſe towns proclaimed the Pretender in the uſual manner. They were now, in their march towards Preſton, joined by about fifteen hundred men from Lancaſhire. Upon their arrival at Preſton, they endeavoured to fortify themſelves in the town, being apprized of the approach of the king's forces under the command of general Wills. Upon the arrival of the royaliſts, the proper diſpoſitions were made for ſecuring the ſeveral avenues to the town, and an attack was made in regular form. At firſt, the king's troops were greatly annoyed by the enemy's ſhot from the windows and tops of houſes, and other buildings; but the royaliſts having ſet fire to the houſes at each end of the town, and received a conſiderable reinforcement, the rebels were ſo diſpirited, that they ſolicited a ceſſation of hoſtilities, and preſently after ſubmitted at diſcretion. The royaliſts ſuſtained a loſs of about a hundred and thirty men; but the number of ſlain on the part of the rebels, is not known.

We muſt obſerve, that on Sunday the thirteenth of November, the very day when the rebels were ſubdued at Preſton, the duke of Argyle, with about four thouſand men, engaged the rebel army under the earl of Mar, conſiſting of about nine thouſand, at Sheriffmuir, or Sheriff-moor, near Dumblain, about four miles from Stirling. Various accounts are given of the battle, which was obſtinate and bloody; and both ſides claimed the victory. It is, however, certain, that the duke of Argyle, with the right of his army, ſoon routed the left of the enemy; but while he was purſuing them two miles with great ſlaughter, the right of the rebels defeated the left of the royal army; ſo that general Witham, their commander, flying full ſpeed to Stirling, gave out that all was loſt. The duke, on his return from the purſuit of the rebels, with that part of the army which had been victorious, inſtantly perceived his imprudence. Both armies continued to gaze at each other, neither of them caring to engage; and towards evening both ſides drew off. The earl of Mar retreated to Perth. The earl of Ilay, the duke of Argyle's brother, was in the action; he behaved with great intrepidity, and was wounded in the arm and ſide. About eight hundred of the rebels were killed, and many made priſoners, among whom were ſeveral gentlemen. The caſtle of Inverneſs, which had been in the poſſeſſion of Mar, was delivered up by lord Lovat, who had hitherto appeared in the intereſt of the Pretender. The marquis of Tullibardine left the earl to defend his own country; and many of the clans ſeeing no likelihood of their ſoon coming to a ſecond engagement, returned home. The Pretender had now the greateſt reaſon to be convinced of the vanity of his expectations, in imagining the whole country would riſe in his cauſe, yet, though his affairs were deſperate, he was ſo infatuated as to reſolve to hazard his perſon among his friends in Scotland. Paſſing therefore through France in diſguiſe, and embarking in a ſmall veſſel at Dunkirk, he landed at Peterhead on the twenty-ſecond of September, having in his train the marquis of Tinmouth, ſon of the duke of Berwick, and five other gentlemen. Thence he haſtened to Fetteroſſe, where the earl of Mar, and ſeveral noblemen and gentlemen met him.

This year terminated with a very ſevere froſt, which began towards the end of November, and continued till February; when the Thames, being frozen over, was covered with booths. Two whole oxen were roaſted upon it; and it abſolutely, from the number of people who reſorted thither, reſembled a fair.

A. D. 1716.

The Pretender marched to Perth, on the ninth of January, where he reviewed the forces that had been raiſed for his ſervice, and expreſſed great ſatisfaction at the Highland dreſs, which he had never before ſeen. Thence he proceeded to Scoon, where he publiſhed ſeveral proclamations, particularly one for a convention of the ſtates, and another for his coronation, and aſſumed other acts of royalty, which ended almoſt as ſoon as they commenced; for towards the end of the month, the duke of Argyle, aſſiſted by lieutenant-general Cadogan, and other general officers who were ſent down to him, and reinforced by a good train of artillery, and the Dutch troops lately landed, marched from Stirling to attack the rebels at Perth, who no longer expected aſſiſtance from France; upon his approach, they abandoned the place, and retired with the Pretender to Dundee, and from thence to Montroſe; where, finding they were cloſely purſued by the king's forces, on February the fourteenth, the Pretender, with the earls of Mar and Melfort, the lord Drummond, and ſome other chiefs, found means to make their eſcape in a French ſhip which lay there; ſoon after which the rebels diſperſed, ſome were taken priſoners, and others ſurrendered.

In order to avoid the Engliſh cruizers, the Pretender ſteered for the coaſt of Norway, and in five days time landed at Gravelin; and the chief of the rebel priſoners being conducted to London, the houſe of commons began to think of the moſt effectual method of proſecuting the offenders. They firſt expelled Mr. Forſter the houſe, and then impeached the earls of Derwentwater, Nithiſdale, Carnwath, and Wintoun, and the lords Widdrington, Nairn, and Kenmuir. Theſe noblemen being brought to the bar of the houſe of lords, heard the articles of impeachment read on the tenth of January, and were ordered to put in their anſwers on the ſixteenth. The impeachments being lodged, the lower houſe ordered a bill to be brought in to continue the ſuſpenſion of the Habeas Corpus act, ſix months longer; then they prepared another to attaint lord John Drummond, the earls of Mar and Linlithgow, and the marquis of Tullibardine. All the lords pleaded guilty except Widdrington, who deſired farther time to prepare for his defence; and the reſt received ſentence of death on the ninth of February. Orders were iſſued for the execution of Derwentwater, Kenmuir, and Nithiſdale; but his majeſty was pleaſed to grant a reſpite to the others till the ſeventh of March. Nithiſdale effected an eſcape in the apparel of a woman, his mother having contrived to ſupply him with the diſguiſe. On the twenty-fourth of February, Kenmuir and Derwentwater were beheaded upon Tower hill. The earl of Wintoun was brought to trial, and being found guilty, received ſentence of death. Of the remaining priſoners, a conſiderable number were found guilty, hanged, drawn, and quartered; and among theſe was William Paul, a clergyman, who in a ſpeech to the populace at the place of execution, declared himſelf "A ſincere and true member of the church of England, but not of the revolution, ſchiſmatical church, whoſe biſhops had abandoned the king, and ſhamefully given up their eccleſiaſtical rights, by ſubmitting to the unlawful, invalid, lay deprivations authorized by the prince of Orange;" yet it appears, that this man's fear of death got the better of his reſolution; for he preſented a petition, wherein he begged pardon of God, his king, and his country, and declared great ſorrow for his crime.

Apprehenſive that the approaching general election might give too much power to the Jacobites and tories, the miniſtry had recourſe to a very extraordinary expedient to fruſtrate their views. The duke of Devonſhire repreſented to the houſe of peers, "That triennial elections ſerved to keep up party diviſions; to raiſe and foment feuds in private families; to produce ruinous expences, and give occaſion to the cabals and intrigues of foreign princes; that it became the wiſdom of ſuch an auguſt aſſembly, to apply a remedy to an evil which might be attended with the moſt dangerous conſequences, eſpecially in the preſent temper of the nation, while the ſpirit of rebellion ſtill remained unconquered, and ſeemed only to wait for a freſh opportunity to diſplay itſelf with more uncontrouled violence than ever; that as the election of a new parliament, which by the triennial act was faſt approaching, was the moſt favourable juncture the Jacobites could expect, he thought it abſolutely neceſſary to deprive them of that reſource; and that for this purpoſe he begged leave to propoſe a bill for enlarging the continuance of parliament, and deſired that the houſe would conſent to its being read." He was ſeconded by the earls of Dorſet and Rockingham, the duke of Argyle, the lord Townſend, and other leaders of the whig party; but the motion was oppoſed by the tories, particularly by the earls of Abingdon, Nottingham, and Paulet. Many arguments were uſed on both ſides of the queſtion, which at length being put, the bill paſſed, and it obtained the royal aſſent. Soon after, the clauſe in the act of ſettlement, by which the ſovereign was not to leave the kingdom without conſent of parliament, was repealed; and his majeſty having conſtituted the prince of Wales guardian of the realm during his abſence, on the ſeventh of July ſet out for his German dominions.

Notwithſtanding the rebellion was happily cruſhed, the ſpirit of it ſtill remained, and diſcovered itſelf in licentious mobs and tumults, in which the diſorderly multitude readily engaged. To ſtem the torrent of thoſe riots, the whigs, and ſuch who were well affected to the Hanoverian ſucceſſion, began even in the laſt reign to form themſelves into clubs, which met at ſeveral public houſes in the city and ſuburbs, then called Mug-houſes, from the veſſels uſed there. After his majeſty's acceſſion, theſe clubs were not only kept up but increaſed. One of the moſt famous of the mug-houſes was the Roebuck in Cheapſide; and that in Saliſbury court became ſo from the following incident. The company there, upon ſome occaſion having given extraordinary demonſtrations of their loyalty, the Jacobite mob were ſo enraged, that they attacked the mug-houſe, which was kept by one Mr. Read, and would have demoliſhed it, had not the company ſent for a reinforcement from the mug-houſe in Taviſtock-ſtreet. Upon their arrival, the mob was put to flight; but on the twenty-third, one Vaughan perſuaded the mob to attack the mug-houſe again, in order to revenge their late affront. They agreed, and followed him with loud huzzas of high church and Ormond, and down with the mug-houſes. Read ordered them to keep off, or he would fire among them; but they diſregarding him, he put his threats in execution, and killed Vaughan on the ſpot; for which he was afterwards tried and acquitted. The mob ſtill continuing their outrages, a party of the guards were ſent for. Five of the rioters were taken, who being tried and found guilty, were hanged at the end of Saliſbury court; and this put an end to thoſe tumults, which had for a conſiderable time thrown the capital into the utmoſt confuſion and diſorder.

A. D. 1717. During his majeſty's abſence, the triple alliance was ſigned between Great Britain, France, and the United Provinces. The king returned in January; and ſoon after the nation was alarmed with an intended invaſion by Charles XII. of Sweden in favour of the Pretender, which his majeſty communicated to the council; but Charles being ſoon after ſhot by a cannon ball before Frederick-ſhall, an end was put to all the deſigns of the Swedes againſt England. In the mean time, his majeſty ſent to demand of the commons an extraordinary ſupply, the better to enable him to ſecure his kingdoms againſt the danger with which they were threatened from Sweden; and after long and warm debates, two hundred and fifty thouſand pounds were granted for this purpoſe; but it was carried only by a majority of four voices. On the concluſion of this debate, there was almoſt a total change in the miniſtry. Mr. Stanhope was raiſed to the office of firſt lord of the treaſury, and chancellor of the exchequer; the earl of Sunderland and Mr. Addiſon were appointed ſecretaries of ſtate: the office of ſecretary at war was given to Mr. Craggs; the earl of Berkeley was appointed firſt lord of the admiralty, on the reſignation of the earl of Orford; the viceroyſhip of Ireland was given to the duke of Bolton, whom the duke of Newcaſtle ſucceeded in his office of lord-chamberlain. Proceedings had been already begun with regard to a reduction of the national debt, which was comprehended under the two heads of redeemable and irredeemable incumbrances. The firſt had been contracted with a redeemable intereſt, and theſe the public had a right to diſcharge; the others conſiſted of longer and ſhorter annuities, granted for a greater or leſs number of years, which could not be altered without the conſent of the proprietors. Mr. Robert Walpole, when at the head of the treaſury, had projected a ſcheme for leſſening the intereſt, and paying the capital of theſe national debts. He propoſed in the houſe of commons to reduce the intereſt of the redeemable funds, and offer an alternative to the proprietors of annuities. This plan had met with approbation; but when he reſigned, ſome alterations were made which were diſpleaſing to him; and when a debate enſued, Mr. Stanhope and Mr. Walpole endeavoured to criminate each other; by which it ſeemed evident, that they had practiſed the ſelling places and reverſions. This diſcovery, which one would have imagined ſhould have cauſed ſuch an enquiry as might have ended in the puniſhment of both the parties, had a very different effect; the houſe ſeemed anxious that the whole matter ſhould be buried in oblivion; and the gentlemen "gave their word and honour to the ſpeaker, that their reſentment ſhould be carried no farther."

A petition from the earl of Oxford, who had been now confined near two years in the Tower, was preſented to the houſe of lords, "praying that his impriſonment might not be indefinite." The tory lords aſſerted, that the impeachment was determined, and all proceedings againſt him ended by the prorogation of parliament; but this being put to the vote, was carried in the negative. Weſtminſter hall being prepared for his trial, and the lord-chancellor Cowper being appointed lord high-ſteward, the priſoner, on June the twenty-fourth, was brought from the Tower by water, and conducted to the bar; when Mr. Hampden, one of the managers for the commons, recapitulated the charge againſt the earl in a long ſpeech. Sir Joſeph Jekyll was proceeding to make good the firſt article; but lord Harcourt having made a motion previous thereto, 'that the commons be not permitted to proceed, in order to make good the articles againſt the earl of Oxford for high crimes and miſdemeanors, till judgment be firſt given upon the articles for high treaſon;' which after a long debate, was carried in the affirmative; there aroſe upon this a difference between the two houſes, the commons being reſolved to proceed in their own way, and the lords as ſtrenuouſly adhering to theirs. At laſt, in the beginning of July, the lords proceeded to the trial; and three proclamations were made for the accuſers of the earl of Oxford to appear, and make good the articles of impeachment againſt him; but nobody appearing, his lordſhip was, by the unanimous advice of all the peers preſent, diſcharged of the high crimes and miſdemeanors, as well as of high-treaſon. However, the commons addreſſed the king to except the earl of Oxford out of the act of grace, with which his majeſty complied. This act being ready, the king went to the houſe of peers, and having given his aſſent to ſeveral bills, cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which, among other things, he expreſſed his hope, that thoſe of his ſubjects who ſhould be reſtored to their liberty by the act of grace, would make a proper uſe of the indulgence for their own and the public advantage. After ſome diſputes between the northern powers, conferences were opened between the emperor, France, and Holland; in conſequence of which the famous quadruple alliance took place, before the cloſe of the next year.

November the ſecond, the princeſs of Wales was brought to-bed of a prince, who was baptized on the twenty-eighth of the ſame month, by the name of George-William, and died ſoon afterwards, the king and the duke of Newcaſtle being godfathers, and the ducheſs of St. Albans godmother. By ſome circumſtance or other, after the chriſtening was over, his royal highneſs the prince of Wales fell under his majeſty's diſpleaſure, inſomuch that he was ordered to leave St. James's; which he did, and went and reſided at Leiceſter houſe, with the princeſs his conſort. The young princeſſes, and the young prince, remained at St. James's with his majeſty; orders having been given that her royal highneſs might come and ſee them as often as ſhe would. The prince retired with the princeſs to a houſe belonging to the earl of Grantham; and notice was given to all peers, peereſſes, privy-counſellors and their wives, that if "they viſited the prince and princeſs, they ſhould forbear coming into his majeſty's preſence." The conſequence was, that thoſe who held offices under the king or prince, were left to their choice; and St. James's of courſe was ſeldom viſited by the prince's ſervants.

As ſoon as the king met his parliament in November, he informed them, that ſince the beginning of the laſt ſeſſion, he had reduced his army to nearly the half of its number at the commencement of the former ſeſſion. High debates aroſe in the houſe of commons, on the number of troops that ought to be ſupplied. Sir William Wyndham, Mr. Shippen, and Mr. Walpole, contended that twelve thouſand men were ſufficient; while Mr. Craggs and others were for voting ſixteen thouſand. At this period lord-chancellor Cowper, who had been promoted to the dignity of an earl, reſigned the great ſeal; which after being put in commiſſion for ſome time, was given to lord Parker. The earl of Sunderland was appointed preſident of the council, and firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury. The earl of Holderneſſe was placed at the head of the board of trade. The lord Stanhope and Mr. Craggs were appointed ſecretaries of ſtate; and the lords Stanhope and Cadogan were advanced to the peerage ſhortly after the above changes.

Philip, the Spaniſh monarch, continued his warlike preparations, and equipped a formidable fleet, which early in the month of July ſailed from Barcelona towards Italy, but the deſtination of this armament was kept a profound ſecret. On the other hand, the king of England having fitted out a powerful ſquadron, the marquis de Monteleone, the Spaniſh ambaſſador, preſented a memorial to the miniſtry, importing, that ſo powerful an armament in a time of peace, could not but give offence to the king his maſter, and tend to diſturb the harmony that ſubſiſted between the crowns of Spain and England. In reply to this memorial, the Engliſh monarch obſerved that he did not wiſh to conceal the deſign with which he had fitted out a fleet; and declared, that his intention was to ſend a powerful ſquadron into the Mediterranean under the command of admiral Byng, in order to protect the neutrality of Italy. In the mean time, the negociations of the miniſters of France and Spain, brought about the quadruple alliance between Great-Britain, France, the emperor, and the States-general. It was ſtipulated by this famous treaty, that the king of Spain ſhould reſtore to the emperor, within two months after the ratification of the articles, the kingdom of Sardinia, and relinquiſh all claim to that iſland, as well as the dominions of the emperor in Italy and the Netherlands; that he ſhould conſent to the emperor's being put in poſſeſſion of Sicily, and renounce all claim to the reverſion of that kingdom in favour of the crown of Spain, as ſettled by the treaty of Utrecht; conditionally, however, of having Sardinia in exchange; that the emperor ſhould for himſelf, his heirs and ſucceſſors, abandon all pretenſions to any territories, of which, by the treaty of Utrecht, the king of Spain was acknowledged rightful poſſeſſor; that he ſhould recognize Philip as lawful king of Spain and the Indies; that the duchies of Parma, Tuſcany, and Placentia, ſhould be conſidered as male fiefs of the empire; and that, in default of male heirs, they ſhould devolve to the queen of Spain's eldeſt ſon; but it was provided, that neither of the above duchies ſhould ever be poſſeſſed by a prince in actual poſſeſſion of the Spaniſh crown; and that the king of Spain ſhould not aſſume the guardianſhip of the prince, to whom the duchies were to deſcend; that within two months after the ratification of the treaty, the king of Sicily ſhould reſtore that kingdom to the emperor; but that in return, the emperor ſhould give the king of Sicily poſſeſſion of the iſland of Sardinia, which he ſhould enjoy with the title of king, on condition that in default of male heirs, the right of reverſion ſhould be reſerved to the crown of Spain; that the kings of Spain and Sicily ſhould be allowed three months to determine, whether they would accede to the articles of the treaty; but that if, in oppoſition to the general wiſhes of Europe, they ſhould continue refractory, the mediating powers ſhould unite their ſtrength to compel their ſubmiſſion; that if any one of the mediators ſhould be attacked on account of the ſuccours lent to the emperor, the others ſhould declare war againſt the aſſailant, and not lay down their arms till the emperor ſhould be put in poſſeſſion of Sicily, and firmly eſtabliſhed in the enjoyment of his dominions in Italy; that if the terms propoſed by the allies ſhould be accepted by either of the kings, he ſhould unite with the mediators in order to enforce the compliance of the other; and to prove that juſtice and the peace of Europe were the only objects of the preſent treaty, it was expreſsly ſtipulated, that as ſoon as the emperor ſhould be put in poſſeſſion of Sicily, he ſhould relinquiſh all pretenſion to Spain and the Indies, whether king Philip acceded or not, inaſmuch as the guarantee of the mediatorial powers, would be, to his Imperial majeſty, a ſecurity for Sicily, the Netherlands, and the Italian dominions, equal to the renunciations of Philip.

Remonſtrance and intreaty proving equally ineffectual, the king of Great Britain reſolved to compel the Spaniſh monarch to comply with the conditions of the treaty. On the fourth of June Sir George Byng ſailed from Spithead, with an armament conſiſting of twenty ſhips of the line, two fire-ſhips, and two bomb-veſſels. On the thirtieth of the ſame month he arrived at St. Vincent's. Paſſing by Gibraltar, he was joined by vice-admiral Cornwall, with the Argyle and Charles galley. He then ſailed for Minorca, and relieved the garriſon of Port Mahon. After this, he directed his courſe towards Naples, where he arrived on the firſt of Auguſt; and the Neapolitans, who were under the moſt terrible apprehenſions of a Spaniſh invaſion, hailed him as their deliverer. The admiral had an interview with count Daun, the viceroy, who treated him in a moſt honourable and reſpectful manner, and communicated to him the following very important intelligence: that a Spaniſh army, amounting to thirty thouſand men, under the command of the marquis de Lede, had effected a landing in Sicily, reduced Palermo and Meſſina, and was then employed in beſieging the laſt mentioned city; that unleſs ſpeedy relief was afforded, the Piedmonteſe garriſon would be under the neceſſity of ſurrendering; that an alliance was negociating between the emperor and the king of Sicily; and that the latter had ſolicited the aſſiſtance of the Imperial army, offering the citadel of Meſſina for their reception. Having received this information, Sir George departed from Naples with all poſſible expedition, taking with him two thouſand German troops, under the command of general Wetzel, as a reinforcement to the citadel; and he arrived within ſight of the Faro, off Meſſina, on the ninth of Auguſt.

The day previous to the arrival of the Engliſh ſquadron, the Spaniſh fleet had ſailed from the harbour of Meſſina; and Byng imagining they had retired to Malta, proceeded towards Meſſina, in order to encourage and reinforce the garriſon in the citadel; but in doubling the Faro, he deſcried two Spaniſh ſcouts, and learnt from the people of a felucca from the Calabrian ſhore, that they had ſeen the Spaniſh fleet laying to in the order of battle. Upon this the admiral detached general Wetzel, with the German troops, to Reggio, under the convoy of two men of war. Paſſing through the Faro, the admiral ſailed in purſuit of the Spaniſh ſcouts; and before noon he deſcried the main fleet, conſiſting of twenty-ſeven ſail, excluſive of two fire-ſhips, four bomb-veſſels, and ſeven gallies, drawn up in line of battle. Don Antonio de Caſtaneta had the chief command of the Spaniſh fleet, in which were the four rear-admirals, Mari, Chacon, Guevara, and Cammock. Upon the appearance of the Engliſh fleet, the enemy ſtood away large, but continued to preſerve the order of battle; and they were purſued till evening. The next morning, rear-admiral Mari, with ſix men of war, the fire and ſtore-ſhips, bomb-ketches and gallies, ſeparated from the main fleet, and ſteered for the coaſt of Sicily. Captain Walton, with ſix ſhips, was diſpatched in purſuit of Mari, with whom he ſoon engaged. The Engliſh admiral purſued the main fleet, and the battle commenced about ten o'clock. The Spaniards made a running fight; and though the admirals behaved with great reſolution, they were all taken except Cammock, who eſcaped to Malta with three ſhips of war and three frigates. In this action, captain Haddock, of the Grafton, diſplayed repeated inſtances of good conduct and bravery. His ſhip being a remarkably quick ſailer, he made it a point to attack the headmoſt of the enemy. When he had diſabled one ſhip, he left it to be attacked by the Engliſh that followed, and then directed his force againſt another headmoſt veſſel in the enemy's line. Sir George received a letter on the eighteenth from Captain Walton, mentioning, that he had made capture of four Spaniſh men of war, a bomb-ketch, and a veſſel laden with arms, and that he had burnt four ſhips of war, a bomb-veſſel, and a fire-ſhip. Notwithſtanding this defeat, the Spaniards continued to proſecute the ſiege of Meſſina with ſuch vigour, that on the twenty-ninth of September the governor capitulated, and the garriſon was tranſported to Syracuſe and Reggio. The emperor and the duke of Savoy now concluded a treaty at Vienna, according to which they were to form an army for the conqueſt of Sardinia in behalf of the duke, who engaged to evacuate Sicily; but it was ſtipulated that, until his forces could be removed from that iſland, they ſhould act in conjunction with the German troops againſt the common enemy. The Engliſh admiral continued to aſſiſt the imperial forces in Sicily, during the greateſt part of the winter, by clearing the ſeas of the Spaniards, and preſerving a communication between the German troops and the Calabrian ſhore, from whence they were ſupplied with proviſions. Having held a conference with the viceroy of Naples, and the other Imperial general, reſpecting the operations of the enſuing campaign, Sir George ſailed for Mahon in order to refit his ſhips, intending to take the ſea early in the ſpring. The admiral's ſon remained at Naples to tranſact buſineſs with the viceroy, and tranſmit to England accounts of all matters of conſequence.

On the eleventh of December the parliament having met, earl Stanhope offered to the houſe of lords a bill for ſtrengthening the proteſtant intereſt, by repealing the acts againſt occaſional conformity, and the ſchiſm bills which had been enacted at the end of the laſt reign. The tory lords were aſtoniſhed at this motion, for which they were unprepared. The archbiſhop of Canterbury repreſented thoſe acts as the main bulwarks of the Engliſh church, and that it was needleſs to repeal them, ſince they had not been put in force: but Dr. Hoadly, biſhop of Bangor, proved, that they were perſecuting laws; and that the arguments in juſtification of them, would ſupport all the perſecutions maintained by the heathens, and even the popiſh inquiſition. In ſhort, this bill, after long debates, paſſed both houſes, and received the royal aſſent the year after.

A. D. 1719. Alberoni now concerted a plan for invading England; the duke of Ormond going to Madrid, had ſeveral conferences with the Spaniſh miniſter on this ſubject. In the mean time the Pretender quitted Rome, and arrived at Madrid, where he was treated as king of Great Britain. Ten ſhips of war and ſeveral tranſports, were prepared, and took on board ſix thouſand troops, and arms for twelve thouſand men. This fleet was commanded by the duke of Ormond, who had the title of captain-general of the forces of his moſt Catholic majeſty; and was furniſhed with a declaration in the name of that monarch, importing, that, for many good reaſons, he had ſent part of his land and ſea forces into England and Scotland, to act as auxiliaries to king James: that what had induced him to take this ſtep, was the certain intelligence he had received that many inhabitants of the two kingdoms, notwithſtanding their ſtrong inclination to acknowledge that prince for their ſovereign, durſt not openly declare for him, becauſe they did not ſee him ſupported by any of the ſtates of Europe, that had either the will or power to aſſiſt him: that in order to remove this difficulty, he had declared he was determined to exert his utmoſt endeavours for his reſtoration to the throne of a kingdom, which he ſaid belonged to him by undoubted right: that he hoped Providence would favour ſo juſt a cauſe: but that the fear of ill ſucceſs might not deter any perſon from openly eſpouſing his intereſt, he promiſed a ſafe retreat in his dominions, to all ſuch as, by their concern in this affair, might be obliged to leave their native country. Advice of this intended invaſion being tranſmitted from France to England, meaſures were taken to defeat the ſcheme. The king iſſued a proclamation, offering a reward for the apprehenſion of the duke of Ormond, or any gentleman embarked in the expedition. A ſtrong fleet was fitted out to oppoſe the invaſion; two thouſand men were demanded of the States General, and troops were aſſembled in the northern and weſtern parts of the kingdom. Parliament promiſed to ſupport the king againſt all his enemies, and aſſured him, that they would vote the neceſſary ſums for the payment of an additional force by ſea and land. The regent of France offered twenty battalions; but theſe were not accepted, as the Dutch had ſent two thouſand men, and ſix battalions of Imperialiſts were landed from the Auſtrian Netherlands. The duke of Ormond ſailed from Cadiz, but a violent ſtorm diſperſing his fleet, the boaſted expedition was fruſtrated; yet two frigates from Port-paſſage, with the earls Mariſchal and Seaforth, the marquis of Tullibardine, ſeveral officers, with three hundred Spaniards, and arms for two thouſand men, made the coaſt of Scotland, and took poſſeſſion of Donan, when they were joined by about ſixteen hundred Highlanders. They were oppoſed by a ſmall body of forces from Inverneſs, under the command of general Wightman. They gained poſſeſſion of the paſs at Glenſhiel; but upon the approach of the royaliſts, they retired to the paſs at Strachell, where they determined to defend themſelves. Being repeatedly attacked in the courſe of the day, and driven from one eminence to another, they became entirely hopeleſs, and wholly diſperſed in the night; and on the following day, the Spaniards ſurrendered themſelves as priſoners of war. The earls of Mariſchal and Seaforth, the marquis of Tullibardine, and ſome other officers, retired to one of the weſtern iſles, where they waited for an opportunity of eſcaping to the continent with the utmoſt impatience.

To compenſate this inſult, an expedition was undertaken againſt Spain, in which the lord Cobham, with the land forces, and vice-admiral Mighels, with the fleet, took Vigo, and Pont a-Vedre; in which places, they found ſome braſs artillery, ſmall arms and military ſtores, with which they returned to England. The ill ſucceſs of the Spaniards now induced them to wiſh for peace; and the king of Spain was at laſt contented to ſign the Quadruple alliance. The king having thus, with equal deliberation and vigour, uſed every precaution which his ſagacity could ſuggeſt, for ſecuring himſelf in the poſſeſſion of the crown, the parliament turned to an object of great importance; that of ſecuring the dependency of the Iriſh parliament upon that of Great Britain. Maurice Anneſley had appealed from a decree of the houſe of peers in Ireland, to the houſe of lords in England; and they having reverſed the appeal, the Britiſh peers ordered the barons of the exchequer in Ireland to put Mr. Anneſley in poſſeſſion of the lands he had loſt by the decree in that kingdom. This order the barons obeyed: but the Iriſh houſe of lords paſſed a vote againſt them, for attempting to diminiſh their juſt privileges, and ordered the barons to be taken under the cuſtody of the Black rod. The houſe of peers in England, on the other hand reſolved, that the barons of the exchequer in Ireland, had behaved with courage and fidelity, and a bill was prepared, by which the Iriſh houſe of lords was deprived of the right of final juriſdiction. This was, however, oppoſed in both houſes. In the lower houſe Mr. Pitt maintained, that it would increaſe the power of the Engliſh peers, already too great, and Mr. Hungerford proved, that the Iriſh lords had always exerciſed their power of finally deciding cauſes. The duke of Leeds alſo exerted himſelf againſt the bill; but notwithſtanding all oppoſition, it was carried by a great majority, and received the royal aſſent. About this time his majeſty went to Hanover, and concluded a treaty of peace with Ulrica, queen of Sweden, by which the duchies of Bremen and Verden were ceded to the houſe of Hanover for ever; and at the ſame time the king mediated a peace between Sweden, Denmark, Ruſſia and Poland. The Czar, however, rejected this mediation, ſo anxious was he to purſue his ſchemes of conqueſt. He ſent a fleet, and landed fifteen thouſand men in Sweden, who committed horrid devaſtations; but Sir John Norris commanding the Britiſh ſquadron in the Swediſh ſeas, the Czar recalled his fleet, in fear of fatal conſequences. In November, John Matthews, a printer, was executed at Tyburn, for printing and publiſhing a treaſonable libel, entitled, Vox populi, vox Dei, which aſſerted the Pretender's right to the crown of theſe realms.

A. D. 1720. About this time England ſuffered a ſevere blow from the mean ſpirit of avarice and chicanery, with which all ranks of people were affected by the South Sea ſcheme, though juſt before France had been deluded by another which nearly reſembled it; where John Law, a Scotchman, had erected the Miſſiſſippi company, which at firſt promiſed the people immenſe wealth, but ended in their diſtreſs and the ruin of many. The South Sea ſcheme in England was no leſs fatal. In order to explain this in as conciſe a manner as poſſible, it muſt be obſerved, that the government, ever ſince the revolution, were conſtrained to borrow money from different companies of merchants, and among the reſt from the South Sea company. In 1716, government was indebted to them about nine millions and a half, for which an intereſt of ſix per cent. was paid. As this was not the only company to which the government was debtor, and paid large annual intereſt, Sir Robert Walpole formed the deſign of leſſening theſe national debts, by giving the ſeveral companies the alternative either of accepting five per cent. for their money, or of being paid their principal. The ſeveral companies choſe rather to accept of this diminiſhed intereſt than any of their capital; and the South Sea company having made up their debt to the government ten millions, annually received, inſtead of ſix hundred thouſand pounds, as uſual, only five hundred thouſand.

While things were in this ſituation, Sir John Blount, who had been bred a ſcrivener, and was a man of great art, propoſed to the miniſtry, in the name of the South Sea company, to purchaſe all the debts of the different companies, and thus become the principal creditor of the ſtate, upon terms extremely advantageous to government. The parliament met, ſoon after the king returned from Hanover, and they had not ſat long, when the South Sea company laid before them their projected plan. After much debate and conteſt, it was determined in favour of the South Sea ſcheme, and their propoſals were accepted on the firſt of February, 1719-20. An act afterwards paſſed both houſes for that purpoſe, which received the royal aſſent in April following. However honeſtly the abovementioned ſcheme might have been deſigned by ſome, the execution of it was attended with amazing and fatal conſequences, to the enriching of a few, and the impoveriſhing of thouſands; for it became a mere bubble and decoy for artful and cunning men to catch the unwary, but covetous adventurers. The infatuation was general, and nothing was now minded but the buſineſs of ſtock-jobbing. Exchange-alley, where theſe affairs were tranſacted, was in a continual hurry, where crowds of all ranks and qualities daily reſorted. The deſperate, who ventured firſt, were generally gainers; whilſt the wiſer and more ſedate, who came in later, were many of them great ſufferers. Stock roſe gradually to a prodigious height; to three hundred and ten pounds for one hundred pounds, before the bill had the royal aſſent, and in a few days to three hundred and forty, then to four hundred, and before the end of May to five hundred. In ſhort, what by the artifices of the managers, and the credulity of the people, through the eagerneſs of increaſing their fortunes, by the ſecond of June it got up to eight hundred and ninety, and continued riſing and falling, till it amounted to above a thouſand. A ſpirit of gambling thus prevailing in the nation, many projects were ſet on foot, ſome whimſical enough, which were deſervedly called bubbles, and grew up from the corruption of the grand bubble, or South Sea ſtock. They were near one hundred in number, and it was reckoned, that almoſt a million and a half was won or loſt in them. During the greater part of theſe tranſactions, the king was at Hanover. Such a number of opulent families had been reduced, that public credit received a ſevere ſhock: complaints and murmurings were every where heard, ſo that the whole nation was in a ferment. Repeated expreſſes were ſent to the king, requeſting his return; in conſequence of which he abridged his ſtay in Germany, and arrived in England in November. On the meeting of parliament, he acquainted the houſe with his negociations on the continent; lamented that the public credit at home had been ſo greatly injured in his abſence, and intreated them, "to conſider of the moſt effectual and ſpeedy methods to reſtore and ſecure the credit of the nation." Upon this an enquiry was made into the fraudulent execution of the South Sea act; and while this matter was in agitation, Mr. Knight, treaſurer of the company, and Sir John Blount, who had been principally concerned in the ſcheme, quitted the kingdom. In the end, the parliament applied to the relief of the ſufferers the eſtates of the ſub-governor, deputy-governor, directors, &c. only allowing each ſuch part as they thought proper; and John Aiſlabie, Eſq; chancellor of the exchequer, met with the ſame fate. They were alſo incapacitated from ſitting or voting in either houſe of parliament, or from holding any office or place of truſt under his majeſty, his heirs or ſucceſſors. The act againſt the directors received the royal aſſent on the twenty-ninth of July, and on the tenth of Auguſt the king paſſed the bill for reſtoring the public credit, and prorogued the parliament. The hand Mr. Robert Walpole had in ſettling this diſtracted affair, and reſtoring the credit of the nation, brought him into full favour again. He was made chancellor of the exchequer, and firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury. About two years afterwards, he was made knight of the Bath, and then of the Garter, and continued prime miniſter to the end of this reign and fifteen ſucceeding years.

A. D. 1721.

Happily now a reconciliation between the royal family was effected, in conſequence of which the prince of Wales attended at St. James's, and held a conference with the king, and on his return was attended by a party of the yeomen of the guards, and of the horſe-guards, after which the foot-guards began to do duty at Leiceſter-houſe. On the fifteenth of April the princeſs of Wales was delivered of a ſon, who was baptized by the name of William Auguſtus, and was afterwards created duke of Cumberland, whoſe name will be long dear to Engliſhmen. In the laſt ſeſſion a bill had been debated in the houſe of lords, for the more effectual ſuppreſſing of blaſphemy and profaneneſs. There was certainly too much occaſion for ſuch a bill: but as it chiefly tended to ſet up a kind of inquiſition on men's conſciences with regard to ſome ſpeculative points, wherein Chriſtians differ, it met with ſuch a rational oppoſition that it fell to the ground.

A. D. 1722.

His majeſty informed both houſes, that a conſpiracy was carrying on in favour of the Pretender, which had threatened the utmoſt danger to his kingdoms: he therefore hoped, that the members would exert themſelves with more than ordinary zeal and vigour; for that a perfect union among all who wiſhed well to the preſent eſtabliſhment, was become abſolutely neceſſary. This ſpeech was anſwered by addreſſes, expreſſive of zeal and loyalty; and a bill was brought in and paſſed, for the ſuſpenſion of the Habeas Corpus act for a year. As a proof of the reality of the abovementioned conſpiracy, the king ſent to the houſe of peers, the original and printed copy of a declaration, dated at Lucca on the twentieth of September, and ſigned by the Pretender. In this paper the Pretender, who thought proper to aſſume the title of king James, affected to talk of the late violation of the freedom of elections; conſpiracies invented to give a colour to new oppreſſions; infamous informers; and the ſtate of the proſcription in which he ſuppoſed every honeſt man to be. He then very gravely propoſed, that if king George would reſign to him the throne of Great Britain, he would in return, beſtow upon him the title of king in his native dominions, and invite all other ſtates to confirm it. He likewiſe promiſed to ſecure the crown of England to king George, or his deſcendants, whenever it ſhould come to them by hereditary right. The lords came to a reſolution, that the above-mentioned declaration was a falſe, ſcandalous, and traiterous libel, and ordered it to be burnt at the Royal Exchange, and in this reſolution the commons concurred; and both houſes joined in an addreſs, expreſſive of their aſtoniſhment at the inſolence of the Pretender, and their readineſs to ſupport the king with their lives and fortunes. The commons now prepared a bill for raiſing one hundred thouſand pounds on the real and perſonal eſtates of Papiſts, towards defraying the expences incident on the late rebellion. The friends of the Roman catholics oppoſed this bill as a ſpecies of perſecution; but it paſſed both houſes, and received the royal aſſent; as did likewiſe a bill to oblige perſons to regiſter their names and real eſtates, who refuſed to take the oaths appointed for the ſecurity of the king's perſon and government.

On the twenty-firſt of November, Chriſtopher Layer, Eſq; a counſellor of the Temple, was brought to his trial in the court of King's Bench, and being convicted of having enliſted men for the Pretender's ſervice, in order to ſtir up a rebellion, received ſentence of death. He was repeatedly reprieved, and examined by a committee of the houſe of commons, in expectation that he would have made a diſcovery; but he was at length executed at Tyburn, and his head fixed on Temple-bar. Mr. Pulteney, chairman of the committee of the houſe of commons, reported, that, from the examination of Layer and others, it had appeared, "that a deſign had been formed by perſons of figure and diſtinction at home, for placing the Pretender on the throne: that his firſt intention was to have procured a body of foreign troops, to invade the kingdom at the time of the late elections; but the conſpirators being diſappointed in this expectation, reſolved to make an attempt at the time when it was generally believed the king intended to go to Hanover, by the help of ſuch officers and ſoldiers as could paſs into England unobſerved from abroad, under the command of the late duke of Ormond, who was to have landed in the river with a great quantity of arms, provided in Spain for that purpoſe; at which time the Tower was to have been ſeized: that this ſcheme being defeated by the vigorous meaſures of the government, they deferred their enterprize till the breaking up of the camp; and in the mean time, employed their agents to corrupt and ſeduce the officers and ſoldiers of the army; that the late duke of Ormond, the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Orrery, the lords North and Grey, and the biſhop of Rocheſter, were concerned in this conſpiracy: that their agents were Chriſtopher Layer and John Plunket, (who travelled with him to Rome) Dennis Kelly, George Kelly, and Thomas Carte, a nonjuring clergyman, Neynoe, an Iriſh prieſt, and others." The commons on the reading the report, reſolved, that "a deteſtable and horrid conſpiracy had been formed and carried on by perſons of diſtinction at home, and their agents and inſtruments, in conjunction with traitors abroad, for raiſing a rebellion, ſeizing the Tower and city of London, laying violent hands on the perſon of his moſt ſacred majeſty and the prince of Wales, and to place a popiſh Pretender on the throne, with a view to ſubvert the eſtabliſhment in church and ſtate." Hereupon the parliament paſſed bills, for inflicting pains and penalties on biſhop Atterbury, Kelly, and Plunket; in conſequence of which, the firſt was baniſhed, and the two others impriſoned for life. Neynoe was drowned in attempting to make his eſcape from the houſe of the king's meſſenger, which was ſituated on the banks of the Thames. The ſon of Sir Robert Walpole was now created a peer in conſideration of the ſervices of his father; the biſhop of Rocheſter was ſent to the continent, and the king, having appointed a regency, accompanied by the lords Carteret and Townſend, ſecretaries of ſtate, ſet out for his dominions in Germany.

About this time Ireland was a little diſturbed by an incident which ſeems to have been miſunderſtood by the people of that kingdom. William Wood had obtained a patent for furniſhing Ireland with copper coin, in which it was deficient. When this money came to be circulated, a violent clamour was raiſed againſt it. The parliament of that kingdom, which met on the fifth day of September, reſolved, that the importing and uttering copper half-pence and farthings by virtue of Wood's patent, would be prejudicial to the revenue, deſtructive of trade, and of dangerous conſequence to the rights of the ſubject: that the ſtate of the nation had been miſrepreſented, in order to obtain the patent: that the halfpence wanted weight; that, even if the patent had been complied with, there would have been a loſs to the nation of a hundred and fifty per cent: and that granting the power of coinage to a private perſon had ever been highly prejudicial to the kingdom; and would, at all times, be of dangerous conſequence. Addreſſes from both houſes were preſented to the king on this ſubject. This affair was referred to the lords of the privy-council of England, who declared, that, from the report of Sir Iſaac Newton, and others of the mint, who had made the aſſay and trial of the half-pence, the conduct of the patentee was altogether unblameable; and that the terms of the patent had been exactly fulfilled: that Wood's currency, in goodneſs, fineneſs, and value of metal, exceeded all the copper money, which had been coined for Ireland, in the reigns of Charles II. James II. king William and queen Mary: that his majeſty's predeceſſors had always exerciſed the undoubted prerogative of granting patents for copper coinage in Ireland to private perſons: that none of thoſe patents had been ſo beneficial to the kingdom as this granted to William Wood, who had not obtained it clandeſtinely, or in an unprecedented manner, but after a reference to the attorney and ſolicitor-general, and after Sir Iſaac Newton had been conſulted in every particular; and finally that it appeared, by a great number of witneſſes, that there was a real want of ſuch money in Ireland; which ſhewed the neceſſity of granting a patent. Notwithſtanding this deciſion the clamour of the Iriſh nation was induſtriouſly kept up by papers, pamphlets, and lampoons written by dean Swift and others; but Wood having voluntarily reduced his coinage from one hundred thouſand to forty thouſand pounds, the noiſe was in a great meaſure ſilenced. The parliament of Ireland paſſed an act for accepting the affirmation of quakers inſtead of an oath: and granted three hundred and forty thouſand pounds towards diſcharging the national debt, which was three hundred and twenty thouſand pounds more.

A. D. 1723.

The worthy Lord Cowper died on the tenth of October. This noble gentleman had twice diſcharged the office of lord chancellor, with equal judgment and ability. This year was likewiſe remarkable for the death of the duke of Orleans, regent of France, who was carried off by an apoplexy, in the fiftieth year of his age, after having nominated the duke of Bourbon as prime miniſter. King George immediately received aſſurances of the good diſpoſition of the French court, to cultivate and improve the harmony ſo happily eſtabliſhed between the two kingdoms.

A. D. 1724. On the nineteenth day of December, the king arrived in London; and on the ninth of January the parliament was aſſembled. His majeſty, in his ſpeech, congratulated them on the ſucceſs of their endeavours during the laſt ſeſſion to promote the ſafety, intereſt, and honour of the kingdom. He recommended to the commons the care of the public debts; and expreſſed his ſatisfaction at ſeeing the ſinking fund improved and augmented, ſo as to put the debt of the nation into a method of being ſpeedily and effectually diſcharged. Addreſſes of thanks having been preſented by both houſes, the commons proceeded to conſider the eſtimates for the enſuing year. They voted ten thouſand ſeamen; and the majority, though not without violent oppoſition, agreed to maintain four thouſand additional troops, which had been raiſed in the courſe of the preceding ſummer; the whole number of effective men, amounting to eighteen thouſand two hundred ſixty-four. The expence was defrayed by a land-tax of two ſhillings in the pound, together with the malt-tax. The nation having long and loudly complained of the injuſtice of protections granted by foreign miniſters, peers, and members of parliament, the commons reſolved, that all protections granted by members of that houſe ſhould be declared void, and immediately withdrawn; that none ſhould be granted for the future; and that if any member ſhould preſume to contravene this order, he ſhould make ſatisfaction to the party injured, and be liable to the cenſure of the houſe. The lords made a declaration to the ſame purpoſe, with an exception of menial ſervants, and thoſe neceſſarily employed about the eſtates of peers. The public buſineſs being finiſhed, the king cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech on the twenty-fourth day of April. The parliament aſſembling on the twelfth day of November, continued the former eſtabliſhment of the land and ſea forces, and readily granted the neceſſary ſupplies. The chief object, which engaged their attention during the ſeſſion, was the trial of the earl of Maccleſfield, lord chancellor of England. This nobleman, by conniving at certain venal practices touching the ſale of places, and the money of ſuitors depoſited with the maſters of chancery, had incurred ſuch a load of odium, that he found it neceſſary about the beginning of January to reſign the great ſeal.

A.D. 1725. A petition was preſented to the commons on the twentieth of April by the lord Finch, in behalf of Henry St. John, late viſcount Bolingbroke, praying that the execution of the law might be ſupended with reſpect to his forfeitures, as a pardon had ſuſpended it with reſpect to his life. Mr. Walpole informed the houſe, that ſeven years before, the petitioner had made his humble ſubmiſſion to the king, with the moſt ſolemn aſſurances of fidelity and allegiance; and that from his ſubſequent behaviour, he had proved himſelf to be a proper object of the royal mercy, which had induced his majeſty to conſent to his petitioning the houſe. The petition being read, Mr. Walpole ſaid, he was perfectly ſatisfied, that the petitioner had made ſufficient atonement for his paſt offences, and was therefore deſerving the interference of the houſe, to enable him to enjoy his family inheritance; which, according to the opinion of the moſt learned in the law, he could not do, unleſs the king's pardon was followed by an act of parliament for reſtoring his eſtates. After this matter had been fully diſcuſſed, a bill was preſented, and having paſſed both houſes, it received the royal aſſent a few days after.

On the death of Lewis, the young king of Spain, which happened a ſhort time after his advancement to the throne, his father Philip reſumed the powers of government; which, however, he exerciſed entirely under the influence of the queen, who was a woman of an intriguing and ambitious temper. Such a ſtrong averſion did Lewis XV. of France conceive againſt his conſort, the infanta of Spain, that he perſevered in a reſolution never to conſummate his nuptials. The whole kingdom of France being greatly alarmed with the apprehenſion of a civil war, in caſe of the king dying without male iſſue, he determined, with the advice of his council, to ſend her back to Madrid; whither ſhe was accordingly conducted by the marquis de Monteleone, and Patrick Lawleſs, agent to the Pretender. The queen of Spain was ſo exaſperated by the inſult offered to her daughter, that ſhe diſmiſſed madamoiſelle de Beaujolouis, one of the daughters of the regent, who had been contracted to her ſon Don Carlos; and farther to gratify her reſentment, ſhe reſolved, that the French ſhould in future have no concerns in the affairs of Spain. The congreſs of Cambray having proved wholly ineffectual, the queen propoſed to compromiſe her differences with the emperor, under the ſole mediation of Great Britain. But the king of England being ſatisfied that the emperor was by no means diſpoſed to abide by his determination, declined the honour offered him by the queen of Spain. Upon receiving this refuſal, her Catholic majeſty propoſed a private negociation to the court of Vienna, which was readily accepted. Hereupon the conferences were immediately opened; and they were conducted under the direction of the baron de Ripperda, a native of Holland, who had renounced proteſtantiſm, and engaged in the ſervice of Spain. A treaty of peace was ſigned at Vienna on the thirteenth of April, whereby the emperor acknowledged Philip as king of Spain and the Indies, and engaged not to diſpute his right to thoſe poſſeſſions which had been ſecured to him by the treaty of Utrecht. By the ſame treaty, Philip relinquiſhed all claim to the territories in Italy and the Netherlands, which by the treaty of London, concluded in 1722, had been adjudged to the emperor. Charles granted the inveſtiture of the dukedoms of Tuſcany, Parma, and Placentia, to the eldeſt ſon of the queen of Spain, in default of heirs in the preſent poſſeſſors, as male fiefs of the emperor. The Auſtrian ſucceſſion was guarantied by Spain, according to the pragmatic ſanction, whereby the dominions of that houſe were ſettled on the emperor's heirs of either ſex, and declared to be a perpetual, indiviſible, and inſeparable feoffment of the primogeniture. No part of the above treaty was calculated to excite the diſpleaſure of the European powers: but the caſe was very different with reſpect to the treaty of commerce, by which the Auſtrian ſubjects were entitled to advantages in trade with Spain, from which all other nations were excluded. Philip propoſed to guaranty the Oſtend Eaſt-India company, and to pay the emperor an annual ſubſidy of four millions of pieces of eight. Different ſums were remitted to Vienna, amounting in the whole to one million ſterling; the Imperial forces were augmented by a body of ſixty thouſand men, and other powers were invited to engage in this alliance, but the court of Ruſſia only complied. Excluſive of theſe public engagements, there were ſeveral articles of a private nature, and a much more dangerous tendency, which proved highly alarming to the court of England. By theſe private articles, the contracting powers were ſaid to have bound themſelves to procure to Spain the reſtitution of Gibraltar and Port Mahon; to effect a double marriage between the two infants of Spain, and the two archducheſſes of Auſtria; and to exert their utmoſt endeavours, for eſtabliſhing the Pretender on the Engliſh throne.

To diſappoint the deſigns of the new allies, the Engliſh monarch ſuggeſted a defenſive treaty between England, France, and Pruſſia; and in the following September, this alliance, which was to continue for the ſpace of fifteen years, was concluded at Hanover.

The order of the knights of the Bath was revived in December; they were thirty-eight in number, including the ſovereign. William Bateman was created baron of Calmore in Ireland, and viſcount Bateman; and Sir Robert Walpole, one of the revived knights of the Bath, was honoured with the order of the Garter.

The duke of Wharton, having diſſipated his fortune by an extravagant courſe of life, repaired to the court of Vienna, from whence he proceeded to Rome, and offered his ſervice to the Pretender; in conſequence of which he received the order of the Garter, and the title of duke of Northumberland. He was diſpatched by the Pretender with credentials to the court of Madrid; and the king of England being apprized of his arrival at the court of Spain, ſent a meſſenger with a letter under the great ſeal, commanding him, upon his allegiance, to return immediately to England. The king's letter being delivered to him as he was riding through the ſtreets of Madrid in his carriage, he vehemently exclaimed againſt the meſſenger, who had preſumed to execute a ſummons upon him within ſight of the palace of his moſt catholic majeſty; and he even threatened to preſent a memorial to the court of Spain, demanding juſtice againſt the meſſenger for the indignity he had offered him; but Philip declared that he would not interfere in this matter. In a ſhort time after this, the duke renounced the proteſtant religion; and was appointed a colonel in the Spaniſh army, having eſpouſed one of the ladies of the queen of Spain's bed-chamber.

A. D. 1726. His majeſty ſet out on his return for England; embarked at Helvoetſluys on the firſt day of January; and after having encountered a moſt furious ſtorm, was landed with great difficulty at Rye, from whence he proceeded by land to London. The parliament being aſſembled on the twentieth day of the ſame month, the king, in his ſpeech to both houſes, informed them, that the diſtreſſed condition of ſome of their proteſtant brethren abroad, and the negociations and engagements contracted by ſome foreign powers, which ſeemed to have laid the foundations of new troubles and diſturbances in Europe, and to threaten his ſubjects with the loſs of ſeveral of the moſt advantageous branches of their trade, had obliged him to concert, with other powers, ſuch meaſures as might give a check to the ambitious view of thoſe who were endeavouring to render themſelves formidable, and put a ſtop to the further progreſs of ſuch dangerous deſigns; that, with this view, he had entered into a defenſive alliance with the kings of France and Pruſſia, to which ſeveral other powers, and particularly the States-general, had been invited to accede; and he had no reaſon to doubt, but they would readily give their concurrence: that by theſe means, and by their ſupport and aſſiſtance, he hoped he ſhould be able, not only to ſecure to his own ſubjects the enjoyment of many valuable rights and privileges long ſince acquired for them by the moſt ſolemn treaties, but effectually to preſerve the balance of power in Europe, which was the chief of all his wiſhes.

The houſe of commons having taken into conſideration the treaties of Vienna and Hanover, Horatio Walpole opened the debate with a long and ſtudied ſpeech, in which he gave a detail of the affairs of Europe ſince the treaty of Utrecht. He recapitulated the ſubſtance of the barrier treaty; the convention for executing that treaty; the defenſive alliance with the emperor; another with the moſt Chriſtian king and the States-general; a ſubſequent convention; the quadruple-alliance; the congreſs at Cambray; the treaty of Vienna, and that of Hanover. On the other hand, the members in the oppoſition alledged, that the treaty of Hanover would engage the Britiſh nation in a war for the defence of the king's German dominions, contrary to an expreſs proviſion made in the act of limitation. They were anſwered by Mr. Pelham, who moved for an addreſs to his majeſty, approving the alliance he had concluded at Hanover, in order to obviate and diſappoint the dangerous views and conſequences of the treaty of peace between the emperor and the king of Spain; and promiſing to ſupport him againſt all inſults and attacks that ſhould be made upon any of his territories, though not belonging to the crown of Great Britain. The addreſs was accordingly voted and preſented; and the houſe of lords in a body delivered one of the ſame tendency.

There being a tax impoſed on malt in Scotland, the maltſters of Glaſgow threatened the lives of the exciſemen, if they ſhould preſume to enter their houſes; in conſequence of which, major-general Wade, who then commanded the forces in Scotland, being applied to by the commiſſioners, diſpatched two companies of foot to Glaſgow, under the command of captain Buſhell. On their entrance into the town, the mob pelted them with ſtones, and the captain was obliged to hire an alehouſe as a guard-room, the populace having locked up the regular guard-room, and ſecreted the key. Towards midnight, the rabble broke into the houſe of Mr. Campbell, member for the city, and either carried off or deſtroyed moſt of the furniture. In the afternoon of the following day (the captain having in the mean time got poſſeſſion of the guard-room) the mob re-aſſembled, and made head againſt the ſoldiers, exclaiming, "Drive the dogs out of town, we will cut them to pieces." It was in vain that the captain remonſtrated with the enraged multitude, and told them that his men muſt fire, if they did not deſiſt. They continued to preſs forward in tumultuous numbers, and wounded ſeveral of the ſoldiers; who at length fired over their heads, in the hope to terrify them into ſubmiſſion. Still, however, they perſiſted in their attack on the ſoldiers, whom they pelted with ſtones, till they were compelled to fire, and three or four perſons were killed, and ſeveral wounded. The populace, now incenſed, ſeized all the arms that could be found in the town; whereupon the captain, finding reſiſtance vain, retreated to Dumbarton, towards which he was purſued ſix miles. General Wade being informed of theſe proceedings, got together a large body of troops, and, in conjunction with Duncan Forbes, the lord-advocate, took poſſeſſion of Glaſgow, the magiſtrates of which were ſent priſoners to Edinburgh, where they were tried by the lords juſticiary, and acquitted. Of the lower rank, ſeveral were puniſhed by whipping, and four tranſported. In March, the king ſent a meſſage to the houſe of commons, requeſting their aſſiſtance "to diſcharge the obligations he had already incurred, and to enter into ſuch other engagements as might be neceſſary." This requiſition, after ſome debate, was complied with, and the parliament prorogued immediately after.

A. D. 1727. The parliament of Great Britain having met on the ſeventeenth day of January, the king, in his ſpeech to both houſes, obſerved, that, "If the preſerving a due balance of power in Europe; if defending the poſſeſſions of the crown of Great Britain, of infinite advantage to her trade and commerce, againſt dangerous and unlawful encroachments; and if the preſent eſtabliſhment, the religion, liberties, and properties of a proteſtant people, were any longer conſiderations worthy the care and attention of a Britiſh parliament, he need ſay no more to incite them to exert their beſt abilities in defence of them." Both houſes preſented addreſſes of thanks, replete with approbation of the king's proceedings to defeat the deſigns of his enemies; and the commons voted a land-tax bill of four ſhillings in the pound, to defray the expence of ſupporting twenty thouſand ſeamen, and twenty-ſix thouſand three hundred and eighty-three men for the land ſervice. There were high debates this ſeſſion in the houſe of lords, on the letters and memorials which had paſſed between the miniſters of Great Britain, France, and Spain, and the papers reſpecting the treaty of Hanover. At length it was reſolved, that the meaſures his majeſty had judged it expedient to purſue, were both juſt and honourable, and highly neceſſary for defeating the dangerous deſigns meditated in favour of the Pretender; for preſerving the dominions belonging to the crown of Great Britain by ſolemn treaties; and for ſecuring to his ſubjects their moſt valuable rights and privileges of commerce, and preſerving the tranquillity of Europe. But this reſolution was proteſted againſt by ſeveral of the peers.

The oppoſition, in the houſe of commons, conſiſted chiefly in making motions for addreſſes on various ſubjects; one of theſe was for a copy of a memorial preſented to the king of Sweden by Mr. Poyntz, and for the ſecret offenſive article between the courts of Vienna and Madrid; another was for the declaration, letters, and engagements, reſpecting the reſtitution of Gibraltar, for which the court of Spain pretended a poſitive promiſe had been given; a third was for copies of ſuch memorials and repreſentations to his majeſty, as had induced him, in the courſe of the preceding year, to ſend a ſquadron into the Baltic; a fourth was for an account of the diſtribution of one hundred and twenty-five thouſand pounds, charged in the ſtate of money granted for the ſervice of the laſt year, in general terms, as iſſued out for other engagements and expences, over and above ſuch as were ſpecified. But theſe motions were negatived; and an addreſs of thanks to his majeſty was voted by a conſiderable majority, in which the houſe expreſſed the moſt perfect ſatiſfaction in the meaſures already purſued, and promiſed to ſupport his majeſty in ſuch proceedings as he ſhould deem neceſſary for the public welfare.

His majeſty's ſpeech was the ſubject of much criticiſm, both at home, and in foreign countries. Some expreſſions therein were ſo diſpleaſing to the court of Vienna, that Mr. Palms, the Imperial reſident at London, was directed to preſent a ſpirited memorial to his majeſty, and afterwards to publiſh it, as an appeal to the people from the declarations of their ſovereign from the throne. In this inſolent paper, the king was accuſed of having averred from the throne, as certain and incontrovertible facts, divers miſrepreſentations and falſities. The memorial aſſerted, that the treaty of Vienna was founded on the quadruple alliance, and could not, therefore, reaſonably give offence to the king or people of England: that the treaty of commerce was calculated to promote the mutual advantage of both parties, agreeable to the laws of nations, and that it could in no reſpect operate to the diſadvantage of Great Britain; that there was no offenſive alliance concluded between the two crowns; and that the ſuppoſed article reſpecting the Pretender, was an abſolute deception: and the memorialiſt further ſaid, that the hoſtilities commenced in the Weſt Indies, and elſewhere, againſt the king of Spain, in direct violation of the moſt ſolemn treaties, afforded that monarch a ſufficient pretence for having laid ſiege to Gibraltar; but with regard to the inſinuation, that his maſter had agreed to aſſiſt in the ſiege, it was wholly deſtitute of foundation, the emperor having no other engagements with the court of Spain, than what was ſpecified in the treaty communicated to the king of England. And the memorialiſt, in the name of the emperor, demanded reparation for the injury the honour of his Imperial majeſty had ſuſtained by ſuch groundleſs imputations. This daring remonſtrance incenſed the people of England in the higheſt degree. Both houſes of parliament jointly addreſſed his majeſty, expreſſing their indignation at the conduct of the Imperial reſident; and aſſuring him, that this audacious manner of appealing to his people, was a proceeding that excited their utmoſt abhorrence and indignation; and the Imperial reſident was ordered immediately to quit the kingdom. Virulent memorials and declarations were preſented by the miniſters of the emperor, and the kings of Great Britain and France, to the diet of the empire at Ratiſbon; and ſuch ſevere perſonalities were thrown out by theſe potentates, that there was but little reaſon to expect a ſpeedy accommodation. To fortify himſelf againſt the impending ſtorm, king George engaged in a more ſtrict alliance with the French monarch. He prevailed upon the king of Sweden to accede to the treaty of Hanover; to ſupply, as a party in that treaty, a body of five thouſand men; to keep double that number of troops in readineſs to act, in caſe of emergency, in conſideration of a ſubſidy of fifty thouſand pounds for three years, to be remitted by equal inſtallments every ſix months. He alſo negociated a new treaty with the king of Denmark, who engaged to furniſh twenty-four thouſand auxiliaries, in conſideration of a ſubſidy of three hundred and fifty-thouſand rixdollars, for the ſpace of four years, to be paid by the king of France. He made a convention with the prince of Heſſe-Caſſel, who promiſed to ſupply four thouſand cavalry, and double that number of land forces, in conſideration of immediately receiving from Great Britain ſeventy-five thouſand pounds, for the purpoſe of levying and equipping theſe forces; and an additional fifty thouſand pounds, in caſe their ſervice ſhould be requiſite in the field, excluſive of the uſual allowance for their pay and maintenance; and while his majeſty was negociating theſe treaties, he engaged four and twenty thouſand ſeamen, and equipped for the Baltic a powerful fleet.

Mr. Scope, ſecretary to the treaſury, now made a motion in the houſe of commons, that a clauſe ſhould be inſerted in the malt-tax bill, empowering his majeſty to apply ſuch ſums as ſhould be neceſſary for defraying the expences incidental to ſuch engagements as had been made, or ſhould be made, previous to the twenty-fifth of the enſuing December, for the purpoſe of protecting and ſecuring the trade and navigation of the kingdom, and reſtoring the public tranquillity. A violent conteſt was the reſult of the above motion; the ſupporters of which aſſerted, that his majeſty was ſo unwilling to involve the nation in any extraordinary expence, that he had requeſted no greater ſupplies in this ſeſſion, than what he deemed abſolutely neceſſary for the ſervice of the year; but that, in the preſent ſituation of public affairs, circumſtances might occur to require an unforeſeen expence, for which no eſtimates could be made, becauſe ſome of the treaties in which his majeſty had judged it prudent to engage, were not yet completed; that therefore it was the duty of parliament to enable him to anſwer ſuch contingencies as might ariſe; and more eſpecially, as he had in no inſtance abuſed the confidence which the houſe had repoſed in him on former occaſions. On the other hand it was contended, that to grant ſupplies without an eſtimate, was contrary to the eſtabliſhed rules of parliament; that the clauſe propoſed was inconſiſtent with that part of the bill, which forbad "iſſuing the ſupplies granted to any other purpoſes than thoſe ſpecified, and rendered ineffectual that diſpoſal of the public money, which the wiſdom of all parliaments thought a neceſſary ſecurity againſt miſapplication; that this embezzlement was the more to be feared, as no proviſion was made to call any perſon to account for the money that ſhould be diſpoſed of by virtue of this clauſe; that the parliament had already granted vaſt ſums, which appeared ſufficient to anſwer any occaſions, as far as their preſent views could extend; and, if there ſhould happen any unexpected emergency which might demand a farther ſupply, it might be provided in the uſual manner, when neceſſity required," &c. It was farther ſaid, that "the repoſing a confidence in the crown in the diſpoſition of ſuch immenſe ſums of money, as, by the advice of profuſe miniſters may be ſquandered away, might be attended with great prejudice to the property of the ſubject, and great danger to the conſtitution." Notwithſtanding theſe and other arguments the motion was carried, and the bill likewiſe paſſed the houſe of peers. On the following day Sir William Younge moved, that three hundred and ſeventy thouſand pounds towards the ſupply granted to the king, ſhould be raiſed by loans on Exchequer bills, to be charged to the ſurplus of the duties on coal and culm, which was reſerved for the diſpoſal of the parliament. This motion was oppoſed by Sir Joſeph Jekyll and Mr. Pultney, but was at length carried without any conſiderable oppoſition. The ſeſſion was now cloſed by the king, who thanked his parliament for their zeal and liberality; and informed them, that the count de las Torres, with twenty thouſand men, preſſed the ſiege of Gibraltar. At this time the place was well defended, and the earl of Portmore, governor of that garriſon, ſailed with a reinforcement, under convoy of a fleet commanded by Sir Charles Wager. Five hundred men likewiſe went from Minorca; and a plenty of freſh proviſions being ſent from the coaſt of Barbary, the efforts of the beſiegers were rendered ineffectual; but though the ſiege was ſuſpended upon preliminary articles for a general pacification being ſigned, it was not raiſed till ſome time after his majeſty's deceaſe.

The king not having viſited his German dominions for two years, declared in council his intention of embracing the preſent opportunity to enjoy that pleaſure. On the third of June the king ſet out for Hanover, and proceeding to Greenwich embarked on board the Carolina yacht for Holland, where he landed on the ſeventh. He lay at the little town of Vaert, and two days after arrived, between ten and eleven at night, at Delden, to appearance in good health. Here he ſupped heartily, and eat part of a melon, which his ſtomach ſeemed not well to digeſt; for ſetting out the next morning, he had not travelled far before he was troubled with gripings of the cholic; and, ordering the coach to ſtop, complained that he had loſt the uſe of one of his hands. Being come to Linden, he could not eat any thing at dinner; upon which it was judged adviſeable to open a vein, and he was blooded, but without any good effect. He was adviſed by his attendants to remain at Linden; but being anxious to reach his electoral dominions, his majeſty continued his journey, during which he fell into a kind of lethargic dozing. About ten at night the king arrived at the palace of his brother, the biſhop of Oſnaburgh, where, his illneſs increaſing, he expired about eleven o'clock the next morning, on Sunday the eleventh of June, leaving the crown of England, and his foreign dominions, to his only ſon the prince of Wales. This worthy monarch aſcended the throne in the fifty-fourth year of his age, endowed with every quality neceſſary for governing a great and powerful people. He died in the ſixty-eighth year of his age, and the thirteenth of his reign. His majeſty married Sophia Dorothy, daughter and heireſs of the duke of Zell, of whom was born his only ſon and ſucceſſor George II. and a daughter, mother of the preſent king of Pruſſia, who died in 1757. The king's body was conveyed to Hanover, and interred there among his anceſtors.

The principal writers who flouriſhed in this and the preceding reign, were Swift, Steel, Addiſon, Bolingbroke, and Trenchard, in the political line. Prior, Cibber, Rowe, Garth, Addiſon, Philips, Gay, Dryden, and Pope, as poets; Atterbury, Clarke, and Hoadley, as divines.

Impartial Character of George the First.

George I. was plain in his perſon, in his addreſs ſimple; of a compoſed and grave deportment; but in his hours of relaxation, familiar, and at times facetious. Before he aſcended the throne of Great Britain, he had juſtly acquired the character of a wiſe politician, a courageous, circumſpect general, a juſt and merciful elector. The eſtabliſhment of the electoral dignity in his family was a work, which, though begun by his father, was reſerved for him finally to accompliſh. A large acceſſion of territory fell to him by his ſucceeding to the dukedom of Zell, by which he became one of the greateſt princes of Germany. The duchies of Bremen and Verden, and the biſhopric of Oſnaburgh, conſiderably ſtrengthened his intereſt in the empire, and gave an additional weight to the proteſtant cauſe. He was, indeed, almoſt always attended with good fortune, which was chiefly owing to his prudence and aſſiduity. He aſcended the throne of England with a mind happily diſpoſed to govern his new ſubjects according to the maxims of the Engliſh conſtitution, and the genius of the people. This he ever made the rule of his conduct; while he himſelf appeared intereſted in the liberty and happineſs of his ſubjects. Naturally inclined to juſtice and equity, though abſolute and deſpotic in his hereditary dominions, he ruled with all the lenity and moderation of a limited prince. He conſidered civil and religious liberty as the unalienable right of mankind; and therefore he indulged it to a people, who pleaded no other claim than his known goodneſs and humanity. Poſſeſſed of theſe generous ſentiments, though his acceſſion to the throne enlarged his ſphere of action, it did not alter his plan of conduct. This was uniformly and invariably the ſame, both before and after his advancement to regal dignity. Leſs tenacious of his own prerogative than the rights and privileges of his ſubjects, as he never made any attacks upon the latter, no encroachments were ever made upon the former. The love and affection of his people, he conſidered as the firmeſt ſupport and ſecurity of his throne. Conſcious that, under an arbitrary government, the property of the ſubject is not in more danger than the life of the ſovereign, he wiſely rejected the inſidious advice of thoſe, who endeavoured to make their court to him by the profeſſion of an obedience which they could never practiſe, and which has always proved fatal to ſuch kings as have put it to the trial. Thoſe he regarded as his beſt friends, who honeſtly acquainted him with the true principles of the Britiſh conſtitution, and adviſed him to regulate his conduct according to its maxims. To their councils he prudently liſtened, and invariably adhered through the whole courſe of his reign. It has been ſaid, that he did not diſtinguiſh himſelf by patronizing the arts and ſciences; yet he founded in the univerſities of Oxford and Cambridge two profeſſorſhips, one of modern hiſtory, and the other of modern languages. In a word, he loved his people; made their happineſs the rule of his actions; and it may be affirmed, no prince was ever better qualified to ſway a ſcepter, nor did any one ever exerciſe the virtues of a great and good king with more diſtinguiſhed ability, or more uninterrupted ſucceſs. In ſhort he was more an ornament to the crown, than the crown was to him.

A.D. 1727. ON the fourteenth of June, when the deceaſe of the late king was notified in England, George II. received the privy-council, and many perſons of diſtinction at Leiceſter-houſe, who drew up an inſtrument for his proclamation, and the ceremony was performed the next morning at the uſual places. The ſyſtem of politics eſtabliſhed in the preceding reign, was firmly adhered to. His majeſty declared in council, that he was firmly reſolved to maintain the religion, laws, and liberties of the kingdom, and to adhere to the alliances which his father had contracted, and which had contributed in a great meaſure to reſtore the tranquillity of Europe. Next day the parliament met, in purſuance of the act of the fourth of queen Anne, but was prorogued by commiſſion to the twenty-ſeventh. At the opening of this ſeſſion, the king gave an early omen of that paternal care, which he ever after exerciſed for the welfare of his people. After addreſſes of condolence and congratulation were preſented by the commons, Sir Robert Walpole moved, that as the annual allowance of ſeven hundred thouſand pounds, ſettled on the late king, had annually fallen ſhort of the ſums wanted; and that as his majeſty's expences were likely to increaſe, "the entire revenues of the civil liſt, producing about eight hundred and thirty thouſand pounds, ſhould be ſettled on his majeſty during life." This motion was ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by Mr. Shippen and other members, but was at length agreed to, and a bill was ordered in for the better ſupport of his majeſty's houſhold; and the commons voted, that if the queen ſhould ſurvive him, ſhe ſhould be allowed the annual ſum of one hundred thouſand pounds, with the lodge and lands of Richmond old park: the parliament was diſſolved a few days after this.

In the interim, his majeſty proceeded to ſettle his miniſtry, his council and his houſhold; and his manner of filling up the ſeveral places in theſe ſeveral departments, plainly ſhewed he was reſolved to give the preference to the friends of his family and of public liberty. The duke of Newcaſtle, and the lord Townſend, were declared ſecretaries of ſtate; Mr. Pelham, the duke's brother, was made ſecretary at war; the duke of Rutland was conſtituted chancellor of the duchy of Lancaſter; Sir Robert Walpole retained the offices of chancellor of the Exchequer, and firſt lord of the treaſury; and, by the union of theſe two great poſts in his perſon, was conſidered as prime miniſter of ſtate. The other lords of the treaſury were Sir Charles Turner, Sir George Oxenden, Mr. Doddington, and Mr. Clayton. Lord Torrington was placed at the head of the board of admiralty, the other members of which were, the lord Malpas, Sir John Norris, Sir Charles Wager, Sir Thomas Littleton, Mr. Cockburn, and Mr. Molyneux. The earl of Cheſterfield was nominated ambaſſador to the States-general; and the lord Carteret obtained the place of lord-lieutenant of Ireland. On the eleventh day of October, the coronation of the king and queen was performed at Weſtminſter with the uſual ſolemnity: the biſhop of Oxford preached on the occaſion, and the day was celebrated throughout every part of theſe dominions with the moſt extraordinary rejoicings.

At firſt the miniſtry was divided between lord Townſend, the earl of Cheſterfield, and Sir Robert Walpole, the laſt of whom ſoon engroſſed the greateſt ſhare of the adminiſtration. The houſe of commons, which in the preceding reign was diſtinguiſhed into whigs and tories, underwent another change, and was divided into the court and country parties. The former favoured all the ſchemes of the miniſtry, and the meaſures of the crown: they conſidered foreign alliances as conducive to internal ſecurity; and paid ſubſidies to other princes for their promiſes of future aſſiſtance. Of theſe Sir Robert was the leader; and ſuch members as he could not convince by his eloquence, he undertook to bring over to the court party by places and penſions. The country party, who were averſe to continental connections, complained that immenſe ſums were laviſhed on ſubſidies that could never be uſeful; and that alliances were purchaſed with money, which ſhould only be rewarded by a reciprocation of good offices. As the court party generally threatened the houſe of commons with imaginary dangers to the ſtate, the country party declaimed againſt the encroachments of the prerogative: but the complaints of neither were founded in truth; the kingdom was in no danger from abroad; nor was internal liberty in the leaſt in-ſringed by the crown. While the court was partly headed by Walpole, the leaders on the other ſide were Mr. Pultney, Sir William Wyndham, Mr. Shippen, and Mr. Hungerford.

A. D. 1728. His majeſty's eldeſt ſon, Prince Frederick, who had been repreſented by the Jacobites, and other enemies of the houſe of Hanover, as an ideot and a driveller, having arrived in England, was introduced into the privy-council, and created prince of Wales. At his appearance, the ſlanders paſſed upon him were ſilenced, his abilities acknowledged, and his amiable qualities ſoon engaged the people's affection.

On the twenty-third of January the new parliament met, when Arthur Onſlow, Eſq. was unanimouſly choſen by the commons for their ſpeaker. His majeſty opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech; and both houſes preſented addreſſes filled with expreſſions of loyalty and affection for his majeſty. The commons aſſured him they entirely approved of his tranſactions, and promiſed to ſupport him in all his undertakings; and declared they would cheerfully grant whatever ſupplies ſhould be wanted for public ſervice. During this ſeſſion, the parliament were chiefly employed in examining copies of ſeveral treaties and alliances which the king had laid before them. They likewiſe made an attempt to amend the ſtatute of limitations, which in the ſequel, however, did not ſucceed. They paſſed the mutiny bill, together with thoſe relating to the public ſupplies, and ſome others of a private nature. Theſe having received the royal aſſent on the twenty-eighth day of May, his majeſty cloſed the ſeſſion, having thanked the commons for the effectual ſupplies they had raiſed, and in particular for having empowered him to borrow five hundred thouſand pounds for the diſcharge of wages due to the ſeamen employed in the navy. Previous to the cloſe of this ſeſſion, his majeſty was pleaſed to raiſe the following gentlemen to the degree of barons of this kingdom. Sir John Monſon, by the title of lord Monſon, Sir Thomas Wentworth, by that of lord Malton, Sir Thomas Coke, by that of lord Lovel, and Sir John Hobart by that of lord Hobart.

A. D. 1729. On the twenty-firſt of January the parliament met, and was diſtinguiſhed by its being warmly employed in the cauſe of humanity. James Oglethorpe, a member of the houſe of commons, paying a viſit to a friend, who was a priſoner in the fleet, was convinced, that the unhappy perſons confined there were treated with the utmoſt cruelty; and laying the affair before the houſe, many humane members concurred with him, and promoted a motion for appointing a committee to enquire into the ſtate of the priſons in this kingdom; and this committee being appointed, Mr. Oglethorpe was choſen chairman. The committee began with viſiting the Fleet priſon in a body, where they found Sir William Rich, bart. loaded with irons, by order of Bambridge, the warden, whom he had offended; they were filled with horror at the diſcovery of many other inhuman barbarities committed by that ruffian; and detected the moſt iniquitous ſcenes of fraud, villainy, and extortion. Upon making their report to the houſe, it was reſolved, that John Huggins, and Bambridge, the late and preſent wardens, with ſeveral of their agents, ſhould be committed cloſe priſoners to Newgate. An addreſs was preſented to the king, deſiring him to direct his attorney general to proſecute theſe perſons and their accomplices; and a bill was brought in to diſable Bambridge from executing the office of warden, and another for the better regulating the priſon of the Fleet. Huggins and Bambridge were tried, not only for many high crimes and miſdemeanors, but for murder, yet were unexpectedly acquitted. One Acton, clerk to the Marſhalſea, was alſo tried for murder and acquitted. The iſſue of this affair was, that the jails were put under proper regulations; and our unhappy fellow ſubjects ſtruggling under the preſſure of misfortunes, delivered from the inhuman gripe of villains, who had rendered their impriſonment doubly painful through the addition of miſery and extortion.

In the mean time the Spaniards continued to commit depredations on our ſhips and ſettlements in America, which exaſperated the Engliſh to repel their inſults: but the miniſtry who were entirely devoted to peace, urged, that as ſomething deciſive muſt ſhortly happen, it was moſt eligibl, as the nation had waited ſo long, to wait a little longer, before it broke out into open hoſtilities. The Spaniards, about this time, having ſeized ſome of our ſhips, engaged in a lawful trade, the indignation of the public could not be any longer reſtrained. Petitions were delivered to the commons by the merchants of London, Liverpool, and Briſtol, complaining of the interruption they had ſuffered in their trade for ſeveral years, from the depredations of the Spaniards in the Weſt Indies. The houſe having conſidered theſe petitions, preſented an addreſs to the king, requeſting his majeſty to uſe his utmoſt endeavours for preventing ſuch depredations, procuring juſt and reaſonable ſatisfaction, and ſecuring to his ſubjects the free exerciſe of commerce and navigation to and from the Britiſh colonies in America. His majeſty aſſured them, that nothing ſhould be wanting on his part to anſwer the deſires and expectations of his people. The complicated buſineſs of this ſeſſion, being at laſt concluded, his majeſty, on the fourteenth of May, went to the houſe of peers, and put an end to the ſeſſion by a ſpeech, wherein he ſignified his intention of viſiting his German dominions; and ſet out for Hanover on the twentieth day of the ſame month. At this time colonel Stanhope was created earl of Harrington, and appointed ſecretary of ſtate in the room of Lord Townſend, who reſigned: the duke of Dorſet ſucceeded lord Carteret as lord lieutenant of Ireland: and, in order to congratulate Lewis XV. on the birth of a dauphin, the earl of Waldegrave was ſent ambaſſador to France.

To all appearance the negociations at Soiſſons were at a ſtand: but at length it was agreed to open conferences at Seville between the plenipotentiaries of England, France, and Spain. The earl of Harrington, who, previous to this had been appointed ambaſſador extraordinary to his Catholic majeſty, had the management of this treaty on the part of Great Britain, in conjunction with Mr. Keene, our plenipotentiary at the court of Madrid. This treaty was ſigned on the ninth of November, and in the acceſſion of the States General, which happened in the ſame month, they were to furniſh only four thouſand foot and one thouſand horſe; and on the part of the other allies, they were to guaranty the aboliſhing the Oſtend Eaſt India company; and the Catholic king engaged that entire ſatisfaction ſhall be given the Dutch for their grievances, as well in the Weſt Indies as in Europe, and to re-eſtabliſh their commerce, agreeable to former treaties; and laſtly to grant them all the commercial privileges which every other favoured nation enjoyed.

A. D. 1730. His majeſty, who had returned to England, from his German dominions, the beginning of September, opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech on the third of January, in which he informed the parliament, that he had concluded an abſolute peace with Spain, and thereby prevented the miſeries and calamities inſeparable from a war. He aſſured them that the peace was agreeable to the purport and intention of former treaties, and calculated to render effectual the ſtipulations of the quadruple alliance: that ſufficient proviſion had been made for the indemnification and future ſecurity of the trading intereſt; and that he had given orders for making an immediate reduction of his land and ſea forces. He then concluded with recommending to their conſideration the ſtate of public credit, and the hardſhips of poor artificers and munufacturers. Both houſes having preſented their addreſſes of thanks and congratulation to his majeſty, the lords took the treaty of peace into conſideration, and ſeveral ſevere animadverſions were paſſed upon it by thoſe in the oppoſition. Lord Bathurſt then moved for the following reſolution, "that the agreement in the treaty of Seville, to effect the introduction of Spaniſh troops into Tuſcany and Parma, is a manifeſt violation of the firſt article of the quadruple alliance, tends to involve the nation in a dangerous and expenſive war, and to deſtroy the balance of Europe." Two other motions were alſo made, the one to reſolve, "that Great Britain's right of ſovereignty, dominion, poſſeſſion, and claim to Gibraltar and Minorca, is not aſcertained by the treaty of Seville, ſo as to extinguiſh the claims and pretenſions ſet up by the Spaniards, which were followed by an actual ſiege, ſince the ceſſion of thoſe valuable places by the treaty of Utrecht." And the other, "that the ſtipulations in the treaty of Seville, for repairing the loſſes of our merchants, are inſufficient and precarious." Theſe motions, however, all ſhared a ſimilar fate; for the queſtion being put, it was carried againſt them by a great majority. The lords in favour of the miniſtry now propoſed to reſolve, "that the treaty of peace concluded at Seville, on the ninth of November laſt, doth contain all neceſſary ſtipulations for maintaining and ſecuring the honour, dignity, rights, and poſſeſſions of the crown; and that all due care is taken therein for the ſupport of the trade of the kingdom, and for repairing the loſſes ſuffered by the merchants." After long debates, the queſtion being put, it was reſolved in the affirmative, upon which ſeveral lords entered their proteſts againſt it, with their reaſons at large. A bill was brought into the houſe of commons, to prohibit his majeſty's ſubjects to lend any ſum of money to any foreign prince, ſtate, or potentate, without licence firſt obtained from his majeſty, under his privy-ſeal, or ſome greater authority. This, however, was not to extend to prohibit any ſubſcription to the public funds or trading companies of foreign kingdoms. This bill being read a ſecond time, Mr. Daniel Pulteney oppoſed it in very ſtrong terms. Mr. Barnard poſitively declared he would never conſent to a bill, which he deemed a violation of our fundamental laws, and a grievous hardſhip on individuals. He then propoſed an exception by which the prohibition ſhould be reſtricted to the emperor alone, without extending to other powers. But the bill, which was vindicated by Sir Robert Walpole, Mr. Pelham, and Sir Philip Yorke, attorney-general, and ſupported by the whole weight of miniſterial influence, not only paſſed through the houſe, but was afterwards enacted into a law. Several acts in favour of the ſubjects were paſſed this ſeſſion, among which were the following: an act for appropriating one million of the ſurpluſage ariſing from the ſinking fund, towards the diſcharge of the national debt. An act for extinguiſhing the duties upon ſalt. A third, for the better regulation of juries; and a fourth, for explaining and amending an act made in the laſt ſeſſion of parliament, entitled, "An act for the relief of debtors, with reſpect to the impriſonment of their perſons." His majeſty went to the houſe of peers and put an end to the ſeſſion, on the 15th of May.

A. D. 1731. On the twenty firſt of January the parliament met. No motion produced ſuch a warm conteſt, as that of Sir Robert Walpole's, that the duties upon ſalt, which about two years ago had been aboliſhed, ſhould now be revived, and granted for three years; though to ſweeten this propoſal, he declared, that the land-tax for the enſuing year, ſhould be reduced to one ſhilling in the pound. All the members of the country party were immediately in commotion. They affirmed, that the revival of the tax would be grinding the faces of the poor, in order to eaſe a few rich men of the landed intereſt; but the prices of all neceſſaries being thus enhanced, the wages of tradeſmen and manufacturers muſt be increaſed: they alledged, that the ſalt tax particularly affected the poor, who could not afford to eat freſh proviſions; yet the queſtion being put, the miniſter's motion was carried in the affirmative; however, before the bill paſſed ſeveral motions were made, and additional clauſes propoſed by the members in the oppoſition; new debates were raiſed on every new objection, and the courtiers were obliged to diſpute their ground by inches; but they at laſt carried their point, and the ſalt duty was revived. On the ſixteenth of May, the ſecret negociation between the courts of London and Vienna was perfected into a treaty. It is obſervable that neither France nor Spain were included in this treaty: the latter of theſe powers, after much difficulty, was brought to accede to it, but the court of France was ſo far from liſtening to any ſolicitations on this ſubject, that its utmoſt endeavours were exerted to prevent the concurrence of Spain. It was even ſuppoſed that their reſentment had prompted them to an immediate invaſion of this kingdom; a large body of troops being aſſembled at Dunkirk. Accordingly the coaſts of Kent were covered with regiments of horſe and foot, who received orders to march thither from all parts of the kingdom, to prevent any attempt of this nature from ſucceeding.

The parliament met on the thirteenth of January, when the king in his ſpeech declared, that the general tranquillity of Europe was now reſtored and eſtabliſhed, and all his expectations on that head fully ſatisfied. A. D. 1732.

Some complaints had been made to the houſe of commons againſt the Charitable Corporation, in the laſt ſeſſion, which affair now became very ſerious. This company was firſt erected in 1707, and their profeſſed intention was to lend money at legal intereſt to the poor upon ſmall pledges, and to perſons of better rank, upon an indubitable ſecurity of goods. At firſt their capital was limited to thirty thouſand pounds, but had been increaſed by licences from the crown to ſixty thouſand. In the month of October George Robinſon, eſq; their caſhier, and John Thompſon, their warehouſe-keeper, diſappeared in one day. The proprietors, alarmed at this incident, held ſeveral general courts, and appointed a committee to examine the ſtate of their affairs, where it ſoon appeared that a moſt vile ſcene of villainy and corruption had been carried on, there being thirty thouſand pounds left, to anſwer a capital of ſixty thouſand, the remainder having been embezzled by means which could not be diſcovered. Hereupon the proprietors preſented a petition to the houſe of commons, repreſenting, that by the moſt notorious breach of truſt in ſeveral perſons, to whom they had committed the management of their affairs, the corporation had been defrauded of the greateſt part of their capital, and many of the proprietors were reduced to abſolute beggary; they therefore humbly prayed, that as they were unable to detect the combinations of thoſe who had ruined them, or to bring the delinquents to condign puniſhment, without the aid and aſſiſtance of parliament, that houſe would be pleaſed to examine into the ſtate of the corporation, and the conduct of the managers, and give ſuch relief to the petitioners as the houſe ſhould think proper. This petition was graciouſly received, and a ſecret committee appointed to proceed on the enquiry. They ſoon diſcovered a moſt iniquitous ſcene of fraud, which had been acted by Robinſon and Thompſon, in concert with ſome of the directors, for embezzling the capital and cheating the proprietors. Many perſons of rank and quality were concerned in this infamous conſpiracy; ſome of the firſt characters in the nation did not eſcape ſuſpicion and cenſure. Sir Robert Sutton and Sir Archibald Grant, having had a conſiderable ſhare in thoſe fraudulent practices, were expelled the houſe: and a bill was brought in to reſtrain them, and other delinquents, from alienating their effects, or leaving the kingdom.

The neceſſary ſupplies being granted by parliament, his majeſty, on the firſt of June, gave the royal aſſent to the bills that were ready, and informed both houſes, that the States General had acceded to the treaty of Vienna; that he had determined to viſit his German dominions, and to leave the queen regent in his abſence; after which he put an end to the ſeſſion, and in a few days after ſet out for Hanover. This year the king granted his perpetual charter, for erecting a ſettlement at Georgia, ſituated to the ſouthward of Carolina in America; and, in order to plant that colony, Mr. Oglethorpe, the principal perſon who firſt ſet this ſcheme on foot, embarked at Graveſend with a number of poor families.

A. D. 1733. In many inſtances the laws that had been enacted for collecting the exciſe, ſeemed to encroach on the property and liberty of the people. Thoſe who had ſuffered by theſe laws, thought themſelves injured, and the number of complaints increaſed ſo faſt, that the clamour againſt exciſes was become almoſt univerſal. Such was the temper of the public when parliament met, the king being returned from Hanover, and was opened on the ſixteenth of January. In this ſeſſion Sir Robert Walpole laid before the houſe his long projected ſcheme for a general exciſe. He began, by taking notice of the arts which had been uſed to prejudice the people againſt his plan before it was known. He affirmed, that the clamours occaſioned by theſe prejudices owed their riſe originally to ſmugglers and fraudulent dealers, who had enriched themſelves at the expence of the public; and that thoſe had found ſtrenuous ſupporters in another ſet of men, fond of every opportunity to ſtir up the people to mutiny and ſedition. He expatiated on the frauds committed on that part of the revenue ariſing from the duties on tobacco; upon the hardſhips to which the American planters were ſubjected by the heavy duties payable on the importation as well as by the ill uſage they received from their factors and correſpondents in England, who, from being their ſervants, were now become their maſters: upon the injury done to the fair trader, and upon the loſs ſuſtained by the public with reſpect to the revenue. He aſſerted that the ſcheme he was going to propoſe would remove all theſe inconveniences, prevent innumerable frauds, perjuries, and falſe entries, and add two or three hundred thouſand pounds annually to the public revenue. He declared he had no intention to promote a general exciſe, and endeavoured to obviate ſome objections that might be made to this plan, the nature of which he at length explained. He propoſed to join the laws of exciſe to thoſe of the cuſtoms: that the farther ſubſidy of three farthings per pound charged upon imported tobacco ſhould be ſtill levied as formerly at the Cuſtom-houſe, and payable to his majeſty's civil liſt; that then the tobacco ſhould be lodged in warehouſes to be appointed for that purpoſe by the commiſſioners of exciſe: that the commiſſioner of each warehouſe, appointed likewiſe by the commiſſioners, ſhould have one lock and key, and the merchant importer another; and that the tobacco ſhould be thus ſecured until the merchant found vent for it, either by exportation or home conſumption: that the part deſigned for exportation ſhould be weighed at the cuſtom-houſe, diſcharged of the three farthings per pound at its firſt importation, and then exported without farther trouble: that the portion deſtined for home conſumption ſhould, in the preſence of the warehouſe keeper, be delivered to the purchaſer, upon his paying the inland duty of four-pence per pound to a proper officer appointed to receive it; by which means the merchant would be eaſed of the inconvenience of paying the duty on importation, or of granting bonds, and finding ſecurity for the payment before he had found a market for the commodity; that all penalties and forfeitures, ſo far as they formerly belonged to the crown, ſhould for the future be applied to the uſe of the public: that appeals in this, as well as in all other caſes relating to the exciſe, ſhould be heard and determined by two or three of the judges, to be named by his majeſty; and in the country, by the judge of exciſe upon the next circuit, who ſhould hear and determine ſuch appeals in the moſt ſummary manner without the formality of proceedings in the court of law or equity. This was the ſubſtance of the famous exciſe ſcheme, the propoſing of which occaſioned a violent debate, which was managed and maintained by the moſt able ſpeakers on both ſides the queſtion. The motion was at length, however, carried by a majority of ſixty-one voices. Several reſolutions were founded on the propoſal; and to theſe the houſe agreed, though not without a ſecond violent conteſt. Theſe reſolutions produced a bill, againſt which petitions were preferred by the lord mayor, aldermen, and common-council of London, as likewiſe by the towns of Coventry and Nottingham. A motion was made that council ſhould be heard for the city; but it was rejected by the majority, and the petition was ordered to lay upon the table till the ſecond reading of the bill. The whole nation was alarmed, and clamoured loudly againſt the exciſe bill. The populace crouded around Weſtminſter-hall, blocked up all the avenues to the houſe of commons, inſulting the perſons of thoſe members who had voted for the miniſtry on this occaſion, and Sir Robert began to be in fear of his life: he thought proper, therefore, to drop the deſign, by moving, that the ſecond reading of the bill, which was to have been on the eleventh of April, might be poſtponed till the twelfth of June. This motion, after ſome debates, being agreed to, the houſe unanimouſly reſolved to enquire into the frauds and abuſes of the cuſtoms; and a committee of twenty-one perſons was choſen by ballot for this purpoſe. The miſcarriage of the bill was celebrated with public rejoicings in London and Weſtminſter, and the populace burned the miniſtry in effigy.

His majeſty went to the houſe on the thirteenth of June, and put an end to the ſeſſion, after an act had been paſſed for granting eighty thouſand pounds to the princeſs royal on her marriage with the prince of Orange. On the ſeventh of November his highneſs arrived at Greenwich, and proceeded in one of the king's barges to the Tower, from whence he went to Somerſet houſe. An act was paſſed for ſettling five thouſand pounds per annum on the princeſs for life; and on the fourteenth of March, in the following year, her marriage with his ſerene highneſs was celebrated with great magnificence; and they ſet ſail for Holland in about a month after.

Freſh calamities now befel Europe, through the vacancy which happened in the throne of Poland. About the beginning of February Auguſtus died at Warſaw, which event threw the neighbouring powers into great commotion. Staniſlaus, whoſe daughter the French king had married, and the elector of Saxony, ſon to the late king, declared themſelves candidates for the Poliſh throne. The former was ſupported by Lewis XV. while the emperor, the czarina, and the king of Pruſſia eſpouſed the intereſt of the latter. The Imperial and Ruſſian troops encamped on the frontiers of Poland, and the king of France ordered the duke of Berwick to aſſemble an army on the Rhine, in order to enter Germany in caſe the Imperial forces made any attempt to diſturb the election at Warſaw. On the twenty-fifth of June the diet was opened with the uſual ceremonies, and Staniſlaus, being unanimouſly choſen king, appeared in the electoral field, where he was received with the loudeſt acclamations. The Saxon party, however, ſoon increaſed to ten thouſand men, proteſted againſt the election, and joined the Ruſſian army. Staniſlaus, finding himſelf unable to oppoſe ſuch powerful antagoniſts, retired to Dantzick, attended by the primate and French ambaſſador; and ſoon after the elector of Saxony was proclaimed king of Poland, under the name of Auguſtus III. by the biſhop of Cracow.

About this time ſeveral changes happened. The earl of Cheſterfield, diſguſted at the conduct of the miniſter, reſigned his place of ſteward of his majeſty's houſehold. The duke of Montroſe relinquiſhed his office of lord privy-ſeal of Scotland; as did lord Clinton, one of the lords of his majeſty's bedchamber. The duke of Bolton and lord Cobham, were deprived of their poſts in the army. Mr. Talbot, ſolicitor-general, was conſtituted lord high chancellor of Great Britain, and created baron Talbot of Henſoll. Sir Philip Yorke, attorney-general, was advanced to the office of lord chief juſtice of the court of King's bench, and honoured with a peerage by the title of lord Hardwick; the place of ſolicitor-general was beſtowed on Mr. Dudley Rider, and that of attorney-general on Mr. John Willes. This year many perſons of diſtinguiſhed rank paid the great debt of nature: George Byng, lord viſcount Torrington, died on the ſeventeenth of January, and was ſucceeded as firſt lord of the admiralty, by Sir Charles Wager; on the twenty-ſecond of the ſame month died the earl of Pembroke; on the nineteenth of March lord Raymond, lord chief juſtice of the King's Bench; on the ſeventh of May the earl of Cholmondeley; and in October, Henrietta, the young ducheſs of Marlborough; by which that title devolved to her ſiſter's ſon, the earl of Sunderland; and about the ſame time the ducheſs of Ormond expired.

A. D. 1734. On the ſeventeenth day of January, the parliament having met, the king in his ſpeech to both houſes, told them, that though he was no way concerned in the war, which had broke out in Europe, except by the good offices he had employed among the contending powers, he could not remain an idle ſpectator of the preſent events, or be indifferent about the conſequences of a war undertaken and ſupported by ſuch a powerful confederacy. He ſaid, he had thought proper to take time to examine the facts alledged on both ſides, and to wait the reſult of the councils of thoſe powers, which were even more immediately intereſted in the conſequences of the rupture. He declared he would concert with his allies, more particularly with the States general of the United Provinces, ſuch meaſures as ſhould be thought moſt adviſeable for their common ſafety, and for reſtoring the peace of Europe; that he ſhould order the eſtimates to be laid before them, of ſuch ſervices as demanded their preſent and immediate care; that the augmentation, which would be propoſed for the ſea-ſervice, would be very conſiderable; but he was confident, they would think it reaſonable and neceſſary: that he muſt particularly recommend to their care the debt of the navy; which had every year been laid before them; but from the preſent circumſtances of the times, he believed they would be perſuaded, that it now required ſome proviſion to be made for it; a thing that could not well be longer poſtponed, without manifeſt detriment to the public ſervice: that, as theſe extraordinary charges and expences were unavoidable, he made no doubt but they would effectually raiſe the ſupplies neceſſary for defraying them, with that readineſs and diſpatch, and with that juſt regard to the true intereſts of his people, which this parliament had hitherto ſhewn upon all occaſions: that he hoped they would proceed in all their deliberations with ſuch temper and unanimity, and ſuch expedition in the public buſineſs, as might give him the ſooner an opportunity of taking the ſenſe of a new parliament: that he flattered himſelf his preſent reſolutions would meet with their hearty concurrence and approbation; and, whatever inſinuations might be thrown out againſt the conduct of the government, he was confident a little time would effectually remove all groundleſs jealouſies, and make it appear, that Great Britain ought always to act that part, which the honour and intereſt of the nation called upon it to undertake. On the ſixteenth of April his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and having given his aſſent to ſuch bills as were ready, took leave of this parliament with the warmeſt acknowledgments of their zeal, duty and affection. The parliament was then prorogued, afterwards diſſolved, and by the ſame proclamation another convoked.

While theſe tranſactions were going on at home, the war was carried on with great vigour abroad, by the confederate powers againſt the emperor. In the mean time the French army on the Rhine, commanded by marſhal Belleiſle, beſieged and took Traerbach, while the duke of Berwick, at the head of ſixty thouſand men, inveſted Philipſburgh, where in viſiting the trenches, he was killed by a cannon ball; and the command devolved on the marquis d'Aſfeldt, who carried on the operations of the ſiege with equal vigour and capacity. Prince Eugene did every thing his great military talents could ſuggeſt, to relieve the beſieged; but finding it impoſſible to ſucceed, general Watgenau, the governor, capitulated, after having made a noble defence. Eugene retired to Heidelberg, and in October the campaign ended.

About the month of November an edict was publiſhed in Paris, which commanded all the Britiſh ſubjects in France not actually in employment, from the age of eighteen to fifty, either to quit the kingdom in fifteen days, or enliſt in ſome of the Iriſh regiments, on pain of being ſent to the gallies. This edict, which was executed with the utmoſt rigour, filled the priſons of Paris with the ſubjects of England, who were denied all communication with their friends, and muſt have periſhed by cold and hunger, had they not been relieved by the charity of the Janſeniſts. A ſpirited memorial from our court, on this occaſion, was delivered by lord Waldegrave, the Engliſh ambaſſador to the French council, who thought proper to excuſe themſelves by alledging, they only meant to execute their edict againſt Britiſh and Iriſh vagabonds, and ſuch as had no viſible livelihood.

A. D. 1735. The affairs of Europe were at this period in a very critical ſituation. The emperor complained loudly of the tame and pacific conduct of the Engliſh court, which, from the treaties ſubſiſting between them, he expected would have eſpouſed his cauſe. His Britannic majeſty, however, gave the world an inſtance about this time, that it was not from any perſonal diſlike to the emperor, that he took no part in his affairs, relative to the war now carrying on; for having received certain advice, that the French had formed a ſtrong a ſtrong party at the Ottoman court, who were labouring to perſuade the divan to declare war againſt his Imperial majeſty, ſent orders immediately, in conjunction with the States General, to their reſpective miniſters at that court, to uſe their utmoſt endeavours to counteract the French in their deſign: and theſe miniſters laboured ſo effectually, that the grand ſignior was perſuaded to lay aſide all thoughts of attacking the emperor. Nor was it in this inſtance only, that the Engliſh court acted as a mediator, in order to maintain the balance of power, which was now in the utmoſt danger. A miſunderſtanding had lately ariſen between the courts of Spain and Portugal, occaſioned by affronts mutually offered to their ambaſſadors at each court. This affair could not be amicably compromiſed; and the king of Spain began to make preparations for a war with Portugal; which ſo alarmed his moſt Faithful majeſty, that he inſtantly made very preſſing applications to the Britiſh court, for protection againſt the deſigns of his enemies. The king of Portugal was readily promiſed aſſiſtance; and it was reſolved, by a timely and powerful relief, to render the deſigns of the Spaniards abortive. Accordingly in the month of May, Sir John Norris, with twenty-eight ſhips of the line, was diſpatched to the river Tagus; where he was received by the inhabitants of Liſbon, as their deliverer and potector.

At this time the belligerent powers on the continent became heartily tired of the war, though neither cared to own their ſentiments. Conferences for a peace had for ſome time been carried on at the Hague, under the mediation of his Britannic majeſty and the States General; notwithſtanding the latter had renewed, for another year, their treaty of neutrality with France. Couriers were continually paſſing and repaſſing between London and Verſailles; and though the king of Great Britain could not claim the merit of having abſolutely completed the deſired work of peace, yet he undoubtedly ſmoothed the way to it by the plans he propoſed. But the two courts of Verſailles and Vienna, the two belligerent powers, diſguſted by certain proceedings in the congreſs, aſſembled to conſider of theſe plans, fell upon a more effectual method of terminating their differences: an armiſtice was propoſed by the emperor, and agreed to by the court of France, which ſoon after terminated by certain preliminary articles, by which France agreed to reſtore to the empire all the places ſhe had taken from it during the courſe of the late war. It was alſo ſtipulated that the emperor ſhould poſſeſs, the Mantuan, Parma, Placentia, and the Milaneſe. Don Carlos was to be acknowledged king of Naples and Sicily; John Francis, duke of Lorraine, was declared grand duke of Tuſcany, after the death of the reigning prince; when the duchy of Lorraine was to be annexed to the crown of France. Staniſlaus was to renounce the crown of Poland, which he had twice obtained. He was, however, allowed to retain the title of king, and to be indemnified for his loſſes. Cardinal de Fleury, the French miniſter, who was at firſt ſatisfied that Staniſlaus ſhould be put in poſſeſſion of the diſtrict of Bar, which was to be given him by the duke of Lorraine, with a reverſion to the crown of France; nor was Lorraine to be ceded, till the preſent duke was in full poſſeſſion of Tuſcany: but the cardinal afterwards demanded the whole duchy of Lorraine, on the ſame conditions as that of Bar, and eaſily obtained it, at the expence of an annual penſion of about ſixteen thouſand pounds, granted to duke Francis, till he ſhould be poſſeſſed of Tuſcany. By this treaty Lorraine was for ever annexed to the crown of France, after having been many times attempted without ſucceſs; a king of Poland was tranſplanted to Lorraine: the ſecond ſon of the king of Spain was removed to Naples: and the duke of Lorraine, by this arrangement, became ſoon after grand duke of Tuſcany. Leghorn was to be declared a free port: France undertook to guaranty the Pragmatic Sanction: and the preſent convention was to be ſupported by England, Holland, Portugal, Vienna, Spain and Sardinia.

A. D. 1736.

The act of James I. againſt conjuration and witchcraft, was repealed; and the famous act for laying a duty upon the retailers of ſpirituous liquors, commonly called the gin act, was, after long and warm debates, paſſed into a law. In this ſeſſion was alſo paſſed the Mortmain act, the Smuggling act; and one for building a bridge acroſs the Thames at Weſtminſter. On the ſeventeenth of April, his royal highneſs Frederic prince of Wales, was married to her ſerene highneſs Auguſta, princeſs of Saxe Gotha. This event was followed by extraordinary rejoicings, and congratulations from both houſes of parliament, the city of London and the two univerſities. But the moſt remarkable event that diſtinguiſhed this year, happened at Edinburgh, where John Porteous who commanded the guard of that city, was, while attending the execution of a ſmuggler, ſo far provoked by the inceſſant inſults of the populace, as to order his men, without uſing the previous formalities of the law, to fire with ſhot, among the crowd: by which inconſiderate action ſeveral innocent perſons were killed. Porteous was indicted for murder, convicted, and received ſentence of death; but her majeſty as guardian of the kingdom, his majeſty being now returned to Hanover, thought proper to grant him a reprieve. This lenity was ſo highly reſented by the common people, that they determined to execute the ſentence themſelves, on the very day the judges had fixed for that purpoſe. Accordingly about ten o'clock at night, they aſſembled in different bodies, locked the gates of the city to prevent the admiſſion of the troops quartered in the ſuburbs, ſurprized and diſarmed the town guard, broke open the priſon, dragged Porteous from thence to the place of execution, and leaving him hanging by the neck on a dyer's pole, quietly diſperſed to their reſpective habitations. In the courſe of this year died at Vienna, in the ſeventy-fourth year of his age, the celebrated prince Eugene, leaving behind him the character of an invincible hero, and conſummate politician. Count Staremberg, who ranked next after the prince in military reputation, did not long ſurvive. Lord Chancellor Talbot, univerſally admired for his worth, probity, and acquired accompliſhments, paid about the ſame time, the great debt of nature; and was ſucceeded by Lord Hardwick in his important office of chancellor.

A. D. 1737.

As the murder of Porteous was concerted and carried into execution, with remarkable prudence and moderation, it was ſuſpected that ſome of the leading citizens of Edinburgh had been concerned in that audacious riot; eſpecially as a reward of two hundred pounds offered by proclamation, for the diſcovery of any perſon who had acted in that tragedy, had not brought one man to juſtice. A bill was therefore brought into the houſe of lords to diſable Alexander Wilſon, eſq; lord provoſt of Edinburgh, from enjoying any office or place, in the magiſtracy of that city, or elſewhere in the dominions of Great Britain; for impriſoning the ſaid Alexander Wilſon; for aboliſhing the guard of Edinburgh, and for taking away the gates of the nether bow port, ſo as to open a communication between the city and the ſuburbs, where the king's troops are quartered. Some amendments and mitigations being made to this bill, it paſſed both houſes and received the royal aſſent. Another bill was paſſed this ſeſſion to limit the number of play-houſes; to ſubject all writings intended for the ſtage to the inſpection of the lord chamberlain; and to compel the authors to take out a licenſe for every production, before the piece could be publicly acted. About this time aroſe unhappily an open breach in the royal family. The princeſs of Wales had advanced to the very laſt month of her pregnancy, before either the king or queen knew any thing of her ſituation. She was conveyed from Hampton-court to St. James's palace, when it was apprehended her labour pains were approaching, and was delivered of a princeſs in about two hours after her arrival. His majeſty, on being informed of this event, ſent a meſſage to the prince, expreſſing his high diſpleaſure at his inconſiderate conduct, as an indignity offered both to himſelf and the queen. The prince implored his majeſty's pardon, and begged the mediation of the queen; the princeſs alſo joined her intreaties; but all was ineffectual. His majeſty gave the prince to underſtand, that till he ſhould withdraw his confidence from thoſe, by whoſe inſtigation and advice he was directed and enouraged in his unwarrantable behaviour to himſelf and the queen, and return to his duty, he ſhould not reſide in the palace; and added, that it was expected he ſhould leave St. James's, with all his family, as ſoon as it could be done without prejudice or inconvenience to the princeſs. Accordingly the prince, in obedience to this order, retired to Kew, and made freſh efforts to be again reſtored to his majeſty's favour; but without effect. He was not even admitted into the preſence of the queen his mother, to expreſs his duty to her in her laſt moments; to implore her forgiveneſs, and receive her bleſſing.

On the 20th of November, Wilhelmina Carolina queen conſort, died of a mortification in her bowels, in the fifty-fifth year of her age. She was regretted as a princeſs endowed with uncommon abilities, poſſeſſed of many amiable qualifications, and a pattern of conjugal fidelity. Her remains were interred, with great ſolemnity, in a new vault in Henry the Seventh's chapel, on the 17th of December.

A deputation of the merchants waited on his majeſty at Hampton court with a petition, complaining of the depredations of the Spaniards, and requeſting ſatisfaction for the loſſes they had ſuſtained. His majeſty returned a moſt gracious anſwer to this petition, and the ſecretary of ſtate ſent orders to Mr. Keene at Madrid, to repeat his inſtances at the court of Spain for their relief. In the mean time a committee of the privy council ſat at Whitehall, to receive proofs of the loſſes which the merchants had ſuffered. The French alſo about this time gave the miniſtry no ſmall umbrage, by their eager attempts to engroſs the whole commerce of the different quarters of the globe. On the north continent of America, they aſſiduouſly purſued the plan of Lewis XIV. for forming a chain of forts and ſettlements from the mouth of the Miſſiſſippi up to the province of Canada, in order to cut off the Engliſh ſettlements from having any commerce with the vaſt Indian countries to the weſtward, and, in time, to obtain poſſeſſion of them all. For this purpoſe the iſland of Cape Breton, ſituated near the mouth of the river St. Lawrence was ſtrongly fortified.

The Africans had now monopolized the gum trade near the river Senegal; they had alſo encroached on the Engliſh ſettlements on the river Gambia, and greatly extended their ſlave-trade on that coaſt, for the encouragement of their Weſt Indian ſugar-iſlands, which now furniſhed amazing quantities of ſugar, rum, indigo, cotton, ginger, and other commodities produced in that country. They had alſo planted a conſiderable colony on the coaſt of Guinea, near Surinam in South America; encroaching on the territories both of the Dutch and Spaniards in that country.

A. D. 1738.

The affairs of Europe being thus ſituated, his majeſty opened the ſeſſion of parliament on the twenty-fourth of January. His ſpeech was remarkably ſhort, and concluded with recommending the diſpatch of public buſineſs with prudence and unanimity. Each houſe preſented a warm addreſs of condolence on the queen's death, with which the king appeared to be deeply affected. The depredations of the Spaniards ſtill continued, ſo that the Engliſh merchants were exaſperated beyond all farther patience. His majeſty had referred the examination of the merchants, to a committee of the privy-council; and the former endeavoured to make good their allegations. Their cauſe was at once both ſpecious and popular; the public warmly eſpouſed their quarrel; they were ſtrongly ſupported by the minority in both houſes, who were determined to force the miniſtry into a war with Spain if poſſible.

The lords were equally as buſy as the commons in enquiring into this ſubject, and in their reſolutions went far beyond them; for they not only aſſerted our undoubted right to navigate in the American ſeas, "but alſo to carry all ſorts of goods, merchandize, or effects, from any one part of his majeſty's dominions to another; and that no goods being ſo carried, are, by any treaty ſubſiſting between the crowns of Great Britain and Spain, to be deemed or taken as contraband or prohibited goods; and that the ſearching ſuch ſhips on the open ſeas, under pretence of their carrying contraband or prohibited goods, is a violation and infraction of the treaties ſubſiſting between the two crowns."

Matters being thus concluded, the king, on the twentieth of May, put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, wherein he obſerved, "that, agreeable to what had appeared to be the concurrent opinion of both houſes of parliament, he had given orders to repeat, in the ſtrongeſt and moſt preſſing manner, his inſtances at the court of Spain, for obtaining ſatisfaction for the many injuries and loſſes ſuſtained by his trading ſubjects in America, and for effectually ſecuring their rights for the future; and he hoped from the juſtice and equity of the catholic king, to procure and eſtabliſh a free and uninterrupted exerciſe of trade between the ſubjects of the two crowns, agreeable to treaties and the law of nations."

During theſe tranſactions, a ſpirit of riot and confuſion diſcovered itſelf among the lower claſs of people in different parts of the kingdom, during the courſe of this year. The moſt dangerous of theſe tumults happened in the weſt of England, where a number of journeymen weavers roſe in a riotous manner, and committed the moſt terrible outrages on the properties and perſons of ſeveral maſters in that branch of trade, from a perſuaſion that they had uſed them ill. At length the affair grew ſo ſerious, that the government was obliged to quarter bodies of troops in ſeveral of the borough and market-towns, to prevent the ſedition from ſpreading. Nor was the metropolis itſelf free from tumults and diſorders: a moſt dangerous inſult was committed upon juſtice by a party of ſailors at Wapping, who cut down from the gibbet and brought to life one Buchanan, who had been condemned for murder; and notwithſtanding the atrocious nature of the crime, and the danger of the example, the offenders were ſo highly favoured by the public, that not one of them could ever be detected.

A. D. 1739.

On the firſt of February the ſeſſion of parliament was opened, when the king informed both houſes in his ſpeech, that he had concluded a convention with the king of Spain, who had obliged himſelf to make reparation to his ſubjects for their loſſes, by certain ſtipulated payments; that plenipotentiaries were appointed for regulating the grievances and abuſes which had hitherto interrupted the commerce of Great Britain in the American ſeas; and for ſettling all matters in diſpute in ſuch a manner, as for the future to prevent and remove all new cauſes of complaint. This convention alarmed the merchants and traders of Great Britain, filled the people with indignation, and raiſed a general outcry againſt the miniſter. The eyes of the whole kingdom were now turned upon the houſe of commons. The two contending parties ſummoned their whole ſtrength for the approaching diſpute, and on the day appointed for conſidering the convention, four hundred members had taken their ſeats by eight in the morning. Several days were employed in reading papers: at length, Horatio Walpole having launched out in praiſe of the convention, moved for an addreſs of approbation to his majeſty. The houſe, upon a diviſion, agreed to the addreſs; but when a motion was made for its being recommitted, the two parties renewed the engagement with redoubled eagerneſs and impetuoſity. Sir William Wyndham and Mr. Pulteney, poured all the thunder of their eloquence againſt the inſolence of Spain, and the conceſſions of the Britiſh miniſtry. Sir Robert Walpole exerted all his fortitude and dexterity in defence of himſelf and his meaſures; and the queſtion being put, the reſolutions of the addreſs were carried by a ſmall majority. To ſuch a degree of mutual animoſity were both ſides inflamed, that the moſt eminent members of the minority left the houſe, and returned no more to it during that ſeſſion. In the houſe of lords, the diſpute was maintained with equal warmth, but ended alſo in the defeat of thoſe who ſtigmatized the treaty; and the houſe agreed to thank his majeſty for his gracious condeſcenſion in laying the convention before them; and acknowledged his great prudence in bringing the demands of his ſubjects for their paſt loſſes to a final adjuſtment. At the head of thoſe who voted againſt the addreſs, was the prince of Wales; and his example was followed by ſix dukes, twenty-two earls, four viſcounts, eighteen barons, four biſhops, and ſixteen proxies; and a ſpirited proteſt was entered and ſubſcribed by thirty-nine peers. But notwithſtanding the parliamentary ſanction the convention had received, the rumour of a war with Spain began to revive. For the Spaniſh monarch not only ſuffered the four months to elapſe, during which interval he was to pay the ſtipulated ſum of ninety-five thouſand pounds, but ordered ſeizures to be made of the ſhips and merchandize of the Britiſh ſubjects in his dominions wherever they could be found; and even commanded all the Britiſh ſubjects to leave his territories in a ſhorter time than was allowed by treaty. Theſe proceedings put a ſtop to the conferences carried on with that crown, and Mr. Keene preſented a ſpirited declaration to the court of Madrid. This was followed with an order of council, dated July the tenth, for granting letters of marque and repriſals to our merchants. A reſolution was alſo formed for endeavouring to preclude the Spaniards from the reſources of their riches in the Weſt Indies and the South Seas. Admiral Vernon was ſent to the Weſt Indies to take upon himſelf the command of the ſquadron in thoſe ſeas, and to deſtroy the trade and ſettlements of the Spaniards. Vernon had rendered himſelf remarkable in the houſe of commons by condemning the meaſures of the miniſtry; and in a debate on the Spaniſh depredation he happened to affirm, that Porto Bello, a ſtrong port on the Spaniſh main, might be eaſily taken; and even offered to undertake the reduction of it with ſix ſhips only. The miniſter, deſirous of removing ſo troubleſome a cenſor from the houſe, ſent him to the Weſt Indies, that he might have an opportunity of executing the ſcheme he had undertaken. A declaration of war againſt Spain was publiſhed on the twenty-third of October, in which his majeſty charges the king of Spain with breaking the convention lately concluded, by not paying within the time appointed the ſtipulated ſum admitted to be due to the ſubjects of Great Britain; and on the fifteenth of November the parliament met at Weſtminſter, when the ſeſſion was opened by a ſpeech from the throne, in which his majeſty informed both houſes, that he had augmented his forces both by land and ſea.

A. D. 1740.

The fourteenth of the ſame month the committee of ſupplies reſolved to grant his majeſty two hundred thouſand pounds on account of carrying on the war, and nine thouſand five hundred for ſervices that year, not provided for by parliament; which was agreed to by the houſe. A million was alſo granted out of the ſinking fund, and two hundred thouſand pounds for the ordinary of the navy. The king having by a meſſage ſignified his intention of giving the princeſs Mary in marriage to prince Frederick of Heſſe, and expreſſed his hopes, that the commons would enable him to give him a ſuitable portion with his daughter, they unanimouſly agreed to grant forty thouſand pounds for that purpoſe; they alſo preſented an addreſs of thanks to his majeſty for having communicated this intended marriage to the houſe. On the twenty-ninth of April his majeſty put an end to the ſeſſion, after thanking the commons for the liberal ſupplies they had granted; recommended unity and concord to both houſes; and expreſſed his hopes, that the preparations he was making for carrying on the war in the moſt vigorous and effectual manner, would be crowned with ſucceſs equal to the juſtice of his cauſe. This ſeſſion being concluded, his majeſty appointed a regency, and ſet out for Hanover in the beginning of May. During theſe tranſactions, a ſhip arrived from the Weſt Indies, diſpatched by admiral Vernon, with an account of his having taken Porto Bello with ſix ſhips only, and demoliſhed all the fortifications. This event filled the whole nation with joy; and both houſes of parliament joined in a congratulatory addreſs to his majeſty on this great ſucceſs.

During the whole ſummer admiral Haddock continued cruizing in the Mediterranean, and had, for ſome time actually blocked up the mouth of that part of the harbour of Cadiz, where the Spaniſh fleet was then lying; which induced admiral Pintado, who commanded another ſquadron, to make a feint of attacking the iſland of Minorca. The Engliſh admiral was deceived; he left his ſtation in order to relieve that iſland; and the Cadiz fleet, conſiſting of nine men of war and two frigates eſcaped, and joined another ſquadron at Ferrol. But the detention of the treaſures from New Spain, kept this combined fleet in that port, till the French thought proper to declare their real intentions, by ſending a ſtrong ſquadron from Breſt and Toulon under the command of the marquis d'Antin, to Martinico, one of their Weſt Indian ſettlements, with ſecret orders, not only to act offenſively againſt the Britiſh ſubjects, but alſo to conſult meaſures for attacking Jamaica; and at the ſame time declaring, that France could no longer behold, with an eye of indifference, the enterprizes which the Engliſh nation had formed in America, nor ſuffer them to make any new eſtabliſhments in that country. Miniſtry were ſurprized at this unexpected behaviour from France, while the nation called loudly for proſecuting the war with the utmoſt vigour, in order to convince that court that we were not to be intimidated by their inſolent menaces.

In the month of September a ſmall ſquadron was fitted out under the command of commodore Anſon, conſiſting of five ſhips of war; the Centurion, the commodore's own ſhip, of ſixty guns and four hundred men; the Glouceſter and Severn, of fifty guns and three hundred men each; the Pearl, of forty guns and two hundred and fifty men; and the Wager, of twenty-eight guns and one hundred and ſixty men; beſides the Trial ſloop, of eight guns and one hundred men, and two victualling ſhips. The commodore's orders were to ſail to the South ſeas, in order to attack the enemy's colonies, and co-operate occaſionally with admiral Vernon, acroſs the iſthmus of Darien. The ſquadron did not arrive at Madeira till the twenty-fifth of October, where they watered, and took in refreſhments of ſeveral kinds. On the fourth of November, Anſon iſſued orders to the captains, appointed their rendezvous, in caſe of ſeparation, at the iſland of St. Catharine's, on the coaſt of Brazil, in South America; and the ſame day the ſquadron weighing anchor, ſteered their courſe for St. Catharine's, where they arrived on the twenty-firſt of December, having in their paſſage loſt a great number of their men by the intemperature of the warm climates. The commodore made all poſſible diſpatch for Cape Horn, but was detained by unavoidable accidents till the eighteenth of January, when the ſquadron, after burying many of their men, and ſickneſs ſtill increaſing, left the iſland, and ſailed to port St. Julian, on the coaſt of Patagonia.

About the latter end of February, admiral Vernon having equipped his ſquadron, and made every neceſſary preparation which the nature of the ſervice required, ſailed from Port Royal, on board the Staſford, accompanied by the Princeſs Louiſa, Windſor, Norwich, Falmouth, and Greenwich men of war, and a proportionable number of fireſhips, bombs, and tenders, with a deſign to bombard Carthagena, and afterwards to annoy the Spaniards in Fort Chagre, which lays a little to the ſouth-weſt of Porto Bello. After ſome difficulty he anchored in the bay of Playa Granda before Carthagena, and began a briſk bombardment againſt the town, which did conſiderable damage to ſome of the principal edifices. But not having ſtrength ſufficient to make himſelf maſter of the place, he thought proper to return to Porto Bello, from whence he frequently detached cruiſers to lie off Fort Chagre, and in a little time ſailed in order to attack it in perſon, which he did, and obliged the garriſon to ſurrender on the twenty-third of March.

This year was rendered remarkable by the death of three crowned heads: the king of Pruſſia, who was ſucceeded by his eldeſt ſon Frederic, the reigning king of that realm; Charles VI. emperor of Germany, who expired at Vienna on the ninth day of October, and was ſucceeded in his hereditary dominions by his eldeſt daughter Maria Thereſa, married to the grand duke of Tuſcany; and the empreſs of Ruſſia, who by her will appointed prince Ivan, ſon of duke Anthony Ulric of Brunſwic-Lunenburgh-Bevern, and the princeſs Ann of Mecklenburgh, her ſucceſſors. She, by the ſame will, named the duke of Courland regent of the empire, and guardian of the young czar, though his own parents were living. The regent, however, was ſoon turned out, and the czar's mother ſucceeded him in that truſt till her ſon was finally depoſed, and the princeſs Elizabeth placed on the throne of the Ruſſias. In England, the beginning of this year was diſtinguiſhed by a moſt intenſe froſt which began on Chriſtmas-day, and continued till the latter end of February. The Thames was frozen over, and a multitude of people dwelled on it in tents. A great number of booths were erected for the entertainment of the populace. A kind of fair was kept, and an ox roaſted whole upon the ice. The navigation being entirely ſtopped, the watermen and fiſhermen were deprived of the means of ſubſiſtence; and a ſtop was put to many kinds of manufactures. The price of all ſorts of proviſions roſe to a great height; even water was ſold in the ſtreets of London; and the poor could neither obtain food, or ſupply themſelves with coals or other fuel, which advanced in proportion to the ſeverity and continuance of the froſt. In this ſeaſon of diſtreſs, many unhappy families muſt have periſhed by cold and hunger, had not thoſe in eaſy circumſtances been inſpired with a remarkable ſpirit of compaſſion and humanity. The ſtreets were crowded with beggars, who were relieved with a liberal hand; and, to the honour of the Engliſh nation, uncommon pains were taken to diſcover and relieve thoſe ſtill more unhappy objects, who, from motives of falſe pride, or ingenuous ſhame, ſtrove to conceal their miſeries. The ſolitary habitations of the widow, the fatherleſs, and the unfortunate, were viſited by thoſe who felt for the woes of their fellow-creatures; and to ſuch who refuſed to receive a portion of public charity, the neceſſaries of life were privately conveyed, in a manner that delicacy could not be offended at.

About the beginning of April his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and made the cuſtomary ſpeech; and on the twenty-fifth, the king cloſed the ſeſſion, when he warmly expreſſed his entire ſatisfaction of the conduct of his parliament. His majeſty, after appointing a regency, ſet out for his German dominions about the middle of May. Having collected his fleet, Sir Chaloner Ogle ſailed for Jamaica. His arrival reanimated admiral Vernon, who now ſaw himſelf at the head of a more formidable fleet and army than had ever before been ſeen in thoſe ſeas, with full powers to act as opportunity directed.

Admiral Vernon had long meditated an attack on Carthagena, a very ſtrong city ſituated on the Spaniſh main, and now determined to carry the deſign into execution. His plan, however, was no ſecret to the Spaniards, who had omitted nothing to put the city in the beſt poſture of defence. Admiral de Torres and Don Blas de Lezo, a ſea-officer of great experience and reputation, had already reached Carthagena with the Ferrol ſquadron, and reinforced the garriſon, which now amounted to above four thouſand men. As ſoon as the admiral had received an account of the fortifications, &c. he directed Sir Chaloner Ogle to proceed with his whole diviſion of ſhips, conſiſting of four of eighty, ſix of ſixty, and one of fifty guns, beſides frigates and bomb veſſels, to demoliſh the forts and batteries, and to ſcour all the country, ſo as to ſecure a deſcent for the land forces. Sir Chaloner performed the ſervice he was entruſted with, in a very ſatiſfactory manner; while general Wentworth landed his forces on Tierra Bomba iſland, near Bocca Chica caſtle. They immediately erected a battery; and having, with the aſſiſtance of the fleet, made a practical breach in the wall, they took the caſtle by ſtorm on the twenty-fourth of February. About the ſame time, the Spaniſh ſhips that lay athwart the harbour's mouth, were either taken or deſtroyed, the paſſage was opened, and admiral Vernon, with the whole fleet, entered the harbour, and attacked Caſtillo Grande, which the enemy likewiſe abandoned to the Engliſh. The forces that were landed on Tierra Bomba were re-embarked, and ſet on ſhore again within a mile of the city. This unexpected ſucceſs ſo greatly elated both the admiral and general, that the Spence ſloop of war was diſpatched to England with letters to the ſecretary of ſtate, promiſing nothing leſs than the total reduction of the city of Carthagena. But they ſhould have remembered, that the greateſt difficulty ſtill remained, the taking of fort St. Lazaro, which muſt be done before they could attack the city. And what was ſtill of more conſequence, a miſunderſtanding had by this time ariſen between the admiral and the general; and which ſoon grew to ſuch a height, that it impeded every operation for the advantage of their country. They had their ſeparate parties, and behaved towards each other with the coldeſt reſerve. The admiral accuſed the general of inactivity, by which the enemy had time ſufficient to finiſh the fortifications they had begun at the foot of the hill on which fort St. Lazaro ſtood. The general at the ſame time accuſed the admiral of his dilatory proceedings with regard to the landing of the tents, ſtores, and artillery of the army. In ſhort, both had committed miſtakes; and inſtead of endeavouring to repair them, employed their whole attention to mortify each other. At laſt, Wentworth reſolved to do ſomething, at leaſt in appearance, and accordingly made preparations for attacking fort St. Lazaro on the eighth of March; but inſtead of beginning the attack in the night as he ought to have done, he waited till break of day. The guides alſo who were provided to conduct the troops, were killed in the march; many of the ſoldiers miſtook their way, and advanced to the ſtrongeſt part of the fortifications, which they could not have mounted, had there been no enemy to oppoſe them. But notwithſtanding all theſe difficulties, the Engliſh troops behaved with ſuch intrepidity as was really aſtoniſhing: twelve hundred men, under the command of general Guiſe, paraded on the ſtrand, where they formed, and began the attack with the utmoſt fury, amidſt an inceſſant ſhower of bullets from the artillery and ſmall arms of the Spaniards. Colonel Grant, who commanded the grenadiers, was mortally wounded; the ſcaling ladders were found too ſhort; and the officers were confuſed for want of proper directions. The ſoldiers, however, maintained their ground for ſeveral hours with the moſt heroic reſolution, till they were drawn off by the general's orders, with the loſs of ſix hundred men of the flower of the army. All hopes of taking the city of Carthagena now vaniſhed like a dream: the troops ſickened in ſo ſurprizing a manner, that no leſs than three thouſand four hundred and forty-five men periſhed in the ſpace of two days, among whom were many of the principal officers. It was therefore determined in a council of war to return immediately to Jamaica. Accordingly, after entirely demoliſhing all the fortifications the fleet ſet ſail, and arrived at Jamaica on the nineteenth of May. Thus ended an expedition that had alarmed all Europe, coſt the Engliſh nation an immenſe ſum, and filled the minds of the people with the moſt ſanguine expectations. But whenever leaders, inſtead of aſſiſting each other, form ſeparate intereſts and cabals, diſappointment and diſgrace will always be the natural conſequences. In the month of July the fleet, which, as well as the land forces were greatly reduced, many of the ſhips being rendered unſerviceable, ſailed again from Jamaica, in order to attack the city of St. Jago de Cuba, and anchored in Walthenham-bay, about twelve leagues to the windward of St. Jago. Here they had the pleaſure of finding themſelves in one of the moſt ſpacious and ſafe harbours in the world; the air perfectly pure and healthy, and their ſhips ſecure from all hurricanes. The admiral, pleaſed with this delightful bay, gave it the name of Cumberland harbour. Here the troops were landed, but continued totally inactive in their camp till the month of November; when general Wentworth abſolutely declaring that he would not march to attack St. Jago, the ſoldiers were again embarked and carried back to Jamaica. In the month of October the king returned to England, and on the firſt of December opened the ſeſſion of parliament with a ſpeech from the throne. It ſoon appeared how greatly the miniſter's party was weakened, and that Sir Robert was on the brink of ruin. The cauſes of popular diſcontent, added to many other complaints which had long been repeated againſt the miniſter, and which were exaggerated by his enemies with unwearied induſtry, rendered him at length univerſally contemptible.

It was well known to Sir Robert that the majority of a ſingle vote would be ſufficient to ſend him to the Tower; and he likewiſe knew, that his ſafety could only be ſecured by dividing the oppoſition. He however determined previouſly to try his ſtrength in the houſe of commons, with regard to the diſputed election of Chippenham in Wiltſhire; but had the mortification to find a majority of one voice againſt him. Irritated at this proceeding, he declared he would never more ſit in that houſe; and accordingly the next day the king adjourned the parliament to the eighteenth of the next month. During the interval, Sir Robert was created earl of Orford, and reſigned his employments. He had now occaſion for all his art, to ward off the blow that threatened his deſtruction. He had recourſe to the plan he had already formed, of transferring the popular odium from himſelf to his adverſaries. In order to this, a coalition was propoſed between the diſcontented whigs, and thoſe of the ſame denomination who acted under the miniſtry. Some were gratified with titles and places; and aſſurances given to all, that a new ſyſtem in the management of affairs would be adopted according to the plan they themſelves ſhould propoſe. Nor was there any thing required of them from the court, but that of ſuffering the earl of Orford to eſcape with impunity. Mr. Sandys was appointed one of the lords of the treaſury, and chancellor of the exchequer; lord Harrington was dignified with the title of earl, and declared preſident of the council; lord Carteret was made ſecretary of ſtate; and the earl of Wilmington firſt lord of the treaſury; the marquis of Tweedale was appointed ſecretary of ſtate for Scotland; Mr. Pulteney was ſworn a member of the privy-council, and afterwards created earl of Bath; the earl of Winchester was placed at the head of the admiralty in the room of Sir Charles Wager; and the earl of Stair appointed field-marſhal of all his majeſty's forces, and ambaſſador extraordinary to the States-general.

A reconciliation between the king and prince of Wales was the firſt happy effect of this change in the miniſtry: the prince now waited on his majeſty at St. James's, attended by a great concourſe of nobility, and other perſons of diſtinction: he was received in a very gracious manner, and a guard was immediately appointed to attend his royal highneſs at Carleton-houſe. On the eighteenth of February the parliament met at Weſtminſter purſuant to their adjournment; when the petitions that had been preſented by the merchants of London, Briſtol, Liverpool, Glaſgow, and many other trading towns in the kingdom, complaining of the loſſes they had ſuſtained by the bad conduct of the war, were taken into conſideration; and a number of ſmall men of war were appointed to cruiſe in the channel, and along the enemy's coaſts, to prevent the Spaniſh privateers from inſulting the merchant ſhips.

It was hoped by the people in general that the late change in the miniſtry would eſtabliſh a permanent unity and harmony among the nation: but alas! theſe hopes were quickly blaſted; and it appeared but too plainly, that thoſe who had declaimed in the loudeſt manner for the liberties of their country, had been ſolely actuated by the moſt ſordid views of ſelf-intereſt. The members that compoſed the long oppoſition were now divided; thoſe who were in power being joined by ſome of the late miniſters, and having gained over others who oppoſed them, obtained a viſible aſcendancy in the parliament; many of the leading tories were neglected by the miniſtry; the rage of party again began to kindle, and another formidable oppoſition ſoon appeared. Whigs and tories were blended together in ſuch confuſion from ſome of them being in, and others out of place, that it was difficult to make any diſtinction. Every claſs of men expected that the earl of Orford would be called to a very ſtrict account for the alarming meaſures purſued during his adminiſtration; but they were entirely diſappointed. The new miniſtry never intended any thing more, than to expoſe the miſconduct of the earl of Orford. This being done, they deſigned to protect him from all dangers that might naturally be expected to reſult from the open and declared vengeance of an enraged and unthinking multitude. They however puſhed their enquiry ſo far, as to render it evident that he had been concerned in many flagrant acts of fraud and corruption in influencing elections; and by making uſe of the wealth, power, and places of the crown, to introduce a criminal dependency in parliament, and conſequently, to ſap the very foundation of the Engliſh conſtitution. It appeared. that during the laſt ten years of his adminiſtration, no leſs than one million, four hundred and fifty-three thouſand, four hundred pounds of the public money had paſſed through his hands for ſecret ſervices; that above fifty thouſand pounds of this ſum had been paid to hireling writers; and that, on the very day preceding his reſignation, he had ſigned orders for above thirty thouſand pounds, on the revenues of the civil liſt.

In order to ſooth the reſentments of the people, and, if poſſible, to conciliate their affections, the miniſtry paſſed a bill for excluding certain officers from their ſeats in the houſe of commons. Another bill was paſſed for encouraging the linen manufacture; and a third to prevent the marriage of lunatics. They voted forty thouſand ſeamen, and ſixty-two thouſand five hundred landmen, for the ſervice of the current year: they provided for the ſubſidies paid to Denmark and Heſſe-Caſſel; they granted the ſum of five hundred thouſand pounds: and voted to ſend ſixteen thouſand three hundred and four effective men to the aſſiſtance of the queen of Hungary. The grants for this year amounted to five millions, ſeven hundred, twenty-three thouſand and thirty-ſix pounds, for the raiſing of which the committee of ſupplies provided a land-tax of four ſhillings in the pound; the malt-tax; one million from the ſinking fund; granted annuities upon it for eight hundred thouſand pounds; and procured a loan of one million ſix hundred thouſand pounds from the Bank. The total produce of this amounted to ſix millions; ſo that there remained a ſurplus of three hundred ſeventy-ſix thouſand four hundred and ſixty-three pounds. Miniſtry, from the behaviour of the French commander to admiral Haddock with regard to his attacking the Spaniſh ſquadron, determined to keep no farther meaſures with France. In the mean time admiral Haddock, partly from the fatigues of the ſervice, and partly from anxiety of mind occaſioned by the numerous diſappointments he had met with, found his conſtitution ſo much impaired, that he reſigned the command of the fleet in the Mediterranean to commodore Leſtock, who lately arrived from the Weſt Indies, and was ſent up the Streights with ten ſail of men of war, to reinforce admiral Haddock, and oppoſe the united fleets of France, and Spain. Leſtock uſed his utmoſt diligence in fitting his fleet for ſea; and on the twelfth of April ſailed for Port Mahon, with a ſquadron of twenty-eight men of war, and ſoon after appeared before Toulon, which filled the inhabitants with the utmoſt conſternation; the whole adjacent country was alarmed by fires, beacons, &c. But they ſoon found their fears had no foundation, the commodore having no intention of moleſting them. The united ſquadrons were indeed greatly ſuperior to that of England; the French, under admiral de Court, conſiſted of five ſhips of ſeventy, ſeven of ſixty, two of fifty, two of thirty, and two of twenty guns; and the Spaniſh ſquadron commanded by Don Navarro, of one ſhip of one hundred and fourteen guns, four of ſeventy, ſix of ſixty, and five of fifty; in all, thirty-ſix men of war. Commodore Leſtock, therefore, after obſerving their ſituation, proceeded to Antibes on the coaſt of Italy.

On the change of the miniſtry, Leſtock was promoted to the rank of rear-admiral of the white; but it being determined to attempt ſome bold enterprize in the Mediterranean during the courſe of the ſummer, the ſupreme concern of the fleet was beſtowed upon Thomas Matthews, Eſq; vice-admiral of the red, who was at the ſame time inveſted with the character of ambaſſador-extraordinary to the king of Sardinia, and the other princes and ſtates of Italy. Matthews left England in the month of April, and in his paſſage took ſeveral French and Spaniſh merchant ſhips, and at length ſafely joined rear admiral Leſtock in the harbour of Villa Franca. Soon after admiral Matthews's arrival in the Mediterranean, he detached captain Norris, in the Kingſton of fifty guns, and the Duke fireſhip, to burn five Spaniſh gallies which had taken ſhelter in the bay of St. Tropez, a French port in the Mediterranean; this order was effectually executed. But no action of the admiral's proved ſo agreeable to the people of England, as that of ſending commodore Martin with a ſquadron of ſhips and bomb-veſſels to Naples, to demand from the king of the Two Sicilies a promiſe in writing, to withdraw his troops from acting in conjunction with thoſe of Spain, and alſo not to give them for the future any kind of aſſiſtance. If this demand ſhould be refuſed, Martin had oders to bombard the city of Naples. The conſternation of the Neapolitans was incredible; and however his Sicilian majeſty might diſlike this inſult upon his dignity, his private reſentment was obliged to ſubmit to the intereſt of the ſtate, which was in no condition to defend itſelf. Accordingly, after ſeveral meſſages between the commodore and the duke de Montealegre, the Sicilian miniſter, the latter, in his maſter's name, gave a written promiſe that his troops ſhould be immediately withdrawn out of Lombardy, and that he would not in any manner whatſoever aid or aſſiſt thoſe of Spain any more during the preſent war in Italy. This promiſe was inſtantly performed; the Neapolitan troops were forthwith recalled; by which means the Spaniſh army was ſo conſiderably weakened, that they were incapable of performing any action of importance during the remaining part of the campaign. By this bold, but ſucceſsful ſtep of the Britiſh admiral, the queen of Hungary was ſaved from apparent deſtruction. Soon after this expedition to Naples, admiral Matthews, purſuing the ſpirited meaſures he had ſo happily began, diſpatched the ſame embaſſy to St. Remo, a ſea-port town belonging to the Genoeſe, with orders to deſtroy ſome conſiderable magazines which the Spaniards had collected. This ſervice alſo the commodore effectually performed; and in the beginning of September re-joined the vice-admiral, who now took up his ſtation in Hieres bay, where his ſhips lay in an excellent road, and commanded every veſſel that might attempt to enter into, or come out of, the harbour of Toulon. The Britiſh fleet being now joined by admiral Rowley, was rather ſuperior to the united ſquadrons of France and Spain: the latter therefore kept cloſe in Toulon harbour.

Every thing in America ſeemed to go backward, owing chiefly to the diſſentions between the admiral and general. In the latter end of the preceding year, they had received a reinforcement from England; upon the arrival of which a council of war was held, to concert in what manner the ſhips and forces might be moſt effectually employed for the advantage of the nation, and the annoyance of the enemy: when it was propoſed by the officers of the army to undertake an expedition againſt Panama, by which a body of three hundred men, with five hundred negroes, and four hundred muſquetos, were to be landed at Porto-Bello, and from thence to march over the Iſthmus of Darien to the ſaid town of Panama. This ſcheme being approved by Sir Chaloner Ogle and Mr. Vernon, Mr. Lowther was ſent aboard the Triton ſloop to the coaſt of Porto-Bello, in the character of a trader, with orders to obtain all the intelligence he could; and in the mean time the admiral got the ſquadron in readineſs; but the land-officers were ſo dilatory in their motions, that it was the latter end of March before the fleet arrived at Porto-Bello. It conſiſted of eight ſail of the line, with three fire-ſhips, two hoſpital ſhips, and about forty tranſports, having on board three thouſand land-forces, and five hundred negroes raiſed by governor Trelawney, who attended this expedition in the rank of a colonel. Admiral Vernon entered the harbour of Porto-Bello without the leaſt oppoſition; for the governor no ſooner ſaw the Engliſh fleet ſtanding in for the harbour, than he quitted the town with the utmoſt precipitation, being attended in his flight by three companies of Spaniſh ſoldiers. Moſt of the inhabitants were preparing to follow, but the admiral immediately diſpatched an officer with an interpreter, to deſire the natives would lay aſide their apprehenſions, and continue peaceably in their poſſeſſions, promiſing them the fulleſt protection in their lives and properties. Encouraged by this meſſage, a deputation from the magiſtrates was ſent on board the admiral, acknowledging his humanity, and readily putting themſelves under his protection. Lieutenant Lowther being returned, gave it as his opinion, that the deſign againſt Panama could not at that time be attempted with any hopes of ſucceſs, on account of the rainy ſeaſon of the year, and the ſickneſs which, in conſequence thereof, prevailed among the troops. This was adopted by all the land-officers, the general not excepted; and as they were greatly ſuperior in number to the ſea-officers, their opinions were always deciſive. At length a general council of war was held on board the Boyne, wherein it was agreed to wood and water the ſhips and return to Jamaica. General Wentworth, however, ſent a paper to the admiral, containing the reaſons of the land officers for laying aſide the projected attempt againſt Panama. Nothing could exceed the vexation of admiral Vernon at finding this expedition likely to conclude ſo ingloriouſly. He was convinced that two thouſand men would have been more than ſufficient for the taking of Panama; and it is certain that the governor of that place deſpaired of its preſervation.

The fleet having returned from Porto-Bello, nothing material was tranſacted in the Weſt Indies either by Vernon or Wentworth, except the taking poſſeſſion of, and ſettling the ſmall iſland of Rattan, in the bay of Honduras. On the twenty-third of September, captain Fowke arrived at Port-Royal in Jamaica, with orders for the above officers to return to England; the vice-admiral to leave the command of the fleet to Sir Chaloner Ogle, and the general to ſupply it with what number of ſoldiers ſhould be demanded, to be under that admiral's command, the government being now fully ſenſible of the diſadvantages attending a command divided between the land and ſea officers. On the ſixteenth of November, the parliament being aſſembled, his majeſty acquainted the houſe of commons in particular, "that he had ordered the proper eſtimates for the ſervice of the enſuing year to be laid before them, and alſo the account of the expence of thoſe particular ſervices which he had already mentioned, and which they would find to have been concerted in as frugal a manner as the nature of them would admit. He ſaid, he was perſuaded that they would readily grant him ſuch ſupplies as ſhould be found neceſſary for the ſecurity and welfare of the nation, requiſite for the ſupport of the common cauſe, and adequate to the emergency." After ſome oppoſition, raiſed by the diſguſted members, addreſſes were preſented to his majeſty by both houſes, expreſſing their approbation of the meaſures he had taken in ſupport of the queen of Hungary, and the reſtoration of the balance of power in Europe. About this period a treaty of mutual defence and guarantee was, ſigned at Whitehall, between his majeſty and the king of Pruſſia.

Towards the cloſe of the laſt ſeſſion, the new miniſtry had contracted for ſixteen thouſand Hanoverians to be taken into Britiſh pay, without the concurrence of parliament, whoſe approbation was expected when they aſſembled again: but on a motion made in the houſe of commons to reſolve, that the ſum of two hundred and ſixty-five thouſand one hundred and ninety-one pounds ſix ſhillings and two-pence farthing, ſhould be granted to his majeſty for defraying the charges of the aforeſaid troops, it was oppoſed with great vehemence: long and violent debates enſued, the reſult of which were, however, that this meaſure was approved by a majority in both houſes, and the money granted. The total of the grants, this ſeſſion, amounted to five millions three hundred and fourteen thouſand one hundred pounds for the ſervice of the current year, and five hundred ninety-eight thouſand three hundred and eighty-two pounds for a deficiency in the ſupplies granted for the preceding year, which together amount to the ſum of five millions nine hundred and twelve thouſand four hundred and eighty-two pounds. The committee of ways and means ſettled the ſum of ſix millions five hundred and ſixty-two thouſand four hundred and ninety-two pounds to anſwer the ſupplies; which was an exceeding of ſix hundred and fifty thouſand and ten pounds. To raiſe this ſum the land-tax at four ſhillings in the pound, was computed to furniſh two million; the malt-tax ſeven hundred and fifty thouſand; one million was taken from the ſinking-fund; one million was to be borrowed at three per cent. and eight hundred thouſand pounds to be raiſed by a lottery; five hundred and eighteen thouſand ſix hundred pounds were to be borrowed by a loan on the exciſe bills, and four hundred eighty-one thouſand four hundred pounds, being the deficiencies on the pot-duty; beſides twelve thouſand four hundred and ninety-two pounds overplus in the exchequer. On the twenty-firſt of April, his majeſty went to the houſe; where after giving the royal aſſent to ſeveral acts, he made a ſpeech to both houſes, wherein he obſerved, "that, to the end that the Britiſh nation and the common cauſe might reap the moſt beneficial fruits from the vigorous reſolutions of this parliament, he had, at the requiſition of the queen of Hungary, ordered his army, in conjunction with the Auſtrian troops, to paſs the Rhine, as auxiliaries to her Hungarian majeſty, to oppoſe any dangerous meaſures that might affect the balance and liberties of Europe, or hinder the re-eſtabliſhment of public tranquillity upon juſt and ſolid foundations." The lord chancellor then, by his majeſty's order, prorogued the parliament; and the king, immediately after, ſet out for Germany, attended by the duke of Cumberland, and ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction, in order to head, in perſon, his troops.

The forces which had been aſſembled by the king of Great Britain in the Netherlands, under the command of the earl of Stair, began their march for the Rhine, and in May they encamped near Hoech, on the river Mayne. Their intention was to join the Auſtrian forces under prince Charles of Lorraine: and the French king, in order to prevent this junction, ordered marſhal Noailles to aſſemble ſixty thouſand men on the Mayne. After ſecuring the towns of Spire, Worms, and Oppenheim, the marſhal paſſed the Rhine in the beginning of June, and poſted himſelf on the eaſt ſide of that river, above Frankfort. The earl of Stair advanced towards him, and encamped at Kilenbach, between the river Mayne and the foreſt of d'Armſtadt; from which place he made a motion to Aſchaffenburgh, with an intention to ſecure the navigation of the Upper Mayne; but the enemy, who lay on the other ſide of that river, had taken poſſeſſion of the poſts above, in ſuch a manner as to intercept all ſupplies. At the ſame time they found means to cut off the communication by water between Frankfort and the confederates. On the ninth of June, when his Britannic majeſty arrived at the camp, he had the mortification to find his army, which conſiſted of forty thouſand men, in danger of being ſtarved; but having received intelligence that twelve thouſand Hanoverians and Heſſians had reached Hanau, he determined to march thither in order to join thoſe forces, and procure proviſions for his army. Accordingly, on the twenty-ſixth he decamped, but had hardly quitted Aſchaffenburgh before it was ſeized by the French, and after marching about three leagues, he perceived the enemy to the number of thirty thouſand, had paſſed the river, and were drawn up in order of battle at the village of Dettingen, to diſpute his paſſage. He now found himſelf in a very dangerous ſituation; the enemy at Aſchaffenburgh prevented his retreat; his troops were confined in a narrow plain, bounded on the right by hills and woods, and flanked on the left by the river Mayne, on the oppoſite ſide of which the French had erected batteries to annoy the allies in their march; a conſiderable part of the French army was, at the ſame time, drawn up at the end of a narrow paſs, having the village of Dettingen on the right, a wood on the left, and a moraſs in the center. Thus hemmed in on every ſide, the confederates muſt either have fought at a great diſadvantage, or ſurrendered themſelves priſoners of war, had not the duke de Grammont, who commanded under his uncle the marſhal Noailles, actuated by a ſpirit of impatience, paſſed the defile, upon which a battle immediately enſued. The French horſe charged with great impetuoſity, and threw ſome of the Britiſh regiments of cavalry into diſorder; but the infantry of the allies behaved with ſuch intrepidity and deliberation, as ſoon determined the fortune of the day. The French were obliged to retreat and paſs the Mayne with great precipitation, after loſing about five thouſand men, killed, wounded, or taken priſoners. Had the allies purſued their advantage without giving the enemy time to recover from their confuſion, a total overthrow would, in all probability, have been the conſequence. This meaſure was actually propoſed by the earl of Stair, but his advice was superſeded.

Three thouſand men were loſt in this action by the confederates. The generals Clayton and Monroy were killed; the duke of Cnmberland was ſhot through the calf of the leg; the earl of Albemarle, general Huſke, and ſeveral officers of diſtinction were wounded: the king himſelf expoſed his perſon to a very ſevere fire of cannon and muſketry, for, during the whole engagement, he rode up and down the flanks, encouraging his troops to fight for the honour of England. Toward the latter end of October, the king of Great Britain returned to Hanover, and the army ſeparated; the troops in the Britiſh pay marched back to the Netherlands, and the reſt took the route to their reſpective countries. In the month of September, a treaty was concluded at Worms, between his Britannic majeſty, the queen of Hungary, and the king of Sardinia.

During this time admiral Matthews continued at the iſles of Hieres, to prevent the French and Spaniſh fleets from coming out of Toulon, which it was ſuppoſed they would ſoon attempt; and Sir Chaloner Ogle, who was left in America on the return of Vernon and Wentworth to England, was deterred from perſonally attempting any material enterprize, becauſe the Spaniſh ſquadron, under admiral de Torres, and which was much ſuperior to his own, ſtill continued at the Havannah. In the beginning of this year, however, he determined on an attack againſt the Spaniards, which might not too greatly weaken his fleet. Accordingly he ordered captain Knowles of the Suffolk, a ſeventy gun ſhip, to take under him the Burford of ſeventy guns, the Aſſiſtance, Norwich and Advice of fifty, and the Scarborough of twenty, with three ſloops, and to proceed to Antigua, where he was to be joined by the Eltham of forty guns and the Lively of twenty. With this ſquadron he was to make an attempt upon la Gueira and Porto Cavallo, on the Caracao coaſt; but the governor of Caracao, having received intelligence of this expedition, erected new batteries, augmented the garriſons with a numerous body of Indians, Mulattoes and Negroes; and prevailed on the Dutch governor of Curacoa, an iſland of the leſſer Antilles, to ſupply him with a conſiderable quantity of ammunition; ſo that when Knowles made an attack upon the place, he met with ſuch a warm reception, that he was obliged to abandon the enterprize, and ſailed immediately for the iſland of Curacoa, in order to repair the damage he had ſuſtained. One lieutenant and ninety-two men were killed, and three hundred and eighty wounded. The Spaniards, however, had no great cauſe of exultation, as their town and fortifications were almoſt deſtroyed, beſides the loſs of ſeven hundred men. Commodore Knowles had no ſooner refitted his ſquadron than he put to ſea with a reſolution to make an attempt upon Porto Cavallo, off which place he came to an anchor on the fifteenth of April: when taking a view of the ſituation of the Spaniards, he diſcerned twelve of their ſmalleſt ſhips, and three gallies, hauled up to the head of the harbour out of gun ſhot, and two large ones, one of ſixty, the other of forty guns, moored cloſe over to the other ſhore, there not being depth of water ſufficient for them to go up the harbour. A ſhip was likewiſe laid acroſs the channel ready to be ſunk, if an entrance ſhould be attempted, a chain being fixed from the caſtle to her ſtern, and another from her head to the main, where the Spaniards had lately erected three faſcine batteries, which extended a conſiderable length; and on the low point, called Punta Brava, were two other faſcine batteries, one of twelve guns, the other of ſeven: but the commodore perceiving they were ill-deſigned and might eaſily be flanked, reſolved on the attempt. Accordingly the next morning two ſhips were ordered to cannonade, and ſoon ſilenced both thoſe batteries. In the evening the forces were landed under the command of Major Lucas; but being ſeized with a ſudden panic they fell into the greateſt confuſion, and retreated with precipitation to their ſhips. A general conſultation of officers was now held, when it appearing that moſt of the ſhips had ſpent the chief part of their ammunition, were all terribly ſhattered in their maſts and rigging, and quite unable to renew the attack, the commodore abandoned the enterprize, and having made an exchange of priſoners with the governor of Porto Cavallo, he returned to Jamaica.

On the firſt of December the parliament met, when an addreſs, beſeeching his majeſty to diſcontinue the Hanoverian troops in the pay of Great Britain, was moved for by lord Sandwich, but the motion was rejected; as was another made by Mr. Grenville for an addreſs, requeſting his majeſty that he would not engage the Britiſh nation any farther in the war on the continent without the concurrence of the States General, on certain ſtipulated proportions of force and expence, as formerly.

A. D. 1744. At this time cardinal de Tencin, who had ſucceeded Fleury as prime-miniſter of France, was perſuaded that a deſcent on England might be attended with ſucceſs, and place the chevalier de St. George on the Britiſh throne: but ſhould it miſcarry, it would at leaſt embarraſs his Britannic majeſty, who was the chief ſupport of the houſe of Auſtria and all its allies. Preparations were therefore made for carrying the ſcheme into execution: count Saxe was appointed commander in chief; and the troops for this expedition, which amounted to fifteen thouſand men, began their march to Picardy, while a great number of veſſels were aſſembled for their embarkation at Dunkirk, Calais and Boulogne. It was determined they ſhould land in Kent, under convoy of a ſtrong ſquadron equipped at Breſt, and commanded by M. de Roqueſeuille. Theſe preparations were ſuperintended by Charles Edward, the Pretender's eldeſt ſon, who, in the month of December, had paſſed through Italy, in the diſguiſe of a Spaniſh courier, embarked at Final, and landed at Antibes, from whence he purſued his journey to Paris, and was indulged with a private audience of the French king. On the twenty-ſixth of January, M. de Roqueſeuille ſailed from Breſt, directing his courſe up the Engliſh channel with twenty ſhips of the line. On the fifteenth of February, the king ſent a meſſage to both houſes of parliament, intimating the arrival of the Pretender's ſon in France, the preparations at Dunkirk, and the appearance of a French fleet in the Engliſh channel. In anſwer to this, both houſes joined in an addreſs, declaring their indignation and abhorrence of the deſign formed in favour of a Popiſh Pretender; and aſſuring his majeſty, that they would with the warmeſt zeal and unanimity, take ſuch meaſures as would enable him to fruſtrate and defeat ſo deſperate and inſolent an attempt. Addreſſes of the ſame kind were preſented by the city of London, both univerſities, the principal towns of Great Britain, the clergy, the diſſenting miniſters, the quakers, and almoſt all the corporations and communities in the kingdom. The ſix thouſand auxiliaries which the States General were by treaty obliged to furniſh on ſuch occaſions were now demanded and granted with great alacrity and expedition. Orders were alſo ſent to bring over ſix thouſand of the Britiſh troops from Flanders, in caſe the invaſion ſhould actually take place. The habeas corpus act was ſuſpended for ſix months. Several perſons of diſtinction were apprehended on ſuſpicion of treaſonable practices. A proclamation was iſſued for putting the laws in execution againſt papiſts and nonjurors, who were commanded to retire ten miles from London; and in ſhort every precaution was taken that had any tendency to preſerve the public tranquillity.

Preparations were now carried on by the French with great diligence and expedition; ſeven thouſand men were actually embarked, and M. de Roqueſeuille, after detaching M. de Barreil with five ſhips to haſten the embarkation at Dunkirk, ſailed up the channel as far as Dungeneſs, where he came to an anchor. On the twenty-fourth of February, he perceived the Britiſh fleet, under Sir John Norris, coming round the South Foreland from the Downs; and, though the wind was againſt him, by the help of the tide, gaining way very faſt. Intimidated at the ſuperiority of his enemy, Roqueſeuille called a council of war, in which it was determined to avoid an engagement, weigh anchor at ſun-ſet, and make the beſt retreat they could to their own coaſts. In the mean time, the tide being ſpent, the Engliſh admiral was obliged to anchor two leagues to leeward of the enemy. A few hours after, a ſtrong gale of wind ſpringing up at north-eaſt, the French ſhips got under ſail, but the wind increaſing every minute, ſoon became a ſtorm that hurried them down the channel at the rate of ten miles an hour. This ſtorm, which in all probability ſaved their fleet from deſtruction, utterly diſconcerted the deſign of invading England. Many of their tranſports were driven on ſhore and daſhed to pieces, and the reſt ſo damaged that a very conſiderable time was neceſſary to repair them. This diſappointment ſo exaſperated the court of France, that the Britiſh reſident at Paris was given to underſtand, that a declaration of war would immediately enſue, and accordingly, on the twentieth of March, this was actually publiſhed, and a ſimilar declaration was made by the Engliſh againſt France, amidſt the acclamations of the people, on the 21ſt of the ſame month.

On this occaſion the Dutch were to ſupply the Engliſh with twenty ſhips of war, but only vouchſafed to ſend five or ſix, which being of no ſervice, might as well have continued at home. The elector of Saxony, and the landgrave of Heſſe, refuſed their ſtipulated ſuccours till we had an army formed in Hanover, ſufficient to protect them. The Ruſſians alledged it was too late in the year to give us that aſſiſtance we had a right to demand. The king of Pruſſia inſiſted that we were the aggreſſors, and therefore would ſend us no ſuccours. France, likewiſe, in the beginning of April, declared war againſt the queen of Hungary, who returned a like declaration againſt that nation in the month of May.

His majeſty went to the houſe of peers upon the third of April, and made a ſpeech to his parliament; to which both houſes returned the moſt affectionate and loyal addreſſes, promiſing effectually to ſtand by and aſſiſt his majeſty in proſecuting the war againſt France with the greateſt vigour, and to furniſh whatever expences ſhould be found neceſſary for the ſame, as became a free and grateful people in defence of their liberties. His majeſty put an end to the ſeſſion on the 15th of May.

During theſe tranſactions, an engagement happened in the Mediterranean between our fleet under the command of Matthews, and the combined ſquadrons of France and Spain, which he had ſo long blocked up in the harbour of Toulon. On the ninth of February they were perceived ſtanding out of the road to the number of thirty-four ſail. The Engliſh admiral immediately weighed from Hieres bay, and on the eleventh part of the fleet were engaged. Matthews in the Namur, and captain Cornwall in the Marlborough, bore down together upon Don Navarro, the Spaniſh admiral, and the Iſabella, and about half an hour paſt one the action began. Captain Forbes in the Norfolk, bore down and engaged the Conſtant; while rear-admiral Rowley, ſingled out M. de Court, who commanded the French ſquadron. A few more of the Engliſh captains followed the example of their admiral; but vice-admiral Leſtock, with his whole diviſion, remained at a great diſtance a-ſtern; and ſeveral captains who were under the eye of Matthews, behaved in ſuch a manner as reflected diſgrace on their country. A conſtant fire was, however, maintained by the Namur and Marlborough, and the Norfolk obliged the Conſtant, after an engagement of three quarters of an hour, to bear away out of the line ſo diſabled, that ſhe never returned turned to the attack. The Spaniſh admiral's ſhip, the Real, was now ſo ſhattered that ſhe lay like a wreck upon the water. Matthews therefore ſent the Ann galley fire-ſhip to deſtroy her, but this expedient miſcarried: for the ſhip ordered to cover the Ann galley did not obey the ſignal, ſo that the captain was expoſed to the whole fire of the enemy; notwithſtanding which he continued to advance till he found his ſhip on the point of ſinking. Perceiving his deſtruction inevitable he determined at leaſt to revenge himſelf in the hour of his death, and hoping he ſhould yet be able to get along ſide of the Spaniſh admiral and blow her up along with himſelf, ſet fire to the train; but it was too late, his veſſel was on fire in an inſtant, and blew up within a few yards of the Real, whoſe deck was covered with the wreck, but without receiving any damage from this dreadful exploſion. A Spaniſh launch, however, ſhared the fate of the Ann galley. She had been manned with fifty ſailors to prevent the fire-ſhip from running on board the Real, and arriving cloſe under her ſtern at the inſtant ſhe blew up, periſhed in the conflagration. The Podea, a large Spaniſh ſhip, ſtruck to captain Hawke, who ſent a lieutenant to take poſſeſſion of her: ſhe was afterwards retaken by the French ſquadron, but found ſo diſabled that they deſerted her, and ſhe was, next day, burnt by order of admiral Matthews. Night now put an end to the action, and the admiral found his own ſhip ſo much damaged that he removed his flag to another. The combined fleet took this opportunity of towing all their ſhattered ſhips before the wind, and making the beſt of their way from the Britiſh fleet, who loſt ſight of them about ten o'clock, and there being but little wind Matthews brought to, that Leſtock and the ſternmoſt ſhips might get up to him. Next day the enemy appeared to leeward, and the admiral gave chace till night. They were obſerved again on the thirteenth at a conſiderable diſtance, and our fleet purſued them till evening. On the morning of the fourteenth a great number of the ſhips of the combined fleets were ſeen diſtinctly from the maſt head, and a freſh gale ſpringing up, Leſtock gave chace to, and had conſiderably gained on them by noon; but juſt as he came up with them, Matthews threw out a ſignal to leave off chace, and afterwards bore away for Port Mahon to refit; while the enemy continuing their courſe towards the coaſt of Spain, M. de Court with his diviſion anchored in the road of Alicant, and Don Navarro ſailed into the harbour of Carthagena. When the Engliſh fleet reached the iſland of Minorca, Matthews ſuſpended Leſtock, accuſed him of having miſbehaved in the battle off Toulon, and ſent him priſoner to England. Theſe two officers had long entertained a violent reſentment againſt each other, and to gratify this paſſion, Leſtock betrayed the intereſt of his country. He might certainly have come up time enough to engage, and, in all probability, by his aſſiſtance the combined fleets of France and Spain would have been in a great meaſure deſtroyed. On the other hand Matthews ſacrificed his duty to his reſentment by calling Leſtock from the chace of the enemy when they appeared diſabled, and when, had they been vigorouſly attacked, they muſt have fallen an eaſy prey to the Engliſh. It is no wonder that a miſcarriage of ſuch importance ſhould be thought a ſubject worthy the moſt ſtrict enquiry. The community had ſuffered from the perſonal animoſity of individuals, and therefore the repreſentatives of that community undertook to puniſh thoſe who had betrayed their country. In an addreſs to the throne, the commons deſired that a court-martial might be appointed to try the delinquents; for by this time Leſtock had in his turn accuſed Matthews, who had reſigned his command to Rowley, and returned to England, and all the captains in his diviſion that had miſbehaved in the day of battle. This court-martial was conſtituted and proceeded to trial. Several commanders of ſhips were caſhiered; vice-admiral Leſtock was honourably acquitted, and admiral Matthews rendered incapable of ſerving for the future in his majeſty's ſervice. It was publicly known that Leſtock kept aloof, and that Matthews ruſhed into the hotteſt part of the engagement, yet the former triumphed on his trial, and the latter narrowly eſcaped the ſentence of death for cowardice and miſconduct. On the eleventh of May a treaty of alliance and union was concluded at Frankfort between his Imperial majeſty, the king of Pruſſia, the elector Palatine and the king of Sweden, as landgrave of Heſſe: by which they agreed, "To employ their good offices either to perſuade or compel the queen of Hungaria to recognize the emperor's title, to reſtore his hereditary Bavarian dominions, and to give up the archives of the empire, which ſhe was in poſſeſſion of."

An army of one hundred and twenty thouſand men had been aſſembled by the French in the Netherlands, provided with a very formidable train of artillery, under the command of marſhal Saxe. In the month of May the allied forces, conſiſting of twenty thouſand active men, aſſembled in the neighbourhood of Bruſſels, whence they marched to Oudenarde, and placed themſelves behind the Schelde, not being able to meet the French in the field. Saxe made himſelf maſter of Menin, Ypres, Fort Knocque, and Furnes; Coigni and Seckendorf, at the head of a ſtrong body of troops, were advantageouſly poſted for the defence of Alſace. Prince Charles of Lorrain, however, found means to paſs the Rhine, and obliged the French and Bavarian generals to retire in order to cover Straſburgh; while the Auſtrians took Haguenau and Saverne, ſecured the paſſes of Lorrain, and laid all the country of Lower Alſace under contribution. The French king immediately ordered a detachment of thirty thouſand men from his army in Flanders to reinforce that under the command of the marſhal de Coigni. Lewis himſelf ſet out for the Rhine, in order to check the progreſs of the enemy, but was ſeized by a ſevere diſtemper at Metz in Lorrain. Prince Charles purſued his conqueſt with great rapidity, and would, in all probability, have rendered the ſchemes of France in regard to the Netherlands abortive, had not the king of Pruſſia, at the head of a numerous army, entered the electorate of Saxony, penetrated into Bohemia, and made himſelf maſter of Prague. This irruption obliged the queen of Hungary to recal prince Charles from Alſace: accordingly he paſſed the Rhine in the face of the French army, marched to the Danube, laid the Upper Palatinate under contribution, and joined the troops in Bohemia under the command of Borthinny and Merotitz. He was ſoon after reinforced by twenty thouſand Saxon troops, which rendered the combined army ſuperior to that of his Pruſſian majeſty, who now abandoned all his conqueſts in Bohemia, and retired with precipitation into Sileſia. The retreat of prince Charles left the French at liberty to paſs the Rhine, which they did at Fort Louis, and inveſted the ſtrong and important city of Friburgh, defended by general Damnitz, at the head of nine thouſand veterans. On the eleventh of October the French king arrived in the camp, and after a ſiege of forty-five days, the garriſon was obliged to ſurrender, the place being firſt reduced to a heap of ruins, and above fifteen thouſand of the beſiegers killed. But the generals who commanded the allied forces deſpiſed each other. Wade, the Engliſh commander, was vain and weak, and the duke d'Aremberg was proud and rapacious, and deſtitute both of talents and ſentiment: ſo that after having made a general forage without moleſtation, they retired to their former camp at the Schelde, and ſoon after into winter quarters; Count Saxe having followed their example.

In the month of June, Commodore Anſon returned to England, having been abſent three years and nine months, during which time he had ſurrounded the whole terraqueous globe. It has been already obſerved that he ſailed for the South Sea, in order to diſtreſs the Spaniſh ſettlements of Chili and Peru. It was the thirtieth of November before he weathered Cape Horne, after ſurmounting moſt terrible difficulties, and loſing ſight of the Pearl and Severn, two of his largeſt ſhips; they having been unable to weather Cape Horne, returned to Europe. The commodore's whole ſtrength was now reduced to a couple of ſhattered half-manned cruizers, and a ſloop ſo far diſabled that in many climates they would not have ventured out to ſea. Upon doubling the Cape his little ſquadron was again ſhattered and diſperſed by a violent tempeſt, and one half of the men periſhed aboard by an inveterate ſcurvy. The commodore's ſhip being ſeparated from the reſt, put into the iſland of Juan Fernandez on the ninth of June, where he was afterwards joined by the Tryal ſloop, and the Glouceſter, three of his own ſhips being yet miſſing. The Anna Pink came in about the middle of Auguſt, and the commodore ſent the Tryal ſloop to Maſſa Fuera, about twenty-two leagues to the weſt of Juan Fernandez, in queſt of the miſſing ſhips, but without ſucceſs. The Wager, a twenty gun ſhip, commanded by captain Cheap, had come with the commodore into the South Seas, but had been ſeparated from him in one of thoſe dreadful ſtorms the ſquadron had encountered, and was unfortunately wrecked on the iſland of Socoro, but the crew, amounting to one hundred, were all ſaved: they, however, imagining that all ſubordination was at an end when the veſſel periſhed, began to mutiny, and having confined the captain, and converted the long-boat into a ſchooner, eighty of them ſet ſail for Rio Grande on the coaſt of Brazil, where, after their number had been more than one half diminiſhed by ſickneſs, they at laſt arrived in the month of January, 1742. Captain Cheap, with the ſmall number who remained behind, found means to be conveyed to Chiloi, from thence to Valparaiſo, and afterwards to St. Jago, the capital of Chili. Here they remained above a year, till at length a cartel being ſettled between the two nations, they were permitted to return to their own country. There now remained with the commodore, the Centurion, the Glouceſter, the Tryal ſloop and the Anna Pink, which latter was loaded with proviſions. With theſe he put to ſea on the eighth of September, and took ſeveral conſiderable prizes near the iſland of Fernandez; but having ſoon after advanced towards the equator, he ventured to attack the city of Paita, where he had learned from ſome of the priſoners on board his prizes, that a large ſum of money was at that very time lodged in the cuſtom-houſe belonging to the Spaniſh merchants, and intended to be ſhipped on board a veſſel then in that port: in executing this bold and hazardous enterprize, he neither made uſe of his ſhips, nor of the land forces on board them, but ſent fifty-eight of his own ſeamen, commanded by Mr. Brett, his lieutenant. Theſe were ordered into boats, and, taking the advantage of the night, landed unperceived. On entering the town the ſailors ſet up a loud ſhout, which inſpired the inhabitants with ſuch terror and confuſion, that, together with their governor, they abandoned the place with the utmoſt precipitation, imagining a conſiderable army was in purſuit of them; after which the ſailors carried off the treaſures which they found in the cuſtom-houſe and private dwellings without moleſtation. The commodore then ordered the town to be ſet on fire, which was ſoon deſtroyed. The loſs which the Spaniards ſuſtained, was much greater than the advantage the Engliſh made, for it amounted to about a million and a half of dollars, but the booty of the Engliſh did not exceed forty thouſand pounds. Anſon now prepared to ſail with all expedition to the ſouthern parts of California or to the adjacent coaſt of Mexico, there to cruiſe for the Manilla galleon, which he knew was then at ſea, bound for the port of Acapulco. It was then about the middle of November, and the galleon did not uſually arrive at Acapulco till the end of January. By croſs winds and bad weather it was the nineteenth of February, 1742, before the Engliſh ſquadron arrived off that place, when they received the diſagreeable intelligence that the Manilla ſhip had anchored in that harbour on the ninth day of January; that ſhe had converted her cargo into money, and was to have ſailed again on the fourteenth of March, but that upon a ſquadron having been diſcovered by the Spaniards, the governor of Acapulco had countermanded her departure for that year. The commodore had now a moſt dreary proſpect; the rainy ſeaſon approached, and he had nothing left but to croſs the Pacific ocean to the river Canton in China. The Tryal ſloop was grown ſo leaky, that ſhe was no longer able to ſwim, and was therefore ſcuttled and ſunk, as were the prizes which had been taken, and the crews were put on board the Centurion and Glouceſter. With theſe two only remaining ſhips, the Anna Pink having been diſcharged and ſent home, the commodore ſtretched away for the river Canton, which he was in hopes of reaching in about two months, but the winds continued againſt him, and to add to his diſtreſs, the Glouceſter ſprung a leak, which obliged him to take her crew on board the Centurion and burn her. The commodore's ſhip was now the only one left of his whole ſquadron, and ſhe was in a moſt ſhattered condition. Incredible were the miſeries and hardſhips he and his people ſuffered from the leakineſs of the veſſel, and the ſcorbutic diſorder which raged amongſt them with the moſt alarming violence. At laſt, towards the end of Auguſt, they made one of the Marian or Ladrone iſlands, called Tinian, which at that time was quite uninhabited, and to this place the whole crew owed their preſervation. It was the middle of October before the commodore was in a condition to put to ſea again, and on the twelfth of November he arrived at Macao, where his ſhip was refitted, and the Chineſe furniſhed him with proviſions and ſtores to enable him to proceed to England. Having taken on board ſome Laſcars and Dutch ſailors, whom he thought might be uſeful to him, he ſailed on the fifteenth of April, with a full determination to go in ſearch of the Manilla ſhip or ſhips, which he had reaſon to believe were, at this ſeaſon of the year returning from Acapulco. By the laſt of May the Centurion arrived off Cape Eſpiritu Santo, on the iſland of Sammal, in the direct track of the Manilla ſhip; and upon the twentieth of June, the ſo much deſired object was deſcried. This ſhip, called the Noſtra Senhora de Cabadonga, was mounted with forty guns, and the treaſure with other effects on board amounted to three hundred and thirteen thouſand pounds ſterling. The Centurion; though mounting ſixty guns, had but two hundred and twenty-ſeven men on board. An engagement, however, enſued, in which the reſolution and ſkill of the Engliſh overbalanced all the ſuperiority of the Spaniards; and the galleon, after having ſixty-ſeven men killed and eighty-four wounded, ſtruck. The Centurion had only two men killed, and one lieutenant and ſixteen hands wounded. The commodore returned with his rich prize to Canton, when after having refitted his ſhip, and ſupplied himſelf with ſuch neceſſaries as he wanted, he prepared to return to his native country; but before his departure from Canton he ſold the hulk of the galleon to the merchants of Macao. On the eleventh of March he arrived at the Cape of Good Hope; and, by favour of a fog, having unknown to himſelf run through a fleet of French ſhips, he, as we have already obſerved, in the month of June, arrived ſafe at Spithead.

Sir Charles Hardy ſailed in April, with a ſquadron of eleven ſhips of the line, and one bomb-ketch, having under his convoy a conſiderable number of veſſels laden with ſtores and proviſions for the fleet in the Mediterranean. Sir Charles conducted his convoy ſafe to Liſbon, where he was detained a conſiderable time by a ſquadron of fourteen ſail of the line and ſix frigates, commanded by M. Rochambault, and ſent from Breſt to cruize off the rock of Liſbon, and intercept Sir Charles if he offered to put to ſea. The Britiſh miniſtry no ſooner received intelligence of this, than they ordered Sir John Balchen, who commanded a large fleet at Spithead, to ſail with the firſt favourable wind, and proceed in queſt of the Breſt ſquadron. Before theſe orders could be put into execution, Sir John was reinforced by a Dutch ſquadron of twenty men of war, commanded by admiral Bacchereſt, which their high mightineſſes had at length conſented to ſend, agreeable to the treaty of 1697. On the ſeventh of Auguſt, the combined fleets ſailed from Spithead, conſiſting of twenty-one ſail of the line, and on the ninth of September arrived off the rock of Liſbon. M. Rochambault, finding this combined fleet ſo much ſuperior to him in force, thought proper to quit his ſtation, leaving Sir Charles Hardy at liberty to proceed according to his deſtination, and Sir John Balchen ſailed again for England; but, on the third of October, he was overtaken in the Bay of Biſcay by a violent ſtorm of wind, in which his own ſhip, the Victory, of one hundred and ten guns, was loſt on the rocks of Alderney, commonly called the Caſkets, and this brave commander, with all his officers, volunteers, and crew, amounting to eleven hundred picked ſeamen, periſhed. The reſt of the fleet with great difficulty eſcaped the fury of the ſtorm, and got ſafe to Spithead. On the fourth of October, the marſhal duke de Belleiſle, and his brother, halting in their way to Berlin, at a village in the foreſt of Hartz, dependent on the elector of Hanover, they were apprehended by the bailiff of the place, and brought to England. They reſided at Windſor till the following year, when they were releaſed, being allowed the benefit of a cartel.

Towards the cloſe of this year, another revolution happened in the Britiſh cabinet. Lord Carteret, who was now, in conſequence of his mother's death, earl of Granville, finding it impoſſible to withſtand an oppoſition formed againſt him in parliament, wiſely avoided the impending ſtorm, by a voluntary reſignation of his employments. The earl of Harrington ſucceeded him as ſecretary of ſtate. The duke of Bedford was appointed firſt lord of the admiralty, and the earl of Cheſterfield lord-lieutenant of Ireland. The lords Gower and Cobham were re-eſtabliſhed in the offices they had reſigned. Mr. Littleton was made a commiſſioner of the treaſury. Sir John Hynde Cotton accepted of a place at court; and a ſeat at the board of trade and plantations was given to Sir John Phillips.

A. D. 1745. Perfect harmony ſubſiſted in both houſes, and during this whole ſeſſion, which began on the twenty-eighth of November, there was ſcarcely a diviſion heard of; and nothing was wanting on the part of the new miniſtry to convince his majeſty, that they were determined to carry on the war with vigour. New levies for land and ſea were ordered, and the commons voted ſix millions and a half for the ſervice of the current year, to be raiſed by the land, the malt, and ſalt taxes, the ſinking fund, and an additional duty on foreign wines. The king acquainted the parliament, "That he had concluded a treaty of quadruple alliance, in conjunction with the queen of Hungary and the States-general; and that the empreſs of Ruſſia, the republic of Poland, and all the other powers of Europe, ſhould be invited to accede to this treaty, which was to continue after the war was concluded." March the twelfth, his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland was appointed captain-general and commander in chief of all his majeſty's forces; and in the ſame month died Robert earl of Orford, late prime miniſter, after having enjoyed for a very ſhort time a penſion of four thouſand pounds per annum from the crown, in conſideration of his paſt ſervices. This miniſter, though he had long directed the application of the public treaſure, was not remarkable for his riches; he was of a liberal diſpoſition, and had ſuch a number of rapacious dependents to gratify, that very little was left for himſelf. May the ſecond, the king went to the houſe of peers, and concluded the ſeſſion with a gracious ſpeech from the throne, acquainting the two houſes with his intention of leaving the kingdom for a ſhort time; he then nominated a regency to adminiſter the affairs of government during his abſence, and the next day embarked on board the Caroline yacht for Holland. On the twelfth he landed at Helvoetſluys, and from thence proceeded directly for Hanover.

Owing to the death of the emperor Charles VII. affairs on the continent were now entirely changed. The grand duke of Tuſcany, conſort to the queen of Hungary, declared himſelf candidate for the Imperial throne; but his election was warmly oppoſed by the French king and his allies. A powerful army was aſſembled by the French in the neighbourhood of Frankfort, in order to influence the election; but the Auſtrian army, commanded by the grand duke in perſon, marching thither from the Danube, the prince of Conti was obliged to repaſs the Rhine at Nordlingen. On the ſecond of September the grand duke was, by a majority of voices, declared king of the Romans, and emperor of Germany at Franckfort. Meanwhile the king of Pruſſia, after having made himſelf maſter of the capital of Saxony, concluded a treaty at Dreſden, under the mediation of his Britannic majeſty. By this convention, the king of Pruſſia retained all the contributions he had levied in Saxony, and the elector engaged to pay him a million of German crowns at the next fair of Leipſic: he, and the elector palatine agreed to acknowledge the grand duke emperor of Germany, and evacuate the Saxon territories. This treaty reſtored the peace of Germany, and the king of Poland now enjoyed his hereditary dominions without any interruption.

In vain France endeavoured to prevent the elevation of the grand duke to the Imperial throne; but Lewis reſolved to humble the houſe of Auſtria, by making a conqueſt of the Netherlands. Accordingly a prodigious army was aſſembled there, under the auſpices of count Saxe; and his moſt Chriſtian majeſty, with the dauphin, arriving in the camp, they inveſted the ſtrong town of Tournay on the thirtieth of April. The garriſon conſiſted of eight thouſand Dutch, commanded by the old baron Dorth, who made a vigorous defence. The duke of Cumberland aſſembled the allied army, and aſſumed the chief command, being aſſiſted by the advice of count Konigſegg, general of the Auſtrians, and the prince of Waldeck, commander of the Dutch forces. Their army was greatly inferior to the enemy, notwithſtanding which they reſolved to march to the relief of Tournay. Accordingly they advanced to Leuſe, and on the twenty-eighth of April took poſt at Maulbre, in ſight of the French army, which was encamped on an eminence, and extended from the village of Antoine to a large wood beyond Vazon, having Fontenoy in their front. Next day was employed by the allies in driving the enemy from ſome out-poſts, and clearing the defiles through which they were obliged to advance to the attack; while the French completed their batteries, and made the moſt formidable preparations for their reception. On the thirtieth of April, about two o'clock in the morning, the duke of Cumberland began the attack; a briſk cannonade enſued, and about nine both armies were engaged. The Britiſh infantry drove the French beyond their lines; but the left wing of the allies failing in the attack on the village of Fontenoy, and the cavalry forbearing to advance on the flanks, they meaſured back their ground in ſome diſorder, occaſioned by the prodigious fire of the French batteries. They rallied, however, and returning to the charge with re-doubled ardor, repulſed the enemy to their camp with great ſlaughter; but being wholly unſupported by the other wing, and expoſed both in front and flank to a dreadful fire, which did great execution, about three in the afternoon the duke was obliged to make the neceſſary diſpoſitions for a retreat, which was effected in tolerable order. The battle was fought with great obſtinacy, and the ſlaughter on both ſides was very great. The allies loſt about twelve thouſand men, among whom were many officers, lieutenant-general Campbel, and major-general Ponſonby being two of them. The victory coſt the French almoſt an equal number of lives; and although the attack was judged raſh and precipitate, the Britiſh and Hanoverian troops fought with ſuch intrepidity and perſeverance, that, if they had been properly ſupported by the Dutch forces, and their flanks covered by the cavalry, the French, in all probability, muſt have abandoned the ſiege. The duke of Cumberland left his ſick and wounded to the humanity of the victors; and retiring to Aeth, encamped in an advantageous ſituation at Leſſines. The garriſon of Tournay, though now deprived of all hope of relief, maintained the place to the twenty-firſt of June, when the governor obtained an honourable capitulation. The duke of Cumberland apprehending the enemy had a deſign upon Ghent, ſent a detachment of four thouſand men to reinforce the garriſon of that city: but they fell into an ambuſcade at Pas-du-mêle, when above one thouſand of them were killed or taken priſoners. That very night Ghent was ſurprized by a detachment of the French army. The conquerors next inveſted Oſtend, which though defended by an Engliſh garriſon, and open to the ſea, was, after a ſhort ſiege, ſurrendered by capitulation on the fourteenth of Auguſt. Dendermonde, Oudenarde, Newport, and Aeth, ſhared the ſame fate, while the allied army lay intrenched beyond the canal of Antwerp: and the French king having ſubdued the greateſt part of the Auſtrian Netherlands, returned to Paris, which he entered in triumph. On the twelfth of October, his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland returned to England, and ſoon after the combined forces took up their winter quarters in Bruſſels, Mechlin, and Antwerp.

The Engliſh navy performed many ſignal ſervices in the courſe of this year. Admiral Rowley, who ſucceeded Matthews as commander of the fleet in the Mediterranean, carried on his operations with great ſpirit and ſucceſs. He bombarded Savona, Genoa, Final, St. Remo, and Baſtia, the capital of Corſica; took ſeveral Spaniſh ſhips, but could not prevent the galleons from arriving ſafe at Corunna. In the Eaſt Indies, commodore Barnet took ſeveral French ſhips richly laden; and commodore Townſhend cruiſing near Martinico, made himſelf maſter of thirty merchant ſhips, under convoy of four men of war, two of which were deſtroyed. Several valuable prizes were alſo taken by our privateers; but what crowned the ſucceſs of this year was the conqueſt of Louiſburgh, a town ſituated on the iſland of Cape Breton, fortified at a prodigious expence, and frequently termed the Dunkirk of North America; a place of the greateſt importance to France, being the center and defence of their fiſhery. The plan for taking this fortreſs is ſaid to have been laid by Mr. Auchmuty, judge-advocate of the court of admiralty in New England. It was recommended by their general aſſembly to our miniſtry here at home, and approved of by his majeſty, who ſent inſtructions to commodore Warren to ſail to Boſton, and aſſiſt the forces of New England in this expedition. Mr. Peppernel, a merchant of Piſcataway, of very extenſive influence in that country, but utterly unacquainted with military operations, was placed at the head of the American army, which conſiſted of ſix thouſand men. Commodore Warren arrived at Canſo, with ten ſhips of war, in the month of April, and the troops being embarked, in a few days after his arrival, on board tranſports provided for that purpoſe, the whole fleet ſailed for the iſland of Cape Breton, where they landed without oppoſition. The enemy ſoon abandoned their grand battery, by which the ſucceſs of the enterprize was greatly facilitated. The commodore ſo effectually blocked up the place by ſea, that no ſuccours could be introduced; while the American forces, aſſiſted by eight hundred marines, carried on the approaches by land; and on the ſeventeenth of June, the town being conſiderably damaged by the bombs and bullets of the beſiegers, the governor, deſpairing of relief, thought proper to capitulate, by which Louiſburgh, and the whole iſland of Cape Breton, were ſurrendered to his Britannic majeſty. The garriſon and inhabitants engaged not to bear arms againſt Great Britain or her allies for twelve months; and being embarked in fourteen cartel ſhips, they were conveyed to Rochfort in France. A few days after the ſurrender of Louiſburgh, two French ſhips from the Eaſt Indies, and a third from Peru, ſailed hither for protection, and the Engliſh ſquadron ſurprized and took them.

Our readers muſt now be apprized of a critical period, when a new ſcene engaged the earneſt attention, and patriotic exertions of the whole nation; we mean the riſe and progreſs of a ſecond rebellion, projected in France, under pretence of ſupporting the claims of a young Pretender; but, in reality, ſet on foot with no other view, than that of throwing the nation into confuſion by a political diverſion, of which the French intended to take a proper advantage. It is our deſign to give a faithful narration of facts; marking, at the ſame time, each memorable event with proper date and circumſtances. We ſhall here purſue our uſual aſſiduity in the ſelection of choice materials, and ſhall preſent our readers with a new ſuccinct account of this rebellion, with all its melancholy tranſactions, not to be found in any other hiſtory of this country. It is our peculiar pride, we hope a commendable quality in our favour, that we have not followed the example of our predeceſſors and competitors, by ſlaviſhly walking over the ſame ground. This we ſcorn. Others, who have diveſted themſelves of ſhame and remorſe, and who have neither character nor reputation to loſe, may meanly endeavour (though without ſucceſs) to imitate part of our plan, and ſome of our embelliſhments, with a view of depriving our publiſher of thoſe ſmall emoluments, which, we flatter ourſelves, a diſcerning public will pronounce a well earned, honeſt, and juſt reward of our induſtrious labours; but we alſo ſcorn ſuch a conduct, which certainly muſt be deteſted by a generous and diſcerning public. We reſt upon the juſtice of that public to decide upon our claim of ſuperiority in every reſpect; nor ſhould we have touched upon this delicate ſubject, but that we think it our incumbent duty to prevent their being impoſed on, by what they will ſoon find to be, a ſhameleſs deception and impoſition. We ſhall therefore without further preamble give a true ſtate of the facts.

Charles, the eldeſt ſon of the Chevalier de St. George, encouraged by the zealous partizans of his houſe in England, and flattered by France with a promiſe of powerful ſuccours, reſolved to make one more effort for aſcending the throne of theſe kingdoms. It was known in the ſummer of this year, that preparations were privately making for an expedition into Scotland, a principal officer in the French navy having raiſed a company of one hundred men, under pretence for the Eaſt-India Company's ſervice, which were ſtiled Graſſins de Mer, and were handſomely clothed in blue faced with red. They were put on board a ſmall frigate, carrying eighteen guns; and every thing being now ready, the young Pretender came privately from the houſe of the duke de Fitz-James to port Lazare in Britanny, where, on the fourteenth of June, he embarked with about fifty Scots and Iriſh, accompanied by the marquis of Tullibardine, Sir Thomas Sheridan, and a few other Scotch adventurers, with a view of ſailing round Ireland, and to land in the north-weſt of Scotland. This frigate of the Pretender's was joined off Belleiſle by the Elizabeth, a French ſhip of war of ſixty guns, taken from us by the French, and now extremely well manned for this ſervice. In their paſſage, ſhe fell in with a fleet of Engliſh merchantmen, under convoy of three men of war, one of which, the Lion, commanded by the gallant captain Brett, engaged the Elizabeth for nine hours; but the frigate bore away, and continued her intended voyage. The Elizabeth, when night came on, made the beſt of her way, and returned to Breſt quite diſabled, having had her captain and ſixty-four men killed, and one hundred and thirty dangerouſly wounded. She had on board a large ſum of money, and arms for ſeveral thouſand men, which were, no doubt, to be landed with the Pretender for the uſe of his adherents. As to the frigate, ſhe continued her courſe; and having cruized for ſome days between the weſtern iſlands of Bara and Uyſt, at laſt ſtood in for the coaſt of Lochabar, where, between the iſlands of Mull and Skie, the young chevalier, with his fellow adventurers landed, on the twenty-third of July. He went firſt to the houſe of Mr. Macdonald Kenlock Moidant, where he remained for ſome time before he ventured a public appearance.

Being joined about the middle of Auguſt by the Camerons of Lochiel, the Macdonals of Glengary, the Stuarts of Appin, and others of the clans, to the number of between fifteen hundred and two thouſand men, he reſolved to ſet up his ſtandard. This was accordingly done, and the motto he made choice of was Tandem Triumphans, "At length Triumphant." About the middle of Auguſt he appeared with his forces in the neighbourhood of Fort William, and about this time publiſhed ſeveral of his father's manifeſtos, among which one was dated in 1743, which plainly ſhewed that an invaſion was then intended, another in this year, declaring his ſon regent, and a third containing large promiſes to the people of Scotland. Soon after, two companies of St. Clair's regiment fell in with the rebels, whom they were ſent to reconnoitre, and were moſt of them taken priſoners, as captain Sweatnam of Guy's regiment was preſently after, but he was releaſed upon his parole; and it was from this gentleman that the firſt diſtinct accounts were obtained of the force, diſpoſition, and deſign of the rebels, who began then to think themſelves ſtrong enough to march ſouthward, for which they very ſpeedily prepared.

Lieutenant-general Sir John Cope, knight of the Bath, at this time commander in chief of the king's forces in Scotland, drew together the troops then in that kingdom, armed the militia, and took ſuch other precautions as he thought requiſite; and at length judged it expedient to march northward in order to find out the enemy, ſuppoſing that they would either wait for him at the Chain, which is the name uſually given to the great road croſs the iſland from Inverneſs to Fort William, or endeavour to meet and fight him in his paſſage; but they did neither: for while the general made a long and fatiguing march to Inverneſs, the rebels gave him the ſlip, and inſtead of marching through the paſs of Corryerroch, they took the way over the mountains; and the firſt news heard of them was, that they had taken poſſeſſion of Perth on the fourth of September, and on the fifth the Pretender was publicly proclaimed there. It was now known that ſeveral perſons of diſtinction had declared for, and were in arms to aſſiſt the chevalier, particularly the perſon called duke of Perth, chief of the noble family of Drummond, and ſon to the earl of Perth, chancellor of Scotland, who followed the fortunes of the late king James, and was by him created a duke in France; the marquis of Tullibardine, now ſtiling himſelf duke of Athol, eldeſt ſon to the late duke, but attainted for the ſhare he had in the laſt rebellion; lord George Murray, his brother, and ſeveral others; by which their numbers ſo much increaſed, that on the eleventh they began their march towards the Forth, which river they paſſed at the Frews by fording it on the thirteenth, and ſeemed to direct their rout towards Glaſgow, which city the young chevalier ſummoned; but receiving no anſwer, they diverted their march eaſtward towards Edinburgh on the 14th.

During this time Sir John Cope marched with all poſſible expedition from Inverneſs to Aberdeen, where he embarked his men, and on the ſixteenth of September entered the harbour of Dumbar, where the next day the men landed, and on the eighteenth the artillery. They were ſcarce well aſhore, before they had advice of the city of Edinburgh being in the hands of the rebels; but general Gueſt had retired into the caſtle with a ſmall number of regular troops, the Bank, and moſt of the public offices, having been removed into that fortreſs before. Brigadier Fowke, with Gardiner's and Hamilton's dragoons, having joined Sir John Cope's army, they, on the nineteenth, marched from Dumbar, and encamped at night on the weſt ſide of Haddington; the next morning early they continued their march, and in the evening reached Preſton Pans, the highlanders appearing on the high grounds to the ſouth of them, ſo that they were very near each other, and during night ſome firing paſſed between them.

It is impoſſible to aſcertain the number of men each army conſiſted of: the regiments that Sir John Cope had with him were colonel Gardiner, and major-general Hamilton's dragoons, lieutenant general Guiſe's, colonel Lee's, colonel Murray's, colonel Laſcelles's, and the earl of Loudon's regiments of foot; but of theſe there was only one complete. As for the rebels, the largeſt number mentioned in any of our accounts was five thouſand, but they owned themſelves no more than three thouſand; and it is agreed, that not above one half of theſe engaged. They attacked the king's troops about three in the morning; and the dragoons breaking on the firſt fire, left the foot expoſed to the highlanders, by whom, after a ſhort diſpute, they were defeated, a conſiderable number killed, and the beſt part of the reſt made priſoners, the few field-pieces they had with them being likewiſe taken. The earls of Loudon and Hume having rallied the dragoons, retired with them to Lauder, and from thence the next day to Berwick; brigadier Fowke, and colonel Laſcelles came back to Dumbar, and Sir John Cope went to Berwick. This is, by ſome, called the battle of Preſton Pans; by others, the battle of Seaton, from two little towns near which it was fought; but it is more properly ſtiled the battle of Glaideſmuir, ſince that was the field of battle, being a wide barren heath, about ſeven miles eaſt from Edinburgh.

The following is a liſt of the officers killed and wounded. Colonel Gardiner's dragoons: colonel Gardiner, killed; lieutenant-colonel Whitney, wounded. Hamilton's dragoons: lieutenant-colonel Wright, wounded; major Bowles, wounded. Laſcelles's foot: captain Steuart, killed; enſign Bell much wounded. Murray's: captain Leiſlie, ſlightly wounded; enſign Haldane, dangerouſly wounded. Guiſe's: captain Pointz, dangerouſly wounded; captain Holwell, killed. Leigh's: captain Bromer, killed; captain Rogers, killed; lieutenant-colonel Whiteford wounded, but not dangerouſly.

This engagement being over, the rebels continued at Diddiſton and Muſſelburgh on the twenty-ſecond and twenty-third, and did not return to Edinburgh till the twenty-fourth. On the twenty-ninth in the evening, they began to take their meaſures for cutting off all communication between the caſtle of Edinburgh and the town; which, conſidering that they wanted heavy artillery, and indeed all other requiſites for a ſiege, was a very needleſs and ſtrange attempt, and ſerved only to expoſe themſelves to conſiderable loſs, as appeared by the event. On the firſt of October they opened their trenches on the caſtle hill, a little below the reſervoir, and by four in the afternoon they abandoned their works. The city of Glaſgow being ſummoned a ſecond time, and fifteen thouſand pounds being demanded by way of contribution, they were conſtrained to compound the matter for five thouſand guineas, which were immediately paid. On the ſeventh, the rebels demanded half a crown in the pound from the landlords of houſes in Edinburgh, under pain of military execution. About the middle of this month they were joined by conſiderable reinforcements, under the command of ſeveral perſons of diſtinction, particularly old Gordon of Glenbucket, Forbes lord Pitſligo, the earl of Kilmarnock, and others. They likewiſe received from abroad conſiderable ſupplies of ammunition, military ſtores, ſmall arms, and ſome field-pieces. There was alſo one Mr. Boyer came over in one of theſe veſſels from France, as an agent, to whom the title of ambaſſador was given.

During this his majeſty had been pleaſed to declare field-marſhal Wade commander in chief of the army which was intended for the north. Our forces ſoon began to move that way, and the Dutch troops were landed at Newcaſtle, as alſo part of the Britiſh forces that were recalled from Flanders, under the command of the earl of Albemarle. The Tryal ſloop likewiſe brought into Briſtol a Spaniſh ſhip, on board of which were two thouſand five hundred fuſils with bayonets, and one hundred barrels of gunpowder, ſeven cheſts of money, &c. deſigned for the ſervice of the rebels. By this time likewiſe the militia in the northern counties were raiſed, and aſſociations and voluntary contributions ſet on foot in moſt parts of the kingdom. In the county of York, particularly, through the timely vigilance and zeal of the archbiſhop, aſſiſted by the nobility and gentry, four new regiments were raiſed, cloathed, and diſciplined, at the expence of the county. There was likewiſe a conſiderable body of gentlemen volunteers on horſeback, who ſerved at their own expence, put in motion under the command of major-general Oglethorpe, ſtiled the Royal Hunters. In Scotland, the lord preſident of the court of ſeſſion, Duncan Forbes, Eſq; diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his zeal and activity in diſtributing commiſſions for raiſing ſeveral independent companies in the north, which were to be put under the command of the right honourable the earl of Loudon; ſo that by the end of the month, there was an army of fourteen thouſand men formed in the north of England, and a very conſiderable body raiſed in the north of Scotland, for the ſecurity of Inverneſs, Fort William, and other garriſons there; which military preparations, joined to the loyal ſpirit which ſhewed itſelf in all parts of the nation, and more particularly at London, very probably diſappointed the deſigns of the diſaffected, hindered many from joining the rebels, and even drew off ſome who had gone to Edinburgh with that determination.

November the firſt the young chevalier came to the camp at Dalkeith, and cauſed the noble palace there belonging to his grace the duke of Buccleugh, and which is reputed one of the fineſt houſes in Scotland, to be prepared for his reception, and there he fixed his head-quarters. On the fifth, their forces began their march ſouthwards in three columns. At this time the duke of Perth (as he ſtiled himſelf) had the title of general; lord George Murray had the poſt of lieutenant-general; lord Elcho, who is eldeſt ſon to the earl of Wemys, commanded thoſe that were about the perſon of the young Pretender, and were ſtiled his life-guards; the earl of Kilmarnock, an elderly man, and corpulent in his perſon, acted as colonel of huſſars; and lord Pitſligo had the command of the Angus horſe. At the head of his councils was Sir Thomas Sheridan, an Iriſh gentleman of a middle age, and reputed a man of capacity; colonel Sullivan, who had been a little while in the French ſervice, and was ſomewhat of an engineer; general Macdonald, an Iriſh officer, who was his aid-de-camp; Mr. Kelly, who was ſo long in the Tower on the affair of the late biſhop of Rocheſter; and Mr. Murray of Broughton, who acted all along as his ſecretary. The rebel chiefs continuing firm in their firſt reſolution, began to paſs the Tweed on the ſixth, and their advanced guards entered England on the ſame day.

They came to Langton on the eighth and the ſucceeding day appeared on a moor two miles from the city of Carliſle. The place in all probability might have made a defence; but the threats of the rebels had ſuch an effect, that the white flag was hung out, and the town capitulated on the fifteenth, and the caſtle too was given up; but the governor took care to withdraw as diſliking the terms, and perſiſted in his firſt opinion, that the place might have been defended. Thus this city fell into the hands of the rebels, who immediately cauſed the Pretender to be proclaimed; and put a garriſon into the caſtle under the command of the duke of Perth, who was declared governor of Carliſle, and continued in that command all the time the rebels were in England.

Marſhal Wade having received intelligence at Newcaſtle of the rout which the rebels had taken, reſolved, notwithſtanding the ſeverity of the ſeaſon, to march from thence to the relief of Carliſle; and accordingly on the ſixteenth the army began to move for that purpoſe; but having intelligence that Carliſle had ſurrendered, he reſolved to march back to Newcaſtle; but the weather continuing bad, and the roads being become in a manner impaſſable, he did not arrive there with the army till the twenty-ſecond; and even then, the forces under his command were ſo exceſſively fatigued, that if it had not been for the great care taken of them by the people of Newcaſtle, who ſhewed the utmoſt zeal and affection in providing them quarters, they muſt certainly have ſunk under their fatigue and oppreſſion.

All the northern and weſtern parts of the kingdom being by this invaſion of the rebels thrown into great confuſion, directions were given for forming another army in Lancaſhire. The city of Cheſter was alſo put into a condition of defence, in a ſurpriſing ſhort ſpace of time, by the care and diligence of the right honourable the earl of Cholmondeley. At Liverpool likewiſe, all neceſſary precautions were taken, and the inhabitants of that town diſplayed the greateſt reſolution and ſpirit.

The continuance of the rebels was not long at Carliſle. They were at Wiggan and Lee on the twenty-eighth, and in the afternoon of the ſame day an advanced party entered Mancheſter, where they began to beat up for volunteers, but with much leſs ſucceſs than they expected; no one of any rank or diſtinction came in, which, without doubt, was a great diſappointment, for they had flattered themſelves with the hopes of a conſiderable inſurrection in their favour. On the twenty-ninth the main body of their army moved towards Mancheſter, and about ten in the morning their horſe entered the town, and the bellman was ſent about to require all ſuch as had any public money in their hands to bring it in. About two in the afternoon the young Pretender, at the head of a conſiderable body of picked Highlanders, and in their dreſs, marched into Mancheſter and was proclaimed. In the evening the bellman was again ſent about to order the town to be illuminated, and at night the rear of their army arrived; but though they had demanded quarters for ten thouſand men, it was judged they never had in Mancheſter above half that number. It is very remarkable, that in their whole progreſs no diſcoveries could be made of the routs they intended to take, becauſe they were never given out above an hour before their march began: and neither officers nor ſoldiers knew over night where they were to go, or what ſervice they were to perform the next morning: which ſecreſy in all probability preſerved them from ruin.

At this time the duke of Cumberland's army was forming in Staffordſhire: for upon the approach of the rebels it was reſolved, that his royal highneſs ſhould be ſent down to command the forces in that part of the kingdom; and accordingly he arrived at Litchfield on the twenty-eighth of November, his troops being at that time cantoned with a line of cavalry in the front, from Tamworth to Stafford, making a very fine appearance, and well furniſhed with artillery and whatever elſe was requiſite for the ſervice. As to the force of which his army conſiſted, we can only ſay that the following was looked upon at that time as the moſt authentic account that could be procured: ſeven thouſand five hundred veteran ſoldiers, three thouſand new raiſed ſoldiers, one thouſand four hundred veteran horſe, and eight hundred new raiſed horſe, being twelve thouſand ſeven hundred men in the whole.

The young Chevalier, with the main body of his army and all his artillery entered Macclesfield on the firſt of December; and on the fourth in the morning, Derby, with near five hundred horſe, and about two thouſand foot. In the evening the reſt of their forces, their artillery, and their baggage arrived there likewiſe; but with all the precaution poſſible, to hinder any exact account from being taken of their numbers, which was a point they laboured with the utmoſt diligence during their whole march. On their firſt coming into Derby it was judged both from the meaſures they took, and from the behaviour of their chiefs, that they were ſtill diſpoſed to march on. In the evening, however, they held ſeveral councils of war, in which the diſputes among their chiefs roſe ſo high that they could not be concealed; yet they agreed upon nothing that night, except levying the public money, which they did with unuſual circumſtances of terror and violence. The next day they continued at Derby, and about noon another great council was held in the preſence of the young Pretender, in which, it was afterwards known, a final reſolution was taken of returning back into Scotland. Notwithſtanding all the artifices uſed to prevent it, there was a very true and curious calculation made of their numbers during the time they ſtaid at Derby; which was the more eaſy, becauſe they remained there longer, and were more regularly quartered than in any other place during their whole march; it was made by the principal inhabitants of the town in all its pariſhes, and that it might be the more exact, it was taken both the firſt night and the ſecond, ſo that the ſmall difference between thoſe calculations plainly ſhows how much they may be depended on, ſince it is impoſſible that any conſiderable miſtake ſhould have happened therein, conſidering how near they approach each other.

It was during their ſtay at Derby that the rebels firſt began to ſhew that kind of ſpirit, which appeared afterwards ſo plainly, and the effects of which made ſuch deep impreſſions on the minds of the people, as are not eaſily to be worn out. For having been informed during their ſtay here, that a ſubſcription had been ſet on foot in that town for the king's ſervice a little before their arrival, and that the money was paying in, they found means to procure a copy of this ſubſcription roll, and when they were thought to have quitted the place, ſent back a party to levy ſuch ſums as were mentioned in that roll, under pain of military execution. They were very aſſiduous in providing themſelves with cloaths, ſtockings, ſhoes, and other neceſſaries, while at Derby, and it cannot be believed that ſuch cuſtomers would pay the full value for all they had, ſo that the difference between their price and the juſt price of the commodities, and manufactures they took, might be conſidered as a ſecond contribution. They alſo endeavoured to levy men here, beating up publicly for that purpoſe, but with very little ſucceſs, ſince there were not above three who liſted in the town, and thoſe of the very loweſt of the people in point of morals as well as condition, which ſhews how low their credit was brought, and might poſſibly be amongſt the reaſons which altogether determined them no longer to delay their retreat.

His royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland, at the head of the king's forces, encamped on the ſixth on Meriden Common, between Coles-hill and Coventry. In the mean time his excellency field-marſhal Wade, had marched the army under his command to Wetherby, where he encamped on the fifth; and the ſame day orders were given for the horſe and dragoons to proceed to Doncaſter whither the foot were to follow them. Theſe diſpoſitions afforded ſufficient reaſon for the rebels to retreat. Yet in North Britain the flame of rebellion began again to ſpread itſelf, by the aſſiſtance of the French; for lord John Drummond having landed with about five hundred men at Aberdeen, Peterhead and Montroſe, he was very ſoon joined by that body which lord Lewis Gordon had been raiſing in the North, as well as by other of the diſaffected clans, ſuch as the Mackenzies, the Mackintoſhes, the Farquharſons, and the Frazers, to the number of between two and three thouſand men; with which forces he drew down towards Perth; the young Pretender being at Derby about this time.

As ſoon as the rebels had executed their purpoſe of raiſing money on the town of Derby, they returned to their reſolution of endeavouring to retire by the ſame road they came into Scotland: and accordingly marched on the ſixth of December to Aſhburn, from whence they moved the next day to Leek, deſtroying in their paſſage whatever they judged might be of uſe to the king's forces that were in purſuit of them, and ſhewing a warm ſpirit of reſentment for the diſappointments they had met with. They carried with them a train of artillery, conſiſting of fifteen ſmall pieces of cannon and one mortar. On the eighth in the evening their vanguard reached Mancheſter, and the next morning the young Chevalier and the main of his forces came thither, where they were not received as they had been before, but on the contrary, the town's people, or at leaſt the mob, gave them ſome pretty viſible marks of their diſlike, which was puniſhed immediately by an order, or precept in the name of the Chevalier, and ſigned and ſealed by Mr. Murray his ſecretary, directed to the conſtables and collector of the land-tax for the towns of Mancheſter and Salford; requiring them to collect and levy, by the next day at noon, the ſum of two thouſand five hundred pounds, to be paid to the ſaid Mr. Murray, with a promiſe of repayment, however, when the country ſhould be ſettled under his government. On the tenth they continued their march by Pendleton Pole, towards Leigh and Wiggan, which laſt place they reached on the eleventh, and puſhed on from thence to Preſton, the next day; being extremely apprehenſive of finding themſelves ſurrounded in that neighbourhood. On the thirteenth in the morning they quitted Preſton, and continued their rout to Lancaſter; and on the fourteenth they moved from thence to Kendal, which they entered about ten in the morning, and where they met with a bad reception, for the town's people fired upon their Huſſars, killed one, and took two priſoners. Their van-guard continued their march from thence to Shap in their way to Penrith; but ſeeing the beacons on every ſide lighted, and being informed that it was done to raiſe the country, and that the people were diſpoſed to fall upon them on every ſide, they thought proper to return to Kendal, which they accordingly did about two in the morning. On the fifteenth the Pretender with all his forces arrived there, and began to march from thence for Penrith on the ſixteenth by break of day; lord George Murray, commanding the rear-guard, as he had done during the whole march. They intended to have reached Penrith that night, but finding it impracticable, they thought fit to halt at Shap, where we ſhall leave them for the preſent, that our readers may have a full account of the motions of the king's forces, and their ſucceſs.

When his excellency field-marſhal Wade received certain intelligence of the proceedings of the rebels, and of the ſituation of his majeſty's forces under the command of his royal highneſs, he held on the eighth of December a great council of war at Ferry-bridge, to conſider of the moſt effectual means for cutting off the Highlanders in their retreat; and in this council of war it was reſolved, to march directly by Wakefield and Hallifax into Lancaſhire, as the moſt likely way of intercepting the rebels. But arriving at Wakefield on the tenth, and having advice that the main body of the rebels were at Mancheſter, and their van-guard moving from thence towards Preſton, his excellency finding that it was now impoſſible to come up with them, judged it unneceſſary to fatigue the forces by hard marches; and therefore detaching major-general Oglethorpe on the eleventh, with the cavalry under his command, he began his march with the reſt of his forces for Newcaſtle. On the thirteenth a great body of the horſe and dragoons that were under major-general Oglethorpe arrived at Preſton, having marched a hundred miles in three days, over ſnow and ice, which was a noble teſtimony of zeal and ſpirit eſpecially in the new raiſed forces. His royal highneſs arrived about one at the ſame place, and immediately gave his orders for continuing the purſuit of the rebels with the utmoſt diligence. On the fourteenth, accordingly general Oglethorpe advanced towards Lancaſter, which place the duke reached on the ſixteenth; general Oglethorpe continuing his purſuit at the heels of the rebels. On the ſeventeenth the major-general was at Shap, and his royal highneſs entered Kendal, having now more hopes of coming up with the enemy than at any time during the march, and the diſpoſitions which were made by the duke for this purpoſe, were ſuch as ſhewed great military capacity and profound penetration.

On the eighteenth of December, in the evening, part of the cavalry with his royal highneſs came up with the rebels, after ten hours march, a little beyond Lowther-hall, which they had quitted on the approach of the king's forces, and threw themſelves into the village of Clifton, about three miles from Penrith; where they had great advantages from the ſituation of the place, and from ſome decayed broken walls. His royal highneſs, however, cauſed the village to be immediately attacked, by the firſt forces that came up, which were the king's own regiment of dragoons, and part of the duke of Kingſton's horſe, who behaved extremely well upon this occaſion; and in an hour's time drove them out of the place, though a very ſtrong and defenſible poſt. The loſs of the enemy could not be certainly known, becauſe it was quite dark before the affair was over. There were forty of the king's ſoldiers killed and wounded, and amongſt them four officers, viz. colonel Honeywood, captain Eaſt, cornet Owen and cornet Hamilton. On the ſide of the rebels, there was one captain Hamilton taken priſoner, who was much wounded. It was ſo dark and the country ſo covered that it was impoſſible to purſue them with any probability of ſucceſs that night; and the next morning about ſeventy of the rebels were made priſoners; the reſt having with the greateſt difficulty evaded their purſuers by the quickneſs of their retreat.

During the rear-guards engagement with the king's forces at Clifton, the main body of the rebels were at Penrith, and ſo apprehenſive of being overtaken, that at ten o'clock at night they ordered their artillery and baggage to advance towards Carliſle; and on the nineteenth, in the morning, they entered that city, exceſſively fatigued and in much confuſion. The rebels did not continue long there, but contented themſelves with putting a ſort of garriſon into the place, compoſed of between four and five hundred men, moſt of them being thoſe that had joined them in England, and which they had formed into a corps, under the title of the Mancheſter regiment. The main body of their army continued their march towards Scotland, paſſing the river Eſk, though very high, which coſt many of them their lives: and on the twentieth and twenty-firſt, they again entered North Britain, leaving thoſe they had thrown into Carliſle to ſhift for themſelves as well as they could, and without any hopes of ſuccour. Theſe pretended at firſt that they would make an obſtinate defence; and having moſt of their artillery with them, they mounted them on the walls, took poſſeſſion of the caſtle, and carried into it all the proviſions they could find, leaving the inhabitants little or none to ſuſtain them; ſo that they were in the utmoſt diſtreſs, being able to draw no relief from the adjacent country, becauſe the people were ſenſible that whatever they ſent them, would be taken from them by the rebels. They did not however continue long in this deplorable condition, being relieved from it by the ſpeedy arrival of the king's forces, who ſoon put an end to the diſpute, and reſtored the people of Carliſle to the king's protection. On the twenty-firſt, about four in the morning, the whole army marched in four columns towards Carliſle, which was already inveſted, and in the evening they arrived before that city, and took up their quarters in the villages round it. Field marſhal Wade, having intelligence of what had paſſed at Clifton, detached a conſiderable body of foot to join the duke's army, and gave ſuch other orders as were requiſite for haſtening thither the artillery and ammunition that were wanting for carrying on the ſiege. On the twenty-ſixth, part of the cannon expected from Whitehaven, arrived, and the utmoſt diligence being uſed, they began on the twenty-eighth to play with ſix eighteen pounders upon the place. In the night of the twenty-ninth they raiſed a new battery of three pieces of cannon that began to play in the morning, upon which the rebels hung out a white flag, and offered to capitulate; but his royal highneſs would grant them no other terms than theſe, "that they ſhould not be put to the ſword but reſerved for his majeſty's pleaſure;" to which, about three in the afternoon, on the thirtieth, one John Hamilton, who ſtiled himſelf governor of Carliſle, agreed, and brigadier Bligh immediately took poſſeſſion of the town with a detachment of four hundred guards, ſeven hundred foot, and one hundred and twenty horſe. The rebel officers yielded themſelves priſoners immediately, and their men retired into the cathedral without arms, where they had a guard ſet over them, till his royal highneſs ſhould otherwiſe diſpoſe of them. Such was the iſſue of this wild undertaking, and ſo ſoon were thoſe reduced to ſurrender the place and themſelves priſoners at diſcretion, who undertook to defend it to the laſt extremity.

The following is a liſt of the rebel officers, &c. taken at Carliſle. Engliſh: One colonel, five captains, five lieutenants, ſeven enſigns, one adjutant, and ninety-three non-commiſſioned officers, private men, &c. Scotch: The governor, one ſurgeon, ſix captains, ſeven lieutenants, three enſigns, and two hundred and fifty-ſix non-commiſſioned officers, private men, &c. Beſides French: Three officers, one ſerjeant, four private men. In all three hundred and ninety-four. Artillery: Braſs one and a half pounders with ſix carriages, braſs octagon with one carriage, braſs four pounders with three carriages, four braſs cohorns, and two royals. In all ſixteen.

While all this time, lord John Drummond, lord Lewis Gordon, and the reſt of the rebel chiefs in Scotland were labouring with great diligence, as well as much violence, to draw together a conſiderable force in order to join the Pretender on his return into that country; the king's loyal ſubjects there ſhewed the greateſt zeal and ſpirit, in exerting their utmoſt force in order to oppoſe them. The city of Glaſgow particularly diſtinguiſhed itſelf on this occaſion, by levying fifteen companies of ſixty men each at their own expence, and having completed them by the beginning of the month of December, they marched from thence under the command of the right honourable the earl of Hume, for Stirling. The city of Edinburgh alſo having received his majeſty's licence for that purpoſe, raiſed one thouſand men for the king's ſervice; and the earl of Loudon with the forces under his command, marching from Inverneſs, obliged a body of the rebels to raiſe the blockade of Fort Auguſtus, which they had formed under the command of the ſon of lord Lovat; and at the ſame time the Macleods and Monroes ſcoured all the north of the rebel parties as far as to within twelve miles of Aberdeen. Such were the tranſactions in South and in North Britain to the cloſe of this year, when the rebels having been obliged to fly out of England, began again to gather ſtrength in the weſt of Scotland and to reſume their deſign of attacking Stirling caſtle. Having paſſed the river Eſke, they divided into two bodies; the leſſer, conſiſting of about two thouſand men, marched on the twentieth of December to Ecclefecan, and from thence the next day to Moffat. The larger body of about four thouſand proceeded to Annan, near the ſea-ſide, and on the twenty-firſt marched to Dumfries, where they continued all the next day, and about eight in the morning on the twenty-third, they moved northwards. At Dumfries they demanded two thouſand pounds immediately, and though this was remonſtrated againſt, as a thing not only hard, but impracticable, yet it was peremptorily inſiſted on, and at laſt eleven hundred was accepted in ready money, and two gentlemen were taken away as hoſtages for the other nine hundred. On the twenty-third they halted at Drumlanerig, and thence continued their march to Glaſgow, at which city they arrived on the twenty-fifth. In the mean time, the northern rebels were moving towards Perth under lord John Drummond, lord Lewis Gordon, and ſome other of their chiefs. This body had ſome artillery, ammunition, and money with them, which had been landed from on board ſome Spaniſh privateers, and brought from the weſt coaſt to Perth, which they fortified for a place of arms; fitting out an armed ſloop there, as they did the Hazard which they had taken, and a ſtout privateer at Montroſe.

A. D. 1746.

It is not to be wondered at, that the behaviour of the rebels at Glaſgow ſhould be rather worſe than in other places. They found themſelves in a very rich city, abounding in whatever they wanted, and therefore they conſidered it as a magazine, and began to furniſh themſelves immediately with broad-cloth, tartan, linen, ſhoes and ſtockings, to the amount of ten thouſand pounds ſterling; ſo that by this means the Pretender in a manner new cloathed his army, which proved a great means of keeping them together, otherwiſe, in all probability, the greater part of them would have diſperſed. On the third of January, having finiſhed their buſineſs at Glaſgow, and gleaned up what they could, it was judged high time to remove, and accordingly they marched that day to Kilſyth. The next day they proceeded to Banockbourne, and on the fifth, having now the beſt part of their forces together, they ſummoned the caſtle and town of Stirling to ſurrender. General Blakeney anſwered, that he would defend the place to the laſt extremity, and as he had lived he was determined to die a man of honour. The town, which is indeed of no ſtrength, after ſome time ſpent in treaty, ſurrendered, and the rebels entered it upon the eighth, when having again ſummoned the caſtle to as little purpoſe as before, they took a final reſolution of beſieging it in form with what artillery they had, and ſo prepared to execute the reſolution.

The king having thought fit to appoint lieutenant general Hawley commander in chief of his forces in North-Britain, and major general Huſke to command under him, the troops that were to form the army in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh marched thither with ſo much expedition, and whatever was requiſite for their uſe, or could contribute to facilitate their motions, was ſo readily ſupplied to them on their rout, that by the tenth it was judged expedient to diſpoſe things for advancing towards the relief of Stirling caſtle; not that this fortreſs, which from its ſituation is of ſome importance, was in any danger, for in truth, the rebels were but bungling engineers, but becauſe it would have given ſome reputation to their arms, in caſe they had continued this ſiege for any time without interruption. Things being thus diſpoſed, the field artillery ordered out, and all the neceſſary precautions taken, it was reſolved to begin the operations by detaching part of the forces under major general Huſke, to diſlodge the earl of Kilmarnock from Falkirk, where he lay with moſt of the cavalry belonging to the rebel army. On the thirteenth, accordingly, the forces appointed for this ſervice began to move towards Linlithgow, which they entered in the evening at the very inſtant the earl of Kilmarnock was marching in on the ſide next Falkirk with ſome of his people; but having early intelligence of the general's purpoſe and nearneſs, he retired with ſome precipitation. After general Huſke had taken poſt at Linlithgow, lord Kilmarnock thought proper to decamp the next day from Falkirk, and to retire to the main body of the rebel army before Stirling. On the ſixteenth, general Huſke, with the forces under his command, and the remains of Gardener's and Hamilton's dragoons, took poſſeſſion of Falkirk, and were followed thither ſoon after by general Hawley, and the reſt of the army. Lieutenant general Hawley having conſidered the ſituation of affairs, and the ſeveral accounts he had received, reſolved to defer the attacking the rebels until the next day, as well in regard to the foulneſs of the weather, as becauſe he was deſirous of obtaining ſuch intelligence as might enable him to make the moſt advantageous diſpoſitions for acting againſt them with his artillery and men.

A few dragoons that had been ſent to reconnoitre, returned about noon with intelligence, that the rebels were actually in motion, in order to attack the king's forces, and by one they were ſeen in two columns, about two miles diſtance, endeavouring to gain ſome riſing grounds near the moor of Falkirk. Upon this the king's forces got under arms, and formed as ſoon as the ſmall time they had would allow, and immediately marched to gain the ground which the rebels were endeavouring to reach on the left of their camp. This, though the ground was above a mile diſtant, they performed, but were ſcarce in poſſeſſion of it, before the enemy came down in order of battle, out-ſtretching the king's forces in ſuch a manner, that the left of one army was oppoſite the center of the other. The king's army being once formed, advanced in good order, the dragoons on the left, and the foot in two lines. As ſoon as they came within a hundred yards of the enemy, the dragoons were ordered to fall on ſword in hand, and the two lines of infantry to advance. They began to move in purſuance of theſe directions, but before they could put them in execution, the rebels made a very ſmart fire, which threw the dragoons into ſome diſorder, and they the foot, who made only one irregular fire, Barrel's and Ligonier's battalions only excepted, who were preſently rallied by brigadier Cholmondeley, attacked afterwards by the rebels, whom they repulſed, and at length drove them fairly out of the field. In the mean time, major general Huſke, with wonderful prudence and preſence of mind, drew together and formed a body of foot in the rear of theſe two regiments, which the rebels ſeeing, did not venture to renew the attack. General Mordaunt taking advantage of this delay, rallied and formed the reſt of the troops, and the officers, who in general behaved well, aſſiſted in ſo doing.

But ſeveral unforeſeen and indeed inevitable accidents contributed greatly to, or rather might be ſaid to have been the ſole occaſion of the rebels gaining this great advantage; in the firſt place, there was ſome difficulty and confuſion in forming the king's troops, which was ſucceeded by another unlucky accident. Some of the battalions fired without orders, which occaſioned a great confuſion among the dragoons. But the great miſfortune of all was, that juſt as the army began to move, there came on a violent ſtorm of wind and rain, which hindered the men from ſeeing before them; and many of their firelocks were ſo wet, that it is thought ſcarce a fifth part of them were of uſe; add to this, that they had no uſe at all of their artillery, for the weather having been for two days very wet, and there being a ſteep hill to climb, they could not get up time enough to do any ſervice in the action; and the commander of the train having quitted it, moſt of the people who belonged to the horſes, rode away with them; ſo that when the troops retired to their camp, they found it extremely hard to carry off their cannon. This difficulty, however, very plainly proves that they were left maſters of the field, for the grenadiers of Barrel's regiment brought off one piece of cannon, and the horſes that were picked up at the town of Falkirk, drew away three more, which ſhews they had time enough, and were not at all moleſted by the rebels; ſo far from it that it was once reſolved to remain in the camp, and brigadier Mordaunt had orders to take poſt there; but the rain was ſo heavy, the tents ſo exceſſively wet, and ſo much of the ammunition ſpoiled, that it was judged altogether inexpedient to expoſe the men to the inclemency of the weather, and therefore it was at laſt determined to march them back to Linlithgow, chiefly for the ſake of ſhelter.

On the 18th in the afternoon the rebels returned to Stirling, and as it was viſible that lieutenant general Hawley's deſign of relieving that fortreſs was diſappointed, they had a mind to try what effect another ſummons would have; but general Blakeney was ſtill in the ſame tone, and contented himſelf with repeating what he had before told them, that he had always been looked upon as a man of honour, which character he would ſupport to his death.

When the king's army returned to Edinburgh, a very ſtrict enquiry was made into the loſs ſuſtained by the late action, which appeared to be, officers excepted, very ſmall. What was moſt regretted was the death of Sir Robert Monroe, bart. colonel of a regiment of foot, who died of his wounds in the hands of the rebels; and his brother, Dr. Monroe, an eminent man in his profeſſion, and who, through fraternal affection, attended him to the field.

There was no account of the killed and wounded publiſhed by authority, probably becauſe it was found difficult to collect ſuch an account, as many of the ſoldiers who were ſuppoſed either to have been ſlain or taken priſoners, came dropping in afterwards for ſeveral days. The officers, in general, diſtinguiſhed themſelves extremely, and ſome very particularly, ſuch as brigadier general Cholmondeley, who was dangerouſly wounded, and contracted a palſey, from the cold he caught in the field. Major general Huſke, by his great vigilance and preſence of mind ſhewn on this occaſion, acquired the higheſt reputation; and brigadier Mordaunt was allowed to have done all that could be expected from the moſt knowing and active officer; nay, even in the battalions where the men did not behave ſo well as might have been expected, their officers ſhewed themſelves to great advantage, and gave glorious examples of intrepidity, though they were but ill copied. It happened very luckily, that as this action proved fatal to ſo many officers, it proved as fortunate to a great many others; for the rebels having ſent moſt of the officers that were taken priſoners at Preſton Pans to Glames, Couper, and Liſlie, when they were drawing together their forces about Stirling, the loyal inhabitants of Dundee, and other places, formed a deſign of reſcuing them, and conducting them back to Edinburgh, which they executed with great ſpirit and diligence, and they arrived at that city on the nineteenth, the very next day after the army returned thither from Linlithgow.

The news of this battle having reached London, it was deemed neceſſary to provide for the immediate extinction of ſo dangerous a flame, by ſending down a ſufficient number of forces, not only to render the army in Scotland more formidable than before, but to increaſe its ſtrength to ſuch a degree, as to free the nation from any apprehenſions of its conſequences, in caſe the enemy ſhould grow more numerous, or the French and Spaniards perſiſt in their deſign of attempting an invaſion for their ſupport in any part of his majeſty's dominions. It was with this view, that a reſolution was taken of embarking the Heſſian troops in Britiſh pay, then in the neighbourhood of Antwerp, for Scotland; and it was alſo thought convenient, that to reſtore the ſpirit of the ſoldiers, to extinguiſh all animoſities, and encourage the well-affected in North-Britain, his royal highneſs the duke ſhould immediately go down thither. On the thirtieth, in the morning, to the great ſurprize and joy of the army, his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland arrived at Edinburgh, after a journey amazingly expeditious, conſidering the rigour of the ſeaſon. He was received with all the teſtimonies of loyalty and affection that could poſſibly be expreſſed, the army looking upon his preſence as a ſure omen of victory, and all ranks and degrees of people being delighted at beholding a prince with whoſe reputation they were ſo well acquainted, and from whom they had juſt reaſon to expect being reſtored to the peaceable poſſeſſion of thoſe bleſſings, which, under the mild government of the king his father, they had, till the breaking out of this rebellion, conſtantly enjoyed. The ſight of the duke baniſhed all remembrance of the late untoward accident; and the troops ſhewed uncommon ardour to be led, bad as the weather was, again into the field.

On the ſucceeding day his royal highneſs reviewed the forces, and marched them in two columns, conſiſting of fourteen battalions, the Argyleſhire men, together with Cobham's and Mark Ker's dragoons, in purſuit of the rebels. The next morning his royal highneſs made the neceſſary diſpoſitions for proſecuting his march, at which time all the officers and ſoldiers expreſſed the greateſt eagerneſs and alacrity imaginable. The march was hardly begun, before advice was brought that the rebels, inſtead of preparing for an engagement, were actually repaſſing the Forth with all the diligence imaginable; and what gave credit to this, was their advanced guards retiring every where with the utmoſt precipitation. This news was ſoon after put out of diſpute, by the noiſe they heard of two great reports like the blowing up of magazines; upon which brigadier Mordaunt was detached with the Argyleſhire men and the dragoons to harraſs the rebels in their retreat. The brigadier, with the troops under his command, arrived at Stirling late that evening, where they found the rebels had abandoned their camp, with all their artillery, and had blown up a great magazine they had of powder and ball in the church of St. Ninian, and that with ſo little care or diſcretion, that ſeveral of the country people were buried in the ruins. They likewiſe left behind them all the wounded men they had made priſoners in the late action, and about twenty of their own ſick men; but it was ſo late when the king's forces arrived, that a continuance of the purſuit was judged needleſs.

His royal highneſs having entered Stirling on the ſecond of February, about one in the afternoon, received the compliments of general Blakeney, and the officers of his garriſon, on that memorable occaſion; and at the ſame time, his royal highneſs was pleaſed to teſtify his entire ſatisfaction, with reſpect to the gallant defence the general had made, by which a place of ſo much importance had been preſerved, and the deſigns of the enemy defeated. In the mean time, the rebels were occupied in making all the diſpatch in their power, that they might be entirely out of reach before Stirling bridge could be repaired for the paſſage of the army. Part of them took the road by Tay bridge, towards the hills, the reſt conſiſting of lord Lewis Gordon's men, the remains of the French; thoſe commanded by lord Ogilvie, and the few horſe they had, got into Perth the very night that brigadier Mordaunt arrived at Stirling; and though they had taken a great deal of pains in throwing up ſeveral works for the ſecurity of that place, yet they began to abandon it, and to continue their march northwards the next morning; lord John Drummond, with the remains of the Scotch and Iriſh that came from France, made the beſt of their way towards Montroſe, and on the third of February the town of Perth was totally evacuated. They left behind them there thirteen pieces of iron cannon, eight and twelve pounders, nailed up, and threw a vaſt quantity of ammunition into the river, together with fourteen ſwivel guns that had been taken out of the Hazard ſloop; and ſet at liberty the ſailors that had been confined there from the time that veſſel was taken; but they thought fit to carry captain Hill, who commanded her, along with them, and ſome few other priſoners of the better kind.

On ſix in the morning of the fourth, the bridge of Stirling was repaired, ſo that the army paſſed over it, and the advanced guard, conſiſting of the Argyleſhire highlanders and the dragoons, marched that night as far as Crief; but the foot were cantoned in and about Dumblain, where the duke took up his quarters that evening, and the next day the advanced guards took poſſeſſion of Perth. Scarce any hiſtory can ſhew a more illuſtrious inſtance of the effects of a general's reputation than this before us, ſince in the ſpace of a ſingle week, his royal highneſs quitted the court of the king his father, put himſelf at the head of the forces in Scotland, and ſaw the enemy flying with precipitation before him. To endeavour to heighten this event by any ſtrains of compliment or panegyric, would be to obſcure it; the bare recital of the matter of fact is the greateſt praiſe that can be given.

His royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland gave orders for the army to march by different roads (but in ſuch bodies as prevented all danger of ſurprize) to Aberdeen, where he propoſed to fix his head-quarters, to raiſe magazines, and to receive ſuch ſuccours and ſupplies as from time to time might be requiſite by ſea from the ſouth. As the Heſſian troops were now in Scotland, his royal highneſs took care to diſpoſe of them and ſome other bodies of Engliſh troops at Perth, Dunkeld, the caſtle of Blair, caſtle of Menzies, and other places, by which he effectually ſecured the paſſage into the lowlands, and put it out of the power of the rebels to return that way into the ſouth. General Campbell, with the Argyleſhire men, undertook the ſecurity of Fort William, a place at that time of infinite importance, as it ſecured another paſſage through the Weſt of Scotland, by which the rebels might again have made their way into England. Theſe precautions taken, his royal highneſs ſet out in perſon for Aberdeen, where he arrived on the twenty-eighth of February. The neceſſary diſpoſitions having been made for continuing the operations of the war, it was judged expedient to make ſome examples of ſuch as had miſbehaved, for the better ſupport of diſcipline, at a time when it was ſo neceſſary for the ſecurity and reputation of the army; a court-martial was accordingly held at Montroſe, by which an officer in the artillery, who had deſerted the train in the action at Falkirk, was condemned to have his ſword broke over his head by the provoſt, his ſaſh thrown on the ground, and himſelf turned out of the army, which was executed accordingly at the head of the artillery. A lieutenant of Fleming's regiment was broke for diſobeying orders, forfeiting his word, and prevaricating before the court-martial, in relation to plundering the houſe of Mr. Oliphant of Gaſk, at that time with the rebels, ſo little colour there was for the reports ſpread that plundering was connived at, if not allowed; though nothing could be more incompatible with the diſcipline of a regular army, as well as the conſtitution of the country, in defence of which that army was employed.

The firſt care of the rebels, in proſecuting their deſigns, was to become maſters of Inverneſs, a town of pretty conſiderable trade on the eaſt ſide of the highlands, with a good port, and a ſmall fortreſs, ſometimes called the caſtle of Inverneſs, but more properly Fort George, to defend it. The earl of Loudon was then there, with a body of about fifteen hundred men, moſt of them haſtily raiſed for the ſervice of government, with whom, upon the approach of the rebels to within a very ſmall diſtance of the place, he marched out in order to act offenſively; but finding that impracticable, and that the enemy were much ſtronger than he expected, he judged it proper to retreat, which he did on the twentieth of February without the loſs of a man, leaving two independent companies under the command of major Grant in Fort George, with orders to defend it to the laſt extremity. But it ſeems theſe orders were but indifferently obeyed, for the place was ſoon after ſurrendered to the rebels; upon which the Chevalier removed his quarters thither, having with him about four thouſand men. They next attacked Fort Auguſtus, a very ſmall place, and only important by its ſituation between Inverneſs and Fort William, in which there was a very ſmall garriſon of no more than three companies of Guiſe's regiment, under the command of major Wentworth; ſo that it was ſpeedily reduced, and as ſpeedily demoliſhed, which was the ſame fate that fort George had met with. As they were ſtill incommoded by the neighbourhood of the earl of Loudon, who lay at their back, with only the Frith of Murray between them, the duke of Perth, the earl of Cromarty, and ſome of the reſt of their chief commanders, reſolved to attempt the ſurpriſing that earl by the help of boats, which they drew together on their ſide of the water; and taking the advantage of a fog, executed their ſcheme ſo effectually, that falling upon the king's forces under the earl's command unexpectedly, they cut off ſome, made a few officers priſoners, and obliged lord Loudon to retire with the reſt out of Sutherland. But though theſe little advantages ſerved to make a noiſe, and to keep up the ſpirits of their party, yet they did them little real ſervice; and their money beginning to run ſhort, and ſupplies both at home and abroad failing their expectations, altercations naturally took place.

Intelligence being received on the ſixteenth of March, that Roy Steuart, with about one thouſand foot, and ſixty huſſars, were at Strathbogie, his royal highneſs ordered major-general Bland to drive them from thence, and at the ſame time ordered brigadier-general Mordaunt, with four battalions, and as many pieces of cannon, to march and ſupport the major-general, if there ſhould be occaſion. On the ſeventeenth, the major-general advanced to Strathbogie, and was almoſt within ſight of the place, before the rebels had any notice of his approach; which alarmed them to ſuch a degree, that they quitted their poſt, and retired with great precipitation towards Keith; and though the evening was wet and hazy, yet the volunteers under the marquis of Granby, colonel Conway, and captain Halden, continued the purſuit till it was almoſt dark. But this ſucceſs was attended with ſome little check: for general Bland having detached a captain of highlanders with ſeventy of his men, and thirty of Kingſton's horſe, with orders to clear that place, and then rejoin the army, they, contrary to his directions, ventured to quarter there that night, which gave the rebels an opportunity of ſurpriſing them; for returning from Fochabers, whither they had retired, they ſurrounded the village of Keith in the night, entered it at both ends, attacked the Campbells who were quartered in the church-yard, and after an obſtinate reſiſtance cut moſt of them to pieces; but the cornet who commanded Kingſton's horſe, retired with ſome of thoſe under his command: which accident made the troops more careful, ſo that nothing of that kind happened for the future. Indeed, the diſpoſition his royal highneſs immediately made, put all attempts of that ſort out of the enemy's power, the royal army being divided into three cantonments, in the following manner, viz. the whole firſt line, conſiſting of ſix battalions, the duke of Kingſton's horſe, and Cobham's dragoons, lay at Strathbogie, within twelve miles of the Spey, under the command of the earl of Albemarle, and major-general Bland. The reſerve, conſiſting of three battalions and four pieces of cannon, under the command of brigadier-general Mordaunt, were at Old Meldrum, half way between Strathbogie and Aberdeen; and the whole ſecond line remained at Aberdeen, conſiſting of the ſix remaining battalions, and lord Mark Ker's regiment of dragoons.

As the rebels were well apprized of the great importance of Fort William, the taking of which would have made them maſters of the whole extent of country from eaſt to weſt, and from ſea to ſea, and would beſides have opened them a paſſage into Argyleſhire and the weſt of Scotland, reſolved to leave nothing unattempted that might contribute to the reduction of this fortreſs; and therefore ordered brigadier Stapleton, with a large body of their beſt men, moſt of their engineers, and as good a train as they could furniſh, that way in the beginning of March; and on the ſecond or third of that month, about one thouſand men arrived at Glenavis, which is within two miles of Fort William, and about this time they took a boat belonging to the Baltimore ſloop, which was employed in the ſervice of the garriſon. But captain Aſkew of the Serpent ſloop, detaching his own boat with another belonging to the Baltimore, and a third belonging to the garriſon of Fort William, with about ſeventy men in them, forced the rebels from the Narrows of Carron where they were poſted, and made themſelves maſters of all their boats. This was on the fourth of March, and was a very effectual and well-timed ſervice: but notwithſtanding this check, the rebels perſiſted in their deſign of attacking this fortreſs, and with very great labour and difficulty brought up their artillery, and made the neceſſary diſpoſitions that were required.

The rebels ſuddenly raiſed their ſiege on the third of April, deſerted their batteries, and with great precipitation marched for Inverneſs; upon which captain Scot detached a party of the garriſon, and eight pieces of cannon and ſeven mortars, which the enemy had left behind them, were ſecured.

The occaſion of this ſudden and haſty retreat of the rebels from before this fortreſs, was the neceſſity the young Pretender was under of drawing together all his forces in the neighbourhood of Inverneſs, upon the approach of the king's army. But before we come to treat of the meaſures taken by them after this junction, it is requiſite that we ſhould give ſome account of another misfortune which befel befel them, which was no leſs fatal in its conſequences than the diſappointment of their deſign againſt Fort William. We have already obſerved, that they were in great diſtreſs for money and other neceſſaries, and waited impatiently for a ſupply from France; which they hoped, notwithſtanding the miſcarriage of ſo many ſmall veſſels that had been ſent them, would ſoon arrive on board the Hazard ſloop, to which they had given the name of the Prince Charles ſnow, and which they had intelligence was at ſea with a conſiderable quantity of gold on board, and a good number of experienced officers and engineers, who were very much wanted. On the twenty-fifth of March, this long-looked-for veſſel arrived in Tongue bay, into which ſhe was followed by his majeſty's ſhip the Sheerneſs, commanded by captain Obrien, who immediately attacked her. In the engagement, the Hazard ſloop had a great many men killed, and many more wounded; ſo that not being able to maintain the fight, ſhe ran aſhore on the ſhallows where the Sheerneſs could not follow her, and there ſhe landed her men and money. The place on which ſhe ran on ſhore (after being chaſed fifty-ſix leagues) was in the lord Rea's country; and it happened, there was then at his lordſhip's houſe his ſon captain Mackay, Sir Henry Monro, lord Charles Gordon, captain Macleod, and about eighty men of lord Loudon's regiment, that had retired thither when the rebels attacked them by boats, as has been before related. Theſe gentlemen having animated the ſoldiers to attack, notwithſtanding the ſuperiority of numbers, thoſe who landed from the Prince Charles ſnow, obtained, after a ſhort diſpute, a complete victory, only three or four being killed on the ſide of the rebels, and with little or no loſs on their ſide. Beſides five cheſts of money, and a conſiderable quantity of arms, they took a hundred and fifty-ſix officers, ſoldiers, and ſailors priſoners, with whom they embarked on board the Sheerneſs man of war, and ſailed directly for Aberdeen, together with another prize captain Obrien had taken in the Orkneys. The money, beſides one cheſt that was miſſing, and what had been taken out of another that was broke, amounted to twelve thouſand and five hundred guineas; and there were forty experienced officers, who had been long either in the French or the Spaniſh ſervice, amongſt the priſoners.

At the ſame time that the rebels employed ſo conſiderable a part of their forces in attacking Fort William, they ſent another body under the command of lord George Murray, to make a like attempt upon the caſtle of Blair, the principal ſeat of his grace the duke of Athol, but a place of no great force, and in which there was only a ſmall garriſon under the command of Sir Andrew Agnew; which ſiege, or rather blockade, they raiſed with the ſame hurry and precipitation on the approach of the earl of Crawford, as they did that of Fort William, upon the very ſame day, and from the ſame motives; ſo that we have run through all their operations in as clear and as ſuccinct a manner as poſſible, and have ſhewn, how all their ſeveral bodies were drawn off in order to join the young chevalier, and to enable him to make a ſtand at Inverneſs. We ſhall now therefore return to the king's forces under the command of his royal highneſs the duke, which we left properly diſpoſed to march as ſoon as the ſeaſon and roads would permit, in order by one general and deciſive action to terminate this unnatural rebellion.

About the beginning of April the troops, notwithſtanding the ſeverity of the winter and the fatigues they had endured by making a double campaign, were ſo well refreſhed, and in ſuch excellent order, that they were every way fit for ſervice; and ſo far from apprehending any thing from the impetuoſity of the highlanders, or the advantage they had in lying behind a very deep and rapid river, that they ſhewed the greateſt eagerneſs to enter upon action; which though his highneſs encouraged, and took every meaſure poſſible for keeping up this ardour in his army, yet he acted with great deliberation, and did not move till the weather was ſettled, and there was no danger that the cavalry ſhould ſuffer for want of forage. At length they moved on the eighth from Aberdeen, and encamped on the eleventh at Cullen, where lord Albemarle joined them, and the whole army was aſſembled; and next day marched to the Spey, and paſſed it with no other loſs than of one dragoon and four women, who were all drowned through hurry and indiſcretion. Major-general Huſke was detached in the morning with fifteen companies of grenadiers, the highlanders, and all the cavalry, and two pieces of cannon, and his royal highneſs went with them himſelf. On their firſt appearance the rebels retired from the ſide of the Spey towards Elgin; whereupon the duke of Kingſton's horſe immediately forded over, ſuſtained by the grenadiers and highlanders, but the rebels were all got out of their reach before they could paſs. The foot waded over as faſt as they arrived; and though the water came up to their middles, they went on with great cheerfulneſs. The rebels appeared to be between two and three thouſand; but they did not make any oppoſition, either while the king's troops were paſſing, or when part of them had paſſed and were on the other ſide the Spey; for which conduct of theirs it ſeems very difficult to aſſign any reaſon, unleſs it were that their officers, being ſenſible that the artillery of the king's troops would ſecure their paſſage, they were unwilling to run the riſk of diſpiriting their men by an unſucceſsful attempt of that kind; and therefore choſe not to diſpute the paſſage of the Spey, but to deceive their men into an opinion that when they had paſſed they ſhould be well enough able to deal with them.

His majeſty's army marched on to Elgin and Forres, and from thence to Nairn, where they halted on the fifteenth, and where the rebels thought to have ſurprized them; but the vigilance and ſtrict diſcipline his royal highneſs maintained, abſolutely diſappointed them; notwithſtanding which they ſet fire to and deſtroyed Fort Auguſtus, called in all their parties, and prepared for a general engagement, which followed the next day. We have had ſeveral accounts of this great and deciſive action; but the cleareſt and moſt diſtinct, as well as the moſt authentic, is that diſpatched by his royal highneſs, dated from Inverneſs, April the eighteenth, and which we think the moſt ſatisfactory to give the reader.

“ We gave our men a day's halt at Nairn, and on the ſixteenth marched between four and five, in four columns. The three lines of foot (reckoning the reſerve for one) were broken into three from the right, which made three columns equal, and each of five battalions. The artillery and baggage followed the firſt column on the right, and the cavalry made the fourth column on the left.

“ After we had marched about eight miles, our advanced guards, compoſed of about forty of Kingſton's and the highlanders, led on by the quartermaſter-general, perceived the rebels at ſome diſtance making a motion towards us on the left, upon which we immediately formed; but finding the rebels ſtill were a good way from us, and that the whole body did not come forward, we put ourſelves again upon our march in our former poſture, and continued it to within a mile of them, where we again formed in the ſame order as before. After reconnoitring their ſituation, we found them poſted behind ſome old walls and huts in a line with Culloden houſe. As we thought our right entirely ſecure, general Hawley and general Bland went to the left with the two regiments of dragoons, to endeavour to fall upon the right flank of the rebels, and Kingſton's horſe were ordered to the reſerve. The ten pieces of cannon were diſpoſed two in each of the intervals of the firſt line, and all our highlanders (except about one hundred and forty, which were upon the left with general Hawley, and who behaved extremely well) were left to guard the baggage.

"When we advanced within five hundred yards of the rebels, we found the moraſs upon our right was ended, which left our right flank quite uncovered to them. His royal highneſs thereupon immediately ordered Kingſton's horſe from the reſerve, and a little ſquadron of about ſixty of Cobham's, which had been patroling to cover our flank, and Pultney's regiment was ordered from the reſerve to the right of the royals.

"We ſpent about half an hour after that, trying which ſhould gain the flank of the other; and his royal highneſs having ſent lord Bury forward within one hundred yards of the rebels, to reconnoitre ſomewhat that appeared like a battery to us, they thereupon began firing their cannon, which was extremely ill ſerved and ill pointed. Our's immediately anſwered them, which began their confuſion. They then came running on in their wild manner; and upon the right, where his royal highneſs had placed himſelf, imagining the greateſt puſh would be there, they came down three ſeveral times within a hundred yards of our men, firing their piſtols, and brandiſhing their ſwords. But the royals and Pultney's hardly took their firelocks from their ſhoulders; ſo that after thoſe faint attempts they made off, and the little ſquadron on our right were ſent to purſue them. General Hawley had, by the help of our highlanders, beat down two little ſtone walls, and came in upon the right flank of their line.

"As their whole firſt line came down to attack at once, their right ſomewhat outflanked Barrel's regiment, which was our left, and the greateſt part of the little loſs we ſuſtained was there. But Bligh's and Sempil's giving a fire upon thoſe who had outflanked Barrel's, ſoon repulſed them; and Barrel's regiment, and the left of Munro's fairly beat them with their bayonets; there was ſcarce a ſoldier or officer of Barrel's, or in that part of Monro's which engaged, who did not kill one or two men each with their bayonets and ſpontoons.

"The cavalry, which had charged from their right and left, met in the center, except two ſquadrons of dragoons, which we miſſed, and they were gone in purſuit of the runaways. Lord Ancram was ordered to purſue with the horſe, as far as he could and did it with ſo good effect, that a very conſiderable number were killed in the purſuit.

"As we were on our march to Inverneſs, and were nearly arrived there, major-general Bland ſent the annexed papers, which he received from the French officers and ſoldiers, ſurrendering themſelves priſoners to his royal highneſs. Major-general Bland had alſo made great ſlaughter, and took about fifty French officers and ſoldiers priſoners, in his purſuit. By the beſt calculation that can be made, it is thought the rebels loſt two thouſand men upon the field of battle, and in the purſuit."

The liſts annexed to this account we have omitted, as well for the ſake of keeping within bounds, as becauſe they could not be very exact at that time, but were afterwards much enlarged. All the French officers on the ſeventeenth ſigned a writing, acknowledging themſelves priſoners of war to his Britannick majeſty, and promiſing ſo to remain upon their parole of honour. Amongſt which were brigadier Stapleton, the marquis de Guilles, whom the highlanders called the French ambaſſador, lord Lewis Drummond, and about fifty more. The loſs on the ſide of the king's army was very inconſiderable; the only perſons of note killed were lord Robert Kerr, captain in Barrel's regiment, captain Groſſet of Prince's, captain John Campbell of Loudon's, and captain Colin Campbell of the militia; beſides theſe, fifty private men killed, and two hundred and fifty wounded.

The liſt of all the perſons taken in this ſignal victory, were two hundred and twenty-two French, and three hundred and twenty-ſix rebels; all their artillery and ammunition, with other military ſtores, and twelve colours, likewiſe fell into the hands of the victors. The earl of Kilmarnock was taken in the action; lord Balmerino, at firſt reported to be killed, was taken ſoon after; and four ladies that had been very active in the rebellion, were likewiſe ſeized at Inverneſs, viz. lady Ogilvie, lady Kinloch, lady Gordon, and lady Mackintoſh. Immediately after the battle, brigadier Mordaunt was detached with the volunteers to the number of nine hundred into the Frazer's country, in order to reduce all who ſhould be found in arms there; and with the like view other detachments were made into other diſaffected parts of the country, which put it entirely out of the power of the rebels to aſſemble afterwards in any body capable of diſturbing the peace of the country, being reduced to the neceſſity of ſeparating into ſmall parties, in order to ſhift the better for themſelves. About the ſame time that the whole forces of the rebels were thus vanquiſhed at the battle of Culloden, the earl of Cromartie, his eldeſt ſon, a great many officers of diſtinction, and about one hundred and fifty private men, were ſurprized in the north, by a very ſmall party of his majeſty's loyal ſubjects, who ſent them priſoners on board his majeſty's ſloop the Hound, captain Dove, from Sutherland to Inverneſs, where they arrived about the time his royal highneſs made his ſecond diſpatch.

In this manner the flame of rebellion, which after being ſmothered for a time in Scotland, broke out at laſt with ſuch force as to ſpread itſelf into England, and not without reaſon alarmed the inhabitants of this metropolis, was in a ſhort ſpace totally extinguiſhed by him who gave the firſt check to its force; and who perhaps alone was capable of performing this ſervice to his country, his father, and his king. From his royal highneſs's courage which he diſplayed in ſo diſtinguiſhed a manner, together with his prudence, and the exalted love he bore to his country, it ſeems that Providence particularly made uſe of him as its moſt proper inſtrument in performing this work. He it was who revived the ſpirits of the people by the magnanimity of his own behaviour. He, without ſeverity, reſtored diſcipline in the army. He prudently delayed at Aberdeen till the troops recovered their fatigue, and the ſeaſon opened a road to victory. He waited with patience, choſe with diſcretion, and moſt happily and glorioully improved that opportunity which blaſted the hopes of the rebels, and has ſecured to us the preſent poſſeſſion and future proſpect of the wiſeſt and beſt-framed conſtitution Europe can boaſt. His royal highneſs continued in the north ſome time, to give proper orders for ſecuring the tranquillity of the country; having received the ſubmiſſion of almoſt all the clans and chieftains he at length returned to London, which he entered amidſt the acclamations of the people. As to the vanquiſhed adventurer, he eſcaped from the field of battle, forded the river Neſs, and with a few horſe retired to Aird, where he held a conference with ſome of his adherents; but finding his affairs deſperate, he deſired each of them to conſult his own ſafety; after which he aſſumed various diſguiſes, wandering from place to place among the mountains tains and weſtern iſlands for four months, during which he underwent an amazing ſeries of dangers, hardſhips and miſeries: at laſt two ſhips, ſent on purpoſe from France to the coaſt, took him and about thirty of his followers on board, and in the middle of Auguſt landed him at Reſcourt, near Morlaix in Britany. Addreſſes were now preſented from all quarters to his majeſty, felicitating him upon the ſucceſs of his arms. The two houſes of parliament having ſet the example: they alſo voted their thanks to his royal highneſs for his great and eminent ſervices; and the commons, ſoon after, ſettled twenty-five thouſand pounds per annum on him and his male iſſue. At the ſame time it was reſolved by government, to make examples of ſome of thoſe who had involved their country in ſuch calamity and confuſion, the number, however, as few as poſſible. An act was paſſed for attainting the earls of Kilmarnock and Cromartie; and the lords Balmerino and Lovat were tried and found guilty. Cromartie was afterwards pardoned as to life, but all his eſtates were confiſcated. On the eighteenth of Auguſt, Kilmarnock and Balmerino were executed on Tower-hill. The former died with marks of penitence and contrition; but the latter viewed the implements of death with the moſt careleſs air, and ſeemed to glory in his ſufferings. Lovat was not beheaded till the ſpring of the ſucceeding year. Courts were opened in different parts of the kingdom for the trial of the rebels of inferior rank, fifty of whom were condemned and executed, ſome were pardoned, and the greater number were tranſported to the plantations. In November following Mr. Ratcliff, the titular earl of Derwentwater, who had been taken in a ſhip bound to Scotland, was arraigned on a former ſentence paſſed againſt him in the year 1716. He refuſed to acknowledge the authority of the court, and pleaded, that he was a ſubject of France, honoured with a commiſſion in the ſervice of his moſt Chriſtian majeſty. The identity of his perſon being proved, a rule was made for his execution; and on the eighth day of December he ſuffered decapitation with great compoſure and ſerenity.

While England was engaged in cruſhing the rebellion at home, the French king and count Saxe took the field in the latter end of April, at the head of one hundred and twenty thouſand men, and advanced towards the allies, who, to the number of forty-four thouſand, were intrenched behind the Demer, under the conduct of the Auſtrian general Bathiani, who retired before them, and took poſt in the neighbourhood of Breda, the capital of Dutch Brabant. Saxe immediately inveſted Antwerp, which in a few days ſurrendered. He then ſat down before the ſtrong town of Mons in Hainault, with an irreſiſtible train of artillery, an immenſe quantity of bombs and warlike implements, and carried on his approaches with ſuch impetuoſity, that notwithſtanding a very vigorous defence, the garriſon was obliged to capitulate on the twenty-ſeventh of June, being about twenty-eight days after the place had been inveſted. St. Guiſlain and Charleroy met with the fate of Mons and Antwerp; ſo that Lewis was abſolute maſter of Flanders, Brabant, and Hainault, about the middle of July.

Prince Charles of Lorrain now aſſumed the command of the confederate army at Terheyde, it being reinforced by ſome of the Heſſian troops and a freſh body of Auſtrians under count Palſi, amounting to eighty-ſeven thouſand men, including the Dutch forces commanded by prince Waldeck. Suppoſing the next ſtorm would fall upon Namur, theſe generals marched towards that place, and on the eighteenth of July poſted their troops in an advantageous ſituation, in ſight of the French army, which was encamped at Gemblours. Here they remained till the eighth of Auguſt, when a detachment of the enemy, commanded by count Lowendahl, took poſſeſſion of Huy, where they found a large magazine belonging to the confederates, whoſe communication with Maeſtricht was entirely cut off. This obliged prince Charles to abandon Namur to its own ſtrength, and quitting his advantageous poſt, he retired on the north ſide of the Maeſe. Namur was immediately inveſted with thirty-five thouſand French, under the count de Clermont, who cauſed the trenches to be opened on the ſecond of September, and the garriſon, conſiſting of ſeven thouſand Auſtrians, defended themſelves with great reſolution; but the ſiege was carried on with ſuch vigour, that on the twenty-third they were obliged to ſubmit, the town being reduced to a heap of ruins. Mean while the allied army lay encamped at Maeſtricht, where they were joined by Sir John Ligonier with ſome Britiſh and Bavarian battalions. Prince Charles now reſolved to give the enemy battle; for which purpoſe he paſſed the Maeſe on the thirteenth of September, and advanced towards them, but he found marſhal Saxe who had been informed of his deſign, ſo advantageouſly poſted at Tongres, that he thought proper to march back to Maeſtricht. On the twenty-ſixth his rear was attacked in their retreat over the Jaar by the enemy, who were repulſed. But count Saxe being reinforced by the body of troops under Clermont, determined to bring the confederates to an engagement. On the thirtieth he paſſed the Jaar, while the allies, perceiving his intention, took poſſeſſion of the villages of Liers, Warem, and Roucoux, drew up their forces in order of battle, and made preparations for giving him a warm reception. The enemy on the firſt of October advanced in three columns; and a terrible cannonading began about noon, which laſted till two o'clock. Prince Waldeck, who commanded the left wing, was then attacked with great fury; and, after a brave defence, overpowered by numbers. The villages were aſſaulted in columns, and as one brigade was repulſed another ſucceeded: ſo that the allies wete obliged to abandon thoſe poſts, and retreat towards Maeſtricht, with the loſs of five thouſand men, and thirty pieces of artillery. This action terminated the campaign in the Netherlands. The allies paſſing the Maeſe took up their winter-quarters in the duchies of Limburgh and Luxemburgh: while the French cantoned their troops in the places which they had newly conquered. In the month of July, this year, died Philip, king of Spain, and Chriſtian VI. king of Denmark. The former was ſucceeded by his eldeſt ſon Ferdinand; and the latter by his ſon Frederic V. who had married the princeſs Louiſa, youngeſt daughter to king George II.

There having been a powerful fleet fitted out at Spithead, conſiſting of ſixteen large ſhips, and eight frigates, beſides bomb ketches, tranſports, and ſtore ſhips, the miniſtry, unwilling that this expenſive armament ſhould be wholly uſeleſs to the nation, diſpatched it under the command of admiral Leſtock to the coaſt of Britany, with orders for making himſelf maſter of Port l'Orient, which place was the repoſitory of all the ſtores aud ſhips belonging to the French Eaſt India company. Six battalions, with a detachment of matroſſes and bombardiers were embarked in thirty tranſports, under the command of lieutenant-general Sinclair. On the fourteenth of September, the whole ſailed from Plymouth and ſteered directly for the coaſt of Britany, which they made on the ſeventeenth; but the enterprize was rendered impracticable by delay. The ramparts were mounted with cannon from the ſhips in the harbour; additional works were raiſed; the garriſon was reinforced with ſeveral bodies of regular troops, and great numbers were aſſembling from different parts, ſo that the Britiſh forces were in danger of being ſurrounded in an enemy's country. However, they erected a ſmall battery againſt the town, which they ſet on fire in ſeveral places, with their bombs and red hot bullets, and repulſed a detachment from the garriſon, which had made a ſally to deſtroy their works. But finding their cannon produced no effect upon their fortifications they deſpaired of ſucceſs, and the ſeaſon of the year rendering it dangerous for the ſhips to continue on the coaſt, general Sinclair, after burying two pieces of iron cannon, retreated to the ſea ſide, and embarked with a very inconſiderable loſs. In the beginning of October the fleet ſailed to Quiberon bay, where they deſtroyed a Spaniſh man of war, took poſſeſſion of a fort on the peninſula, and reduced the trifling iſlands of Hovat and Heydie, after which they returned to England.

November the eighteenth, the parliament having met, affectionate addreſſes were preſented by both houſes; and when the commons came to conſider the ſupply, they voted four hundred and thirty-three thouſand pounds to the empreſs queen of Hungary, and three hundred thouſand to the king of Sardinia: they granted four hundred and ten thouſand pounds for eighteen thouſand Hanoverians, and one hundred ſixty one thouſand ſix hundred and ſeven pounds for ſix thouſand Heſſians: they continued the ſubſidies to the electors of Cologne, Mentz, and Bavaria; and gave five hundred thouſand pounds to enable his majeſty to carry on the war with advantage. So that the whole of the ſupply this year amounted to nine millions four hundred and twenty-five thouſand, two hundred and fifty-four pounds. This was raiſed by a land-tax of four ſhillings in the pound, by transferable annuities, at an intereſt of four, and a premium of ten per cent. and by new duties on coaches and wheel carriages, on houſes and windows.

A. D. 1747. It was reſolved by the allied powers to aſſemble a powerful army in the Netherlands. His royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland, had ſet out for Holland about the beginning of December, to concert with marſhal Bathiani the plan of operations for the enſuing campaign, in which he was to act as commander in chief of the confederate forces. In the latter end of March he took the field, and fixed his head quarters at the village of Filberg: the prince of Waldeck, with the Dutch troops, were poſted at Breda, and marſhal Bathiani near Venlo. The allied army conſiſted of one hundred and twenty thouſand men, but through the inexcuſable negligence of the Dutch and Auſtrians, they had neither forage nor proviſions, which obliged them, notwithſtanding their early appearance in the field to continue inactive for ſix weeks. About this time a treaty was ſigned between his Britannic majeſty and the empreſs of Ruſſia, whereby, in conſideration of an annual ſubſidy of three hundred thouſand pounds, ſhe engaged to keep on foot, during the war, upon the frontiers of Livonia, a body of fifty thouſand foot, and forty or fifty gallies upon the coaſt of that province, to act in ſuch a manner as his Britannic majeſty ſhould require in giving his allies aſſiſtance.

The States General, ſenſible of the danger to which their dilatory proceedings had expoſed them, were now willing to act vigorouſly, in concert with Great Britain, in proſecuting the war, but previous to their fully exerting themſelves, they inſiſted upon the diſſolution of the ſitting parliament of Great Britain, of which, from the various complexions it had worn, they had no very good opinion. In conſequence of this their declaration the parliament was diſſolved, and a new one immediately ſummoned.

A deſign was formed by the confederates for retaking Antwerp: but this city was ſo effectually covered by the grand army of the enemy, and ſo well fortified and garriſoned, that they ſoon found the enterprize impracticable. His royal highneſs then reſolved to take poſt between the Great and Little Nethes, by which he covered Bergen-op-Zoom and Maeſtricht. About the latter end of May the French king arrived at Bruſſels, and Saxe then determined to undertake the ſiege of Maeſtricht. For this purpoſe he advanced towards Louvain, and the confederates perceiving his intention, put their army into motion likewiſe, to take poſt between that town and the enemy. On the twentieth of July, the allies took poſſeſſion of their ground, and drew up in order of battle, with their right at Beilen, and their leſt extending to Wirle, within a mile of Maeſtricht, having in the front of their leſt wing, the village of Laffeldt, in which they poſted ſeveral battalions of Britiſh infantry. The enemy had taken poſſeſſion of the heights of Herdeeren immediately above the allies; and both armies cannonaded each other till the evening. The next morning the enemy's infantry marched down the hill in one column and attacked the village of Laffeldt, which was defended with great obſtinacy. The aſſailants ſuffered terribly in their approach from the cannon of the confederates, and they met with ſuch a warm reception from the Britiſh muſketry that they could not ſtand it; but when theſe were broke and diſperſed, freſh brigades ſucceeded with aſtoniſhing perſeverance. The allies were driven out of the village; yet being ſuſtained by three regiments, they meaſured back their ground, and repulſed the enemy with great ſlaughter. Saxe, however, continued pouring in other battalions, and, the confederates being thus overpowered by numbers, the French regained and maintained their footing in the village, after it had been three times loſt and carried. At noon the duke of Cumberland ordered the whole leſt wing to advance againſt the enemy, whoſe infantry gave way; prince Waldeck then led up the center; and marſhal Bathiani made a motion with the right towards Herdeeren, to annoy the flanks of the enemy. Victory now ſeemed ready to declare for the confederates, when the fortune of the day took a ſudden turn, occaſioned by the cowardly behaviour of ſome Dutch ſquadrons, who perceiving the infantry before them was hard preſſed by the French, inſtead of ſupporting them, turned their backs, and flying at full gallop, overthrew five battalions of infantry belonging to the confederates corps de reſerve. The enemy's cavalry taking advantage of this confuſion ruſhed among the ſcattered troops, whom they trampled under foot, and penetrated through and divided the lines of the combined army. His royal highneſs had endeavoured, but in vain, to rally the Dutch cavalry, and it was with difficulty he rejoined the leſt wing. In all probability the defeat would have been total, had not Sir John Ligonier at the head of three Britiſh regiments of dragoons and a few ſquadrons of Imperial horſe, charged the whole line of the French cavalry with ſuch intrepidity and ſucceſs that he put a ſtop to their career, and enabled the duke to effect an orderly retreat to Maeſtricht. Sir John himſelf was taken priſoner, but the regiments he commanded retired in excellent order. The allies did not ſuſtain much damage in the purſuit, and even brought off all their artillery, ſixteen pieces of cannon excepted. The loſs did not exceed ſix thouſand men killed and taken: theſe were chiefly Engliſh, Heſſians and Hanoverians, they having in a manner oppoſed the whole French army, the ſhare of the Dutch and Auſtrians in the engagement, as well as their loſs, being too inconſiderable to be mentioned. The enemy purchaſed this victory with the loſs of upwards of ten thouſand of their beſt troops, a number of ſtandards, and ſeveral pair of colours, with ſeven hundred priſoners taken, among whom were ſixty officers, ſome of them perſons of diſtinction.

The French army continued in the neighbourhood of Tongres; and marſhal Saxe having amuſed the confederates with marches and countermarches, at length detached count Lowendahl, with thirty-ſix thouſand men to beſiege Bergen-op-Zoom, the ſtrongeſt fortification of Dutch Brabant, and hitherto deemed impregnable. From the ſixteenth of July to the fifteenth of September, the ſiege produced an unintermitting ſcene of horror and deſtruction: deſperate ſallies were made, and mines ſprung with the moſt terrible effects: the works began to be ſhattered, the town was laid in aſhes, the trenches were filled with the bodies of the ſlain; nothing was ſeen but fire and ſmoak; nothing heard but one inceſſant roar of bombs and cannon. The damage, however, fell chiefly on the beſiegers, who were ſlain in heaps, while the garriſon ſuffered very little, and could be occaſionally relieved or reinforced from the lines. But ſome inconſiderable breaches being made in one ravelin and two baſtions, Lowendahl reſolved to ſtorm them: theſe Cronſtrom thought invincible, and, on that ſuppoſition, preſumed that the enemy would not attempt an aſſault: but the French general having regulated his diſpoſitions, about four o'clock in the morning, of the ſixteenth of September, the ſignal was given for the aſſault. A prodigious quantity of bombs being caſt into the ravelin, the French troops threw themſelves into the foſſe, mounted the breaches, forced open a ſally-port, and entered the place almoſt without oppoſition; for they had time to extend themſelves along the curtins and form in order of battle, before the garriſon could be aſſembled. The reduction of this important fortreſs was followed by the ſurrender of all thoſe in the neighbourhood, by which means the victors became maſters of the whole navigation of the Schelde. As ſoon as Lewis was informed of Lowendahl's ſucceſs, he promoted him to the rank of marſhal of France. He likewiſe appointed count Saxe governor of the conquered Netherlands; after which he returned in triumph to Verſailles; and in a little time both armies retired into winter quarters, when his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland embarked for England, where, on the thirteenth of November, he arrived.

This year an expenſive armament was fitted out by the French king, Lewis being reſolved to renew his efforts againſt the Britiſh ſettlements in North America and the Eaſt Indies. Accordingly two ſquadrons were fitted out at Breſt: that deſtined to act in America was commanded by de la Jonquiere, and the other by M. de St. George. The Engliſh miniſtry being informed of theſe meaſures determined to fruſtrate them, by intercepting both ſquadrons, which were to ſail at the ſame time. Vice admiral Anſon and rear admiral Warren were ordered out with a powerful fleet to cruiſe off Cape Finiſterre. On the third of May they fell in with the French ſquadrons, conſiſting of ſix large men of war, the ſame number of frigates, and four armed veſſels, which had been equipped by their Eaſt India company, having under their convoy thirty merchant ſhips richly laden. The enemy's ſhips of war immediately drew up in line of battle, while the merchantmen under the protection of the ſix frigates, continued their courſe with all the ſail they could carry. The Britiſh fleet was by this time formed, and the engagement began with great fury; but the enemy was ſoon compelled to ſtrike their colours. The loſs on both ſides was nearly equal. Immediately after the battle three ſhips were diſpatched in purſuit of the merchantmen, and their convoy, nine ſail of which were taken. Our fleet then returned with their prizes in triumph to Spithead. A conſiderable ſum was found in bullion, on board the French merchant ſhips, which was conveyed to London in waggons, amidſt the acclamations of the populace. By this victory we not only put a ſtop to the deſigns of France againſt our poſſeſſions in North America and the Eaſt Indies, but likewiſe diſtreſſed them by having upwards of four thouſand of their beſt ſailors locked up in our priſons. Soon after this tranſaction admiral Anſon was created a peer, and admiral Warren honoured with the order of the Bath. About the middle of June, commodore Fox, with ſix ſhips of war, cruiſing off Cape Ortugal in Galicia, fell in with a fleet of homeward bound St. Domingo men, conſiſting of one hundred and ſeventy ſail, under the convoy of four large ſhips of war, commanded by commodore de la Motte. On diſcovering the Britiſh ſquadron, La Motte abandoned his convoy, forty-ſix ſail of which fell into our hands, having on board one thouſand four hundred and twenty-eight ſailors, together with a very valuable cargo of cotton, indigo, ſugar, &c.

In the beginning of Auguſt, rear admiral Hawke ſailed from Plymouth, with fourteen ſhips of the line, to intercept a fleet of French merchant ſhips bound for the Weſt Indies; and after cruiſing for ſome time upon the coaſt of Britany, about eight in the morning of the fourteenth of October, being then in the latitude of Belleiſle, he ſaw a great number of ſhips, which proved to be the fleet he was in queſt of, under convoy of nine ſhips of the line, beſides frigates commanded by M. de l'Eſtanduaire. As ſoon as the French commodore could diſtinctly make the Britiſh ſquadron, he ordered one of his great ſhips and a frigate to proceed with the merchantmen, while he formed the line of battle and waited the attack. At eleven in the forenoon, admiral Hawke diſplayed the ſignal to chace, and in about half an hour both fleets engaged. The battle laſted till night, when all the French ſquadron except the Intrepide and Tonant, had ſtruck to the Engliſh flag. Theſe two ſhips eſcaped in the dark, and returned to Breſt in a very ſhattered condition. The loſs of the enemy amounted to eight hundred men, while that of the Engliſh did not exceed two hundred. Admiral Hawke conducted his prizes to England, and was created a knight of the Bath ſoon after his arrival.

About this time the belligerent powers began to think ſeriouſly of peace. Notwithſtanding the rapid conqueſts France had made, ſhe drooped in the midſt of her triumphs; her trade being in a manner deſtroyed by a war with the Dutch; Auſtria ſaw her finances almoſt exhauſted, her armies ill ſupplied, and moſt of her provinces laid waſte. Spain, who carried on the war with equal inactivity and ill ſucceſs, and found the evils it had intended Great Britain were all fallen on herſelf, began to adopt more moderate meaſures. England, which of all the contending powers, had ſuſtained by far the greateſt expence, was not able to carry on another campaign without loading the people with taxes, and the Dutch, who were much fonder of negociating than fighting, ardently wiſhed to ſee their barrier freed from the French yoke, and themſelves delivered from friends, who under the pretence of protecting them, laid waſte their moſt fruitful provinces, and ſtopped the ſources of their commerce. When the new parliament met on the tenth of November, the commons having again choſen Arthur Onſlow, Eſq; for their ſpeaker, his majeſty opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, wherein he gave them to underſtand, that a congreſs would ſpeedily be opened at Aix-la-Chapelle, to concert the means for obtaining a general pacification; and obſerved, that nothing would more conduce to the ſucceſs of the negociation than united vigour and perfect unanimity.

A. D. 1748. The allies encamped in the neighbourhood of Ruremonde, to the number of one hundred and ten thouſand men. Marſhal Saxe had received poſitive orders from the French king to form the ſiege of Maeſtricht, and, accordingly, on the third of April he inveſted the city. The garriſon conſiſted of Imperial and Dutch troops, under the command of the baron d'Alva, who defended the place with great ſpirit and reſolution; but the beſiegers, though annoyed with frequent ſallies, determined to ſurmount all oppoſition, and therefore carried on their approaches with aſtoniſhing bravery and reſolution. After a furious aſſault, in which every inch of ground was diſputed, they effected a lodgment in the covered way; and the fate of Maeſtricht began to be doubtful, when a courier arrived there from the duke of Cumberland, with advice that the preliminary articles of peace had been ſigned at Aix-la-Chapelle on the nineteenth of April, upon which all hoſtilities were ſuſpended; and on the thirteenth of May, the king put an end to the ſeſſion, after having in his ſpeech acquainted both houſes, the preliminaries of a peace were actually ſigned at Aix-la-Chapelle; and that the baſis of this accommodation, was a general reſtitution of all the conqueſts which had been made during the war. On the ſeventh of October, the definitive treaty of peace was ſigned at Aix-la-Chapelle, by which all the former treaties were expreſsly confirmed, from that of Weſtphalia to the laſt concluded at London and Vienna.

A. D. 1749. On the thirteenth of June the buſineſs of the ſeſſion was brought to a concluſion, and his majeſty put an end to it by a ſpeech, in which he told them, That the terms and conditions of the definitive treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle had been carried into execution by the ſeveral contracting parties with great punctuality and good faith, ſo far as the time and diſtance of the places would admit. He expreſſed his ſatisfaction at ſeeing the public credit in ſo flouriſhing a condition, at the end of an expenſive, though neceſſary war, and then having returned them thanks for their ſupplies, and recommended unanimity among them, the parliament was prorogued.

A ſcheme was now formed by the earl of Halifax, at this time firſt lord of trade and plantations, in which he was aſſiſted by many perſons of diſtinction, for the ſettlement of a new colony in Nova Scotia, in order to extend the power of Great Britain in that large track of country, diffuſe the benefits of population and agriculture, and improve the fiſhery of that extenſive coaſt. This excellent and patriotic ſcheme met with the ſucceſs it deſerved; for his majeſty having been pleaſed to honour it with his royal approbation; the lords of trade and plantation, gave notice in the Gazette, and other public papers, on the ſeventh of March, that proper encouragement would be given to ſuch of the officers and private men lately diſmiſſed his majeſty's land and ſea ſervice, as were willing to accept of grants of land, and to ſettle with, or without their families in the province of Nova Scotia. In conſequence of this advertiſement, by the beginning of May, no leſs than three thouſand, ſeven hundred and fifty perſons, with their families had engaged themſelves to go to this new ſettlement, and fix their habitations there. The honourable Edward Cornwallis was appointed governor of this infant colony, and accordingly accompanied the ſettlers thither. The whole fleet, after a pleaſant voyage, arrived ſafely at Nova Scotia, and anchored on the twenty-firſt of June, in the bay of Chebucto, ſituated in the center of the ſouthern part of the province; Annapolis being on the ſouth, and Canſo on the north. Soon after their arrival a town was planned out at the head of Chebucto harbour, and ſoon finiſhed; when it was divided into lots, and called Halifax. It ſoon wore a pleaſing aſpect; and is now in a very flouriſhing condition. During the courſe of this year, died Charles Seymour, the great and magnificent duke of Somerſet; the humane and generous John duke of Montague; field-marſhal, Richard Temple, viſcount Cobham; John Lindſey, the brave earl of Crawford; Sir Watkin Williams Wynn, and Sir John Norris, admiral of England.

The parliament met at Weſtminſter on the ſixteenth of November, and the commons voted one hundred eighty-three thouſand two hundred and thirty-two pounds, for making good the engagements into which his majeſty had entered; one million, forty-five thouſand, five hundred and ninety pounds, towards diſcharging the national debt; four hundred and ſixty-three thouſand and fifty-two pounds, for ſupplying deficiencies; two hundred forty-nine thouſand, nine hundred and thirty pounds, for defraying extraordinary expences; one hundred twenty-two thouſand two hundred forty-ſix pounds, for reimburſing the inhabitants of North America, the money they had expended in making preparations for an expedition againſt Canada, and for ſupporting the colony of Nova Scotia; thirty-ſix thouſand, four hundred and ſeventy-ſix pounds, towards maintaining the above coloniſts during twelve months; and two millions, one hundred and ninety-nine thouſand, eight hundred and fifty-five pounds, for the ſervices of the enſuing year: the whole ſupply amounted to upwards of four millions. The number of land forces were fixed at eighteen thouſand eight hundred and ſixty-ſeven men; and fifteen thouſand the number of marines.

A. D. 1750. On the twelfth of April, his majeſty repaired to the houſe of peers, and after thanking the commons for the ſupplies they had granted, and the attention they had ſhewn to the good of the public, prorogued the parliament; and ſoon after ſet out for his German dominions. About two months before this prorogation, the inhabitants of the metropolis were thrown into the utmoſt conſternation by two ſhocks of an earthquake: the firſt happened on the eighth of February, between twelve and one at noon, and was felt throughout the cities of London and Weſtminſter, and the parts adjacent; ſome chimnies were thrown down, and the waters, in ſeveral places were agitated in a very extraordinary manner; the ſecond on the eighth of March, at half after five in the morning. The latter was far more ſevere than the former, though providentially no lives were loſt. It was attended with a hollow ruſtling noiſe, reſembling that of wind. In ſome places the ſhock was ſo violent that the people left their beds and houſes and ran into the ſtreets almoſt naked. For ſome time before the ſhock happened, a continual, confuſed lightning, which darted with great ſtrength and very low, was obſerved. The ſhock was felt in ſeveral parts of Eſſex, Surry, and Kent, as well as in Middleſex, ſo that the panic became univerſal in all the four counties; and was ſtill farther increaſed by the ridiculous prediction of a wild enthuſiaſtical ſoldier, who boldly propheſied that a third ſhock would happen in the night between the ſeventh and eighth of April, and lay the whole cities of London and Weſtminſter in ruins. Though this prognoſtication ſeems, when viewed in the eye of reaſon, too ridiculous to merit the leaſt attention, yet it produced the moſt aſtoniſhing effect on the credulous and already terrified vulgar. Multitudes of the inhabitants abandoned their houſes and retired into the country; and in the evening of the ſeventh of April, the fields adjacent to the metropolis were crouded with people, who waited there during the whole night in the moſt alarming ſituation, till the light of the morning put an end to their apprehenſions, by convincing them that the prophecy they had been weak enough to credit, had no other baſis than that of falſehood. A no leſs extraordinary event happened at the ſeſſions at the Old Bailey. The putrefied air adhering to the cloaths of the malefactors, ſpread a peſtilential fever among the audience. The lord-mayor of London, one alderman, two of the judges, ſeveral lawyers, and the greater part of the jury loſt their lives by this peſtilential vapour. This melancholy cataſtrophe occaſioned orders to be given for thoroughly cleanſing the jail of Newgate, and erecting a ventilator on the leads, in order to extract the foul air out of the priſon, and cauſe a circulation of freſh, to prevent, if poſſible, another accident of ſuch fatal tendency.

A. D. 1751.

The king being returned from his German dominions, opened, on the ſeventeenth of January, the ſeſſion of parliament, with a ſpeech; when the ſupplies demanded by the miniſtry, amounted to nearly five millions; ſeveral of the motions were oppoſed, with the utmoſt force of argument by Mr. Pitt, Sir George Lyttleton, and Mr. Grenville; but the force of numbers prevailed, and the miniſtry carried every thing they propoſed. On the twentieth of March, about ten at night, the nation ſuffered a ſevere loſs by the death of Frederick prince of Wales, in the forty-ſixth year of his age. His royal highneſs had catched cold in his garden at Kew, about three weeks before; and having neglected it, his diſorder increaſed by his coming very warm from the houſe of peers in his chair, with the windows open. This brought on a pleuriſy, which his phyſicians were far from thinking mortal; and proper applications being made, he was thought in a fair way of recovery, till the very hour before his death; when a large abſceſs upon the lungs, which had long been gathering, was ſuppoſed to burſt, and to have been the immediate cauſe of his death. This amiable prince had carefully ſtudied the conſtitution and intereſt of Great Britain, with the ſpirit of the laws of England. He was at great pains to acquire a taſte in the fine arts, eſpecially thoſe in which the Engliſh excelled, and was a generous patron of ſeveral eminent poets, and other writers of merit. He was a pattern of conjugal tenderneſs, and was uſed to tell thoſe he was moſt intimate with, that he thought it the greateſt happineſs of his life, that his princeſs was every thing he could wiſh, and that he believed he ſhould have loved her, had ſhe been of the humbleſt ſtation. Towards the latter part of his life, he had applied with great aſſiduity to the ſtudy of commerce, and embraced every opportunity of patronizing the plans formed for its advantage. He left five ſons and three daughters; and at the time of his death his princeſs was far advanced in her pregnancy. The remains of his royal highneſs were, on the thirteenth of April, depoſited, with great pomp and ceremony, in a vault, in Henry the ſeventh's chapel, in Weſtminſter-abbey. On the twentieth letters paſſed the great ſeal for creating the prince's eldeſt ſon, George William, his preſent majeſty, prince of Wales, and earl of Cheſter, and on the twenty-ſecond of May, his majeſty gave the royal aſſent to a bill for providing for the adminiſtration of the government, in caſe it ſhould deſcend to any of the children of his late royal highneſs, while under eighteen years of age. This year was alſo fatal to the prince of Orange, who had married the princeſs royal of England, and died in the forty-firſt year of his age; and about the ſame time Louiſa, the king's youngeſt daughter, and queen of Denmark, expired at Copenhagen, in the twenty-ſeventh year of her age. Among the acts paſſed this ſeſſion, was one for altering the ſtile, and regulating the commencement of the year. By this ſtatute the year was to commence from the firſt of January, and eleven days were dropped, to bring the year nearer the true courſe of the ſun. On the twenty-fifth of June the king prorogued both houſes to the thirteenth of Auguſt; and the parliament was again opened at Weſtminſter on the fourteenth of November.

A. D. 1752.

As ſoon as the commons had preſented very affectionate addreſſes to the king they proceeded to ſettle the ſupplies; the whole amounting to near four millions ſterling. On the twenty-ſixth of March his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and, after having given his aſſent to ninety-five public and private bills, put an end to this ſeſſion of parliament: upon which the king ſet out for Hanover, in order to concert the moſt proper meaſures for executing the great ſcheme he had formed, for electing the archduke Joſeph king of the Romans. In the mean time, his Pruſſian majeſty diſcontinued the payment of the Sileſian loan, with which he had charged himſelf, by an article in the treaty of Breſlaw. He alſo publiſhed a paper in juſtification of his conduct; but every article of the charge being clearly and fully confuted, his Pruſſian majeſty withdrew his claim, and iſſued orders for continuing the payment of the loan as before. In North America, the French had been for ſome time labouring to acquire large tracts of land belonging to the Engliſh: while their Indians committed the moſt inhuman barbarities on our out-ſettlers; and to effect their ambitious projects, they ſent nine thouſand ſoldiers with their wives and children to Canada. In the Eaſt Indies a war was carried on between the French and Engliſh companies. Colonel Clive, an officer in the ſervice of the latter, had obliged the French to retire from before Arcot; and had gained many other conſiderable advantages over the enemy. This year was ſo barren of events at home, that not one happened deſerving of notice: the affairs of the parliament, with regard to their granting the yearly ſupplies, was during this period the main buſineſs.

A. D. 1753.

The king having returned from his German dominions, opened the parliament on the ſecond of January. The commons proceeded immediately to conſider the ſupplies, which, by the œconomy of the miniſters, amounted to very little more than two millions; and on the ſeventeenth of June, the buſineſs that lay before them being finiſhed, the king put an end to the ſeſſion. Several unpopular acts were paſſed by this parliament, particularly an act to permit perſons profeſſing the Jewiſh religion, to be naturalized. A petition from the lord mayor, aldermen and common council, expreſſed their apprehenſions, that ſhould the bill paſs into a law, it would greatly tend to the diſhonour of religion, endanger our excellent conſtitution, and be highly prejudicial to the intereſt and trade of the kingdom in general. Several other petitions, both for and againſt the bill, were preſented; and a ſpirit of animoſity againſt the Jews was ſpread throughout the whole nation, notwithſtanding which the bill paſſed; but it was repealed the enſuing ſeſſion. In this ſeſſion alſo a bill paſſed to prevent clandeſtine marriages; by which ſtatute it was enacted, that no minors ſhould be ſuffered to contract marriage without the conſent of their parents or guardians: that the banns of marriage ſhould be regularly publiſhed three ſucceſſive Sundays in the church of the pariſh where both parties reſided, for one month at leaſt before the ceremony: that the marriage ſolemnized without this previous publication, or a licence obtained from the biſhop's court, ſhould be void; and the perſon who ſolemnized it, ſhould be tranſported for ſeven years. This act was then, and by many, is now thought to be replete with conſequences injurious to ſociety; having a tendency to impede that ardour which impels numbers to marry, and to clog a ceremony of infinite advantage to the nation, with procraſtination and delay. Among theſe and other acts, was likewiſe one for purchaſing the famous collection of Sir Hans Sloane, who now paid the debt of nature. That celebrated naturaliſt and antiquarian directed, by his laſt will, that his whole muſeum ſhould be offered to the parliament for the uſe of the public, on condition of their paying to his executors the ſum of twenty thouſand pounds. The offer engaged the attention of the whole kingdom; and when it was made in form to the houſe of commons, they readily embraced it; they accordingly prepared a bill for making the purchaſe, together with the Harleian collection of manuſcripts which were alſo offered by the ducheſs of Portland. In order to increaſe ſtill more theſe treaſures of literature, it was likewiſe reſolved to join with them the famous Cottonian library, and to provide a proper place for them, together with the king's collection of books, which had long lain expoſed to the injuries of the weather, in the old dormitory at Weſtminſter. Theſe reſolutions being taken, a bill was paſſed for completing ſo noble a purpoſe: governors and truſtees were appointed, and Montague-houſe, one of the moſt magnificent edifices in the kingdom, was purchaſed and immediately fitted out for the repoſitory of theſe famous collections.

We have already obſerved that the French in Canada had, during the courſe of the laſt year, procured a ſtrong reinforcement from Europe. This additional ſtrength flattered them with the pleaſing hopes of being able to engage the Engliſh to advantage, and they accordingly made the neceſſary preparations for taking the field early in the ſpring. They were not ignorant that the Engliſh were building forts and raiſing plantations on the banks of the Ohio, which they conſidered as too near their own ſettlements to be diſregarded, and therefore determined to oppoſe them in their ſcheme for eſtabliſhing a colony in that country. Accordingly the French pretended they had a prior right to theſe lands, and therefore erected forts of their own, on the ſame banks of that river. The Engliſh were now convinced that vigorous meaſures were the only reſource they could adopt for any hopes of ſucceſs, and the colonies accordingly determined to oppoſe the enemy to the utmoſt of their power. Theſe tranſactions took up the greater part of the current year; the reſult of them will be hereafter related. Nor did the French confine their ambitious deſigns to America: they were alſo extended to the Eaſt Indies, where they had omitted nothing in their power, to embroil the Engliſh with the nabobs, or vice-roys of the great Mogul, in different parts of the peninſula on this ſide the Ganges. But the French army being defeated in ſeveral engagements, it was at laſt agreed, that the two companies ſhould reciprocally reſtore the territories taken by the troops of either ſince the commencement of theſe diſputes, except certain diſtricts retained for the convenience of their trade; that the nabobs advanced by the influence of either party ſhould be acknowledged by both, and that, for the future, neither ſhould interfere in any differences that might happen between any of the Indian princes. On the fifteenth of November the parliament aſſembled at Weſtminſter, and the ſeſſion was opened by his majeſty, who, in his ſpeech from the throne obſerved, that the public tranquillity and the ſtate of Europe, remained on the ſame footing, as at the cloſe of the laſt ſeſſion; and that they might be aſſured of his ſteadineſs in purſuing the moſt effectual meaſures for preſerving to his people the bleſſings of peace. When the commons were returned to their houſe, a motion was made for an addreſs to his majeſty; but it did not paſs without ſeveral ſevere animadverſions on the inconſiſtency between this ſpeech and the real ſituation of affairs in Europe; nor did the French eſcape without many ſpirited declarations againſt their perfidious conduct both in Aſia and America.

An incident of an inconſiderable kind was in its conſequences carried to ſuch a height this year as to endanger the peace of the public. Elizabeth Canning, a young woman, declared, that on new-year's day ſhe was met, when going home at night, by two men, under Bedlam-wall, in Moorfields; that they pulled off her cap, gown, and apron, gagged her, and threatened to cut her throat if ſhe made the leaſt noiſe. That theſe men hurried her along on foot, when, about four in the morning, they came to the houſe of mother Wells, near Enfield Waſh, where a woman cut off her ſtays, and forced her into a room. Here this girl, by her own account, lived for a whole month, on no other ſuſtenance than about the quantity of a quartern loaf, in ſtale cruſts, and a jug of water; and all this ſeverity was practiſed to induce her to turn proſtitute. She, however, at length, found means to break through a window that had been boarded up, almoſt naked; and, notwithſtanding her long faſt, ran home to London, in the night of the twenty-ninth of January. Improbable as this ſtory is, it had ſuch an effect upon the paſſions of the people, that large ſubſcriptions were inſtantly ſet on foot for the uſe of the girl, and for bringing the delinquents to juſtice. By Canning's deſcription, the houſe was found out; warrants were iſſued for apprehending the miſtreſs, the maid, and one Mary Squires, an old gipſy, whom Canning charged with robbing her of her ſtays. The miſtreſs who did not appear to be guilty of the felony, was ſentenced by the court as a common bawd. The maid, whoſe name was Hall, being intimidated by the juſtice who examined her, turned evidence for Canning, and the gipſey was indicted and tried for a felony. Upon her trial ſhe brought the ſtrongeſt proofs of her being at Abbotſbury, in Dorſetſhire, the very night the felony was ſaid to be committed; and many contradictions on Canning's part, and that of her friends, appeared in the courſe of the trial. But the prepoſſeſſion of the people ran ſo high againſt the gipſey, that ſhe was found guilty, death. Sir Criſpe Gaſcoyne, the then lord mayor, and ſome other gentlemen intereſted themſelves in her favour. A great number of affidavits from perſons of unqueſtionable credit were ſent up, proving the alibi of Squires; and applications were made to the throne for mercy. The king referred the affair to the attorney and ſolicitor-general, who having examined the evidence on each ſide, made their report to the king and council in her favour, and his majeſty was pleaſed to pardon her. The people were now divided into two parties, each of which were men of ſenſe and humanity. Subſcriptions were advertiſed, and immediately raiſed for proſecuting the Abbotſbury men, upon whoſe evidence the pardon had been granted. On the other hand the gentlemen who had engaged againſt Canning, were reſolved upon the puniſhment of one whom they thought to be an impoſtor. Bills of perjury were preferred on both ſides. After a full and impartial trial, the Abbotſbury men were acquitted; and Canning abſconding, warrants were iſſued for apprehending her. In the beginning of the following year ſhe ſurrendered to take her trial, which was carried on to an extraordinary length. The mob, inflamed, inſulted Sir Criſpe Gaſcoyne, and on his coming out of the ſeſſion-houſe, he was obliged to draw his ſword in his defence. The jury brought in their verdict, "guilty of perjury, but not wilful and corrupt." This diſtinction being objected to by the court, they, at laſt, with great difficulty, brought her in guilty; and ſhe was ſentenced to be tranſported to one of the Engliſh colonies in America. The zeal of her numerous friends did not end here. They gave her recommendations to perſons of fortune in New England; and ſhe had a ſervant hired to attend her in the voyage. After all that has been advanced by each party, an impenetrable cloud of difficulties has involved in obſcurity this intricate affair, which even time itſelf, the revealer of truth, has not diſpelled as yet.

His majeſty on the ſixth of April, A. D. 1754. after giving the royal aſſent to ſeveral bills which had paſſed both houſes, prorogued the parliament: and ſoon after it was diſſolved by proclamation, and writs iſſued for calling a new one. The right honourable Henry Pelham, chancellor of the exchequer, died in the beginning of March, and was ſincerely regretted by his majeſty and the nation in general. On his death, the duke of Newcaſtle was placed at the head of the treaſury, and was ſucceeded in his poſt of ſecretary of ſtate by Sir Thomas Robinſon; Mr. Legge was appointed chancellor of the exchequer; Sir George Lyttleton cofferer, and the earl of Hilſborough comptroller of the houſhold; Mr. George Grenville, brother to earl Temple, was appointed treaſurer of the navy; and Mr. Charles Townſhend a lord of the admiralty, in the room of lord Barrington, removed to the poſt of maſter of the wardrobe; lord Hardwicke, the chancellor, was created an earl; and the place of lord-chief-juſtice of the King's-bench, vacant by the death of Sir William Lee, was conferred on Sir Dudley Rider, who was ſucceeded in his poſt of attorney-general by Mr. Murray. The new parliament met at Weſtminſter on the tenth of May, and the ſeſſion opened by the duke of Cumberland, and ſome other noblemen, acting by commiſſion from the king. This ſhort ſeſſion continued only to the fifth of June, when it was cloſed, and the parliament prorogued to the eighth of Auguſt, and afterwards to the month of November.

The miniſtry, alarmed at the progreſs of the French in America, and convinced from the evaſive anſwers they received from that court that nothing could be effected by negociation, ſent peremptory orders to the governors of the American colonies to repel force by force, and drive the French from their ſettlements on the Ohio, provided they refuſed to retire in a peaceable manner. Theſe meaſures being taken, Colonel Waſhington was detached to the banks of the Ohio at the head of four thouſand men. On his arrival he threw up ſome works, and erected a kind of occaſional fort, in hopes of being able to defend himſelf till he ſhould be joined by a reinforcement from New York. But in this he was miſtaken, a ſmall party of the French being ſent to demand the ſurrender of the fort, which they pretended was built on their lands; but Waſhington took the whole detachment priſoners. This ſo provoked de Villar, governor of Canada, that he marched to the attack; which Waſhington, who laboured under many diſadvantages, ſuſtained for a conſiderable time; but being overpowered by numbers, he ſurrendered the fort upon capitulation, and marched towards the frontiers of Virginia. In the mean time the Indians, who paid no regard to the treaty, harraſſed the Engliſh in their retreat, plundered their baggage, and maſſacred every individual that fell into their hands. This tranſaction rendered a rupture between the two nations inevitable; nor were either wanting in their preparations for obtaining the deſired ſucceſs. Two regiments under the command of Sir William Pepperel, and governor Shirley, were ordered to be levied in America.

The Britiſh Parliament having met at Weſtminſter on the fourteenth of November, his majeſty opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne, wherein nothing was mentioned of an approaching rupture; but being perſuaded that the king was determined to humble the inſolence of the French court, both houſes of parliament preſented very dutiful and loyal addreſſes, well knowing that nothing could be more agreeable to the nation, nor any expence too great, for reducing that inſidious people to a proper humility.

On the 22d of March, Sir Thomas Robinſon, ſecretary of ſtate, came to A. D. 1755. the parliament houſe with a meſſage from the king, importing, "That his majeſty finding it requiſite, from the preſent ſituation of affairs, to augment his forces by ſea and land, and to take ſuch other meaſures as may beſt tend to preſerve the general peace of Europe, and to ſecure the juſt rights and poſſeſſions of his crown in America, as well as to repel any attempts whatever which may be formed againſt his majeſty and his kingdoms, doubts not but that his faithful parliament will enable him to make ſuch augmentations in his forces by ſea and land, as the emergency of affairs in this critical juncture may require." Upon which, both houſes preſented loyal addreſſes, expreſſing the utmoſt zeal and affection for his majeſty's perſon and government. Nor were theſe mere compliments; the commons immediately voted a million for enabling his majeſty to augment his forces. This alacrity in parliament to aſſiſt his majeſty, cauſed ſuch remarkable diſpatch in every part of the marine, that by the middle of April there was a very powerful fleet at Spithead well manned, and ready to put to ſea; and admiral Boſcawen, with ten ſhips of the line and ſix frigates, having ſix thouſand land forces on board, ſailed to obſerve the motions of the French. Theſe were reinforced with ſix ſhips of the line and one frigate by admiral Holborne.

Mr. Macnamara, an Iriſh officer, who commanded the French fleet, ſailed from Breſt on the ſixth of May, directing their courſe towards the gulph of St. Lawrence; but as ſoon as they arrived in a certain latitude, Macnamara returned to Breſt with nine of the capital ſhips, leaving the reſt of their ſquadron to continue their courſe under M. Bois de la Mothe, and M. de Salvert. On the tenth of June, two of the French fleet, the Alcide and Lys, both of ſixty-four guns, though the latter had only twenty-two mounted, fell in with the Dunkirk and the Defiance off the banks of Newfoundland, in a very thick fog. On their firſt appearance, captain Howe in the Dunkirk coming cloſe along ſide of the Alcide, ordered her to ſtrike, and come into the Engliſh fleet. The French captain aſked if it was peace or war? but not receiving a ſatisfactory anſwer, he repeated the queſtion, adding, he ſhould obey no orders but thoſe of his own admiral. Captain Howe obſerving a great number of land officers on the quarter-deck, generouſly deſired them to withdraw, as it was not their duty to defend the ſhip. This being done, he poured in a broadſide; and the two ſhips being yard-arm and yard-arm, his ſhot did dreadful execution. Howe continued his fire with ſuch alacrity, that the French officers ſoon found it impoſſible to keep the men to their quarters, and therefore ſtruck their colours in leſs than three quarters of an hour. In the mean time the Lys ſtruck to the Defiance; but the Dauphin Royale, another French ſhip that was juſt in ſight at the beginning of the engagement, eſcaped by means of the fog. In theſe ſhips were ſix hundred ſoldiers with their officers, and fifty thouſand crowns. This action was not the only event that was favourable to Great Britain. An expedition had, by his majeſty's command, been concerted between general Lawrence and governor Shirley, againſt the French in Nova Scotia; and was now carried into execution by the aſſiſtance of two thouſand of the New England troops. The important fort of Beauſejour, jour, now Cumberland fort, ſurrendered to lieutenant-colonel Monckton by capitulation, on the ſixteenth of June, after four days bombardment; and the next day a ſmall fort on the river Gaſpereau, followed the example. In the latter was the enemy's principal magazine for ſupplying the French ſoldiers and Indians with proviſions and ſtores. By this ſucceſs, colonel Monckton was enabled to diſarm fifteen thouſand rebel neutrals, conſiſting of Indians and Acadians.

About January, commodore Keppel ſailed from Ireland with a conſiderable fleet of men of war and tranſports, having on board a body of land forces, under the command of general Braddock, and landed the whole corps ſafely at Virginia in the month of April. Soon after their arrival a council was held by the general, at which the governor of that province, and ſeveral of the neighbouring colonies, aſſiſted. After ſeveral debates it was agreed, that in order to preſerve Oſwego, and reduce the French fort at Niagara, Shirley's and Pepperel's regiments ſhould march to the lake Ontario: general Braddock undertook the reduction of Fort du Queſne, a French fortreſs on the river Monongahela: and Crown Point, a ſtrong fortreſs on the banks of Lake Champlin, was to be inveſted by general Johnſon at the head of the provincial troops.

On the twelfth of June, Braddock, at the head of two thouſand men, croſſed the Allegany mountains, and continued his march towards the enemy, but met with many difficulties in his route: he was detained for ſome time at Willis's Creek, and greatly diſtreſſed for want of proviſions and forage, the Virginians not having provided either, nor were there any baggage waggons to be procured in the province. He was, indeed, promiſed one hundred and fifty waggons, and three hundred horſes, together with a large ſupply of forage and proviſions, to be furniſhed from the back ſettlements of Penſylvania; but after a tedious and anxious expectation of theſe ſuccours, only fifty waggons, and one hundred horſes, arrived. In the mean time, Sir John Sinclair advanced towards Fort du Queſne, to reconnoitre the fortreſs and adjacent ground. In this view, he remarked a ſmall eminence within cannon ſhot of the fort, which was built of wood, and garriſoned with a thouſand men. This diſcovery he imparted to the general, and it was propoſed to erect a battery on the eminence, and, by means of red-hot balls, ſet the fort on fire.

For want of ſupplies, Braddock continued at Willis's Creek in the utmoſt perplexity: but was ſoon relieved from his fears, and immediately began his march towards the enemy. On his arrival in the Little Meadows, he found it neceſſary to leave behind him the greater part of his baggage waggons, &c. under the care of colonel Dunbar, with a detachment of eight hundred men. His corps now conſiſted of twelve hundred men, and by this expedient he was enabled to proceed with much greater expedition, and accordingly encamped within ten miles of Fort du Queſne on the eighth of July. The French garriſon quitted the fort; and having choſe a very advantageous ſpot of ground, about ſix miles ſouth therefrom, they entrenched themſelves in a very maſterly manner, having a thick wood on each ſide of them, extending along the route which they knew muſt be taken by the Engliſh general. When Braddock left his camp in the Little Meadows, he continued his march, without even endeavouring to procure the leaſt intelligence of the ſituation and diſpoſition of the enemy, or to reconnoitre the roads and thickets, though his army was almoſt encompaſſed by the latter. Having advanced within three miles of the enemy's entrenchments, the French left their lines, placing their irregulars in the front, with three hundred regulars behind to ſupport them. The greater part of the Indians were poſted in the wood, where they effectually concealed themſelves behind the trees and buſhes. About noon, Braddock appeared with his troops, and was immediately ſaluted by a general diſcharge upon his front, and all along his left flank: upon this, the Engliſh general gave orders to puſh forwards, as the enemy were in ſight, though not within muſket-ſhot; and ſoon after the attack was begun. The war-whoop was now given by the Indians, who riſing from their ambuſh in the thickets, flanked the Engliſh in vollies; among whom they did incredible execution. Diſmayed at being expoſed to three different fires, the vanguard, after making one general fire on the enemy, retreated in the utmoſt confuſion, and threw colonel Dunbar's regiment, which was behind them, into great diſorder. They were, however, rallied by their officers, many of whom were killed as they were uſing their endeavours to induce them to return to the charge, but in vain: they obſtinately refuſed to attack the enemy. In the mean time the general, who exerted himſelf in a very remarkable manner, after having five horſes killed under him, was mortally wounded. On his dropping from his horſe, both regiments fled in the utmoſt terror, diſorder, and precipitation, deſerting their officers, who, though alone, kept their ground, till only five out of ſixty remained, the reſt being either killed or wounded. The provincials, however, who compoſed the rear, ſtood firm, and continued the engagement, on very unequal terms, for near three hours, when they were obliged to retire. But to this noble ſtand the ſafety of the regulars was principally owing. Seven hundred of the Engliſh fell in the engagement, with the greater part of the officers. Colonel Dunbar, after collecting the remains of the army at Fort Cumberland, retired to the frontiers of Penſylvania, and the troops were afterwards ſent to Albany in New York. Meanwhile, governor Shirley and general Johnſon were employed in their reſpective undertakings. Johnſon had long reſided on the Mohawk river, and was greatly beloved both by the inhabitants and the native Indians, for his great integrity and humanity.

Towards the latter end of Auguſt he encamped in a ſtrong ſituation to wait for his batteaux, in order to proceed to Ticonderago, at the other end of Lake George, and from thence to Crown Point. Whilſt in this ſituation, ſome Indian ſcouts brought him advice, that two thouſand of the enemy, under the command of the baron de Dieſkau, were on their march to attack Fort Edward. Hereupon it was determined in a council of war, to ſend one thouſand men, with a number of Indians, in order to intercept the enemy in their return. Accordingly, on the eighth of September, this detachment began their march under the command of colonel Williams. They ſoon met the enemy, who had reſolved to ſurprize general Johnſon's camp, previous to their attack on Fort Edward. Williams and his party were obliged to retreat back to their camp, and the general immediately made the beſt diſpoſition he was able for the reception of the enemy, who preſently appeared in ſight, and halted about one hundred and fifty yards from the camp. Their regular troops began the attack in the center, the Indians and Canadians in their ſervice being placed on our flanks. Their fire did no execution, while ours ſoon diſperſed the ſavages, who fled into the adjacent woods for ſhelter. The engagement then became general, and the French regulars kept their ground, till the inceſſant fire from our artillery put them into ſome diſorder, which our troops perceiving, immediately jumped over the breaſt-work, and attacked them on all ſides. Between ſeven and eight hundred were killed, thirty taken priſoners, among whom was the baron Dieſkau, and the reſt fled with the utmoſt precipitation. In this engagement, the colonels Williams and Titcomb, major Aſhley, ſix captains, and many ſubalterns were killed; and general Johnſon and major Nichols were wounded. The former recovered in a ſhort time, and the plan for attacking Crown Point was formed; but from want of proviſion, or ſome other cauſe, this attempt was deferred till the next year, and the whole army returned to Albany. The brave conduct of general Johnſon met with its juſt reward; for his majeſty was pleaſed to create him a baronet, and he received a preſent of five thouſand pounds from the parliament.

Governor Shirley's intended expedition againſt Niagara, was not carried into execution this year; and that officer, having left colonel Mercer with a garriſon of ſeven hundred men at Oſwego, returned with the greateſt part of the troops under his command to Albany, where a quarrel aroſe between him and Sir William Johnſon, which arrived to ſuch a height, that his majeſty thought proper to interpoſe, and Shirley received orders to return to England and anſwer for his conduct. In the month of September it was reſolved in council, that the lords of the admiralty ſhould iſſue orders, authorizing the captains and commanders in the royal navy to ſeize and bring into port all ſorts of French ſhips, whether men of war or merchantmen. Previous to this, ſeveral new ſhips were built, and others repaired; and theſe maritime preparations were carried on with ſuch diligence and alacrity, that before the end of the year our navy conſiſted of one ſhip of an hundred and ten guns, five of an hundred guns each, thirteen of ninety, eight of eighty, five of ſeventy-four, twenty-nine of ſeventy, four of ſixty-ſix, one of ſixty-four, thirty-three of ſixty, three of fifty-four, twenty-eight of fifty, four of forty-four, thirty-five of forty, and forty-two of twenty; four ſloops of war of fourteen guns each, two of ſixteen, eleven of fourteen, thirteen of twelve, and one of ten; beſides a great number of bomb-ketches, fire-ſhips, and tenders. The miniſtry alſo had ſent, in the preceding year, rear-admiral Watſon, and rear-admiral Pocock, with a ſquadron of capital ſhips, having Aldercorn's regiment on board, to the Eaſt-Indies, in order to ſupport our intereſts there; and on the twenty-ſixth of December 1754, articles of a provincial treaty, and articles and ſtipulations of a truce were ſigned between governor Saunders and M. Godehew; ſoon after which the latter of theſe gentlemen was recalled home, and M. de Leyrit appointed to ſucceed him, whoſe conduct ſoon convinced the Engliſh, that the tranquillity which they hoped would have been permanent, was founded on an uncertain baſis. They were not miſtaken; for early in the year it was found, that the French were endeavouring, though in direct contravention of the proviſional treaty, to make themſelves maſters of all Decan. At the ſame time they alſo took poſſeſſion of Golconda, and ſent aſſiſtance to the Polygor of Vellour, then in actual rebellion againſt his ſovereign, and our ally Mahomed Ally Khan.

Now admiral Watſon, with the fleet under his command, ſailed to reduce Tullagee Angria, a piratical prince in the neighbourhood of Bombay, whoſe chief reſidence was at Geriah. His city was well fortified, and he was now become formidable to all the trading ſhips of Europe. The pirate himſelf had quitted his capital; but his wife and family were ſtill there, under the protection of his brother-in-law, whom he had left governor of the place. As ſoon as the admiral came before the town, he ſent a meſſage to the governor commanding him to ſurrender; but he haughtity anſwered, that he would defend the place to the laſt extremity. This demand was a ſecond time refuſed, and the ſhips began once more to batter the place with redoubled vigour. About one o'clock the magazine of the fort blew up, and at four the garriſon hoiſted a white flag for a capitulation; but the parley that enſued proving abortive, the bombardment began afreſh, and continued till after five, when the white flag was again diſplayed, and the governor ſubmitted to the terms impoſed by the Engliſh. The flag of Angria was ſtruck; and two captains from Clive's army, at the head of a detachment, took poſſeſſion of the fort, and immediately hoiſted the Britiſh colours. They found in the place two hundred pieces of cannon, ſix braſs mortars, a large quantity of ammunition, beſides money and effects, amounting to one hundred and thirty thouſand pounds. But this loſs, however fatal it might prove to Angria, was not the greateſt; his whole fleet, conſiſting of eight grabs, one ſhip finiſhed, two upon the ſtocks, and a great number of gullivots were totally deſtroyed. Among a great number of priſoners were Angria's wife, children, and mother, towards whom the admiral behaved in the moſt humane manner. During theſe tranſactions in India, his majeſty returned from his German dominions, and reached his palace at Kenſington on the fifteenth of September. On the thirteenth of November he opened the ſeſſion of parliament with a ſpeech from the throne; and a few days after, Sir Thomas Robinſon, ſecretary of ſtate, thought proper to reſign the ſeals, which his majeſty delivered to Mr. Fox. Mr. Legge alſo, about the ſame time, from a diſguſt at the meaſures purſued with foreign princes, reſigned his poſt as chancellor of the exchequer, which was conferred on Sir George Lyttleton, and the poſt of ſecretary at war was given to lord Barrington; while Mr. Pitt was diſmiſſed from his employment, and the earl of Darlington and Mr. Hay, were appointed joint pay-maſters general in his ſtead; the privy-ſeal was given to earl Gower; and the duke of Marlborough made general of the ordnance.

A. D. 1756.

At this time, war, though not formally, was openly declared againſt France; for the commons, in adjuſting the ſupplies for this year, had voted fifty thouſand ſeamen, including nine thouſand one hundred and thirty-eight marines, together with two millions ſix hundred thouſand pounds for their maintenance. Early in the ſpring, advice was received that the French were employed in equipping a formidable ſquadron of ſhips at Breſt: recourſe was therefore had to the landgrave of Heſſe for ſuccours, who readily granted them; which, together with twelve battalions of Hanoverians, arrived in England in the month of April. In the mean time the French landed a body of troops in the iſland of Minorca; and the Britiſh miniſtry detached a ſmall ſquadron of ten ſhips of the line to the Mediterranean, under the command of admiral Byng. He reached Gibraltar on the ſecond of May, where he found captain Edgecumbe, with the princeſs Louiſa and a ſloop. Here Byng learned that the French fleet, commanded by M. Galiſſoniere, conſiſting of thirteen ſhips of the line, and a numerous fleet of tranſports, having fifteen thouſand land forces on board, had ſailed on the tenth of April from Toulon, and made a deſcent on the iſland of Minorca. Strengthened by captain Edgecumbe, and reinforced from the garriſon of Gibraltar, Byng ſailed for Minorca on the eighth of May. Captain Harvey in the Phœnix, joined the admiral off the iſland of Majorca. Soon after they ſaw the Engliſh colours flying on the caſtle of St. Philip, and ſeveral bomb-batteries playing upon the works from various parts of the enemy's camp. The admiral continued his courſe in order to aſſiſt or relieve the caſtle, till he perceived the French fleet at a conſiderable diſtance to the ſouth-eaſt. Early the next morning both fleets were formed ready for the attack; and about two o'clock admiral Byng threw out a ſignal to bear away two points from the wind, and engage the enemy. But the diſtance from the French fleet was ſo great, that rear-admiral Weſt, finding it impoſſible to comply with both orders, bore away with his diviſion ſeven points from the wind, and cloſing with the enemy, attacked them with ſuch impetuoſity, that the ſhips which oppoſed him were ſoon driven out of the line; had he been properly ſuſtained by the van, the Britiſh fleet would, in all probability, have gained a complete victory. But the other diviſion not bearing down, and the enemy's center keeping their ſtation, Weſt could not purſue his advantage without running the riſk of being ſeparated from the reſt of the fleet. At the beginning of the engagement, the Intrepid, one of the Engliſh fleet, was ſo diſabled, that ſhe fell on board the next ſhip, which for ſome time retarded the engagement. The French admiral, in the mean time, who perceived he was not able to engage in a cloſe fight with the Engliſh, took the advantage of joining his van, which had been defeated, and of edging away with a flowing ſail. Byng gave chace to the enemy; but his ſhips being foul, and thoſe of the French clean, he could not come up with them; and the next morning not one of the whole fleet could be ſeen. Three of the Engliſh ſhips were ſo damaged in their maſts, that they could not, with any ſafety, keep the ſea; many of the ſailors were ill, nor was there one ſhip that could be converted into an hoſpital for the reception of the ſick and wounded. It was therefore determined, in a council of war, to return to Gibraltar. The news of this engagement threw the whole Britiſh nation into a violent ferment; and the miniſtry immediately ſent Sir Edward Hawke and admiral Saunders to ſuperſede Byng and Weſt, in their commands of the Mediterranean ſquadron. The latter met with a very gracious reception from his majeſty; but the former was committed to an apartment in Greenwich Hoſpital, as a priſoner.

Notwithſtanding this diſappointment of relief, the Engliſh garriſon ſtill defended Fort St. Philip, though the French preſſed them on every ſide with the utmoſt vigour. Numbers, however, at laſt prevailed, and the caſtle was delivered up to the French on the ſeventh of July. Not many days after the ſurrender of St. Philip's, admiral Hawke's fleet, augmented with five ſhips of the line, appeared off the iſland of Minorca. But the French ſquadron was returned to Toulon, and Sir Edward had the mortification to ſee the French colours flying on St. Philip's caſtle. The Engliſh admiral, thus diſappointed in not meeting with Galiſſoniere, blocked up the port of Toulon; and after ſcouring the Mediterranean, and inſulting the enemy's coaſts, he returned with the homeward-bound merchantmen to Gibraltar, and about the latter end of the year ſailed for England, where war had been declared againſt France, and great preparations made for a vigorous proſecution thereof.

In the month of June General Abercrombie, who ſucceeded general Shirley, aſſembled the Britiſh forces at Albany, they conſiſted of two regiments who had ſerved under Braddock; two battalions raiſed in America; two regiments lately ſent from England; four independent companies from New York; the Jerſey regiment; four companies levied in North Carolina; and a body of provincial forces which the government of New England had raiſed.

General Abercrombie was informed by colonel Bradſtreet, at the head of a convoy of proviſions and ſtores for the garriſon of Oſwego, on his arrival at Albany, that he had received certain intelligence from the priſoners, that a large body of the enemy was encamped on the eaſtern ſide of the Lake Ontario, provided with artillery, and all other neceſſaries for beſieging the Fort of Oſwego. In conſequence of this information, Abercrombie ordered a regiment of regulars, under the command of general Webb, to march to the relief of that garriſon; but before he ſet out, the earl of Loudon, who had been appointed commander in chief of all the forces in America, arrived at Albany; and although he approved of every meaſure which general Abercrombie had taken, yet, ſuch was the obſtinacy of the people of New England, New York, and other provinces, who inſiſted that the army they had raiſed ſhould, previous to all other operations, be employed in the reduction of Crown Point, that it was the twelfth of Auguſt before they would give their conſent to general Webb's march. On his arrival at the carrying-place between the Mohawk's river and Wood's-creek, he received the diſagreeable news of Oſwego's being taken, and the garriſon made priſoners of war: therefore, after having rendered Wood's-creek impaſſable to canoes, by felling trees, and throwing them into the ſtream, Mr. Webb returned to Albany, where lord Loudon, finding the ſeaſon was too far advanced to admit of any important enterprize againſt the enemy, cauſed barracks to be built for his forces; after which he provided the forts of Edward and William Henry with garriſons to a great number.

Major Lawrence had obtained ſeveral advantages over the enemy in the Eaſt Indies, and proſecuted his ſucceſs with ſuch vigour, that, in all probability, a ſhort time would have put a period to the war, had not the progreſs of his arms been interrupted by the taking of Calcutta by Surajah Dowla, viceroy of Bengal, who having been irritated by ſome tranſactions of the company levied, a numerous army, and marching to Calcutta inveſted the place, which was then in no poſture of defence. Mr. Drake, the governor, who was a quaker, left the defence of it to Mr. Holwell, his ſecond in command, and accompanied by the ladies and principal perſons in the ſettlement, embarked on board a ſhip in the river, having taken with them their moſt valuable effects, and the books of the company. Mr. Holwell, with the aſſiſtance of a few gallant officers, and a very weak garriſon, repulſed ſeveral attacks of the enemy with uncommon courage and reſolution; but being overpowered by numbers he was obliged to ſubmit, having firſt obtained a promiſe from Surajah, that no injury ſhould be done to any one of the garriſon. This promiſe, however, was very little regarded; for the garriſon and inhabitants, conſiſting of one hundred and forty-ſix perſons of both ſexes, were all driven into a place called the black-hole, being a room of about eighteen feet ſquare. Here they were confined during the whole night, and deprived of the freſh air, by which means no more than twenty-three ſurvived, the reſt having periſhed in the utmoſt agony: among thoſe who eſcaped ſuffocation was Mr. Holwell, who was ſent priſoner to Muxadabad, with his companions.

The loſſes and diſgraces both in the Mediterranean and North America, occaſioned great murmurings at home among all ranks of people, who imagined they ſaw great miſmanagement as well in the directive as in the executive part of government. In the month of November, therefore, his majeſty thought proper to make the following alterations in the miniſtry; the duke of Devonſhire was appointed firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury, in the room of the duke of Newcaſtle; the right honourable Bilſon Legge was made chancellor of the exchequer, in the place of Sir George Lyttleton; earl Temple was appointed firſt lord of the admiralty; the right honourable George Grenville was made treaſurer of the navy; lord chancellor Hardwicke having reſigned the ſeals, they were put into commiſſion; and Mr. Pitt was appointed one of the ſecretaries of ſtate in the room of Mr. Fox. The dread of an invaſion being now perfectly ſubſided, and Hanover thought in more danger than Great Britain, orders were iſſued for ſending home the Heſſian and Hanoverian forces.

On the ſecond of December the parliament met; and addreſſes having been preſented by both houſes, the committee of ſupply, and of ways and means, were appointed, who proceeded to conſider the public eſtimates, when it was reſolved to augment the land-forces from thirty-five thouſand, to forty-nine thouſand ſeven hundred and forty-nine effective men, including four thouſand and eight invalids. The ſeamen were ſettled at fifty-five thouſand men, including eleven thouſand four hundred and nineteen marines, with a ſufficient proviſion for their maintenance. They alſo enabled his majeſty to perform his agreement with, and provide for, his Heſſian and Hanoverian forces; beſides which they granted ample ſums for garriſons, for the ordnance, for levying new regiments, for forming and maintaining an army of obſervation in Germany, and fulfilling his majeſty's engagements with the king of Pruſſia; for the ſupport of the Britiſh forts on the coaſt of Africa; for the relief of South Carolina and Virginia; the ſupport of Nova Scotia and Georgia; for enabling the Eaſt-India Company to keep a military force in their ſettlements; and for ſeveral other uſes and contingencies; which ſupplies amounted to eight millions three hundred and fifty thouſand, three hundred and twenty-five pounds in the whole.

A.D. 1757. As ſoon as the parliament enquired into the loſs of Minorca, a court-martial was appointed for the trial of admiral John Byng; which, after examining witneſſes for the crown and priſoner, came to ſeveral reſolutions, importing on the whole their opinion, that admiral Byng, during the engagement between the Engliſh and French fleets, did not do his utmoſt endeavours to take, ſeize, and deſtroy the ſhips of the French King, which it was his duty to have engaged, nor to aſſiſt ſuch of his majeſty's ſhips as were engaged, which it was his duty to have aſſiſted; and that he did not exert his utmoſt power for the relief of St. Philip's caſtle. They therefore unanimouſly agreed, that he fell under part of the twelfth article of an act of parliament; and as that article preſcribed death, without any alternative left to the diſcretion of the court, adjudged the ſaid admiral to be ſhot to death, at ſuch a time, and on board ſuch a ſhip, as the lords commiſſioners of the admiralty ſhould pleaſe to direct. But as it appeared by the evidence of the officers who were near the admiral's perſon, that no backwardneſs was diſcernible in him during the action, nor any mark of fear or confuſion, either in his countenance or in his behaviour, but that he delivered his orders coolly and diſtinctly, without any ſeeming influence of timidity; and as they had reaſon, from other circumſtances, to believe, that his miſconduct did not ariſe from cowardice or diſaffection, they unanimouſly and earneſtly recommended him as a proper object of mercy. His majeſty, in conſequence of the repreſentation made by the lords of the admiralty, referred the ſentence to the conſideration of the twelve judges, who unanimouſly averred its legality. This report being tranſmitted from the privy-council to the admiralty, their lordſhips iſſued a warrant for executing the ſentence of death, which was accordingly done on the fourteenth of March on board the Monarque, a third rate ſhip of war, then at anchor in Portſmouth harbour.

Notwithſtanding the people were pleaſed with the promotion of Mr. Pitt and Mr. Legge, upon whoſe virtues and abilities they had the moſt perfect reliance, the old junto found them very unfit for their purpoſes. Theſe patriot miniſters could neither be perſuaded, cajoled, nor intimidated into meaſures, which they thought repugnant to the true intereſt of their country. They oppoſed, both in council and parliament, every thing which they deemed inconſiſtent with the honour of the crown, and prejudicial to the rights of the people. They nobly maintained, even in office, their independency and candour; and greatly evinced, that he is the beſt miniſter to the ſovereign, who acts with the greateſt probity to the ſubject. Thoſe who immediately ſurrounded the throne, were ſuppoſed to have concealed from, or miſrepreſented, the characters of theſe faithful ſervants, to their royal maſter; and to have declared, that with ſuch colleagues it would be impoſſible to conduct the machine of ſtate. Theſe ſuggeſtions, frequently repeated, produced the deſired effect; and on the ninth of April, Mr. Pitt, by his majeſty's command, reſigned the ſeals as ſecretary of ſtate, and Mr. Legge, the office of chancellor of the exchequer. The board of admiralty was changed, and ſeveral other removals made in different parts of the adminiſtration. Nothing could tend more to perpetuate the memory of theſe diſcarded patriots, than the honours conferred on them by the people in general. The whole nation ſeemed to riſe up as one man in vindication of their integrity; every tongue declared their praiſe; and a great number of reſpectable cities and corporations preſented them the freedom of their reſpective ſocieties, incloſed in golden boxes, as teſtimonies of their peculiar veneration. The people conceived the moſt violent antipathy againſt thoſe, who, by their inſidious repreſentations had baniſhed from the councils of their ſovereign, and the ſervice of their country, gentlemen, who were ſo well qualified to direct the one, and promote the other. A great number of addreſſes, dutifully and loyally expreſſed, ſolicited the king to reſtore Mr. Pitt and Mr. Legge to their former employments. Accordingly, his majeſty was pleaſed to re-deliver the ſeals to the former on the ninth of June, and in five days the latter was reſtored to his former office. Sir Robert Henley was made lord-keeper of the great-ſeal; and the cuſtody of the privy-ſeal was committed to the earl Temple. The duke of Newcaſtle, Mr. Legge, Mr. Nugent, lord Duncannon, and Mr. Grenville, were appointed commiſſioners of the exchequer; lord Anſon, the admirals Boſcawen and Forbes, Dr. Hay, Mr. Weſt, Mr. Hunter, and Mr. Elliot, were placed at the board of admiralty; the earl of Thomond was made treaſurer of his majeſty's houſhold; and Mr. Fox receiver and pay-maſter of his majeſty's land forces.

The king of Pruſſia, who had conquered the electorate of Saxony, found himſelf at this time oppoſed by the forces of the empreſs queen of Hungary, thoſe of the czarina, and the whole power of France. The latter had taken poſſeſſion of the duchy of Cleves, and the county of Mark, belonging to his Pruſſian majeſty, in the neighbourhood of the Low Countries. The rendezvous of the French army was appointed at Neuſs, in the electorate of Cologne, where, before the firſt of April, a large body was actually aſſembled under the prince de Soubize. To guard againſt the ſtorm with which Hanover now ſeemed threatened, orders were ſent to recruit the troops of that electorate; and to furniſh the magazines with all things neceſſary for fifty thouſand men. His royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland was appointed commander in chief of theſe forces, which were to be raiſed in Germany. Accordingly in the beginning of April he ſet out for Hanover, and arrived there on the ſixteenth of the ſame month. Before he joined the army it had been reinforced by three Pruſſian regiments, and now conſiſted of thirty-ſeven battalions and thirty-four ſquadrons. The duke, immediately on his arrival, removed the camp to a convenient ſpot of ground between Bielefeldt and Hervorden, and took poſſeſſion of the caſtle of Retberg, where he fixed his head-quarters. Having received advice on the thirteenth of June, that the enemy had cauſed a large body of troops to file off on his right to Burghotte, he cauſed the allied army to march that evening towards Hervorden. The next day he encamped at Coſeldt, and finding the intention of the enemy was either to oblige him to come to an engagement, or to repaſs the Weſer; he choſe the latter, and encamped in a very advantageous ſituation, having that river in front, and his right and left covered with eminences and marſhes. On the eleventh of July the French army alſo paſſed the Weſer; it not being in the power of the allies to prevent them; and having laid part of the electorate of Hanover under contribution, they poſted themſelves on the heights, oppoſite the duke of Cumberland's camp; who immediately changed his ſituation, and drew up his army on an eminence between the Weſer and the wood, having the river Hamelen on his right, and the wood on his left, and the village of Haſtenbeck in his front. A battery of twelve pounders and howitzers, was erected in the wood, and on the left of it, major-general Schulenbourg was poſted with the hunters, and two battalions of grenadiers. In the morning of the twenty-fifth of July, the French advanced in columns, and began a very ſevere cannonade, which continued the whole day, but nothing more was done. The allied army received orders to lay on their arms all night. His royal highneſs then cauſed the battery at the end of the wood to be repaired, and reinforced by four more battalions of grenadiers, under the command of major-general Hardenburgh. A battery was alſo erected behind the village of Haſtenbeck, and every precaution taken to give the enemy a warm reception.

Between five and ſix in the morning the French began a very ſmart cannonading upon the battery behind the village, which was defended by the Heſſian infantry and cavalry with great ſteadineſs and reſolution. About eight the firing of the ſmall arms began on the left of the allies, and the French ſeemed to gain ground; upon which his royal highneſs detached the colonels Darkenhauſen and Bradenbach, with three Hanoverian battalions and ſix ſquadrons, round the wood by Afforde, who towards the cloſe of the day drove ſeveral ſquadrons of the enemy back to their army. At length the grenadiers in the wood, apprehenſive of being ſurrounded by the enemy, thought it prudent to retire nearer the left of the allied army, by which unfortunate motion the French got poſſeſſion of that battery without oppoſition. The hereditary prince of Brunſwic immediately put himſelf at the head of a battalion of Wolfenbuttle guards, and another of Hanoverians, who, animated by the courage of their leader, with their bayonets fixed, repulſed a much ſuperior force of the enemy, and retook the battery. But the French being by this time in poſſeſſion of a height which commanded and flanked both the lines of the infantry and the battery of the allies, which attack they could ſupport under cover of a hill, and his royal highneſs finding he could not diſlodge them without expoſing his troops greatly, he ordered a retreat to Hamelen, which was effected without the leaſt moleſtation on the part of the enemy. The loſs of the allies in this engagement was five hundred and forty-ſeven killed and miſſing, and nine hundred and ſeven wounded; while that of the French, according to their own account, amounted to upwards of two thouſand men. His royal highneſs having left a ſmall detachment at Hamelen for its defence, continued his march, and encamped in the neighbourhood of Hoya, in order to cover Bremen and Verden, and to preſerve a communication with Stade, to which place the archives and moſt valuable effects of Hanover had been removed. The French ſoon reduced Hamelen, and during their ſtay there, M. d'Etrées received orders from his court to reſign his poſt of commander in chief of the French forces to the duke de Richlieu; who, on his arrival at the camp, detached the duke de Chevreuſe to take poſſeſſion of Hanover, with the title of governor of that city. Finding all oppoſition would be vain, the inhabitants ſubmitted to the enemy, and the Hanoverian garriſon, after being diſarmed, was left at liberty to go where they pleaſed. Richlieu himſelf, at the head of his army followed the duke of Cumberland ſtep by ſtep, as far as the Aller, where many ſkirmiſhes happened between the two armies. That of the duke, however, though in a ſtrong ſituation, was by far too weak to think of holding out againſt the numerous forces of the French, which in a manner ſurrounded the allies; and had made themſelves maſters of a little fort at the mouth of the river Zwinga, whereby they cut off the duke's communication with the Elbe. In this diſagreeable ſituation his royal highneſs was in a manner compelled to come to ſome ſort of terms with the enemy; and the king of Denmark having offered his mediation, it was accepted by the commanders in chief of both armies, and on the eighth of September, the duke of Cumberland ſigned the convention of Cloſter Seven, by which thirty-eight thouſand Hanoverians laid down their arms, and were diſperſed into different quarters of cantonment. His royal highneſs having thought proper to reſign the command of the electoral army, it was conferred on prince Ferdinand of Brunſwic, who, about the latter end of November, put the troops in motion. On the fourth of December, they overtook a body of two thouſand men, which formed the enemy's rear; theſe they attacked and totally routed. On the fourteenth of the ſame month, another action happened upon the Aller, between a body of ſeven or eight thouſand Hanoverians, under general Raſtrow, and one of about ten thouſand French, in which the former remained maſters of the field. Theſe advantages animated the Hanoverians, and ſtruck ſuch a panic into the enemy, that they were almoſt incapable of reſiſtance, ſo that the former recovered poſſeſſion of Lunenburgh, Zell, and all that part of the Brunſwic dominions next to Pruſſia. The enemy, however, had committed the moſt terrible outrages in every place; the ſuburbs of Zell were reduced to aſhes, and, by the orders of Richlieu, the orphan-houſe was ſet on fire, and many of the poor innocents periſhed in the flames. Prince Ferdinand now marched to Ultzan and Lunenburgh, where his army was put into winter quarters, as the ſeverity of the weather prevented him from purſuing his advantage.

When the new miniſtry had been ſettled, a deſcent upon the coaſt of France was reſolved on, in order to deſtroy the enemy's ſhipping, which were to carry ſuccours to America, and draw part of the French forces from Germany, to the defence of their own coaſt. A powerful fleet was accordingly fitted out with great expedition, and ten regiments were marched to the Iſle of Wight. The naval armament, conſiſting of ſixteen ſhips of the line, beſides frigates, fire-ſhips, bomb-ketches, and tranſports, were put under the command of Sir Edward Hawke. Sir John Mordaunt was placed at the head of the land-forces, and both ſtrictly enjoined to act with the utmoſt unanimity. On the eighth of September, this powerful fleet ſailed from Spithead; and on the twentieth of the ſame month made the iſle of Oleron, from whence they proceeded to Baſque-road. On the twenty-third, the van of the fleet, led by captain Howe in the Magnanime, ſtood towards the Iſle of Aix, ſituated in the mouth of the river Charente, leading up to Rochfort. The fortifications of this iſland were but half finiſhed, being mounted with only thirty cannon and mortars, and the garriſon conſiſted of ſix hundred men. After an engagement which laſted about an hour, the fort ſurrendered, and ſome forces were landed to take poſſeſſion of the iſland and demoliſh the fortifications. This conqueſt, though inconſiderable in itſelf, greatly elated the forces, as it promiſed them future ſucceſs, but inſtead of improving this advantage, the commanders ſpent ſeveral days in councils of war, and ſounding the coaſt, which having alarmed the enemy, they took ſuch precautions, as rendered every other attempt of our fleet abortive; upon which it was reſolved to return to England. Thus finiſhed an expedition which had coſt the nation near a million of money, thrown the inhabitants of the French coaſt into the utmoſt confuſion, and attracted the notice of all Europe. Sir John Mordaunt was tried by a court-martial, and diſmiſſed from his majeſty's ſervice, for non-performance of his orders.

This year the affairs of America wore but a gloomy aſpect. The enemy remained maſters of all the lakes, which gave them an opportunity of gaining moſt of the Indians over to their ſide. By the loſs of Oſwego, the whole country of the five nations was abandoned to the mercy of the French; and by the imprudent demolition of the forts we poſſeſſed at the Great Carrying-place, a free paſſage was opened to our ſettlements on the German flats and along the Mohawk's river, which, before the end of the campaign, the enemy deſtroyed with fire and ſword. The ſcheme for an attempt on Crown Point, and alſo an expedition to Louiſburgh, were now laid aſide.

Lord Loudon's departure gave the French general an opportunity of improving the ſucceſſes of the former campaign. He reduced Fort William Henry, the garriſon of which, notwithſtanding the articles of capitulation, were cruelly uſed by the ſavages, and many of them murdered in a moſt ſhocking manner. The enemy demoliſhed the fort, carried off the effects, proviſions and artillery, together with the veſſels on the lake, and then returned to Montreal, no further attempts on the frontiers of the Britiſh colonies being made.

At this time admiral Holbourn being freed from the care of tranſports, ſailed for Louiſburgh, with fifteen ſhips of the line, four frigates and a fire-ſhip. Auguſt the twentieth they appeared before that harbour, and perceived the French admiral make the ſignal to unmoor; upon which Mr. Holbourn, who was greatly inferior in ſtrength to the enemy, not chuſing to hazard an engagement, returned to Halifax. But having been reinforced with four ſhips of the line, he, in the middle of September, again proceeded to Louiſburgh, with intention, if poſſible, to draw the enemy to an engagement. La Mothe was, however, too prudent to hazard a battle, the loſs of which muſt have expoſed all the French colonies to the attempts of the Engliſh. Here the Britiſh ſquadron continued cruiſing till the twenty-fifth, when they were overtaken by a terrible ſtorm. When the hurricane began the fleet was about forty leagues diſtant from Louiſburgh, but, in twelve hours, were driven within two miles of the rocks and breakers on the coaſt of that iſland: juſt at that inſtant the wind providentially ſhifted, and ſaved the whole ſquadron, except the Tilbury, which was loſt upon the rocks, and about half her crew periſhed. Eleven ſhips were diſmaſted, others threw their guns overboard, and the whole returned to England very much out of repair.

Affairs in the East Indies were however very favourable: there the bravery of admiral Watſon and colonel Clive re-eſtabliſhed the military honour of the Engliſh. That admiral ſailed from Madras with no more than three ſhips of the line; and arrived at the port of Balaſore in the kingdom of Bengal, where ſtrengthening himſelf with all the troops he could draw together, he entered the Ganges; and after a ſhort reſiſtance, made himſelf maſter of the fort of Buſbudgia, which opened a paſſage to the foot of Calcutta, the late principal ſettlement of the company in Bengal, and the ſcene of the deplorable ſufferings of ſo many of our unfortunate countrymen. Animated with revenge at the ſight of this place, our ſhips and land forces attacked it with ſuch ſpirit, that the Indians ſurrendered it before night; and a few days after, Hughly, ſituated higher up the Ganges, was reduced with as little difficulty. The nabob finding the feeble reſiſtance made by forts defended by Indians, advanced with an army of ten thouſand horſe and twelve thouſand foot. Infinitely inferior as our troops were in number, Clive did not heſitate to attack the nabob's army; and though he did not entirely rout them, yet the ſlaughter he made among them was ſo great, and he had ſo much the advantage in the field, that the nabob was glad to agree to a peace, by which the Engliſh Eaſt India company was reſtored to all its ancient privileges: an immunity was granted them from all taxes, and reſtitution promiſed for all that they had ſuffered by the taking of Calcutta. The admiral and colonel having ſettled the company's officers in the poſſeſſion of their eſtabliſhments, turned their army againſt the French. They reſolved to attack Chandenagore, a place of conſiderable ſtrength, ſituated at a diſtance from Calcutta, higher up the river, and the principal ſettlement of the French in that part of India. In this expedition, colonel Clive commanded ſeven hundred Europeans, and ſixteen hundred black ſoldiers, while Watſon and Pocock commanded a ſquadron of ſhips which conſiſted only of the Kent, the Tyger, and Saliſbury. The French prepared to receive them, by ſinking ſeveral large veſſels both above and below the fort; but the admirals, by carefully ſounding, found a ſafe paſſage, and made ſo ſevere a fire upon the fort, in which they were ſeconded by colonel Clive's batteries on ſhore, that the place capitulated in leſs than three hours. Here five hundred Europeans and ſeven hundred blacks, ſurrendered themſelves priſoners of war; one hundred and eighty-three pieces of cannon were found in the place, beſides a conſiderable value in money and commodities.

From the time of his ſigning the above treaty, the nabob ſhewed but little inclination to adhere to the ſtipulations made; and though he was not ſparing in his promiſes, he always deferred the performance upon ſuch frivolous pretences, as evidently ſhewed his ill deſigns. The Engliſh commanders reſolved to take no notice of his proceedings, till they had broken the power of the French in this province; and having accompliſhed it, by the taking of Chandenagore, they deliberated whether they ought not to commit hoſtilities againſt him; and an incident happening, which promiſed to enſure their ſucceſs, they reſolved to attempt it. The nabob, Surajah Doula, who had the laſt year taken Calcutta, had treated his own ſubjects with the ſame perfidy which he had formerly ſhewn, and ſtill continued to diſtreſs the Engliſh; hence moſt of his generals were diſcontented, and ſome of them entered into a conſpiracy againſt him. At the head of this conſpiracy was Jaffier Ali Cawn, one of his principal officers, a man of great power and influence. Their deſigns were no ſooner ripened, than they communicated them to the Engliſh government at Calcutta, deſiring their aſſiſtance. The gentlemen there did not long heſitate with what party they ſhould ſide; they concluded a treaty with Jaffier

Ali Cawn, and the other conſpirators; in conſequence of which the Engliſh troops immediately took the field under colonel Clive. The admiral undertook to garriſon the fort of Chandenagore with his ſeamen; and a detachment of fifty men with their officers, were added to the land forces, to ſerve as gunners; while a twenty gun ſhip was ſtationed above Hughly, in order to preſerve a communication between colonel Clive and the admiral. Theſe preliminary meaſures being taken, they advanced up the river, and in a few days brought the nabob's army, of about twenty thouſand men, excluſive of thoſe who favoured the conſpirators, to an action which was deciſive in favour of the Engliſh; when the nabob ſeeing himſelf ruined by the treachery of his officers, and the cowardice of his troops, fled with the few who remained faithful. Jaffier Ali Cawn now declared himſelf openly; and entering Muxadavad, the capital of the province, with an army of his friends and victorious allies, was placed by colonel Clive on the ancient ſeat of the nabobs, and received the homage of all ranks of people as Suba of Bengal, Bahar, and Orixa. Soon after, the depoſed nabob was made priſoner, and put to death in his priſon by him who now ſat on his throne. Thus this great revolution was accompliſhed within about thirteen days, and the government of a vaſt kingdom was transferred to an uſurper; a kingdom which yielded in its dimenſions to few in Europe, and to none in the fertility of its ſoil, the number of its inhabitants, and the richneſs of its commerce. By this revolution the territories of the Engliſh Eaſt India company were enlarged, and upwards of two millions ſterling were to be paid them as an indemnification to the ſufferers, by the taking of Calcutta. The new elevated nabob gave alſo about ſix hundred thouſand pounds, ſterling, as a gratuity to the ſeamen and troops. However, the joy of the Engliſh was not a little damped by the death of admiral Watſon, who loſt his life by the unwholſomeneſs of the climate, on the 16th of Auguſt.

On the firſt of December the parliament met at Weſtminſter. Addreſſes of thanks having been preſented by both houſes, the commons proceeded to ſettle the ſupply; the whole of which amounted to ten millions four hundred eighty-ſix thouſand four hundred and fifty-ſeven pounds. The buſineſs of this ſeſſion was not finiſhed till the firſt of June, in the following year, when, his majeſty being indiſpoſed, the lords commiſſioners put an end thereto.

A. D. 1758. About the month of February, admiral Boſcawen ſailed with a fleet for St. Helens, deſtined to act againſt the enemy in North America. Sir Edward Hawke alſo directed his courſe, with another ſquadron, to the Bay of Biſcay, in order to intercept any ſupplies from France, deſigned for Cape Breton or Canada. On the twenty-eighth of March, admiral Oſborne, cruizing off Carthagena on the coaſt of Spain, fell in with a ſquadron of the enemy, commanded by the marquis du Queſne, conſiſting of the four following ſhips: the Foudroyant of eighty guns; the Orphée of ſixty-four; the Oriflamme of fifty; and the Pleiade a frigate of twenty-four, in their paſſage from Toulon to reinforce M. de la Clue, who had for ſome time been blocked up by admiral Oſborne in the harbour of Carthagena. The enemy no ſooner perceived the Britiſh ſquadron than they diſperſed, and ſteered different courſes, upon which the Engliſh admiral detached ſeveral ſhips in purſuit of each, while he himſelf, with the principal part of his fleet, ſtood into the bay of Carthagena, to watch the motions of the French ſquadron in that port. Captain Storr, in the Revenge, came up with the Orphée, about ſeven in the evening, and took her: The Monmouth, captain Gardiner, engaged the Foudroyant, and obliged her to ſtrike. The Oriflamme was driven on ſhore under the caſtle of Aiglais, and the Pleiade frigate made her eſcape. Sir Edward Hawke, in the beginning of April, diſcovered a French fleet at anchor off the iſle of Aix, conſiſting of five ſhips of the line, ſix frigates, and forty tranſports, having on board three thouſand troops, and a large quantity of ſtores and proviſions, for their ſettlements in North America. As ſoon as they ſaw the Engliſh admiral advancing, they ſlipped their cables, and fled with the utmoſt precipitation. Some of them eſcaped, but the far greater number ran into ſhallow water, where they could not be purſued, and by throwing their guns, ſtores, and ballaſt overboard, got into the river Charente; but their loading was loſt and the end of their equipment totally defeated. Another convoy of merchant ſhips, under the protection of three frigates, had, a few days before, been chaſed by Sir Edward Hawke into the harbour of St. Martin's on the Iſle of Rhé; and a third conſiſting of twelve ſail, under convoy of a frigate and armed veſſel, was encountered at ſea by one Britiſh ſhip of the line, and two fire ſhips, which took the frigate and armed veſſel; and two of the convoy afterwards met with the ſame fate. A terrible accident befel the Prince George of eighty-guns, commanded by rear-admiral Broderick, in his paſſage to the Mediterranean. On the thirtieth day of April, between one and two in the afternoon, a dreadful fire broke out in the fore part of the ſhip, and raged with ſuch violence, that notwithſtanding all the efforts of the officers and men for ſeveral hours, the flames increaſed; and the ſhip being conſumed to the water-edge, ſunk about ſix o'clock in the evening. When all endeavours proved ineffectual, and no hopes of preſerving the ſhip remained, the barge was hoiſted out for the preſervation of the admiral, who accordingly entered it; but all diſtinction being now forgot, the ſailors ruſhed into it in ſuch crowds, that in a few moments it overſet. The admiral, who foreſaw what muſt be the conſequence, had ſtripped off his cloathes, and committed himſelf to the mercy of the waves. In this ſituation he remained a full hour, when he was taken up by a boat belonging to a merchant ſhip: beſides the admiral, the captain, four lieutenants, the purſer, the chaplain, the maſter, two lieutenants of marines, the boatſwain, three paſſengers, fourteen petty officers, and about three hundred men were ſaved, while the reſt, amounting to five hundred, were loſt.

A renewal of the ſchemes for a deſcent on the coaſt of France now took place. Two powerful ſquadrons, the one conſiſting of eleven large ſhips, commanded by lord Anſon and Sir Edward Hawke, and the other compoſed of four ſhips of the line, two fire-ſhips, two bombs, twenty tenders, ten ſtore-ſhips, and one hundred tranſports, was put under the direction of commodore Howe. On board the latter was embarked a body of troops, conſiſting of ſixteen regiments, nine troops of light horſe, and ſix thouſand marines, under the command of the duke of Marlborough. The two fleets ſailed, in the beginning of June, from St. Helens for the coaſt of Bretagne. The ſquadron commanded by lord Anſon ſtanding to the weſtward, and the other ſteering right athwart the channel. On the fourth about five in the afternoon, being entirely becalmed, they came to an anchor within three miles of St. Malo; the next morning they weighed before it was day, and ſtood along the coaſt till they opened the bay of Cancalle, where they intended to diſembark the forces. About eight in the morning the commodore made a ſignal for the ſhips with the grenadiers on board to make ſail, and about four in the afternoon the whole fleet came to an anchor; four frigates excepted, which were ordered to continue their courſe towards a battery that might impede the landing of the forces. Ten companies of grenadiers, under the command of general Moſtyn, were immediately put into flat-bottomed boats, and as ſoon as the frigates had ſilenced the battery, they landed without any oppoſition. Lord Down, at the head of twenty men, was ordered to march through a very narrow paſs up to the village, where they were met by the marquis de Landal, intendant of the coaſt, and one of his ſervants. Lord Down inſtantly called to him, and aſſured him, that if he would ſurrender he had nothing to fear; but this he fooliſhly refuſed to do, upon which he, together with his ſervant and horſes, were ſhot dead on the ſpot.

After taking poſſeſſion of the village of Cancalle, the grenadiers lay on their arms all night. The next day the diſembarkation was entirely completed, and the whole encamped: the head quarters being fixed at Cancalle. The day following, as ſoon as it was light, the whole army except the third brigade, ſtruck their tents, and began to march in two columns. The firſt, conſiſting of the brigade of the guards, two battalions of grenadiers, and the firſt brigade, commanded by lord George Sackville, marched from the left, till they fell into the great road leading to St. Malo. The ſecond column conſiſting of the ſecond and fourth brigades, commanded by the earl of Ancram, marched alſo from the left through a country wholly encloſed, and the road ſo remarkably narrow, that two hundred pioneers, who marched at the head of the diviſion, were frequently obliged to continue their route in ſingle files. At the ſame time the fields on each ſide the road ſo intercepted their view, that they often could not ſee more than forty yards beyond their flanks. The inhabitants of the villages had deſerted their houſes, and ſtripped them of every thing they could remove, ſo that the country appeared a mere deſart to the ſoldiers. This march was conducted with great order and without beat of drum: but though the diſtance was no more than ſix miles, they did not reach their ground till it was late in the evening. St. Malo was now reconnoitred by the general officers, and a camp marked out about a mile from the city. Parties of horſe were immediately detached to different parts of the country, to ſcour the road, and make good diſcoveries. One of theſe detachments perceived a large baſon behind the town, into which all the ſhipping belonging to the place were collected, and concealed from the ſight of the Engliſh fleet by a prodigious ſtorehouſe, built in the form of a rotunda, near the rope-walk. Marlborough, on being informed of this diſcovery, detached all the cavalry, with a foot ſoldier mounted behind each of the horſemen, furniſhed with hand-grenades, matches, &c. Theſe, concealed by the night, paſſed under the enemy's cannon on the walls to the harbour, where they found a large fleet, conſiſting of men of war, privateers, and merchantmen. Fire was immediately ſet to the neareſt ſhips, and alſo the magazines of pitch, tar, ropes, &c. all which, in the ſpace of a few hours, became ſuch a dreadful ſcene of conflagration, that even imagination itſelf is unable to paint. The ſhips were all faſt aground, and ſo cloſe together that it was impoſſible for any of them to eſcape. Two men of war, one of fifty, the other of thirty guns, thirty-three privateers, from thirty to eighteen guns each, and above ſeventy ſail of merchant ſhips were by this conflagration reduced to aſhes, together with an amazing quantity of naval ſtores. The conflagration continued during the whole night; and the next morning foraging parties were detached from the camp, the army having landed with only two days proviſions. While encamped near St. Malo, one of the battalions of the guards marched under the command of general Cæſar, to the town of Doll, ſituated about twelve miles up the country, where they were politely entertained by the magiſtrates; and as their deſign was nothing more than to reconnoitre the country, they continued one night in the town without committing the leaſt act of hoſtility, and in the morning returned to their camp. A party of the light horſe advancing ſtill farther, fell in with the vedets of a French camp, two of whom, after a long chaſe, they took, and brought them priſoners to the Engliſh army. By this time it was evident that the town of St. Malo was too well fortified to hope for ſucceſs, all thoughts of attacking it were therefore laid aſide; and the general having received repeated advices, that the French were buſily employed in aſſembling forces to attack his camp, he returned to Cancalle, where commodore Howe had made ſuch a maſterly diſpoſition of the boats and tranſports, that the reembarkation of the troops was performed with ſurprizing eaſe and expedition. The ſoldiers, while they continued in the enemy's country, were reſtrained from committing the leaſt outrage, by the ſevereſt diſcipline; and all the houſes which the inhabitants had abandoned were left untouched. When the troops were all embarked the fleet left Cancalle bay, and after encountering the fury of a tempeſtuous ſea for near a fortnight, came to an anchor near Cherburgh; and on the firſt of July, arrived in the road of St. Helens; the ſoldiers were landed on the Iſle of Wight, and a conſiderable part of them ſent, under the command of the duke of Marlborough and lord George Sackville, to reinforce the allied army in Germany. The fleet ſailed from St. Helens on the firſt of Auguſt; and after a tedious paſſage, anchored before Cherburgh. The enemy had for ſome time expected the Engliſh would ſoon attack this place: nor had they been idle during the interval. They had thrown up an intrenchment, extending near four miles along the coaſt from the fort de Ecourdeville, ſituated about two miles to the weſt of Cherburgh, and fortified it with ſeveral batteries at proper diſtances. Behind this intrenchment, a body of horſe and infantry appeared, dreſſed in red and blue uniform. But as they did not advance to the open beach, the landing of the Engliſh forces was attended with little danger. A bomb ketch was ſent to anchor near the town, and throw a few ſhells into the place, as a feint to amuſe the enemy, with regard to the ſpot, where they intended to land, which was near a league to the weſtward of Querqueville, the weſtermoſt fort in the bay. The other bomb ketches being poſted along the ſhore, conſiderably galled the intrenchment by not only throwing ſhells, in the uſual manner, but alſo by loading the mortars with great quantities of balls, which were thrown to a very conſiderable diſtance, and, by ſcattering as they flew, did an infinite deal of miſchief. While theſe veſſels kept up an inceſſant fire on the trenches, the grenadiers and guards were landed without oppoſition, and formed immediately on the beach, having a natural breaſtwork in their front. The enemy advanced upon them in good order from the left, where the ground was interſected with hedges. On perceiving the approach of the enemy, the Britiſh troops marched towards them, and a ſtraggling fire began; but the French declined the engagement, and took poſſeſſion of a hill, whence they diſcharged a few random ſhot on the Engliſh advanced poſts, and took advantage of the night to retire. General Blythe, who now commanded the Britiſh forces, encamped at the village of Erville, and the next morning marched towards Cherburgh. An advanced party took poſſeſſion of Querqueville, which the enemy had abandoned, together with the lines and batteries along the ſhore. When the Engliſh reached Cherburgh, they found the place entirely deſerted by the enemy, the gates were open, and they entered it without the leaſt oppoſition, while the inhabitants received them with great civility. The famous baſon, harbour, and ſluice of Cherburg being deſtroyed, on the ſixteenth of Auguſt the forces marched down to the beach, and were re-embarked at Fort Galet, without the leaſt diſturbance from the enemy. The next day the fleet ſet ſail for the coaſt of England, and anchored in the road of Weymouth, under the high land of Portland. Two days after it again weighed and ſtood to the ſouthward, but was obliged by contrary winds to return to the ſame ſtation. The ſecond effort, however, was more effectual; and ſteering to the French coaſt, they arrived in the bay of St. Lunaire, two leagues to the weſtward of St. Malo, upon which place it was determined to make another attempt. The ſloops and ketches being poſted along ſhore to cover the landing, the troops were diſembarked on an open beach, and a ſmall party detached to the harbour of St. Briac, above the town of St. Malo, where they deſtroyed about fifteen ſmall veſſels: but St. Malo itſelf being carefully reconnoitered, appeared to be impregnable either by the land forces or ſhipping, which obliged the deſign againſt it to be laid aſide. The general unwilling to re-embark without attempting ſome ſtep for the farther annoyance of the enemy, reſolved to penetrate into the country, regulating his motions, however, by thoſe of the fleet, which, by this time, had quitted the bay of St. Lunaire, where it could not ride in ſafety, and anchored in the bay of St. Cas, about three leagues to the weſtward. On the eighth of September the army began its march to St. Guildo, which they reached in the evening, and the next day continuing their rout, they encamped in the open ground, about three miles from the bay of St. Cas, which was immediately reconnoitred for re-embarkation, the general having received certain intelligence that the duke d'Aiguillon had advanced from Breſt to Lambale, within ſix miles of the Engliſh camp, at the head of twelve regular battalions, ſix ſquadrons, two regiments of militia, eight mortars and ten pieces of cannon. Had our troops decamped in the night in ſilence, they might poſſibly have reached the beach before the enemy had received the leaſt notice of their deſign: but inſtead of this cautious method of proceeding, on the eleventh, at two in the morning, the generale was beat, and the army began to march in one column, conſiſting of ſix thouſand, five hundred men, ſo diſpoſed, as to be capable of forming before an attack could be made. In the mean time, the Brilliant, Roſe, Active, Pallas, and Tartar frigates, ſtood into the bay of St. Cas, to cover the re-embarkation of the troops, who were drawn up near a wind-mill, on a hill, about three quarters of a mile from the beach. At nine in the morning the army began to march down to the boats, which lay ready to receive them. By eleven, two thirds of the army with the light horſe and artillery, being on board, a body of the enemy's horſe appeared on the hill, and a little afterwards a much larger one of infantry, occupying the ground round the wind-mill. Upon a motion made by the French to deſcend, the bomb-ketches began to play upon them with great ſucceſs. The firſt ſhell fell upon a body of horſe, which rendered them ſo ungovernable, that the men were obliged to diſmount. Several alſo fell among the enemy's infantry. At half after eleven, the French opened a battery of ſix pieces of cannon, near the wind mill, from which they maintained a cloſe fire on the troops while embarking. At twelve the enemy opened a battery of cohorns, behind the hedge, on the right of the mill; but the ſhips and ketches kept ſo inceſſant a fire upon it, that they threw only two ſhells among the troops, which did ſome damage. They then filed off a ſecond time to the left, and got poſſeſſion of the village of St. Cas; upon which the grenadiers of the whole army, amounting to eleven hundred men, with four companies of guards, under general Drury, drew up on the beach to cover the battalions while embarking. In the mean time, the enemy, to avoid the fire of the ſhips, left the village, and endeavoured to get poſſeſſion of a hollow way, which entirely covered them. This they accompliſhed, but when they began to deſcend, the grenadiers formed into two diviſions, and marched to the attack. The bay of St. Cas was covered by an intrenchment, which the enemy had thrown up to prevent or oppoſe the diſembarkation; and on the outſide of this work there was a range of ſand hills, extending along the ſhore, which would have ſerved as a cover to the enemy, from whence they might have annoyed the troops in re-embarking; a propoſal was therefore made to the general, that the forces ſhould be taken on board from an open beach on the left, between St. Cas and Guildo; but this was rejected. The intrenchment would have been of great uſe to the grenadiers, had not general Drury, by ſome miſtake, inſtead of waiting behind the dyke for the enemy, marched the diviſion over it, and attacked the enemy, who were ready prepared on the other ſide. Indeed he twice repelled them; but the continual ſuccours pouring down from the hollow way, brought them back to the charge; and then they repelled general Drury in his turn. He was now convinced of his error; for the ſecond diviſion could not get over the breaſt-work time enough to ſuccour the firſt, which was entirely broken, and with great difficulty got back. The enemy having now got poſſeſſion of the dyke, kept a continual fire upon the grenadiers, and the general ſeeing that a retreat was the only remedy, ordered the whole body immediately to wheel to the right, and make to the boats as faſt as poſſible. Some embarked, but a battery which the French had erected on the middle of the hill, played ſo furiouſly, that many of the boats were beat to pieces. The enemy ſeeing no retreat left to the grenadiers, mounted the dyke, and by a great ſuperiority of numbers, drove thoſe that remained into the ſea, where the greateſt part of them were cut to pieces or drowned. During the laſt attack, the fire from the ſhips was rendered ineffectual, becauſe the Engliſh would have ſuffered equally with the French. General Drury was ſhot in the breaſt, but by the help of a grenadier, he ſtripped off his cloaths, and plunged into the water, where he periſhed. Sir John Armitage, a volunteer, was killed on a rock to which he had ſwam. The whole loſs amounted to 1000 men, including the ſlain, and thoſe taken priſoners.

It was for ſome time determined by miniſtry, to attack the French ſettlements on the coaſt of Africa, and the deſign this year was carried into execution. The plan was concerted by Mr. Cumming, a quaker, a man of acute penetration, and happy invention. This perſon, who as a private merchant, had made a voyage to this part of the coaſt of Africa, obſerved the extenſive trade carried on by the French, and even contracted a perſonal acquaintance with Amir, the Mooriſh king of Legibelli; in whoſe dominions the moſt important branches of trade are carried on. The French, beſides other articles of commerce, were in poſſeſſion of the whole trade of gum-ſenega, a great quantity of which is uſed in the manufactures of Great Britain, and which could only be procured at an exorbitant price from the Dutch, who had taken care to purchaſe the whole from the French. A ſmall ſquadron was now equipped for this expedition, under the command of captain Marſh, having on board a body of marines, commanded by major Maſon, with a detachment of artillery, ten pieces of cannon, eight mortars, and a conſiderable quantity of warlike ſtores and ammunition. Captain Walker was appointed engineer, and Mr. Cumming was concerned as principal director and promoter of the expedition. In the beginning of March this little armament ſailed, and in their paſſage touched at the iſland of Teneriffe; and, while the ſhips were taking in their wine and water, Mr. Cumming proceeded in the Swan Sloop to Portenderrick, charged with a letter of credence to his old friend the king of that country. But on his arrival he had the mortification to find this prince engaged in a new war with a neighbouring nation, and at that time headed his army at a very conſiderable diſtance from his capital. One of the chiefs, however, diſpatched a meſſenger to the king, with advice of Mr. Cumming's arrival and deſign; declaring at the ſame time, that he would uſe the utmoſt expedition in aſſembling three hundred warriors to join the Engliſh troops, adding, that he was perſuaded the king would ſend a detachment from his army to reinforce them. Captain Marſh, with the reſt of the armament, had by this time arrived at Portenderrick, and without waiting for the Indian forces, which were not yet ready, they ſailed again on the twenty-ſecond of April, and the next day, at four in the afternoon, diſcovered the French flag flying upon fort Louis. Captain Marſh having taken a large Dutch ſhip richly laden with gums, which lay without the bar, came to an anchor in Senegal road, at the mouth of the river; where he perceived the enemy had poſted ſeveral armed ſloops to defend the paſſage of the bar, which is extremely dangerous. The captain, however, immediately prepared for landing. All the boats of the fleet were employed to carry the ſtores into the ſmall craft, notwithſtanding the enemy's veſſels kept firing on them. As ſoon as every thing was ready, and the channel diſcovered, the ſhips weighed anchor; and at that inſtant the wind, which generally blows down the river, veering about, captain Miller, in the London buſs ſeized the opportunity, and paſſing the bar with a full ſail, caſt anchor on the inſide, where he lay all night expoſed to the whole fire of the enemy. Next morning he was joined by the other ſmall veſſels, upon which a regular engagement enſued, and was warmly ſupported on both ſides. At laſt the buſſes and one of the ſmall veſſels running a-ground immediately bulged, and were filled with water. This misfortune obliged the troops they contained to take to their boats, and with great difficulty they reached the ſhore, where they formed in a body, and were ſoon after joined by their companions from the other veſſels; ſo that the whole now amounted to three hundred and ninety marines, beſides the detachment of artillery. Expecting to be attacked by the natives who lined the ſhores at ſome diſtance, as if reſolved to oppoſe the deſcent, they threw up an intrenchment, and began to diſembark the ſtores, great part of which lay under water. While they were thus employed the negroes came down in great numbers, and ſubmitted to them: and on the following day they were reinforced by three hundred and fifty ſeamen, who paſſed the bar in ſloops with their enſigns and colours flying. They intended to make an immediate attack on Fort Louis, but this deſign was prevented by the arrival of two French deputies at the intrenchment, with propoſals from the governor for a capitulation. The Engliſh forces began their march for Fort Louis, accompanied by a number of long boats, in which the artillery and ſtores had been embarked. On ſeeing them advance, the French immediately ſtruck their flag, and major Maſon took poſſeſſion of the caſtle, where he found ninety-two pieces of cannon, with a very conſiderable quantity of treaſure and merchandize. The corporation and burghers of the town of Senegal readily ſubmitted and ſwore allegiance to the king of Great Britain: the neighbouring princes, attended by numerous retinues, viſited the commander, and concluded treaties with the Engliſh nation; and the king of Portenderrick, or Legibelli, ſent an ambaſſador from his camp to major Maſon, with compliments of congratulation and aſſurances of amity.

As the miniſtry were ſenſible that the Engliſh ſettlements on the coaſt of Africa could never be ſecure while the French kept poſſeſſion of Goree, they fitted out a ſquadron, the command of which was given to commodore Keppel, conſiſting of four ſhips of the line, ſeveral frigates, two bomb ketches, and ſome tranſports, having on board ſeven hundred regular troops, commanded by colonel Worge. On the eleventh of November this armament ſailed from Cork in Ireland, and, after a dangerous paſſage, they arrived at Goree the latter end of December; when the commodore immediately made a diſpoſition for attacking the iſland. A ſhell being fired from one of the bomb-ketches, which was the ſignal for the engagement to begin, the great ſhips poured in their broadſides without intermiſſion, and their fire was returned with equal vivacity from all the batteries of the iſland. At length the cannonading from the ſhips became ſo ſevere and terrible, that the French ſoldiers fled from their quarters, in ſpite of all the efforts of the governor, who endeavoured to keep them to their duty; which obliged him to ſtrike his colours, and ſurrender at diſcretion; upon which the commodore ſent a detachment of marines on ſhore, who diſarmed the garriſon, and hoiſted the Britiſh flag upon the caſtle of St. Michael. Two trading veſſels which happened to be at anchor in the road, likewiſe fell into the hands of the Engliſh, with ſtores, money, and merchandize, to the value of twenty thouſand pounds. This important conqueſt coſt the victors only one hundred men killed and wounded. Commodore Keppel returned home with his ſquadron, having left a garriſon at Goree, and reinforced that of Senegal.

In the mean time, events of much greater conſequence happened in America; where, excluſive of the fleet and marines, the government had aſſembled about fifty thouſand men, including twenty-two thouſand regular troops. Lord Loudon having returned to England, the chief command devolved on major-general Abercrombie: but as the objects of operation were various, the forces were divided into three ſeparate bodies, under three diſtinct commanders. Twelve thouſand were deſtined for an attempt on Cape Breton, under the command of major-general Amherſt. The general himſelf reſerved near ſixteen thouſand for the reduction of Crown Point; and eight thouſand, under brigadier-general Forbes, were allotted for the conqueſt of Fort du Queſne. On the twenty-eighth of May, major-general Amherſt embarked his troops at Halifax in Nova Scotia, and ſailed for Louiſburgh with the Engliſh ſquadron, commanded by admiral Boſcawen, the whole fleet conſiſting of one hundred and fifty-ſeven ſail. On the ſecond of June they came to an anchor in Gabarus bay, about ſeven miles to the weſtward of Louiſburgh. Our troops amidſt innumerable difficulties made good their landing; after which the ſiege was carried on with ſuch vigour and reſolution, that the French governor finding it impoſſible to withſtand the fury of the aſſault, thought proper to capitulate on the twenty-ſeventh of July, by which he, and the garriſon, became priſoners of war. Major Farquhar, with three companies of grenadiers, immediately took poſſeſſion of the weſtern gate; and brigadier Whitmore was ſent into the town, to ſee the garriſon lay down their arms, and to poſt the neceſſary guards on the ramparts, and at the doors of the magazines. In this town the victors found two hundred and twenty-one pieces of cannon, and eighteen mortars, together with a very large quantity of ſtores and ammunition. The merchants and inhabitants were ſent to France in Engliſh ſhips:

but the garriſon, ſea-officers, marines, and mariners, amounting in all to five thouſand ſix hundred and thirty-ſeven priſoners, were tranſported to England. This important conqueſt was obtained with the loſs of four hundred men only, the wounded included. The enemy's ſhips, which were in the harbour at the time our troops arrived there, were all either burnt or taken, two frigates excepted, which on the day of the diſembarkation ſailed from thence undiſcovered. All things being properly ſettled at Cape Breton, ſeveral ſhips were detached, with a body of troops under the command of lieutenant-colonel lord Rollo, to take poſſeſſion of the iſland of St. John, a ſmall but fertile place in the gulph of St. Lawrence. The inhabitants, amounting to four thouſand one hundred, made no oppoſition, but readily delivered up their arms. Lord Rollo then repaired to the governor's quarters, where he found ſeveral ſcalps of Engliſhmen, whom the ſavages had butchered, in conſequence of the encouragement which their French patrons and allies had given them for ſuch inhuman proceedings.

About the beginning of July, the forces under the immediate command of general Abercrombie, conſiſting of about ſeven thouſand regular troops, and ten thouſand provincials, embarked at the mouth of Lake George, on board batteaux and whale boats, with proviſion, artillery and ammunition; ſeveral pieces of artillery being mounted on rafts to cover the propoſed landing, which was effected the next day without oppoſition. The general's ſcheme was to inveſt Ticonderoga, a fort ſituated on a point of land between Lake George and a narrow gut communicating with Lake Champlin. Three ſides of this fortification were ſurrounded with water, and nature had ſecured the front by a moraſs. The troops being landed, were immediately formed into three columns, and began their march towards the advanced guard of the enemy, conſiſting of one battalion, encamped behind a breaſt-work of logs, which on the approach of the Engliſh, they abandoned with great precipitation. The rout from this breaſt-work to the fort lay through a thick wood, which would admit of no regular paſſage: and the guides proving extremely ignorant, our forces were bewildered, and the columns thrown into the utmoſt diſorder. A French detachment alſo met with the ſame embarraſſment, and falling in with lord Howe, at the head of one of the Britiſh columns, an engagement enſued, wherein the enemy were totally defeated. But this trifling advantage was dearly purchaſed by the loſs of lord Howe, who fell in the beginning of the action, univerſally lamented, being a young nobleman of approved courage and moſt promiſing talents. The troops were now ſo much fatigued and diſordered, that general Abercrombie thought it adviſeable to return to the landing place, which they reached about eight in the morning. The general having made his approaches, and ſeveral unſucceſsful attempts, was convinced that a retreat was neceſſary to prevent a total overthrow. Having, therefore, re-embarked the troops, he returned to lake George, from whence he had taken his departure. He now detached lieutenant-colonel Bradſtreet with a body of three thouſand men, to execute a plan that officer had formed againſt Fort Frontinac, ſituated on the north ſide of the river St. Lawrence, juſt where it takes its riſe from the Lake Ontario. Having advanced with his detachment to the ſide of this lake, he embarked in ſome ſloops and batteaux provided for the purpoſe, and landed within a mile of Fort Frontinac, the garriſon of which, conſiſting of one hundred and ten men, with a few Indians, immediately ſurrendered priſoners of war. Bradſtreet then made himſelf maſter of all the enemy's ſhipping on the lake, amounting to nine armed veſſels, ſome of which carried eighteen guns. After deſtroying the fortifications, the colonel returned to Oſwego, with the veſſels, artillery, ſtores, ammunition and merchandize. It has been already obſerved, that eight thouſand men, under brigadier-general Forbes were appointed for the reduction of Fort du Queſne. That general began his march on the thirteenth of June, from Philadelphia to the river Ohio. The difficulties and fatigues he met with were aſtoniſhing: but he ſurmounted them all, and, at length arrived at Ray's town, at the diſtance of ninety miles from fort du Queſne, from whence he detached colonel Grant, at the head of eight hundred men, to reconnoitre the fort and its out-works. On his approach the enemy ſent out a large body of forces to meet him. An engagement enſued, which the Engliſh maintained with their uſual courage for three hours; but at length being overpowered by numbers, they were obliged to retreat with the loſs of three hundred men killed or taken; among the latter were major Grant, and nineteen officers. Far from being diſpirited by this misfortune, brigadier Forbes immediately advanced with his whole army, reſolved to make himſelf maſter of the fort or periſh in the attempt. But before his arrival the French had thought proper to abandon the place, and retire down the river Ohio, to their ſettlements on the Miſſiſſippi. On the twenty-fiſth of November the Engliſh entered the fort, and after repairing the fortifications, which the enemy had diſmantled, he changed its name from Fort du Queſne to Pitſburg; after which he returned to Philadelphia, having concluded a treaty of friendſhip and alliance with the Indian tribes.

No material occurrence now happened in the Weſt-Indies, except the protection of our commerce, and two gallant actions performed by captain Tyrrel, who in the Buckingham, aſſiſted by the Cambridge, demoliſhed a ſmall fort in Grand Ana bay, in the iſland of Martinico, and took four privateers, three of which were deſtroyed, and one converted into a tender. But what moſt redounds to the honour of captain Tyrrel, is the following inſtance of humanity. When the fort was demoliſhed, the men fluſhed with victory, warmly ſolicited leave to deſtroy a village ſituated near it, but their valiant commander replied, "Gentlemen, it is beneath us to render a number of poor people miſerable, by deſtroying their habitations; brave Engliſhmen ſcorn to diſtreſs even their enemies, when not in arms againſt them." This ſpeech had the deſired effect on the brave tars, and ſaved the habitations of the poor and innocent villagers. A few months after being detached in the Buckingham on a cruize, he fell in with the Weazel ſloop, commanded by lieutenant Bowles, between the iſlands of Montſerrat and Guadaloupe; and ſoon after diſcovered a fleet of nineteen ſail under the convoy of a French man of war called the Floriſſant, and two frigates. The brave Tyrrel, undiſmayed by their ſtrength and number, immediately gave chace with all the ſail he could carry. The enemy were prepared to receive him; but after a ſhort engagement became intimidated by his briſk fire, with which he ſoon diſabled the two frigates, and preſſed hard on the Floriſſant, which now made ſail in order to eſcape; but Tyrrel prevented her deſign by getting within piſtol ſhot, and pouring into her a whole broadſide, which did great execution. Both ſides now became deſperate, and captain Tyrrel received a wound in his face, and loſt three fingers of his right hand, which obliged him to leave the command of his ſhip to Mr. Marſhal the firſt lieutenant, who continued the action with great bravery until he loſt his life: the charge then deſcended to the ſecond lieutenant, who behaved with equal intrepidity, and maintained a moſt deſperate engagement. At length the fire of the Floriſſant ceaſed, and confuſion, terror, and uproar prevailed among her officers and men, till ſhe ſtruck her colours. At this time the ſea ran ſo high, and the Buckingham was in ſo ſhattered a condition, that they could not immediately board the enemy; which being perceived by the commander, he ſpread all the ſail he could, and made his eſcape. But though the gallant Tyrrel was diſappointed of his prize, the action will always be remembered with honour. The Buckingham had twenty men killed and wounded; but the Floriſſant had above one hundred and eighty killed, and three hundred wounded; ſhe was alſo ſo greatly diſabled in her hull, that it was with the utmoſt difficulty they reached Martinico, being every moment in danger of ſinking.

The war in the Eaſt Indies was carried on with vigour, though not always with ſucceſs. Vice-admiral Pocock being joined by commodore Stephens in Madras Road with the reinforcements from England, ſailed on the twenty-ſeventh of March, with the Yarmouth, Elizabeth, Tyger, Weymouth, Cumberland, Newcaſtle, Saliſbury, Queenborough, and Protector ſtoreſhip, in order to get to windward of St. David's, to intercept the French ſquadron, which he had reaſon to expect. On the twenty-ninth in the morning he ſaw ſeven ſhips in St. David's Road getting under ſail, and two cruiſing in the offing, and immediately gave chace. The ſeven ſhips ſtood off under their top-ſails, and being joined by the two ſhips in the offing, formed the line of battle a-head. The enemy began to fire upon the Engliſh as they were going down; but the admiral did not make the ſignal to engage, till he was within half muſket ſhot of the Zodiaque, which was about three o'clock. A few minutes after, perceiving his ſhips were not cloſe enough to the enemy, he made the ſignal for a cloſer engagement, which was immediately complied with by the ſhips in the van. At half an hour paſt four, obſerving ſome of the French line had drawn up pretty cloſe to the Zodiaque, the admiral made the Cumberland, Newcaſtle, and Weymouth, ſignals to make up and engage cloſe. Soon after M. d'Aché broke the line, and put before the wind; his ſecond a-ſtern, which kept on the Yarmouth's quarter moſt part of the action, then came up along ſide, gave his fire, and bore away. The other two ſhips in the rear came up in like manner, and then bore away; and a few minutes after obſerving the enemy's van to bear away alſo, the admiral hauled down the ſignal for the line, and made the ſignal for a general chace. At ſix, obſerving the enemy join two ſhips about four miles to leeward, and at the ſame time hawling their wind to the weſtward, and ſeeming to form the line a-head; and the Yarmouth's maſts, yards, ſails, and rigging, as well as the Elizabeth's, Tyger's, and Saliſbury's, being ſo much damaged as to prevent their keeping up with the ſhips that were in the rear during the engagement, who had received but little damage; and night approaching, the admiral followed the enemy as well as he could, ſtanding to the S. W. in order, if poſſible, to keep to windward of them, in hopes of being able to engage them next morning; but as they ſhewed no lights, nor made any night ſignals that could be obſerved, he did not ſee them in the night nor next morning; and therefore concluding they had weathered him in the night by being able to carry more ſail, he continued his endeavours to work up after them until ſix in the morning of the firſt of May, when finding he loſt ground conſiderably, he came to an anchor about three leagues northward of Madras, and ſent an officer to the chief of that ſettlement for intelligence, who informed him, that the Bien-Aimé of ſeventy-four guns had received ſo much damage in the action, that they were obliged to run her on ſhore a little to the ſouthward of Alemparve, where the French ſquadron was at anchor. The admiral had not any certain account of the enemy's loſs; but according to the report of the Dutch, and ſeveral French officers, they had ſix hundred men killed in the action, and many more wounded. The loſs on our part was only twenty-nine killed, and eighty-nine wounded. The action was about ſeven leagues W. by N. of Alemparve. The admiral obſerved, that commodore Stephens, and captains Latham and Somerſet who were in the van, and alſo captain Kempenfelt, the commodore's captain, behaved as became gallant officers; and that captain Harriſon's behaviour, as well as that of all the officers and men belonging to the Yarmouth, gave him ſenſible ſatisfaction; and that had the captains in the rear done their duty as well, he ſhould have commanded them with great pleaſure; but their manner of acting in the engagement appeared ſo faulty, that on his return to Madraſs he ordered a court-martial to aſſemble, and enquire into their conduct. In conſequence of this, captain Nicholas Vincent was ſentenced to be diſmiſſed from the command of the Weymouth; captain George Legge of the Newcaſtle to be caſhiered from his majeſty's ſervice; and captain William Brereton of the Cumberland, to loſe, as a poſt captain, one year's rank.

On the tenth of May, Pocock having repaired the moſt material damages of his ſhips, put to ſea with an intent to get up to Fort St. David, but was not able to effect it. He got ſight of Pondicherry on the thirtieth; and the next morning the French ſquadron, which had been there ever ſince the fifth, ſtood out of the road and got away, notwithſtanding the admiral's utmoſt endeavours to come up with them. On the 6th of June, upon receiving an account that Fort St. David had ſurrendered to the French, he judged it prudent to return immediately to Madraſs to refreſh his ſquadron. The admiral ſailed again on the twenty-fifth of July in queſt of the enemy, and on the twenty-ſeventh in the evening got within three leagues of Pondicherry Road, where he perceived their ſquadron at anchor, conſiſting of eight ſail of the line and a frigate. They got under ſail the next morning, and ſtood to the ſouthward. The admiral made the ſignal to chace, and endeavoured to weather them, as the moſt probable means of bringing them to action, which however he was not able to accompliſh till the third of Auguſt, when taking the advantage of the ſea breeze he got the weather-gage, and brought on the engagement about one o'clock. M. d'Aché ſet his fore-ſail, and bore away in about ten minutes, his ſquadron followed his example, and continued a running fight in a very irregular manner till three o'clock. The admiral then made a ſignal for a general chace; upon which the French cut away their boats, and made all the ſail they could; he purſued them till it was dark, when they eſcaped by out-ſailing him, and got into Pondicherry Road. The admiral anchored with his ſquadron the ſame evening off Carrical, a French ſettlement. The loſs of men in this action was only thirty-one killed, and one hundred and ſixty wounded; among the latter were commodore Stephens, and captain Martin. The behaviour of the officers and men in general on this occaſion, was entirely to the admiral's ſatisfaction. The French ſquadron continued in Pondicherry Road until the third of September, when they ſailed for the iſlands to clean and refit, two of their ſhips being in a very bad condition, and the others conſiderably damaged. Their loſs in this laſt amounted to five hundred and forty killed and wounded, according to the beſt accounts.

It is now neceſſary to take a ſummary view of the operations performed by the allied army during this campaign on the continent of Europe, where the war was proſecuted with the utmoſt virulence. A farmer of the revenue arrived at Hanover from Paris about the cloſe of the laſt year, in order to receive the revenue of that electorate, together with thoſe of all other countries which ſhould be reduced by the armies of the moſt Chriſtian king. At the ſame time a decree was publiſhed at Paris, by which it appeared, that the court of Verſailles had determined the government and ſyſtem of the electorate, contrary to an expreſs article of the capitulation granted to the city of Hanover, when it ſurrendered. The French, therefore, had no right to complain of the infraction of articles, as they themſelves had ſet the example. The landgrave of Heſſe Caſſel, alarmed at theſe proceedings, ſolicited a treaty with the French king, whereby the former was enjoined not to act directly or indirectly againſt his moſt Chriſtian Majeſty; and the latter to afford him the moſt ſpeedy and effectual ſuccours, if his eſtates ſhould be attacked in conſequence of this treaty. Nor was the landgrave of Heſſe Caſſel the only prince alarmed by the progreſs of the French arms. The duke of Brunſwic, though now nearly connected with his Britannic majeſty, in order to detach himſelf from the deſperate fortune of Hanover, concluded a treaty, ten days after the former convention was ſigned, with the courts of Vienna and Verſailles.

Prince Ferdinand being joined, about the middle of February, by a body of Pruſſian horſe under the command of the prince of Holſtein-Gottorp, the whole army was put in motion, and advanced to the country of Bremen. The enemy was ſoon diſlodged from Rottenburg, Otterſburg, and Verden; they alſo abandoned the city of Bremen on the approach of the Hanoverian army, who took poſſeſſion of it without oppoſition. In the mean time the duke de Richlieu had been recalled, and the count de Clermont now commanded the French forces. The appointment of this general was at once agreeable to the army, and the ſubjects of Hanover, Richlieu having treated them with great inhumanity. The count, perceiving that it would be impoſſible for him with the wretched remnant of the French army, to oppoſe prince Ferdinand in the field with ſucceſs, or even maintain the footing his predeceſſor had gained, retreated as the allies advanced with ſuch precipitation, as frequently to leave his ſick, and the greater part of his baggage and artillery behind. The inhabitants of Hanover, perceiving the French were not able to face the allies, were convinced they muſt ſoon abandon their city, and dreaded the abuſes and cruelties they had reaſon to fear would be practiſed on that occaſion. But they were happily diſappointed by the ingenuous behaviour of their governor, the duke of Randan, who not only kept the ſoldiers within the bounds of the moſt rigid diſcipline, but even ordered the large magazine of proviſions to be ſold at a low rate, after diſtributing a conſiderable quantity to the poor. An inſtance of humanity more honorary to that nobleman, than titles of dignity, or laurels of victory. The French army now retired to Hamelen, leaving a conſiderable detachment under count Chabot at Hoya, a ſtrong fort upon the Weſer, and a place of ſo much importance, that prince Ferdinand determined to drive the enemy from it. The hereditary prince of Brunſwic was appointed for this ſervice, with four battalions of foot, and a detachment of light horſe. The prince, pleaſed with an opportunity of diſplaying his military talents, undertook the expedition with alacrity. He had a broad and deep river to paſs, and no means of tranſporting his men but a ſingle float; and even this was ſoon rendered uſeleſs by a ſtrong wind, which aroſe about the time that one half of his troops had paſſed over. By this accident, all communication was cut off between the prince and a large part of his detachment; while the party he was going to diſlodge, was ſuperior to his whole force. Thus embarraſſed, the prince formed and executed a plan, worthy the moſt renowned of warriors: he determined not to ſpend any time in bringing over the reſt of his troops, but to puſh on with ſuch reſolution as could not fail of intimidating the enemy, and giving him an opportunity of attacking them with ſucceſs, notwithſtanding the ſmall number of his forces. Accordingly, the detachment was in motion before five in the morning, and marched with the utmoſt expedition directly to Hoya. When they were only a mile and a half diſtant from the place, another accident had nearly defeated the ſucceſs of the enterprize. The detachment fired, by miſtake, upon four of the enemy's dragoons, who were patrolling in the neighbourhood of the place. The fire was caught from man to man, till at length it became general, and could not fail of alarming the enemy. An intrepid reſolution was now the only reſource, and was accordingly aſſumed. They marched with the utmoſt expedition to the town, and attacked the enemy at the bridge; a fierce fire enſued, without any apparent advantage reſulting to either party: and the ground was ſo uneven, that the prince could not bring up his whole detachment. Senſible of this difficulty, he formed the deſign of attacking the enemy in the rear; but to carry this ſcheme into execution, it was neceſſary to make a circuit about the town. Every thing ſucceeded to his wiſh: the attack was made with fixed bayonets, and a terrible ſlaughter enſued. The French abandoned the bridge, and fled in confuſion; and the prince, having diſlodged the enemy, rejoined the other part of the detachment. The count de Chabot threw himſelf with two battalions, into the caſtle, and determined to defend the place to the laſt extremity; but ſoon after capitulated, by which his garriſon marched out with all the honours of war; but their cannon, ſtores, and ammunition, were ſurrendered to the victor. The prince had about a hundred men killed and wounded, but took ſix hundred and ſeventeen priſoners. By this action a place of the utmoſt importance, and which opened a paſſage over the Weſer, was ſecured to the Hanoverian army. This was the firſt exploit of the hereditary prince, whoſe military conduct afterwards ſhone with diſtinguiſhed luſtre and honor.

The hereditary prince now inveſted Minden, which was defended by a garriſon of four thouſand men, who in nine days ſurrendered themſelves priſoners of war. About the ſame time, ſeveral ſkirmiſhes happened between the advanced parties of the Hanoverian and French armies, but always to the advantage of the former. The latter, ſurrounded with difficulties and diſtreſs, marched towards the Rhine in three columns. Prince Ferdinand finding it impracticable to attack the French camp, found means to turn the left flank towards the convent of Campe, which obliged the enemy to quit a very advantageous poſt and retire to Nys, a little higher up the river, whence the Count de Clermont detached a conſiderable corps, under the command of the count de St. Germain, to take poſt at Creveldt, ſituated in a plain between his army and the camp of the allies, which fronted the town of Meurs. Prince Ferdinand having made a diſpoſition for attacking the enemy, and carefully reconnoitered the ſituation of their camp, aſſigned the command of his whole left wing, conſiſting of eighteen battalions, and twenty-eight ſquadrons, to lieutenant-general Sporcken; the conduct of the right wing, compoſed of ſixteen battalions, and fourteen ſquadrons, was conferred on the hereditary prince and major-general Wagenheim; the ſquadrons, with the addition of two regiments of Pruſſian dragoons, were under the immediate direction of the prince of Holſtein, while the hereditary prince commanded the infantry. The light troops, conſiſting of five ſquadrons of Heſſians, were divided between the prince of Holſtein and general Sporcken. Major Buckner's ſquadron, together with Scheither's corps, were ordered to obſerve the flank of the enemy's right, and were accordingly poſted in the village of Pandendeike; and a battalion of the troops of Wolfenbuttle was left in the town of Hulſte, to cover the rear of the army. The intention of prince Ferdinand was to attack the left flank of the enemy; but the woods and ditches that interſected this part of the country, rendered the execution extremely difficult. However he continued his march at the head of the grenadiers to the valley of Anrath, where he fell in with an advanced party of the French, who, after a few diſcharges of muſquetry retired to the camp, and gave the alarm. About one in the afternoon, the action began with a ſevere cannonading on the part of prince Ferdinand, which, though well ſupported, did not drive the French from their cover; he therefore determined to diſlodge them by a cloſe attack of the infantry. The hereditary prince accordingly advanced with the whole front, and an obſtinate action enſued. In the mean time, the cavalry on the right attempted in vain to penetrate through the wood on the other ſide, where the enemy had raiſed two batteries, which were ſuſtained by forty ſquadrons of horſe. In this manner the action continued till five in the afternoon, when the grenadiers collecting all their ſtrength, forced the intrenchments in the wood, which were lined with the French infantry. Theſe giving way, they abandoned the wood in the utmoſt diſorder; but the purſuit was checked by the conduct and reſolution of the enemy's cavalry, which maintained their ground, and covered the foot in their retreat to Nuys, notwithſtanding a dreadful fire from the artillery of the allies, and the vigorous attacks of the Hanoverian horſe, who had by this time found means to regain the plain. The ſucceſs of the day was in a great meaſure owing to the artillery on the left and in the center, which did great execution, while prince Ferdinand proſecuted his attack on the other quarter. In this action, ſeven thouſand of the French troops were killed, wounded, and taken priſoners; and ſeveral ſtandards, colours, and pieces of cannon fell into the hands of the allies, who loſt about fifteen hundred men. Soon after the count de Clermont reſigned his command, which was conferred on M. de Contades, and the army was conſiderably reinforced. This general threatened to attack prince Ferdinand in his turn, and made ſome motions in conſequence of this reſolution; but was prevented in his purſuit by the little river Erff, behind which the prince reſolved to continue quiet, till he ſhould be joined by the body of Britiſh troops under the command of the duke of Marlborough, the firſt diviſion of which had juſt landed at Embden.

A plan was now formed by M. de Chevert, one of the ableſt commanders in the French army, which, if it had ſucceeded, muſt have greatly embarraſſed the ſituation of prince Ferdinand. Chevert had projected a ſcheme for diſlodging baron Imhoff, who was poſted on the right of the Rhine; burning the bridge at Rhees, making himſelf maſter of the magazine, and preventing the junction of the Britiſh and Hanoverian forces. To execute this plan, he united ſeveral detachments from the garriſon of Weſel to a conſiderable corps, originally intended for the ſiege of Duſſeldorp. His whole force amounted to twelve thouſand men; while the troops under Imhoff did not exceed three thouſand. As ſoon as the Hanoverian general was apprized of the deſign of Chevert, he did all that could be done to defeat it. Perſuaded that the ſwell of the river had rendered it impoſſible for him to receive any aſſiſtance from prince Ferdinand, and that he had nothing to rely on but his own genius, and the valour of his troops, he reſolved to quit his poſt, and meet the enemy. Obſerving that the French were paſſing through very difficult ground, he did not loſe a moment in beginning the action. He ordered a ſmall party, poſted in a little coppice, to fall upon the enemy's left, which he perceived to be uncovered; and appointed the fire of this party as a ſignal for all the reſt to advance, and begin the attack with fixed bayonets. The French being attacked in ſo vigorous and unexpected a manner, fell into confuſion, and in leſs than half an hour fled from the field of battle, leaving eleven pieces of cannon, and all their baggage, to the Hanoverians, who took three hundred and fifty-four priſoners, and drove them under the cannon of Weſel. This ſignal advantage obtained over ſo great a ſuperiority, was not more bravely obtained than wiſely improved. Imhoff, having taken proper meaſures for procuring his magazine, quitted his poſt at Meer; and being reinforced by ſeveral parties who had paſſed the river in boats, he marched with the utmoſt expedition towards the route of the Engliſh forces, and happily effected a junction, which had hitherto been attended with ſo many difficulties. Prince Ferdinand now retired into Weſtphalia, and fixed his head-quarters at Munſter; while Contades encamped near Ham upon the Lippe, and extended his troops in ſuch a manner, as to command the whole courſe of the Rhine on both ſides. The campaign was ſo far advanced before the Britiſh troops joined the army, that they had no opportunity of ſignalizing themſelves in the field. The effects of a long and tedious march, however, were ſeverely felt by them in general, and proved fatal to their commander, the duke of Marlborough, who died at Munſter of a dyſentery.

As ſoon as the time of prorogation expired, the ſeſſion of parliament was opened by commiſſion on the twenty-third of November, his majeſty being indiſpoſed. The miniſtry reſolved to proſecute the war in every quarter with the utmoſt vigour: and the houſe of commons, ſeconding their deſire of reducing the enemy to reaſon, voted the ſum of twelve millions, ſeven hundred, ſixty-one thouſand, three hundred and ten pounds, nineteen ſhillings and five-pence.

At this time all the French ports were filled with preparations for invading the Britiſh dominions: men of war, tranſports, and flat-bottomed boats, were prepared with the greateſt diligence; and nothing leſs than a triple embarkation now filled the mouths of the French. But the Engliſh were not now to be intimidated; they ſmiled at the vain boaſts of the enemy, and ridiculed a pretended invaſion, threatened by a people incapable of defending their own coaſts. M. de Thurot was appointed to command one of theſe embarkations; and he accordingly found means of ſailing from Dunkirk with a ſmall ſquadron of ſhips and ſeveral tranſports, directing his courſe towards Scotland. This commander, from the maſter of a merchant ſhip, became the captain of a privateer, and, in that capacity, greatly annoyed the Engliſh commerce; and diſplayed ſo many accompliſhments, both with regard to courage and conduct, that he was choſen to command this ſquadron. But the principal embarkation for invading England, was to be made at Havre de Grace, and other ports of Normandy, in flat-bottomed boats. While the third embarkation, intended againſt Ireland, was to be made at Vannes, in Lower Brittany, where a very conſiderable body of troops were aſſembled, under the command of the duke d'Aquillon, d'Aiguillon, governor of that province. M. de Conflans was appointed commander of the fleet then fitting out at Breſt for covering the embarkation. Such was the plan formed by the French for invading the Britiſh territories. But all theſe pleaſing ideas they had formed, with regard to the ſucceſs of theſe embarkations, were ſoon diſſipated by the meaſures taken by the Engliſh. Commodore Boys, with his ſquadron, was ſtationed before Dunkirk; while admiral Hawke, with a ſtrong ſquadron, blocked up the French fleet in Breſt, and a ſmaller ſquadron, under the command of captain Duff, cruized off the port of Vannes. Nor were the preparations at Havre forgotten: admiral Rodney, with a ſmall ſquadron of ſhips and bombs, ſailed for that port, in order to prevent the flat-bottom boats from ſailing, and even to bombard the town. On the ſecond of July, Rodney arrived before Havre, and anchored in the great road. The neceſſary diſpoſitions for the bombardment being made, the bomb-ketches placed themſelves in the narrow channel of the ſtream leading to Honfleur. About ſeven in the evening the bombardment began, and continued fifty-two hours without the leaſt intermiſſion, and with ſuch ſucceſs, that the town was ſeveral times on fire, and the magazine of ſtores, collected for the uſe of the army intended for invading England, burnt with the utmoſt fury for ſix hours, notwithſtanding the continual efforts of above four hundred men to ſtop the violence of the flames. This bombardment threw the inhabitants into the utmoſt conſternation; they abandoned the town, and ſought for ſafety in the adjacent country. The troops, in the mean time, were continually employed in throwing up intrenchments, and erecting batteries, in order to defend themſelves againſt the Engliſh, ſhould they attempt to land on the coaſt. But they had no forces on board for that purpoſe, nor indeed was there occaſion for any; they had done enough to convince the enemy that their ſcheme was ridiculous, and that before they attempted an embarkation, it was neceſſary to collect a fleet ſufficient to defeat every attempt that might be made to prevent it by the Engliſh.

It was judged proper that admiral Boſcawen ſhould continue cruizing off Toulon, to watch the motions of a fleet then fitting out there, under the command of M. de la Clue. He often ſtood in near the ſhore, diſplaying the Engliſh flag, by way of defiance, hoping, by that means, to provoke M. de la Clue to leave the harbour, and venture a fair engagement on the open ſea. But in this he was miſtaken; the Frenchman was too well acquainted with the courage and conduct of Boſcawen, to riſk his fleet againſt the efforts of ſo experienced and intrepid a commander. Boſcawen therefore detached three men of war of the line, to burn two ſhips lying in the mouth of the harbour. Accordingly they advanced with the utmoſt reſolution, and were warmly received by ſeveral batteries erected near the ſhore, and which they had not till then perceived. They attempted to deſtroy two ſmall forts, and cannonaded them for ſome time with the utmoſt fury; till finding them too ſtrong, they endeavoured to return, but were prevented by the wind ſubſiding into a calm: and were at laſt, with great difficulty, towed off in a very ſhattered condition. This obliged the admiral to return to Gibraltar to refit his fleet; and M. de la Clue ſeized the opportunity of ſailing from Toulon, hoping without the knowledge of the Engliſh to paſs the Streights mouth.

As the Gibraltar was ordered to hover between Eſtapona and Ceuta Point on the coaſt of Barbary, to give notice in caſe the enemy ſhould attempt to ſail, about eight in the morning of the ſeventeenth of Auguſt ſhe diſplayed a ſignal, that fourteen ſail appeared on the Barbary coaſt, to the eaſtward of Ceuta. In conſequence of this, admiral Boſcawen got under ſail with all poſſible expedition, and at day-break the next morning, he deſcried ſeven large ſhips lying to. The Engliſh fleet, conſiſting of fourteen ſail of the line and two fire-ſhips, ſtood after the enemy, and came up with them about noon; but the wind dying away, the battle did not begin till after two o'clock; nor was admiral Boſcawen able to get up to the Ocean, M. de la Clue's ſhip, till about four, when the action was ſupported on both ſides with great fury. In about half an hour the mizen-maſt, and both top-ſail-yards of the Namur were ſhot away, in conſequence of which the admiral hoiſted his flag on board the Newark; after which the Ocean ſtood away with all the ſail ſhe could crowd. Preſently after, the Centaur, of ſeventy-four guns, ſtruck on a rock; and the Engliſh purſued the flying enemy till morning, when only four ſail were to be diſcovered, and they were ſtanding in for the land. The Engliſh were now at a diſtance of more than three miles from the enemy, and not more than five leagues from the ſhore. About noon, the Ocean ran among the breakers, as did the Redoubtable a ſhort time after; and the utmoſt endeavours were uſed for landing the men from both ſhips; but the ſea being exceedingly rough, this proved a taſk of great difficulty and danger. The Temeraire and the Modeſte, anchored as near the ſhore as they could be brought with ſafety. The Engliſh admiral ſtood in as near the ſhore as prudence would permit, and he diſpatched the Intrepid and America to deſtroy the Ocean; the former, by coming to an anchor, could not get in, but the latter performed the ſervice with little difficulty; for, upon throwing into her a broadſide the Ocean ſtruck, and ſhe was immediately taken poſſeſſion of by the conquerors. About half an hour before the Ocean ſtruck, M. de la Clue, who had one leg broke and the other wounded, was put on ſhore; but M. le compte de Came, her captain, and many other officers, were made priſoners. No probability appearing of getting the Ocean off, ſhe was ſet on fire. Captain Bentley of the Warſpight, was ordered againſt the Temeraire, carrying ſeventy-four guns; and he was fortunate enough to bring her off with very little damage. In the mean time, admiral Broderick, with his diviſion, burnt the Redoubtable, which had been bulged and deſerted by the crew; and he brought off the Modeſte, of ſixty-four guns, which had ſuſtained but little damage. In this action the Engliſh had fifty-ſix men killed, and one hundred and ninety-ſix wounded: but the loſs of the enemy was much more conſiderable; for in his letter to the French ambaſſador at Liſbon, M. de la Clue acknowledged, that one hundred men were killed, and ſeventy dangerouſly wounded, on board the Ocean. But the moſt important injury the French ſuſtained, was in the loſs of four capital ſhips, two of which were deſtroyed, and the others brought in triumph to England. Captain Bentley was ſent with advices to the admiralty, of the victory of the Engliſh fleet over that of France; and he experienced a moſt gracious reception from his majeſty, who was pleaſed, as a reward for his bravery during the engagement, to confer the honour of knighthood upon him.

Though the defeat of M. de la Clue had retarded the projected invaſion of Great Britain, preparations were notwithſtanding continued for the enterprize. Thurot was ordered to avail himſelf of the firſt opportunity of ſailing from Dunkirk, and to proceed round the northern coaſt of Scotland, in order to alarm the coaſt of Ireland, and make a diverſion from that part where Conflans was to diſembark his troops. A great number of ſhips of war and tranſports were aſſembled at Breſt, having on board a train of artillery, with accoutrements for the cavalry, which was intended to be mounted in Ireland. A body of French troops, including the Iriſh brigade, were in readineſs to embark; and the young Pretender remained in the neighbourhood of Vannes incognito, with a view of giving countenance to a revolt in Great Britain. To fruſtrate theſe deſigns, Sir Edward Hawke, with a fleet of twenty-three capital ſhips, blocked up the harbour of Breſt; while a ſmall ſquadron, commanded by captain Duff, continued cruiſing along the coaſt of France, from Port l'Orient in Bretagne, to the point of St. Giles in Poictou; and theſe operations entirely defeated the deſign of invading England. In November the Engliſh fleet, under the command of Sir Edward Hawke, Sir Charles Hardy, and admiral Young, was driven from the coaſt of France by ſtreſs of weather, and on the ninth day anchored at Torbay. Immediately upon receiving intelligence of the Engliſh fleet being driven from their ſtation, the French admiral ſailed from Breſt with twenty-one ſail of the line, in order to deſtroy the ſquadron commanded by captain Duff, before the larger fleet could return from the coaſt of England. Sir Edward had no ſooner received intelligence of the departure of the French fleet, than he put to ſea, with a deſign of deſtroying them; and in the mean time orders were iſſued by government for defending all thoſe parts of the coaſt that were expoſed to a deſcent; and all the ſhips of war that were in a condition of going to ſea, were ordered to ſail with all poſſible expedition. The troops quartered along the coaſts of Kent and Eſſex were put in motion; and the miniſtry purſued every meaſure for defeating the deſigns of the enemy, that ſound policy could dictate, and true patriotiſm inſpire. In the mean time admiral Hawke directed his courſe for Quiberon Bay, where he ſuſpected the French fleet would rendezvous: but he was driven by a hard gale to the weſtward, where he was joined by two of his majeſty's frigates, named the Coventry and Maidſtone; theſe veſſels the admiral ordered to keep a-head of the ſquadron, one on the ſtarboard, and the other on the larboard-bow. In the morning of the twentieth of November, the Maidſtone made a ſignal that ſhe deſcried a fleet; and thereupon the admiral diſplayed a ſignal for forming the line a-breaſt, in order to collect all his ſhips together; and about ten o'clock the ſhips deſcried by the Maidſtone were found to be the French ſquadron, ſailing in chace of the ſquadron under captain Duff; but upon ſeeing the Engliſh fleet, they made off with all the ſail they could croud; and captain Duff, with ſome difficulty, effected a junction with Sir Edward, who diſplayed a ſignal for ſeven of his ſhips which were neareſt to the enemy to chace, and detain them till a reinforcement ſhould arrive. About half after two o'clock the engagement began in the neighbourhood of Belleiſle, by the van of the Engliſh attacking the rear of the French. The purſuit, however, was not ſtopped; but having poured a broadſide into the ſternmoſt of the French ſhips, they continued their courſe towards the van, leaving the rear to the ſhips that followed. In paſſing through the rear in the Royal George of one hundred and ten guns, admiral Hawke reſerved his fire, and ordered the maſter to put him along-ſide the French admiral, who commanded on board the Soleil Royal, carrying eighty guns and twelve hundred men. The pilot, remonſtrating on the danger of running upon a ſhoal, the gallant Hawke ſaid, "You have done your duty in pointing out the danger, now you are to act in obedience to my order; therefore lay me along-ſide the French Admiral." The maſter immediately complied; and the brave veteran ſoon ſaw the Royal George range up with the Soleil Royal. The danger of Conflans being obſerved, a large ſhip, called the Theſee, ran in between the two admirals, and received the fire intended for the Soleil Royal; but this ſpirited manœuvre proved fatal to her; for the ſea ruſhing in at her lower-deck ports, ſhe went to the bottom in a ſhort time. Though the weather was exceedingly tempeſtuous, ſeveral of the ſhips on both ſides maintained the conteſt with great fury, and for ſome time it was doubtful in whoſe favour the battle would terminate; but at laſt victory declared in favour of the Engliſh. About four in the afternoon the Formidable ſtruck her colours; and the Superb met the ſame fate as the Theſee. The Hero ſtruck, and came to an anchor; but the ſea was ſo violently agitated, that no boats could go on board her. Preſently after, the retreat of the French, covered by the obſcurity of the evening, put an end to the conteſt. This was a circumſtance exceedingly unfortunate to England, as one more hour of day-light, would, in all probability, have enabled admiral Hawke to make his victory at once complete.

The ſtorm continuing to increaſe, and darkneſs coming on apace, the admiral, with a view to prevent his ſhips from running on the unknown ſhoals and iſlands, made a ſignal for coming to an anchor on the weſt ſide of the ſmall iſland Dumet, where the ſhips remained the whole night in a moſt dangerous ſituation, being continually alarmed by the firing of guns in diſtreſs, and uncertain whether they were ſignals proceeding from their own ſhips or thoſe of the enemy. Under cover of the night, the Soleil Royal came to an anchor in the midſt of the Engliſh fleet: but upon the appearance of the dawn, M. de Conflans ordered her cable to be cut, and ſhe drove aſhore to the weſtward of Croize; and this event was no ſooner perceived by the Engliſh admiral, than he made a ſignal for the Eſſex to ſlip her cable, and purſue the flying enemy. In performing this ſervice, the Eſſex unfortunately ran on a ſand bank called Lefour, where another of the Engliſh fleet, named the Reſolution, was already aground. Notwithſtanding they received every aſſiſtance that it was in the power of the reſt of the fleet to afford, both theſe ſhips were irrecoverably loſt. All the men, and the greateſt part of the ſtores were ſaved; and leſt the wrecks ſhould fall into the hands of the enemy, they were ſet on fire. The Soleil Royal lay beating on the ſhore; but ſhe was ſet fire to by the French, upon their perceiving that the Portland, Chatham, and Vengeance, were approaching to deſtroy her. When they ſaw the Soleil Royal in flames, the three men of war returned and deſtroyed the Hero, which was alſo aground; and another large French ſhip periſhed in the river Loire, named the Juſté.

The Engliſh admiral perceiving ſeven ſhips of the line riding at anchor between Point Penva and the river Vilaine, made a ſignal, on the morning of the twenty-third, to weigh, in preparation for attacking them; but the ſtorm increaſed to ſuch violence, that he was under the neceſſity of remaining at anchor, and of ſtriking top-gallant maſts. In the interim the French ſhips threw their guns and ſtores overboard, and the weather being leſs tempeſtuous under the land, took advantage of the flood to paſs the bar at the mouth of the river Vilaine, where they lay within half a mile of the entrance, defended by ſome occaſional batteries erected on the ſhore, and by two large frigates, moored acroſs the mouth of the harbour. In this engagement, only one lieutenant and thirty-nine men were killed, and about two hundred wounded; a trifling loſs, when put in competition with the amazing victory obtained; by which the projected invaſion, that had ſo long alarmed the apprehenſions of Great Britain was rendered abortive, and a finiſhing blow given to the naval power of France. Sir Edward continued cruizing off the coaſt of Bretagne for a conſiderable time after he had defeated Conflans, taking particular care to block up the mouth of the river Vilaine, that the French ſhips might not come out and join the ſhattered remains of their ſquadron, which had found means to reach Rochfort. At laſt the Engliſh admiral was recalled home, and gratified by his ſovereign with a conſiderable penſion, for the courage and conduct he had ſo often diſplayed in his country's ſervice.

There being now a ſcheme projected for improving the ſucceſs of our arms in North America, by carrying them up the river St. Lawrence, and attacking Quebec, the capital of Canada, a fleet deſtined for this important undertaking, ſailed from St. Helen's on the twelfth of November in the preceding year, under the command of captain Hughes, conſiſting of eight ſail of the line, one frigate, four bombketches, and a fleet of tranſports, having on board ſix regiments of infantry, and a detachment of artillery, beſides eight hundred marines diſtributed among the ſhips of war: the whole force being under the command of major-general Hopſon, aſſiſted by major-general Barrington, the colonels Armiger and Haldane, and the lieutenant-colonels Trapand and Clavering, acting in the capacity of brigadiers. After a voyage of ſeven weeks and three days the fleet arrived at Barbadoes, and anchored in Carliſle bay, where they joined commodore Moore, who had received orders to aſſume the command of the united ſquadrons, amounting to ten ſhips of the line, beſides frigates and bombketches. Having ſpent ſome time in ſupplying the fleet with wood and water, and taking in a number of negroes to aſſiſt in drawing the artillery, they ſailed from Carliſle bay on the thirteenth of January: but by this time the troops, unaccuſtomed to a hot climate, were conſiderably weakened and reduced by fevers, diarrhœas, the ſcurvy, and the ſmall pox, which laſt diſorder had unfortunately broke out on board the tranſports. Next morning the ſquadron came within ſight of Martinico, the place of its deſtination; and on the fifteenth day of the month, entered the great bay of Port Royal. The general found that he ſhould meet with much greater obſtruction from the nature of the ground, than from the ſtrength of the enemy; the whole country being interſected with a number of gullies, incloſed by ſteep and almoſt perpendicular precipices, which rendered it extremely difficult for the troops to advance, and abſolutely impoſſible for them to tranſport their artillery: he therefore informed the commodore that he could not maintain his ground, unleſs the ſquadron would ſupply him with heavy cannon, landed near the town of Port Royal, or aſſiſt him in attacking the citadel by ſea, while he ſhould make his approaches by land: but both theſe expedients were deemed impracticable; the attempt upon Port Royal was given up: and the troops being recalled from their advanced poſts, were reimbarked without moleſtation. A council of war being held, it was reſolved to make an attack upon St. Pierre; and the fleet proceeding to that part of the iſland, entered the bay on the nineteenth, when the commodore told the general, that he could undoubtedly reduce the iſland; but as the ſhips might be diſabled in an attack, ſo as not to be in a condition to proceed immediately on any other material ſervice; and as the reduction of the iſland of Guadaloupe would be of great benefit to the ſugar colonies, he thought it would be moſt adviſeable for them to conduct the armament to that iſland. The general having agreed to this propoſal, they immediately ſteered for Gaudaloupe, which lies weſtward of Martinico, about thirty leagues.

When the Britiſh ſquadron arrived at Baſſeterre, the chief engineer reconnoitered the town, and pronounced it abſolutely impregnable to ſhipping; notwithſtanding which, the commodore reſolved to attack it early next morning. At nine, the engagement was begun by captain Trelawney, in the Lyon, and the reſt of the ſhips continuing to draw up abreaſt of the citadel and batteries, the action ſoon became general, and was maintained with equal vivacity on both ſides for ſeveral hours. About five in the afternoon the fire of the citadel was exhauſted; and at ſeven, all the batteries were ſilenced. Four bomb-ketches were then anchored near the ſhore, and began to ply the town with ſhells and carcaſſes; ſo that in a little time the houſes were in flames, the magazines of gunpowder blew up, and about ten at night the whole place was involved in one general conflagration. Next day part of the troops took poſſeſſion of an advantageous poſt on an eminence, and part entered the town, which ſtill continued burning with great violence. At day-break the enemy, to the number of two thouſand, appeared about four miles from the town, and began to throw up intrenchments near a houſe where the governor had fixed his head-quarters, declaring he would maintain this poſt to the laſt extremity. Finding it would be impoſſible to conquer the inhabitants on the ſide of Guadaloupe, the general reſolved to make an attempt on Grand-terre, in conſequence of which the great ſhips were ſent round to that place, aud on the thirteenth of February attacked Fort Louis. After a ſevere cannonading, which laſted ſix hours, a body of marines, and one of highlanders, were landed, who ſword in hand, drove the enemy from their intrenchments, took poſſeſſion of the fort, and hoiſted the Britiſh colours. General Barrington now ſucceeded to the chief command, in the place of general Hopſon, who died at Baſſeterre a few days after Fort Louis was taken, and he determined to proſecute the entire reduction of the iſland with the utmoſt vigour and diſpatch. This, however, he was not able to effect till the firſt of May, on which day the inhabitants, thinking it in vain to hold out any longer, ſurrendered the whole iſland of Guadaloupe by capitulation. A fortunate circumſtance for the Engliſh forces: for the agreement was but juſt ſigned, when a meſſenger arrived to inform the natives, that M. de Beauharnois, general of the French Iſlands, had landed at St. Ann with a reinforcement from Martinico, under convoy of a ſquadron commanded by M. de Bompart, who no ſooner heard that the capitulation was ſigned, than he reimbarked his troops with all poſſible expedition, and ſailed back to Martinico. The iſlands of Deſeada, Los Santos, and Marigalante were now ſummoned to ſurrender, and they accordingly ſubmitted upon the ſame terms as were granted to Guadaloupe. General Barrington having made the tour of Guadaloupe, ordered that the fortifications which he thought neceſſary to be maintained, ſhould be immediately repaired, He then finiſhed every thing requiſite for the ſupport of the iſland, and ſettled the affairs relating to the inhabitants; after which he ſent the highlanders, with a body draughted out of other regiments, to North America, under convoy; garriſoned the principal towns of the iſland, and left the chief command to colonel Crump. Colonel Melville was appointed governor of the citadel at Baſſeterre, and the command at Grand-terre was given to colonel Delgarno. Three regiments were aſſigned as a guard for the whole iſland, and the other three were embarked for England. In the latter end of June, general Barrington himſelf went on board the Roebuck, and with the tranſports, ports, under convoy of a ſmall ſquadron, ſet ſail for Great Britain, while commodore Moore directed his courſe to Antigua, with the greater part of the fleet.

While theſe tranſactions were going on in the Weſt Indies, the moſt dreadful devaſtations and ravages of war raged in North America. The inſidious arts of the French had prevailed upon moſt of the Indian nations to revolt, and inſtigated the ſavages to commit the moſt horrid barbarities upon the ſubjects of England. In conſequence of theſe proceedings, the miniſtry deemed it prudent to ſet on foot a treaty at Eaſton, about ninety miles from Philadelphia, where a peace was negociated between Great Britain and fifteen Indian nations. A junction being formed between the Indians and their old friends and allies the Engliſh, every meaſure was purſued for reducing the French ſettlements in Canada, and terminating a war in that part of the world, where innocent people of both ſexes, and all ages and conditions, had been long expoſed to the moſt excruciating tortures that could be inflicted upon them by brutal ferocity. To effect this great purpoſe, it was reſolved to divide the forces in North America, and make ſeveral attacks at the ſame time; that by employing the attention of the enemy in different quarters, the reduction of the whole country of Canada might be effected in the courſe of one campaign. In purſuance of the above deſign, three different expeditions were concerted in ſuch a manner, as to aſſiſt and promote the ſucceſs of each other. Without any oppoſition from the enemy, general Amherſt, whoſe ſeparate army was firſt in motion, paſſed Lake George. Upon the arrival of the Engliſh army in the neighbourhood of Ticonderoga, which the enemy at firſt ſeemed diſpoſed to defend, the neceſſary preparations were made for beſieging that important fortreſs; but the enemy, after having in ſome meaſure diſmantled the fortifications, abandoned the fort, and retreated towards Quebec, in the neighbourhood of which lay the center of all the great military operations. General Amherſt, immediately after the departure of the enemy, took poſſeſſion of the important fortreſs of Ticonderoga, and having appointed a ſtrong garriſon for the defence of the place, he ordered the neceſſary repairs to be made to the fortifications. On the firſt of Auguſt, one of the ſcouting parties brought intelligence, that the French had abandoned the fort of Crown Point; and hereupon, a body of rangers was diſpatched to take poſſeſſion of the place; and in the mean time the general embarked with the reſt of the army, and on the fourth landed at the fort, where the rangers were already encamped. Having thus obtained poſſeſſion of the moſt important fort in that part of the country, he determined immediately to erect a new fort, in order to ſecure the Britiſh territories in that quarter, and prevent the incurſions of ſcalping parties, who had already committed upon the Engliſh innumerable barbarities, too ſhocking for deſcription. Soon after, general Amherſt received intelligence of the ſtrength of the enemy, who had retreated to an iſland ſituated near the north extremity of Lake Champlain; upon which he ordered captain Loring to uſe the utmoſt expedition in building a ſloop of ſixteen guns, and a radeau of eighty-four feet in length, capable of carrying ſix pieces of large cannon, being determined to have the ſuperiority on the lake. Theſe veſſels being built and manned the general embarked, and made ſeveral attempts to attack the enemy; but the winter coming on, he deemed the accompliſhment of his deſign a matter of impoſſibility, and returned to the bay. Having landed his troops, he marched towards Crown Point, where he arrived on the twenty-firſt of October. His attention was now wholly engroſſed in erecting the new fortreſs at Crown Point; in opening roads of communication with Ticonderoga; and in forming ſuch diſpoſitions for the winter quarters of his troops, as were neceſſary for ſecuring the back colonies from the inroads of the enemy.

At this time general Prideaux reinforced by a conſiderable body of Indians, commanded by Sir William Johnſon, advanced without oppoſition to the camp at Niagara. General Prideaux inveſted the French fortreſs about the middle of July; but after carrying on his approaches for ſome days with great vigour, he was, while viſiting the trenches, unfortunately killed by the burſting of a cohorn. General Amherſt being informed of this diſaſter, he ſent brigadier-general Gage from Ticonderoga, to ſucceed the deceaſed Prideaux in command. In the interim, the command of the army devolved upon Sir William Johnſon, who carried on the plan of his predeceſſor with great ſucceſs. The French, being alarmed by the apprehenſion of loſing a place of ſo much importance, were exceedingly induſtrious in collecting a body of regular troops, amounting to twelve hundred men; and theſe, together with a large body of Indians, were ſent, under the command of M. d'Aubry, to reinforce the garriſon of Niagara. Sir William Johnſon was no ſooner apprized of this, than he made the neceſſary diſpoſitions for intercepting them in their march. About eight in the morning, the French came in ſight of the adverſe army, which was drawn up in order of battle. Upon perceiving the enemy, the Indians advanced to ſpeak to their countrymen, who ſerved under M. d'Aubry; but the latter declining a conference, ſounded the war-whoop, and began the battle with great fury. The Britiſh troops gave the enemy a very warm reception; and the Indians attacked their flanks, and galled them ſo ſeverely, that in about half an hour their whole army was routed; the French general, and many of his officers were ſlain, as were a great number of the fugitives in endeavouring to eſcape through the woods. The Engliſh general now ſent major Hervey to the commander of the fort, with a liſt of the ſeventeen officers who had been made priſoners, and to exhort him to ſurrender, while the ferocity of the Indians could be reſtrained; adding, that he would be allowed the liberty of ſending ſome perſon to view the officers, and thereby ſatiſfy himſelf with regard to the fact. An officer was accordingly diſpatched from the fortreſs, and he was permitted to converſe with M. d'Aubry and the other priſoners. On his return, the commander agreed to ſurrender, and in a few hours the capitulation was ratified. The garriſon were permitted to march out with all the honours of war, in order to embark in veſſels on the lake, and be conveyed to New York in the moſt expeditious manner. At their own requeſt, all the women were ſent to Montreal; and the ſick and wounded, who could not bear the fatigue of travelling, were treated with the utmoſt care and cordiality.

Many advantages reſulted to the Engliſh colonies in North America, from the reduction of Crown Point and Niagara; but the conqueſt of Quebec was a matter of much greater importance, and the expedition againſt this place was attended with much greater danger. The fleet deſtined for this important expedition, ſailed from England about the middle of February, under the command of the admirals Saunders and Holmes, who had afforded repeated proofs of their courage and military ſkill. On the twenty-firſt, they arrived within ſight of Cape Breton; but the harbour being frozen over, they bore away for Halifax in Nova Scotia. It was deemed expedient to detach admiral Durell, with a ſmall ſquadron, to the river St. Lawrence, with orders to penetrate as far as the Iſle de Coudres, in order to intercept any ſupplies that might be ſent from France for Quebec. In the interim, admiral Saunders arrived at Louiſburgh; and the troops being embarked on board the tranſports, he purſued every neceſſary meaſure for executing his plan of operations upon the river St. Lawrence. The land forces were commanded by major-general Wolfe, aſſiſted by the brigadiers Monckton, Townſhend, and Murray. Near the latter end of June, the troops were landed on the iſle of Orleans, ſituated a little below Quebec. The general publiſhed a manifeſto, importing that the king of Great Britain, his maſter, for equitable cauſes, had equipped an armament, for the purpoſe of reducing the moſt conſiderable of the French ſettlements in America; that he intended not to offer any acts of hoſtility to the induſtrious peaſants, their families, or the miniſters of their religion; but that he would maintain them in their temporal poſſeſſions, as well as in the exerciſe of their religion, provided they would not intereſt themſelves in the diſpute between the kings of France and England. Notwithſtanding the liberality of ſentiment on which this manifeſto was founded, it failed of producing the deſired effect; for the Canadians could repoſe no reliance on the faith of a nation, which their prieſts had repreſented as treacherous, heretical, and implacably cruel. Their prejudices and bigotry induced them to reject the offers of the Engliſh general, and to expoſe themſelves to deſtruction, by joining the ſcalping parties of Indians, who attacked the Engliſh ſtraggling parties, and put them to death with circumſtances of horrid cruelty. Shocked and exaſperated by theſe inhuman tranſactions, the generous Wolfe diſpatched a letter to the French general, complaining of the frequent enormities committed, as wholly repugnant to the rules of war obſerved by civilized people, diſhonourable to the French nation, and diſgraceful to humanity; and ſaying, that if the Canadians and Indians were not reſtrained from ſuch horrid proceedings, he ſhould be under the diſagreeable neceſſity of retaliating upon the perſons of ſuch priſoners as then were, or might afterwards become, ſubject to his power. Notwithſtanding the above remonſtrance, they ſtill perſiſted in their infernal practices; and general Wolfe judged it prudent to connive at ſome irregularities committed by his own people, in order that what could not be effected by lenient methods, might be accompliſhed by intimidation. M. de Montcalm, the French general, had taken the field at the head of five regular regiments, and formed his encampment in a very advantageous ſituation. The city of Quebec was ſtrongly fortified, well ſupplied with proviſions and ammunition, and defended by a ſtrong garriſon. General Wolfe, upon receiving intelligence that a detachment of the enemy, with a train of artillery, had taken poſt at Point Levi on the ſouth ſhore, oppoſite the city of Quebec, he reſolved to diſlodge them before they ſhould have time to intrench themſelves. He diſpatched general Monckton, at the head of four battalions, and in the night theſe troops paſſed the river; and the following morning, after ſkirmiſhing with ſome of the enemy's irregulars, compelled them to abandon that poſt, which the Engliſh themſelves immediately poſſeſſed.

Now M. de Montcalm was convinced of his error, in not fortifying Point Levi; and foreſeeing the effect of the battery raiſed by the Engliſh, he detached ſixteen hundred men acroſs the river to deſtroy the works, which were not yet completed; but this attempt proved unſucceſsful. Upon their landing the detachment fell into diſorder, fired upon each other, and retreated in confuſion, before the Engliſh could come up to ſhare in the action. The battery was now finiſhed, and the cannon was employed with ſuch ſucceſs, that in a ſhort time the upper town received conſiderable damage, and the lower one was entirely deſtroyed.

All this time the fleet was expoſed to the moſt imminent danger. The troops were no ſooner landed on the iſland of Orleans, than the wind increaſed to a furious ſtorm, which blew with ſuch violence, that many of the tranſports ran foul of each other, and were diſabled; a number of boats and ſmall craft foundered, and ſeveral large ſhips loſt their anchors. The enemy, ſuppoſing this ſtorm muſt have produced great confuſion among the Britiſh ſquadron, reſolved to take advantage of it; for which purpoſe they prepared ſeven fire ſhips, and at midnight ſent them down from Quebec among the tranſports. This ſcheme, however, was entirely defeated by the vigilance of the Engliſh admiral, and the courage of the ſailors, who undauntedly boarded the fire-ſhips, and towed them faſt on ſhore with incredible expedition, where they lay burning to the water's edge, without having done the leaſt part of that execution for which they were deſigned. A ſecond attempt of that kind was ſoon after made, and with as little ſucceſs as the former. The works for the ſecurity of the hoſpital, and the ſtores on the iſland of Orleans, being now completed, the Britiſh forces croſſed the north channel in boats, and landing under the cover of two ſloops, encamped on the ſide of the river Montmorenci, which ſeparated them from the left of the enemy. Next morning a company of rangers, poſted in a wood to cover ſome workmen, were attacked by the French Indians and put to flight; but our neareſt troops advancing, the Indians were, in their turn, repulſed with great loſs. General Wolfe now thought it would be moſt adviſeable to defer attacking the French army till he had ſurveyed the river St. Lawrence above Quebec, where he hoped to find a place more favourable for a deſcent. Having made the admiral acquainted with his deſign, two men of war, two armed ſloops, and ſeveral tranſports with troops on board were ſent up the river, and they paſſed the city without receiving any damage. The general himſelf being on board of this little armament, carefully ſurveyed the banks on the ſide of the enemy, which the nature of the ground rendered extremely difficult; and theſe difficulties were farther increaſed, by the works which the French general had cauſed to be thrown up. Thus diſappointed in his expectation, the general returned to Montmorenci.

For ſome time this truly great man was rendered incapable of performing his duty, owing to a fever and dyſentery brought on by a continual ſucceſſion of care, watchfulneſs and fatigue. His mind, however, was not in a ſtate of inactivity; for during the whole time of his confinement he held conſultations with his officers for the public utility. They agreed in opinion, that any farther attempts at Montmorenci would be of no effect, and that their principal operations ought to be carried on above the town, in order, if poſſible, to draw the enemy to an engagement. In conſequence of this reſolution, as ſoon as the general was ſomewhat recovered, the troops quitted their camp at Montmorenci, and, with the artillery, were re-imbarked, and landed at Point Levi. They then paſſed up the river in tranſports, while admiral Holmes made a movement with his ſhips, to amuſe the enemy poſted on the north ſhore. The weather being extremely bad, and the tranſports very much crowded, the general ordered half of the men to be landed on the ſouth ſhore for refreſhment. The plan of operations was now entirely changed, there appearing no poſſibility of attacking the enemy above the town. A ſcheme was formed and preſented by the three brigadiers, for conveying the troops farther down in boats, and landing them in the night within a league of Cape Diamond, in hopes of aſcending the heights of Abraham, which riſe abruptly with a ſteep aſcent from the banks of the river, that they might take poſſeſſion of the ground on the back of the city, in which place the fortifications were but indifferent. Hazardous as this undertaking was, Wolfe reſolved to attempt it; accordingly the time was fixed, and the neceſſary preparations made. Admiral Holmes, with his ſquadron, was ordered to move about three leagues farther up the river than the place appointed for the diſembarkation, in order to amuſe M. de Bougainville, whom Montcalm had detached to attend the motions of this ſquadron; but as ſoon as night came on he was to return down the river, that he might be ready to protect the landing of the forces. On the twelfth of September, about one in the morning, the firſt embarkation, conſiſting of four complete regiments of light infantry, commanded by colonel Howe, a detachment of highlanders, and the American grenadiers, was made in flat-bottomed boats, under the immediate command of the brigadiers Monckton and Murray, though general Wolfe accompanied them, and was one of the firſt who landed. They then fell down with the tide to the intended place of diſembarkation, rowing cloſe to the north ſhore, in order to find it the more eaſily; but by the rapidity of the tide, and the darkneſs of the night, the boats overſhot the mark, and the troops landed a little below the place intended. This was no ſooner accompliſhed, than the boats were ſent back for a ſecond embarkation, which was ſuperintended by brigadier Townſhend. In the mean time, colonel Howe, with the light infantry and highlanders, aſcended the precipices with amazing courage and activity; and in their way diſlodged a captain's guard, which defended a paſs, by which alone the reſt of the troops could reach the ſummit. The whole army then mounted without moleſtation, and the general drew them up in order as they arrived. The French general, M. de Montcalm, was no ſooner informed that the Engliſh had gained the heights of Abraham, than he reſolved to give them battle; and, having collected his whole force from the ſide of Beauport, immediately ſet forward on his march. General Wolfe perceived them croſſing the river St. Charles, upon which he began to form his own line, which conſiſted of ſix battalions and the Louiſburgh grenadiers; the right commanded by brigadier Monckton, and the left by brigadier Murray. Colonel Howe, with his light infantry, was poſted in the rear of the left. The manner in which Montcalm advanced, plainly ſhewed that his deſign was to flank the left of the Engliſh; and accordingly brigadier Townſhend was ſent thither with the regiment of Amherſt, which he formed, preſenting a double front to the enemy. He was afterwards reinforced by two battalions; and the reſerve conſiſted of one regiment, drawn up in eight ſubdiviſions, with large intervals. About nine in the morning, the enemy advanced to the charge with great order and reſolution, though their fire was both irregular and ineffectual. The Engliſh reſerved all their ſhot till the French approached within forty yards of their line, when they poured in a violent diſcharge, and continued the fire with ſuch ſpirit and activity, as could not fail of doing terrible execution. The general had fixed himſelf where the attack was moſt warm; and ſtanding conſpicuous in the very front of the line, he was aimed at by the enemy's markſmen, and received a ſhot in the wriſt, which did not, however, oblige him to quit the field; for wrapping his handkerchief about it, he continued to give his orders without the leaſt emotion, and advanced at the head of the grenadiers with their bayonets fixed, when another ball unfortunately entered the breaſt of this young hero, who fell at the moment when victory was crowning all his labours with ſucceſs; for at this very inſtant every regiment of the Britiſh army ſeemed to exert itſelf for the honour of its own peculiar character. While the right puſhed on with their bayonets, brigadier Murray advanced briſkly with the troops under his command, and ſoon broke the center of the enemy; the highlanders then drawing their broadſwords, fell in among them with irreſiſtible fury, and drove them with great ſlaughter into the town and works they had raiſed at the bridge over the river St. Charles. The command now devolved on brigadier Townſhend, who haſtened to the center; and finding the troops diſordered by the purſuit, formed them again with great expedition. This taſk was ſcarce accompliſhed, when M. de Bougainville, with a body of two thouſand freſh men, appeared in the rear of the Engliſh. He had begun his march from Cape Rouge, as ſoon as he had received intelligence that the Britiſh troops had gained the heights of Abraham; but could not arrive time enough to have any ſhare in the action. Two battalions, with two pieces of artillery, were immediately ordered to advance againſt him, who at their approach retired among woods and ſwamps, where general Townſhend did not think it prudent to follow them. M. de Montcalm was mortally wounded in the battle, and taken to Quebec, where he died. His ſecond in command was left wounded on the field, and next day expired on board an Engliſh ſhip, to which he had been conveyed; about one thouſand of the enemy were made priſoners, including a great number of officers, and about five hundred were ſlain on the field of battle. The remains of their army, after they had reinforced the garriſon of Quebec, retired to Port au Tremble, from whence they proceeded to Jaques Quartiers, where they remained intrenched, till compelled to make the beſt of their way to Trois Riviéres and Montreal, by the ſeverity of the weather.

GENERAL WOLFE

In this memorable action the Engliſh had only fifty men killed, and about five hundred wounded. But the death of general Wolfe was a national loſs, as he might be juſtly placed among the greateſt generals of the age. When the fatal ball which put a period to his life firſt ſtruck his breaſt, he was carried to a ſmall diſtance in the rear, where, ſupported by an Engliſh grenadier, and a particular friend, he received the welcome news by his ſervant who had long attended him, that the French were defeated, and even ſeeking their ſafety by a precipitate flight. Rouzed by this cheering information, the young hero, though then in the agonies of death, opened his eyes, replying with a trembling accent, "Then I die contented," and expired immediately. This gallant youth ſeemed formed by nature, for reaching the ſummit of military greatneſs; and by the moſt aſſiduous application had ſo greatly improved the talents he had received, that he may be conſidered as the wonder of his age. Nor was he the leaſt deficient in the ſocial virtues of life; he ſought for deſerving objects, and relieved their wants. Firm and ſincere in his friendſhips, gentle and conciliating in his manners; a friend to juſtice, and a warm champion for the honour and liberties of his country, he was beloved and eſteemed by every man of virtue, probity, and honour. It will be unneceſſary then to add, that he died univerſally regretted.

On the twelfth of September this glorious battle was fought; and on the eighteenth, the enemy perceiving that the communication between the town and the army was cut off, and that the Engliſh fleet and troops were preparing for a vigorous ſiege, ſurrendered Quebec upon very advantageous terms; by which they were allowed the free exerciſe of their religion, and the poſſeſſion of their civil rights, till a general peace ſhould determine their future condition. A garriſon of five thouſand men under general Murray, was put into the place; and the fleet ſoon after ſailed for England, where the news of this important conqueſt of the capital of Canada, was received with extraordinary marks of joy by all ranks of people; at the ſame time the death of the brave general Wolfe created throughout the nation univerſal concern.

The Britiſh arms were not leſs ſucceſsful in the Eaſt Indies, than on the other ſide the Atlantic. Colonel Ford, who had the command of the troops in Bengal, obtained a complete victory near Maſulipatam, over M. Conſlans, the French commander, and entered the place in a triumphant manner. At the ſame time colonel Maitland was detached from Bombay with fifteen hundred ſeapoys, and nine hundred European troops, to inveſt the town and caſtle of Surat; which places he attacked with ſo much vigour that they both ſurrendered, on condition that the inhabitants ſhould be allowed to ſecure their property. In the mean time, the Engliſh and French commanders warmly contended for ſuperiority at ſea. On the ninth of September, vice-admiral Pocock deſcried the French fleet, and at ſix o'clock the following morning a ſpirited engagement commenced, which was continued till four in the afternoon, when the rear of the French gave way; and this example was ſoon followed by the van. The Engliſh having ſuſtained very conſiderable damage in their maſts and rigging, were not in a condition to purſue. Captain Mitchie, who commanded the Newcaſtle, captain Gore of the marines, five inferior officers, and upwards of three hundred fore-maſt men were ſlain; and the captains Somerſet and Brereton, with about two hundred and fifty men were wounded. The French, in order that their ſhips might undergo neceſſary repairs, directed their courſe towards the iſland of Mauritius, leaving the Engliſh maſters of the Indian coaſt; and this ſuperiority was confirmed by the arrival of four ſhips of the line, commanded by rear-admiral Corniſh, who joined admiral Pocock at Madras, on the eighteenth of October.

The French were the only profeſſed enemies with whom the Engliſh had to contend in this quarter; but the Dutch, inſtigated by envy and avarice, and countenanced by the governor of Batavia, ſeized ſeveral ſmall veſſels, on pretence of retaliating affronts offered to them by the ſubjects of Great Britain. In a ſhort time after, the Calcutta Eaſt Indiaman, commanded by captain Wilſon, ſailing down the river, the Dutch commodore ſignified to him, that he would fire upon him if he attempted to paſs. Not being in a condition to oppoſe the Dutch commander, captain Wilſon returned to Calcutta, where two other Indiamen were lying at anchor, and reported his adventure to colonel Clive. Hereupon the colonel ordered the three ſhips to prepare for offering battle to the Dutch commodore; and having each taken on board two additional twelve pounders, they fell down the river, and on their approach the Dutch drew up in a line of battle. Three of the Dutch ſhips carried thirty-ſix guns each; the ſame number carried twenty-nine; and the other nineteen. The Duke of Dorſet being neareſt the enemy, captain Wilſon, who acted as commodore, fired a gun as a ſignal for her to begin the engagement, and ſhe immediately came to an anchor cloſe to the enemy. A dead calm unfortunately coming on, the Duke of Dorſet was, for a conſiderable time, expoſed to the whole fire of the enemy; but a breeze ſpringing up, the Hardwick and Calcutta advanced to her aſſiſtance, and a ſmart conteſt was for ſome time maintained. Two of the Dutch ſhips at length ſlipped their cables and bore away, and a third was driven on ſhore. The Dutch commodore being thus weakened, his remaining four ſhips ſtruck to captain Wilſon. In this ſharp conteſt the Engliſh had not a ſingle man ſlain; a circumſtance the more remarkable, as the Duke of Dorſet was almoſt torn to pieces, about ninety ſhot having penetrated her hull. Having taken poſſeſſion of the prizes, captain Wilſon ſent the priſoners to Calcutta to be diſpoſed of by colonel Clive. The Engliſh were alſo ſucceſsful on the coaſt of Coromandel. Colonel Coote inveſted and reduced the Fort of Wandewaſh, and defeated the French army under the command of general Lally. The atchievements performed by colonel Coote during a long and laborious campaign, were productive of great advantages to his country, and to himſelf proportionable honour.

Having now done with the eaſtern quarter of the globe, we ſhall take a ſurvey of the ſcene of war on the continent of Europe. The apprehenſion of the ſpeedy death of the king of Spain, had very materially affected the political ſyſtem in general. Yielding to the force of conjugal affection, this ſovereign had, ſince the deceaſe of his conſort, indulged a melancholy, which operated ſo powerfully upon him, that the inevitable conſequence was expected to be his ſpeedy diſſolution, or a total extinction of the rational faculties. The next in ſucceſſion to the crown of Spain was Don Carlos, king of Naples; and it had been ſtipulated by the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, that the duchies of Parma, Guſtalla, and Placentia, ſhould be reſtored to the houſe of Auſtria. The affairs of England and France were connected with the general ſyſtem, yet partly diſtinct and independent. France perceived from the increaſing power of the Engliſh in America, and the feeble condition of her own navy, that all farther attempts in that quarter of the world muſt neceſſarily fail, and that her efforts were therefore to be made in Europe, with two objects principally in view, the recovery of Hanover, and the invaſion of England. In the firſt of theſe projects they could not reaſonably promiſe themſelves any very capital advantage, even in caſe of every poſſible ſucceſs; and with regard to the ſecond, the threats of a deſcent had ſerved to increaſe the internal ſtrength of Great Britain, without producing the leaſt apprehenſion or alarm in the kingdom; and at this time the meaſures of the Engliſh miniſtry, and the mode of proſecuting the war were ſo popular, that the utmoſt harmony prevailed among people of all ranks and conditions. Ferdinand, who ſtill commanded the allied army, had been now ſtrengthened by reinforcements from England, and recruits from different parts of Germany. He had already concerted a plan of operations for the enſuing campaign, the principal object of which was, the extirpation of the enemy from Frankfort, before the reinforcements which they expected could arrive. Having reſolved to undertake this enterprize, he collected all his forces in the neighbourhood of Fulda; and on the tenth of April, he began his march at the head of an army amounting to forty thouſand men. On the thirteenth he came in ſight of the enemy, whom he found ſtrongly encamped about the village of Bergen, between Frankfort and Hanau. The duke de Broglio, the general of the French army, who was eſteemed one of the beſt officers in the ſervice, upon gaining intelligence of the deſign of prince Ferdinand, took poſſeſſion of this poſt on the twelfth, the right of his army being at Bergen, and his center and flanks ſo ſecured, that the allies could only attack them by the village. But notwithſtanding the advantageous ſituation of the enemy, prince Ferdinand reſolved to give them battle, and made the neceſſary diſpoſitions for that purpoſe. After being repulſed in three ſeveral attacks, he made a new diſpoſition, and brought up his artillery, by means of which he ſeverely cannonaded the village, and damaged ſeveral parts of the French lines. But the ſituation of the enemy was ſuch, as to ſecure them from very eſſential injury; they were, however, ſo effectually amuſed by the artful diſpoſition of prince Ferdinand, that inſtead of taking meaſures for harraſſing him in his retreat, they were only ſolicitous to maintain their ſituation, and, in caſe of another attack, be in readineſs.

It was now the allies began to experience the ill conſequences of the miſcarriage at Bergen. In the neighbourhoods of Duſſeldorp and Crevelt, the French obtained plenty of proviſions, while a great dearth of all kinds of neceſſaries prevailed in the allied army, that part of the country which they occupied being already exhauſted, and their ſupplies being conveyed from a great diſtance. The article of forage alone was attended with an expence ſo enormous, as to alarm the Britiſh miniſtry, who judged it prudent to appoint an inſpector, to prevent all kinds of frauds and extortions in future. The French army being encamped at Stadburg, the duke de Broglio, who commanded the right wing, advanced from Caſſel into the territories of Hanover, where he took poſſeſſion of Gottingen without oppoſition; and as the enemy advanced, prince Ferdinand was under the neceſſity of retiring; but he left ſtrong garriſons at Lipſtadt, Retherg, and Minden. Yet ſo rapid was the progreſs of the French arms, that there appeared every reaſon to believe they would be attended with ſucceſs. Prince Ferdinand, however, kept himſelf unmoved, and ſteadily attentive to the proſecution of his deſigns. After taking Minden, the body of the French army poſted themſelves in the neighbourhood of that city, to which the right of their forces extended; their left was protected by a very ſteep hill, an extenſive moraſs was in their front, and their rear was covered by a rivulet. The allied army advanced to Peterſhagen, where they pitched their camp in a very advantageous ſituation. An immediate engagement now appeared to be the only event which could diſappoint the French in their intention of eſtabliſhing their winter-quarters in the electorate of Hanover; and the allies could not attack them in the camp they at preſent occupied, with any proſpect of advantage. In this critical ſituation of affairs, prince Ferdinand diſplayed ſuch quick penetration, ſteady fortitude, and undaunted valour, as proved him to be qualified for the moſt important military enterprizes. On the twenty-ninth of July he marched from his camp on the Weſer, towards a village at a conſiderable diſtance on the right, named Hillen, at the head of the greater part of his army. On the preceding day, he diſpatched the hereditary prince, with ſix thouſand men, to make a compaſs towards the left flank of the enemy, and to poſt himſelf in ſuch a manner, as to cut off the communication of their convoys from Paderborn. He had alſo left, on the banks of the Weſer, a body of troops, under the command of general Wangenheim, extending to the town of Thornhauſen, where they were intrenched, and ſupported by a conſiderable train of artillery. Theſe motions being obſerved by the generals of the adverſe army, they ſummoned a council of war, and the reſult of their deliberations was to purſue meaſures which precipitated them into the ſnare prepared for them. They imagined that the allied army was divided and diſjoined, and therefore reſolved not to neglect ſo favourable an opportunity for attacking general Wangenheim, who they knew was at the head of only a ſmall body of forces, and ſuppoſed to be at too great a diſtance from the main body of the army to receive any relief. Broglio was to lead the attack, by falling upon the body of troops laying near the river. The duke advanced in full confidence of ſucceſs; but he had no ſooner gained an eminence which lay along his front, than he was ſtruck with the utmoſt aſtoniſhment; for, inſtead of a few poſts weakly guarded, he beheld the whole army of the allies drawn up in moſt excellent order, and extending from the banks of the Weſer to the moraſs, directly in the front of the French camp. The motions of the enemy were for a time entirely ſtopped by this unexpected diſcovery; they were hemmed in between the allies, the moraſs, and the river; and from this diſagreeable ſituation, they found no poſſibility of receding. An obſtinate engagement enſued. The weight of the battle was, in a great meaſure, ſuſtained by the Engliſh infantry, and ſome corps of Hanoverians, who, with a degree of intrepidity that has never been exceeded, ſtood the reiterated charges of the ſeveral bodies of the enemy's cavalry, which they at length completely routed. Two brigades of foot attempted to ſupport the French horſe, but they ſoon fled before the Engliſh infantry. The regiments under Waldegrave and Kingſley, diſtinguiſhed themſelves on this occaſion in a very honourable manner. The enemy's cavalry, which compoſed their center, being entirely defeated; and their right wing, which had attacked Wangenheim, unable to maintain the conteſt, a retreat evidently appeared to be their deſign. At this very critical juncture, prince Ferdinand diſpatched orders to lord George Sackville, who commanded the whole Britiſh, and ſeveral brigades of German cavalry, to advance. But lord George urged, that his orders were not ſufficiently explicit, and deſired an explanation: the delay conſequent hereon, deprived the Britiſh cavalry of an opportunity of ſharing in the glory of the action, and at the ſame time enabled the enemy to retreat with ſome regularity, favoured by the circumſtances of being in poſſeſſion of Minden, and under the command of ſo brave and prudent a general as the duke de Broglio. Though the French loſt the honour of the day, and were diſappointed in their expectations, their loſſes, and diſgraces were not irreparable, nor could the battle of Minden be deemed deciſive; nor would the iſſue of this encounter have proved ſo favourable to the Engliſh, had not prince Ferdinand detached the hereditary prince in the manner above recited. At five in the morning of that memorable day, the young hero attacked a large body of French forces commanded by the duke de Briſac; and theſe troops he entirely defeated, and compelled to fly to Minden for refuge. This event inſured ſucceſs to the allies, over an enemy of great ſuperiority in point of numbers. All the paſſages through which the French could receive either reinforcements or proviſions, were taken poſſeſſion of by the allies; and therefore the enemy was under the neceſſity of abandoning their ſtrong poſts. They fled through Minden, and paſſing the Weſer, advanced to the eaſtward of that river. Thus they retreated, under a variety of diſagreeable circumſtances, and loſt every advantage they had acquired during the preceding part of the campaign. The loſs of the allies in this action did not exceed two thouſand men; but the enemy had about ſeven thouſand killed, wounded, and taken priſoners. The Engliſh troops, who acquired the greateſt ſhare of glory, ſuſtained the greateſt loſs; the number of killed and wounded being about twelve hundred.

Prince Ferdinand, the day following that on which the battle was fought, paid due honours to thoſe gallant corps of both Engliſh and Hanoverians, having iſſued immediate orders for returning his thanks to ſuch regiments and officers, as had diſtinguiſhed themſelves in the action: but theſe orders contained ſome expreſſions, which ſeemed to convey a very ſevere reflection on the commander in chief of the Britiſh forces; the conſequence of which was, that in a few days after the battle his lordſhip reſigned his command, and returned home, where, in a ſhort time, he was deprived of all his military employments, and declared incapable of ſerving his majeſty in any military character; a ſentence, to a man of honour, worſe than death itſelf. The Marquis of Granby ſucceeded in his command.

The noble prince Ferdinand having ſupplied Minden with a ſufficient garriſon, proceeded to Hervorden; and the hereditary prince croſſed the Weſer at Hamelin in order to purſue the enemy, who kept retreating before him, while he ſeized every opportunity of attacking their rear, took the greateſt part of their baggage, and drove them from every place they occupied in Weſtphalia. The allied army in the mean time, advanced by regular marches; and prince Ferdinand having ſecured Caſſel, the garriſon of which had ſurrendered to the hereditary prince, detached general Imhoff with a body of troops to reduce the city of Munſter, which he accordingly began to batter with great fury; but M. d'Armentieres advanced to its relief, and obliged general Imhoff to abandon the ſiege; who being ſoon after reinforced, marched back to Munſter, and obliged the French commander to retreat in his turn; but the ſiege of this important place was not regularly undertaken till November, when it was formally inveſted, and the operations carried on with ſuch vigour, that, in a few days, the city ſurrendered on capitulation. After this, prince Ferdinand proceeded with the army to Neidar-Weimar, and there fixed his camp; while Contades remained at Gieſſen, on the ſouth ſide of the river Lahne, where he was joined by the marſhal d'Eſtrées. Contades and Broglio had mutually accuſed each other of miſconduct; but the latter ſeemed to gain credit at the court of Verſailles, and in a little time he aſſumed the command of the French army; while Contades, d'Eſtrées, and ſeveral other general officers who were ſenior to Broglio, received orders to return to Paris. In the mean time the duke of Wirtemberg having occupied the town of Fulda, the hereditary prince reſolved to beat up his quarters. In conſequence of this reſolution, on the twenty-eighth of November he began his march from Marpurg, at the head of a ſelect body of forces, and on the thirtieth, about one in the morning, arrived before Fulda. The troops of Wirtemberg, who were detached about in ſmall parties, retired haſtily into the town, whither they were followed by the hereditary prince, who purſued them to the other ſide of it, where four battalions were routed and taken; while the duke himſelf, with the reſt of his forces, filed off on the other ſide of Fulda, and the prince advanced to Rupertenrade, ſituated on the right of the French army. This motion obliged the duke de Broglio to relinquiſh Gieſſen, and retire to Friedberg, where he fixed his head quarters. The allied army immediately took poſſeſſion of his camp at Kleinlinnes and Heuchelem, where they began to make preparations for the ſiege of Gieſſen; but the ſeverity of the ſeaſon rendered the deſign abortive; prince Ferdinand therefore thought proper to detach the hereditery prince at the head of twelve thouſand men to the aſſiſtance of the king of Pruſſia, who ſuffered greatly this campaign by the Auſtrian and Ruſſian armies. The allied army being thus weakened, Broglio thought it a favourable opportunity for attacking them to advantage. Accordingly, on the twenty-fifth of December, he advanced towards their camp, but found them ſo well diſpoſed to receive him, that he thought proper to abandon his enterprize, and return to his former quarters. The allies then quitted Kleinlinnes and proceeded to Coſdorf, where they were cantoned till the beginning of January, when they fell back as far as Marpurg, where prince Ferdinand eſtabliſhed his head-quarters.

Having thus given a particular detail of the operations of this campaign, as far as they relate to us, we ſhall return to our domeſtic concerns. The parliament, on the fourteenth of November, met at Weſtminſter, when the ſeſſions was opened by commiſſion, and the lord-keeper made a ſpeech to both houſes, recapitulating our uncommon ſucceſſes in every part of the globe this campaign, and, in his majeſty's name, congratulating the parliament thereon. Addreſſes from both houſes being preſented, the commons proceeded to ſettle the ſupply, which this year amounted to ſixteen millions on hundred thirty thouſand, five hundred and ſixty-one pounds, nine ſhillings and eight-pence. On the eleventh of January in this year, died the princeſs-dowager of Orange and Naſſau, governante of the United Provinces, and eldeſt daughter of his Britannic majeſty, who was informed of this melancholy event by a letter from the ſtates-general, wherein they condoled with him on the irreparable loſs which he, as well as they had ſuſtained; and aſſured him they would employ all their care and attention in ſecuring and defending the rights and intereſts of the young ſtadtholder, and the princeſs his ſiſter, whom they conſidered as children of the republic. The death of this amiable princeſs was ſoon followed by that of the princeſs Elizabeth Caroline, ſecond daughter of his royal highneſs Frederic, prince of Wales, who departed this life at Kew, aged only nineteen.

A. D. 1760.

M. de Thurot, after having alarmed the coaſts of England and Scotland, arrived, in January, on the coaſt of Ireland, and threw that kingdom into great conſternation. On the twenty-firſt of February he made a deſcent at Carrickfergus with ſix hundred men; and notwithſtanding the ſpirited defence of colonel Jennings, whoſe ſoldiers were raw and undiſciplined, got poſſeſſion of the town and caſtle; but the country crouding in from all parts to oppoſe their invaders, Thurot haſtily embarked, and near the Iſle of Man was met by captain Elliot of the Æolus, captain Logie of the Pallas, and captain Clements of the Brilliant, who, after a ſmart engagement, in which Thurot was ſlain, took his little ſquadron, the Belleiſle of forty-four guns, La Blond of thirty-two guns, and the Terpſichore of twenty-ſix guns, at the expence of about forty men killed and wounded; but the loſs of the French exceeded three hundred. Early this year, the Ramilies, a fine ſecond rate, was wrecked on the Bolt head near Plymouth, in her return with admiral Boſcawen from Quiberon bay; and all her officers and men, amounting to ſeven hundred, periſhed, a midſhipman and twenty-five marines only being ſaved. On the twenty-ſecond of May the parliament continued ſitting, when a great number of bills were paſſed into laws by commiſſion, after which the ſeſſion was cloſed by the lord-keeper.

The Cherokee Indians on the back of Carolina, in North America, being inſtigated by the French, broke the peace with the Engliſh, having plundered, maſſacred, and ſcalped many Britiſh ſubjects. Upon this, Mr. Lyttleton, governor of South Carolina, raiſed a body of forces, and marched into their country with ſuch ſpirit and reſolution, that they being intimidated ſued for peace; and a new treaty was agreed upon, in which it was ſtipulated, that ſatisfaction ſhould be made for the damages ſuſtained by the Engliſh, and that the delinquents ſhould be puniſhed. But no ſooner was the governor returned, than the Indians attempted to ſurpriſe Fort George, and butchered all the Engliſh traders in their country; after which they maſſacred forty of the defenceleſs inhabitants of the back ſettlements. Upon this, general Amherſt detached colonel Montgomery with a body of twelve hundred men to chaſtize the Cherokees, who marching into their country deſtroyed every village and houſe in the lower nation, put a great number to death, and brought off forty women and children priſoners to Fort George. They afterwards made an irruption into their middle ſettlements, deſtroying all before them with fire and ſword. The Indians, in revenge, attacked Fort Loudun, and after granting a capitulation, maſſacred the greateſt part of the garriſon in their march to Carolina. While our arms were thus employed in the ſouthern parts of America, M. de Levis, with twelve thouſand men, reſolved to attempt the recovery of Quebec; and approaching that city, general Murray, on the twenty-eighth of April, marched out againſt him with about three thouſand men. A warm engagement enſued, in which the Engliſh loſt a thouſand men killed and wounded; and being overpowered by numbers, retreated into the city. Levis laid ſiege thereto, and the governor with his garriſon made a vigorous defence. But at this time lord Colville, with a fleet from Halifax, arriving in the river St. Lawrence, deſtroyed and took the French veſſels that attended their army; on which Levis inſtantly raiſed the ſiege, leaving behind him all his artillery, with a great part of his ammunition and baggage. Vaudreuil, the French governor of Canada, after Levis had been compelled to raiſe the ſiege, fixed his head-quarters at Montreal, and there collected the whole regular force that remained in Canada. Brigadier-general Murray had orders to advance towards Montreal, with all the troops which could be ſpared from the garriſon of Quebec. Colonel Haviland ſailed thither from Crown Point; and Amherſt, with an army of about ten thouſand men, proceeded by the way of Lake Ontario, into the river St. Lawrence. At length, after a fatiguing voyage of two months and ſeventeen days, they reached Montreal almoſt at the ſame time; when Vaudreuil, ſeeing himſelf entirely incloſed by three armies, ſurrendered the garriſon of Montreal and all Canada on the eighth of September, on condition that the inhabitants ſhould enjoy their religion and effects; and that thoſe of the French, who ſhould chuſe to return to France, ſhould be tranſported thither. Thus was the conqueſt of Canada completed to the great honour of the Britiſh arms; and that vaſt country reduced to the obedience of the king of England. In the courſe of this ſummer, captain Byron, with three of his majeſty's ſhips, deſtroyed a French ſettlement in the bay of Chaleur. He there took three frigates, and nineteen ſmaller veſſels, and burned the town of Chaleur. Nothing now remained to be done in North America, but the demolition of the fortifications of Louiſbourg on the iſland of Cape Breton; for which purpoſe ſome able engineers had been diſpatched from England. By means of mines artfully diſpoſed, the fortifications were reduced to a heap of rubbiſh, the glacis was levelled, and the ditches were filled. All the artillery, ammunition, and implements of war, were tranſported to Halifax; but the barracks were repaired, ſo as to accommodate three hundred men occaſionally; while the hoſpital, and private houſes, remained as they were.

The Britiſh arms were equally ſucceſsful in the Eaſt Indies. After the reduction of Arcot, the garriſons of Permacoil and Allumparva ſurrendered themſelves priſoners of war in the beginning of May. The important ſettlement of Carical was reduced by the ſea and land forces commanded by rear-admiral Corniſh and major Monſon, and the French garriſons made priſoners of war. Colonel Coote, having defeated the French general Lally in the field, and ſubdued ſeveral of the enemy's ſettlements on the coaſt of Coromandel, at length ſhut them up within the walls of Pondicherry, which was well fortified, and defended by a numerous garriſon. Five ſhips of the line, commanded by captain Haldane, blocked it up by ſea, while colonel Coote carried on the ſiege by land, which was delayed for ſome time by the exceſſive rains; but on the eighth of December, four batteries which colonel Coote had erected were all opened at midnight, and though placed at a conſiderable diſtance, they did great execution. The garriſon defended the town with aſtoniſhing reſolution till about the middle of January, when all the inhabitants being in danger of periſhing by hunger, the principal of the Jeſuits, accompanied by two civilians, came out, and offered terms of capitulation, which conduct the governor was far from approving of; for he ſent out at the ſame time a paper full of invectives againſt the Engliſh, for the breach of treaties relative to India; adding, that theſe breaches rendered him incapable of propoſing any conditions. It may therefore be ſaid, that he rather ſuffered the Engliſh forces to take poſſeſſion of the place, than that he ſurrendered it: as he refuſed to capitulate, the propoſals of the inhabitants were little regarded; and the city of Pondicherry, with a garriſon of about fourteen hundred European ſoldiers, a vaſt quantity of military ſtores, and great riches, were given up to the conqueror at diſcretion.

This year, the enemy's corps, in Germany, under M. Broglio, conſiſted of near one hundred thouſand effective men; beſides thirty thouſand, drawn out of their quarters in Duſſeldorp, Cleves, Cologn, and Weſel; which being completed by draughts from France, formed a ſeparate army on the Rhine, under the count de St. Germain. At the opening of this campaign, we had in Germany twelve regiments of heavy, and one of light horſe; and twelve regiments, with two highland battalions of foot, the whole amounting to about twenty-two thouſand men; but in the courſe of the ſummer they were further reinforced to near twenty-five thouſand. The allied fell very ſhort of the French army in numbers, but they exceeded it in quality of the troops; thoſe newly arrived from England were freſh, but not undiſciplined; and the old, though harraſſed, were accuſtomed to victory. The campaign was opened very late; for the allied army did not march from their cantonments till May the fifth.

Advice being received that the count de St. Germain was in motion, prince Ferdinand began his march from Ziegenheim, and on the ninth of July reached the heights of Brunau, in the neighbourhood of Wildurgen; while the hereditary prince, at the head of the advanced corps, reinforced with ſome battalions and ſquadrons under major-general Griffin, was ſent forwards to Saxenhauſen, whither the army followed the next morning. The hereditary prince continuing to advance, found the enemy already formed at Corbach; but ſuppoſing their whole force did not exceed ten thouſand infantry and ſeventeen ſquadrons, he reſolved to give them battle. Accordingly he attacked them, and the action became very warm and obſtinate; but the ſuperiority of the enemy rendered all the efforts of the prince ineffectual, and prince Ferdinand was at too great a diſtance to aſſiſt him. He therefore made the proper diſpoſitions for a retreat, which proved a very difficult taſk; for ſome bodies of the German troops, both horſe and foot, fell into great confuſion, which the enemy perceiving, puſhed forward upon them with irreſiſtible fury, and in all probability, the whole infantry of the allies would have been cut off, had not the hereditary prince put himſelf at the head of Bland's and Howard's regiments of dragoons, and charged the enemy with ſuch impetuoſity as ſoon ſtopped their career, and enabled the allies to make an undiſturbed retreat to Saxenhauſen. In this engagement the hereditary prince was wounded; about five hundred men were killed, and fifteen pieces of cannon taken. On the ſixteenth of July prince Ferdinand attacked the enemy near the village of Exdorff, and, after a warm diſpute, victory declared for the allies. Five battalions of the enemy, including the commander in chief, and the prince of Anhalt Cothen, were taken, with ſix pieces of cannon, and all their arms, baggage, and artillery. All this time the duke de Broglio remained encamped on the heights of Corbach, during which, ſome detachments he had ſent for that purpoſe reduced the caſtles of Marpurg and Dillemburg, the garriſons of both theſe places being obliged to ſurrender themſelves priſoners of war. About this period, ſeveral of the French generals threw up their commiſſions in diſguſt; among theſe was the count de St. Germain, who was ſucceeded by the chevalier de Muy. On the thirteenth of July the troops were again put in motion; and both armies having paſſed the Dymel, prince Ferdinand reſolved to give the French corps under M. de Muy battle. The proper diſpoſitions were accordingly made; and almoſt at the ſame inſtant the enemy were attacked both in flank and in rear with equal ſucceſs; and unable to withſtand the fury of the Britiſh cavalry they betook themſelves to flight, leaving about fifteen hundred men killed or wounded in the field of battle, with ten pieces of cannon; and the ſame number were taken priſoners. On the evening of the battle, the marquis of Granby, with twelve battalions and ten ſquadrons, received orders to paſs the river in purſuit of the enemy; but they had retired to Wolfſhagen, and the marquis encamped at Wilda, about four miles from Warbourgh, the heights of which were occupied by the enemy's grand army. Prince Ferdinand, by this victory, was enabled to maintain his communication with Weſtphalia, and prevent the enemy from approaching Hanover; but at the ſame time he was obliged to ſacrifice the country of Caſſel; for prince Xavier of Saxony, at the head of a detached body, advanced towards that city, which he made himſelf maſter of; he then reduced Munden, Gottingen, and Elmbeck, in the electorate of Hanover; and it was not long before the garriſon of Ziegenheim, conſiſting of ſeven hundred men, were obliged, after a vigorous reſiſtance, to ſurrender themſelves priſoners of war. In the mean time prince Ferdinand employed himſelf in ſecuring poſts and paſſes, in order to retard the progreſs of the enemy, and in ſending detachments to harraſs and ſurprize their advanced parties, which ſervice was moſt ſucceſsfully performed.

It was now apparent that whilſt the enemy's communication with the Rhine, and with Frankfort on the Maine, continued open, it would be to very little purpoſe to attempt any thing either for the relief of Gottingen or Caſſel. The prince had, indeed, checked their progreſs into Hanover; but while they continued in ſo advanced a poſition, it was evidently impoſſible to prevent their making very ruinous inroads into that country. He did not think it prudent to force them to a battle; ſo that the only reſource left, was to make frequent and ſtrong detachments into the ſouthern parts of Heſſe and Wetteravia, and thus render the enemy's communication with the Rhine and Maine, from whence they drew the greateſt part of their ſupplies of all kinds, precarious. In the month of September the hereditary prince quitted the grand army of the allies, and with twenty battalions and ten ſquadrons having traverſed Weſtphalia, he appeared on the Lower Rhine, marching by Schermbech and Duſſeldorp. On the twenty-ninth he ſent a large detachment over the river at Rocroot, which ſurprized part of the partizan Fiſcher's corps at Rhynberg, and ſcoured the country. Some other parties croſſing at Rees and Emerick, the next day took poſſeſſion of ſome redoubts which the French had raiſed along the banks of the river; and here they found a ſufficient number of boats to tranſport the reſt of the forces. The prince then advanced to Cleves, the garriſon of which he obliged to ſurrender priſoners of war on the third of October. In the mean time the French, being informed of his motions, detached M. de Caſtres after him, with thirty battalions and thirty-eight ſquadrons, and on the fourteenth of October they arrived at Rhynberg, where the prince's light troops were poſted. Theſe they immediately attacked, and compelled them to retreat, notwithſtanding all the efforts of the prince who commanded in perſon. Leaving five battalions at Rhynberg, the enemy proceeded by the left, and encamped behind the convent of Campen, where de Caſtres intended to wait for ſome reinforcements then on their march. But the hereditary prince reſolved to attack his camp that very night; and having left four battalions and five ſquadrons under general Bock, with orders to obſerve Rhynberg, and attack that poſt in caſe his attempt ſhould prove ſucceſsful, he began his march at ten in the evening. Before the allied forces could reach the enemy's camp, they were under the neceſſity of overpowering Fiſcher's corps of irregulars. This ſervice occaſioned ſome firing, the noiſe of which alarmed the French army: upon which their commander formed them with amazing expedition, and poſted them in a wood, where they were inſtantly attacked, and at firſt obliged to give ground; but they ſoon recovered their ranks, and ſuſtained an unceaſing fire of muſquetry from five in the morning till nine at night, when the hereditary prince thought proper to retreat. His loſs on this occaſion amounted to ſixteen hundred choice men, killed, wounded, and taken priſoners; and the chief of theſe were troops of Great Britain. Several Engliſh officers were dangerouſly wounded, and thoſe of lord Downe, an amiable young nobleman, proved mortal. By this time the Rhine was ſo exceedingly ſwelled by the rains, and the banks of it were overflowed in ſuch a manner, that it was judged neceſſary to repair and move the bridge, which had been thrown over the river lower down. This work was accordingly performed in the preſence of the enemy; and the prince paſſing over without moleſtation, proceeded to Brynen, where he fixed his head-quarters. Here he received advice that a body of the enemy intended to ſurprize him; upon which he called in his advanced poſts, and made preparations for giving them a warm reception. He abandoned the tents that were in front of his camp, and poſted his infantry in ambuſcade behind thoſe that were in the rear: at the ſame time he ordered ſome regiments of horſe and huſſars to take a compaſs, and fall upon the back of the enemy. The deſired ſucceſs attended this ſtratagem; for the French detachment thinking the allies had actually abandoned their camp, broke all order, and began to pillage the tents. The infantry then ſallied from their places of concealment, and fell upon them with irreſiſtible fury; the artillery opened, and the cavalry charged them in flank; and of twelve hundred of the enemy who marched from Weſel, ſcarce two hundred eſcaped. During theſe tranſactions, the duke de Broglio endeavoured to take advantage of the allied army on the other ſide the Weſer, while it was thus weakened by the abſence of the troops under the hereditary prince; but he found it impoſſible to ſurprize prince Ferdinand, and he was too ſtrongly ſituated to be attacked with any proſpect of ſucceſs. He therefore employed himſelf in waſting the country by detachments. Prince Ferdinand then withdrew into winter quarters, leaving the enemy in full poſſeſſion of Heſſe, and the whole country eaſtward of the Weſer to the frontiers of the electorate of Hanover.

It is neceſſary here to record a remarkable tranſaction which happened in England, during the courſe of this year. Laurence, earl Ferrers, a nobleman of a moſt violent ſpirit, and who, in the opinion of all who knew him had given evident proofs of inſanity, at laſt committed a premeditated murder on Mr. Johnſon, his ſteward. Lord Ferrers had ſome time before married a very amiable lady, but behaved to her in ſo brutal a manner, that application was made to the houſe of peers, and a ſeparation was effected by act of parliament. In conſequence of this ſtatute truſtees were appointed, and Johnſon was to receive the revenues of the earl's eſtate. This act of parliament exaſperated him to the higheſt degree; and ſuſpecting Johnſon to have joined with the reſt of his family in a conſpiracy againſt his intereſt, he laid a plan for his deſtruction. Accordingly he ſent for him to his houſe, under pretence of conſulting with him on buſineſs of importance. Johnſon, ſuſpecting nothing of miſchief from the earl, readily obeyed his command, and was received with great appearance of friendſhip and complaiſance. But ſoon after, the earl ſhot the unfortunate victim with a piſtol he had before loaded for that very purpoſe. A deliberate deſign of this horrid nature alarmed the whole nation, and the people, with one voice, cried aloud for juſtice. Nor did they implore in vain. He was tried before the houſe of peers, found guilty, and hanged at Tyburn, purſuant to his ſentence, on the fifth of May.

Great murmurs were now raiſed in England againſt the commander of the allied army, as if, upon all occaſions, he had wantonly expoſed the lives of the Britiſh ſoldiers, in order to preſerve thoſe of the Germans; but the Engliſh always deſired the poſt of honour, and with equal ſpirit purchaſed it more cheaply than on the whole might have been expected; for the only actions in which they ſuffered any thing worthy of notice, were thoſe of Warburg and Campen; and it has been aſſerted, that the whole Engliſh army, which amounted to twenty-five thouſand men, loſt, during the whole campaign, only two hundred and ſixty-five killed in battle, and eight hundred and ſeventy wounded. While the minds of the people were agitated by theſe reflections, and began to exclaim againſt being burthened with new loads of taxes for conqueſts they could neither preſerve nor enjoy, their thoughts took a different turn, by the ſudden death of the king at his palace in Kenſington, on the twenty-fifth of October, in the ſeventy-ſeventh year of his age, and the thirty-third of his reign. He had riſen at his uſual hour, drank his chocolate, and obſerved to his page, that the weather being fine, he intended to walk in the gardens. In a few minutes after he had ſignified his intention, and being alone in his chamber, his majeſty was heard to fall on the floor. The noiſe of his fall brought in ſeveral attendants, who lifted him on the bed, where, in a faint voice, he deſired that Amelia might be ſent for; but before her arrival the king expired. The immediate cauſe of his death is ſaid to have been a rupture of the right ventricle of his heart, which occaſioned an inſtantaneous ſtoppage of the whole circulation; an unexpected ſtroke from the king of terrors, which filled the hearts of all his ſubjects with unfeigned ſorrow. An event of this kind is never preceded with any apparent illneſs; ſo that it is no wonder his majeſty had enjoyed for ſome time an uncommon degree of ſtrength and health conſidering his advanced age; and what is no leſs extraordinary, he never more perfectly poſſeſſed the love of his ſubjects than towards the end of his days.

This reign was remarkable for a conſiderable increaſe in the agriculture, commerce, and manufactures of the nation, which daily improved under its internal tranquillity, and the wiſe regulations of parliament: but the national debt was alſo immenſely increaſed by the rage of waſteful war, in which England had ſo conſiderable a ſhare, and acquired ſuch additional fame.

Literature was equally thriving, if not more than ever, ſeeing a purity of ſtyle (which had been hitherto neglected) was particularly attended to, and a refined taſte became univerſal: among the poets were Addiſon, who alſo as a proſe writer, deſerves the higheſt regard: Sir Richard Steele, Mr. Addiſon's friend and admirer, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his comedies; and his other works have great merit. Dean Swift, the antagoniſt of both Addiſon and Steele, deſcribed nature in all its imperfections, and delighted to diſplay his poetic genius on deformed images, and ſubjects which others would have thought beneath their notice. His proſe writings, which are pretty numerous, are ſevere and ſarcaſtic; but his ſtile conciſe and nervous. Prior diſtinguiſhed himſelf by an eaſy elegance. Rowe and Parnel, as poets, had great merit. Gay acquired an equal reputation for his fables and paſtorals. Pope had obtained a ſeat in the temple of the Muſes by his harmonious verſification, and the correctneſs of his numbers; and Dr. Young, by his ſolemn thoughts, expreſſed with amazing energy in his night pieces, and the deſerved ſucceſs of his tragedies.

Moreover, in this reign, our philoſophy was adopted by all in every part of Europe who would reaſon for themſelves; and the learned of other nations turned to the Engliſh writers for inſtruction. Church preferments were beſtowed on men of abilities; bigotry loſt ground; and ſentiments of benevolence more generally prevailed than in any former period. The wealthy ſhewed their humanity and pity for the diſtreſſes of their fellow creatures: Infirmaries were founded in ſeveral parts of the kingdom, and many of them in the capital, for the relief of thoſe afflicted with any of the diſeaſes and calamities to which the human frame is ſubject. The deſerted infant was in this reign firſt received into an hoſpital founded for its education and ſupport; an aſylum was raiſed to receive young friendleſs females, and another for repenting proſtitutes. Poor married women had foundations eſtabliſhed for their relief in the time of their greateſt difficulty, diſtreſs, and danger; thoſe in the ſame circumſtances, with the additional pangs of guilt, have alſo a receptacle, in which they may be delivered and ſupported during their lying-in, without the leaſt expence. In this reign were likewiſe erected hoſpitals for thoſe under the ſmall-pox, who were formerly ſent to peſt-houſes, and treated as if they had the plague; and an hoſpital was now erected for inoculating the young who never had this formidable diſeaſe, in order to prevent the fatal effects which commonly attend its being caught in riper age. In this reign was likewiſe formed the marine ſociety for increaſing our mariners, by clearing the ſtreets of vagabond boys, and men deſtitute of the means of procuring an honeſt ſupport: thus making thoſe contribute to the public good, who were in danger of ſubſiſting by plunder, and who would probably have terminated their wretched lives with ignominy, or lived a perpetual nuiſance to the nation.

IMPARTIAL REVIEW of the CHARACTER of KING GEORGE the SECOND.

Though this wiſe and amiable prince was not diſtinguiſhed by very ſhining abilities; yet his virtues afford ſufficient matter for juſt panegyric. If his natural genius was not of the firſt water, his general conduct evinces the ſolidity and extent of his judgment. If his temper was rather warm and impetuous, it never hurried him into meaſures ſubverſive of his own true intereſts, or thoſe of his people, to which he inflexibly adhered. He was plain and direct in his intentions; true to his word; ſteady in his favour and protection to his ſervants, whom he never willingly changed; and thoſe who immediately attended on his perſon, grew old with him, or died in their places.

In his early part of life he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his bravery, and was preſent as a volunteer under the great duke of Marlborough at the battle of Oudenarde, in which he put himſelf at the head of a ſquadron of Hanoverian horſe, ſword in hand, and fighting with the greateſt intrepidity, had his horſe killed under him. He alſo ſhewed his perſonal courage at the battle of Dettingen. His domeſtic happineſs was, for many years, complete. He lived with his queen in a felicity ſeldom experienced in the more humble walk of private life. His ſubjects, except in the time of the rebellion, enjoyed a long interval of domeſtic tranquillity. Peace extended her wings over this happy iſle; commerce flouriſhed in a very remarkable manner; and riches were continually flowing into the ports of the Britiſh empire; agriculture and manufactures were daily improving, aſſiſted by the wiſe regulations of the parliament, which greatly contributed to make theſe noble acquiſitions.

Having baffled the machinations of his enemies to ſubvert the government, through the wiſdom of his councils, the affection of his people, and the bravery of his ſon, he had the happineſs to ſee the clamours of party in a great meaſure extinguiſhed; he ſaw his ſubjects contented at home, and acquiring abroad the greateſt military glory; and he had the ſingular felicity of having a prime miniſter who entered into all his views, and who was at the ſame time the favourite of the people.

He was well acquainted with the ſyſtem of Germany, and was, during his whole reign, a zealous aſſertor of the liberties of his native country: nor was he leſs acquainted with the true intereſts of the ſeveral princes of Europe; and always oppoſed, to the utmoſt of his abilities, every attempt that tended to ſhake the balance of power. Deſirous not only of keeping, but alſo of enlarging the acquiſitions of his father, he had recourſe to œconomy, by which he was enabled to maintain a conſiderable body of troops in Hanover. He ſurvived ſeveral of his children; and died at that period of time, when the terror of his arms, the power of his kingdoms, and the wiſe meaſures of his government, were all raiſed to the higheſt point of proſperity and renown. He has been cenſured as being too fond of money; and in ſome trivial matters, this cenſure does not appear to be entirely without foundation; but it never ſhewed itſelf in one rapacious act, or influenced his conduct on any important occaſion; ſo that at his death his private wealth was far inferior to what was expected. He ſhewed a remarkable affection alſo for his native country: but when the intereſts of England and Hanover were ſeparated, and the war broke out in which Hanover muſt ſuffer much, and could hope for no advantage, he did not heſitate to expoſe his German dominions to almoſt inevitable ruin, rather than to abate of the juſt claims of the Engliſh in America. He was ever more attentive to the intereſts of his ſubjects, than that of his own; manifeſting at the ſame time a uniform regard to the laws of this country, which he never violated; nor did he, in a ſingle inſtance, attempt to demoliſh the barriers of liberty, or to incroach on one privilege of his people. None of his predeceſſors on the throne of England lived to ſo great an age; few of them enjoyed ſo long and glorious a reign; and very few indeed were ſo ſincerely and ſo juſtly lamented.

The family of George II. are, Frederic, his eldeſt ſon, prince of Wales, and earl of Cheſter, father to his preſent majeſty; who married the twenty-ſeventh of April, 1736, Auguſta, only ſurviving daughter of Frederic II. duke of Saxe Gotha, and died the twentieth of March, O. S. 1750-1, in the forty-ſixth year of his age.

William Auguſtus, duke of Cumberland, K. G. and K. B. born the fifteenth of April, 1721, and died, univerſally lamented by the Engliſh nation, the thirty-firſt of October, 1765.

Anne, princeſs royal of England, born November the ſecond, 1709, married to the late prince of Orange, March the twenty-fifth, 1734, and mother to the preſent ſtadtholder. Died 1759.

Amelia Sophia Eleonora, born June the ſixteenth, 1711, died October the thirty-firſt, 1786.

Elizabeth Caroline, who died unmarried in 1758.

Mary, fourth daughter, born March the ſixteenth, 1723, married the hereditary prince of Heſſe Caſſel, May the ſeventeenth, 1740, and died 1771.

Louiſa Anne, late queen of Denmark, and mother of the preſent king, born in 1724, and died December the eighth, 1751.

The family of his royal highneſs Frederic, prince of Wales, are, Auguſta, married to the hereditary prince of Brunſwic, 1764, born O. S. thirty-firſt July, 1737.

George William Frederic, his preſent majeſty, born the twenty-fourth of May, 1738, O. S.

Edward Auguſtus, duke of York, and ſecond ſon, born the fourteenth of March, 1738-9, died at Monaco in Italy, on the ſeventh of September, 1767.

Elizabeth Caroline, ſecond daughter, born the thirtieth of December, 1740, died September the fourth, 1759.

William Henry, duke of Glouceſter and Edinburgh, &c. K. G. and third ſon, born the fourteenth of November, O. S. 1743, and now living.

Henry Frederic, duke of Cumberland, &c. K. G. fourth ſon, born the twenty-ſeventh of October, O. S. 1745, died September the eighteenth, 1790.

Louiſa Anne, third daughter, who died 1768.

Frederic William, the youngeſt ſon, born the thirteenth of May, 1750, died on the twenty-ninth of December, 1765, aged ſixteen.

Caroline Matilda, fourth daughter, married to Chriſtian VII. king of Denmark, but was divorced in 1772; born the eleventh of July, 1751, and died at Zell, May the eleventh, 1775.

The following family are excluded from the ſucceſſion to the crown of Great Britain, by act of parliament.

James Stuart, chevalier de St. George, pretended ſon of James II. born June the twenty-firſt, 1688, O. S. married September the third, 1719, to Maria Clementina Sobieſki of Poland; widower, January the eighteenth, 1735.

Charles Edward Lewis Philip-Caſimir, his eldeſt ſon, born at Rome, December the thirty-firſt, 1720.

Henry Benedict Maria Clement, his ſecond ſon, born March the ſixth, 1725, created a cardinal in 1747, and biſhop of Corinth, 1758.

A. D. 1760. GEORGE III. now aſcended the throne of his anceſtors under the moſt promiſing circumſtances. The lords of the council, as ſoon as the death of the late king was notified, aſſembled at Charlton houſe, and iſſued orders for proclaiming his majeſty, which was accordingly done at the uſual places, and with the accuſtomed ceremonies. His majeſty was in the twenty-third year of his age, at the time of acceſſion. While the council was ſitting, his majeſty arrived from Kew, and addreſſed them in the following terms: "The loſs the nation and I have ſuſtained by the death of the king, my grandfather, would have been ſeverely felt at any time; but coming at ſo critical a juncture, and ſo unexpected, it is by many circumſtances augmented; and the weight now falling upon me is much increaſed; I feel my own inſufficiency to ſupport it as I wiſh; but animated by the tendereſt affection for this my native country, and depending on the advice, experience, and abilities of your lordſhips, the ſupport and aſſiſtance of every honeſt man, I enter with cheerfulneſs into this arduous ſituation; and ſhall make it the buſineſs of my life to promote, in every thing, the glory and happineſs of theſe kingdoms; to preſerve and ſtrengthen the conſtitution both in church and ſtate: and as I mount the throne in the midſt of an expenſive, but juſt and neceſſary war, I ſhall endeavour to proſecute it in a manner the moſt likely to bring about an honourable and laſting peace, in concert with my allies."

His majeſty then took and ſigned the oath relating to the ſecurity of the church of Scotland, and ſubſcribed two inſtruments thereof; one of which was tranſmitted to the court of ſeſſion, to be recorded in the book of Sederunt, and afterwards lodged in the public regiſter of Scotland; the other remained among the records of the council. Both houſes of parliament were now aſſembled, in order to ſwear in the members, whoſe oaths of allegiance were diſſolved by the death of the late king. The duke of Rutland being conſtituted high-ſteward, ſwore in all the commons; and the lord-keeper adminiſtered the oaths to the peers. Theſe acts of government were followed by addreſſes of condoleance and congratulation, filled with the warmeſt profeſſions of duty and attachment, and preſented to his majeſty from moſt parts of the kingdom. The two houſes of parliament led the way. The magiſtrates, merchants, clergy, diſſenters, &c. followed their example. Perhaps ſo great a number of addreſſes were never before ſent on any ſimilar occaſion. The clergy of London and Weſtminſter, with the archbiſhop of Canterbury at their head, waited on his majeſty with their compliments on his acceſſion to the throne; and were followed by the two univerſities, and moſt of the bodies politic and corporate in the three kingdoms. In a word, the whole people ſeemed to vie with each other in expreſſions of loyalty and affection to their new ſovereign, who increaſed the pleaſing idea they had formed of him, by the condeſcending and affable manner in which he received them. On the tenth of November in the evening, the body of the late king was removed from Kenſington to the prince's chamber, where it lay in ſtate till next day, when it was interred with great funeral pomp in the chapel of Henry VII. the duke of Cumberland appearing in the character of chief mourner. On the eighteenth the parliament aſſembled to tranſact buſineſs; when his majeſty, after being conducted to the houſe of peers amidſt the univerſal acclamations of his people, opened the ſeſſion, and delivered from the throne, the following ſpeech.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"The juſt concern which I have felt in my own breaſt, on the ſudden death of the late king my royal grandfather, makes me not doubt but you muſt all have been deeply affected with ſo ſevere a loſs. The preſent critical and difficult conjuncture has made this loſs the more ſenſible, as he was the great ſupport of that ſyſtem, by which alone the liberties of Europe, and the weight and influence of theſe kingdoms can be preſerved, and give life to meaſures conducive to theſe important ends.

"I need not tell you the addition of weight which immediately falls upon me, in being called to the government of this free and powerful country at ſuch a time, and under ſuch circumſtances. My conſolation is in the uprightneſs of my own intentions, your faithful and united aſſiſtance, and the bleſſing of heaven upon our joint endeavours, which I devoutly implore.

"Born and educated in this country, I glory in the name of Briton; and the peculiar happineſs of my life will ever conſiſt in promoting the welfare of a people, whoſe loyalty and warm affection to me I conſider as the greateſt and moſt permanent ſecurity of my throne; and I doubt not but their ſteadineſs in thoſe principles will equal the firmneſs of my invariable reſolutions to adhere to and ſtrengthen this excellent conſtitution in church and ſtate, and to maintain the toleration inviolable. The civil and the religious rights of my loving ſubjects are equally dear to me with the moſt valuable prerogatives of my crown; and as the ſureſt foundation of the whole, and the beſt means to draw down the divine favour on my reign, it is my fixed purpoſe to countenance and encourage the practice of true religion and virtue.

"I reflect with pleaſure on the ſucceſſes with which the Britiſh arms have been proſpered this laſt ſummer. The total reduction of the vaſt province of Canada, with the city of Montreal, is of the moſt intereſting conſequence, and muſt be as heavy a blow to my enemies, as it is a conqueſt glorious to us; the more glorious becauſe effected without effuſion of blood, and with that humanity which makes an amiable part of the character of this nation.

"Our advantages gained in the Eaſt Indies have been ſignal, and muſt greatly diminiſh the ſtrength and trade of France in thoſe parts, as well as procure the moſt ſolid benefits to the commerce and wealth of my ſubjects.

"In Germany, where the whole French force has been employed, the combined army, under the wiſe and able conduct of my general, prince Ferdinand of Brunſwic, has not only ſtopt their progreſs, but has gained advantages over them, notwithſtanding their boaſted ſuperiority, and their not having hitherto come to a general engagement.

"My good brother and ally the king of Pruſſia, although ſurrounded with numerous armies of enemies, has, with a magnanimity and perſeverance almoſt beyond example, not only withſtood their various attacks, but obtained very conſiderable victories over them.

"Of theſe events I ſhall ſay no more at this time, becauſe the nature of the war in thoſe parts has kept the campaign there ſtill depending.

"As my navy is the principal article of our naval ſtrength, it gives me much ſatisfaction to receive it in ſuch good condition; whilſt the fleet of France is weakened to ſuch a degree, that the ſmall remains of it have continued blocked up by my ſhips in their own ports: at the ſame time the French trade is reduced to the loweſt ebb; and with joy of heart I ſee the commerce of my kingdoms, that great ſource of our riches, and fixed object of my never failing care and protection, flouriſhing to an extent unknown in any former war.

"The valour and intrepidity of my officers and forces, both at ſea and land, have been diſtinguiſhed ſo much to the glory of the nation, that I ſhould be wanting in juſtice to them if I did not acknowledge it. This is a merit which I ſhall conſtantly encourage and reward; and I take this occaſion to declare, that the zealous and uſeful ſervice of the militia, in the preſent arduous conjuncture, is very acceptable to me.

"In this ſtate I have found things at my acceſſion to the throne of my anceſtors: happy in viewing the proſperous part of it; happier ſtill ſhould I have been, had I found my kingdoms, whoſe true intereſts I have entirely at heart, in full peace; but ſince the ambition, injurious encroachments, and dangerous deſigns of my enemies, rendered the war both juſt and neceſſary, and the generous overture made laſt winter towards a congreſs for a pacification, has not yet produced any ſuitable return, I am determined, with your cheerful and powerful aſſiſtance, to proſecute this war with vigour, in order to that deſirable object, a ſafe and honourable peace. For this purpoſe it is abſolutely incumbent upon us to be early prepared; and I rely upon your zeal and hearty concurrence to ſupport the king of Pruſſia, and the reſt of my allies, and to make ample proviſion for carrying on the war, as the only means to bring our enemies to equitable terms of accommodation."

"Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons,

"The greateſt uneaſineſs which I feel at this time, is in conſidering the uncommon burthens neceſſarily brought upon my faithful ſubjects. I deſire only ſuch ſupplies as ſhall be requiſite to proſecute the war with advantage; be adequate to the neceſſary ſervices; and that they may be provided for in the moſt ſure and effectual manner. You may depend upon the faithful and punctual application of what ſhall be granted. I have ordered the proper eſtimates for the enſuing year to be laid before you; and alſo an account of the extraordinary expences which, from the nature of the different and remote operations, have been unavoidably incurred.

"It is with peculiar reluctance that I am obliged to mention any thing which perſonally regards myſelf. But as the grant of the greateſt part of the civil liſt revenues is now determined, I truſt in your duty and affection to me, to make the proper proviſion for ſupporting my civil government with honour and dignity. On my part you may be aſſured of a regular and becoming œconomy."

"My lords and gentlemen,

"The eyes of all Europe are upon you. From your reſolutions the proteſtant intereſt hopes for protection, as well as all our friends for the preſervation of their independency; and our enemies fear the final diſappointment of their ambitious and deſtructive views. Let theſe hopes and fears be confirmed and augmented by the vigour and diſpatch of our proceedings.

"In this expectation I am the more encouraged by a pleaſing circumſtance, which I look upon as one of the moſt auſpicious omens of my reign: that happy extinction of diviſions, and that union and good harmony which continue to prevail amongſt my ſubjects, afford me the moſt agreeable proſpect. The natural diſpoſition and wiſh of my heart are to cement and promote them; and I promiſe myſelf that nothing will ariſe on your part to interrupt or diſturb a ſituation ſo eſſential to the true and laſting felicity of this great people."

No words can expreſs the ſatisfaction and joy with which this ſpeech was received by the people: not the leaſt murmur of diſcontent was heard; but every one endeavoured to exceed each other, in expreſſions of zeal and affection for his majeſty. The ſpeech was printed in an elegant manner, framed and glazed; and was with due reverence hung up throughout the kingdom as a piece of ornamental furniture.

Dutiful and loyal addreſſes were on this occaſion preſented by both houſes; while the commons, as a proof of their affection, granted the ſum of eight hundred thouſand pounds to defray the expences of the civil liſt. They then proceeded to grant the ſupplies for the ſervice of the current year, which amounted to upwards of nineteen millions in all.

Agreeable to ancient cuſtom upon a king's acceſſion, the parliament on their meeting after the holidays paſſed an act of grace in favour of inſolvent debtors, who, in conſequence of giving up all their effects, were to be diſcharged by the juſtices at the quarter-ſeſſion. No act was ever paſſed at a more ſeaſonable juncture; for the priſons were filled with poor unfortunate creatures, whoſe wives and children were ſtarving. This act, however, had in it a clauſe, attended with ſuch conſequences, that it was found neceſſary to repeal it. It was imagined that every creditor might compel a debtor to give up his effects, and if he concealed any of them to the ambunt of twenty pounds, he was to ſuffer death as a felon. This clauſe was laid hold of by many of the lower ſorts of tradeſmen, who, in order to cheat their creditors, got one of their own relations to compel them to account; ſo that a door was opened for perjury, and many perſons were deprived of their property under the proſtituted authority of an act of parliament. Indeed, the abuſe became ſo glaring, that the city of London preſented a petition to have it repealed; but it did not take place till the meeting of the new parliament. In the beginning of March the king ſent a meſſage to both houſes, importing, that as nothing could contribute more towards promoting the intereſts of the people than that of rendering the judges independent, ſo he deſired they would grant him leave to advance their ſalaries, and that they ſhould hold their places by patent for life; for by the act of ſettlement at the Revolution, they were to expire within ſix months after the death of the king. In conſequence of this meſſage, the ſalaries of the nine puiſne judges in England were advanced from fifteen hundred to two thouſand pounds, and the three chiefs in proportion. In Scotland, the lord-preſident, inſtead of one thouſand pounds a year, was allowed thirteen hundred; the lords of ſeſſion, inſtead of five hundred, ſeven hundred pounds; and the lords juſticiary, inſtead of five hundred, one thouſand pounds.

At this time Mr. Onſlow, who had ſo long filled the ſpeaker's chair with equal candour and capacity, ſignified his intention to retire from buſineſs, in conſequence of age, infirmities, and other motives of a private nature; the commons, therefore, determined to beſtow upon him ſome ſignal marks of their eſteem and regard. Accordingly they reſolved that the thanks of the houſe ſhould be given to Mr. Speaker, for his conſtant and unwearied attendance in the chair, during the courſe of above thirty-three years, in five ſucceſſive parliaments; for the unſhaken integrity, and ſteady impartiality of his conduct there; and for the indefatigable pains he had, with uncommon abilities, conſtantly taken to promote the honour and dignity of parliament, and to preſerve inviolable the rights and privileges of the commons of Great Britain. At the ſame time the houſe reſolved to preſent an addreſs to the king, humbly to beſeech his majeſty, that he would be graciouſly pleaſed to beſtow ſome ſignal mark of his royal favour upon the right honourable Arthur Onſlow, Eſq. This application was very agreeable to the king's own generous diſpoſition. He expreſſed a proper ſenſe of the ſpeaker's great ſervices and unblemiſhed character; and that gentleman was gratified with an annual penſion of three thouſand pounds, payable out of his majeſty's treaſure at the exchequer, for his own life and that of his ſon. All the public buſineſs being diſpatched, the king repaired to the houſe of lords on March the nineteenth, and having ſigned ſuch bills as were ready, cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne. The parliament was ſoon after diſſolved, and writs iſſued for a new one to be choſen. During this interim the proceedings between the contending armies on the continent are worthy notice.

Immediately after the commencement of this year the French king's ambaſſador at the court of Stockholm delivered a declaration to the Swediſh monarch, importing, that the moſt Chriſtian King, moved by the calamities of war, ſo widely diffuſed, and ſo ſeverely felt in different parts of the world, thought it his indiſpenſible duty to declare, that his humanity in general, and his regard to his own ſubjects in particular, prompted him to expreſs his deſire that his allies would concur with him in reſtoring the tranquillity of Europe; that in adjuſting the differences between France and England, he would abundantly ſhew his moderation, whenever Great Britain ſhould be inclined to acquieſce in reaſonable terms; that common humanity required his allies to concert with him a plan of pacification, and he hoped every member of the alliance would labour to ſtrengthen, if poſſible, the bands of amity with which they were connected; that, in the mean time, an accumulation of diſtreſs among his unhappy ſubjects; an additional depopulation of countries; a diſorder in the finances of ſeveral powers; and the greateſt doubt whether an advantageous peace could be made in Germany, induced him to declare, that as the war had conſiderably diminiſhed his reſources, he was conſtrained to leſſen his ſubſidies, and even to give notice, that ſhould the war continue, he could no longer promiſe an exact compliance with the letter of his engagement. In conſequence of this declaration, four others were made by the courts of Peterſburgh, Vienna, Sweden, and Poland, which were ſigned at Paris on the twenty-fifth of March, and delivered at London on the thirty-firſt of the ſame month. The counter declarations of Great Britain and Pruſſia appeared on the third of April; and a congreſs was appointed to be held at Augſburgh, as the moſt proper ſituation for the powers at war: yet, promiſing as theſe ſeeming diſpoſitions for peace appeared, the war was continued with great vigour in Germany.

Prince Ferdinand, about the beginning of February, aſſembled his army, and began his march towards Caſſel, on the eleventh day of that month, in four columns. The command of the vanguard being aſſigned to the marquis of Granby, he advanced to Kerkberg and Metze. In the mean time the hereditary prince having received intelligence that the French garriſon of Fritzlar was not prepared for a defence, he marched thither with a few battalions, in hopes of carrying the place by a ſudden aſſault with muſquetry only; but he met with ſuch a warm reception, that he was obliged to wait for the arrival of ſome artillery, which was made uſe of with ſuch ſucceſs, that the governor of the place was compelled to capitulate on honourable terms. In the interim, general Briedenback took poſſeſſion of a large magazine at Rothenſal, and made an unſucceſsful attempt upon Marpurg, in which he loſt his life; but this place was afterwards abandoned by the French at the approach of the marquis of Granby, who took poſſeſſion of it. It was now reſolved to reduce Ziegenheim and Caſſel before the duke de Broglio ſhould receive his reinforcements; and theſe two places were accordingly inveſted. The allied army was cantoned in two lines, with the right extending to Lahne, and the left ſtretched towards Fulda; while prince Ferdinand fixed his head-quarters at Schwienſberg. Having left a garriſon at Marpurg, lord Granby marched into the neighbourhood of Lohr. Another body, under general Hardenberg, advanced to Kircham, where the detachment employed at the ſiege of Caſſel proceeded very ſlowly in their operations, and received ſome ſevere rebuffs from ſallies made by the garriſon. By this time the duke de Broglio was joined by all the detachments he expected from the Lower Rhine, and advanced towards the army of the allies, which at this time was unable to meet him in the field. On the twenty-firſt day of March, the detachment under the hereditary prince was, in its march from Heinbach, encountered by a numerous body of the enemy, near the village of Stangerode, in the neighbourhood of Grunberg. The attack was made by the enemy's dragoons, the very firſt ſhock of which broke the whole foot of the allies, conſiſting of nine regiments of Hanoverians, Heſſians, and Brunſwickers. Two thouſand were either killed or taken, together with eighteen pair of colours, and twelve pieces of artillery.

After this blow, the allied army could no longer think of making head againſt the French, or of maintaining their ground in Heſſe. They broke up the blockade of Zeigenheim, and ſoon after raiſed the ſiege of Caſſel, after the trenches had been opened twenty-ſeven days. They now evacuated the whole country of Heſſe, retiring behind the Dymel, and falling back nearly to the quarters they poſſeſſed before this attempt. The enemy was now once more in poſſeſſion of the whole landgraviate of Heſſe Caſſel; they were alſo maſters of Munden and Gottingen in Hanover, and at liberty to penetrate into the heart of that electorate. The ſituation of the allies appeared the more dangerous, as the prince de Soubiſe, at the head of a ſecond French army, was encamped on the Lower Rhine. About the middle of May, the hereditary prince of Brunſwic, at the head of a ſeparate body, advanced to Nettolen, in the neighbourhood of Munſter, to watch the motions of the army. Soubiſe had by this time formed three different camps at Duſſeldorp, Burich, and Rees, though part of his forces ſtill continued in cantonment. The army of the duke de Broglio, having, about the latter end of June, croſſed the Dymel, diſlodged general Sporcken from his poſt on the left of that river, with the loſs of eighteen hundred men taken proſoners, nineteen pieces of cannon, four hundred horſes, and two hundred waggons. The French next took poſſeſſion of Warburg, Padeborn, and Dringlebroen, and on the ſecond of July compelled prince Ferdinand to paſs the Lippe. Theſe ſucceſſes, however, were balanced by the atchievements of ſmall parties of the allies, who, at different times were diſpatched to cut off their convoys of proviſion, and otherwiſe harraſs them in their motions.

In the morning of the thirteenth of July, general Luckner advanced with his detachment to Salme, where the count de Chabot was poſted with a ſtrong body of horſe and foot, which he attacked with ſuch fury, that they were forced to repaſs the Lippe in haſte, having loſt about two hundred men, and as many horſes in their retreat. Other parties intercepted the French convoys in the neighbourhood of Caſſel, and did ſuch conſiderable damage to the enemy, that they reſolved to unite their armies and give battle to prince Ferdinand. At Hohenover, the camp of the allies was formed. The right wing, at the extremity of which the hereditary prince was poſted, extended as far as the village de Buderich, and this was guarded by a detachment. The body of the army occupied the heights of Wambeln, and the prince of Anhalt poſſeſſed the ground between the Illengen and Hohenover. The marquis of Granby maintained his poſition on the heights of Kirck-Denckern, lieutenant-general Wiltgeneau advancing from the heath of Untrup, marched by his right in order to reach the village of Kirck-Denckern; the avenues and poſts on the little rivers Aſte and Sultzbah, were, by the piquets of the army, defended.

The army of Soubiſe having ſtruck their tents on the fifteenth of July, advanced on the left of the allies, and diſlodged the advanced poſt of lord Granby, againſt whoſe corps their chief efforts were directed. Prince Ferdinand now commanded the marquis of Granby to maintain his ground to the laſt extremity. Wutnau was ordered to make a motion to the left, to block up the high road from Lipſtadt to Ham, and act in concert with the marquis, whoſe right was likewiſe ſuſtained by the left of the body commanded by the prince of Anhalt, and this general's own right extended to the Aſte, above Kirck-Denckern. Lieutenant-general Conway replaced the prince of Anhalt, between Illengen and Hohenover. The hereditary prince ordered lieutenant-general Boſe to ſecure the heights of Wambeln, leaving count Kilmanſiegge on the ſide of Buderich. The greateſt part of the artillery was placed on the front of the left. General Sporcken, who encamped with a ſeparate body at Hortzfeld, was ordered to detach ſix ſquadrons and as many battalions over the Lippe, to ſupport M. Wutnau, and to co-operate with the reſt as he ſhould judge moſt effectual for the advantage of the whole. In the evening, the enemy made a furious attack on lord Granby's poſt, which was ſuſtained with the moſt intrepid bravery and reſolution till the arrival of Wutnau, who advancing on his left, and charging them in flank, obliged them to retire into the woods with precipitation. The priſoners having informed prince Ferdinand, that marſhal Broglio had decamped from Erwite by break of day, in order to join Soubiſe, and give battle to the allies, concluded that the ſtrongeſt efforts would be made upon his left, and formed his diſpoſitions accordingly. General Howard was ordered to bring up the brigade of infantry, commanded by lord Frederick Cavendiſh, and the cavalry of lord Pembroke. Colonel Grevendorff was detached with two battalions to barricade and fortify the village of Kirck-Denckern, and to be there, in caſe of neceſſity, ſupported by general Howard. At three in the morning the whole French army advanced again to the attack on the ſide where Wutgenau was poſted, and a terrible fire of cannon and muſquetry was maintained on both ſides for five hours, during which the enemy was not able to gain one inch of ground. About nine, prince Ferdinand received advice that Broglio's deſign was to cannonade lord Granby's camp, from an oppoſite eminence; he therefore ordered immediately a body of troops to anticipate this operation, by making a vigorous charge. Accordingly they advanced with the greateſt intrepidity, and attacked the enemy with ſo much fury, that the French were ſoon obliged to give way, and abandon the field. Their left, however, ſtill maintained a ſevere cannonade on the ſide where the hereditary prince commanded; but were no ſooner informed of their defeat on the right, than they deſiſted from the attack, and retreated in good order. They were purſued as far as Hiltrup, about a league from the field of battle, and would in all probability have ſuffered a total defeat, had the nature of the ground permitted the artillery to act; but this being impoſſible, the French ſuſtained very little loſs. They had, however, about five thouſand men killed and taken priſoners in this attack, ſome colours, and a few pieces of artillery. About five hundred men was prince Ferdinand's loſs.

From this action the commander derived immortal honour in the diſpoſition, and the troops in the bravery and intrepidity of the execution. It was, however, far from being deciſive; the French, notwithſtanding the conſiderable loſs they had ſuſtained, were ſtill ſuperior in number. After this defeat, the miſunderſtanding between the two French generals revived, and the army was again divided. Broglio, with his diviſion, marched towards Caſſel, and Soubiſe retreated to Dortmund, and croſſed the Roer, in order to ſecure a great number of barges then paſſing down the Rhine with proviſions for his army. He did not, however, take this ſtep, before he had ſent off two large detachments to reinforce Broglio. Nor did he continue any longer on the other ſide of the Roer, than was neceſſary to receive his proviſions, when he repaſſed both that river and the Lippe, advancing as far as Dulmen. In the mean time Broglio penetrated ſtill farther into the electorate of Hanover, took poſſeſſion of Keſter, and fortified the place. Upon this, prince Ferdinand retired to Dumolt, and called in moſt of his detachments. The French general encamped near him on the heights of Neim, and ſeveral ſkirmiſhes happened between the two armies, in one of which prince Henry, brother to the hereditary prince, was mortally wounded. In the mean time, general Luckner gained a conſiderable advantage at Caſſel. He attacked and routed a large body of the enemy, took many priſoners, and a number of horſes. Nor were the French idle. Broglio, having croſſed the Weſer with his whole army, prince Ferdinand made a forced march, paſſed the Dymel, and advanced to Caſſel. Broglio perceiving that he could not now advance to the city of Hanover, without bringing on a general engagement with the allied army, thought proper to retreat. The French being thus retired, prince Ferdinand proceeded to Paderborn, and eſtabliſhed his head-quarters at Buhne. On this movement of the allies, Broglio thought proper to croſs the Weſer, and encamped at Eimbeck, where he laid the whole country under contribution. Soubiſe in the mean time having erected his ovens at Dorſten, and garriſoned the place with one battalion, the hereditary prince found means to attack and reduce the town. The garriſon were made priſoners; the ovens demoliſhed; and large quantities of proviſions deſtroyed. This ſucceſs obliged Soubiſe to retreat to the other ſide of the Lippe. But he ſoon after repaſſed that river, and advanced again to Coesfelt, ravaging all the northern parts of Weſtphalia, with his detachments.

Towards the cloſe of September, a detachment from the army of Soubiſe, under the command of the count de Conflans, advanced to the gates of Embden, which was garriſoned by two companies of Engliſh invalids, who obtained an honourable capitulation, and embarked for Bremen. The French did not, however, continue long in the town; they laid the neighbouring country under contribution, and immediately evacuated the place. But the country people flying to arms, and ſinking the pontoons on which the enemy had paſſed the river, it was ſome time before the detachment could return to their camp. Another party of the army entered the city of Oſnaburg, and pillaged the place, the inhabitants not being in a condition to pay the enormous contributions demanded by the enemy. A third part made an attempt upon Bremen; but the inhabitants joining the garriſon, the French were obliged to retire with the utmoſt precipitation. All this time Broglio lay inactive in his camp at Eimbeck, without attempting any thing of importance: nor was he at all diſturbed till the beginning of November, when prince Ferdinand formed a plan for attacking him unexpectedly, before he could call in his detachments. In order to this, he ordered the hereditary prince and general Luckner, reinforced by the garriſon of Wolfenbuttle, to advance from their reſpective poſts, ſo as to be in the neighbourhood of Eimbeck by a certain hour on the fifth of November. He commanded the marquis of Granby to force the French poſt at Cappelnhagen on the fourth; to proceed next day to Wickenſen, and block up a defile in that neighbourhood, on the road from Eſcherſhauſen to Eimbeck. He ſent general Hardenberg with a detachment to paſs the Weſer at Badenwerder, that he might, at the appointed time, take poſſeſſion of a defile at Amelunxhorn, on the other road from Eſcherſhauſen to Eimbeck. On the fourth, he himſelf, with the main body of his army, croſſed the river near Haſtenbeck, and advanced towards Eimbeck. When he approached Wickenſen, he found part of his orders already executed, the road being occupied by a ſtrong body of Britiſh grenadiers and highlanders; for the marquis of Granby had bravely forced the enemy's poſt at Cappelnhagen, and, by the hour appointed, blocked up the defile. In the mean time, M. de Chabot finding he was intercepted, immediately retreated towards Eſcherſhauſen, and ſtruck into the other road to Eimbeck, which general Hardenberg had been ordered to ſecure: but unfortunately for that officer, ſome of his pontoons were overturned, and this accident retarded him ſo long, that he did not arrive at the place appointed till ſeven in the morning; by which time Chabot had paſſed the defile on his way to Eimbeck, and by noon reached that place without farther interruption. Notwithſtanding this diſappointment, prince Ferdinand advanced towards the French camp, which he found too ſtrong to be attacked with any probability of ſucceſs. He then reſolved to turn their flanks, as if he deſigned to cut off their communication with Gottingen; a motion which, he was well aſſured, would either bring Broglio to an engagement on equal terms, or oblige him to retreat. He choſe the latter; and on the ninth the whole French army retired. After this, no tranſaction of conſequence happened in Germany. The duke de Broglio quartered his forces in and about Caſſel; while thoſe of Soubiſe were diſtributed at Duſſeldorp, and along the Lower Rhine. The allies fixed their quarters at Hilderſham, Munſter, Hamelen, and Eimbeck. The Britiſh cavalry wintered in Eaſt Frieſland, and the infantry in the biſhopric of Oſnaburg.

Several ſucceſsful exploits were performed this year in the Eaſt and Weſt Indies. After the reduction of Pondicherry, an armament was equipped againſt the French ſettlement of Mahie, ſituated on the coaſt of Malabar, about thirty miles to the northward of Tillicherry. A body of forces for this expedition was embarked at Bombay, under the command of major Hector Monro, who acted with ſuch ſpirit, that in the beginning of February, M. Loner, the French governor at Mahie, was obliged to ſurrender the place with all its dependencies. But the French officers in the Eaſt Indies had exerted themſelves with ſo much induſtry, as to intereſt in their cauſe a prince of the Mogul empire, named Shah Zadda, who, at the head of eighty thouſand men, took the field againſt the forces of the Eaſt India company, commanded by major John Carnack, and reinforced by the ſuba of Bengal. This army conſiſted of five hundred Europeans, two thouſand five hundred ſeapoys, and twenty thouſand black troops, with twelve pieces of cannon. Both armies advanced to the neighbourhood of Guya, where, on the fifteenth of January, the Mogul's troops were routed in a pitched battle. All their artillery was taken, together with part of their baggage, and a number of French officers. About this time a revolution happened in favour of Mir Coſſim Ali Kawn, who was placed on the throne of Bengal in the room of his father-in-law Jaffier Ali Kawn, raiſed to that dignity by lord Clive, and now depoſed for his cruelty and mal-adminiſtration. This change, however, did not affect the intereſt of the Engliſh Eaſt India company; on the contrary, their privileges were confirmed and enlarged by the new nabob.

About the month of July, the iſland of Dominique, in the Weſt Indies, which the French had ſettled and fortified, was attacked by a party of Engliſh forces under the command of lord Rollo, and aſſiſted by commodore Sir James Douglas, with four ſhips of the line. At firſt, the inhabitants would have ſubmitted; but M. de Longprie, the governor, ſtirred them up to hold out, under pretence that ſome ſhips would ſoon arrive to their aſſiſtance. Lord Rollo, finding him obſtinate, landed with a party of grenadiers, commanded by colonel Melville, and drove the enemy from their advanced poſts; after which they proceeded to the head-quarters of the governor, whom they took priſoner, with all his officers. Next day the magiſtrates, and indeed all the inhabitants of the iſland, except the ſoldiers, took the oaths to our government. The forts that had been damaged were repaired, and every thing ſettled in a proper manner; after which, lord Rollo and Sir James Douglas ſet ſail for the iſland of Guadaloupe.

For the greater part of this year the Engliſh navy was remarkably ſucceſsful; ſeveral engagements happened in different parts of the ſeas, and many of the enemy's ſhips were taken. But the following is juſtly eſteemed one of the moſt remarkable and gallant actions which diſtinguiſhed this war, and fully evinced the vaſt ſuperiority poſſeſſed by the Engliſh navy over that of France. On the tenth of Auguſt, captain Faulkner of the Bellona, a ſhip of the line, and the Brilliant, a frigate of thirty guns, ſailed from the river Tagus for England, having on board a conſiderable ſum of money for the merchants of London. On the thirteenth in the afternoon, being then off Vigo, they deſcried three ſail of ſhips ſtanding in for the land, one of the line of battle, and two frigates. As ſoon as they perceived captain Faulkner, they bore down upon him, till within the diſtance of ſeven miles, when they took both the Bellona and frigate for two-decked ſhips, and not chuſing to ſtand an engagement, they ſuddenly wore round, filled all their ſails, and crouded away. Captain Faulkner being by this time convinced of their ſize, and from the intelligence he had received, conjecturing that the large ſhip was the Courageux, as it actually proved to be, he hoiſted all the ſail he could carry, and gave chace till ſun-ſet, when one of the French frigates hauling out in the offing, he threw out a ſignal for the Brilliant to purſue in that direction, which order was immediately obeyed. They did not loſe ſight of the enemy all night; but at ſun-riſe had gained only two miles upon them in a chace of fourteen hours, ſo that the French commodore might ſtill have avoided an engagement had he thought proper; but he no longer declined the action; for by this time he plainly perceived that one of the Engliſh ſhips was a frigate, and the Bellona, at that diſtance, appeared to him much ſmaller than ſhe really was. He now hoiſted a red enſign on the mizen ſhrouds, as a ſignal for his two frigates to cloſe with, and engage the Brilliant; at the ſame time he hawled down his ſtudding ſails, wore round, and ſtood for the Bellona under his top-ſails, while captain Faulkner advanced towards him with an eaſy ſail, and ordered his quarters to be manned. The two ſhips were equal in burthen, in number of guns, and in weight of metal. The crew of the Courageux amounted to ſeven hundred men, commanded by M. du Guy Lambert. The Bellona's complement conſiſted of five hundred and fifty men; all the officers were perſons of known merit; and the commander had, on ſeveral occaſions, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his bravery and conduct. The fire on both ſides was ſuſpended till they were within muſquet ſhot of each other, when the engagement began with a terrible diſcharge of fire arms and artillery. In leſs than nine minutes all the Bellona's braces, bowlings, ſhrouds and rigging, were cut and ſhattered by the ſhot, and the mizzen-maſt fell over the ſtern, with all the men on the round-top, who nevertheleſs ſaved their lives by clambering into the port-holes of the gun-room. Apprehenſive that the enemy might ſeize this opportunity of eſcaping, captain Faulkner gave orders to board them immediately; but this attempt was ſoon rendered impracticable by the poſition of the two ſhips. The Courageux was now fallen athwart the bows of the Bellona, in which ſituation ſhe muſt have raked the latter fore and aft with great execution. The haul yards, and moſt of the other ropes by which the Bellona could be worked, were already ſhot away. Captain Faulkner, however, with the aſſiſtance of his maſter, made uſe of the ſtudding-ſails with ſuch ſucceſs, as to wear the ſhip quite round, and fall upon the oppoſite quarter of the Courageux. The officers and men now flew to the guns on that ſide of the ſhip oppoſed to the enemy, from whence they poured in a moſt dreadful diſcharge, and maintained it without intermiſſion or abatement. Every ſhot took place. The ſides of the Courageux were terribly ſhattered, and her decks ſtrewed with carnage. The enemy ſuſtained this fire for about twenty minutes, when the enſign was hauled down, and the engagement ceaſed; but in a ſhort time after a ſhot was fired from the lower tier of the Courageux; upon which the Britiſh ſeamen ran to their quarters, and, without waiting for orders, poured in two broadſides upon the enemy, who now called out for quarter, which was granted them. The Bellona ſuffered greatly in her rigging, but very little in the hull; and her number of killed and wounded did not exceed forty. The caſe was very different with the Courageux. Nothing was left ſtanding but her foremaſt and bowſprit; large breaches were made in her ſides; her decks were torn up in ſeveral parts; many of her guns were diſmounted; and her quarters were filled with mangled bodies of the dying and the dead. Above two hundred and twenty were killed outright; and half that number were brought aſhore wounded, at Liſbon, to which place the prize was conducted. This ſucceſs of the Bellona, was in a great meaſure owing to the brave conduct of captain Logie, who finding it would be impoſſible for him to acquire any thing but laurels from two ſhips, the leaſt of which was equal in ſtrength to the frigate he commanded, he reſolved to amuſe them in ſuch a manner, as to prevent either from aſſiſting the Courageux. Accordingly he began the attack on the Malicieuſe: but the other coming up immediately, he ſtood their whole fire all the time the great ſhips were engaged, and near an hour after ſhe had ſtruck her colours; when, having ſuffered conſiderable damage in their maſts and rigging, they both ſecured themſelves by flight.

This year the miniſtry were determined to attempt the reduction of Belleiſle. It contained one ſmall city called Le Palais; had three country towns, one hundred and three villages, and about five thouſand inhabitants. A ſquadron was accordingly equipped under the command of commodore Keppel, conſiſting of ten ſhips of the line, ſeveral frigates, two fire-ſhips, and two bomb-ketches, beſides tranſports. The troops deſtined for this expedition amounted to ten battalions, under the command of major-general Hodgſon, aſſiſted by major-general Crawford, with proper engineers, ſome troops of light horſe, and a detachment of artillery. On the twenty-ninth of March the whole armament ſailed from Spithead; and on the ſeventh of April came to an anchor in Belleiſle road. The firſt attempt miſcarried; which was attended with the loſs of major Purcel, captain Oſborne, ſeveral other officers, and near five hundred men. It was ſome time before the weather would permit a ſecond to be made; but when it did, the prince of Orange man of war ſailed round the iſland in order to ſurvey the coaſt, and diſcover, if poſſible, ſome other place more favourable for a deſcent; but the whole ſeemed to be ſecured in ſuch a manner by rocks and batteries, as precluded all acceſs. Far from being diſcouraged by theſe difficulties, the commanders only thought of the moſt proper methods to remove them; and at length fixed on the following, which met with all the ſucceſs they could wiſh. On the twenty-ſecond in the morning the troops were diſpoſed in the flat-bottomed boats, and rowed to different parts of the iſland, as if they intended to land in ſeveral places; by which means the attention of the enemy was ſo diſtracted, that they knew not where to expect the deſcent, and were obliged to divide their forces at random. In the mean time, brigadier Lambert pitched upon the rocky point of Lomaria, where captain Paterſon, at the head of Beauclerk's grenadiers, and captain Murray, with a detachment of marines, climbed the precipice with amazing intrepidity, and ſuſtained the fire of a ſtrong body of the enemy, till they were ſupported by the reſt of the troops, who now landed very faſt, when the French were obliged to abandon their batteries. But this advantage was not gained without loſs. About forty men were killed, and ſeveral wounded; colonel Mackenzie, and the captains Murray and Paterſon being of the number of the latter.

When the French governor perceived that the Engliſh troops were diſembarked to the number of eight thouſand men, he recalled all his detachments to Palais, and prepared for a vigorous defence. On the twenty-third of April the Engliſh troops were formed in columns, and began their march towards the capital. On the ſecond of May the beſiegers broke ground; but next night the garriſon made a ſally, and attacked the trenches with ſuch vigour, that the piquets on the left were put into diſorder. Major-general Crawford, who commanded the trenches, rallied the troops, and endeavoured, by his own example, to animate them; but on this occaſion they did not act with their uſual ſpirit; ſome hundreds were killed, and the major-general, with his two aids du camp, fell into the hands of the enemy. The engineers giving it as their opinion that the works could not be properly advanced till the enemy's redoubts ſhould be taken, the general made the proper diſpoſitions for the attack, which began on the thirteenth at day-break. A terrible fire from four pieces of cannon, and above thirty cohorns, was poured into the redoubt on the right of the enemy's flank; after which a detachment of marines, ſupported by part of Loudon's regiment, advanced to the parapet, drove the French from the works, and, after a very obſtinate diſpute, took poſſeſſion of the place. The other five redoubts were all reduced in the ſame manner, and great ſlaughter was made of the enemy, who withdrew into the citadel; and ſuch was the ardour of the aſſailants, that they entered the ſtreets of Palais with the fugitives, a great number of whom were made priſoners, and took poſſeſſion of the town, in which they found the French hoſpital, and ſome Engliſh priſoners who had been taken in different ſallies. Every endeavour was now exerted for the reduction of the citadel, and by the end of May a breach was made, which by the ſeventh of June became practicable, when M. de St. Croix, the governor, being apprehenſive of a general aſſault, demanded a capitulation. This being granted him on the moſt honourable terms, the articles were immediately ſigned and executed, and poſſeſſion of the citadel was taken by Beauclerk's grenadiers.

Thus while hoſtilities were raging in almoſt every quarter of the world, the congreſs already mentioned at Augſburg was intended to be opened for a general peace; but the Engliſh miniſtry finding in the mean time that no faith could be placed in the proceedings of the French; and at the ſame time the Spaniſh ambaſſador preſenting a very unſeaſonable, and even unprecedented interpoſition of Spain, the intention was rendered abortive, and the intended congreſs at Augſburg never took place. The Spaniſh ambaſſador was called upon to diſavow ſo ſtrange a proceeding; but he returned a verbal, and was ſoon after authorized by his court to return a written anſwer, in which he openly avowed and juſtified the ſtep taken by the French agent, as entirely agreeable to the ſentiments of his maſter. He declared, that the kings of France and Spain were united, not only by the ties of blood, but by a mutual intereſt. He applauded the humanity and greatneſs of mind, which his moſt Chriſtian majeſty demonſtrated in the propoſition that was complained of. He inſiſted much on the ſincere deſire of peace, the only motive which influenced the conduct of the two monarchs; and he haughtily added, "That if his maſter had been governed by any other principles, his catholic majeſty, giving full ſcope to his greatneſs, would have ſpoken for himſelf, and as became his dignity." It appeared from the whole of this paper, that the court of Spain was regularly apprized of every ſtep that was taken in the negotiation; that her judgment was appealed to upon every point, and her authority called in aid to force the acceptance of the terms offered by France; that there was a perfect union of affections, intereſts, and councils between thoſe two courts; and the miniſter of the former, ſo far from denying or palliating this conduct, ſeemed to make it his boaſt.

Theſe circumſtances convinced Mr. Pitt that the intentions of Spain were by no means equivocal, and that this partiality, which they ſtrongly avowed, not only by declarations but by facts, would drive them into all the meaſures of France. That a war on that account was abſolutely inevitable; and if, for the preſent moment, the Spaniards had rather have delayed their declaration of war, than laid aſide their hoſtile intentions, it was in order to ſtrike the blow at their own time, and with the greater effect; that therefore their reaſons for delaying to act, were the very motives which ought to induce us to act with the utmoſt ſpeed and vigour; that we ought to conſider the evaſions of that court as a refuſal of ſatisfaction, and that refuſal as a declaration of war; that we ought from prudence, as well as from ſpirit, to ſecure to ourſelves the firſt blow; and to be practically convinced, that the early and effective meaſures which had ſo large a ſhare in reducing France to the dependence upon Spain, would alſo be the fitteſt for deterring or diſabling Spain from affording any protection to France; that to carry on this war with vigour, it was only neceſſary to continue our preſent efforts; no new armament would be neceſſary; and that, if any war could provide its own reſources, it muſt be a war with Spain; that their flota had not yet arrived, and that the taking of it would at once diſable their hands and ſtrengthen ours. This procedure, ſo ſuited to the dignity of the nation, and the inſults it had received, would be a leſſon to Spain, and to every other power, how they preſumed to dictate in our affairs, and to intermeddle with a menacing mediation, and an officiouſneſs as inſidious as it was audacious; and that we would allow our enemies, whether ſecret or declared, no time for dangerous contemplation.

We muſt here obſerve, in juſtification of the conduct of this great ſtateſman, that he had received private intelligence of a ſecret alliance having been formed between France and Spain; for the laſt-mentioned power had actually entered into a family compact with France, by which both nations engaged to carry on the war in conjunction. Hence it was that the Engliſh ſecretary propoſed in the privy-council to anticipate the deſigns of Spain, by an immediate declaration of war againſt that power; but they were determined to act with more deliberation, and deſired a certainty of an offence before they demanded a reparation; alledging, that Spain had yet given no proofs of her hoſtile intentions; and that the Engliſh miniſter at the court of Madrid, ſtill continued to aſſure them of her pacific diſpoſition. Fired with indignation at this oppoſition of ſentiment, Mr. Pitt declared, "That this was the time for humbling the whole houſe of Bourbon; that if this opportunity was let ſlip, it might never be recovered; and if he could not prevail in this inſtance, he was reſolved it ſhould be the laſt time of his ſitting in that council. He thanked the miniſters of the late king for their ſupport; ſaid he was himſelf called to the miniſtry by the voice of the people, to whom he conſidered himſelf accountable for his conduct; and that he would no longer remain in a ſituation which made him reſponſible for meaſures he was no longer allowed to guide." On the diviſion, Mr. Pitt and lord Temple were the only voices in favour of the immediate declaration declaration of war againſt the Spaniards; upon which, having declared their reaſons in writing, they reſigned their employments.

When Mr. Pitt reſigned, the king received him with an eaſy firmneſs, without deſiring him to reſume his office; but expreſſed his concern for the loſs of ſo able a ſervant, and made him an unlimited offer of any rewards in the power of the crown to beſtow; at the ſame time obſerving, that he ſhould have found himſelf under the greateſt difficulty how to have acted, had the council concurred as fully in ſupporting the meaſure propoſed by Mr. Pitt, as they had done in rejecting it. Mr. Pitt, ſenſibly touched at his majeſty's generous condeſcenſion, anſwered, "I confeſs, Sir, I had but too much reaſon to expect your majeſty's diſpleaſure. I did not come prepared for this exceeding goodneſs. Pardon me, Sir,—it overpowers, it oppreſſes me."——He then burſt into tears. The next day the king ſettled on him a penſion of three thouſand pounds a year for life, and the life of his ſon; his lady being, at the ſame time, created a peereſs in her own right: a penſion well beſtowed; nobility honourably acquired, and juſtly merited. The gazette immediately gave notice to the public of all theſe tranſactions; which were followed by a letter from our ambaſſador in Spain, containing an account of the pacific language of that court, and of the ſtrong aſſurances they gave of a deſire to accommodate all differences in an amicable manner. This was intended by the miniſtry to oppoſe that torrent of popular rage, which it was apprehended would proceed from Mr. Pitt's reſignation; and for ſome time it had the deſired effect.

Candour and impartiality muſt always acknowledge that no man was ever better fitted than Mr. Pitt, to be the prime miniſter in a great and powerful nation. He was called to the miniſtry by the voice of the people; and, what is more rare, he held it with their approbation; and under him, for the firſt time, adminiſtration and popularity were united. Under him, Great Britain carried on the moſt important war in which ſhe was ever engaged, with greater ſplendour, and with more ſucceſs than ſhe had ever enjoyed at the head of the moſt powerful alliance. He never ſuffered the enemy to breathe, but overwhelmed them with reiterated blows, and kept up the alarm in every quarter. If one of his expeditions were not ſo well calculated, or ſo ſucceſsfully executed, amends were made by a ſecond, and by a third. The ſpirit of the nation was not ſuffered for a moment to ſubſide; and the French, daunted by the multitude and celerity of his enterprizes, ſeemed to have almoſt loſt all power of reſiſtance. In ſhort, he revived the military genius of the people, ſupported ably our allies, extended our trade, augmented our dominions, and raiſed our reputation.

The members of the privy-council being aſſembled, in the month of July, his majeſty acquainted them, "That, having nothing ſo much at heart as to procure the welfare and happineſs of his people; and to render the ſame ſtable and permanent to poſterity, he had, ever ſince his acceſſion to the throne, turned his thoughts towards the choice of a princeſs for his conſort; and now with great ſatisfaction acquainted them, that, after the fulleſt information, and mature deliberation, he had come to a reſolution to demand in marriage the princeſs Charlotte of Mecklenburgh Strelitz; a princeſs diſtinguiſhed by every eminent virtue and amiable endowment, whoſe illuſtrious line had conſtantly ſhewed the firmeſt zeal for the proteſtant religion, and a particular attachment to his family; that he had judged proper to communicate to them theſe intentions, in order that they might be fully apprized of a matter ſo highly important to him and to his kingdoms, and which he perſuaded himſelf would be moſt acceptable to all his loving ſubjects." This declaration was ſo agreeable to the council, that they unanimouſly requeſted it might be made public for the ſatisfaction of the nation in general. The earl of Harcourt was appointed ambaſſador plenipotentiary to the court of Mecklenburgh Strelitz to demand the princeſs, and ſign the contract of marriage; and the royal yachts were prepared, under convoy of a ſquadron commanded by lord Anſon, to convey the future queen to England. The ducheſſes of Ancaſter and Hamilton, together with the counteſs of Effingham, were appointed ladies of the bedchamber, in order to attend her from the court of Mecklenburgh to that of England. On the ſeventeenth of Auguſt, the princeſs, accompanied by the reigning duke, her brother, ſet out for Mirow. Next day ſhe arrived at Perleberg. From thence ſhe continued her journey by Leutzen to Gourde, and on the twenty-ſecond reached Stade, under a general diſcharge of cannon, and public joy was expreſſed by every poſſible demonſtration; on the twenty-third, ſhe embarked in the yacht at Cuxhaven, where ſhe was ſaluted by the Britiſh ſquadron appointed for her convoy. After a tedious voyage of ten days, the princeſs landed on the ſeventh of September in the afternoon at Harwich. She advanced with her attendants by the way of Colcheſter to Witham, and lodged at a houſe belonging to the earl of Abercorn. When arrived at the garden gate of St. James's palace, ſhe was handed out of her coach by the duke of Devonſhire, in quality of lord-chamberlain. At the gate ſhe was received by the duke of York, whom ſhe took for his majeſty; and in the garden, this amiable princeſs was met by the king himſelf with the greateſt mark of affection, and welcomed to England by the loudeſt and moſt general acclamations of the people, who flocked in crouds to meet and welcome their new queen. The nuptial ceremony was performed on the eighth, the ſame evening of her arrival, in the chapel royal, which was, on this occaſion, very magnificently decorated. All the great officers of ſtate, the nobility, peers, and peereſſes, and the foreign miniſters, as well as the royal family, were preſent at the ſervice. Addreſſes on this auſpicious event now flowed from every part of the Britiſh dominions, expreſſive of the moſt unfeigned joy and ſincerity.

The coronation ceremony now ſucceded that of the nuptials on the twenty-ſecond. Weſtminſter hall was prepared for the royal banquet, by removing the courts of judicature, boarding the floor, erecting canopies, and building three rows of galleries for the accommodation of ſpectators. A platform was laid between the hall and Weſtminſter abbey, where the king is crowned. All the houſes and ſtreets within ſight of the proceſſion were faced and crouded with benches and ſcaffolding, which extended on both ſides within the abbey from the weſtern entrance almoſt up to the choir. Theſe occaſional erections were ſurpriſingly calculated for ſecurity and convenience; but when they were occupied by above two hundred thouſand people of both ſexes, arrayed in gay apparel, they filled the mind with an aſtoniſhing idea of the wealth and populouſneſs of Great Britain, and almoſt outvied the proceſſion, notwithſtanding the incredible profuſion of jewels and finery, and all the other circumſtances of pomp by which it was diſtinguiſhed. The principal objects, however, ſtill maintained their importance in the eyes and boſoms of all the ſpectators, who could not, without the moſt lively emotions of admiration and joy, behold the royal pair. This ceremony was followed with the anniverſary pageants that celebrate the election of a new lord mayor in the city of London. As the kings and queens of Great Britain are always entertained at Guildhall by the magiſtrate who happens to be choſen in the year of the coronation, extraordinary preparations were made for the reception of their majeſties: who honoured the banquet, with a great number of the nobility.

As ſoon as the new parliament met, November the third, the king, being ſeated on the throne, commanded the attendance of the commons; to whom he ſignified his pleaſure, by the mouth of the lord-chancellor, that they ſhould return to their houſe, and chuſe a new ſpeaker. Accordingly their unanimous choice fell upon Sir John Cuſt, a gentleman of extenſive knowledge and diſtinguiſhed probity. His majeſty, repairing again to the houſe of peers on the ſixth, approved of the ſpeaker, and thus addreſſed the parliament:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"At the opening of the firſt parliament, ſummoned and elected under my authority, I with pleaſure take notice of an event, which has made me completely happy, and given univerſal joy to my loving ſubjects. My marriage with a princeſs, eminently diſtinguiſhed by every virtue, and amiable endowment, whilſt it affords me all poſſible domeſtic comfort, cannot but highly contribute to the happineſs of my kingdoms; which has been, and always ſhall be, my firſt object in every action of my life.

"It has been my earneſt wiſh that this firſt period of my reign might be marked with another felicity; the reſtoring of the bleſſings of peace to my people, and putting an end to the calamities of war, under which ſo great a part of Europe ſuffers. But though overtures were made to me, and my good brother and ally the king of Pruſſia, by the ſeveral belligerent powers, in order to a general pacification, for which purpoſe a congreſs was appointed; and propoſitions were made to me by France, for a particular peace with that crown, which were followed by an actual negotiation; yet that congreſs hath not hitherto taken place, and the negotiation with France is entirely broken off.

"The ſincerity of my diſpoſition to effectuate this good work has been manifeſted in the progreſs of it; and I have the conſolation to reflect, that the continuance of the war, and the farther effuſion of Chriſtian blood, to which it was the deſire of my heart to put a ſtop, cannot with juſtice be imputed to me.

"Our military operations have been in no degree ſuſpended or delayed; and it has pleaſed God to grant us farther important ſucceſſes, by the conqueſts of the iſlands of Belleiſle and Dominico; and by the reduction of Pondicherry, which hath in a manner annihilated the French power in the Eaſt Indies. In other parts, where the enemy's numbers were greatly ſuperior, their principal deſigns and projects have been generally diſappointed, by a conduct which does the higheſt honour to the diſtinguiſhed capacity of my general prince Ferdinand of Brunſwick, and by the valour of my troops. The magnanimity and ability of the king of Pruſſia have eminently appeared in reſiſting ſuch numerous armies, and ſurmounting ſuch great difficulties.

"In this ſituation, I am glad to have an opportunity of receiving the trueſt information of the ſenſe of my people, by a new choice of their repreſentatives. I am fully perſuaded you will agree with me in opinion, that the ſteady exertion of our moſt vigorous efforts, in every part where the enemy may ſtill be attacked with advantage, is the only means that can be productive of ſuch a peace, as may with reaſon be expected from our ſucceſſes. It is, therefore, my fixed reſolution, with your concurrence and ſupport, to carry on the war, in the moſt effectual manner, for the intereſt and advantage of my kingdoms; and to maintain, to the utmoſt of my power, the good faith and honour of my crown, by adhering firmly to the engagements entered into with my allies. In this I will perſevere, until my enemies, moved by their own loſſes and diſtreſſes, and touched with the miſeries of ſo many nations, ſhall yield to the equitable conditions of an honourable peace; in which caſe, as well as in the proſecution of the war, I do aſſure you, no conſideration whatever ſhall make me depart from the true intereſts of theſe my kingdoms, and the honour and dignity of my crown."

"Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I am heartily ſorry, that the neceſſity of large ſupplies appears ſo clearly from what has already been mentioned. The proper eſtimates for the ſervices of the enſuing year ſhall be laid before you; and I deſire you to grant me ſuch ſupplies as may enable me to proſecute the war with vigour, and as your welfare and ſecurity, in the preſent critical juncture, require, that we may happily put the laſt hand to this great work. Whatſoever you give ſhall be faithfully applied.

"I dare ſay your affectionate regard for me and the queen makes you go before me in what I am next to mention: the making an adequate and honourable proviſion for her ſupport, in caſe ſhe ſhould ſurvive me. This is what not only her royal dignity, but her own merit calls for, and I earneſtly recommend it to your conſideration.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I have ſuch confidence in the zeal and good affections of this parliament, that I think it quite ſuperfluous to uſe any exhortations to excite you to a right conduct. I will only add, that there never was a ſituation in which unanimity, firmneſs, and diſpatch, were more neceſſary for the ſafety, honour, and true intereſt of Great Britain."

Affectionate and loyal addreſſes were now preſented to his majeſty by both houſes, in which they aſſured him he might rely on their exerting themſelves, in the moſt effectual manner, to maintain the dignity of his crown, and oblige the enemy to accept an honourable peace; that they would make ſuch ample and honourable proviſion for his illuſtrious conſort, as might enable her to ſupport her royal dignity with proper luſtre, in caſe ſhe ſhould ſurvive his majeſty: and that his faithful commons would grant ſupplies adequate to the ſeveral ſervices that his majeſty's wiſdom ſhould think neceſſary. "That, ſenſible of the difficult criſis in which they were aſſembled, they were determined to concur with the greateſt firmneſs and unanimity, in whatever might contribute to the public welfare, might tend to defeat the views and expectations of their enemies, and convince the world, that there are no difficulties which his majeſty's wiſdom and perſeverance, with the aſſiſtance of his parliament, could not ſurmount."

As ſoon as the commons had preſented their addreſs, they proceeded to ſettle the ſupplies, which amounted to eighteen millions two hundred twenty-nine thouſand one hundred thirty-five pounds eighteen ſhillings and eleven pence half-penny. But they had hardly ſettled this important meaſure, when advice arrived from the earl of Briſtol, his majeſty's ambaſſador at Madrid, importing, that having demanded a categorical declaration with reſpect to the part his majeſty intended to act in the diſputes between the courts of London and Verſailles, he had received at firſt a very evaſive and unſatisfactory anſwer. He added, that on repeating his remonſtrance, he was anſwered, that the Spaniſh monarch had already taken his meaſures in concert with the court of Verſailles, and that war was that moment declared againſt Great Britain; and therefore, when he thought fit, he might retire home.

War now was declared againſt Spain with the uſual ceremonies, on the 4th of January. His majeſty went to the houſe of peers on the 19th, and delivered a ſpeech to both houſes; in which he obſerved, that he had aſſured his parliament of his ſincere diſpoſition to put an end to the calamities of war, and to reſtore the public tranquillity on ſolid and laſting foundations, that no impartial perſon either at home or abroad could ſuſpect him of unneceſſarily kindling a new war in Europe. But notwithſtanding this he acquainted them, "That ſince their receſs, he had found himſelf indiſpenſibly obliged to declare war againſt Spain. He obſerved, that his own conduct, ſince his acceſſion to the throne, as well as that of the late king, his grandfather, had been ſo full of good-will and friendſhip, ſo averſe to the laying hold of ſeveral juſt grounds of complaint, which might have been alledged, and ſo attentive to the advantage of the Catholic king and his family, that it was matter of the greateſt ſurprize to find that engagements had, in this conjuncture, been entered into between that crown and France; and a treaty made to unite all the branches of the houſe of Bourbon in the moſt ambitious and dangerous deſigns againſt the commerce and independency of the reſt of Europe, and particularly of theſe kingdoms. He expreſſed his reliance on the divine bleſſing, on the juſtice of his cauſe, on the zealous and powerful aſſiſtance of his faithful ſubjects, and the concurrence of his allies, who muſt find themſelves involved in the pernicious and extenſive projects of his enemies. He added, that he left theſe conſiderations with his parliament, full of the juſteſt confidence, that the honour of his crown, and the intereſts of his kingdoms were ſafe in their hands." Immediately both houſes took this ſpeech into conſideration, and each preſented an addreſs, aſſuring his majeſty, that they would afford him the moſt conſtant and adequate ſupport. After which, the public buſineſs being finiſhed, on the fourth of June, the king went to the houſe of peers, and put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne, in which he expreſſed the higheſt approbation of zeal, unanimity and diſpatch, which, during their proceedings, had ſo ſignally appeared.

One of the acts which paſſed this ſeſſion gave univerſal offence, as being burthenſome to the people, eſpecially the induſtrious and laborious part of the nation. This was an additional duty of three ſhillings for every barrel of beer, excluſive of the duties of exciſe, to be paid by the brewer; and as porter in the city, and ale in the country, were eſteemed neceſſary for the ſupport of thoſe engaged in laborious employments, a tax which occaſioned porter to be raiſed from three-pence to three-pence half-penny a pot, was therefore conſidered a very grievous impoſition.

There was nothing more efficacious in producing the peace which followed, than the ſucceſs of the Britiſh arms in the Weſt Indies. The late miniſter, before his reſignation of the ſeals, had determined to employ a very conſiderable part of the Britiſh forces againſt the French colonies in the Weſt Indies. Nor was this reſolution merely ſpeculative; a ſtrong ſquadron was fitted out, and ſailed from Spithead in the month of October in the preceding year. This armament had under their convoy a number of tranſports with four battalions from Belleiſle, to join at Barbadoes a ſtrong body of forces from North America, together with ſome regiments and volunteers from Guadaloupe and the Leeward Iſlands, and proceed in concert with the fleet already on that ſtation, and make a conqueſt of Martinico, which, ſince the attempt of general Hopſon, had been ſtrengthened with new fortifications, and a ſtrong body of troops. The armament from North America and England, under the command of major-general Monckton, and rear-admiral Rodney, amounting to eighteen battalions, and as many ſhips of the line, beſides frigates, bombs, and fire-ſhips, having rendezvouſed at Barbadoes, ſailed from thence on the fifth of January, and on the eighth the fleet and tranſports anchored in St. Ann's bay, in the eaſtern part of Martinico, the men of war having firſt ſilenced ſome batteries which the enemy had erected on that part of the coaſt. In the courſe of this ſervice, the Raiſonable, a ſhip of the line, was, by the ignorance of the pilot, run upon a reef of rocks, from whence ſhe could not be got off; but the men were happily ſaved, together with her ſtores and artillery. The general not thinking this a proper place for diſembarking, detached two brigades under the command of the brigadiers Haldimand and Grant, to the bay of Petite Anſe, where a battery was cannonaded, and taken, by the ſeamen and marines. Theſe brigades were ſoon followed by the whole army, and the reſt of the ſquadron; when ſome other batteries being ſilenced, general Monckton, with the forces, landed on the ſixteenth, in the neighbourhood of the Cas des Navires, and having received a reinforcement of two battalions of marines from the ſquadron, he determined on beſieging the town of Fort-Royal immediately.

Early in the morning of the twenty-fourth of June, brigadier Grant, at the head of the grenadiers, ſuſtained by lord Rollo's brigade, attacked the advanced poſts of the enemy under the briſk fire of the batteries; while brigadier Ruſane, with his brigade, reinforced by the marines, marched up on the right to attack the redoubts that were raiſed along the ſhore; and the light infantry under colonel Scot, ſupported by the brigade of Walſh, advanced on the left of a plantation, in order, if poſſible, to turn the enemy; in which attempt they ſucceeded, and by nine in the morning were in poſſeſſion of the Morne Tortueſon, and all the redoubts and batteries with which it was fortified. The enemy retired in confuſion to the town of Fort-Royal, and to the Morne Garnier, which being more high and inacceſſible than the other, was deemed impregnable. During the conteſt for the poſſeſſion of Tortueſon, brigadier Haldimand, at the head of his brigade, with two battalions of Highlanders, and a corps of light infantry, under major Leland, were ordered to paſs the ravine ſome way to the left, and turn a body of the enemy poſted on the oppoſite heights, hoping, by that method to divide their forces; but the country being difficult of acceſs, it was late before this paſſage was effected. In the mean time, the general, perceiving the enemy giving way on all ſides, ordered colonel Scot's light infantry, with Walſh's brigade, and a diviſion of the grenadiers, to advance on the left to a plantation, from whence they drove the enemy, and then took poſſeſſion of an advantageous poſt oppoſite to the Morne Garnier. Next day batteries were begun to be erected againſt the citadel of Fort-Royal, but in the execution of this work our troops were greatly harraſſed by the enemy's fire from the Morne Garnier; and on the twenty-ſeventh, about four in the afternoon, they made a furious attack, with the greateſt part of their forces, on the poſts defended by the light infantry and brigadier Haldimand; but met with ſo warm a reception, that they ſoon retired in diſorder. Such was the ardour of the Engliſh troops, that they paſſed the ravine with the fugitives, ſeized their batteries and took poſſeſſion of the ground, being ſuſtained by the brigade of Walſh, and the grenadiers under Grant, who, at the beginning of the attack, marched up to their aſſiſtance. Major Leland, with his light infantry, finding no reſiſtance on the left, advanced to the redoubt, which was abandoned, and the brigadiers Walſh, Grant, and Haldimand, moved up in order to ſupport him; thus by nine at night the Britiſh troops were in poſſeſſion of this ſtrong poſt. Next day the governor perceiving the Engliſh employed in erecting batteries on the different heights which commanded the citadel, ordered the chamade to be beat, and ſurrendered by capitulation. On the fourth of February, the gate was delivered up to the victors, and next morning the garriſon, amounting to eight hundred men, marched out with all the honours of war. Immediately after the reduction of Fort Royal, deputations were ſent from different parts of the iſland, requeſting a capitulation: but M. de la Touche, the governor-general, retired with his forces to St. Pierre, which he propoſed to defend to the laſt extremity. On the ſeventh, Pidgeon iſland, which was ſtrongly fortified, and eſteemed one of the beſt defences of the harbour, ſurrendered at the firſt ſummons. This conqueſt was obtained at the ſmall expence of about four hundred men, including a few officers, killed and wounded in the different attacks; but the loſs of the enemy was very conſiderable. General Monckton was juſt ſetting out for the reduction of St. Pierre, when two deputies arrived from M. de la Touche, with propoſals of capitulation for the whole iſland, which being agreed to, on the fourteenth the terms were ſettled, and the capitulation ſigned. On the ſixteenth the Engliſh commander took poſſeſſion of St. Pierre, and all the poſts in that neighbourhood; while the French governor-general with M. Rouille, the lieutenant-governor, the ſtaff officers, and about three hundred and twenty grenadiers, were embarked on board ſome tranſports, and conveyed to France. The ſurrender of Martinico was followed by that of its dependent iſlands, by which means the Engliſh were the ſole poſſeſſors of all the Caribbees. The Britiſh miniſtry now ſent a fleet againſt the Havannah, the center of the Spaniſh commerce, and at this time ſo ſtrongly defended, that the taking of it was reckoned an impoſſibility, a thought this very ſeldom conceived by the Britiſh forces. Nineteen ſhips of the line, with many ſmaller veſſels, were fitted out, under the command of admiral Pocock; and about ten thouſand land forces, commanded by the earl of Albemarle. At firſt the admiral intended to have landed on the ſouth ſide of the iſland of Cuba, where it was ſuppoſed he might fall in with the Spaniſh galleons; but that opinion was over-ruled in a council of war, and the fleet continued on a courſe of ſeven hundred miles, in a very dangerous ſea. On the ninth of June, they came within ſight of St. Jago, on the eaſtern extremity of the iſland of Cuba. St. Jago is the capital of Cuba; but although the courts of juſtice are held there, yet the Havannah is the ſeat of commerce, and, conſequently, of the utmoſt importance. From St. Jago the fleet continued their voyage to the Havannah; but when they arrived there, they found they had more difficulties to encounter than they had as yet imagined. The paſſage to the harbour is extremely narrow, and above half a mile in length, at the end of which is a large baſon, where a thouſand ſhips may ride in ſafety. On one ſide of the narrow paſſage is the Moro Caſtle, a ſtrong fort built for the defence of the place, and to prevent any ſhips from coming in but ſuch as have paſſports. To the weſtward of the harbour ſtands the town, ſtrongly fortified with a parapet, redoubts and baſtions; the whole being ſurrounded by a ditch, and cannon placed in the moſt judicious manner.

In hopes of diverting the attention of the enemy the admiral bore away, with a large part of the fleet, to the weſtward, where he made as if he would have landed; while commodore Keppel and captain Hervey landed the forces on the eaſt of the harbour, without the loſs of a man, although the Spaniards had a conſiderable fleet then lying at anchor, which might have done them great damage. The earl of Albemarle divided the army into eight brigades; one of which, under the command of general Elliot, was ordered to march up the country, in order to prevent any ſupplies being ſent to the town, and to cover the ſiege in the rear. General Keppel and colonel Howe were ordered to make a diverſion on the weſt of the town; while the earl of Albemarle, with the main body of the forces, attacked the Moro Caſtle, that being the grand object in view becauſe it defended the entrance to the harbour. The difficulties they had to encounter were innumerable. There was no freſh water to be had; and as the men were obliged to cut their way through woods, and drag the cannon along with them, many of them died on the ſpot through the heat of the climate, and the fatigues they underwent in the ſervice of their country. But courage and perſeverance overcame all difficulties; for batteries were erected in the night on the riſing grounds, to cover the approaches, and make way for the reduction of the place. To do juſtice to the Spaniards, it muſt be acknowledged that they defended the place with great bravery, and for ſome time, the fire was, in a manner, equal on both ſides. On the twenty-ninth of June, in the evening, they made a ſally; but although they acted with great courage and reſolution, they were obliged to retreat, with the loſs of above three hundred men. All the batteries being now opened, the admiral ordered the Cambridge, the Dragon, and the Marlborough, to ſail up to the fort, under the command of captain Hervey; and then a moſt dreadful firing began. The Spaniſh artillery was well conducted, and it appeared that the beſt officers under their government were at this time at the Havannah. As the Moro caſtle was ſituated on a high rock, the ſhips could not, after ſeven hours firing, make the leaſt impreſſions on it. In the attempt the Engliſh loſt one hundred and thirty men, which is not to be wondered at when we conſider, that, beſides the Moro caſtle, they had another battery playing upon them from an oppoſite fort, which galled them exceſſively; ſo that they were obliged to retire, otherwiſe they would have been deſtroyed. Among thoſe killed in this hazardous attempt, was captain Gooſtrey, a brave officer, who had on many former occaſions, given the moſt ſignal proofs of his courage; but duty, and the love of glory were the ſole objects he had in view. When the Engliſh men of war were gone to rejoin the fleet, the Spaniards turned their attention to the eaſtern part of the fort, and reſolved to hold out to the laſt extremity; ſo that the Engliſh officers found the reduction of the place would be a work of time. Indeed, an unforeſeen accident happened at this time, which tended, in a great meaſure, to retard their operations, namely, the reduction of a battery, which took fire by the exploſion of a mortar. Sickneſs likewiſe rendered many of the men incapable of acting, and the few who remained in health were fatigued beyond deſcription. Add to this the want of freſh proviſions, the heat of the climate, and the inſupportable fatigue which both officers and men underwent, by which many gave themſelves up to deſpair, and ſunk under the load of their miſery: but at this time they received a very ſeaſonable ſupply; for a fleet arrived from New York, and another from Jamaica, having on board a large quantity of proviſions, from which both army and navy derived new life and ſpirits.

As the governor of the Havannah knew that the Engliſh would make themſelves maſters of the Moro caſtle, unleſs he could ſend freſh reinforcements to it, he therefore ordered one thouſand two hundred men to be put on board the boats in the harbour, and to land and attack the Engliſh. Accordingly, theſe men landed, and attacked our forces in three different places, but with ſo little ſucceſs, that upwards of four hundred were left dead on the ſpot; ſome were drowned, and the reſt with much difficulty ſaved themſelves by getting into their boats. On the thirtieth of July, the miners blew up a part of the wall, by which a breach was made; and although it was ſmall, yet the engineers were of opinion that the army might attack it. The Engliſh troops now mounted the breach in ſuch good order, that the enemy became intimidated, after above four hundred of them had been killed, among whom was the marquis de Gonſales, the ſecond in command, a brave officer, who had exerted himſelf to the utmoſt during the ſiege, and died animating the ſoldiers to defend the place. The ſame fate attended Don Lewis de Velaſco, the commander in chief, who diſdaining to áſk quarter, collected as many men as yet remained, and making a ſtand with them, received a mortal wound, and died in the bed of honour. The Engliſh being now in poſſeſſion of the fort, which had coſt the lives of many brave men, during a ſiege of fourteen days, turned the cannon againſt the town. Several batteries were, at the ſame time, erected on the riſing grounds; and the earl of Albemarle being willing to ſave as many lives as poſſible, ſent a meſſage to the governor, deſiring him to ſurrender, as it would be in vain to hold out any longer; but the governor, though he returned a polite anſwer to the earl, yet refuſed to comply, declaring that he would hold it out to the laſt extremity. In conſequence of this the firing immediately began on both ſides; but in a little more than ſix hours all the artillery belonging to the enemy were ſilenced, and the north baſtion of the city was almoſt diſabled. This reduced the Spaniard to reaſon; and accordingly about two in the afternoon, white flags were diſplayed all round the place, and in a ſhort time a flag of truce arrived at the head quarters with propoſals for a capitulation. The terms, however, which the Spaniſh governor thought proper to tranſmit, were not granted: he demanded that the ſhips in the harbour ſhould be ſent to Spain, and that the harbour ſhould be declared neutral. Theſe appeared rather the demands of a conqueror than a fallen enemy; they were, therefore refuſed, and hoſtilities were ordered to be renewed. This produced the deſired effect; the enemy thought proper to recede from their demands and to treat upon very different terms; ſo that a capitulation was ſigned on the thirteenth of Auguſt, by which the inhabitants were ſecured in the enjoyment of their own laws and religion, as well as in their private property; and next day the Engliſh took poſſeſſion of this important conqueſt. The Spaniſh garriſon which was reduced to about ſeven hundred men, including officers, was permitted to march out with the honours of war; and it was ſtipulated that they and the ſailors ſhould be conveyed to Old Spain. About five hundred of the Britiſh troops, including fifteen officers, were killed, or died of their wounds, during the progreſs of this ſiege, and about ſeven hundred, among whom were nine officers, were carried off by ſickneſs. The conquerors found in the place great quantities of artillery, ſmall arms, ammunition, and warlike ſtores. Twelve ſhips of the line, two upon the ſtocks, and ſeveral trading veſſels likewiſe fell into the hands of the Engliſh. But beſides theſe captures they acquired to the amount of about three millions ſterling in ſilver, tobacco and valuable merchandize, collected on his catholic majeſty's account; which at once rendered the enemy's loſs irreparable, and indemnified the Britiſh nation for the expence of this expedition, which was carried into execution with the utmoſt alacrity, and afforded many inſtances of true capacity and courage.

Not only in this conqueſt did the arms of Great Britain triumph over thoſe of Spain. A ſcheme had been projected by the miniſtry for making a deſcent on the iſland of Manilla in the Eaſt Indies: where is the port from whence two large ſhips are annually ſent acroſs the vaſt Pacific Ocean to the port of Acapulco, one of the ſea-ports of Mexico, laden with ſpices, ſtuffs, jewels, and other rich merchandize of India. An attempt was to be made on this iſland by part of the ſquadron of vice-admiral Corniſh, and the troops deſtined for the expedition were to be under the command of brigadier-general Draper. The beginning of Auguſt, admiral Corniſh ſailed in two diviſions, and on the nineteenth arrived at Malacca, where the fleet was watered, and a large quantity of rattans collected for making gabions. On the twenty-third of September they anchored in the bay of Manilla, where the enemy were but ill prepared for a defence, and greatly alarmed at this unexpected viſit. The governor was the archbiſhop, who aſſumes the title of captain-general of the Philippine iſlands: but the garriſon conſiſting of eight hundred men, was commanded by the marquis de Villa Medina, who now reinforced it with a body of ten thouſand Indians, from the province of Pampanga; but theſe were undiſciplined, and formed rather a rude rabble of people, than an army. The admiral was fortunate enough to find a convenient place for landing the troops, about two miles to the ſouthward of the city of Manilla; and immediately made the proper diſpoſitions for that purpoſe. The three frigates, Argo, Sea-horſe and Seaford, were ſtationed very near the ſhore, to cover the deſcent, three diviſions of the forces were put on board the boats of the fleet, conducted by the captains Parker, Kempenfeldt, and Brereton of the navy, and ſoon landed at the church and village of Malata. This was the time for the enemy to have rendered the attempt abortive, and they accordingly aſſembled in great numbers to oppoſe the deſcent; but the covering frigates kept ſuch a continual fire of cannon and ſmall arms, that they ſoon diſperſed and ſought their ſafety in a precipitate flight; ſo that the troops were diſembarked without the loſs of a ſingle man. Next day the general took poſſeſſion of the Polveriſta, a ſmall fort deſerted by the enemy, and which now proved an excellent place of arms for covering the landing of the ſtores and artillery. The curate's houſe was made the head quarters, and guarded by the ſeventy-ninth regiment. The church of the Hermita was occupied by colonel Monſon, with an advanced party of two hundred men. The marines were left at the Malata, in the neighbourhood of Polveriſta, to ſecure the communication with the fleet, and protect the ſtores and artillery. In the mean time a body of men approached within an hundred yards of the town, and poſſeſſed themſelves of the church of St. Jago, which they maintained, notwithſtanding it was expoſed to the continual fire of the enemy. The admiral, on the twenty-ſixth, landed a battalion of ſeamen, who were poſted between the head quarters and marines. Nor were the Spaniards idle on this occaſion. They were determined, if poſſible, to prevent the deſtruction of their city; and, accordingly, four hundred of their troops, under the command of the chevalier Fayette, with two field pieces, marched up on the right of the Engliſh advanced poſt, the flank of which they began to cannonade; but colonel Monſon, at the head of the piquets, and a ſmall reinforcement of marines, attacked them with ſo much fury, that they retreated with the greateſt precipitation, leaving one of their field pieces behind in their hurry.

There being a conſiderable breach made in the wall, it was hoped the garriſon would demand a capitulation; but finding they made no propoſitions of that nature, the Engliſh general reſolved to ſtorm the town. Accordingly, on the ſixth of October, at four in the morning, the troops allotted for this ſervice marched off from their quarters in ſmall bodies, to avoid ſuſpicion, and while they were aſſembling, a cloſe fire was maintained in order to clear thoſe places where the enemy might be lodged or intrenched. Every thing being in readineſs for the aſſault, lieutenant Ruſſel, at the head of ſixty volunteers, ſuſtained by the grenadiers, led the way. The engineers, pioneers, and other workmen followed in order to clear and widen the breach; and after them the remainder of the army was conducted in proper order. As ſoon as the aſſailants mounted the breach, the enemy fled in the utmoſt confuſion, and the troops entered the town with very little difficulty; the only oppoſition of conſequence which they met with being from a hundred Spaniards, who, with ſome Indians, were poſted at the royal guard-houſe, and, upon their refuſal to ſubmit, were all cut to pieces. The governor, with the principal magiſtrates, withdrew into the citadel, but that being, ſoon after, entirely demoliſhed, they were obliged to ſurrender priſoners of war. The Spaniſh officers, on giving their parole of honour, were enlarged, and all the Indians diſmiſſed in ſafety. This important conqueſt coſt the Engliſh only one hundred men, including officers. By the capitulation it was agreed, that the town and port of Cavite, with the iſlands and forts depending upon Manilla, were to be delivered up to his Britannic majeſty, and four millions of dollars paid as a ranſom for the city of Manilla, and the effects of the inhabitants, who, in return, were to be protected in their religion and private property. Admiral Corniſh, during the ſiege, having intercepted ſome letters to the Spaniſh governor, informing him, that the galleon, St. Phillipina, was arrived from Acapulco at Cajayagan, he determined to ſend in queſt of her. Accordingly the Panther man of war, and Argo frigate, commanded by the captains Parker and King, were detached on this ſervice; and on the thirtieth of October, being off the iſland of Capul, they diſcerned a ſail, ſtanding to the northward. Unfortunately the Panther was drove by the current among the Narangoes, and obliged to come to an anchor, but captain King in the frigate continuing the chace, came up with and engaged her for near two hours, during which his rigging ſuffered conſiderable damage, and obliged him to give over the attack till it could be repaired. In the mean time the Panther got under ſail again, and in her turn engaged the enemy, who ſoon ſurrendered; but when captain Parker came to take poſſeſſion, he was ſurprized to find, that inſtead of the St. Phillipina, his prize proved the Santiſſima Trinidada, which had departed from Manilla for Acapulco on the firſt of Auguſt; but meeting with a hard gale of wind, wherein ſhe was diſmaſted, had been obliged to put back and refit. The merchandize on board the ſhip was valued at one million and a half of dollars, and the whole cargo ſuppoſed to be worth double that ſum. We may here add, the Hermione, a Spaniſh regiſter ſhip, bound from Lima to Cadiz, laden with treaſure and valuable effects to the amount of one million ſterling, which was taken in the month of May, by two Engliſh frigates, on a cruize off cape St. Vincent, and brought from Gibraltar to England. Several captures were alſo made in the Weſt Indies during the month of November, among which were a French ſhip, mounted wlth twenty pieces of cannon, taken by captain Ruthven, commander of the Terpſichore; and the Oiſeau, another French frigate of twenty guns, taken by captain Tonyn, in his majeſty's ſhip the Brune, about ſeven leagues from Carthagena. Nor were the cruizers of Great Britain leſs active, or leſs ſucceſsful in the American ſeas. Captain Ourry, of the Acteon, took, about the beginning of April, a large Spaniſh regiſter ſhip, laden with artillery, ſtores and ammunition; and bound to Lagueira. A fleet of twenty-five French merchant ſhips, laden with ſugar, coffee, and indigo, ſailed from Cape François for Europe, under convoy of four frigates, in the month of September; but, during their paſſage, five of them were taken by a fleet of privateers, belonging to New York and Jamaica. Nor did the reſt eſcape; commodore Keppel fell in the next day with the remaining part, took the whole fleet, together with their convoy, and ſent them to Port Royal immediately afterwards.

We ſhall now return to the continent, where the war was ſtill carried on with the utmoſt vigour. A joint memorial was preſented by the French and Spaniſh ambaſſadors at the court of Liſbon, to the Portugueſe miniſtry, importing, that the firſt meaſure planned by the kings of France and Spain was to engage his Portugueſe majeſty in their offenſive and defenſive alliance, and to join his forces with theirs: that they expected his moſt Faithful majeſty would not heſitate a moment to acquieſce in ſo reaſonable a requeſt, when he conſidered what he owed to himſelf, to his kingdom, and to his ſubjects, who more ſeverely felt the yoke which Great Britain had laid upon them, than thoſe of any other nation, and which ſhe was deſirous of extending over all thoſe who had any poſſeſſions in the new world: that it would be unjuſt for France and Spain alone to ſupport a war, and ſacrifice their ſubjects for an object in which Portugal was equally intereſted with themſelves: that in order to this, the ambaſſador of Spain, and the miniſter plenipotentiary of France deſired his moſt Faithful majeſty to renounce the neutrality, and declare himſelf united in the preſent war againſt the Engliſh, with the kings of France and Spain; that this declaration was made by thoſe two monarchs as being agreed and concerted between them: that his Catholic majeſty had alſo inſtructed his ambaſſador to obſerve, that it was the brother of the queen, wife to his moſt Faithful majeſty, a true friend, a moderate, and quiet neighbour, who had made this propoſal to him, and who, conſidering the intereſt of his Portugueſe majeſty as his own, wiſhed to unite the one with the other, ſo that either in peace or war, Spain and Portugal might be conſidered as belonging to one maſter. To this extraordinary memorial, the two miniſters added, That they were commanded by their reſpective courts, to demand in four days a categorical anſwer, and that any delay beyond that period would be conſidered as a negative, and as ſuch reported.

Notwithſtanding the ſituation of Portugal was at this time truly alarming, yet the firmneſs of the king was ſuch as muſt tranſmit his name with the moſt diſtinguiſhed advantage to poſterity. He anſwered this inſulting propoſition with a moderate but intrepid reſolution. He obſerved that the ties, which equally united him to Great Britain, and the crowns of France and Spain, rendered him a proper mediator to them all, and conſequently improper for him to declare himſelf an enemy to either: that his alliance with England was ancient, and conſequently incapable of giving offence at this juncture; that it was merely defenſive, conſequently innocent: that the late calamities of Portugal had abſolutely diſabled her from taking part in any offenſive war, into which neither the love his moſt Faithful majeſty bore his ſubjects, as a father, nor the duty by which he was bound to them as a king, could ſuffer him to plunge them.

However the princes of the Bourbon confederacy were far from being ſatisfied by this reply. They denied that the alliance with England was either purely defenſive, or purely innocent: and to other aſſertions added, that if the king of Portugal did not comply with their requiſition, the Spaniſh troops which were already marched to the frontiers, ſhould enter his country, ſeize his forts, and ſhut them up; and that no choice was therefore left to his majeſty, but that of treating them as enemies, or receiving them as friends.

Extraordinary as this treatment was, it could not divert the king from the firmneſs of his reſolution, ſolution, nor provoke him to depart from the moderation of his language. He declared he would keep his treaties with England inviolate; and that if their troops ſhould enter his dominions, he would, in defence of his neutrality, repulſe them with all his forces, joined by thoſe of his allies; and concluded with this noble reſolution, "That it would affect him leſs though reduced to the laſt extremity, of which the great Judge was the ſole arbiter, to let the laſt tile of his palace fall, and to ſee his faithful ſubjects ſpill the laſt drop of their blood, than to ſacrifice, together with the honour of his crown, all that Portugal held moſt dear; and to ſubmit, by ſuch extraordinary means, to become an unheard-of example to all pacific powers, who would no longer be able to enjoy the benefit of neutrality, whenever a war ſhould be kindled between other powers with which the former were connected by defenſive treaties." On receiving this final reſolution, the ambaſſadors of the two crowns demanded paſſports, which being granted them, they ſet out for their reſpective courts; and France and Spain, in the month of June, publiſhed a joint declaration of war againſt Portugal. In the mean time about eight thouſand troops, with large ſupplies of ſtores and ammunition, and a fine train of artillery, arrived in Portugal from England. The command of the Portugueſe army had ſome time before been conferred upon count de la Lippe Buckebourg, an officer of great abilities, and who, during the whole courſe of the war, had directed the Britiſh artillery in Germany. The Engliſh forces were conducted by lord Tyrawley and the earl of Loudon, aſſiſted by ſeveral officers of great experience. Theſe forces had not been long in Portugal, before lord Tyrawley, diſguſted at the behaviour of the court of Liſbon, deſired to be recalled; his requeſt was granted, and the earl of Loudon ſucceeded to the chief command. But the progreſs of the Spaniſh army in Portugal was very ſlow, and the military enterprizes very trifling; and when the ſeaſon was far advanced the rain fell in torrents, the roads were deſtroyed, and the country, in many places, rendered impaſſable. The Spaniards, therefore, who had not ſecured any advanced poſt where they could maintain themſelves during the winter, were obliged to retreat into their own country, being deſtitute of magazines for their ſupport, and their convoys continually cut off by the enemy.

Nothing was left undone in Germany. General Luckner, a noted Hanoverian partizan, and who had made ſeveral ſucceſsful invaſions into the country poſſeſſed by the enemy, obtained a conſiderable advantage over the marquis de Lortange, who had marched out of Gottingen at the head of eighteen hundred horſe and two thouſand infantry, to intercept Luckner. But the latter falling unexpectedly on the marquis, forced him to retire with great loſs and precipitation to Gottingen. About the ſame time a party of French irregulars were made priſoners at Eichffeld by major Wingerode, commander of the Heſſian huſſars. The caſtle of Roer was beſieged by the hereditary prince of Brunſwic. In the month of April, he ſet out at the head of a ſtrong detachment and a train of artillery, in order to carry his deſign into execution. His batteries had ſcarce begun to play before the fort was ſet on fire. Every method was purſued by M. de Muret, who commanded in the caſtle, to ſtop the progreſs of the flames; but finding all his endeavours ineffectual, he was obliged, with his whole garriſon of two hundred and thirty men, to ſurrender at diſcretion, by leaping over the walls.

As ſoon as the French generals Soubiſe and d'Etrees arrived at Frankfort, near the latter end of April, they applied themſelves to aſſemble their forces on the banks of the Weſer; while the prince of Condé commanded a ſeparate army encamped at Duſſeldorp on the Lower Rhine. The main body of the allied army, commanded by prince Ferdinand, was poſted behind the Dymel, to make head againſt the two marſhals, while the hereditary prince, at the head of a conſiderable corps, was encamped in the biſhopric of Munſter, to watch the motions of Condé. Prince Xavier of Saxony had taken poſt, with a corps de reſerve, between the river Werra and the town of Gottingen; and general Luckner encamped near Eimbeck on the Leine, to obſerve that prince's motions. On the twenty-fourth of June prince Ferdinand made the proper diſpoſitions for attacking the French camp, ſituated between Graebenſtein and Meinbrexen. In order to execute this plan with ſucceſs, general Luckner left his camp in the morning of the twenty-third, croſſed the Weſer in the evening, and by three o'clock the next morning arrived between Mariendorff and Undenhauſen. General Sporcken paſſed the Dymel at Sielem about four in the morning, at the head of twelve Hanoverian battalions, and part of the cavalry of the left wing, in order to fall upon the enemy's flank, while Luckner attacked them in the rear. Prince Ferdinand paſſed the river about the ſame time, at the head of twelve Britiſh battalions, eleven of the Brunſwic troops, eight regiments of Heſſians, the Engliſh cavalry, and part of the German horſe of the left wing. On his gaining the bank on the oppoſite ſide, he drew up his forces in order of battle, behind the ponds of Kalſe. The vanguard on the right was compoſed of the chaſſeurs, of the Engliſh and German infantry commanded by lord Frederick Cavendiſh, and Freytag's Hanoverian chaſſeurs, who had orders to occupy the mountain of Langenberg, while the left conſiſted of the piquets of the army. The body of reſerve, conducted by the marquis of Granby, croſſed the Dymel at Warburg, and marched to an eminence oppoſite to Furſtenwalde, in order to fall upon the left wing of the enemy. All theſe preparations were made with ſuch judgment, activity, and good order, that the French were attacked with the utmoſt impetuoſity in front, flank, and rear, before they knew any thing of the approach of the allied army. Terrified at this vigorous and unexpected aſſault, a very precipitate retreat was the immediate conſequence, and would probably have ended in a total defeat of the whole army, had not M. de Stainville, at the head of a choſen body of troops, conſiſting of the grenadiers of France, the royal grenadiers, the regiment of Aquitaine, and ſome other forces which conſtituted the flower of the French infantry, thrown himſelf into the woods of Willemſtahl, where he made a noble ſtand, and effectually covered the retreat of the French marſhals, who retired in the utmoſt confuſion under the cannon of Caſſel. Stainville was attacked by lord Granby with his uſual impetuoſity, and the whole body, except two battalions, either killed or taken. Two thouſand five hundred and fifty of the enemy, including one hundred and ſixty-two officers, were made priſoners: ſome ſtandards and colours were alſo taken; while the whole loſs of the allied army did not exceed three hundred men. The only officer of diſtinction who loſt his life in the action, was Colonel Townſhend.

When the French marſhals had withdrawn to their camp at Melſungen, in order to maintain their communication with Franckfort, and facilitate their junction with the prince of Condé, who had received orders to advance from the Lower Rhine, prince Ferdinand reſolved to attack them. Accordingly, on the twenty-fifth of July he croſſed the Eder, and joined the marquis of Granby on the heights of Falkenberg; after which he reconnoitered the enemy's ſituation, when he found there was no probability of engaging them with ſucceſs; and having contented themſelves with cannonading their camp, he recroſſed croſſed the Eder, leaving the marquis of Granby on the heights of Falkenberg. The French now croſſed the Fulda, and retired to Caſſel, having left a body of troops under M. de Guerchy oppoſite to the camp they abandoned: at the ſame time the marquis of Granby took poſſeſſion of Melſungen, by which means the enemy's communication with Franckfort was once more cut off. Immediately after, a body of their dragoons advancing towards Ruthenburn under M. de Stainville, fell into an ambuſcade at Morſchen, and were entirely routed. This was followed by the loſs of Gottingen, which place they relinquiſhed after having deſtroyed the fortifications. On the ſixteenth of July the prince of Condé began his march from Coeſfeldt, and paſſed the Lippe at Halderen. He was followed by the hereditary prince, at the head of a ſtrong detachment from the allied army; who having received intelligence that a large body of the enemy were on their march to meet the prince of Condé, he determined to attack him before their arrival. In the beginning of this action, the French were drove from the heights into the plain; but while the allies were eagerly purſuing their advantage, the main army of the enemy arrived. Such a powerful reinforcement could not fail of turning the balance in their favour. The allies were totally defeated, having loſt about three thouſand men. This misfortune was greatly increaſed by a wound which the hereditary prince received from a muſquet ball in his hip-bone, by which his life was in the moſt imminent danger for a conſiderable length of time.

The caſtle of Ameneburgh was in the neighbourhood of the allies, which they had furniſhed with a garriſon conſiſting of ſeven hundred men, under the command of captain Cruſe. This fortreſs the enemy determined to take; but, in order to conceal their real intention, attacked a poſt of the allies called Brucker Mulk, which defended the paſſage of a bridge over the Ohme. This poſt was defended by a detachment of two hundred men, the greater part of whom were poſted in a ſmall redoubt, which they had erected to defend them againſt the random ſhot of the enemy. The attack on this poſt was made by the French with muſquetry and cannon, by a detachment placed on an eminence, a little beyond the bridge. This attack brought on a moſt violent cannonade on both ſides; while a warm diſpute with ſmall arms was maintained between the French and Hanoverians, who defended the redoubt. The latter having expended all their ammunition, and ſuffered a conſiderable loſs from the conſtant fire of the enemy, general Waldegrave was detached, with the firſt battalion of guards, to relieve the Hanoverians. In the mean time, prince Ferdinand obſerving that the enemy were continually throwing in freſh troops, and increaſing the number of cannon that played continually on the allies, thought proper to reinforce his artillery with ſix pieces of heavy cannon, and three howitzers from the army; and ordered four Heſſian regiments to advance, in order to ſuſtain thoſe who were ſo warmly engaged. A terrible fire both of ſmall arms and artillery was now maintained for fifteen hours, both ſides fighting with the moſt determined reſolution, though neither made the leaſt attempt to paſs the bridge. At length the darkneſs put an end to the action, in which eleven hundred men of the enemy, and ſix hundred of the allies, were killed. Prince Ferdinand after this action inveſted Caſſel; and notwithſtanding all the activity and reſolution of a numerous garriſon, commanded by the baron de Dieſbach, the operations were carried on with ſuch remarkable vigour, that the city was taken on the tenth of October by capitulation. This between the French and the allies in Germany was the laſt action.

At this time Great-Britain was much diſpoſed to peace. Victories were become familiar to us, and made but a ſlight impreſſion. The marks of public joy, on conſiderable conqueſts, were become much colder, than thoſe ſhewn at the beginning of the war upon very trivial advantages. Beſides, as an alteration in the ſyſtem of the Britiſh miniſtry had begun the war, another alteration, by the reſignation of Mr. Pitt, naturally put an end to it. The duke of Newcaſtle, firſt lord of the treaſury, from his early zeal in favour of the houſe of Hanover, and the liberal uſe he had made of his fortune, had long been conſidered as the head of the whigs: but neither his age, nor his ſituation in the former reign, had allowed him an opportunity of cultivating an intereſt with the preſent king; whence he did not now poſſeſs the royal confidence. On the other hand, the earl of Bute had enjoyed an employment near his perſon when he was prince of Wales, and had obtained an uncommon ſhare of his eſteem. This laſt nobleman therefore, after the removal of Mr. Pitt, was made ſecretary of ſtate; and ſoon after the duke of Newcaſtle, thinking himſelf obliged to reſign, the earl of Bute was appointed firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury. This reſignation was followed by that of ſeveral others, diſtinguiſhed by their rank and influence. His majeſty, with a view of aboliſhing party diſtinctions, and extending the royal favour equally to all his ſubjects, now choſe many perſons from thoſe families which had been the moſt ſtedfaſt friends of the Steuarts, and had, ever ſince the revolution, oppoſed the meaſures of government. The whigs, irritated at the changes by which they loſt their places, expreſſed their reſentment in the moſt public manner, and endeavoured by riotous proceſſions of different kinds of mobs, to excite the people to eſpouſe their cauſe. A violent ferment ſucceeded, in which his majeſty loſt great part of that popularity to which his firſt ſpeech juſtly entitled him; the faireſt characters were traduced and inſulted by party violence; and the moſt bitter animoſity was infuſed into the minds of ignorant unthinking people againſt the Scots. While the nation was thus diſtracted, the conduct of the war became difficult, its continuance unſafe, and its ſupplies uncertain; and its being impoſſible for thoſe in the adminiſtration to behold without anxiety, that the chiefs of the monied intereſt were connected with the principal perſons in oppoſition, their deſire of a peace became cordial and ſincere. It is ſaid, the firſt overtures were made under the mediation of his Sardinian majeſty. The duke of Bedford was ſent to Verſailles, to negociate on the part of England; the duke de Nivernois came to London on that of France; and ſoon after the great outlines of a treaty were adjuſted, and preliminaries ſigned. In conſequence of which, on the twenty-fifth of November, his majeſty opened the ſeſſion of parliament with a ſpeech from the throne, in which he obſerved, that the war with Spain, and the attack of his ally, the king of Portugal, having greatly affected the commerce of his ſubjects, multiplied the objects of his military operations, and added to the heavy burthens of his people, he had willingly embraced an occaſion that offered of renewing the negociation for peace. He informed them, that the preliminary articles were actually ſigned; that by the conditions in which all parties had acquieſced, an immenſe territory was added to the empire of Great Britain, and a ſolid foundation laid for the increaſe of commerce; that care had been taken to remove all occaſions of future diſputes; that the king of Portugal was ſecured in all his dominions; and that all the territories of his German allies were evacuated by the troops of France. He lamented that a great number of his ſubjects had been loſt in different parts of the world; a conſideration which reinforced the other reaſons he had to engage in the negociation; and that he had haſtened the concluſion of it, to prevent the neceſſity of making preparations for another campaign. He deſired the commons to conſider of ſuch methods, in the ſettlement of the new acquiſitions, as ſhould moſt effectually tend to the ſecurity of thoſe countries, and to the improvement of the Britiſh trade and navigation. He recommended to their care and attention his gallant ſubjects by whom thoſe acquiſitions were made. He obſerved, that union at home was peculiarly neceſſary to lay the foundation of that œconomy which they owed to themſelves and their poſterity, and which alone could relieve the nation from the heavy burthens entailed upon it by the neceſſities of a war both tedious and expenſive.

Both houſes were ſo delighted with this gracious ſpeech that they were eager to preſent addreſſes, containing general compliments of congratulation on the approach of peace, as well as upon the birth of the prince of Wales. The next day a ceſſation of arms was proclaimed, and orders were iſſued for opening again all the channels of communication with France and Spain. However, the preliminaries of the peace underwent a very ſevere examination by the oppoſition, but were at length approved of by a great majority in both houſes; and each preſented an addreſs to the king on the occaſion, in which they declared, "That they owed the utmoſt gratitude to his majeſty for the re-eſtabliſhment of the public tranquillity upon terms of honour to the crown, and of advantage to the people."

A. D. 1763. On the tenth of February, the definitive treaty of peace was ſigned at Paris, and being thence tranſmitted to England, was laid before the parliament; an exact copy of which is as follows.

"In the Name of the moſt Holy and Undivided Trinity, Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt. So be it.

"BE it known to all thoſe to whom it ſhall, or may, in any manner, belong.

"It has pleaſed the Moſt High to diffuſe the ſpirit of union and concord among the princes, whoſe diviſions had ſpread troubles in the four parts of the world, and to inſpire them with the inclination to cauſe the comforts of peace to ſucceed to the misfortunes of a long and bloody war, which having ariſen between England and France, during the reign of the moſt ſerene and moſt potent prince, George the Second, by the Grace of God, King of Great-Britain, of glorious memory, continued under the reign of the moſt ſerene and moſt potent prince George the Third, ſucceſſor, and, in its progreſs, communicated itſelf to Spain and Portugal: conſequently, the moſt ſerene and moſt potent prince, George the Third, by the Grace of God, King of Great-Britain, France, and Ireland, Duke of Brunſwick and Lunenburg, Arch-Treaſurer and Elector of the Holy Roman Empire; the moſt ſerene and moſt potent prince, Lewis the Fifteenth, by the Grace of God, the moſt Chriſtian King, and the moſt ſerene and moſt potent prince, Charles the Third, by the Grace of God, King of Spain and of the Indies, after having laid the foundations of peace in the preliminaries, ſigned at Fontainbleau the third of November laſt; and the moſt ſerene and moſt potent prince, Don Joſeph the Firſt, by the Grace of God, King of Portugal and of the Algarves, after having acceded thereto, determined to complete, without delay, this great and important work. For this purpoſe the high contracting parties have named and appointed their reſpective ambaſſadors extraordinary and miniſters plenipotentiary, viz. his Sacred Majeſty the King of Great-Britain, the moſt illuſtrious and moſt excellent lord John Duke and Earl of Bedford, Marquis of Taviſtock, &c. his Miniſter of State, Lieutenant-General of his Armies, Keeper of his Privy Seal, Knight of the Moſt Noble Order of the Garter, and his Ambaſſador Extraordinary and Miniſter Plenipotentiary to his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty: his Sacred Majeſty the Moſt Chriſtian King, the moſt illuſtrious and moſt excellent lord Cæſar Gabriel de Choiſeul, Duke of Praſlin, Peer of France, Knight of his Orders, Lieutenant-General of his Armies, and of the Province of Brittany, Counſellor of all his Councils, and Miniſter and Secretary of State, and of his Commands and Finances: his Sacred Majeſty the Catholick King, the moſt illuſtrious and moſt excellent lord, Don Jerome Grimaldi, Marquis de Grimaldi, Knight of the Moſt Chriſtian King's Orders, Gentleman of his Catholick Majeſty's Bed-Chamber in employment, and his Ambaſſador Extraordinary to his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty: his Sacred Majeſty the Moſt Faithful King, the moſt illuſtrious and moſt excellent lord, Martin de Mello and Caſtro, Knight profeſſed of the Order of Chriſt, of his Moſt Faithful Majeſty's Council, and his Ambaſſador and Miniſter Plenipotentiary to his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty.

"Who, after having duly communicated to each other their full powers, in good form, have agreed upon the articles, the tenor of which is as follows:

"Art. I. There ſhall be a chriſtian, univerſal, and perpetual peace, as well by ſea as by land, and a ſincere and conſtant friendſhip ſhall be re-eſtabliſhed between their Britannick, Moſt Chriſtian, Catholick, and Moſt Faithful Majeſties, and between their heirs and ſucceſſors, kingdoms, dominions, provinces, countries, vaſſals, and ſubjects, of what quality or condition ſoever they be, without exceptions of places, or of perſons; ſo that the high contracting parties ſhall give the greateſt attention to maintain between themſelves and their ſaid dominions and ſubjects, this reciprocal friendſhip and correſpondence, without permitting on either ſide any kind of hoſtilities, by ſea or by land, to be committed from henceforth, for any cauſe, or under any pretence, whatſoever; and every thing ſhall be carefully avoided, which might hereafter prejudice the union happily re-eſtabliſhed, applying themſelves, on the contrary, on every occaſion, to procure for each other whatever may contribute to their mutual glory, intereſts, and advantages, without giving any aſſiſtance or protection, directly or indirectly, to thoſe who would cauſe any prejudice to either of the high contracting parties: there ſhall be a general oblivion of every thing that may have been done or committed, before or ſince the commencement of the war, which is juſt ended.

"Art. II. The treaties of Weſtphalia of 1648; thoſe of Madrid between the two crowns of Great-Britain and Spain of 1667, and 1670; the treaties of peace of Nimeguen of 1678, and 1679; of Ryſwick of 1697; thoſe of peace and of commerce of Utrecht of 1713; that of Baden of 1714; that of the triple alliance of the Hague of 1717; that of the quadruple alliance of London of 1718; the treaty of peace of Vienna of 1738; the definitive treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle of 1748; and that of Madrid, between the crown of Great-Britain and Spain, of 1750; as well as the treaties between the crowns of Spain and Portugal, of the thirteenth of February, 1668: of the ſixth of February, 1715; and of the twelfth of February, 1716; and that of the eleventh of April, 1713; between France and Portugal with the guarantees of Great-Britain; ſerve as a baſis and foundation to the peace, and the preſent treaty: and for this purpoſe they are all renewed and confirmed in the beſt form, as well as all the treaties in general, which ſubſiſted between the high contracting parties before the war, as if they were inſerted here word for word; ſo that they are to be exactly obſerved, for the future, in their whole tenor, and religiouſly executed on all ſides, in all their points, which ſhall not be derogated from by the preſent treaty, notwithſtanding all that may have been ſtipulated to the contrary by any of the high contracting parties: and all the ſaid parties declare, that they will not ſuffer any privilege, favour, or indulgence to ſubſiſt, contrary to the treaties above confirmed, except what ſhall have been agreed and ſtipulated by the preſent treaty.

"Art. III. All the priſoners made on all ſides, as well by land as by ſea, and the hoſtages carried away, or given during the war, and to this day, ſhall be reſtored, without ranſom, ſix weeks at lateſt, to be computed from the day of the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty, each crown reſpectively paying the advances which ſhall have been made for the ſubſiſtence and maintenance of their priſoners, by the ſovereign of the country where they ſhall have been detained, according to the atteſted receipts and eſtimates, and other authentic vouchers, which ſhall be furniſhed on one ſide and the other: and ſecurities ſhall be reciprocally given for the payment of the debts which the priſoners ſhall have contracted in the countries where they have been detained, until their entire liberty. And all the ſhips of war and merchant-ſhips, which ſhall have been taken ſince the expiration of the terms agreed upon for the ceſſation of hoſtilities by ſea, ſhall be likewiſe reſtored bona fide, with all their crews and cargoes: and the execution of this article ſhall be proceeded upon immediately after the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty.

"Art. IV. His Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty renounces all pretenſions which he has heretofore formed, or might form, to Nova Scotia, or Acadia in all its parts; and guaranties the whole of it, and with it all its dependencies, to the King of Great Britain; moreover, his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty cedes and guaranties to his ſaid Britannic Majeſty, in full right, Canada, with all its dependencies, as well as the iſland of Cape Breton, and all the other iſlands and coaſts in the gulph and river St. Lawrence, and in general, every thing that depends on the ſaid countries, lands, iſlands, and coaſts, with the ſovereignty, property, poſſeſſion, and all rights acquired by treaty or otherwiſe, which the moſt Chriſtian King, and the crown of France have had till now, over the ſaid countries, iſlands, lands, places, coaſts, and their inhabitants; ſo that the moſt Chriſtian King cedes and makes over the whole to the ſaid King, and to the crown of Great Britain, and that in the moſt ample manner and form, without reſtriction, and without any liberty to depart from the ſaid ceſſion and guarantee, under any pretence, or to diſturb Great Britain in the poſſeſſions above mentioned. His Britannic Majeſty, on his ſide, agrees to grant the liberty of the catholic religion to the inhabitants of Canada: he will, conſequently, give the moſt preciſe and moſt effectual orders, that his new Roman catholic ſubjects may profeſs the worſhip of their religion, according to the rights of the Romiſh church, as far as the laws of Great Britain permit. His Britannic Majeſty further agrees, that the French inhabitants, or others who had been ſubjects of the moſt Chriſtian King in Canada, may retire, with all ſafety and freedom, wherever they ſhall think proper, and may ſell their eſtates, provided it be to the ſubjects of his Britannic Majeſty, and bring away their effects, as well as their perſons, without being reſtrained in their emigration, under any pretence whatſoever, except that of debts, or of criminal proſecutions: the term limited for this emigration ſhall be fixed to the ſpace of eighteen months, to be computed from the day of the exchange of the ratification of the preſent treaty.

"Art. V. The ſubjects of France ſhall have the liberty of fiſhing and drying on a part of the coaſts of the iſland of Newfoundland, ſuch as it is ſpecified in the XIIIth article of the treaty of Utrecht; which article is renewed and confirmed by the preſent treaty (except what relates to the iſland of Cape Breton, as well as to the other iſlands and coaſts in the mouth and in the gulph of St. Lawrence): and his Britannic Majeſty conſents to leave to the ſubjects of the moſt Christian King, the liberty of fiſhing in the gulph of St. Lawrence, on condition that the ſubjects of France do not exerciſe the ſaid fiſhery, but at the diſtance of three leagues from all the coaſts belonging to Great Britain, as well thoſe of the continent, as thoſe of the iſlands ſituated in the ſaid gulph of St. Lawrence. And as to what relates to the fiſhery on the coaſts of the iſland of Cape Breton out of the ſaid gulph, the ſubjects of the moſt Chriſtian King ſhall not be permitted to exerciſe the ſaid fiſhery, but at the diſtance of fifteen leagues from the coaſts of the iſland of Cape Breton; and the fiſhery on the coaſts of Nova Scotia or Acadia, and every where elſe out of the ſaid gulph, ſhall remain on the foot of former treaties.

"Art. VI. The King of Great Britain cedes the iſlands of St. Pierre and Miquelon, in full right, to his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, to ſerve as ſhelter to the French fiſhermen: and his ſaid Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty engages not to fortify the ſaid iſlands; to erect no buildings upon them, but merely for the convenience of the fiſhery; and to keep upon them a guard of fifty men only for the police.

"Art. VII. In order to re-eſtabliſh peace on ſolid and durable foundations, and to remove for ever all ſubject of diſpute with regard to the limits of the Britiſh and French territories on the continent of America; it is agreed, that for the future, the confines between the dominions of his Britannic Majeſty, and thoſe of his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty in that part of the world, ſhall be fixed irrevocably by a line drawn along the middle of the river Miſſiſſippi, from its ſource to the river Iberville, and from thence, by a line drawn along the middle of this river, and the lakes Maurepas and Pontchartrain to the ſea; and for this purpoſe the Moſt Chriſtian King cedes in full right, and guaranties to his Britannic Majeſty the river and port of the Mobile, and every thing which he poſſeſſes, or ought to poſſeſs, on the left ſide of the river Miſſiſſippi, except the town of New Orleans, and the iſland in which it is ſituated, which ſhall remain to France; provided that the navigation of the river Miſſiſſippi ſhall be equally free, as well to the ſubjects of Great Britain as to thoſe of France, in its whole breadth and length, from its ſource to the ſea, and expreſsly that part which is between the ſaid iſland of New Orleans, and the right bank of that river, as well as the paſſage both in and out of its mouth. It is farther ſtipulated, that the veſſels belonging to the ſubjects of either nation ſhall not be ſtopped, viſited, or ſubjected to the payment of any duty whatſoever. The ſtipulations inſerted in the IVth article, in favour of the inhabitants of Canada, ſhall alſo take place with regard to the inhabitants of the countries ceded by this article.

"Art. VIII. The King of Great Britain ſhall reſtore to France, the iſlands of Guadaloupe, of Marie Galante, of Deſirade, of Martinico, and of Belleiſle; and the fortreſſes of theſe iſlands ſhall be reſtored in the ſame condition they were in, when they were conquered by the Britiſh arms; provided that his Britannic Majeſty's ſubjects who ſhall have ſettled in the ſaid iſlands, or thoſe who ſhall have any commercial affairs to ſettle there, or in the other places reſtored to France by the preſent treaty, ſhall have liberty to ſell their lands and their eſtates, to ſettle their affairs, to recover their debts, and to bring away their effects, as well as their perſons, on board veſſels which they ſhall be permitted to ſend to the ſaid iſlands, and other places reſtored as above, and which ſhall ſerve for this uſe only, without being reſtrained on account of their religion, or under any other pretence whatſoever, except that of debts, or of criminal proſecutions: and for this purpoſe the term of eighteen months is allowed to his Britannic Majeſty's ſubjects, to be computed from the day of the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty: but as the liberty granted to his Britannic Majeſty's ſubjects, to bring away their perſons and their effects in veſſels of their nation, may be liable to abuſes, if precautions were not taken to prevent them; it has been expreſsly agreed between his Britannic Majeſty and his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, that the number of Engliſh veſſels, which ſhall have leave to go to the ſaid iſlands and places reſtored to France ſhall be limited, as well as the number of tons of each one; that they ſhall go in ballaſt; ſhall ſet ſail at a fixed time; and ſhall make one voyage only, all the effects belonging to the Engliſh being to be embarked at the ſame time. It has been further agreed, that his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty ſhall cauſe the neceſſary paſſports to be given to the ſaid veſſels; that, for the greater ſecurity, it ſhall be allowed to place two French clerks, or guards, in each of the ſaid veſſels, which ſhall be viſited in the landing places and ports of the ſaid iſlands and places reſtored to France, and that the merchandize which ſhall be found therein ſhall be confiſcated.

"Art. IX. The Moſt Chriſtian King cedes and guaranties to his Britannic Majeſty, in full right, the iſlands of Grenada, and of the Grenadines, with the ſame ſtipulations in favour of the inhabitants of this colony, inſerted in the IVth article for thoſe of Canada: and the partition of the iſlands called Neutral, is agreed and fixed, ſo that thoſe of St. Vincent, Dominica, and Tobago, ſhall remain in full right to Great-Britain, and that of St. Lucia ſhall be delivered to France, to enjoy the ſame likewiſe in full right; and the high contracting parties guaranty the partition ſo ſtipulated.

"Art. X. His Britannic Majeſty ſhall reſtore to France the iſland of Goree in the condition it was in when conquered: and his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty cedes in full right, and guaranties to the King of Great-Britain, the river Senegal, with the forts and factories of St. Lewis, Podor, and Galam; and with all the rights and dependencies of the ſaid river Senegal.

"Art. XI. In the Eaſt Indies, Great-Britain ſhall reſtore to France, in the condition they are now in, the different factories which that crown poſſeſſed, as well on the coaſt of Coromandel and Orixa, as on that of Malabar, as alſo in Bengal, at the beginning of the year 1749. And his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty renounces all pretenſions to the acquiſition which he had made on the coaſt of Coromandel and Orixa, ſince the ſaid beginning of the year 1749. His Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty ſhall reſtore on his ſide, all that he may have conquered from Great-Britain in the Eaſt Indies during the preſent war; and will expreſsly cauſe Nattal and Tapanoully in the iſland of Sumatra, to be reſtored; he engages further not to erect fortifications, or to keep troops, in any part of the dominions of the ſubah of Bengal. And in order to preſerve future peace on the coaſt of Coromandel and Orixa, the Engliſh and French ſhall acknowledge Mahomet Ally Khan for lawful Nabob of the Carnatick, and Salabat Jing for lawful Subah of the Decan; and both parties ſhall renounce all demands and pretenſions of ſatisfaction, with which they might charge each other, or their Indian allies, for their depredations or pillage committed on the one ſide or on the other, during the war.

"Art. XII. The iſland of Minorca ſhall be reſtored to his Britannic Majeſty, as well as Fort St. Philip, in the ſame condition they were in when conquered by the arms of the Moſt Chriſtian King; and with the artillery which was there, when the ſaid iſland and the ſaid fort were taken.

"Art. XIII. The town and port of Dunkirk, ſhall be put into the ſtate fixed by the laſt treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, and by former treaties. The cunette ſhall be deſtroyed immediately after the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty, as well as the forts and batteries which defend the entrance on the ſide of the ſea; and proviſion ſhall be made, at the ſame time, for the wholſomeneſs of the air, and for the health of the inhabitants, by ſome other means, to the ſatisfaction of the King of Great-Britain.

"Art. XIV. France ſhall reſtore all the countries belonging to the electorate of Hanover, to the Landgrave of Heſſe, to the Duke of Brunſwic, and to the count of La Lippe Buckebourg, which are or ſhall be occupied by his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty's arms: the fortreſſes of theſe different countries ſhall be reſtored in the ſame condition they were in when conquered by the French arms; and the pieces of artillery, which ſhall have been carried elſewhere, ſhall be replaced by the ſame number, of the ſame bore, weight, and metal.

"Art. XV. In caſe the ſtipulations contained in the XIIIth article of the preliminaries, ſhould not be completed at the time of the ſignature of the preſent treaty, as well with regard to the evacuations to be made by the armies of France of the fortreſſes of Cleves, Weſel, Guelders, and of all the countries belonging to the King of Pruſſia, as with regard to the evacuations to be made by the Britiſh and French armies of the countries which they occupy in Weſtphalia, Lower Saxony, on the Lower Rhine, Upper Rhine, and in all the empire, and to the retreat of the troops into the dominions of their reſpective ſovereigns: their Britannic and Moſt Chriſtian Majeſties promiſe to proceed, bona fide, with all the diſpatch the caſe will permit of, to the ſaid evacuations, the entire completion whereof they ſtipulated before the fifteenth of March next, or ſooner if it can be done: and their Britannic and Moſt Chriſtian Majeſties further engage and promiſe to each other, not to furniſh any ſuccours, of any kind, to their reſpective allies who ſhall continue engaged in the war in Germany.

"Art. XVI. The deciſion of the prizes made in time of peace, by the ſubjects of Great-Britain on the Spaniards, ſhall be referred to the courts of juſtice of the admiralty of Great-Britain, conformably to the rules eſtabliſhed among all nations, ſo that the validity of the ſaid prizes between the Britiſh and Spaniſh nations, ſhall be decided and judged according to the law of nations, and according to treaties in the courts of juſtice of the nation who ſhall have made the capture.

"Art. XVII. His Britannic Majeſty ſhall cauſe to be demoliſhed, all the fortifications which his ſubjects ſhall have erected in the Bay of Honduras, and other places of the territory of Spain in that part of the world, four months after the ratification of the preſent treaty: and his Catholic Majeſty ſhall not permit his Britannic Majeſty's ſubjects, or their workmen, to be diſturbed or moleſted under any pretence whatſoever in the ſaid places, in their occupation of cutting, loading, and carrying away logwood; and for this purpoſe they may build without hindrance, and occupy without interruption, the houſes and magazines which are neceſſary for them, for their families and for their effects: and his Catholic Majeſty aſſures to them, by this article, the full enjoyment of thoſe advantages and powers on the Spaniſh coaſts and territories as above ſtipulated, immediately after the ratification of the preſent treaty.

"Art. XVIII. His Catholic Majeſty deſiſts, as well for himſelf as for his ſucceſſors, from all pretenſions which he may have formed in favour of the Guipuſcoans, and other his ſubjects, to the right of fiſhing in the neighbourhood of the iſland of Newfoundland.

"Art. XIX. The King of Great Britain ſhall reſtore to Spain all the territory which he has conquered in the iſland of Cuba, with the fortreſs of the Havanna; and this fortreſs, as well as all the other fortreſſes of the ſaid iſland, ſhall be reſtored in the ſame condition they were in when conquered by his Britannic Majeſty's arms; provided that his Britannic Majeſty's ſubjects who ſhall have ſettled in the ſaid iſland, reſtored to Spain by the preſent treaty, or thoſe who ſhall have any commercial affairs to ſettle there, ſhall have liberty to ſell their lands and their eſtates, to ſettle their affairs, to recover their debts, and to bring away their effects as well as their perſons, on board veſſels which they ſhall be permitted to ſend to the ſaid iſland reſtored as above, and which ſhall ſerve for that uſe only, without being reſtrained on account of their religion, or under any pretence whatſoever, except that of debts, or of criminal proſecution: and for this purpoſe the term of eighteen months is allowed to his Britannic Majeſty's ſubjects, to be computed from the day of the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty: but as the liberty granted to his Britannic Majeſty's ſubjects, to bring away their perſons and their effects in veſſels of their nation, may be liable to abuſes, if precautions are not taken to prevent them; it has been expreſsly agreed between his Britannic Majeſty and his Catholic Ma-Majeſty, that the number of Engliſh veſſels, which ſhall have leave to go to the ſaid iſland reſtored to Spain, ſhall be limited, as well as the number of tons of each one; that they ſhall go in ballaſt; ſhall ſet ſail at a fixed time; and ſhall make one voyage only; all the effects belonging to the Engliſh being to be embarked at the ſame time: It has been further agreed, that his Catholic majeſty ſhall cauſe the neceſſary paſſports to be given to the ſaid veſſels; that, for the greater ſecurity, it ſhall be allowed to place two Spaniſh clerks, or guards, in each of the ſaid veſſels, which ſhall be viſited in the landing places, and ports of the ſaid iſland reſtored to Spain, and that the merchandize, which ſhall be found therein, ſhall be confiſcated.

"Art. XX. In conſequence of the reſtitution ſtipulated in the preceding article, his Catholic majeſty cedes and guaranties, in full right, to his Britannic Majeſty, Florida, with Port St. Auguſtin, and the bay of Penſacola, as well as all that Spain poſſeſſes on the continent of North America, to the eaſt or to the ſouth eaſt of the river Miſſiſſippi, and, in general, every thing that depends on the ſaid countries and lands, with the ſovereignty, property, poſſeſſion, and all rights acquired by treaties, or otherwiſe, which the Catholic King, and the crown of Spain have had, till now, over the ſaid countries, lands, places, and other inhabitants; ſo that the Catholic King cedes and makes over the whole to the ſaid King, and to the crown of Great Britain, and that in the moſt ample manner and form. His Britannic Majeſty agrees, on his ſide, to grant to the inhabitants of the countries above ceded, the liberty of the Catholic religion: he will conſequently give the moſt expreſs and the moſt effectual orders that his new Roman Catholic ſubjects may profeſs the worſhip of their religion, according to the rites of the Romiſh church, as far as the laws of Great Britain permit: his Britannic Majeſty farther agrees, that the Spaniſh inhabitants, or others who had been ſubjects of the Catholic King in the ſaid countries, may retire, with all ſafety and freedom, wherever they think proper; and may ſell their eſtates, provided it be to his Britannic Majeſty's ſubjects, and bring away their effects, as well as their perſons, without being reſtrained in their emigration, under any pretence whatſoever, except that of debts or of criminal proſecutions; the term limited for this emigration being fixed to the ſpace of eighteen months, to be computed from the day of the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty. It is moreover ſtipulated, that his Catholic Majeſty ſhall have power to cauſe all the effects that may belong to him to be brought away, whether it be artillery, or other things.

"Art. XXI. The French and Spaniſh troops ſhall evacuate all the territories, lands, towns, places and caſtles, of his moſt Faithful majeſty in Europe, without any reſerve, which ſhall have been conquered by the armies of France and Spain, and ſhall reſtore them in the ſame condition they were in when conquered, with the ſame artillery, and ammunition, which were found there: and with regard to the Portugueſe colonies in America, Africa, or in the Eaſt Indies, if any change ſhall have happened there, all things ſhall be reſtored on the ſame footing they were in, and conformably to the preceding treaties, which ſubſiſted between the courts of France, Spain, and Portugal, before the preſent war.

"Art. XXII. All the papers, letters, documents, and archives, which were found in the countries, territories, towns and places, that are reſtored, and thoſe belonging to the countries ceded, ſhall be reſpectively, and bona fide, delivered, or furniſhed at the ſame time, if poſſible, that poſſeſſion is taken, or, at lateſt, four months after the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty, in whatever places the ſaid papers or documents may be found.

"Art. XXIII. All the countries and territories, which may have been conquered, in whatſoever part of the world, by the arms of their Britannic and moſt Faithful Majeſties, as well as by thoſe of their moſt Chriſtian and Catholic Majeſties, which are not included in the preſent treaty, either under the title of ceſſions, or under the title of reſtitution, ſhall be reſtored without difficulty, and without requiring any compenſation.

"Art. XXIV. As it is neceſſary to aſſign a fixed epoch for the reſtitutions, and the evacuations, to be made by each of the high contracting parties; it is agreed, that the Britiſh and French troops ſhall complete, before the fifteenth of March next, all that ſhall remain to be executed of the XIIth and XIIIth articles of the preliminaries, ſigned the third day of November laſt, with regard to the evacuation to be made in the empire, or elſewhere. The iſland of Belleiſle ſhall be evacuated ſix weeks after the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty, or ſooner, if it can be done. Guadaloupe, Deſirade, Marie Galante, Martinico, and St. Lucia, three months after the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty, or ſooner if it can be done. Great Britain ſhall likewiſe at the end of three months after the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty, or ſooner, if it can be done, enter into poſſeſſion of the port and river of the Mobile, and of all that is to form the limits of the territory of Great Britain, on the ſide of the river Miſſiſſippi, as they are ſpecified in the VIIth article. The iſland of Goree ſhall be evacuated by Great Britain, three months after the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty; and the iſland of Minorca, by France, at the ſame epoch, or ſooner, if it can be done: and according to the conditions of the VIth article, France ſhall likewiſe enter into poſſeſſion of the iſlands of St. Peter and Miquelon, at the end of three months after the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty. The factories in the Eaſt Indies ſhall be reſtored ſix months after the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty, or ſooner, if it can be done. The fortreſs of the Havanna, with all that has been conquered in the iſland of Cuba, ſhall be reſtored three months after the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty, or ſooner, if it can be done: and, at the ſame time, Great Britain ſhall enter into poſſeſſion of the country ceded by Spain, according to the XXth article. All the places and countries of his moſt Faithful majeſty in Europe, ſhall be reſtored immediately after the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty; and the Portugueſe colonies, which may have been conquered, ſhall be reſtored in the ſpace of three months in the Weſt Indies, and of ſix months in the Eaſt Indies, after the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty, or ſooner, if it can be done. All the fortreſſes, the reſtitution whereof is ſtipulated above, ſhall be reſtored with the artillery and ammunition which were found there at the time of the conqueſt. In conſequence whereof, the neceſſary orders ſhall be ſent by each of the high contracting parties, with reciprocal paſſports for the ſhips that ſhall carry them, immediately after the exchange of the ratifications of the preſent treaty.

“ Art. XXV. His Britannic majeſty, as Elector of Brunſwic Lunenburg, as well for himſelf, as for his heirs and ſucceſſors, and all the dominions and poſſeſſions of his ſaid majeſty in Germany, are included and guarantied by the preſent treaty of peace.

“ Art. XXVI. Their Sacred Britannic, moſt Chriſtian, Catholic, and moſt Faithful majeſties, promiſe to obſerve, ſincerely and bona fide, all the articles contained and ſettled in the preſent treaty; and they will not ſuffer the ſame to be infringed, directly nor indirectly, by their reſpective ſubjects; and the ſaid high contracting parties, generally and reciprocally, guaranty to each other all the ſtipulations of the preſent treaty.

“ Art. XXVII. The ſolemn ratifications of the preſent treaty, expedited in good and due form, ſhall be exchanged in this city of Paris between the high contracting parties, in the ſpace of a month, or ſooner, if poſſible, to be computed from the day of the ſignature of the preſent treaty.

“ In witneſs whereof we the underwritten, their ambaſſadors extraordinary, and miniſters plenipotentiary, have ſigned with our hand, in their name, and in virtue of our full powers, the preſent definitive treaty, and have cauſed the ſeal of our arms to be put thereto.

“ Done at Paris, the tenth of February, 1763.
(L. S.) BEDFORD, C. P. S.
(L. S.) CHOISEUL, Duc de Praslin.

Notwithſtanding this treaty was chiefly intended for the ſecurity of our northern colonies in America, it gave great offence. On the one hand it was aſſerted, that as we had at a great expence of blood and treaſure, reduced the French nation to a ſtate of beggary, ſo we ought, in order to keep them humble, to have retained all the conqueſts to ourſelves; for by ſo doing, their commerce being effectually ruined, they would not have been able for many years to give us the leaſt diſturbance. On the other hand, it was urged, by ſuch as were friends to the peace, that the advantage to Britain was very great, and that we had not only regained the iſland of Minorca, but that we had acquired the moſt extenſive territories in North America and the Weſt Indies, which, if cultivated in a proper manner, would turn out to the advantage of the mother-country. The parliament were no leſs divided in their opinions than the nation in general. The treaty, like the preliminaries, occaſioned very violent debates in both houſes, but was at length approved of by a great majority. The ſpirit of the minority was not, however, exhauſted in this attempt. They fell upon the miniſtry in the moſt critical juncture, and puſhed their arguments with the utmoſt force when the ſupplies came to be debated in the lower houſe. Several circumſtances favoured their deſign. The miniſtry ſenſible in what ſtate the minds of the people now were, determined to impoſe as few new taxes as the public ſervice could poſſibly admit. Accordingly the ſupplies were to be raiſed, firſt, by taking two millions out of the ſinking fund; ſecondly, by ſtriking one million eight hundred thouſand pounds in exchequer bills: thirdly, by borrowing two million eight hundred thouſand pounds on annuities; and laſtly, by two lotteries, for three hundred and fifty thouſand pounds each. To pay the intereſt on theſe loans, which, in the whole, amounted to ſeven million, three hundred thouſand pounds, an additional duty of eight pounds per ton was laid upon all wines of the growth of France, and four pounds per ton upon all other wines. Thus far the whole ſcheme was wholly unexceptionable; but another duty was added, which put the nation into a ferment, viz. four ſhillings per hogſhead upon cyder, to be paid by the maker, collected by the officers, and ſubjected to all the laws of exciſe. Oppoſition vehemently objected to this plan. They firſt attacked the new taxation, upon which almoſt the whole ſcheme of ſupply was founded. In direct contradiction to the advocates of the miniſtry, they maintained that the nation was far from being exhauſted: that there were reſources for carrying on the war at leaſt two years longer, and much more towards clearing off incumbrances on the peace: that as individuals abounded in wealth, and as the public was loaded with ſo immenſe a debt, it was, in ſuch circumſtances, the dictates of the wiſeſt and moſt enlarged policy to add as much as poſſible, by bold and liberal grants, to the income of the nation; as the fund of payment would then be enlarged, and œconomy would have ſomething to operate upon: that, in any other method, the practice of frugality was mean and ſordid, and the effect would certainly prove trifling: that it might ſtarve many uſeful parts of public ſervice, but muſt ever be found a frivolous and fallacious reſource towards the diſcharge of the public debt. To the lottery loan they objected the enormous profit which was allowed to the ſubſcribers, exceeding that of former occaſions, without any alterations in the ſtate of public credit; two lotteries, for the firſt time, eſtabliſhed in one year, without any urgent neceſſity; and the incitement which muſt thence ariſe to the pernicious ſpirit of gaming, which cannot be too much diſcountenanced in every ſtate governed by wiſdom, and a ſober regard to the morals of the people. As to the money that was to be taken from the ſinking fund, they obſerved, that ſcarce any neceſſity could, in our ſituation, be pleaded in favour of a perverſion of this fund from its original purpoſes to the current ſervices; that the appearance of tenderneſs for the people in this ſcheme was entirely deceitful, as they were exonerated for a time, only to be burthened more heavily hereafter, and that their preſent eaſe muſt infallibly cauſe their future weakneſs. As to the tax on cyder, they urged, that with regard to its object, it was both partial and oppreſſive; with regard to the method of collecting it, dangerous and unconſtitutional; that it lays the whole burthen of expences incurred in the general defence of the kingdom, and in defence of the national commerce, on a few particular counties, which in every other article of the public charge contribute at leaſt their full ſhare: they ſtated the diſproportion of this tax to the natural original value of the commodity: that it was oppreſſive both to farmers and landholders: to the latter in diminution of their rents, operating more ſeverely than the land-tax: to the former, becauſe if they compounded, it would be in effect a heavy capitation, if they did not, it would be a ſubjection to new, unknown, and perplexed laws: they obſerved, that when new orders of men, by

by ſituation and profeſſion diſtinct from traders, are rendered objects of the exciſe laws, the precedent is formidable not to commerce only, but to more important objects; and had a fatal tendency, which they trembled to think on: they alſo lamented, that things were come to that melancholy paſs, that, beſides what might be dreaded for the future, the houſes of all orders of people, peers, gentlemen, freeholders and farmers, were rendered liable to be entered and examined at pleaſure.

In anſwer to this, the friends of adminiſtration obſerved; That to aim at increaſing the national income by any further taxes, than the moſt extreme neceſſity demanded, was a wild project; that every tax proved a diſcouragement to trade, becauſe, in its conſequences, it enhanced, more or leſs, in foreign markets, the price of our manufactures, which muſt always in time of peace, depend for their vent principally on their cheapneſs; and that this muſt be the caſe let the peace be made upon what terms they would: that every tax alſo, in order to be effectual, naturally implied ſome reſtraint upon liberty: that nothing demonſtrated more fully the ſolidity of theſe principles, than the oppoſition then made to the duty of cyder and perry, a moſt moderate and equitable impoſition; and that of all men it ill became thoſe who ſpoke ſo ſtrongly of continuing and enlarging the charge of the nation, to object to one of the leaſt diſtreſſing reſources which could be found for the public. They inſiſted that nothing could be leſs founded on reaſon than the charge, "That this tax was unequal, and lay heavy upon ſome particular counties," it being well known that it did not even bring them on a par with the charge on thoſe counties where the people drink beer. In ſuch counties all private, as well as public conſumption, is charged in the malt-tax, which the charge on cyder is by no means equal to, beſides its having exemptions in favour of the poor, which are not indulged in the malt-tax; ſo that the cyder counties ought to be rather thankful for their long immunity, than complain that they are at laſt obliged to contribute rather leſs than their proportion towards the ſupport of the national burthens.

The queſtion being put, it was carried in the affirmative by a very conſiderable majority. In the upper houſe alſo the bill was ſtrongly oppoſed; but after a ſmart debate the miniſtry carried their point, and the royal aſſent was now given to it.

Peace was proclaimed in London at all the uſual places, and with the accuſtomed ſolemnities on March the twenty-ſecond; and on the nineteenth of April the king went to the houſe of peers, and having given the royal aſſent to ſeveral bills, he prorogued the parliament with a ſpeech from the throne, in which he expreſſed his thanks for the zeal and diſpatch they had manifeſted in their proceedings: he told them, that having ordered the preliminary articles to be laid before them, he had received the higheſt ſatisfaction at their grateful expreſſions of entire approbation: he acquainted them with his firm reſolution to form his government on a plan of ſtrict œconomy: aſſured the commons, that they might depend on the utmoſt frugality being obſerved in the diſpoſition of the ſupplies they had granted; and when the account of the money ariſing from the ſale of ſuch prizes, as were veſted in the crown, ſhould be cloſed, it was his intention to direct, that the produce ſhould be applied to the public ſervice; and concluded with declaring, that his future attention ſhould be directed to the extenſion of the commerce of his ſubjects, the improvement of the advantages they had obtained, and the public revenue's increaſe.

While the parliament was thus engaged, the nation was filled with the greateſt diſcontent; and a number of virulent pamphlets were circulated throughout the kingdom, in which no character was ſpared; and neither party was free from that particular ſpecies of intemperance of which they accuſed each other. In the midſt of this contention, to the aſtoniſhment of all, the earl of Bute, the principal perſon againſt whom the reſentment of the populace was directed, reſigned his poſt of firſt lord of the treaſury: yet that nobleman was ſuppoſed ſtill to guide the helm of government, and the moſt invidious reflections were thrown out, accompanied with the moſt groſs inſults from riotous mobs. Theſe popular tumults were kept up by many periodical publications, particularly by one called the North-Briton, in which not only the earl of Bute was loaded with abuſe, but the whole nation of the Scots, on his account, were treated with a ſeverity, which the impartiality of our hiſtory obliges to acknowledge, as both unjuſt and inhuman. While things were in this ſituation, a rule for an information was granted by the court of King's-Bench againſt the author, printers, and publiſhers of a periodical paper called the North-Briton, Number forty-five; which contained a ſevere commentary on the king's ſpeech at the cloſe of the ſeſſion of parliament on the nineteenth of April. John Wilkes, Eſq. member of parliament for Ayleſbury in Buckinghamſhire, was the gentleman pitched on as the ſuppoſed author of this performance. A warrant was therefore iſſued by the ſecretary of ſtate for taking Mr. Wilkes, together with the printer and publiſher, into cuſtody. Accordingly, on the evening of the twenty-ninth of April, the meſſengers went to Mr. Wilkes's houſe for that purpoſe. On their entrance he excepted to the generality of the warrant, as his name was not mentioned in it, and threatened the firſt who ſhould offer violence to his perſon in his own houſe, at that unſeaſonable hour of the night, upon any pretended verbal order which they might, or might not, have received for that purpoſe. Upon this the meſſengers thought proper to retire, and defer the execution of the warrant till next morning, when they took him into cuſtody, and carried him before the ſecretaries of ſtate for examination. Immediately after this event a motion was made in the court of Common-Pleas, then ſitting in Weſtminſter-hall, for a Habeas Corpus, which was granted, though by reaſon of the Prothonotary's office not being open, it could not be ſued out till four o'clock in the afternoon. In the mean time ſeveral gentlemen applied for admittance to him; which was refuſed, upon pretence of an order from the ſecretaries of ſtate, which order, notwithſtanding many ſolicitations to that purpoſe, was never produced; and though it was well known that the court of Common-Pleas had granted an Habeas Corpus, and Philip Carteret Webb, Eſq. was aſſured of the fact, Mr. Wilkes was committed to the Tower, where many of his friends were alſo denied admittance to him. May the third, he was brought to the bar of the court of Common-Pleas, where he addreſſed himſelf to the judges on the illegality and hardſhips of his commitment, in a very bold and animated ſpeech. The caſe was then learnedly argued by eminent lawyers on both ſides; but the court, after making a polite excuſe to Mr. Wilkes for the delay, (requiring farther time to conſider of the affair) he was remanded to the Tower till the ſixth of May, with orders that his friends and lawyers ſhould have free acceſs to him. In the mean time orders were given that Mr. Wilkes ſhould no longer continue colonel of the militia for the county of Buckingham. At the time appointed, Mr. Wilkes was again brought to Weſtminſter-hall, when, after another ſpirited addreſs to the court, and many learned arguments on both ſides, the lord chief juſtice Pratt proceeded to give his opinion on the three following points, viz. The legality of Mr. Wilkes's commitment; the neceſſity for a ſpecification of thoſe particular paſſages in number forty-five of the North Briton, which had been deemed a libel; and his privilege as a member of parliament. Theſe points were diſcuſſed by his lordſhip in a manner, which will redound to his honour to the lateſt poſterity: and his opinion having deſervedly met with the approbation of the whole court, Mr. Wilkes was diſcharged. Before, however, he had quitted the court, a gentleman of eminence in the law ſtood up, and informed the lord chief juſtice, that he had juſt received a note from the attorney and ſolicitor-general, to deſire his lordſhip would detain Mr. Wilkes till their arrival, as they had ſomething to offer againſt his plea of privilege. This requeſt, however, was not complied with; and Mr. Wilkes with the following ſpeech took his leave of the court.

"My lords,

"Great as my joy muſt naturally be at the deciſion which this court, with a true ſpirit of liberty, has been pleaſed to make concerning the unwarrantable ſeizure of my perſon, and all the other conſequential grievances, allow me to aſſure you that I feel it far leſs ſenſibly on my own account, than I do for the public. The ſufferings of an individual are a trifling object, when compared with the whole; and I ſhould bluſh to feel for myſelf in compariſon with conſiderations of a nature ſo tranſcendently ſuperior.

"I will not trouble you with my poor thanks. Thanks are due to you from the whole Engliſh nation, and from all the ſubjects of the Engliſh crown. They will be paid you, together with every teſtimony of zeal and affection to the learned ſerjeant, who has ſo ably and conſtitutionally pleaded my cauſe, and in mine, with pleaſure I ſay it, the cauſe of liberty. Every teſtimony of my gratitude is juſtly due to you, and I take my leave of this court with a veneration and reſpect, which no time can obliterate, nor the moſt grateful heart ſufficiently expreſs."

As ſoon as Mr. Wilkes was releaſed from the Tower, he cauſed a printing-preſs to be ſet up, under his own direction, at his houſe in Great George-ſtreet, Weſtminſter, where he advertiſed the proceedings of the adminiſtration, with all the original papers; and the North-Briton was re-publiſhed. In the mean time an information was filed againſt him in the court of King's-Bench, at his majeſty's ſuit, as being author of the North-Briton, number forty-five; and on the meeting of the parliament a meſſage was ſent to the houſe of commons with the information his majeſty had received, that John Wilkes Eſq. a member of that houſe, was the author of a moſt ſeditious and dangerous libel. The examinations and proofs of the ſaid libel, together with the meaſures that had been taken thereon, were alſo laid before the houſe; in conſequence of which the North-Briton, number forty-five, was adjudged a falſe, ſcandalous, and ſeditious libel, and was ordered to be burnt by the hands of the common hangman. On the third of December, the day appointed for this ſentence to be put in execution, a great mob aſſembled at the Royal Exchange, who inſulted the ſheriffs in a very groſs manner, and one of them received a ſlight wound in the fray, which obliged him to quit the place. The North-Briton, however, was partly conſumed, by means of a lighted link, but ſome ſcraps of it were carried off in triumph by the mob, who, in the evening, diſplayed them at Temple-Bar, where a bonfire was made, and the greateſt rejoicings exhibited on the occaſion. Mr. Wilkes now commenced an action againſt Robert Wood, Eſq. under ſecretary of ſtate, for ſeizing his papers. The cauſe was tried on the ſixth of December before lord chief juſtice Pratt, and a ſpecial jury; when, after a hearing of near fifteen hours, many arguments on both ſides, and a moſt maſterly, pathetic, and eloquent charge given by his lordſhip, the jury gave a verdict for the plaintiff with one thouſand pounds damages, and full coſts of ſuit. Previous to this, a complaint had been exhibited againſt Mr. Wilkes, in the houſe of lords, for affixing the name of a member of that houſe to a book entitled, "An Eſſay on Woman;" which blaſphemous book was publicly produced, to the utter confuſion and eternal diſgrace of every perſon concerned in it: but Mr. Wilkes could not prefer his anſwer, being at that time indiſpoſed, in conſequence of a wound he had received in a duel with Samuel Martin, Eſq. late ſecretary of the treaſury, who thinking himſelf groſsly inſulted in the North-Briton, and, by what had paſſed, preſuming Mr. Wilkes was the author of that abuſe, he ſent him a challenge, which being readily accepted by Mr. Wilkes, he unfortunately received a dangerous wound in the belly; of which he ſent immediate notice to the houſe of commons, who thereupon gave him time for his appearance, and afterwards, on the report of his phyſician and ſurgeon, enlarged it: but at length, beginning to ſuſpect ſome colluſion between him and them, on the ſixteenth of December, they ordered Dr. Heberden and Mr. Hawkins to attend him, in order to obſerve the progreſs of his cure, and make a report of the ſame to the houſe. This being made known to Mr. Wilkes by his phyſician, he ſent cards to the two gentlemen appointed to attend him, expreſſing his juſt ſenſe of the kind care of the houſe for his ſpeedy recovery, but at the ſame time intimated his perfect reliance on the gentleman to whom he had committed his caſe, and aſſured them, that though he did not wiſh to ſee them at preſent, he was impatient for an opportunity of ſhewing the juſt regard he would ever pay to diſtinguiſhed merit. It is uncertain whether the attention of the houſe had any happy effect on Mr. Wilkes's health, but he recovered ſo faſt, that on the twenty-fourth of December he ſet out for France on a viſit to his daughter, who was at this time very ill at Paris, and where for the preſent we ſhall leave him, that the tranſactions of the enſuing year may be conſidered.

A. D. 1764.

On the fourteenth of January the hereditary prince of Brunſwic Lunenburgh (having ſailed from Helvoet-ſluys, on board his majeſty's yacht the Princeſs Auguſta, on the tenth), landed at Harwich in the morning, and arrived at night at Somerſet-houſe. On the evening of the ſixteenth, the ceremony of the marriage of her royal highneſs the princeſs Auguſta, eldeſt ſiſter to his majeſty, with his moſt ſerene highneſs the hereditary prince of Brunſwic Lunenburgh, was performed in the great council-chamber, by his grace the archbiſhop of Canterbury, in preſence of a great number of peers, peereſſes, and foreign miniſters. After the ſolemnization of the nuptials, their ſerene, and royal highneſſes, repaired to Leiceſter-houſe, where was prepared an elegant entertainment; at which their majeſties, the princeſs dowager, princes William and Henry, and the reſt of the royal family were preſent.

At this time the hereditary prince, whoſe military atchievements had gained him renown, acquired the affection of the Engliſh nation, by a peculiar affability and generoſity. During his ſhort ſtay, the marquis of Granby generally attending, he viſited the Royal Society, the Britiſh Muſeum, St. Paul's cathedral, the Tower, Weſtminſter-abbey, and other remarkable places; alſo the duke of Cumberland, Mr. Pitt, the duke of Newcaſtle, and many others of the nobility and gentry.

On the twentieth of January, the commons expelled Mr. Wilkes, for a contempt of their authority, and publiſhing the North-Briton, it being adjudged an infamous libel, and iſſued out a writ of election for Ayleſbury in his room; and in the month of February his trial came on in the court of King's Bench, before lord chief juſtice Mansfield, for reprinting and publiſhing the North Briton, number forty-five, at his own houſe: of which publication he was found guilty; as he was afterwards of printing and publiſhing the "Eſſay on Woman." A letter received from Mr. Wilkes was then publiſhed, together with a certificate, ſigned by one of the French king's phyſicians, and a ſurgeon of eminence, which was atteſted by two notaries, and the earl of Hertford, our ambaſſador at the court of France, wherein it appeared that he was ſo bad with his wound as not to have been able, during the month of January, to return to England. April the eighteenth, his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and having given the royal aſſent to ſeveral bills, delivered a ſpeech from the throne, which cloſed the ſeſſion.

During the month of Auguſt a circumſtance happened that gave manifeſt proof of the wonted humanity and beneficence of the inhabitants of London. One colonel Stumpel, an officious German ſoldier of fortune, pretending authority from the Britiſh miniſtry, engaged about ſix hundred proteſtant Wurtzburgers and Palatines to emigrate from their own country, by a promiſe of ſettling them in the iſlands of St. John and le Croix in America. After they had been ſhipped for England, the contractor, finding himſelf unable to fulfil his engagements, abandoned them, and they arrived at the port of London in the moſt imminent danger of periſhing for want. Thoſe who were able to pay their paſſage were permitted to come on ſhore, and they immediately afterwards retired to the fields adjoining to Whitechapel, where they continued ſome days in the moſt wretched ſtate, not having the leaſt ſhelter to preſerve them from the inclemency of the weather; while thoſe who remained on board the ſhip were nearly in as deſtitute a ſituation. The only relief theſe poor deluded people received for ſome days was what could be gathered from the different German churches and chapels about London; but this was far from being ſufficient to relieve ſo great a number. At length, however, Mr. Wachſel, miniſter of the German Lutheran church in Ayliffe-ſtreet, Goodman's fields, laid their caſe before the public in the news-papers of the laſt day of Auguſt; and in ſo true and affecting a manner was it related, that it immediately attracted the attention not only of the great, but alſo of royalty itſelf. Before eleven o'clock on the ſame day one hundred tents were ſent them from the Tower, by order of his majeſty; the paſſage of thoſe who were detained in the ſhip was defrayed, and three hundred pounds were ſent for their immediate ſupport. Subſcriptions were opened, and prodigious ſums of money gathered for their relief. Phyſicians, ſurgeons, and midwives offered their ſervice for the ſick, and thoſe in travail, for the latter of whom proper apartments were hired. Thus delivered from the direful diſtreſs in which they had been placed, Mr. Wachſel, who with ſeveral other benefactors, had formed themſelves into a committee for the management of the ſubſcriptions, waited on the king, to know his pleaſure reſpecting their future diſpoſal. His majeſty communicating his intention of eſtabliſhing them in South Carolina, ordered one hundred and fifty ſtand of arms to be delivered to them for their defence, and contracts to be immediately made for proper veſſels to convey them to that colony. When every thing was prepared for their embarkation, their camp was broke up, and they went on board ſinging hymns of thankſgiving in praiſe of their benefactors, whoſe beneficence had been ſo extenſive, that the committee were not only enabled to furniſh them with every neceſſary while on board, but even after their landing in America to make ſome proviſion for them.

Thus far having recorded the principal domeſtic occurrences of this year, we ſhall now take a view of ſome material tranſactions that happened on the continent. At the commencement of the year, the Eaſt India Company received advice, that the diſputes between their ſervants and the reigning nabob, Coſſim Aly Kawn, had been productive of ſuch animoſities and jealouſies on the part of the latter, that it was judged highly neceſſary to uſe every means to allay them: and for this purpoſe Meſſrs. Amyatt and Hay, two gentlemen of the council, were deputed to wait upon the nabob with inſtructions to endeavour to adjuſt the differences in an amicable manner. Accordingly, being arrived at Mongheer, the place of his reſidence, they held many conferences with him, in which he always ſhewed a great averſion to an accommodation upon the terms offered him; and, about this time, a ſupply of five hundred arms going to Patna, was ſtopt by his officers. Other acts of hoſtility were likewiſe committed, by which affairs were brought to ſuch an extremity, that a war with Coſſim Aly was unavoidable. Meſſrs. Amyatt and Hay were recalled, and the former of thoſe gentlemen having received the uſual paſſports ſet out for Calcutta, accompanied by Meſſrs. Amphlett, Wollaſton, and Hutchinſon; the lieutenants Jones, Gordon, and Cooper, and Dr. Crooke; Meſſrs. Hay and Guiſton being left with the nabob as hoſtages. While the boats were paſſing the city of Moorſhedabad, they were attacked by a number of troops, aſſembled on both ſides the river for that purpoſe, and ſome of the gentlemen in the boats being ſlain, Mr. Amyatt immediately landed with a few ſeapoys, whom he forbad to fire. He then endeavoured to make the enemy underſtand that he was furniſhed with the nabob's paſſports, and had no deſign of committing hoſtilities; but the Mooriſh horſe advancing, ſome of the ſeapoys inadvertently fired, and, in the confuſion which enſued, Mr. Amyatt, with moſt of his ſmall party, were killed. Upon this Mr. Ellis, and the other gentlemen in council at Patna, agreed, with the approbation of captain Corſtairs, to attack the city of Moorſhedabad. This reſolution was executed with the utmoſt ſucceſs, on the twenty-fifth of June, and captain Corſtairs, with his party, were in poſſeſſion of the city for four hours, the Mooriſh governor and his people having fled as far as Futwa. Here, however, he came to a reſolution of returning and making an effort to regain the city, in which he ſucceeded but too well, for moſt of the ſeapoys and Europeans being engaged in plundering the place, they were not prepared to receive him, and conſequently eaſily diſpoſſeſſed of it. Hereupon they retired into the factory, but the men were ſo diſpirited, and the ſeapoys deſerted in ſuch numbers, that it was found impoſſible to make any ſtand there; upon which a reſolution was taken to proceed to Sujah Dowlah's country. Accordingly, they croſſed the river on the twenty-ſixth in the evening, and met with no obſtruction till they paſſed Churpa; when on the thirtieth, they were attacked by the Phouſdar, with about two thouſand men, whom they eaſily routed; but he being joined that evening by near five hundred ſeapoys from Bugepore, who brought ſix field pieces with them, he again attacked the Europeans, who, quitting their ranks at the firſt onſet, were entirely defeated. Fifty of them were killed, among whom was captain Corſtairs. Mr. Ellis and the reſt were all made priſoners. From theſe and other acts of hoſtility committed by Coſſim Aly, in ſeveral of the Company's ſettlements, it was determined to declare war againſt him, and to reſtore Meer Jaffier, the former nabob (who had been depoſed) to the ſubahſhip; obliging him firſt to enter into a treaty, which was ſolemnly ſigned and ſealed at Fort William, on the tenth of July, 1763, and a few days after Meer Jaffier ſet out to join the army under Major Adams, then on its march towards Moorſhedabad. On the nineteenth of July the firſt action happened oppoſite to Cutwa on the Coſſimbuzar ſide of the river. The preceding night major Adams had croſſed with the army, and in the morning came up with a large body of the enemy's troops, who were ſtrongly poſted in order to oppoſe his paſſage to the city. Theſe he attacked, and, after a ſhort reſiſtance, routed them. At the ſame time a detached party, under captain Long, poſſeſſed themſelves of the fort of Cutwa, on the other ſide of the river, together with all the enemy's artillery. Major Adams now purſued his march to Moorſhedabad, which place he entered on the twenty-fourth, at night, with very little oppoſition; and here the army halted for ſome days, during which Meer Jaffier was proclaimed in proper form. On the twenty-eighth of July the army was again put in motion, and on the ſecond of Auguſt they arrived near a place called Sooty, at the head of the Coſſimbuzar river. At this place, a numerous army of the enemy's beſt troops, with artillery, occupied a very advantageous poſt. Major Adams immediately attacked them, and for four hours they made a reſolute defence, but then, being thrown into confuſion, they were eaſily defeated. In this engagement the loſs of the Engliſh conſiſted of ſix officers, and forty Europeans; together with two hundred and ninety-two ſeapoys and black cavalry, killed and wounded. Twenty-three pieces of cannon, and about one hundred and fifty boats, laden with military and other ſtores, were taken. Major Adams, immediately after this battle, advanced with the army near to Rajamant; about three or four miles from which place the enemy had thrown up a ſtrong entrenchment from the hills to the river. This the major was reſolved to attack, and every thing being ready for the aſſault by the fifth of September, it was carried on with ſuch vigour, that in a ſhort time the enemy were obliged to abandon the entrenchment to the conquerors.

By this victory the province of Bengal was entirely ſecured to the Engliſh; and the letters which brought theſe accounts expreſſed their hopes, that the fate of the war would be entirely decided by this action.

Advices were about this time received from North America, by which it appeared that the military operations in that quarter had been carried on with great vigour; but that Sir William Johnſon had at laſt brought the Seneca nation to conceſſions highly advantageous to the ſubjects of Great Britain, and that they had entered into a treaty of peace, friendſhip, and alliance, with the Engliſh, which was reciprocally ſigned in congreſs held at Niagara for that purpoſe.

Colonels Bradſtreet and Bouquet were now equally ſucceſsful as Sir William Johnſon in North America. The Delawares and Shawaneſe had refuſed to meet Sir William at the congreſs of Niagara, but now, intimidated by the march of ſuch a number of troops towards their country, they met colonel Bradſtreet at Preſque Iſle, and in the moſt ſubmiſſive manner, ſued for peace, which was granted them on conditions as follow.

1. " That all priſoners in their hands ſhould be delivered to colonel Bradſtreet at Sanduſky in twenty-five days.

2. " That they ſhall renounce all claim to the poſts and forts the Engliſh now have in their country, and that the latter ſhall be left at liberty to erect as many as they ſhall judge proper to ſecure their trade; and that the Indians ſhall cede to them for ever, as much land as a cannon ſhot can fly over, on which they may raiſe proviſions.

3. " That if any Indian hereafter kill an Engliſhman, he ſhall be delivered up by his nation, and tried by the Engliſh laws, only to have half the jury of Indians: and if any one of the nations renew the war, the reſt ſhall join to bring them to reaſon.

4. " That ſix of the deputies ſhall remain with colonel Bradſtreet as hoſtages, and the other four with an Engliſh officer, and one Indian in the Engliſh intereſt ſhould proceed immediately to acquaint the dependent nations with theſe terms of peace, and forward the collecting of the priſoners to be ready at the day appointed."

Theſe being the only terms which colonel Bradſtreet would grant, they were accordingly agreed to and ſolemnly ratified by the Delawares and Shawaneſe: but it was not long before theſe ſavages again revolted, and renewed their outrages with aggravated inſolence. In conſequence of this perfidy, major-general Gage, commander in chief of his majeſty's forces in thoſe parts, determined to penetrate into the heart of their country. Accordingly, the regular and provincial troops under colonel Bouquet, having been joined by a large body of volunteers from Virginia, Maryland, and Penſylvania, in the beginning of October marched from Fort Pitt, and about the fifteenth arrived at Tuſcarowas. The ſight of the troops in their country threw the ſavages into the utmoſt conſternation, they having depended on their woods for protection, and had frequently boaſted that their ſituation ſecured them from the attacks of our army. Not chooſing to come to an engagement they had again recourſe to negociation, and received for anſwer, that they might have peace, but every priſoner in their poſſeſſion muſt firſt be delivered up, upon which they brought up about twenty, and promiſed to deliver the reſt; but as their promiſes were not regarded, they engaged to ſend the whole on the firſt of November, to a fort about two hundred and fifty miles from Fort Pitt, the center of the Delaware towns, and near to the moſt conſiderable ſettlement of the Shawaneſe. Colonel Bouquet being determined not to loſe ſight of them, moved his camp to that place, and ſoon obliged the Delawares, together with ſome broken tribes, to bring in all their priſoners, even to children bought of white women. They were then told that they muſt appoint deputies to go to Sir William Johnſon, in order to receive ſuch terms as he might think proper to impoſe upon them, which the nations muſt agree to ratify; and they were obliged to leave a number of their chiefs in the hands of the Engliſh, as a ſecurity for the performance of this agreement. All the nations readily agreed to the above terms, except the Shawaneſe, who did not approve of the conditions, and were particularly averſe to the giving of hoſtages: but finding their obſtinacy would only bring on their deſtruction, they at laſt conſented, gave up forty principal chiefs as hoſtages, and appointed their deputies to go to Sir William Johnſon, in the ſame manner as the reſt. The number of priſoners delivered up by theſe ſavages exceeded three hundred, and it was expected that the Engliſh parties would bring in from their different towns, about one hundred more.

In the mean time various accounts were received from the Bay of Honduras, complaining that our logwood cutters there had not only been diſturbed in their buſineſs, but ſuddenly ordered to remove from their uſual places of ſettlement, on pretence of their having nothing to prove that they were ſubjects of his Britannic Majeſty; and granting they were, that they had roved too freely about the country, gathering the fruits of it as if it belonged to them. In conſequence of theſe proceedings, a remonſtrance was preſented to the court of Madrid by our ambaſſador there; and on the twenty-ſeventh of September a meſſenger arrived in London, with a duplicate of the orders which were immediately diſpatched to Don Felix Raming de Eſtenoz, governor of Jucatan. From the tenor of theſe it appeared, that his catholic majeſty diſapproved of the proceedings of the ſaid governor, with reſpect to the ſubjects of the king of Great Britain in the Bay of Honduras; that he expreſſed his deſire of giving his majeſty the greateſt proofs of his friendſhip, and of preſerving peace with the Britiſh; that he had commanded the ſaid governor to re-eſtabliſh the ſaid Britiſh logwood cutters in the ſeveral places from which they had been obliged to retire, and to acquaint them, that they might return to their occupation of cutting logwood, without the dread of any moleſtation.

The ROYAL FAMILY of GEORGE III _ Plate 1.

Published by Alexr. Hogg

Being now near entering upon an hiſtorical period, over which poſterity, in all probability, will ſhed many tears, it may not be amiſs to mention here, though a little out of the due order of time, a melancholy event, which greatly affected the whole nation. The duke of Cumberland, in the following year, had recommended a new miniſtry. He conſtantly aſſiſted them with his advice, influence, and authority, and there is every reaſon to believe, that his patriotiſm would have greatly added to their ſtrength; but in the evening of the thirty-firſt of October, when his royal highneſs, after coming that day from Windſor, was preparing to aſſiſt at one of the councils frequently held at his own houſe, to put matters in a way of being more ſpeedily diſpatched by the privy-council, at eight o'clock, juſt as the duke of Newcaſtle and the lord chancellor came to council, he was ſuddenly ſeized with a fit of ſhivering; and ſaying, "It is all over," ſunk ſenſeleſs into the arms of the earl of Albemarle, and expired. The nation were extremely concerned at their loſs, and teſtified their unfeigned ſorrow by a moſt remarkable general mourning.

In the courſe of our hiſtory we have been particular in characterizing perſons, whoſe virtues have rendered them reſpectable, or vices odious in the public eye; it would not only be ingratitude to our patron, but injuſtice to mankind, to paſs over in ſilence the many qualities of an illuſtrious prince, which at once rendered him the delight and ornament of human nature. A review of his life will afford a moſt ſhining example of patriotiſm, valour, juſtice, friendſhip, ſincerity, and humanity. Inflexibly attached to the intereſt of his country, he braved every danger, nor indulged a thought of life, when called on his ſovereign's duty. Patriotic from principle, he gave ſanction to wiſe and conſtitutional meaſures; nor feared to diſcountenance the ſchemes of oppreſſion, ambition, and avarice. Conſcientiouſly juſt, he rewarded merit irreſpective of rank, nor ſuffered the dignified minion to eſcape his reſentment. Refined in his friendſhip, he ſweetened life by a judicious ſelection of worthy men to partake at his hoſpitable board, and amuſe his leiſure hours with an unreſerved affability of converſe. Inviolably ſincere, he never promiſed without deliberation, or the moſt punctual performance of his engagements. Above all, ſympathetically humane, and extenſively generous, his heart never failed to feel, nor his hand to relieve, the diſtreſſes of his fellow creatures of every age, ſex, and condition. Nay, he ſought opportunities for doing good, and ſtudied plans for the employment of the poor. With theſe virtues to preponderate, his foibles may be eaſily conſigned to oblivion, eſpecially when it is remembered, that to err is the lot of humanity. If ſome, from prejudice, may deem our deſcription exaggerated, we preſume others from juſtice will allow it but adequate, nor refrain a tributary tear at the loſs of ſo eminent a complex of royalty, of birth and dignity of ſoul, which alone conſtitute human excellence. This character of the duke is contained in the following eulogium beſtowed on him by the houſe of lords.

"The many eminent, public and private virtues, the extent of capacity, and the magnanimity of mind; the affection for his majeſty's perſon, and the eminent ſervices performed for his country, which diſtinguiſhed this great and excellent prince, have made an impreſſion never to be eraſed from the minds of a grateful people."

On the ninth of December the corpſe of his royal highneſs was privately interred in king Henry VIIth's chapel at Weſtminſter.

A. D. 1765. ON the tenth of January his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and opened the ſeſſion of parliament with a ſpeech, wherein he informed them, "That the marriage of his ſiſter, the princeſs Carolina Matilda, with the king of Denmark, would be ſolemnized as ſoon as their reſpective ages might permit; that the courts of France and Spain had given freſh aſſurances of their pacific diſpoſitions; that he relied on their wiſdom and firmneſs in promoting obedience to the laws, and reſpect to the legiſlative authority of this kingdom; and his majeſty truſted that they would proceed with temper, unanimity, and diſpatch." To this ſpeech both houſes preſented the moſt affectionate addreſſes; and on the ſeventh of February, the houſe of commons agreed to no leſs than fifty-five reſolutions, formed by the committee of ſupplies, for impoſing much the ſame ſtamp-duties upon the Americans, as are payable here in England; and the ſaid reſolutions being formed into a bill, received the royal aſſent on the twenty-ſecond of March. On the twenty-fourth of April the king, who had been indiſpoſed, again repaired to the houſe of peers, and having ſigned ſuch bills as were ready, made a ſpeech from the throne, in which his majeſty earneſtly recommended to their ſerious deliberation, the making ſuch proviſion as would be neceſſary, in caſe any of his children ſhould ſucceed to the throne before they had reſpectively attained the age of eighteen years. In conformity to his majeſty's requeſt, a regency-bill was ordered to be brought into the houſe of lords, where it was paſſed, and ſent to the commons. But here it met with ſome oppoſition. However, an amendment having been made which was approved of by the lords, on the fifteenth of May it received the royal aſſent. By this act the king was empowered to appoint the queen, with the princes of the blood, and all the great officers of the ſtate jointly, regents during the minority of the prince of Wales; and that his majeſty ſhould be further allowed to add to the number of regents ſuch perſons as he thought proper, whoſe names ſhould be left, in caſe of his death, ſealed up in a deed, to be opened by the privy-council. This affair being thus concluded, his majeſty, on the twenty-fifth of May, prorogued the parliament by commiſſion, not being able to attend in perſon through ſevere indiſpoſition.

Immediately after theſe tranſactions, an account arrived of the ſucceſs of his majeſty's arms, in conjunction with the company's troops, in the Eaſt Indies, a complete victory having been obtained over the king and vizier of Hindoſtan, by major Hector Monro. The Indians had ſix thouſand men ſlain on the field of battle, and loſt one hundred and thirty pieces of cannon, beſides military ſtores of different kinds, with all their tents ready pitched. The loſs of the victors was comparatively ſmall, for they had only thirty-two Europeans, and two hundred and thirty nine Indians killed; fifty-ſeven Europeans, and four hundred and ſeventy-three Indians wounded. Such was the ſituation of affairs in the Eaſt-Indies, when major Monro was recalled; and Sir Robert Fletcher, an officer brought up in the company's ſervice, was appointed to command in his room. He took the field as ſoon as he arrived; and marched about one hundred and fifty miles up the Ganges, when he attacked ſeveral of the enemy's forts, and made the garriſons priſoners of war.

Information at this time was received by letters from North Carolina, of many outrages committed in that country by a ſet of lawleſs banditti, who had murdered ſome Cherokees in alliance with the Engliſh. The ſame accounts likewiſe contained a moſt affecting narrative of the arrival of the priſoners at the Engliſh camp, after the defeat of the Ohio Indians by the forces under the command of general Bouquet. This ſcene exhibited a view of fathers and mothers recognizing and claſping their once loſt babes; huſbands hanging round the necks of their newly recovered wives; ſiſters and brothers unexpectedly meeting together after a long ſeparation, ſcarce able to ſpeak the ſame language. The following paragraph, from the ſpeech of the Shawaneſe chief on delivering up his priſoners, is a ſtrong proof of their tenderneſs and affection for the captives, whom they had preſerved and treated with the utmoſt liberality.

“ Fathers” (addreſſing the Engliſh) “ we have brought your fleſh and blood to you; they have been all united to us by adoption; and although we now deliver them, we will always look upon them as our relations, whenever the great Spirit is pleaſed that we may viſit them. We have taken as much care of them as if they were our own fleſh and blood. They are now become unacquainted with your cuſtoms and manners, and therefore we requeſt you will uſe them tenderly and kindly, which will induce them to live with you contentedly and happy.”

Our attention muſt now be devoted to that affecting period of the Engliſh hiſtory, which has been attended by the moſt unhappy, we may ſay too, the moſt diſgraceful and humiliating conſequences. In America, great diſturbances aroſe on account of the ſtamp-act. The firſt intelligence that arrived there of ſuch a bill being in agitation, threw an univerſal melancholy on the countenances of the people; but when it was known that the bill had paſſed both houſes, and received the royal aſſent, they were fired with indignation, and nothing but confuſion took place throughout moſt of the provinces. When the news arrived at Boſton, the ſhips in the harbour hung out their colours half maſt high, in token of the deepeſt mourning; the bells were rung muffled; copies of the act were printed, with a death's head to it, in the place where it is uſual to fix the ſtamps, and cried publicly about the ſtreets by the name of “ The folly of England, and ruin of America.” Eſſays ſoon followed, not only againſt the expediency, but even the equity of it, in ſeveral news-papers, one of which bore the ſignificant title of “ The Conſtitutional Courant, containing matters intereſting to liberty, and no ways repugnant to loyalty, printed by Andrew Marvel, at the ſign of the Bribe Refuſed, on Conſtitution hill, North America.” The head-piece to this paper was a ſnake cut in pieces, with the initial letters of the names of the ſeveral colonies, from New England to South Carolina, affixed to each piece, and above them the words “ Join or Die.” To theſe were added caricatures, paſquinades, puns, bon-mots, and ſuch ſayings, ſuited to the occaſion, as by being ſhort could be moſt eaſily circulated and retained; at the ſame time that, by being extremely expreſſive, they carried with them the weight of a great many arguments. The two chief articles urged in theſe news-paper eſſays were, firſt, that the perſon acting under this ſtatute, had it in his power to bring an action, the cauſe of which had ariſen at one extremity of the North American colonies, and extended itſelf to the other, at almoſt two thouſand miles diſtance, without the traders being entitled to recover damages, in caſe the judge certified that there was any probable cauſe for the proſecution. The ſecond was, the judge having an intereſt in giving a decree in favour of the party ſuing for the penalties of the act, on being allowed, a very large ſhare in theſe penalties by way of commiſſion.

As ſoon as the printed act reached the colonies, the populace were every where exaſperated againſt it to ſuch a degree, as to ſhew it the moſt public marks of contempt. In ſeveral places it was burnt, together with the effigies of thoſe who were ſuppoſed to have voted for, or otherwiſe had any hand in favour of it. At the ſame time it was agreed, at the meetings of thoſe in higher rank, that thanks ſhould be given to general Conway and colonel Barré, two gentlemen whom they conſidered as the moſt ſtrenuous oppoſers of it in the Britiſh houſe of commons; that their ſpeeches againſt it, and their pictures, ſhould be requeſted. The pictures to be hung up in their places of meeting, and their ſpeeches to be inſerted in the books deſtined to record all their principal tranſactions. The news of this diſcontent having reached England, ſeveral maſters of ſhips refuſed to take any ſtamps on board for the colonies; and it ſoon appeared that their precaution was well founded; for ſuch as ventured to take them had ſufficient cauſe to repent it on their arrival at their deſtined ports, where, to ſave their veſſels from fire, and their perſons from the gallows, they were moſt of them obliged to ſurrender their execrated cargoes into the hands of the enraged multitude, which they treated in the ſame ignominious pious manner they had done the act: the other veſſels were obliged to take ſhelter under ſuch of the king's ſhips as happened to be at hand to protect them. But thoſe gentlemen who went from England with commiſſions to act as diſtributors of the ſtamps, met with ſtill worſe treatment. Many of them were made to renounce, now and for ever, publicly and upon oath, all manner of concern in them: others thought it moſt prudent to return from whence they came; whilſt ſome, who were ſuſpected of obſtinately perſiſting in endeavouring to enſlave their country, as it was termed, or of having ſpoke too freely concerning the behaviour of the people on this occaſion, had their houſes burnt down, and their moſt valuable effects plundered or deſtroyed. Even thoſe who, without their ſolicitation or knowledge had been named, were obliged, in virtue of the offices they already filled, to ſuperintend the diſtribution of the ſtamped paper, were treated in the ſame manner; and the populace having ſuſpected one of writing to England in diſreſpectful terms concerning their proceedings, ſurrounded his houſe, and notwithſtanding the moſt earneſt entreaties, obliged him to deliver up the copies of his letters, and thereby turn evidence againſt himſelf. Even ſhips bringing ſtamped mercantile or cuſtom-houſe papers, merely in their own defence, from ſuch of the colonies as had thought proper to ſubmit to the ſtamp act, were forced to part with them to be ſtuck up in deriſion in coffee houſes and taverns, and publicly committed to the flames. By degrees, many of the better ſort joined the populace in thoſe tumults; and one of them ſet the act openly at defiance, by advertiſing under his hand, that thoſe whoſe buſineſs it was to enforce it, might ſave themſelves the trouble of calling upon him for that purpoſe; for that he was reſolved to pay no taxes but what was laid by his repreſentatives. The provincial aſſemblies themſelves declined giving the governors any advice concerning their behaviour on this critical occaſion; and though they diſavowed theſe riotous proceedings, and bid rewards for apprehending the rioters, yet they could not be brought to condemn them farther than decency required; and abſolutely refuſed, when exhorted to it by the governors, to make any compenſation to the injured parties; much leſs could they be brought to ſtrengthen the hands of the executive power, ſo far as to prevent any future commotions; which as levelled entirely at the ſtamp-act, and as having no particular leaders, whoſe ignorance and brutality might be attended with worſe conſequences than what they wiſhed to avoid, they did not think proper to conſider as objects of military reſtraint. This behaviour of the general aſſemblies was openly approved, if not encouraged, by aſſemblies of the freeholders and principal inhabitants of ſome places, who directed their repreſentatives not to agree to any ſteps for the protection of ſtamped papers, or ſtamp officers, though they owned there had been already ſome tumults and diſorder relating to them; and likewiſe cautioned them againſt all unconſtitutional draughts on the public treaſury. The general aſſemblies went ſtill further; for inſtead of barely conniving at the people's aſſerting their independence by tumultuous acts, they proceeded to avow it themſelves, and at the ſame time conſidering, that unanimity is the chief ſource of ſtrength, they eſtabliſhed committees to correſpond with each other concerning the general affairs of the whole, and even appointed deputies from theſe committees to meet in a congreſs at New York. But ſuch harmony already prevailed in the ſentiments of the general aſſemblies of the ſeveral provinces, that the deputies, when met, had little more to do than congratulate each other upon it, and put their hands to one general declaration of their rights, and the grievances they laboured under, and to one general petition expreſſive thereof, to the king, lords, and commons, of the mother country. In a ſhort time, the ſubordinate executive powers began to join the legiſlative. The juſtices of peace for the diſtrict of Weſtmoreland in Virginia gave public notice, under their hands, that they had declined acting in that capacity; becauſe, in conſequence of their judicial oath, they were liable to become inſtrumental in the deſtruction of their country's moſt eſſential rights and liberties. Their example was followed by the gentlemen of the law, who reſolved rather than carry it on with ſtamped papers, to give up their buſineſs.

This act took place on the firſt of November; at which time not a ſheet of ſtamped paper was to be had throughout the ſeveral colonies of New England, New York, New Jerſey, Penſylvania, Virginia, Maryland, or the two Carolinas, except a ſmall parcel, which the governor of New York, terrified by the threats of the enraged populace, had ſurrendered into the hands of the corporation of that place, on condition of their not being deſtroyed; ſo that all buſineſs which could not be legally carried on without ſtamps, was at once put to a ſtand, except that of news printing, which the printers ſtill continued, pleading in excuſe, that if they did not, the populace would ſerve them as they had done the ſtamp-maſters themſelves. The courts of juſtice were cloſed, and the ports ſhut up. Even in thoſe colonies where ſtamps were to be had, people of the beſt fortune ſubmitted to be aſked in church, rather than take out licences for private marriages. The effects of this ſtagnation ſoon began to be ſo ſeverely felt, that the inhabitants found it neceſſary to hit upon ſome expedient by which they might elude the act. Accordingly, one of them ſent a thin piece of bark to the printers at Boſton, on which he had written, "That it being neither paper, parchment, or vellum, he would be glad to know, if inſtruments written on ſuch ſtuff might not be valid, though not ſtamped: in which caſe he was ready to ſupply, with good writing bark, all thoſe whoſe conſciences were bound by the late act." At laſt, the governors of ſome of the provinces, though bound by the act to ſwear to ſee it obſerved, under the ſevereſt penalties, imagining the total ſtoppage of all public buſineſs of ſuch bad conſequence to the community, as to render lawful the non-compliance with any injunctions laid on them, or even the breach of any oath taken by them in conſequence of injunctions, merely for the ſake of that community, thought proper to diſpenſe with the uſe of ſtamps, grounding their diſpenſation on the abſolute impoſſibility of procuring any; and accordingly granted certificates of that impoſſibility to all outward-bound veſſels, to protect them in other parts of his majeſty's dominions, from the penalties of the act.

The lieutenant-governor of South Carolina was, on this occaſion, one of thoſe who refuſed to acquieſce in the tranſacting of any public buſineſs without ſtamps; in conſequence of which the commons houſe of aſſembly took the following method with him. They preſented an addreſs to him, wherein they deſired to be informed, if the ſtamp-act had been tranſmitted to him by the ſecretaries of ſtate, the lords of trade, or through any other authentic channel; and, on his anſwering that he had received it firſt from the attorney-general of the province, on that gentleman's arrival from England, and ſince from Mr. Boone, the governor of the province, they replied, that neither of theſe ways of receiving any act was ſuch a notification thereof, as to oblige him to enforce the execution of it; as the governor, while out of the province, or the attorney-general, even while in it, could not, at leaſt with regard to this communication, be conſidered in any other light than private gentlemen.

At the ſame time they put him in mind, that there were ſeveral inſtances of the province having ſuffered peculiar and very great hardſhips, and for no ſmall length of time, even from the accidental detention or miſcarriage of governmental informations, enough to prove, that certain forms were abſolutely neceſſary in all matters of government, eſpecially ſuch as related to the authenticity of new laws of ſuch immenſe conſequence. Theſe arguments, however, ſeemed to make little or no impreſſion on the governor or his council. The merchants of all thoſe colonies which ventured openly to oppoſe the act, now entered into the moſt ſolemn engagements with each other, not only not to order any more goods from Great Britain, let the conſequences be what they would, and recall the orders they had already given, if not obeyed by the firſt of January 1766, but even not to diſpoſe of any Britiſh goods ſent them on commiſſion, that were not ſhipped before that day; or, if they conſented to any relaxation from theſe engagements, it was not to take place till the ſtamp-act, and even the ſugar and paper money acts were repealed. The people of Philadelphia alſo reſolved, though not unanimouſly, that till ſuch repeal, no lawyer ſhould put in ſuit a demand for money owing by a reſident in America to one in England; nor any perſon in America, however indebted in England, make any remittances there. Theſe reſolutions were adopted by the retailers, who unanimouſly agreed not to buy or ſell any Britiſh goods ſhipped contrary to them. But Ireland received material benefit from theſe proceedings, as what goods the colonies could not poſſibly do without, they took from that country in exchange for their hemp-ſeed and flax-ſeed, of which they ſent yearly very large quantities. In the mean time they omitted no methods to free themſelves even from this dependence. A ſociety of arts, manufactures, and commerce, on the plan of the London ſociety, was inſtituted at New-York, and markets opened for the ſale of home-made goods; by which it ſoon appeared, that neither the natives, nor the manufacturers, whom the natives had for ſome time paſt been inviting from Great Britain by very large encouragements, had been idle. Linens, woollens, the coarſer but moſt uſeful kinds of iron ware, malt-ſpirits, paper-hangings, &c. were produced to the ſociety, and greatly approved; and when brought to market, every body appeared deſirous of purchaſing them. At the ſame time, leſt the new woollen manufactures ſhould come ſhort of materials, moſt of the inhabitants came to a reſolution not to eat any lamb; and to extend the influence of their reſolution to thoſe who did not join them in it, not to deal with any butcher that ſhould kill or expoſe any lamb to ſale. In ſhort, the ſpirit of induſtry and frugality, took place of the ſpirit of idleneſs and profuſeneſs. The moſt ſubſtantial and even faſhionable people were the firſt in ſetting the example to their countrymen, by contenting themſelves with home-ſpun or old cloaths, rather than make uſe of any thing Britiſh; and ſuch were the efforts of all ranks, and ſo prudent their meaſures, that many now began to be convinced of what they had till then thought impoſſible, that the colonies would ſoon be able to ſupply themſelves with every common neceſſary.

His Majeſty, in conſequence of the diſtracted ſtate of America, thought proper to aſſemble the parliament ſooner than had been intended. Accordingly, on the ſeventeenth of December he went to the houſe of peers, and opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne, as follows:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"The preſent general ſtate of tranquillity in Europe, gave me hopes, that it would not have been neceſſary to aſſemble my parliament ſooner than is uſual in time of peace: but as matters of importance have lately occurred in ſome of my colonies in America, which will demand the moſt ſerious attention of parliament, and as further informations are daily expected from different parts of that country, of which I ſhall order the fulleſt accounts to be prepared for your conſideration; I have thought fit to call you now together, in order that the opportunity may be thereby given, to iſſue the neceſſary writs on the many vacancies that have happened in the houſe of commons ſince the laſt ſeſſion, ſo that the parliament may be full, to proceed immediately, after the uſual receſs, on the conſideration of ſuch weighty matters as will then come before you."

The citizens of London evinced this year a noble and diſintereſted regard for genuine merit, by electing Mr. Alderman Janſſen to the office of chamberlain of this city. This gentleman having reduced his circumſtances by his connections with ſeveral public ſpirited plans, had for ſome years paſt lived in obſcurity, and abridged himſelf of every ſuperfluity, gradually to compenſate the loſs of his creditors. Such was his modeſty, that he was not without much difficulty prevailed upon to offer himſelf a candidate for the vacant poſt; but merit overcame every obſtacle, and his grateful fellow-citizens exulted in an opportunity of publickly honouring a man ſo truly honeſt and worthy.

A. D. 1766.

His majeſty went to the houſe of peers, on the fourteenth of January, and being ſeated on his throne, addreſſed both houſes in the following manner.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"When I met you laſt, I acquainted you, that matters of importance had happened in America, which would demand the moſt ſerious attention of parliament.

"That no information which could ſerve to direct your deliberations in ſo intereſting a concern might be wanting, I have ordered all the papers that give any light into the origin, the progreſs, or the tendency of the diſturbances which have of late prevailed in ſome of the northern colonies, to be immediately laid before you.

"No time has been loſt, on the firſt advice of theſe diſturbances, to iſſue orders to the governors of my provinces, and to the commanders of my forces in America, for the exertion of all the powers of government, in the ſuppreſſion of riots and tumults, and in the effectual ſupport of lawful authority.

"Whatever remains to be done on this occaſion, I commit to your wiſdom; not doubting but your zeal for the honour of my crown, your attention to the juſt rights and authority of the Britiſh legiſlature, and your affection and concern for the welfare and proſperity of all my people, will guide you to ſuch ſound and prudent reſolutions, as may tend at once to preſerve thoſe conſtitutional rights over the colonies, and to reſtore to them that harmony and tranquillity, which have lately been interrupted by riots and diſorders of the moſt dangerous nature.

"If any alterations ſhould be wanting in the commercial œconomy of the plantations, which may tend to enlarge and ſecure the mutual and beneficial intercourſe of my kingdoms and colonies, they will deſerve your moſt ſerious conſideration. In effectuating purpoſes ſo worthy of your wiſdom and public ſpirit, you may depend upon my moſt hearty concurrence and ſupport. The preſent happy tranquillity ſubſiſting in Europe, will enable you to purſue ſuch objects of your interior policy with a more uninterrupted attention.

"Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I have ordered the proper eſtimates for the current ſervice of the year to be laid before you.

Such ſupplies as you may grant ſhall be duly applied with the utmoſt fidelity, and ſhall be diſpenſed with the ſtricted œconomy.

“ My lords and gentlemen,

“ I earneſtly recommend to you to proceed in your deliberations with temper and unanimity. The time requires, and I doubt not but your own inclinations will lead you to thoſe ſalutary diſpoſitions. I have nothing at heart but the aſſertion of legal authority, the preſervation of the liberties of all my ſubjects, the equity and good order of my government, and the concord and proſperity of all my dominions.”

Petitions now followed this ſpeech from the merchants of London, Briſtol, Lancaſter, Liverpool, Hull, Glaſgow, and in ſhort, from moſt of the trading and manufacturing towns and boroughs in the kingdom, wherein they ſet forth the great decay of their trade, owing to the new laws and regulations made for America: the vaſt quantity of our manufactures (beſides thoſe articles imported from abroad, which were purchaſed either with our own manufactures, or with the produce of our colonies) which the American trade formerly took off our hands; by all which many thouſand manufacturers, ſeamen, and labourers, had been employed, to the very great and increaſing benefit of the nation. That in return for theſe exports, the petitioners had received from the colonies, rice, indigo, tobacco, naval ſtores, oil, whale-fins, furs, and lately pot-aſh, with other ſtaple commodities; beſides a large balance in remittances by bills of exchange and bullion, obtained by the coloniſts for articles of their produce, not required for the Britiſh market, and therefore exported to other places: that from the nature of this trade, conſiſting of Britiſh manufactures exported, and of the import of raw materials from America, many of them uſed in our manufactures, and all of them tending to leſſen our dependence on neighbouring ſtates, it muſt be deemed of the higheſt importance in the commercial ſyſtem of this nation: that this commerce, ſo beneficial to the ſtate, and ſo neceſſary for the ſupport of multitudes, then lay under ſuch difficulties and diſcouragements, that nothing leſs than its utter ruin was apprehended, without the immediate interpoſition of parliament: that the colonies were then indebted to the merchants of Great Britain, to the amount of ſeveral millions ſterling; and that, when preſſed for payment, they appeal to paſt experience in proof of their willingneſs; but declare it is not in their power at preſent to make good their engagements, alledging, that the taxes and reſtrictions laid upon them, and the extenſion of the juriſdiction of the vice-admiralty courts, eſtabliſhed by ſome late acts of parliament, particularly by an act of parliament paſſed in the fourth year of his preſent majeſty, for granting certain duties in the Britiſh colonies and plantations in America; and by an act paſſed in the fifth year of his majeſty, for granting and applying certain ſtamp-duties, &c. in the ſaid colonies, &c. with ſeveral regulations and reſtraints, which, if founded in acts of parliament for defined purpoſes, they repreſent to have been extended in ſuch a manner as to diſturb legal commerce, and harraſs the fair trader, and to have ſo far interrupted the uſual and former moſt uſeful branches of their commerce, reſtrained the ſale of their produce, thrown the ſtate of the ſeveral provinces into confuſion, and brought on ſo great a number of actual bankruptcies, that the former opportunities and means of remittances and payments were utterly loſt and taken from them. That the petitioners were, by theſe unhappy events, reduced to the neceſſity of applying to the houſe, in order to ſecure themſelves and their families from impending ruin; to prevent a multitude of manufacturers from becoming a burden to the community, or elſe ſeeking their bread in other countries, to the irretrievable loſs of the kingdom: and to preſerve the ſtrength of this nation entire, its commerce flouriſhing, the revenues increaſing, our navigation, the bulwark of the kingdom, in a ſtate of growth and extenſion; and the colonies from inclination, duty, and intereſt, firmly attached to the mother-country. Such kind of petitions from every part of the kingdom, replete with a number of intereſting facts, ſtated and atteſted by many people, whoſe lives having been entirely devoted to trade, muſt naturally be eſteemed competent judges of a ſubject which they had ſo long and ſo cloſely attended to, could not fail of having great weight with the houſe, as had alſo a petition which arrived at this time from the agent for the iſland of Jamaica, ſetting forth the ill conſequences that had attended a ſtamp-tax which the aſſembly of that iſland had impoſed, and which was ſuffered to expire, it having been found unequal and burdenſome in a very high degree; and he gave it as his opinion, that the preſent law for a ſtamp-duty in the colonies would be attended with the ſame, if not greater inconveniencies. Petitions were likewiſe received from the agents for Virginia and Georgia, ſetting forth their inability to pay the ſtamp-duty; yet the party, who had reſolved on the ſupport of the ſtamp-act, at all events, could not be prevailed on, either by the arguments or the facts contained in the petitions, to remit the leaſt of their ardour. Such petitions they repreſented as the effect of miniſterial artifice; and obſerved, that ſuppoſing the diſtreſs of trade, for a due exertion of the authority of parliament, was as real and as great as it was repreſented, yet it were better to ſubmit to this temporary inconvenience, than, to hazard the total loſs of the juſt ſuperiority of Great Britain over her colonies, by a repeal of the act.

They, on the other hand, who contended for the repeal, were divided in their opinion as to the right of taxation; the more numerous body, among whom were the miniſtry, inſiſted that the legiſlature of Great Britain had an undoubted right to tax the colonies; but acknowledged the inexpediency of the preſent tax, as ill adapted to the condition of the colonies, and built upon principles ruinous to the trade of Great Britain. Thoſe who denied the right of taxation were not ſo numerous; but they conſiſted of ſome characters the moſt diſtinguiſhed and popular among us.

The Houſe attended to this affair with the moſt unwearied application; yet the nature of their enquiries, the number of petitions they received, and the multitude of papers and witneſſes they had to examine, occaſioned a delay which could not be remedied; during this there were continual debates, and the oppoſition made the moſt ſtrenuous efforts for enforcing the ſtamp-act, and by every means to prevent the repeal. In the courſe of this debate two queſtions aroſe, viz. Whether the legiſlature of Great Britain had a right of taxation over the colonies, or not? and What was the expediency or inexpediency of the late laws? On theſe queſtions the whole turned.

The right of taxation was oppoſed by gentlemen, who produced many learned authorities from Locke, Selden, Harrington, and Puffendorf, ſhewing, “ That the very foundation and ultimate point in view of all government, is the good of ſociety.” They likewiſe urged, that by going up to Magna Charta, and referring to the ſeveral writs upon record iſſued out for the purpoſe of raiſing taxes for the crown, and for ſending repreſentatives to parliament, as well as from the bill of rights, it appears, throughout the whole hiſtory of our conſtitution, that no Britiſh ſubject can be taxed, but per communem conſenſum parliamenti, that is to ſay, of himſelf or his own repreſentative; and this is that firſt and general right, as Britiſh ſubjects, with which the firſt inhabitants of the colonies emigrated; for the right does not depend upon their charters: the charters were but the exterior modelling of the conſtitution of the colonies: but the great interior fundamental of their conſtitution is this general right of a Britiſh ſubject, which is the very firſt principle of liberty,—No man ſhall be taxed, but by himſelf or his repreſentative. That the counties palatine of Cheſter, Durham, and Lancaſter, were not taxed but in their own aſſemblies or parliaments; till at different periods in our hiſtory they were melted into our preſent form of parliamentary repreſentation. That the body of the clergy, till very late, taxed themſelves, and granted the king benevolences. That the Marches of Wales had a right of taxing themſelves till they ſent members to parliament, and from this circumſtance has continued the ſtyle of the king's proclamations, and of our acts of parliament to this day, although unneceſſarily, to name eſpecially the principality of Wales, and the town of Monmouth and Berwick. That many people carry the idea of a parliament too far, in ſuppoſing it can do every thing; which is not true, and if it were, it is not right conſtitutionally: for then there might be an arbitrary power in a parliament as well as in any one man. There are many things a parliament cannot do. It cannot make itſelf executive, nor diſpoſe of offices that belong to the crown. It cannot take any man's property, even that of the meaneſt cottager, as in the caſe of incloſures, without his being heard. The lords cannot reject a money bill from the commons, nor the commons erect themſelves into a court of juſtice. The parliament could not tax the clergy, till ſuch time as they were repreſented in parliament. Nor can Ireland be taxed by the parliament of England.

The charters of the colonies, which are derived from prerogatives, and are in fact only ſo many grants from the crown, are not the only right the colonies have to being repreſented before they are taxed. They, as Britiſh ſubjects, take up their rights and liberties from a higher origin than their charters only. They take them up from the ſame origin and fountain, from whence they flow to all Engliſhmen, from Magna Charta, and the natural right of the ſubject. By that rule of right, the charters of the colonies, like all other crown-grants, are to be reſtricted and interpreted, for the benefit, not the prejudice of the ſubjects. Had the firſt inhabitants of the colonies renounced all connection with their mother country, they might have renounced their original rights; but when they emigrated under the authority of the crown, and the national ſanction, they went out from hence, at the hazard of their lives and fortunes, with all the firſt great privileges of Engliſhmen on their backs: but at the ſame time they were not, and could not be bound by penal laws of this country, from the ſeverity of which they fled, to climates remote from the heavy hand of power, and which they hoped to find more friendly to their principles of civil and religious liberty. It is upon this ground, that it has been univerſally received as law, that no acts of parliament made here, and particularly thoſe which enact any penalty, are binding upon the colonies, unleſs they are ſpecially named. The inhabitants of the colonies once removed from the domeſtic legiſlation of the mother country, are no more dependent upon it in the general ſyſtem, than the Iſle of Man is, or than, in the feudal ſyſtem of Europe, many ſubordinate principalities are dependent on the juriſdiction of the ſeigneur Suzerain, or lord Paramount; but owing only to a limited obedience. By what has been ſaid it is not meant to affect the caſe of any external duties laid upon their ports, or of any reſtrictions which by the act of navigation, or other acts are laid upon their commerce; for they are in the ſame caſe, as all other colonies belonging to the reſt of the maritime powers in Europe; who have ſhut up their colonies from all intercourſe with foreign countries in the very firſt eſtabliſhment. What is ſpoken of are internal taxes, to be levied on the body of the people; and that they muſt firſt be repreſented, before they can be liable to theſe internal taxes.

As ſoon as the debates were cloſed, and the queſtion put, the power of the legiſlature of Great Britain over her colonies, in all caſes whatſoever, and without any diſtinction in regard to taxation, was without a diviſion confirmed and aſcertained.

The grand committee who had paſſed the reſolutions, on which the foregoing queſtion was debated, had alſo paſſed another for the total repeal of the ſtamp-act; and two bills were accordingly brought in to anſwer theſe purpoſes. By the bill itſelf, all votes, reſolutions, or orders, which had been paſſed by any of the general aſſemblies in America, by which they aſſumed to themſelves the ſole and excluſive right of taxing his majeſty's ſubjects in the colonies, were annulled, and declared contrary to law, derogatory to the legiſlative authority of parliament, and inconſiſtent with their dependency upon the crown.

Far from being yet diſpirited, oppoſition gained new vigour, and ſtill reſiſted the repeal in every part of its progreſs. But on the queſtion being put, notwithſtanding this, the bill paſſed by a majority of one hundred and eight, and was carried up to the lords by above two hundred members of the houſe of commons. The eclat, however, with which it was introduced did not prevent its meeting with a ſtrong oppoſition in the upper houſe, a proteſt was entered againſt it at the ſecond reading by thirty-three lords, and at the third by twenty-eight, notwithſtanding which it was carried by a majority of thirty-four; and on the eighteenth of March received the royal aſſent. Upon this the American merchants made a moſt numerous appearance to expreſs their joy and gratitude: the ſhips in the river diſplayed their colours: ſeveral houſes in the city were illuminated: and every proper method was taken to demonſtrate the juſt ſenſe that was entertained of his majeſty's goodneſs, and the wiſdom of parliament, in conciliating the minds of the people on this critical occaſion. The national buſineſs thus finiſhed, his majeſty, on the ſixteenth of June, went to the houſe of peers, and put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne; and ſoon after the riſing of the parliament his majeſty thought proper to make the following changes in the miniſtry: His grace the duke of Grafton was appointed firſt lord of the treaſury in the room of the marquis of Rockingham; the earl of Shelburne ſucceeded the duke of Richmond as ſecretary of ſtate; lord Camden was created lord high chancellor in the place of the earl of Northington, as was the honourable Charles Townſhend chancellor of the exchequer, in the room of the right honourable William Dowdeſwell; and the right honourable William Pitt, was made lord privy ſeal, who ſome days before had been created viſcount Pynſent and earl of Chatham.

As the price of proviſion was at this time very exorbitant, inſurrections took place in ſeveral parts of the kingdom among the poor. Having deſtroyed the flour mills, they ſeized on corn, and other neceſſaries of life, which they ſold at a moderate price, and delivered the money to the owners. In ſome places they were much more violent; for inſtead of taking the above method of ſupplying their wants, they ripped open the ſacks, and ſcattered the corn about, ſeized butter, cheeſe, and bacon, in the ſhops, which they threw into the ſtreets, and behaved in the moſt outrageous manner to the proprietors of the goods they thus demoliſhed. In order to prevent the dreadful conſequences that were likely to enſue on this account, a proclamation was publiſhed on the eleventh of September for putting in execution the laws againſt foreſtalling, regrating and engroſſing of corn. And on the twenty-third of the ſame month two other proclamations were publiſhed: by the firſt of which an embargo was laid on all veſſels laden, or to be laden, with wheat or flower for exportation, till the fourteenth of November; and by the other the diſtilling of ſpirits from wheat was prohibited.

The parliament having aſſembled on the eighteenth of November, his majeſty repaired to the houſe, and opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne. As the miniſtry had been recently changed, great oppoſition was made to every thing propoſed by adminiſtration; however, it was agreed upon, by a great majority in both houſes, that addreſſes of thanks ſhould be preſented to his majeſty, in anſwer to his ſpeech, which being done they adjourned till after Chriſtmas.

A. D. 1767. In the courſe of the preceding year, violent diſputes took place between the proprietors of Eaſt India ſtock, and the directors; occaſioned by the former ſuppoſing, that an increaſe of dividend ſhould be made, adequate to the great opulence of the company at this time; owing to their amazing ſucceſs in the Eaſt Indies. This the directors ſtrenuouſly oppoſed, and in a little time the news-papers became the common field for the diſcuſſion of India affairs, by which means every thing relative to them was publicly known. Soon after it was rumoured that the government intended to interfere, in ſome manner, in the diſpoſition of the company's affairs. At firſt this report obtained but little credit, till, a few days before the meeting of the general court at Michaelmas, a meſſage was actually received by the directors, from the miniſtry, informing them, "That as the affairs of the Eaſt India company had been mentioned in parliament laſt ſeſſion, it was very probable they might be taken into conſideration again; therefore, from the regard they had to the welfare of the company, and that they might have time to prepare their papers for that occaſion, they informed them, that the parliament would meet ſome time in November." Accordingly, in the beginning of this ſeſſion, a committee was appointed to examine into the ſtate and condition of the company, and ſome time after it was ordered, that copies of the company's charters, their treaties with, and grants from, the country powers; together with their letters and correſpondence to and from their ſervants in India; the ſtate of their revenues in Bengal, Bahar, Orixa, and other places, ſhould all be laid before the houſe: alſo an account of all expences incurred by government on the company's account, whether in the naval, military, or whatever other departments. An order was then given for printing the Eaſt India papers; upon which the court of directors preſented a petition, ſhewing the great injury it would be to the company, and the many ill conſequences that would probably attend the printing the private correſpondence between them and their ſervants. In conſequence of this petition, a motion being made to diſcharge the order, a debate enſued; but it was at laſt agreed, that the private correſpondence ſhould not be printed. The diſputes were carried on with great warmth by both parties, and the reſult was, that the company ſhould, during the ſpace of two years enſuing, pay a certain ſum to the government; and that no dividend of their ſtock ſhould be made without the conſent of a general court of proprietors. June the twenty-fourth his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and, ſuch bills as were ready being ſigned, the parliament was prorogued.

This year, an event took place on the continent of Europe, which was little expected, and ſurpriſed moſt people. It is well known that Italy, once the ſeat of learning, has been for many ages the mother and nurſe of ſuperſtition. For ſome time popery had been loſing ground in thoſe countries where it is by law eſtabliſhed, and increaſing where it was prohibited, owing to the diſgrace into which the Jeſuits had brought themſelves. That ſociety had been eſtabliſhed about two hundred years, and in that time had riſen to ſuch fame, that they became objects of jealouſy, and even reſentment to the other orders. It is true, they were become ſo affluent, that even princes might have looked upon them as dangerous rivals; but that was not the ſole cauſe of their ruin. It had been a conſtant practice with princes, and other great men, to make them their confeſſors; and it is well known, that he who acts the part of a confeſſor to a prince, may, with propriety, be conſidered as his prime miniſter. All ſecrets had been truſted with them, and as ſome of them were at the ſame time, confeſſors to thoſe in oppoſite intereſts, jealouſies took place; and the king of Portugal having been attacked in his carriage, in conſequence of a plan laid by theſe fathers, reſolved to baniſh them out of his dominions. This happened ſeveral years before the period we are now treating of, and Spain followed the example of Portugal, by baniſhing them out of all their dominions, whether in Europe or America. They found an aſylum in Italy, for ſome time; but during the former part of this year they were baniſhed from Naples and Parma, and all their eſtates confiſcated. Under various characters, ſuch as thoſe of tutors, clerks, ſurgeons, &c. many of them have ſettled in proteſtant countries: They however failed in their endeavours to propagate their evil principles.

During this year, the attention of the people in Europe was particularly directed to Corſica, an iſland in the Mediterranean, almoſt adjoining to the iſland of Sardinia. It is extremely fertile and populous, and ſome centuries ago had been given by the pope to the republic of Piſa; but the Genoeſe took it, and for many years treated the inhabitants in the moſt arbitrary and cruel manner. The ſpirit of liberty, however, was not extinct, it wanted only the breath of a hero to kindle it; and ſuch a one was found in the perſon of the famous Paoli, a native of the iſland, who had travelled into other countries, where he had learned the art of war. The prudence and valour of that hero will be tranſmitted to the lateſt ages, but overpowered by numbers, he was obliged to abandon the iſland in diſtreſs.

On the twenty-fourth of November, his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne, in which he told the members that he had aſſembled them at ſo early a period, that they might have time to deliberate with ſteadineſs and judgment; and he recommended the ſtate of the nation with reſpect to the price of proviſions, to their moſt particular attention.

A.D. 1768. On the 10th of March, the buſineſs of this ſeſſion (in the courſe of which one hundred and twelve public and private bills received the royal aſſent) being brought to a concluſion, his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and in a moſt gracious ſpeech returned thanks to the parliament for the many ſignal proofs they had given him of their affectionate attachment to his perſon, family, and government: and concluded in the following manner:

"I doubt not, in the approaching election of repreſentatives, but my people will give me freſh proofs of their attachment to the true intereſt of their country; which I ſhall ever receive as the moſt acceptable mark of their affection to me. The welfare of all my ſubjects is my firſt object. Nothing therefore has ever given me more real concern, than to ſee any of them in any part of my dominions, attempting to looſen thoſe bonds of conſtitutional ſubordination, ſo eſſential to the welfare of the whole, but it is with much ſatisfaction that I now ſee them returning to a more juſt ſenſe of what their own intereſt, no leſs than their duty, indiſpenſably requires of them; and thereby giving me the proſpect of continuing to reign over an happy, becauſe an united people." The parliament was then prorogued to the laſt day of the month; but it was diſſolved by proclamation, on the twelfth of April.

We have already obſerved, that Mr. Wilkes had retired to France. By his long reſidence there, and not appearing to the indictments laid againſt him, he was declared an outlaw. Previous, however to the general election he returned to England, and to the great aſtoniſhment of the public, declared himſelf a candidate to repreſent the city of London in parliament; but loſt his election. He then offered himſelf for the county of Middleſex, and on the twenty-eighth of March was elected by a prodigious majority. On the twentieth of the ſame month he had ſurrendered himſelf to the court of King's-Bench, and on the twenty-ſeventh was committed to the King's-Bench priſon. Some time after, his trial came on in that court, and being ſound guilty, the following ſentence was pronounced on him: "That for the republication of the North Briton, number forty-five, he ſhould pay a fine of five hundred pounds, and be impriſoned ten calendar months: and for publiſhing the Eſſay on Woman, that he ſhould likewiſe pay a fine of five hundred pounds, and be impriſoned twelve calendar months, to be computed from the expiration of the term of the former impriſonment; and that he afterwards find ſecurity for his good behaviour for ſeven years, himſelf to be bound in the ſum of one thouſand pounds, and two ſureties in five hundred pounds each." At this time the general election was carried on with great heat, and violent conteſts enſued in many parts of the nation. Nor did the diſorders, which this occaſion gave riſe to, ſubſide with it. A general murmuring and diſſatisfaction prevailed among the lower claſs of people, partly occaſioned by the high price of proviſions, and partly from other cauſes. The riotous aſſemblies of the weavers, coal-heavers, and ſailors, kept the capital and its environs in continual alarm. From ſome unknown cauſe, juſt at this time, when it was moſt wanted, the civil power ſeemed to loſe its force and energy, and too frequently give occaſion for the dangerous interpoſition of a military force in its ſupport: the unhappy effects of which are ſtill recent in the minds of the greater part of the preſent age. Of all the diſturbances that drew the public attention at this time, the moſt fatal was that which happened in St. George's Fields on the tenth of May, and which evinced the raſh violence exerciſed againſt the people on account of their attachment to Mr. Wilkes, then a priſoner in the King's Bench. The particulars of this remarkable affair were as follow: The parliament being to aſſemble on that day, great numbers of people gathered about the priſon, in expectation that Mr. Wilkes would, on that account, obtain his liberty, and intending to conduct him to the houſe of commons. Finding themſelves diſappointed, they grew tumultuous, and a party of the third regiment of guards was ſent for. The riot was greatly increaſed by a paper that had been ſtuck againſt the wall of the priſon, which was forcibly taken down by one of the juſtices for the Borough. The populace inſiſted on having this paper, which the juſtice not regarding, the tumult became exceeding violent; the drums beat to arms, and the riot act was read, during which great quantities of ſtones and bricks were thrown by the populace. William Allen, a young man, ſon of Mr. Allen, keeper of the Horſe-ſhoe Inn, in Blackman-ſtreet, Southwark, being purſued along with others, was unfortunately ſingled out, followed by three ſoldiers, and ſhot dead. Theſe meaſures not having any tendency to diſperſe the mob, an additional number of the guards was ſent for, as alſo a party of horſe-grenadiers; but the people growing ſtill more numerous, they were fired upon by the ſoldiers, when five were killed on the ſpot, and about fifteen wounded. Among the latter were two women, one of whom afterwards died in St. Thomas's hoſpital. The day following an inquiſition was taken by the coroner for Surry on the above William Allen, when the jury gave their verdict, that Donald Maclaine was guilty of wilful murder, and Donald Maclaury and Alexander Murray (the laſt of whom was commanding officer) were aiding and abetting therein. This inqueſt was held at the houſe of Mr. Allen; and it appeared, on examination, that the deceaſed was only a ſpectator, and, on ſeeing ſome perſons run, he ran alſo, but was unhappily miſtaken, and followed by the ſoldiers into a cow-houſe, where he was ſhot. Maclaury and Murray were admitted to bail, but Maclaine was committed to priſon for the murder. He was afterwards tried at the Surry aſſizes at Guildford, and acquitted. Two other inquiſitions were taken in the Borough, on perſons killed by the ſoldiers in this riot; one on the body of Mary Jeffs, who having a baſket with oranges, was ſhot in removing them; the other, on one William Bridgman, who was ſhot on the top of a hay-cart, as he was looking at the fray at a diſtance; on both theſe inquiſitions the jury brought in their verdict, Chance Medley. On the tenth of May, the members of the new parliament were ſworn in and took their ſeats in the houſe: and the following day the commons, having re-choſen Sir John Cuſt for their ſpeaker, preſented him to the lords commiſſioners for their approbation, who were pleaſed in his majeſty's name to approve their choice. After which the lord chancellor opened the ſeſſion. Upon this a joint addreſs was preſented by the lords and commons to his majeſty, beſeeching him to exert his authority for quelling the diſorders and tumults which prevailed to ſo alarming a degree; at the ſame time aſſuring his majeſty, that nothing ſhould be wanting on their parts which might enable him to maintain the public authority, and carry the laws into due execution; and ſoon after this ſhort ſeſſion was terminated.

The king of Denmark arrived at St. James's on the eleventh of Auguſt, to viſit his royal brother-in-law, our ſovereign. He was attended by moſt of his great officers of ſtate, and the utmoſt reſpect was paid to him by all ranks of people. In the beginning of October he left England; and much about the ſame time the following changes happened in the miniſtry. The earl of Briſtol ſucceeded lord Chatham as lord privy-ſeal. Lord Weymouth was appointed ſecretary of ſtate for the ſouthern department, in the room of lord Shelburne; and in the northern department, the earl of Rochfort ſucceeded lord Weymouth.

We muſt now take in conſideration the moſt material tranſactions on the continent. In the month of Auguſt the French concluded a treaty with the republic of Genoa, of a very extraordinary nature, and ſuch as ſhould have met from all the maritime ſtates in Europe the ſtrongeſt oppoſition.

Violent diſturbances happened in America, on account of ſome duties laid on glaſs, ſalt, and other commodities imported from England. It was thought that the repeal of the ſtamp act would have given ſome ſatisfaction to theſe people, but they ſtill inſiſted that it was their inherent privilege to tax themſelves. The inhabitants of Boſton met in a large body, and entered into ſeveral reſolutions not to import any goods of a ſuperfluous nature, but to attend to the ſtricteſt œconomy, both in dreſs and furniture. A ſubſcription was opened for the encouragement of their own manufactures, and the eſtabliſhment of new ones. This was done to elude the payment of the duties upon ſuch articles as ſhould be ſent from England; and, at the ſame time, an aſſociation of gentlemen from all the old colonies was formed, in order to propoſe the moſt likely means to be uſed in preventing Engliſh acts of parliament from being put in force there, or in any other of the American provinces, or the Weſt Indies. The freeholders, and, in general, all the inhabitants of Maſſachuſet's Bay, had placed the greateſt confidence in their repreſentatives, and there was a continual conteſt between them and their governor. The earl of Shelburne had ſent over a letter to the governor, complaining of theſe abuſes, and it was read in the open aſſembly of the repreſentatives. This occaſioned moſt violent debates; and ſome of the members went ſo far as to declare, that the governor had miſrepreſented their conduct to the miniſtry. They denied the charges in the letter, and wrote to the earl of Shelburne on the ſubject, vindicating themſelves, and throwing the whole blame on the governor. At the ſame time, the merchants of Boſton ordered their agent to repreſent to the lords of the treaſury, that unleſs theſe duties, which had occaſioned ſo much miſchief, were taken off, the trade of the province would be deſtroyed, as they ſeemed to them contrary to the ſpirit of the conſtitution, and inconſiſtent with their charter. Their repreſentations occaſioned the eſtabliſhment of a new officer, who was to act as ſecretary of ſtate for the colonies in America; and the firſt perſon made choice of was the earl of Hillſborough, at that time firſt lord of trade. The firſt thing done by his lordſhip, was to ſend circular letters to the governors of the provinces, informing them, that his majeſty was highly diſpleaſed at the conduct of the people, as it was apt to create confuſion, and throw every thing into the utmoſt diſorder. He ſaid, that their conduct in oppoſing the legiſlative power of Great Britain was little better than an act of open rebellion; for, by giving encouragement to ſuch practices, the government would be overturned, and no regard paid to the laws. He concluded by recommending to them to preſerve the public peace, by puniſhing all diſorders of an evil tendency; but as to mere oppoſition in words, or in ſcandalous libels, they were to treat them with the utmoſt ſcorn.

The aſſembly of repreſentatives being diſſolved by governor Barnard, and new ones choſen, it was inſiſted on by him, that they ſhould make a public act to diſapprove of the conduct of the late aſſembly. They deſired to ſee a copy of the governor's inſtructions, which was granted them, and, to their ſurprize, they found, that in caſe they refuſed to comply, they were to be diſſolved, and an account of their conduct ſent to England, in order to be laid before the next ſeſſions of parliament. This ſet the whole nation in a flame; and when the bill was brought in to paſs a cenſure on the conduct of the laſt aſſembly, ninety-two voted againſt it, and no more than ſeventeen for it. The reſt of the colonies took the alarm, and followed their example; while combinations were formed almoſt every where not to take any goods from England, except ſuch as were abſolutely neceſſary. The diſcontents among the people of Boſton now broke out into open violence: for a ſhip having landed a cargo of wine, and taken on board another of oil, without paying any regard to the new laws by which the new cuſtoms were to be regulated, the officers made a ſignal to the Romney man of war, who ſent her boats; and having cut down the maſts of the trading veſſel, hawled her along-ſide of the king's ſhip. This was ſo ſeverely reſented by the populace, that they roſe in great numbers, demoliſhed the houſes of the cuſtom-houſe officers, and laying hold of the commiſſioner's boat, dragged it on ſhore, and then ſet it on fire. During theſe tumults in the town, the governor diſſolved the aſſembly; but that had not the deſired effect, for the diſturbances increaſed every day, ſo that two regiments were ſent over from Ireland to ſupport the civil power. Their place of rendezvous was to be at Haliſax, in Nova Scotia; and no ſooner had the people of Boſton received news that they were landed at that place, than they met and choſe a preſident among themſelves, who was deputed to wait on the governor, to know for what reaſon, or with what view, his majeſty's forces were to be ſent among them. They deſired, at the ſame time, that a general aſſembly might be ſummoned to meet; but he refuſed to give them any ſatisfactory anſwer, and only told them, that it was their duty to break up their tumultuous meetings, and ſubmit quietly to the laws. He added, that as they ſeemed ignorant of the offence they had committed, he muſt freely tell them, that unleſs they ſubmitted to the government, he ſhould be obliged to treat them as rebels. From this time he refuſed to receive any meſſages from them; upon which they ſent a long detail of their grievances to London, in order to be laid before the miniſtry. In the mean time, the tranſports, with the two regiments, and a train of artillery, arrived from Halliſax, and were quartered in the houſes of the townſmen; but as the military laws did not extend to America, any farther than providing barracks for them, it was ordered by the governor that they ſhould have barrack proviſions, ſo as to be as little burthenſome to the people as poſſible. This part of the governor's conduct gave general ſatisfaction to ſuch of the people as were moderate in their ſentiments; but notwithſtanding, a great majority were ſtill diſcontented. They could not behold, without jealouſy, an armed force quartered among them in time of peace; for, with reſpect to their late combinations, they conſidered them as efforts to maintain their liberty.

About the beginning of this year, affairs began to aſſume a new form in the Eaſt Indies; and it was even feared that a revolution would take place much to the diſadvantage of the Engliſh Eaſt India company, whoſe ſtock was now advanced to a ſurprizing height. Hyder Ally, a perſon who had ſerved ſome time as a common ſoldier, having received an affront from his officers, left the army, and, with a view of driving the Engliſh out of all their ſettlements in that part of the world, collected together a choſen band of followers.

Near the cloſe of this year, the war was carried on with great violence in Corſica: for although the French had landed there with a numerous army, the brave iſlanders diſputed the ground with them inch by inch. Paoli, who ſtill hoped for aſſiſtance from England, as well as from ſome of the European powers, called an aſſembly of the Corſican chiefs, and aſked their opinion concerning the moſt proper methods to be uſed in the proſecution of the war. He laid before them all the papers which the French had cauſed to be diſtributed throughout the iſland; but no ſooner did the chiefs perceive that they were looked upon as vaſſals to the crown of France, than they tore them into a thouſand pieces. Adjoining to Corſica are ſome ſmall iſlands; and as the harbours of them are ſafe and commodious, ſo the Corſican privateers prevented, in a great meaſure, the enemy from receiving ſuch ſupplies as had been ſent them from France. This induced the French, in the month of November, to embark a conſiderable body of forces on board thirteen tranſports, in order to attack theſe ſmall iſlands. Their firſt attack was made on the iſland of Pietra; but although they made good their landing, they were repulſed with great loſs by a few Corſicans, who animated by the love of liberty, fought like lions.

From thence the French proceeded to Iſola Boſſa another iſland, where the Corſicans were driven from their poſts; but no ſooner had they recollected themſelves, and recovered from their firſt ſurpriſe, than they faced about, and not only recovered the poſts they had loſt, but drove the enemy, with great ſlaughter, back to their ſhips. Above nine hundred of the French were killed in this fruitleſs expedition, and their general notwithſtanding all their former hopes of ſucceſs, began to deſpair of ever taking the iſland.

During the interim ſeveral changes took place in the Engliſh miniſtry, by the death of Mr. Townſhend, chancellor of the exchequer, a gentleman of great natural parts, univerſal erudition, and a perfect knowledge of the conſtitution. In conſequence of this lord North was made chancellor of the exchequer, Mr. Thomas Townſhend, paymaſter of the forces, earl Gower, preſident of the council, lord Weymouth, one of the ſecretaries of ſtate, and Mr. Rigby was appointed one of the vice-treaſurers of Ireland.

The parliament met on the twenty-fourth of November, when his majeſty went to the houſe, and opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne, in which he obſerved, that it would have given him great ſatisfaction could he have aſſured them that all the other powers of Europe had been as careful as himſelf to avoid taking any ſtep that might endanger the general tranquillity: that he had received repeated aſſurances of their pacific diſpoſitions towards this country; which ſhould not, however, divert his conſtant reſolution, ſtedfaſtly to attend to the general intereſts of Europe. He then took notice of the conduct of the Americans, and obſerved, that the capital of one of the colonies was in an actual ſtate of diſobedience, having proceeded to meaſures ſubverſive of the conſtitution, and attended with circumſtances that manifeſted a diſpoſition to throw off their dependence on Great Britain; but that he did not doubt, with their aſſiſtance and concurrence, of being able to defeat the miſchievous deſigns of thoſe turbulent and ſeditious perſons, who under falſe pretences, had too ſucceſsfully deluded numbers of his ſubjects in America; and whoſe practices, if ſuffered to prevail, could not fail to produce the moſt fatal conſequences to his colonies immediately, and in the end to all the dominions of his crown. And laſtly, he recommended a ſpirit of harmony among themſelves, as a conduct that would be attended with the moſt ſalutary conſequences both abroad and at home. The only material thing the parliament did previous to their breaking up for the holidays was, to bring in a bill to prevent the exportation of corn for a limited time, which, after long debates in both houſes, was, to the great ſatisfaction of the poor in general, paſſed into an act,

A. D. 1769. There was a petition preſented, ſigned by Mr. Danforth, preſident of the council at Boſton, praying that the revenue acts might be repealed. The petition was penned in the moſt modeſt manner, with a promiſe, that if theſe acts were repealed, the people would make an ample compenſation by taxing themſelves. Great debates aroſe in both houſes concerning the petition, thoſe of the anti-miniſterial party making uſe of the ſame arguments which had been urged in the debate concerning the ſtamp-act. The lords agreed to addreſs his majeſty on the American affairs; and their reſolution being adhered to by the commons, became the joint act of both. By theſe reſolutions it was declared, that all the acts made in the different colonies, which tended towards throwing off the ſovereignty of the Britiſh parliament, were illegal, unconſtitutional, and derogatory to the crown and dignity of his majeſty. It was farther reſolved, that the town of Boſton was in a ſtate of the utmoſt diſorder and confuſion, diſturbed by riots and tumults of a dangerous nature, in which the officers of the revenue had been obſtructed in the diſcharge of their duty, and their lives endangered: that neither the council of the province, nor the ordinary magiſtrates, had exerted their authority for ſuppreſſing theſe riots and tumults; and that the execution of the laws would be rendered abortive, without the aſſiſtance of a military force to ſupport the civil power, and protect the officers of the cuſtoms: that the reſolutions of the town meetings in Boſton were unconſtitutional, and calculated to excite ſedition and inſurrection againſt the government. It was alſo agreed to by both houſes, that all thoſe who had written circular letters to the other colonies, were guilty of a high indignity to the crown, and that they had committed a daring inſult on the legiſlative power of Great Britain. In the end, his majeſty was deſired to iſſue a ſpecial commiſſion, to enquire into the cauſes of theſe diſorders, according to the ſtatute of 30th of Henry VIII. The debates on this occaſion, with reſpect to his majeſty granting writs of Habeas Corpus, to bring over the perſons concerned in the riots, to be tried in England by virtue of ſpecial commiſſions, was in both houſes ſtrongly and learnedly oppoſed.

The ſeveral arguments uſed by thoſe who oppoſed adminiſtration, were very rational and conſiſtent with the ſpirit of our moſt excellent conſtitution; and the miniſtry were ſo ſenſible of the error they had committed, that they became weak and languid in their anſwers. They referred back to the repeal of the ſtamp act, and imputed all the troubles which had happened in America to the ill-judged lenity ſhewn on that occaſion: that nothing but the vigorous uſe of coercive authority could ever reduce them to obedience, and convince them of the neceſſity of their dependence on the mother country: that unleſs this meaſure was adopted, the moſt flagrant acts of treaſon and rebellion, with all other public crimes, might be committed with impunity: that ſuch crimes had been already committed, and being attended with ſeveral circumſtances of an aggravated nature, the perpetrators were not objects of compaſſion: that, with reſpect to there being no colonies in America when the act of Henry VIII. was made, it did not in the leaſt apply to the argument in hand, for the act was made for the trial of all his majeſty's ſubjects who ſhould happen to commit crimes in any part of the world. For example; ſuppoſing a ſhip being at anchor near an iſland not belonging to Britain, and two perſons going on ſhore, fight, and one of them is killed; then by the above act, a ſpecial commiſſion is granted by the king for the trial of the offender, in whatever country he pleaſes. They concluded by taking notice, that the revival of the act was not to promote puniſhment, but to preſerve peace; and that the coloniſts, ſeeing the vigorous meaſures which the government intended to purſue, might be brought back to a ſenſe of their duty. Such were the hopes of adminiſtration at that time; but experience has convinced us, that they were wrong in their conjectures, and in all their meaſures, as the ſequel will teſtify.

Mr. Wilkes, during theſe debates in parliament, publiſhed a letter, written by lord Barrington, ſecretary at war, to the juſtices of the county of Surry, to which he prefixed an introduction that gave great offence to the houſe of lords, who voted it, "an inſolent, ſcandalous and ſeditious libel, tending to inflame and ſtir up the minds of his majeſty's ſubjects to ſedition, and to a total ſubverſion of all good order and legal government." The lords then complained to the commons, who confirmed the vote of the peers, expelled Mr. Wilkes their houſe, and ordered a new writ to be iſſued for the county of Middleſex: Mr. Wilkes was, however, unanimouſly re-choſen, and again expelled by the commons, who at the ſame time declared him incapable of being a member of that houſe. On the thirteenth of April a new election for the county of Middleſex came on at Brentford. The candidates were, Mr. Wilkes, Mr. Luttrell, Mr. Serjeant Whitaker, and Mr. Roach, when Mr. Wilkes had a majority of eight hundred and forty-ſeven votes; notwithſtanding which he was rejected by the houſe of commons, and Mr. Luttrell declared duly elected. No public meaſure, ſince the acceſſion of the preſent royal family, had excited ſo general an alarm, or cauſed ſo univerſal a diſcontent as the preſent, nor was ever oppoſed with more firmneſs, or debated with greater ability. At the ſame time a great number of maſterly writings were publiſhed, ſo that the affair was both within doors and without thoroughly diſcuſſed.

His Majeſty on the ninth of May went to the houſe of peers, and put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne; and, on the twenty-fourth of May, the freeholders of Middleſex, who thought themſelves particularly injured by the deciſion of the houſe of commons in favour of Mr. Luttrell, preſented a petition to his majeſty as follows:

“ Moſt gracious ſovereign,

“ We, your majeſty's dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the freeholders of the county of Middleſex, beg leave, with all affectionate ſubmiſſion and humility, to throw ourſelves at your royal feet, and humbly to implore your paternal attention to thoſe grievances of which this county and the whole nation complain, and thoſe fearful apprehenſions with which the whole Britiſh empire is moſt juſtly alarmed.

“ With great grief and ſorrow, we have long beheld the endeavours of certain evil-minded perſons, who attempt to infuſe into your royal mind, notions and opinions of the moſt dangerous and pernicious tendency, and who promote and counſel ſuch meaſures, as cannot fail to deſtroy that harmony and confidence, which ſhould ever ſubſiſt between a juſt and virtuous prince, and a free and loyal people.

“ For this diſaffected purpoſe, they have introduced into every part of the adminiſtration of our happy, legal conſtitution, a certain unlimited and indefinite diſcretionary power; to prevent which is the ſole aim of all our laws, and was the ſole cauſe of all thoſe diſturbances and revolutions which formerly diſtracted this unhappy country; for our anceſtors, by their own fatal experience well knew, that in a ſtate where diſcretion begins, law, liberty, and ſafety end. Under the pretence of this diſcretion, or, as it was formerly, and has been lately called, law of ſtate, we have ſeen

“ Engliſh ſubjects, and even a member of the Britiſh legiſlature, arreſted by virtue of a general warrant, iſſued by a ſecretary of ſtate, contrary to the law of the land—

“ Their houſes rifled and plundered, their papers ſeized, and uſed as evidence upon trial—

“ Their bodies committed to cloſe impriſonment—

“ The Habeas Corpus eluded—

“ Trial by jury diſcountenanced, and the firſt law-officer of the crown publicly inſinuating, that juries are not to be truſted—

“ Printers puniſhed by the miniſtry in the ſupreme court without a trial by their equals, without any trial at all—

“ The remedy of the law for falſe impriſonment, barred and defeated—

“ The plaintiff and his attorney, for their appeal to the law of the land, puniſhed by expences and impriſonment, and made, by forced engagements, to deſiſt from their legal claim—

“ A writing determined to be a libel by a court where it was not cognizable in the firſt inſtance; contrary to law, becauſe all appeal is thereby cut off, and inferior courts and juries influenced by ſuch pre-determinations—

“ A perſon condemned in the ſaid court, as the author of the ſuppoſed libel, unheard, without defence or trial—

“ Unjuſt treatment of petitions, by ſelecting only ſuch parts as might be wreſted to criminate the petitioner, and refuſing to hear thoſe which might procure him redreſs—

“ The thanks of one branch of the legiſlature propoſed by a miniſter to be given to an acknowledged offender for his offence, with the declared intention of ſcreening him from law—

“ Attachments wreſted from their original intent of removing obſtructions to the proceedings of law, to puniſh, by ſentence of arbitrary fine and impriſonment, without trial or appeal, ſuppoſed offences committed out of court—

“ Perpetual impriſonment of an Engliſhman, without trial, conviction, or ſentence, by the ſame mode of attachment, wherein the ſame perſon is at once party, accuſer, judge, and jury—

“ Inſtead of the ancient and legal civil police, the military introduced at every opportunity, unneceſſarily and unlawfully patroling the ſtreets, to the alarm and terror of the inhabitants—

“ The lives of many of your majeſty's innocent ſubjects deſtroyed by military execution—

“ Such military execution ſolemnly adjudged to be legal—

“ Murder abetted, encouraged, and rewarded—

“ The civil magiſtracy rendered contemptible by the appointment of improper and incapable perſons—

“ The civil magiſtrates tampered with by adminiſtration, and neglecting and refuſing to diſcharge their duty—

“ Mobs and riots hired and raiſed by the miniſtry; in order to juſtify and recommend their own illegal proceedings, and to prejudice your majeſty's mind by falſe inſinuations againſt the loyalty of your majeſty's ſubjects—

“ The freedom of election violated by corrupt and undue influence, by unpuniſhed violence and murder—

“ The juſt verdicts of juries, and the opinion of the judges, over-ruled by falſe repreſentations to your majeſty; and the determinations of the law ſet aſide, by new unprecedented, and dangerous means; thereby leaving the guilty without reſtraint, the injured without redreſs, and the lives of your majeſty's ſubjects at the mercy of every ruffian protected by adminiſtration—

“ Obſolete and vexatious claims of the crown ſet on foot for partial and election purpoſes—

“ Partial attacks on the liberty of the preſs: the moſt daring and pernicious libels againſt the conſtitution, and againſt the liberty of the ſubject, being allowed to paſs unnoticed, whilſt the ſlighteſt libel againſt a miniſter is puniſhed with the utmoſt rigour—

“ Wicked attempts to increaſe and eſtabliſh a ſtanding army, by endeavouring to veſt in the crown an unlimited power over the militia; which, ſhould they ſucceed, muſt, ſooner or later, ſubvert the conſtitution, by augmenting the power of adminiſtration in proportion to their delinquency—

“ Repeated endeavours to diminiſh the importance of members of parliament individually, in order to render them more dependent on adminiſtration collectively. Even threats have been employed by miniſters to ſuppreſs the freedom of debate; and the wrath of parliament denounced againſt meaſures authorized by the law of the land—

“ Reſolutions of one branch of the legiſlature, ſet up as the law of the land, being a direct uſurpation of the rights of the two other branches, and therefore a manifeſt infringement of the conſtitution—

"Public money ſhamefully ſquandered and unaccounted for, and all enquiry into the cauſe of arrears in the civil liſt, prevented by the miniſtry—

"Enquiry into a pay-maſter's public accounts ſtopped in the exchequer, though the ſums unaccounted for by that pay-maſter amounted to above forty millions ſterling—

"Public loans perverted to private miniſterial purpoſes—

"Proſtitution of public honours and rewards to men, who can neither plead public virtue nor ſervices—

"Irreligion and immorality, ſo eminently diſcountenanced by your majeſty's royal example, encouraged by adminiſtration both by example and precept—

"The ſame diſcretion has been extended, by the ſame evil counſellors, to your majeſty's dominions in America, and has produced to our ſuffering fellow-ſubjects in that part of the world, grievances and apprehenſions ſimilar to thoſe of which we complain at home.

"Moſt gracious ſovereign,

"Such are the grievances and apprehenſions which have long diſcontented and diſturbed the greateſt and beſt part of your majeſty's loyal ſubjects. Unwilling, however, to interrupt your royal repoſe, though ready to lay down our lives and fortunes for your majeſty's ſervice, and for the conſtitution, as by law eſtabliſhed, we have waited patiently, expecting a conſtitutional remedy by the means of our own repreſentatives: but our legal and free choice having been repeatedly rejected, and the right of election now finally taken from us, by the unprecedented ſeating of a candidate who was never choſen by the county, and who, even to become a candidate, was obliged fraudulently to vacate his ſeat in parliament, under the pretence of an inſignificant place, invited thereto by the prior declaration of a miniſter, that whoever oppoſed our choice, though with but four votes, ſhould be declared member for the county. We ſee ourſelves, by this laſt act, deprived even of the franchiſes of Engliſhmen, reduced to the moſt abject ſtate of ſlavery, and left without hopes or means of redreſs but from your majeſty or God.

"Deign then, moſt gracious ſovereign, to liſten to the prayer of the moſt faithful of your majeſty's ſubjects; and to baniſh from your royal favour, truſt, and confidence, for ever, thoſe evil and pernicious counſellors, who have endeavoured to alienate the affection of your majeſty's moſt ſincere and dutiful ſubjects, and whoſe ſuggeſtions tend to deprive your people of their deareſt and moſt eſſential rights, and who have traitorouſly dared to depart from the ſpirit and letter of thoſe laws which have ſecured the crown of theſe realms to the houſe of Brunſwic, in which we make our moſt earneſt prayers to God, that it may continue untarniſhed to the lateſt poſterity."

The example of Middleſex was followed by the city of London, and moſt of the counties in England, who in like manner preſented petitions and remonſtrances to the throne; but the only anſwer received was, that his majeſty would abide by, and not do any thing without the parliament's conſent.

On the 9th of January the parliament met; and, in his majeſty's ſpeech, not the leaſt notice was taken of the petitions and remonſtrances from the different counties relative to the Middleſex election. The chief things principally pointed out were, the diſtracted ſtate of America, and the diſtemper which had broke out among the horned cattle. The former was, in the ſtrongeſt terms, recommended to their ſerious attention, as a thing of the utmoſt importance to the dignity of government. The other was mentioned as a moſt dreadful calamity to the nation in general; and it was recommended to every one to exert themſelves in endeavouring to put a ſtop to the infection, before it ſhould become univerſally dangerous.

His majeſty's ſpeech was ſeverely handled by the public in general, who thought that nothing ſhould have been ſo much touched on as the petitions and remonſtrances. Ridicule was circulated with great freedom; eſpecially as the exiſtence of the diſtemper among the horned cattle was not believed to be of ſo dreadful a nature as had been inſinuated and repreſented. Some very remarkable changes now took place in the miniſtry. The ſeals were taken from lord Camden, and the honourable Charles York was created chancellor in his room, but he died within three days afterwards; and then the chancery was put into commiſſion, the ſeals being delivered to baron Smythe, and the juſtices Bathurſt and Aſton. The marquis of Granby reſigned all his places, except the royal regiment of blues, and was ſucceeded as maſter of the ordnance by general Conway. The duke of Beaufort reſigned the place of maſter of the horſe to the queen; the earl of Huntingdon his place of groom of the ſtole; and the duke of Mancheſter, with the earl of Coventry, their places of lords of the bedchamber. Sir John Cuſt, ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, reſigned at the ſame time, owing to his infirm ſtate of health; and Sir Fletcher Norton, a gentleman who had made a very diſtinguiſhed figure at the bar, was choſen in his ſtead. The duke of Grafton alſo reſigned the place of firſt lord of the treaſury, and lord North, chancellor of the exchequer, became his ſucceſſor.

The validity of the Middleſex election became the firſt ſubject of parliamentary enquiry; but after warm debates it was held, by a conſiderable majority, that no court of law was to meddle with any of their rules and orders. This meaſure aſtoniſhed the whole nation; and many perſons began to look upon the houſe of commons as a ſtanding council for the crown. Nor was this important ſubject agitated with leſs heat in the houſe of lords. The earl of Chatham, with lord Camden, and many other peers, oppoſed it with great ſtrength of argument, and produced proofs from many of our law books, and parliamentary journals, that no ſuch ſtep had ever been taken, not even in the moſt deſpotic reigns. But notwithſtanding the force of theſe arguments, miniſterial intereſt prevailed; and the proceedings of the houſe of commons, in the affair of the Middleſex election, were all deemed equitable and juſt.

After this a motion was made to bring in a bill to diſqualify certain officers of the revenues from voting for members of parliament: this motion was rejected by a very great majority. The popular party next deſired, that all the papers, containing a liſt of the expences of government, ſhould be laid before them. It was ſaid, in ſupport of the motion, that the civil-liſt revenue, if miſapplied, inſtead of maintaining the dignity of the crown, ſerved only to beſiege it with paraſites; and in the place of promoting arts and induſtry, to ſubvert the liberties of the nation.

In anſwer to this and other arguments it was urged by thoſe who ſtood up for the miniſtry, that if an application had been now made for an additional ſum to make good any deficiency in the civil-liſt eſtabliſhment, an enquiry into the cauſes of it would be natural and juſtifiable; and it would be but reaſonable that the miniſtry, in ſuch a circumſtance, ſhould give the utmoſt ſatisfaction to the people; nay, that it was even their duty to do ſo, and ſhew the reaſons why the proviſion already made was not ſufficient; but till ſuch a requiſition was made, it would be improper and very diſreſpectful to the crown, to ſcrutinize into the manner in which the money for the ſupport of the royal family had been expended. It was urged farther, that a certain ſum of money was allowed annually for the ſupport of the civil-liſt; and while the expences do not exceed that ſum, there can be no reaſon for making any enquiry. They concluded by taking notice, that as the civil-liſt was the property of the crown, his majeſty had a right to diſpoſe of it in whatever manner he pleaſed. At laſt, the motion being put, it was rejected by a great majority. This being thus diſpoſed of, the next thing was to take into conſideration the ſtate of the colonies in America. A petition had been preſented by the merchants trading to North America, ſetting forth the great hardſhips they laboured under in conſequence of an act, by which a duty had been laid on ſome trifling articles exported from Great Britain; and this had ſo much enraged the people, that they refuſed to purchaſe the goods, after they had been ſent there at a conſiderable expence. This affair being of a very ſerious nature, the houſe took it into conſideration, and repealed every part of it, except what related to ſea, which was ſtill continued. The debates concerning this bill were managed with great force of argument on both ſides, for the popular party ſought a repeal of the whole; while the miniſtry inſiſted that the Americans, inſtead of deſerving any ſuch indulgence, ought to have had more ſevere laws binding upon them. After this, another bill was brought into the houſe of commons by Mr. George Grenville, one of the leading men in the oppoſition, for regulating the proceedings on controverted elections; a bill equally juſt and popular, and in which all the ſubjects of Great Britain were more or leſs concerned. While the houſe of commons were engaged on this ſubject, the city of London met in their common hall, and agreed upon another petition, addreſs, and remonſtrance, for redreſs of grievances in the affair of the Middleſex election. In this addreſs it was expreſsly declared, that the houſe of commons had acted in the moſt unconſtitutional manner, and therefore they prayed that they might be diſſolved, that they might be left at liberty to make a free choice. In anſwer to this his majeſty told them, that he had never done any thing but by the advice and conſent of his parliament, and therefore he could not comply with their deſires.

Great conteſts aroſe in parliament on this affair, and many opprobrious expreſſions were made uſe of on both ſides. It was ſaid, that the citizens of London were the ſupport of the government on every occaſion; that it had been the cuſtom, time immemorial, to conſult them on the moſt important matters; to which the miniſtry anſwered, that no affront had been offered to the citizens of London, nor any thing denied them, except ſuch as was, in its own nature, improper to be granted. Towards the cloſe of this ſeſſion of parliament, ſeveral propoſals were made in the houſe of lords relative to the ſtate of affairs in America, which were chiefly ſupported by the duke of Richmond. Miniſtry were now perplexed to the utmoſt; they ſaw no other method left, but that of adjourning the debate till a future day, well knowing that the parliament would be prorogued. On the nineteenth of May his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne, in which he applauded both houſes for the zeal they had ſhewn in ſupporting the intereſt and honour of the nation. He aſſured them that he ſhould, on all occaſions, ſeek the happineſs of his people; and that it ſhould be the ſole object of his care, to watch over their intereſts. He concluded, by recommending to them the preſervation of public peace, and the diſcountenancing of tumultuous meetings of the people, which, if encouraged, would have a diſagreeable termination.

When the parliament broke up advices were received from America of a violent tumult that had happened at Boſton, occaſioned by a quarrel between the ſoldiers, and the journeymen and apprentices belonging to the rope-makers, in which the former unfortunately fired among the latter, whereby ſome were killed, and others wounded. Different accounts of this tranſaction were ſent to England; but one from captain Preſton, who happened that day to be captain of the guard, ſeems to be the moſt authentic. He obſerved, that it was matter of too great notoriety to need proofs, that the arrival of his majeſty's troops in Boſton was extremely obnoxious to its inhabitants. That the people ever uſed all means in their power to weaken the regiments, and to bring them into contempt, by promoting deſertions, and by groſly and falſly propagating untruths concerning them. That on the arrival of the ſixty-fourth and ſixty-fifth regiments, their ardour ſeemingly began to abate; but that the ſame ſpirit revived immediately on its being known that thoſe regiments were ordered for Halifax. That after their embarkation, one of their juſtices, from the ſeat of juſtice, declared, "That the ſoldiers muſt now take care of themſelves, nor truſt too much to their arms, for they were but an handful." That this alarming declaration was ſucceeded by ſeveral diſputes, between the townſpeople and ſoldiers of both regiments; and that on the ſecond of March two ſoldiers of the twenty-ninth going through a rope-walk, belonging to Mr. Gray, the rope-makers inſultingly aſked them, if they would empty a vault. That this had, unfortunately, the deſired effect; by provoking the ſoldiers, blows enſued, and both parties ſuffered greatly in the fray. That the hatred of the inhabitants towards the troops had now arrived to ſuch an height, that the fifth and ſixth of March were privately agreed on for a general engagement; in conſequence of which, ſeveral of the militia came from the country armed, to join their friends, threatening to deſtroy any who ſhould oppoſe them. That on the fifth, about eight o'clock at night, two ſoldiers were attacked and beat. That about nine, ſome of the guard informed him (captain Preſton) that the inhabitants were aſſembling to attack the troops; that the bells were ringing as a ſignal, and not for fire: and that they intended to fire the beacon, in order to bring in the diſtant people of the country. That upon this intelligence, being captain of the day, he immediately repaired to the main guard, and in his way ſaw the people in great commotion. That ſoon after, about an hundred paſſed him, and went towards the cuſtom houſe, where the king's money was lodged, ſurrounded the centinel poſted there, and with clubs and other weapons threatened to execute their vengeance on him. That he (captain Preſton) fearing their plundering the king's cheſt, ſent a non-commiſſioned officer and twelve men to protect both the centinel and the king's money, and followed himſelf to prevent diſorder. That the ſoldiers ruſhed through the people, and by charging their bayonets in a half circle, kept them at a diſtance. That the mob then increaſed greatly, and were very outrageous, ſtriking bludgeons againſt each other, and calling out, "Come you raſcals, you bloody backs, you lobſter ſcoundrels; fire if you dare; fire and be damned; we know you dare not:" with much more ſuch opprobrious language.—That they then advanced to the points of the bayonets, ſtruck ſome of them, and even the muzzles of the pieces, and ſeemed to be endeavouring to cloſe with the ſoldiers. That ſome well behaved perſons then aſked him (captain Preſton) if he intended to fire? That he anſwered, no; but while he was ſpeaking, a ſoldier, having received a ſevere blow with a ſtick, inſtantly fired. That he immediately reprimanded him; and while he was thus engaged, received a moſt violent blow on his own arm. That a general attack was then made on the men by heavy clubs and ſnow balls; and ſome perſons from behind cried out, "Damn your bloods, why don't you fire?" That inſtantly three or four of the ſoldiers fired, one after another, and directly after, three more in the ſame confuſion and hurry. That the mob then ran away, except three unhappy men, who inſtantly expired, in which number was Mr. Gray, at whoſe rope-walk the prior quarrel took place. That one more was ſince dead; three were dangerouſly, and four ſlightly wounded. That on his (captain Preſton's) aſking the ſoldiers why they fired without orders? they ſaid, they heard the word "Fire," and ſuppoſed that he had given the order.

The captain concludes his account in the following words: "On the examination before the juſtices, they have ſworn that I uſed the word Fire; and ſo bitter and inveterate are the malcontents againſt the officers and troops, that I am, though perfectly innocent, under moſt unhappy circumſtances, having nothing in reaſon to expect but the loſs of life in a very ignominious manner, without the interpoſition of his majeſty's goodneſs." This gentleman was, ſome time after, tried at Boſton, and honourably acquitted.

On the 27th of July an affair of a very ſingular and ſuſpicious nature, engaged the attention of the public. About four o'clock in the morning a moſt dreadful fire was diſcovered to have broke out in the great dock-yard at Portſmouth. It burnt with the moſt rapid fury; and communicating itſelf with the hemp-houſe and other offices, conſumed every thing before it. Whether this was an accident, or the work of ſome vile wretch or incendiary, has not yet been diſcovered, and perhaps never will. Some impoſtors, indeed, pretended to have been concerned in it, particularly one Dudley, who ſince that time has been tranſported for perjury; and the other, whoſe name was Britain, has been ſince executed for forgery. The moſt remarkable circumſtance attending this fatal affair was, the fire was diſcovered in five different places at once, which gave ſtrong ſuſpicions that more than one perſon muſt have been concerned; for accidental fires generally break out in one place only.

In the courſe of this year the wretched inhabitants of Corſica felt all the ſeverity of a French deſpotic government. Many of them ſtill refuſed to ſubmit; and ſuch of them as were taken were inſtantly put to death. Some of them were tranſported to France, but this was little more than ſhifting the ſcene; for as in Corſica they beheld the ruin of their country, ſo in France they ſaw a whole nation of people ruined. But here their ſufferings did not end; for ſuch as were brought to France, after a journey of ſix hundred miles on foot from Marſeilles to Breſt, were put on board ſeveral veſſels, and ſent to the Weſt Indies as ſlaves.

A war was on the point of breaking out this year between Great Britain and Spain. The governor of Buenos Ayres had obliged the ſmall force ſtationed at Falkland's iſlands, to leave them, and return to England. All the conditions the Spaniſh commodore would grant, were, that the Engliſh ſhould immediately, or as ſoon as poſſible, not exceeding forty days, remove from the ſettlement; and what ſtores they left behind them, ſhould be produced as ſoon as orders for that purpoſe arrived from Spain. This was one of the greateſt inſults, perhaps, that had ever been offered to the Britiſh flag; but the Engliſh, who had not ſtrength ſufficient to defend themſelves, were obliged to comply, and in September arrived at Portſmouth. Such a flagrant act of hoſtility, which it was imagined would have cauſed an immediate rupture with Spain, ſwelled the tide of domeſtic inquietudes, which now ran high againſt the miniſtry, with whoſe conduct the people in general were diſſatisfied. Preſs-warrants had been iſſued for raiſing ſeamen; but the legality of them was in ſeveral places called in queſtion. In the city of London, Mr. Croſby, the lord-mayor, refuſed to back the preſs-warrants; Mr. Alderman Wilkes diſcharged a man who had been impreſſed; and although the opinion of council was taken on this important ſubject, yet, among the more ſenſible and judicious, the practice itſelf was looked upon as inconſiſtent with the nature of the Britiſh conſtitution. Such as were averſe to a war, or dreaded the conſequences of it, looked back with reſentment to the laſt peace, and to thoſe who had adviſed the making of it. All the arguments made uſe of in defence of it were treated with the utmoſt contempt; and the whole was conſidered as a meaſure which, in its conſequences, muſt for ever diſhonour the Britiſh nation. Indeed, many ſober perſons, whoſe minds were free from paſſion or prejudice, and who, judging of the diſputes between the rival nations only by the ſame equitable and diſintereſted principles which ſhould at all times take place between private perſons, had not, at that time, in general, diſapproved of the conditions of peace, could not now refrain from the utmoſt indignation, at beholding the flagrant inſult we had received from an enemy we had ſo lately in our power to chaſtiſe; and from thinking that thoſe who ſaid, that the fruits of one of the moſt glorious and ſucceſsful wars mentioned in hiſtory, had been bartered away for an inglorious and inſecure peace, had but too much reaſon on their ſide; and therefore there was no wonder that the people ſhould find fault with the meaſures of adminiſtration. In this ſtate of anxiety, doubt, and expectation, all people longed, in the moſt eager manner, for the meeting of parliament. No change had taken place in adminiſtration during the receſs; and as lord North had ſucceſsfully weathered all the ſtorms of the winter, ſupported by a prodigious majority in both houſes, he ſeemed now to be as ſecurely fixed in his ſeat at the head of the treaſury, as the precarious circumſtances of the times would admit of. The ſtate of the different parties in oppoſition had not hitherto ſuffered any material change. The death of Mr. Grenville, which happened in the beginning of November, having left that party to which he belonged without a leader, ſome of the moſt ſanguine in oppoſition, went over to the court. The party that adhered to the marquis of Rockingham, and who were called the Whig party, ſtill maintained their former principles; and ſuch as were attached to the earl of Chatham, earl Temple, and the earl of Shelburne, generally coincided with the Rockingham party, though conſiſting of both Whigs and Tories.

The parliament met on the 13th of November, and the ſeſſion was opened by his majeſty with a ſpeech from the throne, in which he told them, that the Spaniſh governor of Buenos Ayres had acted in ſuch a manner, as was inconſiſtent with the honour of Great Britain, and demanded the utmoſt ſatisfaction; that, under theſe circumſtances, an immediate demand had been made for proper ſatisfaction, in conſequence of the injury received; that the neceſſary preparations had been made, without loſs of time, in order to be enabled to obtain juſtice, in caſe the requiſition to the court of Spain ſhould fail in procuring it. An aſſurance was given that theſe preparations ſhould not be diſcontinued, until proper reparation had been made; and that ſufficient proofs ſhould be given, that all other powers on the continent diſapproved of ſuch proceedings. He ſaid, he had called them together ſo early, that they might be ready to aſſiſt him with the beſt of their advice, and provide for the honour and ſecurity of the nation. With reſpect to the colonies in America, it was obſerved, that many of the factious people had deſiſted from thoſe combinations into which they had inadvertently entered, and which had been attended with many fatal conſequences to their peaceable fellow ſubjects; that the people of Boſton, and in general the inhabitants of the province of Maſſachuſett's Bay, could not yet be brought into a proper ſtate of obedience, but continued in carrying on the ſame violent and unwarrantable practices as before. He added, that the eſtimates for the preſent year would naturally exceed the former; and that it would be neither conſulting the inclinations nor the intereſts of his people, if they ſhould decline any expence that ſhould ſeem neceſſary towards promoting the national honour: that as to foreign meaſures, no doubt was held that there could be any other conteſt, than who ſhould appear moſt forward in ſupport of the common cauſe, in upholding the reputation, and promoting the proſperity of the kingdom. He concluded by telling them, that the crown had no intereſt ſeparate from that of the people; that they were all members of the ſame body; and, conſiſtent with the order of nature and the laws of ſociety, they muſt together ſtand or together fall.

The addreſſes which were preſented by both houſes, now contained the moſt unreſerved aſſurances that every degree of requiſite ſupport ſhould be cheerfully granted. The moſt unreſerved confidence was placed in his majeſty; and the commons concluded by a declaration, that if any hopes had been conceived, or it ſhould have been any where ſurmiſed that there were any ſuch differences ſubſiſting among the people, as could, in the leaſt degree, abate the ardour of their affectionate attachment to his majeſty, or prevent their joining, as one man, in maintaining unſullied the luſtre of the crown, and preſerving undiminiſhed the rights of the people, they would, by their proceedings, convince the world how falſe and ſcandalous all ſuch ſurmiſes were; and make it manifeſt that, whenever they were called upon in the cauſe of their king and country, there would be but one heart and one voice among them. However, notwithſtanding theſe addreſſes were carried by a great majority, there aroſe conſiderable debates upon them; and it was aſſerted, in poſitive terms, that the conduct of our miniſtry had neither been honeſt in the deſign, nor able in the execution; they had loſt the confidence of the people, and yet imagined they would ſupport them; that they had threatened the colonies with unrelenting ſeverity, in ſupport of an unconſtitutional meaſure, and yet ſuppoſed that we ſhall ſuffer nothing from an alienation of their affection; that Ireland was ruled with a rod of iron, and yet they conſtantly declared that they were not making ſtrides towards arbitrary power. Laſtly, that with reſpect to the deſigns of our enemies, they had been totally blind and improvident, and as yet no danger threatened us.

When the addreſs had been preſented, the duke of Richmond in the houſe of lords, and Mr. Dowdeſwell in that of the commons, both made motions, that all the papers which had been ſent to the miniſtry ſhould be produced, but this the miniſtry would by no means comply with; and the queſtion being put, the motion was rejected by a great majority. Many people blamed the miniſtry for their conduct in this affair; for they thought, that as parliament alone could grant the neceſſary ſupplies, ſo they ought to have had the peruſal of all the papers relating to the controverſy; and it is an eſtabliſhed principle, that the man who acts from motives of integrity, need never be either afraid or aſhamed to have his conduct examined.

Shortly after the riſing of parliament, another addreſs, remonſtrance, and petition, was preſented by the city of London; in which, after profeſſions of the greateſt loyalty and affection, they deplored the ſevere cenſure caſt upon them by the anſwer to their former remonſtrance; execrated the malignant and pernicious advice which had ſuggeſted it; renewed their application in the ſtrongeſt terms, for the diſſolution of the preſent, and the calling a new parliament; expatiated on the ſecret machinations, and inſidious attempts of evil counſellors; and inſiſted ſtrongly on the indiſpenſible right of the ſubject being repreſented by a full, free parliament. His majeſty ſaid, that he could give them no other anſwer than he had done before. On which Mr. Beckford, the father of the city, who at that time was lord-mayor, with an honeſt boldneſs and freedom peculiar to himſelf, made an immediate and ſpirited reply, which he concluded in the following words: "That whoever had dared already, or ſhould hereafter endeavour, by falſe inſinuations and ſuggeſtions, to alienate his majeſty's affections from his loyal ſubjects in general, and the city of London in particular, and to withdraw his confidence and regard from his people, was an enemy to his majeſty's perſon and family, and a betrayer of our happy conſtitution, as it was eſtabliſhed at the glorious and neceſſary revolution." This ſpeech was highly applauded by the citizens; nor did the death of Mr. Beckford prevent another addreſs, which was the third preſented this year by the city.

On the twenty-ſecond of January the following declaration was delivered by prince Maſſerano, ambaſſador extraordinary from his catholic majeſty to our court.

"His Britannic majeſty having complained of the violence which was committed on the tenth of June 1770, at the iſland commonly called the Great Malouine, and by the Engliſh Falkland's Iſland, in obliging, by force, the commander and ſubjects of his Britannic majeſty to evacuate the port by them called Egmont, a ſtep offenſive to the honour of his crown; the prince de Maſſerano, ambaſſador extraordinary of his catholic majeſty, has received orders to declare, and declares, that his catholic majeſty, conſidering the deſire with which he is animated for peace, and for the maintenance of good harmony with his Britannic majeſty; and reflecting that this event might interrupt it; has ſeen with diſpleaſure this expedition tending to diſturb it, and in the perſuaſion in which he is, of the reciprocity of ſentiments of his Britannic majeſty, and of its being far from his intention to authorize any thing that might diſturb the good underſtanding between the two courts, his catholic majeſty does diſavow the ſaid violent enterprize; and in conſequence, the prince de Maſſerano declares, that his catholic majeſty engages to give immediate orders, that all things ſhall be reſtored in the Great Malouine, at the port called Egmont, preciſely in the ſtate in which they were before the tenth of June, 1770. For which purpoſe his catholic majeſty will give orders to one of his officers, to deliver up to the officer authorized by his Britannic majeſty, the port and fort called Egmont, with all the artillery, ſtores, and effects of his Britannic majeſty and his ſubjects, which were at that place the day abovementioned, agreeable to the inventory which has been made of them.

"The prince de Maſſerano declares, at the ſame time, in the name of the king his maſter, that the engagement of his ſaid catholic majeſty, to reſtore to his Britannic majeſty the poſſeſſion of the port and fort called Egmont, cannot, nor ought, any wiſe, to affect the queſtion of the prior right of ſovereignty of the Malouine iſlands, otherwiſe called Falkland's iſlands."

"In witneſs whereof, &c."

(L. S.) Signed le prince de Maſſerano.

The earl of Rochfort ſignified the acceptance of this declaration in the following terms:

“ His catholic majeſty having authoriſed the prince de Maſſerano, his ambaſſador extraordinary, to offer in his majeſty's name to the king of Great Britain, a ſatisfaction for the injury done to his Britannic majeſty, by diſpoſſeſſing him of the port and fort of Port Egmont; and the ſaid ambaſſador having this day ſigned a declaration, which he has juſt delivered to me, expreſſing therein that his catholic majeſty, being deſirous to reſtore the good harmony and friendſhip which before ſubſiſted between the two crowns, does diſavow the expedition againſt Port Egmont, in which force has been uſed againſt his Britannic majeſty's poſſeſſions, commander, and ſubjects; and does alſo engage, that all things ſhall be immediately reſtored to the preciſe ſituation in which they ſtood before the tenth of June, 1770. And that his catholic majeſty ſhall give orders, in conſequence, to one of his officers, to deliver up to the officer authoriſed by his Britannic Majeſty, the port and fort of Port Egmont, as alſo all his Britannic majeſty's artillery, ſtores, and effects, as well as thoſe of his ſubjects, according to the inventory which has been made of them. And the ſaid ambaſſador having moreover engaged, in his catholic majeſty's name, that what is contained in the ſaid declaration ſhall be carried into effect by his ſaid catholic majeſty; and that duplicates of his catholic majeſty's orders to his officers, ſhall be delivered into the hands of one of his Britannic majeſty's principal ſecretaries of ſtate, within ſix weeks. His ſaid Britannic majeſty, in order to ſhew the ſame friendly diſpoſitions on his part, has authoriſed me to declare, that he will look upon the declaration of prince de Maſſerano, together with the full performance of the ſaid engagement on the part of his catholic majeſty, as a ſatisfaction for the injury done to the crown of Great Britain. In witneſs whereof, &c.”

(L. S.) Signed, Rochfort.

There were copies of this tranſaction immediately laid before both houſes of parliament, and it was then moved in the commons, that all the papers relating to the convention ſhould be laid before the houſe, which was complied with, except in one inſtance that of keeping back ſuch papers as contained the Spaniſh claims to Falkland's iſlands. This occaſioned a warm debate; but the miniſtry ſcreened themſelves under pretence that all the offices had been ſearched, but no more papers could be found. It was then propoſed to preſent an addreſs of thanks to his majeſty for ordering the papers to be laid before them; but this was objected to by the minority, who denied that all the papers had been laid before them. Warm debates enſued in both houſes; but the miniſterial party prevailed, and the addreſs was preſented, without any amendment whatever.

Several ſpeeches ſaid to have been made in the houſe of commons, had for a conſiderable time been publiſhed by ſome bookſellers, who being cited before the houſe, refuſed to appear; upon which a proclamation was publiſhed, with a reward for apprehending them. This produced the intended effect. J. Wheble, one of theſe perſons, was apprehended and taken before John Wilkes, Eſq; the ſitting alderman at Guildhall; but he finding that the perſon who had apprehended Mr. Wheble, had no accuſation againſt him, and only apprehended him on the authority of the proclamation; and at the ſame time Mr. Wheble declaring that the apprehender had forcibly detained him, and brought him there, the alderman immediately diſcharged him, and bound him over to proſecute his accuſer. Mr. Miller, printer of a public paper, was likewiſe taken into cuſtody by a meſſenger from the houſe of commons; who, on his refuſing to go with him, took him by the arm; upon which a conſtable was ſent for, and Mr. Miller gave him charge of the meſſenger for aſſaulting him in his own houſe; whereupon he was carried to the manſion-houſe, and a hearing came on before the lord-mayor, and aldermen Wilkes and Oliver. In the mean time the ſerjeant at arms being informed of this tranſaction, came to demand the bodies of the meſſenger and of Mr. Miller: upon which the lord-mayor aſked the meſſenger, if he had applied to a magiſtrate to back the warrant, or to any peace officer of the city to aſſiſt him; and on his replying in the negative, his lordſhip declared, that no power had a right to ſeize a citizen of London, without an order from him or ſome other magiſtrate; and that he was of opinion, the ſeizing of Miller, and the warrant were both illegal; he therefore declared Miller to be at liberty, and proceeded to examine witneſſes to prove the aſſault of the meſſenger, which being done, his lordſhip aſked the latter if he would give bail. This he at firſt refuſed to do; but his commitment being actually made out, he thought proper to comply, when himſelf was bound in forty pounds, and two ſureties in twenty pounds, for his appearance at Guildhall the next ſeſſions.

Indignation at theſe proceedings ſeized the whole houſe of commons, and moſt of the gentlemen in the minority joined in aſſerting the privileges of the houſe; but obſerved, that theſe were not proper times to engage the honour of that houſe in a diſpute with the city of London. The lord-mayor was ordered to attend the houſe the next day, when that magiſtrate juſtified his conduct by his oath of office, which obliged him to preſerve the franchiſes of the citizens from any proceſs of law being ſerved, but by their own officers. It was then moved and carried, that the lord-mayor's clerk ſhould attend with the book of minutes; and he being brought to the houſe, was obliged to eraſe the cognizance out of the book: and a reſolution was paſſed, that there ſhould be no farther proceedings at law.—The lord-mayor, who had been ſummoned to attend, at length appeared in his place; when he produced the charter, and copies of the oath adminiſtered to the city magiſtrates; and alledged, that he could not have acted otherwiſe than he did, without having violated his oath and his duty; that he had acted in defence of the laws of his country, which were manifeſtly invaded, and that he ſhould always glory in having done it. To this it was anſwered, that the privileges and practice of parliament had at all times been invariably the ſame; that the only queſtion now was an exemption claimed by the city of London, through a charter derived from the crown; that the crown could convey no powers through that charter which were not inherent in itſelf, and that it had no power over the privileges of that houſe. That their privileges were a check upon the other branches of the legiſlature; that conſequently their cauſe was the cauſe of liberty and of the people at large; and if the power of the commons were weakened, the ſecurity of liberty, were equally ſo. It was therefore moved, that the diſcharging of Miller from the cuſtody of the meſſenger, was a breach of privilege, as was alſo the apprehending of the meſſenger of the houſe, for executing their warrant, under pretence of an aſſault; and it was likewiſe a breach of privilege to hold their meſſenger to bail for doing his duty. They then proceeded againſt Mr. Oliver, who was alſo a member, and who, as well as Mr. Braſs Croſby, the lord-mayor, had been refuſed counſel; and Mr. Oliver anſwering, that he avowed and gloried in the fact laid to his charge, it was moved, that he ſhould be ſent to the Tower. Great heats aroſe upon this queſtion, and the ſevereſt cenſures were thrown out; while above thirty gentlemen quitted the houſe in a body. Several attempts were made to bring Mr. Oliver to ſubmiſſion, but he continued inflexible; and the queſtion for his being ſent to the Tower was carried. Two days after Mr. Oliver's commitment, the lord mayor attended at the houſe to receive his ſentence; the crowd was prodigious, and great irregularities were commited; while the ſheriff, attended by the Weſtminſter juſtices, and an army of conſtables, were inſufficient to preſerve order. It was moved, that in conſideration of the lord mayor's ill ſtate of health, he ſhould be taken into the cuſtody of the ſerjeant at arms; but he refuſed all favour, and was therefore ordered to the Tower. The populace took his horſes from the coach and drew it to Temple-bar; when having conceived ſome ſuſpicion of the deputy-ſerjeant at arms, who attended him, they ſhut the gate; but at the earneſt deſire of the lord mayor, they were reſtrained from intended violence, and proceeded to the manſion-houſe, from whence his lordſhip afterwards was conveyed to the Tower; where he continued with Mr. Oliver, till the prorogation of parliament, which happened on the eighth of May, when his majeſty put an end to the ſeſſion, in the uſual manner, with a moſt gracious ſpeech from the throne. On the twenty-third of July, the aldermen in their ſcarlet gowns, with the common council, proceeded to the Tower, to conduct the lord mayor and alderman Oliver to the manſion houſe in the ſtate coach. There were fifty-three carriages in the train; and the artillery company, in their uniforms, graced the proceſſion. The lord mayor and Mr. Oliver no ſooner appeared at the Tower-gate, than they were ſaluted by twenty-one pieces of cannon belonging to the artillery company, and were received by the people with the loudeſt acclamations of joy, which were continued all the way to the manſion-houſe. At night the city was grandly illuminated, and the licentious populace broke the windows of ſuch houſes as had no lights. Soon after Mr. Wilkes and Mr. Bull were, for the city of London and county of Middleſex, choſen ſheriffs.

The citizens of London were, in general, exaſperated in the higheſt degree againſt parliament, on account of their late proceedings; and nothing was left undone to ſhew their reſentment. A committee was even appointed to carry on a proſecution againſt the ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, for the commitment of their magiſtrates; and the moſt eminent counſel were conſulted upon that occaſion: but it was found that no action could be brought upon that ſubject. Recourſe was therefore again had to the hopeleſs reſort of another addreſs, remonſtrance, and petition to the throne; in which, after the other complaints, the impriſonment of the magiſtrates, and the eraſing a judicial record, in order to ſtop the courſe of juſtice, were not forgotten. His majeſty, in his anſwer, declared his readineſs to redreſs any real grievances, and that the city of London would always find him diſpoſed to liſten to any of their well founded complaints; but expreſſed his concern to ſee a part of his ſubjects ſtill ſo far miſled and deluded, as to renew in ſuch reprehenſible terms, a requeſt with which he had repeatedly declared he could not acquieſce.

Thus having, in a full manner, given a detail of domeſtic tranſactions, we ſhall take a tranſient view of affairs on the continent, not herein copying the example of ſome of our predeceſſors, who, in order to ſpin out the thread of hiſtorical narration, and to ſwell the ſize of their work, from pecuniary motives, have been very liberal in a dry amplification of matters which are not immediately connected with the hiſtory of England. War between the Turks and Ruſſians was carried on with great vigour, and attended with cruel devaſtations. The Ruſſians were in general victors; but their conqueſts were not obtained without great loſs of men, as well by ſickneſs, as the ſword. The kingdom of Poland was deluged with blood from one extremity to the other: the confederates became more and more inveterate againſt each other, and yet the fertility of the ſoil furniſhed the means of ſubſiſtence. Indeed, it may be juſtly ſaid, that the Ruſſian ambaſſador was the ſovereign of Poland: all orders were iſſued from him, though they were ſanctified by the name of his Majeſty.

A remarkable revolution, in the internal government of France, now took place. That faithful body of men the parliament of Paris, had long defended the liberties of their fellow ſubjects. The king having ſent for the members to the palace, ordered them to regiſter ſome edicts: this they abſolutely refuſed, and returning to the parliament houſe, entered into a bond to ſtand by each other in doing juſtice, although the conſequence ſhould be death. A body of dragoons ſurrounded the parliament houſe, and forced the clerks to regiſter the edicts; upon which the parliament proteſted, and deputed their preſident to wait on the king. The anſwer they received was, that next day they ſhould be all ſent into baniſhment. This took place, and thoſe venerable guardians of the laws were ſent to different villages, at a great diſtance from their friends and families. Several of the other parliaments in the provinces in honour of that of Paris, reſigned their offices.

During the ſucceeding year, a revolution was effected in Sweden without bloodſhed, tumult, or the leaſt oppoſition. The new form of government, eſtabliſhed by the king, conſiſted of fifty-ſeven articles, but they may be all compriſed in the following: That the king ſhall, for the future, chuſe the ſenate, or, in other words, he ſhould appoint to that office ſuch as he approved of: that he ſhall aſſemble the ſtates when he pleaſes, and likewiſe when he pleaſes, diſſolve their meeting, ſo as they have ſat at one time full three months: that the taxes ſhall be granted by the ſtates; but if not granted within three months after their meeting, then the old ones ſhall be levied. In caſe of any ſudden exigence, ſuch as the fear of invaſion, the king ſhall impoſe taxes till ſuch time as the ſtates can be called together: that when the ſtates are aſſembled, they are not to deliberate on any thing but what the king ſhall cauſe to be laid before them: that the king ſhall have full power to diſpoſe of the army and navy in whatever manner he pleaſes, and likewiſe to give away all places, either in the civil or military departments. When theſe articles were read, the king ſtood up, and aſked the ſtates, Whether they would give their oath to obſerve the form of government? As they knew it was in vain to diſpute, they all conſented with one voice; after which they were immediately ſworn in the king's preſence, and the ſpeakers of each order ſigned a bond in the name of the reſt. The great work being thus finally accompliſhed, the king ſtood up, and told them, that it was neceſſary they ſhould return thanks to God for bringing about ſo happy an event, without the effuſion of human blood; and then taking a book out of his pocket, the whole aſſembly joined with him in ſinging Te Deum, according to the cuſtom of the Lutherans.—They were then permitted to kiſs his hand; after which the king departed, and the ſtates ſeparated, without knowing whether they were ever again to meet.

Near the ſame time that the above remarkable revolution took place in Sweden, another of a very ſingular nature happened in Denmark; where the two counts, Struenſee and Brandt were accuſed; the firſt of having embezzled from the king's coffers a large ſum, amounting to one hundred and twenty-five thouſand pounds ſterling; of having iſſued many orders from the cabinet without the king's knowledge; of having been guilty of criminal converſation with the queen; of having ſecreted from the king ſeveral letters ſent to his majeſty, &c.—Count Brandt was accuſed of having been privy to Struenſee's criminal converſation, and all his other crimes, without divulging them. In conſequence of theſe accuſations, a tribunal was appointed for the trial of the queen, and the two counts, at which the latter were ſentenced to loſe their heads, and the queen to baniſhment. The two counts were executed on the twenty-eighth of April; and the queen, after having her two children taken from her, was permitted, by the interceſſion of her royal brother the king of Great Britain, to retire to Zell, in his majeſty's German electorate dominions, where having languiſhed for ſome time, the exceſs of her anguiſh put a period to her life.

Thus having noticed the moſt material foreign tranſactions, let us now return to affairs at home, where, during the receſs of parliament, an event took place, which ſurprized the whole nation, and made way for an act, the next ſeſſions, of a moſt extraordinary nature. The event alluded to was no other than the marriage of his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland with Mrs. Horton, a widow lady and daughter to lord Irnham, of the kingdom of Ireland. This ſtep of the duke's gave great offence at court, eſpecially as it had been openly acknowledged by the parties, and not concealed as the marriage of the duke of Glouceſter with the counteſs dowager of Waldegrave had been.

A. D. 1772. The parliament met this year on the 21ſt of January, and the ſeſſion was opened by his majeſty with a ſpeech from the throne; in which he expreſſed much ſatisfaction, that neither the foreign nor domeſtic ſtate of affairs required their more early attendance: that, now they were aſſembled, they would, no doubt, attend to the intereſts of the nation, and regulate its internal policy, as well as its foreign commerce. They were likewiſe informed that the king of Spain had given up Fort Egmont, and that we were on the beſt terms with that court. He concluded, with recommending to them, to keep the navy on the moſt reſpectable footing, to be ready in caſe of any neceſſity for the future. To this ſpeech addreſſes were preſented in the uſual form; after which the public buſineſs was opened, by making proper enquiries into the ſtate of the navy; and the miniſtry propoſed, that twenty-five thouſand men ſhould for the ſervice of the current year be voted.

The motion was not only oppoſed by two of our greateſt naval commanders, but the then preſent arrangement of the fleet likewiſe condemned. They obſerved that the force already in the Eaſt Indies was either too great, or too little: that if the appearances of a permanent peace, as held out in the ſpeech, were to be relied on, it was too great, and, in caſe of war, it was inſufficient: that the ſame objections lay to the arrangement at Jamaica, where the ſquadron conſiſted only of about four ſhips, and was altogether unable to protect it, ſuppoſing any danger of an attack. Many ſevere ſarcaſms were levelled at the miniſtry for the futility of their conduct, becauſe they accompanied a ſpeech which breathed nothing but ſentiments of peace, with all the actual preparation for war. At laſt, the queſtion having been put, the motion was carried as uſual, and the miniſtry reigned triumphant. The houſe next took into conſideration a petition for leave, to bring in a bill to excuſe ſome of the clergy from ſubſcribing to the thirty-nine articles of religion. The motion was rejected by a great majority, and not without ſome ſevere ſtrictures on the conduct of thoſe by whom it had been promoted. But of all the buſineſs tranſacted during this ſeſſions, none was conſidered of ſuch importance, as that of a meſſage ſent by his majeſty to the houſe of lords. In this meſſage it was obſerved, that his majeſty being deſirous, from paternal affection to his own family, an anxious concern for the future welfare of his people, and the honour and dignity of his crown, that the right of approving all marriages in the royal family, as a matter of public concern, had always belonged to the princes of this realm; he therefore recommended to both houſes to take it into their ſerious conſideration, whether it may not be wiſe and expedient to ſupply the defects of the laws now in being, and, by ſome new proviſion, more effectually guard the deſcendants of his late majeſty, except ſuch as were already married to foreign princes, from marrying without the approbation of his majeſty, his heirs and ſucceſſors, firſt had and obtained. In conſequence of this meſſage, a bill was brought into the houſe of lords, which fully anſwered all the purpoſes intended. This bill was oppoſed, with great ſtrength of argument, by ſome of the moſt reſpectable peers in the nation. All the judges were ſent for to give their opinion, which was, that the marriages of the intermediate branches of the royal family muſt be approved of by the king, but how far that power extended over collateral branches, they could not ſay. At laſt the motion was carried, though not till fourteen lords entered a proteſt againſt it, as being inconſiſtent with the law of nature. In the houſe of commons, the bill met with a much ſtronger repulſe; and thoſe in oppoſition boldly declared, that it had been brought in at a time when moſt of the gentlemen of the law, whoſe opinions would have been of great ſervice, were gone on the circuits. But, notwithſtanding all the ſtrength of argument, it paſſed, and received the royal aſſent ſoon after.

Having thus adjuſted this matter, the attention of the parliament was directed to the affairs of the Eaſt India company, which at this time were in a very perplexed ſituation. On the thirtieth of March, the deputy-chairman of the company moved the houſe for leave to bring in a bill for the better regulation of the ſervants belonging to the company in India. The grand object in view was, to reſtrain the governor's council; and, indeed, all the ſervants belonging to the company, from carrying on any ſort of trade, and to give the directors of the company a ſovereign power over their own ſervants. The motion was carried, and this led to an enquiry into the ſtate of affairs in India. All the papers belonging to the company were ordered to be laid before a ſelect committee of the houſe, and from the peruſal of them, many important diſcoveries were made. Indeed, it was found, that the mode of government in India was, in every reſpect, arbitrary, unconſtitutional, and no way fit for preſerving the rights of the people, or adminiſtering juſtice to individuals. The committee, finding the buſineſs increaſing faſt, and the ſeaſon far advanced, deſired leave to continue ſitting during the receſs of parliament, or, at leaſt, till ſuch time as they could go through with the intended enquiry. In the mean time, the ill temper which had unaccountably taken place between the two houſes the preceding ſeſſion, ſtill continued during the preſent; and, except in tranſmitting of bills from the one to the other, there was no more communication between them, than if they had been the jealous councils of two rival ſtates. His majeſty went, in uſual ſtate, to the upper houſe, and cloſed the ſeſſion on the ninth of June.

The ſeſſion was again opened by his majeſty on the 26th of November with a ſpeech from the throne; in which he informed the members, that his reaſon for calling them ſo ſoon was, to take into their conſideration ſome things of the utmoſt importance. He deſired them to take into their immediate conſideration the diſtreſſed condition of the Eaſt India company. He took notice, that he had the ſtrongeſt aſſurances from the powers on the continent, of their diſpoſition to peace; and he concluded by recommending to them the moſt prudent methods that could be made uſe of, in order to reduce the price of proviſions, as the diſtreſſes of the poor were not imaginary but real; and that nothing would give him greater pleaſure, than to hear that thoſe diſtreſſes were removed.

The preſent ſtate of the navy, was the firſt thing of importance which came under the conſideration of the houſe of commons, and this occaſioned very warm debates. Certainly, nothing could be more reaſonable, than to lay before the people a ſtate of the public affairs, eſpecially ſuch as concerned the marine, that they might be ſatisfied whether their money had been laid out in promoting the purpoſes for which it had been given: but, notwithſtanding the force of thoſe arguments urged by oppoſition, no ſooner was the queſtion put, than it was carried for the miniſtry by a great majority, and the ſupplies were granted. After this buſineſs a motion was made to enquire into the nature of thoſe cauſes which occaſioned the ſcarcity of proviſions: but nothing was done that could be of any real ſervice to the public. A ſecret committee having been appointed to enquire into the ſtate of the Eaſt India company's affairs, it was found by their report, that the affairs of the company were both complexed and very much diſtreſſed. At laſt the motion was carried in the uſual manner; and ſuperviſors were appointed for the Eaſt Indies, to make a proper enquiry into all the abuſes complained of, and to rectify them, according to the beſt of their abilities.

A. D. 1773. REGARDLESS of the fate of the diſſenters bill, againſt ſubſcribing to the thirty-nine articles, another with ſimilar principles was, with ſome additions, brought into the houſe of commons in the beginning of this year, but it was received like that of the preceding year, it being carried, in all its ſtages, in the one houſe by a great majority, and rejected chiefly by the influence of the biſhops in the other. A motion was likewiſe made, for a committee of the whole houſe to conſider of the ſubſcription to the thirty-nine articles, required of perſons in the univerſities. This petition was ſomewhat different from that preſented laſt year. But though the motion was well ſupported, and produced a very conſiderable debate, it was rejected by a great majority. After the holidays parliament took into conſideration the acts reſpecting the preſervation of the game. Nothing, however, was done on this ſubject. The miniſtry promoted the bill in order to acquire ſome ſhare of popularity, and the patriots oppoſed it, merely for the ſake of oppoſition. About fifty years ago, at the inſtance of baron Thompſon, the city of London ſet the example of diſcharging every priſoner without fees as ſoon as he was acquitted by the jury. This generoſity of the citizens of London was not, however, imitated by thoſe who lived in more diſtant counties. Inſtances were produced of ſome poor men having laid a whole year in goal, becauſe they could not pay their fees. To remedy an evil of ſo glaring a nature, a bill was brought in to oblige every county to make good the deficiencies incurred to the gaolers for keeping the priſoners: in conſequence of which the priſoner may now go from the bar to his family, without being called in queſtion, or detained for any fees whatever; his impriſonment being conſidered as a great puniſhment, after his innocence has been proved. The parliamentary buſineſs being finiſhed, on the firſt of July his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and prorogued the parliament, having firſt ſigned ſuch bills as were ready.

On the twenty-ſecond of June, a ſhort time before the cloſe of this ſeſſion, the king made an excurſion to Portſmouth, in order to inſpect the ſtate of the dock-yard, and to review the fleet aſſembled at Spithead. He was pleaſed to expreſs the higheſt approbation of the good order and diſcipline of his fleet, the excellent condition of the dock-yard, arſenals, and garriſon, and the regularity with which every thing was conducted; and ſhewed the utmoſt ſatisfaction of thoſe demonſtrations of loyalty and affection, with which he was received by all ranks of people. His majeſty ſet out, on his return from the commiſſioner's houſe, on the twenty-ſixth of June, about ſeven o'clock in the morning, and arrived at Kew, in perfect health, about two in the afternoon. Previous to his departure the king was pleaſed to order a diſtribution of the following ſums.

One thouſand five hundred pounds to the artificers, workmen, and labourers of the dock-yard, victualling-office, and gun-wharf.

Three hundred and fifty pounds to the companies of the Barfleur and Auguſta Yacht, and the crew of his majeſty's barge.

Two hundred and fifty-pounds to the poor of Portſmouth and Goſport.

His majeſty was alſo pleaſed to make ſome other ſmall gratuities, and to releaſe the priſoners confined in Portſmouth gaol.

His majeſty went on Thurſday, the thirteenth of January, to the houſe of A.D. 1774. peers, in the uſual ſtate, and opened the ſeſſion of parliament with a ſpeech, in which he aſſured them of the pacific diſpoſition of foreign powers, and recommended the proſecution of meaſures more immediately reſpecting the preſervation and advancement of the revenue and commerce of the kingdom. He deſired in a particular manner their attention to the ſtate of the gold coin; and concluded with declaring, that they could propoſe no meaſure, to advance, or ſecure the happineſs of his people, in which they might not always depend on his moſt hearty concurrence. When the commons returned to their houſe, ſtrong debates enſued upon the words of the addreſs which ſhould be preſented to his majeſty; but the queſtion being put to the vote, it was carried by a great majority in favour of the miniſtry. Mr. Buller moved, that twenty thouſand ſeamen, including four thouſand three hundred and fifty-four marines, were neceſſary for the ſervice of the preſent year; and that a ſum, not exceeding four pounds a man per month, ſhould be granted for the ſervice of the royal navy; both which motions, after a warm debate, were agreed to. But the grand object government had in view, was to reduce the colonies to a ſtate of obedience, and convince them of the neceſſity they were under of being ſubject to the mother country. At Boſton in America, in the month of December, a number of reſolute men, (dreſſed like Mohawks or Indians) in leſs than four hours, emptied into the ſea every cheſt of tea on board three ſhips, commanded by the captains Hall, Bruce, and Coffin, amounting to three hundred and forty-two cheſts, without the leaſt damage done to the ſhips, or any other property. This was the fate of the firſt of thoſe ſhips employed by the India company, that reached their deſtined port. The other governors wiſely agreed to ſuffer the tea to be carried back from whence it came: for the perſons to whom it was conſigned refuſed to take it; and as no one had ordered it, no one was obliged to hazard his own perſonal ſafety in taking upon himſelf to be the owner of it. In ſeveral of the provinces this tea was termed the fetters forged for the people by Great Britain; and at a public meeting of the inhabitants of Philadelphia, it was reſolved, that the diſpoſal of their own property is the inherent right of freemen: that there can be no property in that which another can take from them without their conſent: that the claim of parliament to tax America, is, in other words, a claim of right to levy contributions on them at pleaſure: that the duty impoſed by parliament upon tea landed in America, is a tax on the Americans, or levying contributions without their conſent; and that the reſolution entered into by the Eaſt India company, to ſend out their tea to America, ſubject to duties on its being landed there, was an open attempt to inforce a miniſterial plan, and a violent attack upon American liberties.

It is impoſſible when the minds of men are greatly agitated, to prevent their running into violent extremes; which were, however, conſidered by the court of England, as ſuch audacious inſults on the ſupremacy of parliament, that his majeſty ſent a meſſage to the houſe of commons, deſiring them to enable him to take ſuch meaſures as would be moſt likely to put an immediate ſtop to the preſent diſorders, and to ſecure the dependence of the colonies upon the crown and parliament of Great Britain. This meſſage produced a bill, which was preſented to the houſe by lord North, for the immediate removal of the officers of the cuſtoms from the town of Boſton, in the province of Maſſachuſet's bay; to quarter a military force on the people; and for diſcontinuing the landing, and diſcharging the lading and ſhipping of goods in that port, till his majeſty was ſatiſfied that no interruption would be made to collecting the duties, and till full ſatiſfaction ſhould be made to the Eaſt India company, for the tea which had been deſtroyed. This bill for ſhutting up the port and harbour of Boſton, having paſſed the houſe, lord North preſented another for regulating the government of the province of Maſſachuſet's bay, which occaſioned a very warm debate, particularly with reſpect to a part of the bill, which propoſed, that offenders ſhould be removed for trial to other colonies; or if government thought, that juſtice could not be had there, they ſhould be brought to Great Britain for that purpoſe.

Several important points were diſcuſſed during this ſeſſion of parliament, and ſeveral acts were paſſed. In which number were included one for the better regulation of the gold coin, and another relative to the naturalizing foreigners. An important queſtion was alſo decided in the houſe of peers, againſt the excluſive common-law right of authors, and their aſſigns, to their works. But one bill produced an univerſal diſcontent among the people. It was entitled, "An Act for the future government of Quebec." The principal clauſes that gave offence were two; by the firſt the Romiſh clergy were to have the exerciſe of their religion, as eſtabliſhed by the firſt of queen Elizabeth; and might enjoy and receive the accuſtomed dues and rights from perſons profeſſing the Romiſh religion. By the ſecond clauſe, all controverſies relative to property and civil rights were to be determined by the Canada laws then in being, or ſuch as might be afterwards enacted by the governor, lieutenant-governor, and legiſlative council. The city of London in a petition againſt it, declared, that they apprehended it to be entirely ſubverſive of the Britiſh conſtitution. The parliamentary buſineſs being finiſhed, his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and after having ſigned ſuch bills as were ready, cloſed the ſeſſion on the twenty-ſecond of June.

About the ſame time the harbour of Boſton was ſhut up againſt all veſſels bound to America; and ſome days after, none were allowed to depart thence. In July the Boſtonians with firmneſs and coolneſs formed a ſolemn league and covenant, that they would not import or export any thing from Great Britain; nor have any connection or trade with any one ſo doing, till all their rights and charters ſhould be reſtored to them again. To prevent ſuch conventions, meetings, and aſſemblies, general Gage iſſued out a proclamation expreſsly forbidding them. He likewiſe diſſolved an aſſembly of the province of Salem; but they unanimouſly riſing, declared they would not be diſſolved; that they were come there on the buſineſs of the public, and that they were determined to paſs ſuch votes as were for the good of the province: they then locked the doors of the town-hall, and obliged the general to comply with their reſolutions. Several other colonies followed their example, and a general Congreſs was eſtabliſhed, to which deputies from the ſeveral provinces were invited. A very alarming tranſaction alſo took place, which was, the ſeizure of Fort William in New Hampſhire, by the provincial militia, in which they found one hundred and ſix barrels of gunpowder, ſeveral cannon, ſhot, and ſmall arms. On the ſecond of September general Gage thought proper to demand of colonel Brattle, the provincial ammunition and ſtores under his care, which were delivered up to him; and at the ſame time he ſent two companies of ſoldiers up the river by night, who ſeized a large magazine of powder, a part of which was private property. Soon after the general ordered four twenty-four pounders, and eight nine pounders, to be placed againſt the fortifications of Boſton; he alſo cauſed trenches to be dug round the town, and Boſton-neck, the only avenue by land into the town, to be fortified, and a regiment placed there for its ſecurity. Againſt this ſtep the Boſtonians, in a petition, ſtrongly remonſtrated: and about the ſame time, the New York merchants all refuſed to let general Gage have any of their ſhips to fetch the troops from Quebec. Such was the ſituation of affairs at Boſton, when the Engliſh parliament was diſſolved by proclamation, and the writs for calling a new one were made returnable on the twenty-ninth of November. Accordingly, on that day, his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and being in his royal robes ſeated on the throne, commanded the attendance of the commons in the houſe of peers; who being come, the king, by his chancellor, ſignified his pleaſure that they ſhould return and chuſe a ſpeaker, to be preſented next day for his majeſty's approbation. They returned accordingly, and unanimouſly choſe Sir Fletcher Norton. Next day his majeſty went again in the uſual ſtate to the houſe of peers, and having approved of the commons choice of a ſpeaker, opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne; to which both houſes preſented very affectionate addreſſes; to each of which his majeſty was pleaſed to return a moſt gracious reply.

Ast his was the firſt ſeſſion of a new parliament, the ſwearing in of the members and other trifling matters incident on ſuch occaſions, engaged their attention for ſome days. This over, they proceeded to buſineſs, which was begun by the houſe reſolving itſelf into a committee of ſupply to his majeſty; when ſeveral reſolutions were agreed to; after which the parliament was adjourned to the nineteenth of January, by his majeſty.

A. D. 1775. The parliament having met, purſuant to their adjournment, lord North preſented to the houſe, by his majeſty's command, ſeveral bundles of American papers: and as ſoon as the clerk had finiſhed reading their titles, a motion was made that they ſhould lie on the table for inſpection, and that a future day ſhould be appointed for the whole houſe to go into a committee to conſider of the ſame; which was agreed to after ſome debates.

Petitions in the mean time were preſented to the houſe from the Merchants of London, Glaſgow, Briſtol, Liverpool, and other places, complaining of the great decay of trade, occaſioned by the unhappy differences between Great Britain and her colonies. The corporation of London alſo preſented an addreſs, remonſtrance and petition to the king; in which they complained of the meaſures that had been purſued, and were ſtill purſuing, againſt their fellow ſubjects in America; and earneſtly beſeeched his majeſty to diſcharge thoſe miniſters from his councils who had been the means of promoting them, as the firſt ſtep towards a full redreſs of the grievances ſo univerſally complained of by the people. To this addreſs and petition his majeſty was pleaſed to return the following anſwer: "It is with the utmoſt aſtoniſhment that I find any of my ſubjects capable of encouraging the rebellious diſpoſition which unhappily exiſts in ſome of my colonies in North America. Having entire confidence in the wiſdom of my parliament, the great council of the nation, I will ſteadily purſue thoſe meaſures which they have recommended for the ſupport of the conſtitutional rights of Great Britain, and the protection of the commercial intereſts of my kingdom." While petitions were preſenting to the commons from the principal corporations in England, lord Chatham, that real patriotic nobleman, brought in a bill for reconciling the preſent differences between Great Britain and America. This alſo met with great oppoſition; and the queſtion being put, it was by a conſiderable majority rejected.

At this time the papers relative to America were taken into conſideration in the lower houſe. Among them were two official letters from lord Dartmouth to general Gage, and the general's letter to his lordſhip. The former contained ſtrains of firmneſs and coercion, which it was plain, the general was not by any means able to realize with the force he had under his command. The language of the latter varied according to the different circumſtances and occaſions that preſented themſelves. Two matters were, however, very evident, that the rage and diſcontents were greatly augmented on account of the laſt American acts paſſed by the parliament; and that they were working up into a kind of phrenzy by a gradual augmentation of the troops, and by the works and defences raiſed on Boſton-neck. He drew, in ſome places, the moſt lamentable picture of the ſtate of that province, deſtitute at once of all legiſlative authority; of a council, of courts of juſtice, of magiſtracy; and repreſented the whole as one ſcene of anarchy and confuſion. When the houſe went into a committee to examine the American papers, lord North began the buſineſs with a view of the whole maſs of information laid before the committee, diſcriminated the diſpoſition of the reſpective colonies, and particularly directed to ſuch as he thought were in a ſtate of actual rebellion. His lordſhip then pointed out the meaſures intended to be purſued; and concluded by propoſing a conference with the houſe of lords, that a joint addreſs might be carried up to the throne, "To return thanks to his majeſty for communicating to the houſe the American papers, and that he would be pleaſed to take ſuch meaſures as might be ſuitable to his wiſdom for enforcing the laws againſt America; and promiſing to ſupport him, in a full and vigorous exertion of the ſame, with their lives and fortunes." The meaſures intended to be taken were mentioned generally, and ſaid to be theſe: "That a fleet of fourteen frigates be ſent to join the ſhips at Boſton, by which all the ports of New England were to be blocked up; that ten thouſand troops, including Preſton's regiment of light horſe, be ſent to Boſton, to keep the New Englanders in order; and that an addition of two thouſand ſeamen more be aſked to man the fleet to Boſton, and to ſupply the naval eſtabliſhment at home." This motion for the addreſs met with great oppoſition; but the queſtion being at length put, a conſiderable majority carried it.

The reſolution of the committee for preſenting the addreſs being reported to the houſe, the ſpeaker was proceeding to put the queſtion to agree with the report; but was interrupted by lord John Cavendiſh, who moved that the conſideration of the American papers ſhould be re-committed. He was ſeconded by lord Irnham, who, after having in a long ſpeech agitated the queſtion on the ground propoſed by adminiſtration, in a conſtitutional as well as in a political light, concluded with aſſerting that it appeared, in both thoſe views, formidable and deſtructive; and that it became abſolutely neceſſary to retract the unconſtitutional and impolitic ſteps which adminiſtration had hitherto adopted.

There were ſeveral others, among whom Mr. Wilkes particularly diſtinguiſhed himſelf, who expatiated largely on the juſtneſs and propriety of the noble lord's motion, when at length the queſtion being put, the numbers were—for the motion one hundred and five, againſt it two hundred and eighty-eight. An addreſs was then drawn up, and agreed to without a diviſion; and after a conference with the lords, it was reſolved that the addreſs ſhould be jointly preſented by both houſes to the king; which was accordingly done on the ninth of February; when his majeſty returned an anſwer as follows:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I thank you for this very dutiful and loyal addreſs, and for the ſolemn aſſurances you give me of your ſupport in maintaining the juſt rights of my crown, and of the two houſes of parliament, and you may depend on my taking the moſt effectual meaſures for enforcing due obedience to the authority of the ſupreme legiſlature." The day after the addreſs was preſented, lord North read, in his place, a meſſage from his majeſty, as follows:

"His majeſty being determined, in conſequence of the addreſs of both houſes of parliament, to take the moſt ſpeedy and effectual meaſures for ſupporting the juſt rights of the crown and the two houſes of parliament, thinks proper to acquaint this houſe, that ſome addition to his forces by ſea and land will be neceſſary for that purpoſe, and does not doubt but his faithful commons, on whoſe zeal and affection he entirely relies, will enable him to make ſuch an augmentation to his forces, as on the preſent occaſion ſhall be thought proper." This meſſage was referred to the conſideration of the committee of ſupply; after which the houſe reſolved itſelf into a committee of the whole houſe on the American papers, when a motion was made by lord North, “ that the chairman be directed to move the houſe, that leave be given to bring in a bill to reſtrain the trade and commerce of the provinces of Maſſachuſet's Bay, New Hampſhire, Connecticut, Providence, and Rhode-Iſland colonies in North America, to Great Britain, Ireland and the Weſt Indies; and to prohibit ſuch provinces and colonies from carrying on any fiſhery on the banks of Newfoundland, or other parts therein mentioned, under certain conditions, and for a time to be limited.” This motion was productive of great debates, which continued for ſeveral hours; when the queſtion being put, it was carried by a very conſiderable majority; and a bill was ordered to be brought in purſuant thereto. A petition was now preſented from the corporation of London, againſt the bill depending in the houſe, for reſtraining the trade of New England, and the fiſheries of that colony on the banks of Newfoundland. This petition repreſented the bill as being unjuſt, cruel, partial, and oppreſſive; injurious to the trade of Great Britain, and tending to increaſe the wealth and ſtrength of her rivals and enemies. They preſented another petition, of the like nature, to the houſe of lords; as did alſo the American merchants; and another to the king. But all theſe ſolicitations proved abortive; for the bill paſſed both houſes, and on the thirtieth of March received the royal aſſent. On the thirteenth of April his majeſty again went to the houſe of peers, and, among other bills, gave the royal aſſent to “ A bill to reſtrain the trade and commerce of the colonies of New Jerſey, Pennſylvania, Maryland, Virginia, and South Carolina, to any part of Great Britain, Ireland, and the Weſt India iſlands.”

Theſe acts being paſſed, the generals Burgoyne, Clinton and Howe, were ſent to take on them the command of the troops deſtined for endeavouring to bring the Americans to obedience; for which expedition they embarked on board the Cerberus man of war on the twenty-firſt of April. The national buſineſs being now finiſhed, on the twenty-ſixth of May his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and prorogued the parliament, having previouſly ſigned ſuch bills as were ready.

The flame of independency began to riſe high in America, the breach of diſcord was widened, confuſion gained ground upon order, and both private and public calamities were multiplied. At length recourſe was had to the ultimam rationem populorum et regum; and the deſtructive ſword was drawn to decide the conteſt of liberty and power: which happened on the nineteenth of April, a memorable Wedneſday. General Gage, the then commander of the Engliſh troops, having received intelligence of a large quantity of military ſtores being collected at Concord, for ſupplying a body of the mal-contents, detached on the eighteenth at night, the grenadiers of his army, and the light infantry, in order to deſtroy the ſaid ſtores. The next morning eight companies of the fourth, the ſame number of the twenty-third, and forty-ninth, and ſome marines, marched to the ſupport of the other detachment, under the command of lord Percy.

When lieutenant colonel Smith found, after he had advanced ſome miles of his march, that the country had been alarmed by the firing of guns and ringing of bells, he diſpatched ſix companies of light infantry, in order to ſecure two bridges on different roads beyond Concord, who, upon their arrival at Lexington, found a body of the country people drawn up under arms on a green, cloſe to the road; and upon the king's troops marching up to them, in order to enquire the reaſon of their being ſo aſſembled, they went off in great confuſion; and ſeveral guns were fired upon the king's troops from behind a ſtone wall, and alſo from the meeting-houſe, and other houſes, by which one man was wounded, and major Pitcairne's horſe ſhot in two places. In conſequence of this attack of the rebels, the troops returned the fire, and killed ſeveral of them; after which the detachment marched on to Concord, without any thing further happening, where they effected the purpoſe for which they were ſent. Whilſt this was performing, great numbers of the rebels aſſembled in many parts, and a conſiderable body of them attacked the light infantry poſted at one of the bridges, on which an action enſued, and ſome few were killed and wounded. On the return of the troops from Concord, they were very much annoyed, and had ſeveral men killed and wounded, by the rebels firing from behind walls, ditches, trees, and other ambuſhes; but the brigade, under the command of lord Piercy, having joined them at Lexington, with two pieces of cannon, the rebels were for a while diſperſed; but as ſoon as the troops reſumed their march, they began again to fire upon them from behind ſtone walls and houſes, and kept up in that manner a ſcattering fire during the whole of their march of fifteen miles; by which means ſeveral were killed and wounded; and ſuch was the cruelty and barbarity of the rebels, that they ſcalped, and cut off the ears of ſome of the wounded men, who fell into their hands. In this firſt engagement, one lieutenant, one ſerjeant, one drummer, and ſixty-two privates were killed; and two lieutenant-colonels, two captains, nine lieutenants, two enſigns, ſeven ſerjeants, one drummer, and one hundred and fifty-ſeven rank and file were wounded.

It is an old adage, Audi alteram partem, “ hear the other party;” and that our readers may have both ſides of the queſtion, in order to form a right judgment, we ſhall here lay before them, an account of the above action, as publiſhed in the Eſſex Gazette, printed at Salem in New England; dated the twenty-fifth of April.

“ Laſt Wedneſday, the nineteenth of April, the troops of his Britannic majeſty commenced hoſtilities upon the people of this province.——The particulars relative to this intereſting event, by which we are involved in all the horrors of a civil war, we have endeavoured to collect, as well as the preſent confuſed ſtate of affairs will admit.

“ On Tueſday evening a detachment from the army, conſiſting, it is ſaid of eight or nine hundred men, commanded by lieutenant-colonel Smith, embarked at the bottom of the common in Boſton, on board a number of boats, and landed at Phipp's farm, a little way up Charles river, from whence they proceeded with ſilence and expedition, on their way to Concord, about eighteen miles from Boſton. The people were ſoon alarmed, and began to aſſemble, in ſeveral towns, before day-light, in order to watch the motion of the troops. At Lexington, ſix miles below Concord, a company of militia, of about one hundred men, muſtered near the meeting houſe; the troops came in ſight of them juſt before ſun-riſe; and running within a few rods of them, the commanding officer accoſted the militia in words to this effect:—‘ Diſperſe you rebels, d—n you, throw down your arms and diſperſe:’ upon which the troops huzza'd, and immediately one or two officers diſcharged their piſtols, which was inſtantaneouſly followed by the firing of four or five of the ſoldiers, and then there ſeemed to be a general diſcharge from the whole body: eight of our men were killed and nine wounded. In a few minutes after this action, the enemy renewed their march for Concord; at which place they deſtroyed ſeveral carriages, carriage wheels, and about twenty barrels of flour, all belonging to the province.—Here about one hundred and fifty men going towards a bridge, of which the enemy were in poſſeſſion, the latter fired, and killed two of our men, who then returned the fire, and obliged the enemy to retreat back to Lexington, where they met lord Piercy, with a large reinforcement, and two pieces of cannon. The enemy now having a body of about eighteen hundred men, made a halt, picked up many of their dead, and took care of their wounded. At Menotomy, a few of our men, attacked a party of twelve of the enemy (carrying ſtores and proviſions to the troops) killed one of them, wounded ſeveral, made the reſt priſoners, and took poſſeſſion of all their arms, ſtores, proviſions, &c. without any loſs on our ſide. The enemy having halted one or two hours at Lexington, found it neceſſary to make a ſecond retreat, carrying with them many of their dead and wounded, whom they put into chaiſes and on horſes that they found ſtanding in the road. They continued their retreat from Lexington to Charles Town with great precipitation; and notwithſtanding their field-pieces, our people continued the purſuit, firing at them till they got to Charles Town Neck (which they reached a little after ſunſet) over which the enemy paſſed, proceeded up Bunker's Hill, and ſoon afterwards went into the town, under the protection of the Somerſet man of war of ſixty-four guns.

" In Lexington, the enemy ſet fire to Deacon Joſeph Loring's houſe and barn, Mrs. Mulliken's houſe and ſhop, and Mr. Joſhua Bond's houſe and ſhop, which were all conſumed. They alſo ſet fire to ſeveral other houſes, but our people extinguiſhed the flames. They pillaged almoſt every houſe they paſſed by, breaking and deſtroying doors, windows, glaſſes, &c. and carrying off cloathing, and other valuable effects. It appeared to be their deſign to burn and deſtroy all before them; and nothing but our vigorous purſuit prevented their purpoſes from being put into execution. But the barbarity exerciſed upon the bodies of our unfortunate brethren who fell, is almoſt incredible: not content with ſhooting down the unarmed, aged, and infirm, they diſregarded the cries of the wounded, killing them without mercy, and mangling their bodies in the moſt ſhocking manner.

" We have the pleaſure to ſay, that, notwithſtanding the higheſt provocations given by the enemy, not one inſtance of cruelty, that we have heard of, was committed by our victorious militia.

" The conſternation of the people of Charles Town, when our enemies were entering the town, is inexpreſſible; the troops, however, behaved tolerably civil, and the people have ſince nearly all left the town.

" We had thirty-nine killed, nineteen wounded, and two miſſing."

At this time the provincials inveſted the town of Boſton; and the people of New York, hearing of the action at Lexington, and the affair of Concord, roſe in a tumultuous manner, entered the town-houſe, ſeized many ſtands of arms, appropriated to their own uſe the cargoes of two ſhips laden with military ſtores for general Gage, and then marched to their aſſiſtance; whoſe forces not only continued to block up the town of Boſton, but began to raiſe batteries on the heights of the peninſula of Charles Town, in order to cannonade his majeſty's troops. An action at Bunker's Hill was the conſequence.

The Britiſh garriſon in Boſton were alarmed at break of day, July the 17th, by a firing from the Lively ſhip of war, which blocked up Marblehead harbour. Soon afterwards advice was received, that the rebels had broke ground, and were raiſing a battery on the heights of the peninſula of Charles Town. Preparations were inſtantly made by general Gage, for landing a body of men, under the command of major-general Howe, and brigadier-general Pigot, who embarked with great expedition, and landed on the peninſula without oppoſition, under the protection of ſome ſhips of war, by whoſe fire the rebels were kept within their works.

As ſoon as the troops landed, they were formed; the light infantry poſted on the right, and the grenadiers upon their left. The fifth and thirty-eighth battalions drew up in the rear of thoſe corps, and the forty-third and fifty-ſecond battalions made a third line. The rebels upon the heights were perceived to be in great force, and ſtrongly poſted. A redoubt, thrown up on the ſixteenth at night, with other works full of men, defended with cannon, and a large body poſted in the houſes of Charles Town, covered their right flank; and their center and left were covered by a breaſt-work, part of it cannon-proof, which reached from the left of the redoubt to the Myſtick, or Medford river. This appearance of ſtrength, and the large columns of the rebels ſoon pouring in to their aſſiſtance occaſioned an application for more troops, conſiſting of ſome companies of light infantry and grenadiers, the forty-ſeventh battalion, and the firſt battalion of marines; the whole making above two thouſand men when in conjunction.

Now theſe troops, formed in two lines, advanced, and the attack began by a ſharp cannonade, the lines advancing ſlowly, and frequently halting, to give time for the artillery to fire. The light infantry were directed to force the left point of the breaſtwork, to take the rebel line in flank, and the grenadiers to attack in front, ſupported by the fifth and fifty-ſecond battalions. Theſe orders were executed with perſeverance, under a heavy fire from the vaſt numbers of the rebels; and notwithſtanding various impediments, before the troops could reach the works, and though the left under brigadier-general Pigot was engaged alſo with the rebels at Charles Town, which place, at a critical moment, was ſet on fire, the brigadier purſued his point, and carried the redoubt. The rebels were then forced from other ſtrong holds, and purſued till they were drove clear off the peninſula, leaving behind five pieces of cannon.

During this dreadful engagement, maintained with great bravery and obſtinacy on both ſides, the loſs of the provincials in killed and wounded was very conſiderable. Of the Britiſh troops, according to the return of general Gage, two hundred and twenty-ſix were killed, and eight hundred and twenty-eight were wounded, many of the latter dying ſoon after; others, by the loſs of limbs, rendered for ever after incapable of ſervice; and more than a proportionable number of officers were included in both liſts. It may not be amiſs, for information, to obſerve, that Charles Town, burnt by the Britiſh forces in a moſt unfortunate critical moment, was much more populous than Cambridge, the capital of the county, and exceeded it much in trade, being ſituated on a peninſula between Myſtick and Charles rivers, and parted from Boſton only by the latter. The town was ſo large, as to take up all the ſpace between the two rivers; it was beautified with a handſome large church, a market-place by the river ſide, and two long ſtreets leading down to it. From theſe towns only a thouſand veſſels cleared.

General Carleton at this time was indefatigable in putting the province of Canada into a proper ſtate of defence; and the earl of Dunmore, governor of Virginia, having thought proper to take refuge on board a ſhip of war, harraſſed the coaſt, and made frequent deſcents upon the laſt mentioned province; laying waſte the country, carrying off, or ſpiking up a great number of cannons, deſtroying vaſt quantities of military ſtores belonging to the provincials, &c. &c. But on the other ſide, Fort St. John ſurrendered to the provincial forces, and the garriſon became priſoners on the third of November.

On the eighteenth of the ſame month, the regulars and provincials had a hot engagement near Savannah in Georgia, in which the latter were defeated; and the provincial general Montgomery, who had for ſome time laid ſiege to the city of Quebec, attempted to take it by ſtorm on the 31ſt of December.

But the general, finding his cannon too light to effect a breach, and that the enemy would not hearken to terms of capitulation, formed a deſign of carrying the town by eſcalade. In this he was encouraged by the extenſiveneſs of the works, and the weakneſs of the garriſon. When every thing was prepared, while he was waiting the opportunity of a ſnow ſtorm to carry his deſign into execution, ſeveral men deſerted to the enemy. His plan at firſt was to have attacked the upper and lower towns at the ſame time, depending principally for ſucceſs againſt the upper town: but diſcovering, from the motions of the enemy, that they were apprized of his deſign, he altered his plan; and, having divided his little army into four detachments, ordered two feints to be made againſt the upper town, one by colonel Livingſton, at the head of the Canadians, againſt St. John's Gate; the other by captain Brown, at the head of a ſmall detachment, againſt Cape Diamond, reſerving the two principal attacks againſt the lower town to himſelf and one Arnold.

Now the general at five o'clock, the hour appointed for the attack, at the head of the New York troops, advanced againſt the lower town at Aunce de Mere. Being obliged to take a circuit, the ſignal for the attack was given, and the garriſon alarmed before he reached the place; however, preſſing on, he paſſed the firſt barrier, and was juſt opening to attempt the ſecond, when by the firſt fire from the enemy he was unfortunately killed, together with his aid de camp, captain John M'Pherſon, captain Cheeſeman, and two or three more. This ſo diſpirited the men, that colonel Campbell, on whom the command devolved, found himſelf under the diſagreeable neceſſity of drawing them off immediately.

In the mean time Arnold, at the head of about three hundred and fifty of thoſe brave troops (who with unparalleled fatigue had penetrated Canada, under his command) and captain Lamb's company of artillery, had paſſed through St. Roques, and approached near a two gun battery without being diſcovered. This he attacked; and though it was well defended for about an hour, carried it with the loſs of a number of men. In this attack, Arnold had the misfortune to have his leg ſplintered by a ſhot, and was obliged to be carried to the hoſpital. After gaining the battery, his detachment paſſed on to a ſecond barrier, which they took poſſeſſion of. By this time the enemy, relieved from the other attacks by our troops being drawn off, directed their whole force againſt this detachment; and a party attacked them in the rear, having ſallied out from Palace Gate.

For three hours theſe brave men ſuſtained the force of the whole garriſon; but finding themſelves hemmed in, and no hopes of relief, they were obliged to yield to numbers, and the advantageous ſituation the garriſon had over them.

Of the provincials the loſs in killed and wounded, amounted to about ſixty, and three hundred taken priſoners, who were treated by general Carleton with great humanity. Among the ſlain were captain Kendricks, lieutenant Humphreys of the riflemen, and lieutenant Cooper. After this repulſe, the remains of the defeated army retired about three miles from Quebec, where they poſted themſelves advantageouſly, and waited for reinforcements; but no ſecond attack was made. Every poſſible diſtinction was ſhewn by the brave Carleton to the corpſe of general Montgomery, who on the 2d of January was interred in Quebec.

In conſequence of the reſolutions of the livery, laſt Midſummer day at Guildhall, on Wedneſday, June the twenty-eighth, the ſheriffs Plomer and Hart waited on his majeſty at St. James's, agreeable to his appointment at Kew. Mr. Sheriff Plomer addreſſed his majeſty in the following manner:

"May it pleaſe your majeſty,

"We are ordered by the lord-mayor, aldermen, and livery of the city of London, in common-hall aſſembled, to wait upon your majeſty, humbly to know your majeſty's royal will and pleaſure, when your majeſty will be pleaſed to receive, upon the throne, their humble addreſs, remonſtrance, and petition."

The king returned the following anſwer:

"You will pleaſe to take notice, that I will receive their addreſs, remonſtrance, and petition, on Friday next (to-morrow) at the levee."

Upon this Mr. Sheriff Plomer ſaid, "Your majeſty will permit us to inform you, that the livery, in common-hall aſſembled, have reſolved not to preſent their addreſs, remonſtrance, and petition, unleſs your majeſty ſhall be pleaſed to receive it ſitting on the throne."

His majeſty thus replied,

"I am ever ready to receive addreſſes and petitions, but I am the judge where."

The ſheriffs waited again on his majeſty at St. James's on the 5th of July, whom Mr. Sheriff Plomer addreſſed in the following manner:

"May it pleaſe your majeſty,

"We are ordered by the mayor, aldermen, and livery of the city of London, in common-hall aſſembled, to wait upon your majeſty, humbly to deliver into your majeſty's hands, in their name, the reſolutions agreed to in common-hall on the twenty-fourth of June laſt, and of the fourth inſtant."

Upon this Mr. Sheriff Plomer delivered a copy of the following reſolutions into the king's own hand, which he received without making any reply.

The following is a copy of thoſe reſolutions:

"Reſolved, That the king is bound to hear the petitions of his people, it being the undoubted right of the ſubject to be heard, and not a matter of grace and favour.

"Reſolved, That his majeſty's anſwer is a direct denial of the right of this court to have their petitions heard.

"Reſolved, That ſuch denial renders the right of petitioning the throne, recognized and eſtabliſhed by the Revolution, of no effect.

"Reſolved, That whoever adviſed his majeſty, directly or indirectly, to refuſe hearing the humble addreſs, remonſtrance, and petition of this court, on the throne, is equally an enemy to the happineſs and ſecurity of the king, and to the peace and liberties of the people."

Then follows a reſolution, "That inſtructions be given to their repreſentatives in parliament," which conclude thus—"You are further inſtructed, gentlemen, to move for an impeachment of the authors and adviſers of thoſe meaſures; that by bringing them to public juſtice, evil counſellors may be removed from before the king, his throne may be eſtabliſhed, the rights of the people be vindicated, and the whole empire reſtored to the enjoyment of peace, liberty, and ſafety.

A. D. 1776.

Purſuant to their adjournment the parliament now met; and in the courſe of the ſeſſion, the attention of the upper aſſembly was engaged by the trial of the ducheſs of Kingſton, who was accuſed of bigamy, in having married the duke of Kingſton, while her firſt huſband, the honourable Mr. Harvey (earl of Briſtol) was living. The trial laſted five days; at the cloſe of which, the priſoner being called to the bar, was informed by the lord high-ſteward, that the lords had pronounced her to be guilty. In conſequence of this ſhe claimed her privilege of peerage, which occaſioned the lords to adjourn to the chamber of parliament to debate on the matter. On their return, the priſoner was again called to the bar; and the lord high-ſteward pronounced it to be the ſenſe of the houſe, "That the ducheſs ſhould be allowed the privilege ſhe claimed." She was, therefore, as a peereſs, diſcharged on paying her fees, being ſubject to no kind of corporal puniſhment.

No buſineſs of conſequence was done in the lower houſe, except what is uſually called opening the budget, among the contents of which were the following new taxes. On four-wheel carriages a tax of twenty ſhillings, which lord North computed would amount to ſeventeen thouſand pounds per annum; on ſtage-coaches, at five pounds each, amounting to two thouſand pounds; on deeds, or all writings to be ſtamped, at one ſhilling a ſtamp, amounting to thirty thouſand pounds; on news-papers one half-penny per ſtamp; eighteen thouſand pounds per annum; ſix-pence a pack on cards, and two and ſix-pence on dice. Theſe different ſums, he ſaid, would amount to ſeventy-two thouſand pounds, which would have a ſurplus of eight thouſand pounds to go to the credit of the ſinking fund. As ſoon as his lordſhip had ſat down, governor Johnſtone roſe, and animadverted upon ſeveral parts of the miniſter's ſpeech. This produced a warm debate, which continued till half paſt eight o'clock, when the ſeveral reſolutions being put, they paſſed in the affirmative without a diviſion. The parliamentary buſineſs being finiſhed, on the twenty-third of May his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and having ſigned ſuch bills as were ready, prorogued the houſe.

At this time hoſtilities were carried on in America with great vehemence. General Gage having been recalled, the command in chief devolved on general Howe, who ſoon after iſſued a proclamation, by which ſuch of the inhabitants as attempted to quit the town without licence were condemned to military execution, if detected and taken, and if they eſcaped, to be proceeded againſt as traitors, by the forfeiture of their effects; and by a ſecond, ſuch as obtained permiſſion to quit the town were reſtrained, by ſevere penalties, from carrying more than a ſmall ſpecified ſum of money with them. He alſo enjoined the ſigning and entering into an aſſociation, by which the remaining inhabitants offered their perſons for the defence of the town; and ſuch of them as he approved of were to be armed, formed into companies, and inſtructed in military exerciſes and diſcipline, the remainder being obliged to pay their quotas in money towards the common defence. Theſe proclamations, co-operating with the violent meaſures of the Engliſh miniſtry, and their coercive acts of parliament, inſpired the people of New England with an enthuſiaſtic fury, and they ſoon compelled general Howe to evacuate Boſton. On the ſecond of March, the provincials began to bombard the town from a place called Phipps's Farm, and on the third they opened a twenty-four pound battery in Dorcheſter Neck, which annoyed the army exceedingly. On the fifth, general Howe embarked ſix regiments to attack this battery; but a ſtrong eaſterly wind preventing the men of war from covering and ſupporting them, it was thought adviſeable to deſiſt. The next day he renewed the attempt, but found the work ſo ſtrong, that he returned without effecting any thing. In the mean time the provincials had thrown near an hundred bombs into the town, and fired with conſiderable execution from their battery. General Howe, therefore, got ſome of the ſelect men to go out to general Waſhington, to inform him, that if the firing continued, he muſt ſet fire to the town to cover his retreat. Two of the ſelect men returned; and having communed with general Howe, went back, and the firing immediately ceaſed. The general then began his embarkation. The refugee inhabitants went firſt, not being ſuffered to carry any thing but neceſſaries. The mortars and heavy artillery could not be embarked; theſe therefore they endeavoured to burſt, by charging them full with powder, and firing it off; but this did not anſwer their wiſhes. They attempted alſo to deſtroy all the ſmall arms belonging to the town. While this work was going on, a deſerter from the provincial camp informed general Howe on the tenth, that general Waſhington was preparing for a general ſtorm. Upon this intelligence, the general and all the troops immediately embarked, leaving the artillery, ſtores, &c. damaged only, as the hurry and confuſion would allow.

By the movements of the provincial army it now appeared that they were taking ſtations upon Hog and Noddles iſlands, and preparing to attack Caſtle-William. If they had ſucceeded in this, they would have had the command of Boſton harbour, and deſtroyed the fleet. General Howe therefore diſmantled and blew up Caſtle-William, and then on the ſeventeenth fell down with the whole fleet into Nantaſhet Road. The terms of agreement between the two generals were ſecret; but it was ſuppoſed that nothing ſhould have been deſtroyed, and that this breach of the convention determined the provincials to ſtorm the town. General Howe made good his landing and capture of New York ſome ſhort time after theſe events.

About June, a battle was fought in Canada between the regulars under general Carleton, and a body of American troops commanded by major-general Thompſon, when the latter was defeated, and the major taken priſoner. Numbers were killed and wounded, and about two hundred taken priſoners. In the ſame month an attempt was made on Charles Town, South Carolina, by Sir Peter Parker, at the head of a fleet of ſhips of war, with a body of land forces; but the enterprize was, after an obſtinate engagement, without ſucceſs. On the fourth of July the INDEPENDENCY of the UNITED COLONIES of AMERICA was ordered to be declared throughout the different provinces by Congreſs.

On the nineteenth of September, Richard, viſcount Howe, and his brother William, general of his majeſty's forces in America, having been appointed commiſſioners for reſtoring peace to his majeſty's colonies and plantations in North America, publiſhed a conciliatory declaration, addreſſed to the provincials, which was far from having the wiſhed-for effect, the Americans being at this time adverſe to every mode offered by government; and inſtances occurred daily of their determination to preſerve themſelves independent. After this, many ſkirmiſhes happened between the king's troops and the provincials; but nothing deciſive till the latter end of October, when the latter were defeated in an action, which, from the place where it was fought, was termed the battle of the White Plains. In the diſpatches from general Howe, dated November the thirtieth, information was given of the taking of Fort Waſhington and Fort Lee, by the Britiſh forces, together with a great variety of military ſtores, and many priſoners. The following is the return of officers and privates killed, wounded and miſſing, belonging to the army under general Howe, in the ſeveral ſkirmiſhes and actions from the ſeventeenth of September, to the ſixteenth of November. Officers three hundred and four; ſtaff ditto twenty-five; privates four thouſand one hundred and one. Four thouſand four hundred and thirty in all.

About December, Rhode Iſland was taken by general Clinton; about the ſame time lord Cornwallis took poſſeſſion of Eaſt Jerſey, and general Lee was taken priſoner by a patrole of Britiſh dragoons, commanded by lieutenant-colonel (now lord) Harcourt. His lordſhip having penetrated the country upon a reconnoitring party with about twelve light dragoons, and chancing to meet a countryman on the road, entered upon examination of him, and found he was charged with a letter to general Waſhington, and that the wafer with which the letter was ſealed was ſtill wet; the ſignature being that of Mr. Lee, the colonel deſired the countryman to conduct him to that gentleman, which he complied with. The countryman was accordingly mounted behind one of the dragoons, and a party galloped to the houſe where Lee was: the guard fired upon the dragoons, by which one private man was killed, and a cornet wounded; a bullet paſſed through colonel Harcourt's helmet, but did not do him the leaſt injury. Lee was ſummoned to ſurrender, which he complied with, delivered up his ſword, and in the moſt earneſt manner interceded for his life, deſiring to come in under the proclamation. This, of courſe, could not be complied with; and he was carried to the head-quarters, and lodged on board one of his majeſty's ſhips. He was afterwards exchanged for ſome of the king's officers, whom the provincials had taken priſoners.

The parliament met on the laſt day of October, when his majeſty opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne, in which the king gave them to underſtand, that they muſt, at all events, prepare for another campaign; nor did his majeſty doubt, but that his faithful commons would readily and cheerfully grant him ſuch ſupplies, as the maintenance of the hononr of his crown, the vindication of the juſt rights of parliament, and the public welfare, ſhould be found in need of.

The conſideration of the ſupplies was the firſt buſineſs entered on; when a motion was made, that forty-five thouſand ſeamen, including ten thouſand one hundred and twenty-nine marines, be employed for the ſervice of the enſuing year. This motion produced ſome debates, but was at length carried by a great majority. At the ſame time a reſolution paſſed, for allowing four pounds per man per month for the maintenance and wages of every ſeaman. The committee of ways and means, after a motion made for the purpoſe, reſolved, that the land-tax ſhould be four ſhillings in the pound for 1777.

A proclamation was iſſued by his majeſty on the ſecond of November, for a general faſt to be kept throughout England on the thirteenth of December following. It was alſo appointed to be held on the ſame day in Ireland, and in Scotland on the twelfth.

Before the holidays commenced, the money granted by parliament for defraying the expences of the navy, including the ordinary at four hundred thouſand and five pounds; and the building and repairing of ſhips, which was voted at four hundred and ſixty-five thouſand five hundred pounds, amounted to no leſs than three millions, two hundred and five thouſand five hundred and five pounds, excluſive of four thouſand pounds voted afterwards to Greenwich hoſpital, and a million granted towards the diſcharge of the navy debt. The ſupplies being ſo far granted, and no public buſineſs of any moment in the way, an early and long receſs took place, the houſe adjourning on the ſecond of December to the twenty-firſt of January next.

An extraordinary event terminated this year, which for ſome time cauſed great ſuſpicion and confuſion. At the admiralty office, advice was received by expreſs, that a fire had broke out in the rope-houſe of his majeſty's yard at Portſmouth, about half an hour after four o'clock on Saturday afternoon, which burned with great violence, and conſumed the ſame, except the outer walls; but it was happily prevented from extending to any other buildings, and was at length totally extinguiſhed. How this accident, and another of the like nature at Briſtol happened, was for ſome time a myſtery; but at length it was diſcovered, that they took place by the machinations of a wretched enthuſiaſt and incendiary, ſince well known by the appellation of John the Painter, but whoſe real name was Aitken. When taken up and under examination, he refuſed anſwering any queſtions, and otherwiſe behaved in a very daring and reſolute manner. However, there appearing ſufficient reaſon to ſuppoſe him the guilty perſon, he was committed to Wincheſter jail. While there, he was circumvented by means of another painter, who being either an American, or having lived on that continent, through which Aitken had travelled, found means thereby, pretending at the ſame time to ſympathize in his misfortunes, and to hold principles ſimilar to his own, to obtain his confidence in priſon; until at length, being inſtructed and aſſiſted for the purpoſe, he fulfilled his intent, by drawing from him the whole hiſtory of his crimes. Upon his trial at Wincheſter, notwithſtanding the ſhock which the appearance and evidence of his pretended friend muſt have given, he behaved with the ſame boldneſs and addreſs which he had hitherto manifeſted; made a good defence, ſhrewd obſervations on the nature of the evidence, and the acknowledged baſeneſs of the witneſs, and received ſentence of death with the moſt perfect indifference. He ſent for one of the principal naval officers of Portſmouth, either going to, or at the place of execution, to whom he acknowledged his crime, and alſo gave ſome cautions with reſpect to the future preſervation of the royal yards from ſimilar dangers. This criminal was tried at Wincheſter on the ſixth of March, 1777, and from the heinouſneſs of his crime (of which he was found guilty) was on the 10th of the ſame month executed at the Dock-gate, Portſmouth.

A. D. 1777.

On the twenty-firſt of January, the parliament met purſuant to adjournment, and immediately proceeded on the buſineſs of the nation. The firſt thing that gained particular notice was, a bill brought into the lower houſe for granting commiſſions, or letters of marque and repriſal, as they are uſually called, to the owners or captains of private merchant ſhips, authoriſing them to take and make prize of all veſſels, with their effects, belonging to any of the inhabitants of the thirteen ſpecified revolted American colonies. This bill paſſed the commons without the leaſt oppoſition; nor did it produce much debate among the lords, with whom it only underwent the trifling alteration of inſerting the words "letters of commiſſion," in the place of "letters of marque," the latter being thought only applicable to repriſals on a foreign enemy. On the ſame day this bill paſſed the lords, a motion was made in the houſe of commons, for leave to bring in a bill to enable his majeſty to ſecure and detain perſons charged with or ſuſpected of the crime of high-treaſon committed in America, or on the high ſeas, or the crime of piracy. The bill being admitted, was, after great debates, read the firſt time; and a motion being made for the ſecond reading, it was carried by a great majority. It occaſioned much murmuring among the people; and during the ſhort time it was in agitation, a petition againſt it was preſented to the commons from the city of London. At the very next meeting of the members, the bill petitioned againſt was read the third time and paſſed. It met with more oppoſition in the upper than the lower houſe; but after the third reading, the queſtion being put, it was carried without further debate, and on the third of March received the royal aſſent. The next thing which engaged the attention of the commons was a meſſage from his majeſty, intimating his deſire, that his faithful commons would enable him to diſcharge charge the debts incurred by the expences of his houſhold, and at the ſame time make ſome further proviſion for the ſupport of the honour and dignity of his crown.

The houſe on the day appointed for taking this matter into conſideration, went into a committee of ſupply; and, after ſome debates, the following reſolutions were agreed to.

Reſolved, That it is the opinion of this committee, that the ſum of 618,240l. 9s. be granted to his majeſty, to diſcharge the arrears and debts due and owing on account of the civil liſt on the 5th of January, 1777.

Reſolved, That it is the opinion of this committee, that the ſum of 100,000l. per annum be granted to his majeſty, over and above the yearly ſum of 800,000l. granted by an act made in the firſt year of his reign.

Theſe reſolutions being reported from the committee of ſupply to the whole houſe, the firſt was agreed to without any oppoſition; but the ſecond produced debates that continued for ſeveral hours, at the cloſe of which, however, it was agreed to by a great majority. In conſequence of theſe reſolutions a bill was immediately framed, which ſoon paſſed both houſes; and on the 7th of May received the royal aſſent. No other material matter occurred during the remainder of this ſeſſion. The national buſineſs being therefore finiſhed, on the 6th of June his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and after ſigning ſuch bills as were ready the parliament was prorogued.

We ſhall now return to America, where the war was ſtill proſecuted with the utmoſt vigour. Several ſkirmiſhes happened in the beginning of this year in the Jerſeys, with various ſucceſs. On the 23d and 24th of March, a great quantity of proviſions, ſtores, &c. with barracks and ſtorehouſes belonging to the provincials, were deſtroyed by the king's troops at Peek's Hill, upon the North River. The cruizers belonging to lord Howe and commodore Hotham's fleet, continued to take many prizes. In Connecticut, the king's troops deſtroyed a great quantity of ſtores at Danbury on the 27th of April.

General Burgoyne, with the northern army, proceeded to Ticonderago and Fort Independence, which he took poſſeſſion of on the 6th of July; and found in them great quantities of ſtores and proviſions, beſides what he deſtroyed at Skeneſborough. Soon after this he took poſſeſſion of Fort Edward, which the provincials abandoned; and then proceeded to Saratoga, where they were ſtrongly defended.

The troops under the command of general Howe had an engagement with the provincials on the heights of Brandy-wine, on the 11th of September, in which many were killed and wounded on both ſides, and 400 provincials taken priſoners. On the 25th the army marched in two columns to German Town; and lord Cornwallis, with the Britiſh grenadiers, and two battalions of Heſſian grenadiers, took poſſeſſion of Philadelphia early the next day.

The enemy on the 3d of October, having received a reinforcement of 1500 men from Peek's Hill, 1000 from Virginia, and preſuming upon the army being much weakened by the detachments to Philadelphia and Jerſey, thought it a favourable time for them to riſk an action. They accordingly marched at ſix o'clock in the evening of the 3d, from their camp near Skippach Creek, about 16 miles from German Town. This village forms one continued ſtreet for two miles, which the line of encampment, in the poſition the army then occupied, croſſed at right angles, near a mile from the head of it, where the ſecond battalion of light infantry and the 40th regiment were poſted.

On the fourth, at three o'clock in the morning, the patroles diſcovered the enemy's approach; and upon the communication of this intelligence, the army was immediately ordered under arms. Soon after the break of day, the enemy began their attack upon the ſecond light infantry, which they ſuſtained for a conſiderable time, ſupported by the fortieth regiment; but at length, being overpowered by increaſing numbers, the light infantry, and a part of the fortieth retired into the village, when lieutenant-colonel Muſgrave, with ſix companies of the latter corps, threw himſelf into a large ſtone houſe in the face of the enemy, which, though ſurrounded by a brigade, and attacked by four pieces of cannon, he moſt gallantly defended, until major-general Grey, at the head of three battalions of the third brigade, turning his front to the village, and brigadier-general Agnew, who covered major-general Grey's left with the fourth brigade, by a vigorous attack repulſed the enemy, that had penetrated into the upper part of the village, which was done with great ſlaughter; the fifth and fifty-fifth regiments from the right, engaging them at the ſame time on the other ſide of the village, completed the defeat of the enemy in this quarter.

Major-general Grant, who was upon the right, moved up the forty-ninth regiment with four pieces of cannon to the left of the fourth regiment, about the time major-general Grey had forced the enemy in the village; and then advancing with the right wing, the enemy's left gave way, and was purſued through a ſtrong country between four and five miles. The enemy retired near twenty miles by ſeveral roads to Perkiomy Creek, and encamped upon Skippach Creek, about eighteen miles diſtant. By withdrawing their cannon early in the day they were all preſerved.

The provincials, on the 16th of October, under the command of general Gates, having ſurrounded general Burgoyne's army at Saratoga, the latter thought proper to enter into articles of capitulation; by which himſelf and his troops, were to have a free paſſage to Great Britain, after laying down their arms.

On the twentieth of November the parliament met, when his majeſty opened the ſeſſion in uſual form. The ſupplies being granted, and ſeveral bills ready, among which was one for ſuſpending the Habeas Corpus, his majeſty adjourned the parliament on the 10th of December.

A.D. 1778.

On the 23d of January, both houſes re-aſſembled, and on the 6th of February the houſe was full, to hear Mr. Burke's motion. The honourable member began with an awful ſolemnity to prepare their minds, and incline them to adopt his ſentiments, and join him in his endeavours to make the houſe as ſenſible as he was, of the many barbarities which he ſaid had been committed during the war in America. Adminiſtration, lord Dunmore, and general Burgoyne, were placed upon the carpet; and the ſhare they had in the barbarities complained of, held up to view. The whole ſpeech, though it laſted three hours, was no more than a preface to his motion. When he thought he had ſaid ſufficient for his purpoſe, he moved, that copies of the treaties entered into with the Indians, ſhould be laid before the houſe.

Thoſe of the oppoſite ſide vindicated the Indians from the reflections thrown on them. The facts urged as proofs of the untameable and ungovernable rage of the Indians, it was ſaid were by much exaggerated; owed a great deal of their horror to the fancy of the orator; and, ſuch as they were, ought to be deemed the acts of a few lawleſs banditti of their body, who equally diſclaimed obedience to our commanders and their own; and not to be attributed to the nation, who, to the knowledge of many members of the houſe, had often acted with a degree of humanity which might make even Chriſtians bluſh. The freeing the negroes by lord Dunmore, was juſtified on the ground of neceſſity; it was impoſſible poſſible to raiſe men otherwiſe to recover our juſt rights; every private conſideration ſhould give way to promote the public good. The debate was warm, intereſting, and laſted near ſeven hours. The queſtion being put, the numbers for it were one hundred and thirty-ſeven, againſt it two hundred and twenty-three; it was accordingly rejected by a majority of eighty-ſix.

Lord North, on the nineteenth of February, preſented to the houſe, a bill to enable his majeſty to appoint commiſſioners to treat, conſent, and agree on the means of quieting the diſorders ſubſiſting in certain of the colonies, plantations, and provinces of America: alſo a bill for declaring the intention of the parliament of Great Britain, concerning the exerciſe of the right of impoſing taxes on the colonies. Another bill of a conciliatory nature was likewiſe paſſed. But the apparent intent of theſe bills, ſeemed in ſome meaſure defeated by the recent treaty of amity and commerce, which the Americans and the court of France had now entered into.

The French having laid an embargo on all ſhipping in their ports, and having previouſly fitted out a large fleet, it was thought neceſſary to call out the militia of England on the twenty-ſecond of March, and encamp them, in order to oppoſe any deſigned invaſion; and on March the twenty-ſeventh an order was iſſued for detaining in the ports of England all French ſhips. On the thirteenth of April commiſſioners were appointed to go with conciliatory terms to America; and a proper proviſion was made for the younger branches of the royal family on the ſixteenth of the ſame month.

On the ſeventh of April, the houſe of lords went into a committee of enquiry, purſuant to notice given by his grace the duke of Richmond on a former day, when lord Chatham roſe, in the courſe of the enquiry, and after lamenting that his bodily infirmities had ſo long, and at ſo important a criſis, prevented his attendance on the duties of parliament, he declared that he had made an effort, almoſt beyond the powers of his conſtitution, to come down to the houſe on that day, to expreſs his indignation at the puſillanimous idea of giving up the dependence of America, through the apprehenſions of a war with France. He ſhould think himſelf guilty of the deepeſt treachery, if he could ever ſubſcribe to American independence. He ſpoke in a kind of enthuſiaſtic rapture of the paſt glories of the houſe of Brunſwic; and aſked, who was the man that would dare to give up any part of its dominions? Who would dare to diſinherit the prince of Wales, the biſhop of Oſnaburgh, and all the fair hopes of that beloved family of proteſtant princes, deſcended from the body of the revered princeſs Sophia? His lordſhip cut his ſpeech ſhort from extreme weakneſs, when the duke of Richmond again roſe; and when his grace came near the end of his reply, lord Chatham's great ſoul ſeemed agitated with ſome big thought; and after the duke had ſat down, his lordſhip attempted to riſe; but his feelings proved too ſtrong for his debilitated conſtitution, and ſuddenly preſſing his hand on his ſtomach, he fell into a convulſive fit. The whole houſe was in the greateſt alarm poſſible; the bar cleared; the windows thrown open; but to no effect. Very fortunately, Dr. Brockleſby happened to be below the bar of the houſe of lords to hear the debates when his lordſhip dropt, who immediately flew to his relief, and exerted all his humanity and ſkill for the recovery of ſo illuſtrious a character. His endeavours ſoon prevailed, and his lordſhip recovered his ſenſes: but on the arrival of Dr. Addington (his lordſhip's family phyſician) both the medical gentlemen thought it neceſſary to have his lordſhip no further removed than to Mr. Strutt's (the clerk of the houſe of lords) left the motion of a carriage might again affect his ſpirits. As ſoon as his lordſhip had been taken out of the houſe, the duke of Richmond ſaid, ſuch an event muſt have deranged their minds too much to proceed on the debate; he would therefore ſubmit it to them to adjourn the motion. This meeting their lordſhip's concurrence, the houſe adjourned to the enſuing day.

On the twelfth of May, to the great regret of the nation, our great ſtateſman, the earl of Chatham, departed this life, at his ſeat at Hayes, in Kent. He had ſerved his country with fidelity and ſucceſs; and the ſplendor of its atchievements departed with him. This great ornament of human nature, and glory of the Engliſh nation, the right honourable William Pitt, was earl of Chatham, viſcount Pitt of Burton Pynſent in Somerſetſhire, F. R. S. and prime miniſter of this kingdom. He was born Nov. the 15th, in 1708. He took the helm of ſtate at a very critical and dangerous criſis; and by his great abilities reſcued this nation from the perilous ſituation in which he found it, and carried its reputation to a high pitch of glory. His lordſhip was created a peer by the above titles, the thirtieth of July, 1766. He married lady Heſter, ſiſter to earl Temple, who was created baroneſs of Chatham, the fourteenth of December, 1761. His title devolved on his eldeſt ſon, John, lord Viſcount Pitt, born the twenty-eighth of October, 1756. The citizens of London, ever grateful to real patriots, have erected, in their Guildhall, a new cenotaph to the memory of the earl of Chatham; and the Britiſh nation honoured his merit by a public funeral, and a public monument among her illuſtrious characters in Weſtminſter abbey.

The royal aſſent was given, on the twenty-eighth, to a bill for the relief of the Roman catholics; and about the ſame time an embargo was laid on all foreign veſſels in the ports of England. On the ſecond of June his majeſty went in ſtate to the houſe of peers; when having given his aſſent to ſeveral bills, particularly one for ſettling an annuity on the deſcendants of the late earl of Chatham, the parliament was prorogued.

At this time admiral Keppel who had ſailed with a fleet, not ſufficient in point of force, for the purpoſe of attacking the French, returned to England for reinforcement, which having obtained, he again put to ſea. On July the twenty-ſeventh the two grand fleets met, and came to an engagement off Uſhant; the iſſue of which (in conſequence of an accuſation laid by Sir Hugh Palliſer, vice-admiral, againſt the chief commander) produced great diſſentions. The engagement was repreſented in ſuch a light by Sir Hugh Palliſer, as to ſtigmatize the reputation of the admiral; Mr. Keppel, however, vindicated his character in parliament on the ſecond of December; notwithſtanding which, Sir Hugh Palliſer exhibited his charges againſt him on the ſeventeenth of the ſame month at the admiralty. The bill for his trial on land received the royal aſſent on the twenty-fourth enſuing: his trial accordingly began on the ſeventh of January, 1779, and ended on the firſt of February, when he was unanimouſly acquitted with the greateſt honour, and the proſecution pronounced to be malicious. On his acquittal the moſt general demonſtrations of joy took place, and the greateſt illuminations, perhaps ever known, enſued in moſt of the cities, towns, &c. throughout the kingdom. He likewiſe received the united thanks of the houſe of lords, houſe of commons, the lord-mayor and common-council of the city of London (who preſented him with the freedom of the city in a box made of heart of oak, and richly ornamented with gold) and of many other cities, towns, corporations, &c. &c. &c.

General Clinton, on the eighteenth of June, evacuated Philadelphia. He was attacked on his march by the provincials, whoſe object appeared to be the gaining poſſeſſion of the Britiſh baggage: but in this they were diſappointed, and every where repulſed, by means of the judicious manner in which general Clinton had diſpoſed his troops. After this event the earl of Carliſle, Mr. Eden, and governor Johnſtone, were ſent as commiſſioners from Great Britain, to treat of a pacification with America, but did not meet with that ſucceſs that every true lover of both countries could wiſh. About the ſame time the iſlands of St. Pierre and Miquelon were taken from the French, by admiral Montague's fleet; in oppoſition to which, the iſland of Dominica was by an armament of French and Americans from Martinico captured.

December the eleventh, admiral Barrington, (who ſucceeded lord Howe in the command of the Britiſh fleet) and a body of forces under general Grant, ſeized on the iſland of St. Lucia, one of the Antilles belonging to the French. It was afterwards attempted to be retaken by count d'Eſtaing, but he was repulſed both by ſea and land, and was obliged to leave the iſland much diſconcerted. On the fourth of January the enſuing year, Georgia ſurrendered to a detachment of Britiſh troops, and many inhabitants of that colony and of the Carolinas came in and joined the royaliſts.

A.D. 1779. On the 6th of July a deſperate engagement was fought between the Engliſh, commanded by admiral Barrington, and the French by count d'Eſtaing, in which the French claimed the victory. The Engliſh commander was wounded, and loſt near two hundred men; but no ſhips were taken on either ſide. M. d'Eſtaing, being afterwards joined by a body of Americans under general Lincoln, made an attack on the Britiſh lines at Savannah, but was repulſed with great ſlaughter, and himſelf wounded; ſoon after which the American coaſts were abandoned by the French.

On the eighteenth of Auguſt the combined fleets of France and Spain took their departure from Plymouth, without attempting any hoſtilities, except in the attack of the Ardent man of war, captain Boteler, who defended himſelf heroically againſt two frigates, and three ſeventy-fours of the enemy, for near three hours, but was at laſt obliged to ſtrike to this unequal force, after having every yard, and her main-maſt ſhot away. The fleet of the enemy, conſiſting of ſixty ſail of the line, twenty frigates, and tranſports, made their appearance on the morning of the fourteenth, and in a few hours arrived off Cauſand-bay, where they lay to, in two grand diviſions, for four days, till their departure. As ſoon as it was high water on Wedneſday evening, count d'Orvilliers' ſhip fired a gun to leeward, which was returned by that of count d'Arce, the Spaniſh admiral, on which the two diviſions tacked immediately, and ſtood to the ſouthward. On Thurſday morning they were barely diſcernable, with the beſt glaſſes, ſteering the ſame courſe, and by noon were totally out of ſight. The conſternation occaſioned by the firſt appearance of this vaſt naval armament was certainly great, the inhabitants flying with what valuable effects they could get together, ſo that the town was preſently left to thoſe only who meant gallantly to defend it; and to the credit of the country, the place of the female and infirm fugitives was more than doubly ſupplied by the able volunteers who flocked in from all parts. The garriſon, which conſiſted of four thouſand effective men, were under arms night and day, as were the officers and artificers of the dock, about two thouſand more; and, from the general diſpoſition, they would have defended the place to the laſt extremity. The vigilance and ſpirit of the officers ſoon got the better of the firſt momentary panic, and not a man was to be found within twenty miles of the place that did not arm himſelf, and bravely reſolve to ſhed his blood in defence of his country. The warmeſt encomiums are due to lord Shuldham, who commanded at that part, and the reſt of the officers, naval as well as military, whoſe activity and zeal ſerved to raiſe a glorious animation that pervaded the whole kingdom.

The Counteſs of Scarborough armed ſhip, and Serapis frigate, having the fleet from the Baltic under their convoy, were attacked, between Flamborough head, and Scarborough, by Paul Jones's ſquadron, when, after a ſevere engagement, in which the Serapis loſt her main-maſt, bowſprit, and mizen top-maſt, and was otherwiſe much ſhattered, as was alſo the Counteſs of Scarborough, they were both taken. The merchant ſhips were ſeparated during the action, part of which had taken ſhelter on the coaſt near Scarborough, and two were arrived at Hull. In captain Pearſon's letter to the lords commiſſioners of the admiralty, he gives the following account of this obſtinate engagement. "We at length dropt along ſide of each other, head and ſtern, when the fluke of our ſpare anchor hooking his quarter, we became ſo cloſe fore and aft, that the muzzles of our guns touched each other's ſides. In this poſition we engaged from half paſt eight till half paſt ten, during which time, from the great quantity and variety of combuſtible matter which they threw in upon our decks, chains, and in ſhort into every part of the ſhip, we were on fire ten or twelve times in different places, and it was with the greateſt difficulty and exertion imaginable, at times, that we were able to get it extinguiſhed. At the ſame time the largeſt of the two frigates kept ſailing round us the whole action, and raking us fore and aft, by which means ſhe killed or wounded almoſt every man on the quarter and main decks. About half paſt nine, either from a hand grenade being thrown at one of our lower-deck ports, or from ſome other accident, a cartridge of powder was ſet on fire, the flames of which running from cartridge to cartridge all the way aft, blew up the whole of the people and officers that were quartered abaft the main-maſt, from which unfortunate circumſtance all thoſe guns were rendered uſeleſs for the remainder of the action, and I fear the greateſt part of the people will loſe their lives. At ten o'clock they called for quarters from the ſhip along-ſide, and ſaid they had ſtruck. Hearing this, I called upon the captain to know if they had ſtruck, or if he aſked for quarters; but no anſwer being made, after repeating my words two or three times, I called for the boarders, and ordered them to board, which they did; but the moment they were on board her, they diſcovered a ſuperior number lying under cover with pikes in their hands ready to receive them, on which our people retreated inſtantly into our own ſhip, and returned to their guns again till half paſt ten, when the frigate coming acroſs our ſtern, and pouring her broadſide into us again, without our being able to bring a gun to bear on her, I found it in vain, and, in ſhort, impracticable, from the ſituation we were in, to ſtand out any longer with the leaſt proſpect of ſucceſs; I therefore ſtruck (our main-maſt at the ſame time went by the board). The firſt lieutenant and myſelf were immediately eſcorted into the ſhip along-ſide, when we found her to be an American ſhip of war, called the Bon Homme Richard, of forty guns and three hundred and ſeventy-five men, commanded by captain Paul Jones; the other frigate which engaged us, to be the Alliance, of forty guns, and three hundred men; and the third frigate which engaged and took the Counteſs of Scarborough after two hours action, to be the Pallas, a French frigate of thirty-two guns, and two hundred and ſeventy-five men; the Vengeance, an armed brig of twelve guns and ſeventy men, all in Congreſs ſervice, and under the command of Paul Jones." This action of our gallant commander happened on the twenty-fifth of September.

tember. It occaſioned a ſpirited memorial from the Engliſh court, to the States of Holland, and open acts of hoſtility ſoon after followed.

Another bloody engagement took place in the month of October between the Quebec frigate, which was blown up in an action with a French forty gun ſhip, about fourteen leagues S. W. of Uſhant; of which the following narrative is given by Mr. James George, lieutenant of the Rambler cutter, the Quebec's conſort. "Wedneſday, the ſixth inſtant, at day-break, we diſcovered three ſail to leeward. Captain Farmer made the ſignal for the Rambler to come under his ſtern, which I obeyed; he then aſked me what I thought of them; I told him a ſhip, a cutter, and a Dutch hoy; he replied, he would go down and ſee what they were, and ordered me to keep cloſe to him. At half paſt eight we plainly perceived two of them to be a large French frigate, and a cutter. At ten the Quebec, being within point blank ſhot of the enemy, hoiſted her colours, and returned their fire, ſtill edging down to come to a cloſer engagement, till ſhe was along-ſide the French frigate. Immediately I hoiſted my colours, and ſtood in between the French frigate and the cutter, with an intent to bring her to a cloſe engagement, which I effected at eleven o'clock. I found her force to be ſixteen ſix pounders, and full of men. We continued to engage her, cloſe along-ſide, till within a few minutes of two o'clock, when ſhe ſet all the ſail ſhe could croud, and bore from us, we not having had the luck to carry away any thing material; and the Rambler having her garf ſhot away, her top-maſt ſhot through, the top-ſail haliyards, and moſt of her ſtanding and running rigging gone, and the mainſail rendered unſerviceable, was incapable of following her with any hopes of coming up with her; at the ſame time ſeeing both the frigates diſmaſted, and the Quebec take fire, I endeavoured to get as near the Quebec as poſſible, in hopes of ſaving ſome of her men; but there being little wind, and a large ſwell, found I could aſſiſt her no other way but by hoiſting out our boat, which I effected, and ſent the maſter and five men armed in her, who picked up one maſter's mate, two young midſhipmen, and fourteen more of the Quebec's people, the enemy's frigate at the ſame time firing at the boat. As the Rambler was at a conſiderable diſtance, to leeward of the Quebec, I thought it would be in vain to ſend a ſecond time. I want words ſufficient to deſcribe the noble and gallant manner of captain Farmer's engaging the enemy for upwards of three hours and an half that he lay along-ſide the frigate, which carried twenty-eight eighteen pounders on her main-deck, and twelve guns on her quarter-deck and forecaſtle. The Quebec continued burning very fiercely, with her colours flying, till ſix o'clock, when ſhe blew up."

Thirteen of the brave crew were taken from the wreck by a Pruſſian veſſel, who put them into a Topſham pilot-boat; theſe with the few abovementioned were all who were ſaved; the remainder periſhed either by the fire or water, among whom was the intrepid captain Farmer, deſervedly, and to this day, lamented both by his friends and country. The engagement began about nine o'clock in the morning, yard-arm and yard-arm, and laſted till two, when the Frenchman ceaſed firing.

The officers and garriſon of Omoa, ſurrendered that fort to the honourable captain John Luttrell, of his majeſty's ſhip the Charon, and William Dalrymple, Eſq; commander of the land forces, on the twenty-fourth of October. The officers, ſoldiers, and ſeamen, exerted themſelves upon every point of duty in a diſtinguiſhed manner: but of the various proofs of an undaunted and elevated mind, during the eſcalade, we muſt not omit that of a brave Britiſh tar, which amazed the Spaniards, and gave them a very high idea of Engliſh valour: not contented with one cutlaſs, he had ſcrambled up the walls with two; and meeting a Spaniſh officer without arms, who had been rouſed out of his ſleep, had the generoſity not to take any advantage, but, preſenting him one of his cutlaſſes told him, 'You are now on a footing with me.'—The orders were not to ſpare while they reſiſted, but to grant quarters to all who requeſted it. Only two Spaniards were wounded by the bayonet in reſiſting, nor was any perſon plundered or pillaged.

A. D. 1780.

On the ſixteenth of January a ſignal victory was obtained, by admiral Rodney, over the Spaniſh fleet, commanded by Don Juan Langara, off Cape St. Vincent's; by means of which the fortreſs of Gibraltar, then beſieged by the Spaniards, and the people in great diſtreſs for want of proviſions, were happily relieved. In this action the Spaniſh admiral and ſeven ſhips, the greateſt part of his ſquadron, were either taken or deſtroyed. On the eleventh of May Charles Town ſurrendered to Sir Henry Clinton; in which were taken ſeveral officers, a commodore, ten continental regiments, and three battalions of artillery, with a great number of American and French ſeamen; in all ſix thouſand men in arms, beſides ſeveral armed ſhips, and four hundred pieces of cannon. On the ſeventeenth, a very ſmart engagement took place between the Engliſh fleet, commanded by admiral Rodney, and the French under M. de Guichen, near Martinico. It laſted for ſome time, and in the end proved unfavourable to the French, though neither ſide loſt any ſhips.

A victory was obtained over the American army under general Gates, by the Britiſh army under lord Cornwallis, on the ſixteenth of Auguſt. The loſs of the Americans was about nine hundred ſlain, among whom was brigadier general Gregory; and about one thouſand were taken priſoners. Soon after this action lieutenant-colonel Tarleton defeated general Sumpter's army, which was greatly ſuperior to his own, taking about three hundred priſoners, and two pieces of cannon.

General Arnold (one of the chief commanders of the American forces) deſerted that ſervice in November; his defection occaſioned the melancholy cataſtrophe of major Andree, adjutant-general of the Britiſh army, commanded by Sir Henry Clinton. Arnold, before he eſcaped, had, with major Andree, concerted a plan for ſurprizing the American army. This ſcheme, however, failed, and Andree, being taken as a ſpy, was, by order of general Waſhington, executed. It is aſſerted that the officers who formed the council of war that condemned him, wept when his ſentence was pronounced. Univerſally beloved and eſteemed, he was only twenty-ſeven years old when he died; and though he had ſerved but eight years, his merit promiſed to raiſe him ſoon to the higheſt honours. Beſides his military talents, he was remarkable for a well cultivated genius, and had diſtinguiſhed himſelf by many agreeable fugitive pieces. In ſhort, every thing ſeemed to conſpire to render his melancholy end ſtill more affecting.

On the twenty-firſt of December was publiſhed, in a Gazette extraordinary, his majeſty's manifeſto, wherein ſeveral ſtriking allegations were ably ſupported, tending to prove, that the States, particularly Amſterdam, had, in various inſtances, been guilty of an infraction of the law of nations, and a flagrant violation of public faith. In conſequence of which the king had ordered his ambaſſador to withdraw from the Hague; and was determined to purſue ſuch vigorous meaſures as the occaſion fully juſtified, his own dignity, and the intereſts of his people demanded.

This year teemed with diſturbances at home of a very ſingular nature; which took their riſe from an aversion

The Unfortunate DEATH of MAJOR ANDRE

(Adjutant General to the English Army) at Head Quarters in New York Oct.r 2. 1780, who was found within the American Lines in the character of a Spy.

All the Prisoners to the amount of 300 were released this Night.

The Devastations occasioned by the RIOTERS of LONDON Firing the New Goal of NEWGATE, averſion to a relaxation of the penal laws againſt papiſts. Aſſociations were formed for defending the proteſtant religion from the incroachments of popery; and of one of thoſe aſſemblies, called the Proteſtant Aſſociation, lord George Gordon was invited to become the preſident, and with this invitation he complied. A petition was framed, and ſigned by the aſſociators, complaining of the late act for repealing the ſeverities of an act of the 10th and 11th of William III. and this petition lord George Gordon undertook to preſent to the houſe of commons. An advertiſement was publiſhed, with the ſignature of lord George, inviting the members of the aſſociation to meet in St. George's Fields, on Friday the ſecond of June, in order to attend the preſentation of their petition to the houſe of commons. In purſuance of this advertiſement between thirty and forty thouſand people aſſembled at the time appointed, and accompanied lord George to the houſe. On their arrival there, lord George moved for leave to preſent the petition, but it being agreed to poſtpone it till another day, the multitude were ſo irritated, that they immediately divided themſelves into parties, ſome going to the Romiſh chapel in Duke-ſtreet, Lincoln's-inn-fields, and others to that in Warwick-ſtreet, Golden-ſquare, both which buildings they in a great meaſure demoliſhed in a very ſhort time. This was the commencement of the deſtruction which afterwards took place. The people became more and more outrageous, nor had the pacific meaſures taken by ſeveral of the magiſtrates the leaſt effect. On the Sunday afternoon they deſtroyed the chapel near Moorfields, together with ſeveral houſes in the neighbourhood belonging to Roman catholics. The appearance of the rabble was much more formidable and alarming on the Monday. The chapel in Virginia-lane, Wapping, and Nightingale-lane, Eaſt-Smithfield, were deſtroyed by different parties, as were alſo ſeveral houſes belonging to people in very reputable conditions.

All the military in London were ordered on Tueſday upon duty at both houſes of parliament, St. James's, the Tower, &c. But notwithſtanding theſe precautions, the fury of the rioters continued to increaſe. They that day deſtroyed ſeveral houſes belonging to Roman catholics, and in the evening a party of them appeared before Newgate, and demanded an immediate releaſe of all the priſoners. Mr. Akerman (the maſter of the priſon) declared himſelf reſolved to do his duty, upon which they broke the windows of his dwelling-houſe, and proceeded to batter the doors with pickaxes and ſledge hammers; and climbing by means of ladders, the walls of the building, they entered at the windows, threw Mr. Akerman's furniture into the ſtreet, and committed them to the flames. In conſequence of theſe exceſſes, all the priſoners amounting to about three hundred, were releaſed, among whom were four under ſentence of death, and ordered for execution on the following Thurſday.—Having done this they fell on the priſon itſelf, which, though the ſtrongeſt in England. and lately erected at an immenſe expence, they ſoon demoliſhed, leaving nothing more ſtanding than the bare walls. The ſame night another party ſet fire to the houſe of lord Mansfield in Bloomſbury-ſquare, which was entirely conſumed, together with a collection of pictures of great value, and many of the ſcarceſt manuſcripts in the poſſeſſion of any private perſon in the world; beſides all, his lordſhip's notes on great law caſes, and the conſtitution of England. The military arrived in Bloomſbury, but not till the miſchievous intentions of the rabble had taken effect. However, they were under the neceſſity of firing in their own defence, and ſix men and a woman were killed, and many others wounded. The ſame night they deſtroyed the houſe of juſtice Cox, in Great Queen-ſtreet, and that of Sir John Fielding in Bow-ſtreet. They alſo ſet all the priſoners in New Priſon, Clerkenwell, at liberty. On Wedneſday they deſtroyed the King's Bench and Fleet priſons, ſetting all the debtors at liberty; and to ſuch lengths did they go that they threatened to deſtroy the Bank, and other public buildings. It now became neceſſary to give the military diſcretionary powers. For the protection of the Bank, guards were placed before that building, as alſo within the Royal Exchange, St. Paul's Church-yard, and ſeveral of the public courts; and almoſt every place tenable as a fortification, became a receptacle for armed troops. Two houſes, one at the bottom, and the other about the middle of Holborn, belonging to Mr. Langdale, an eminent diſtiller, were ſet fire to, and entirely conſumed, as were the dwellings of many other individuals profeſſing the Roman catholic faith.

Two attacks were made by the rioters upon the Bank, and one upon the Pay-office. The importance of theſe places rendered it neceſſary to ſhew but little lenity; and many perſons were killed and wounded by the ſoldiery. Two men and a chimney-ſweeper's apprentice were ſhot in the Fleet-market; and three men were ſhot dead upon Black-Friars-bridge, the toll-houſes of which were deſtroyed. Numbers alſo fell ſacrifices to inebriation, particularly at the diſtilleries of Mr. Langdale, from whoſe veſſels the liquor ran down the ſtreets in ſuch quantities, that it was taken up in pails, and held up to the mouths of the intoxicated multitude; many of whom actually killed themſelves by exceſſive drinking of non-rectified ſpirits, and were either burnt to death, or buried in the ruins, from which about twenty of theſe miſerable wretches were dragged out, ſeveral of whom were quite dead. Some diſturbances likewiſe happened in the Borough, where ſeveral individuals ſuffered conſiderably in their property; but by the interpoſition of the military the rioters were ſoon diſperſed.

There were great numbers of theſe deluded people taken up, and afterwards, by a ſpecial commiſſion granted for that purpoſe, tried for their lives, of which the following is a general liſt:

During the week of theſe diſturbances lord George Gordon (who was conſidered as the inſtigator of them) was taken into cuſtody, and, after a long examination before the privy-council, was committed to the Tower. On the fifth of February following, 1781, he was tried in the court of King's Bench, Weſtminſter, for high-treaſon, and levying war, inſurrection and rebellion, againſt the king, by aſſembling a great number of armed perſons on the ſecond of June in the preceding year, and diſturbing the peace, &c. The trial laſted from half paſt eight on Monday morning, till five o'clock the next morning, when his lordſhip was acquitted.

A. D. 1781

About two in the morning of the ſixth of January, the French made a deſcent on the iſland of Jerſey, but in their attempting to land, four of their tranſport veſſels were wrecked upon the rocks, and upwards of two hundred men periſhed. Thoſe, however, who did land made their way into the moſt interior part of the iſland, where they met with a warm repulſe from the garriſon, great numbers of them being killed, many taken priſoners, and the reſt obliged by a precipitate retreat to ſave themſelves.

About the beginning of the month of February admiral Rodney, commander of the Britiſh fleet in the Weſt Indies, in conjunction with general Vaughan, commander of the land forces, poſſeſſed themſelves of the Iſland of St. Euſtatius, belonging to the Dutch, which ſurrendered at diſcretion; but upwards of twenty ſhips, laden with property captured there, were taken by the French fleet in their paſſage home. They likewiſe made themſelves maſters of the iſlands of St. Martin, Saba and St. Bartholomew, belonging to the French, together with the two valuable Dutch colonies of Demerary and Eſſequibo, both ſituated on the Spaniſh coaſt.

Throughout the month of March, there was little done in America with reſpect to bringing the war to a period; though in moſt of the actions the Britiſh forces came off victors, and found means to take and deſtroy great quantities of ordnance, ammunition, ſtores, &c. in Virginia. They likewiſe defeated general Green's army at Guildford, on the fifteenth of the ſame month, after a ſharp engagement, in which ſeveral Engliſh officers of rank, and a great number of privates, were killed and wounded. The Britiſh troops having for ſome time had poſſeſſion of Camden, lord Rawdon, with colonel Weſton's detachment being near it, and cloſely purſued by the American general Green, after the battle of Guildford, wherein the Britiſh troops proved victorious, ſet fire to that beautiful town, and reduced it to aſhes, after which he retired to within a ſmall diſtance of Charles-Town for ſafety.

Commodore Johnſtone's fleet, with a number of India ſhips under convoy, was attacked on the 16th of April by the French fleet under M. de Suffrein off the iſland of St. Jago, which was attended with great loſs and damage on both ſides. Some of the India ſhips were taken by the French, but they not being able to retain the whole, ſeveral eſcaped, and rejoining the Engliſh fleet, arrived ſafe in England. In June, the iſland of Tobago in the Weſt Indies was taken from the Engliſh by a body of land forces, commanded by the French governor of St. Vincent's, under cover of a large fleet of ſhips of war commanded by M. de Graſſe.

On the ſixth of Auguſt, admiral Hyde Parker fell in with the Dutch ſquadron, with a large convoy on the Dogger-bank. The latter had eight ſhips of the line, and the former ſeven. The engagement was very hot for ſome time, and great damage was done on both ſides; but at length the Dutch thought proper to bear away for the Texel, and the Engliſh were too much diſabled to follow them. One of the Dutch men of war of ſeventy-four guns was ſunk, and the whole crew were loſt.

During the month of September, colonel Tarleton was defeated at Glouceſter by the Sieur de Choiſy, after which the allied armies of France and America marched againſt the Britiſh forces commanded by lord Cornwallis. The intrenchments were opened in two attacks, above and below York River, in the night between the ſixth and ſeventh of October, and different engagements took place till the ſeventeenth, when lord Cornwallis finding the enemy too powerful, was obliged to capitulate, and he, with his whole army were made priſoners of war. There were found in the poſts of York and Glouceſter ſix thouſand regular troops, twenty-two pair of colours, one thouſand five hundred ſeamen, one hundred and ſixty pieces of cannon of different calibres, of which ſeventy-five were braſs; eight mortars; about forty ſhips, one of them of fifty guns, which was burnt. Twenty tranſports were ſunk; the Guadaloupe, a frigate of twenty-four guns, was one of the number.

A. D. 1782.

The conjunctive forces of France and Spain laid ſiege to Minorca in February. The honourable general Murray, governor of the place, oppoſed them for ſeveral days with great reſolution, but his troops were ſo diſabled, by a ſcorbutic diſorder prevailing among them, that they were at length obliged to ſubmit to the ſuperior power of the enemy. General Murray propoſed articles of capitulation to the conquerors, which being agreed to, he ſurrendered the fort of St. Philip to his Catholic majeſty, and then, with his troops, left it with all the honours of war. About the ſame time advice was received of the capture of the iſlands of St. Chriſtopher and Nevis in the Weſt Indies by the French, under the command of the marquis de Bouille. Major-general Shirley, governor of the place, held out, with the moſt diſtinguiſhed reſolution, for a conſiderable time; but at length, finding the enemy too powerful, was obliged to ſubmit, and, after a ſiege of above five weeks, compelled upon terms of capitulation, to ſurrender to the French arms.

All the nation was alarmed at the ſurrender of two armies attended by the fineſt train of artillery which ever entered the field; the cabinet began to talk in a more moderate ſtrain; miniſters lowered their tone, and in the parliament, aſſembled in laſt November, ſeveral of the leading members appeared deeply affected with our ſucceſſive diſgraces and loſſes. In the houſe of commons, it was inſiſted, that no circumſtances except a ſpeedy change of miniſterial meaſures, and the return of peace, could ſave the nation from irretrievable calamity. Mr. Duncombe aſſerted that the elective body of the people beheld the idea of proſecuting the American war with indignation and concern. On the twenty-ſecond of February in this year, general Conway made a motion correſponding with the above ſentiments, which was loſt by a majority of one only, the numbers for it being one hundred and ninety-three, againſt it one hundred and ninety-four: and on the twenty-ſeventh the ſame right honourable member made his ſecond motion againſt any further proſecution of an offenſive war againſt America, upon which the attorney-general moved, "that the debate be adjourned for a fortnight." A diviſion took place and the miniſter was left in a minority. After which the main queſtion was put and carried. General Conway then moved, "that an humble addreſs be preſented to his majeſty thereupon." This motion was carried without a diviſion. In conſequence of this addreſs, the following arrangement of a new miniſtry, extremely grateful to the people, was ſettled. Marquis of Rockingham, firſt lord of the treaſury. Lord Shelburne, and the honourable Charles Fox, ſecretaries of ſtate. Lord Camden, preſident of the council. Lord John Cavendiſh, chancellor of the exchequer. Admiral Keppel, firſt lord of the admiralty; and the duke of Richmond, maſter-general of the ordnance, &c. In May Mr. Wilkes moved, that the reſolution declaring his being expelled that houſe, and incapable of ſerving as a member of parliament, be expunged from the journals of the houſe. Mr. Wilkes, after many annual defeats, triumphed at laſt; for a diviſion taking place, there appeared for expunging the reſolution one hundred and fifteen, againſt it forty-ſeven.

During this month the public were exceedingly alarmed by the death of the marquis of Rockingham, the reſignation of Mr. Fox, and other members of the new cabinet. To pave the way for advances to a general peace, lord Shelburne was appointed to the office of firſt lord of the treaſury; and in his ſpeech in the houſe of lords he declared, that nothing was farther from his intention than to renew the war in America. The ſword was ſheathed never to be again drawn there.

A moſt obſtinate engagement commenced on the 12th of April, between the Engliſh fleet under the command of Sir George Brydges Rodney, and the French fleet commanded by the count de Graſſe, in the Weſt-Indies. The battle laſted with unremitting fury from ſeven o'clock in the morning till half-paſt ſix in the evening, when victory declared in favour of the Britiſh flag. The Ville de Paris, a ſhip of one hundred and ten guns, commanded by count de Graſſe, with four others of the line, were captured, and another of the line ſunk in the action. The Cæſar, one of thoſe taken, was blown up, and the whole crew, among whom were fifty Engliſh ſeamen, periſhed. The engagement was ſuſtained with the greateſt reſolution on both ſides. The day after the battle, the remainder of the French fleet diſperſed; but being purſued by a ſquadron under the command of Sir Samuel Hood, two others of their line of battle ſhips and two frigates were taken; by which the formidable power they had in the Weſt Indies was greatly reduced, and their deſign of poſſeſſing themſelves of the iſland of Jamaica (which they had long concerted) totally fruſtrated. Sir George Rodney, for his gallant behaviour, received the public thanks of the Britiſh ſenate; and was farther honoured, by being afterwards created a peer of the realm. But this glorious victory was not obtained without the loſs of many brave officers and ſeamen, two hundred and thirty having been killed, and ſeven hundred and fifty-nine wounded; among whom, every lover of his country will drop a tear to the memory of the right honourable lord Robert Manners, who was, while fighting with the moſt undaunted intrepidity, ſhot in different parts of his body, and at laſt wounded mortally, on board the Reſolution. The following anecdote, which is ſaid to be authentic, has been related of the French admiral, Count de Graſſe:

There was an Engliſh officer ſent to Martinico in a cartel, who was introduced to the Count on board the Ville de Paris. After ſome converſation on the buſineſs he went upon, the Count, in a gaſconading manner, deſired the officer to give his compliments to Sir George Rodney, and tell him, that he would be off Dominica on the ninth of April, and would be glad to meet Sir George. After the action of the twelfth, when the count was brought a priſoner on board one of our ſhips, the ſame officer was there, and complimented him in the following manner: "I am very happy to ſee you, and aſſure you Monſ. le Compte, that you are a gentleman of the greateſt punctuality."

It appeared by letters from Madraſs received in May, that a deſperate battle had taken place between the Britiſh forces under the command of Sir Eyre Coote, and thoſe under Hyder Ally, in which the former proved victorious. About the ſame time diſpatches were received from Sir Edward Hughes, dated Trincomale-bay, January the fifteenth, 1782, the ſubſtance of which was, that on the twenty-firſt of October the company's troops, under the command of Sir Hector Monro, appeared at Nagore on the ſea-coaſt, in order to co-operate with his majeſty's fleet in the reduction of Negapatam. On the tenth of May the enemy thought proper to demand a capitulation, which was granted; and being ſigned on the twelfth, the town and citadel were then delivered up. By other advices it alſo appeared, that lord Macartney, governor of Madraſs, had poſſeſſed himſelf of all the Dutch ſettlements on the coaſt of Coromandel, and that the Dutch had on that ſide the continent of India totally loſt footing.

During Auguſt, a moſt melancholy accident happened at Spithead. His majeſty's ſhip, the Royal George, of one hundred guns, having in her laſt cruize ſprung a leak, it was reſolved, in order to ſave time, to heave her down at Spithead, and there repair the damage. Accordingly, the buſineſs was begun early in the morning of the twenty-ninth, and the ſhip was ſoon got to a proper ſituation for diſcovering the leak; but in order to caulk the ſeam properly, ſhe was ordered to be thrown down another ſtreak. This was accordingly done, and the buſineſs went on with facility till about twelve o'clock, when the ſhip, by a ſudden guſt of wind fell on one ſide, and the lower deck ports being open, ſhe filled in about eight minutes, and went to the bottom. It was ſuppoſed that not leſs than nine hundred people periſhed by this accident, among whom was admiral Kempenfelt, one of the braveſt commanders in the Britiſh fleet.

The enſuing month of September was rendered memorable by the defence and preſervation of the important garriſon and fortreſs of Gibraltar; where thoſe gallant and humane commanders, general Elliot and captain Curtis, withſtood and defeated the combined efforts of France and Spain. On the twelfth, the combined fleet of France and Spain, conſiſting of thirty-eight ſail of the line, arrived in the Bay; ſix ſail of the line were there before. On the thirteenth, at eight in the morning, the ten battering ſhips, lying at the head of the Bay, under the command of admiral Moreno, began to get under ſail, in order to come againſt the garriſon. At ten, the gun-boats, or floating-batteries, were ſtationed as near the fortreſs as poſſible, covered by the combined fleet. All things being ready, a general attack began, and the heavy pieces from the gun-boats were diſcharged with great rapidity. But the deſign of this grand project (on which their hopes of ſucceſs were principally built) was ſoon rendered abortive. The brave general Elliot had cauſed furnaces to be made, in which, having heated the balls till they were red-hot, they were in that ſtate fired againſt the enemy. This produced the total deſtruction of the gun-boats; for the balls entering their ſides ſet them on fire, and the whole blew up one after another, except three, which were burnt to the water's edge. Thus was this grand ſcheme, by the diſtinguiſhed courage and military proweſs of the Britiſh commander, totally defeated.

Dreadful was the ſcene beyond conception; numbers of men crying from amidſt the flames; ſome on pieces of wood in the water; others appearing in the ſhips, where the fire had made but little progreſs; all expreſſing, by ſpeech and geſture, the deepeſt diſtreſs, and all imploring aſſiſtance; the whole forming a ſpectacle of horror not eaſily to be deſcribed. Every exertion was made by the brave captain Curtis to ſave them; though a large hole was beat in the bottom of his boat, his cockſwain killed, one of his gun-boats ſunk, and another damaged by the falling of pieces of timber, when one of the battering ſhips blew up: however, this heroic officer, early in the morning of the fourteenth, humanely ſaved three hundred and fifty-ſeven of the periſhing beſiegers from impending death. The loſs in the brigade of ſeamen on the thirteenth and fourteenth, conſidering the nature of the attack was very inconſiderable, only one man having been killed, and five wounded; a ſtriking inſtance of divine protection, extended to his creatures, when employed in acts of benevolence.

The following is a ſtate of the combined force of the enemy in the Bay of Gibraltar, at the time of the attack of the ten battering ſhips, on the thirteenth of September.

This overthrow being effected, the combined fleet continued in the Bay, in order to prevent ſuccours being carried into the garriſon. But in this they were alſo diſappointed. Lord Howe had been diſpatched with a number of tranſports, laden with proviſions and all kinds of ammunition, and ſupported by a fleet of thirty-five ſhips of the line. He appeared before the Bay on the tenth of October, when the combined fleets of France and Spain, which were riding at ſingle anchor, ſlipped their cables to engage him; but a violent ſtorm ariſing, which continued for three days, prevented their deſign. One French ſhip of ſeventy-four guns was entirely loſt; the St. Michael, a Spaniſh ſeventy-four, was driven on ſhore, and taken by the garriſon: and another Spaniſh ſhip of one hundred and ten guns was ſo damaged, as to be rendered totally unfit for farther ſervice. Lord Howe took advantage of the Bay being clear, and ſending in the principal part of his tranſports, entirely anſwered the main purport of his inſtructions, and the deſign of his expedition.

Mr. T. Townſend, one of his majeſty's principal ſecretaries of ſtate, tranſmitted a letter to the directors of the Bank, on Sunday morning, November the twenty-fifth, wherein he informed them, "That the negociations carrying on at Paris were brought ſo far to a point, as to promiſe a deciſive concluſion, either for peace or war, before the meeting of parliament, which on that account would be prorogued from the twenty-ſixth, to Thurſday the fifth of December." The lord mayor likewiſe received a letter of the ſame purport; and on the third of December his lordſhip was informed from the ſame quarter, that proviſional articles were ſigned at Paris on the thirtieth of November, between his majeſty's commiſſioners of the united ſtates of America, to be inſerted and conſtitute a treaty of peace, when peace ſhould be concluded between Great Britain and France.

The tranſactions of this year we ſhall cloſe with a remarkable domeſtic occurrence, a dreadful calamity which happened at Mr. Woodmaſon's houſe in Leadenhall ſtreet, Friday, the eighteenth of January.

Mr. Woodmaſon and a party having gone to ſee the company in the ball-room at St. James's, his wiſe was left at home with three maids and two young men belonging to the buſineſs. His clerks and footmen out. At half paſt ten, Mrs. W. with the nurſery-maid, viſited all the children, to ſee they were ſafe, which ſhe did every night. Five of them ſlept in the nurſery over her bed-chamber, in the front of the houſe; the other two ſlept over them. They were all in the moſt profound ſleep but the elder, whom ſhe kiſſed, and talked with a little. She then went to her room, and deſired her own maid to bring her ſome water to waſh her feet in the adjoining bed-chamber; Mrs. W. went into her chamber, undreſſed herſelf all but her under-petticoat, and put on her bed-gown. She then went to waſh her feet, ordered her maid to go and get her a ruſh-light ready, and carry to her room, which was done. She then ſent her down for a tumbler of water, which ſhe brought up, and went into the room with it, where, in five or ſix minutes, ſhe gave a moſt violent ſhriek, and cried out, Fire! Mrs. W. ran out to her, ſaw her bed in flames, and called to her to ſave her children. The maid in her fright ran down ſtairs, Mrs. W. following, calling to her and the reſt of the maids to come to her aſſiſtance; no anſwer was given, nor any one came. She went down therefore (neither the maid or Mrs. W. had preſence of mind to ſhut the chamber-door) and found no one in the kitchen. She ran to the dining-room window, which ſhe opened, and called out, Fire! People from the ſtreet deſired her to come and open the door, and they would aſſiſt her. She, poor woman, ran down ſtairs, without ſhoes and ſtockings, and with great difficulty opened the ſtreet door to all who entered. She cried out, her children! her children! ſave her children! they promiſed to take care of them. She loſt her ſenſes, and was carried over to Mr. Munt's, where ſhe remained ſome time in agonies not to be deſcribed, till ſhe was aſſured all her children were ſafe. She was then taken up ſtairs. A neighbour ran to St. James's for Mr. W. Upon his reaching Mr. Munt's, all cried out to him that his children were ſafe! He found his wife in the greateſt agonies; he enquired after his children; by the anſwers given he was, from his own reaſon, convinced the children were deſtroyed. His feelings and ſufferings are better imagined than expreſſed.

When the people opened the door, they ran up for the children, but found the flames ruſhing ſo violent from the chamber-door, and the ſmoke ſo thick, that no one dared to venture up. The little innocents were all burned: and thus the happieſt of couples rendered the moſt wretched!

On Monday the eldeſt daughter of Mr. Woodmaſon was dug out of the ruins; as was likewiſe a young lad, who proves to be an apprentice to a perſon in Bunhill-row.

On Wedneſday, January the twenty-fifth, were interred in the vault under St. Peter's church, Cornhill, the remains of Mr. Woodmaſon's ſeven children, taken out of the ruins; three were put into one coffin; the other four were taken up ſo entire they had a coffin for each. Likewiſe were interred in the ſame vault, Mr. Noble's ſon, breeches-maker, next door to Mr. Woodmaſon's, and a young man, a watch-maker, whoſe bodies were taken out of the ruins at the ſame time.

A. D. 1783.

On the twenty-fourth of January, the earl of Grantham roſe up in the houſe of lords, and acquainted their lordſhips, that preliminary articles of peace between Great Britain and France, and between Great Britain and Spain, were ſigned at Verſailles, and that the ſame would be ready to be laid on their lordſhip's table the beginning of the enſuing week; upon which the houſe adjourned to Monday the twenty-ſeventh having no buſineſs before them.

On the twenty-fifth, Mr. Ogg, one of the king's meſſengers, arrived at lord Grantham's office, his majeſty's principal ſecretary of ſtate for foreign affairs, with the preliminary articles of peace, which are exactly as follows:

PRELIMINARIES

Signed at Paris on the twentieth inſtant, between Great Britain and France, and between Great Britain and Spain: and alſo, the

ARTICLES of the PROVISIONAL TREATY,

Entered into by Great Britain with the United States of North America.

Tranſlation of the Preliminary Articles of Peace, between his Britannic Majeſty and the Moſt Chriſtian King: ſigned at Verſailles the twentieth of January, 1783.

In the Name of the Moſt Holy Trinity.

THE King of Great Britain, and the Moſt Chriſtian King, equally animated with a deſire of putting an end to the calamities of a deſtructive war, and of re-eſtabliſhing union and good underſtanding between them, as neceſſary for the good of mankind in general, as for that of their reſpective kingdoms, ſtates, and ſubjects, have named for this purpoſe, viz. on the part of his Britannic Majeſty, Mr. Alleyne Fitzherbert, Miniſter Plenipotentiary of his ſaid Majeſty the King of Great Britain; and on the part of his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, Charles Gravier Comte de Vergennes, Councillor in all his Councils, Commander of his Orders, Councillor of State, Miniſter and Secretary of State, and of the Commands and Finances of his ſaid Majeſty for the Department of Foreign Affairs; who, after having duly communicated to each other their full powers in good form, have agreed on the following Preliminary Articles:

I. As ſoon as the preliminaries ſhall be ſigned and ratified, ſincere friendſhip ſhall be re-eſtabliſhed between his Britannic Majeſty and his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, their kingdoms, ſtates, and ſubjects, by ſea and by land, in all parts of the world: orders ſhall be ſent to the armies and ſquadrons, as well as to the ſubjects of the two powers, to ſtop all hoſtilities, and to live in the moſt perfect union, forgetting what is paſſed, of which their ſovereigns give them the order and example; and for the execution of this article, ſea-paſſes ſhall be given on each ſide for the ſhips which ſhall be diſpatched to carry the news of it to the poſſeſſions of the ſaid powers.

II. His Majeſty the King of Great Britain ſhall preſerve in full right the iſland of Newfoundland, and the adjacent iſlands, in the ſame manner as the whole was ceded to him by the thirteenth article of the treaty of Utrecht, ſave the exceptions which ſhall be ſtipulated by the fifth article of the preſent treaty.

III. His Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, in order to prevent quarrels which have hitherto ariſen between the two nations of England and France, renounces the right of fiſhing, which belongs to him by virtue of the ſaid article of the treaty of Utrecht, from Cape Bonaviſta to Cape St. John, ſituated on the eaſtern coaſt of Newfoundland, in about fifty degrees of north latitude; whereby the French fiſhery ſhall commence at the ſaid Cape St. John, ſhall go round by the north, and going down the weſtern coaſt of the iſland of Newfoundland, ſhall have for boundary the place called Cape Raye, ſituated in forty-ſeven degrees, fifty minutes latitude.

IV. The French fiſhermen ſhall enjoy the fiſhery aſſigned them by the foregoing article, as they have a right to enjoy it by virtue of the treaty of Utrecht.

V. His Britannic Majeſty will cede, in full right to his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, the iſlands of St. Pierre and Miquelon.

VI. With regard to the right of fiſhing in the gulph of St. Lawrence, the French ſhall continue to enjoy it conformably to the fifth article of the treaty of Paris.

VII. The King of Great Britain ſhall reſtore to France the iſland of St. Lucia, and ſhall cede and guaranty to her that of Tobago.

VIII. The Moſt Chriſtian King ſhall reſtore to Great Britain the iſlands of Grenada, and the Grenadines, St. Vincent's, Dominica, St. Chriſtopher's, Nevis, and Montſerrat; and the fortreſſes of thoſe iſlands conquered by the arms of Great Britain, and by thoſe of France, ſhall be reſtored in the ſame condition in which they were when the conqueſt of them was made; provided that the term of eighteen months, to be computed from the time of the ratification of the definitive treaty, ſhall be granted to the reſpective ſubjects of the crowns of Great Britain and France, who may have ſettled in the ſaid iſlands, and in other places which ſhall be reſtored by the definitive treaty, to ſell their eſtates, recover their debts, and to tranſport their effects, and retire without being reſtrained on account of their religion, or any other whatever, except in caſes of debt, or of criminal proſecutions.

IX. The King of Great Britain ſhall cede and guaranty in full right to his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, the river of Senegal, and its dependencies, with the forts of St. Louis, Podor, Galam, Arguin, and Portendie: His Britannic Majeſty ſhall reſtore likewiſe the iſland of Goree, which ſhall be given up in the condition in which it was when the Britiſh arms took poſſeſſion of it.

X. The Moſt Chriſtian King ſhall, on his ſide, guaranty to his Majeſty the King of Great Britain, the poſſeſſion of Fort James, and of the river Gambia.

XI. In order to prevent all diſcuſſion in that part of the world, the two courts ſhall agree, either by the definitive treaty, or by a ſeparate act, upon the boundaries to be fixed to their reſpective poſſeſſions. The gum trade ſhall be carried on in future, as the Engliſh and French nations carried it on before the year 1755.

XII. In regard to the reſt of the coaſts of Africa, the ſubjects of both powers ſhall continue to frequent them, according to the cuſtom which has prevailed hitherto.

XIII. The King of Great Britain ſhall reſtore to his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty all the eſtabliſhments which belonged to him at the commencement of the preſent war on the coaſt of Orixa and in Bengal, with liberty to ſurround Chandenagore with a ditch for draining the waters: and his Britannic Majeſty engages to take ſuch meaſures as may be in his power for ſecuring to the ſubjects of France in that part of India, as alſo on the coaſts of Orixa, Coromandel, and Malabar, a ſafe, free, and independent trade, ſuch as was carried on by the late French Eaſt India Company, whether it be carried on by them as individuals, or as a company.

XIV. Pondicherry, as well as Karical, ſhall likewiſe be reſtored and guarantied to France; and his Britannic Majeſty ſhall procure to ſerve as a dependency round Pondicherry, the two diſtricts of Valanour and Bahour; and as a dependency round Karical, the four contiguous Magans.

XV. France ſhall again enter into poſſeſſion of Mahe, and of the Comptoir at Surat: and the French ſhall carry on commerce in this part of India, conformably to the principles laid down in the thirteenth article of this treaty.

XVI. In caſe France has allies in India, they ſhall be invited, as well as thoſe of Great Britain, to accede to the preſent pacification; and for that purpoſe, a term of four months, to be computed from the day on which the propoſals ſhall be made to them, ſhall be allowed them to make their deciſion; and in caſe of refuſal on their part, their Britannic and Moſt Chriſtian Majeſties agree not to give them any aſſiſtance, directly or indirectly, againſt the Britiſh or French poſſeſſions, or againſt the poſſeſſions of their reſpective allies; and their ſaid Majeſties ſhall offer them their good ſervices towards a mutual accommodation.

XVII. The King of Great Britain, deſirous of giving his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty a ſincere proof of reconciliation and friendſhip, and of contributing to the ſolidity of the peace which is on the point of being re-eſtabliſhed, will conſent to the abrogation and ſuppreſſion of all the articles, relative to Dunkirk, from the treaty of peace concluded at Utrecht in 1713, incluſively, to this time.

XVIII. By the definitive treaty, all thoſe which have exiſted till now between the two high contracting parties, and which ſhall not have been derogated from either by the ſaid treaty, or by the preſent preliminary treaty, ſhall be renewed and confirmed; and the two courts ſhall name commiſſioners to enquire into the ſtate of commerce between the two nations, in order to agree upon new arrangements of trade, on the footing of reciprocity and mutual convenience. The ſaid two courts ſhall together amicably fix a competent term for the duration of that buſineſs.

XIX. All the countries and territories which may have been or which may be conquered in any part of the world whatſoever, by the arms of his Britannic Majeſty, or by thoſe of his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, and which are not included in the preſent articles, ſhall be reſtored without difficulty, and without requiring compenſation.

XX. As it is neceſſary to aſſign a fixed epocha for the reſtitutions and the evacuations to be made by each of the high contracting parties, it is agreed, that the King of Great Britain ſhall cauſe to be evacuated the iſlands of St. Pierre and Miquelon, three months after the ratification of the definitive treaty, or ſooner if it can be done; St. Lucia, in the Weſt Indies, and Goree in Africa, three months after the ratification of the definitive treaty, or ſooner, if it can be done. The King of Great Britain ſhall, in like manner, at the end of three months, after the ratification of the definitive treaty, or ſooner, if it can be done, enter again into poſſeſſion of the iſlands of Grenada, the Grenadines, St. Vincent, Dominica, St. Chriſtopher's, Nevis, and Montſerrat.

France ſhall be put into the poſſeſſion of the towns and comptoirs which are reſtored to her in the Eaſt Indies, and of the territories which are procured for her, to ſerve as dependencies round Pondicherry and round Karical, ſix months after the ratification of the definitive treaty, or ſooner, if it can be done.

France ſhall, at the end of the ſame term of ſix months, reſtore the towns and territories which her arms may have taken from the Engliſh or their allies, in the Eaſt Indies.

In conſequence whereof, the neceſſary orders ſhall be ſent by each of the high contracting parties, with reciprocal paſſports for the ſhips which ſhall carry them, immediately after the ratification of the definitive treaty.

XXI. The priſoners made reſpectively by the arms of his Britannic Majeſty and his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, by land and by ſea, ſhall be reſtored reciprocally and bona fide, immediately after the ratification of the definitive treaty, without ranſom, and on paying the debts they may have contracted during their captivity; and each crown ſhall reſpectively reimburſe the ſums which ſhall have been advanced for the ſubſiſtence and maintenance of their priſoners, by the ſovereign of the country where they ſhall have been detained, according to the receipts and atteſted accounts, and other authentic titles, which ſhall be produced on each ſide.

XXII. In order to prevent all cauſes of complaint and diſpute, which may ariſe on account of prizes which may be made at ſea after the ſigning of theſe preliminary articles, it is reciprocally agreed, that the veſſels and effects which may be taken in the Channel, and in the North Seas, after the ſpace of twelve days, to be computed from the ratification of the preſent preliminary articles, ſhall be reſtored on each ſide.

That the terms ſhall be one month from the Channel, and the North Seas, as far as the Canary Iſlands, incluſively, whether in the Ocean or in the Mediterranean. Two months from the ſaid Canary Iſlands, as far as the Equinoctial line, or Equator. And laſtly, five months in all other parts of the world, without any exception, or any other more particular deſcription of time and place.

XXIII. The ratifications of the preſent preliminary articles ſhall be expedited in good and due form, and exchanged in the ſpace of one month, or ſooner, if it can be done, to be computed from the day of the ſignature of the preſent articles.

In witneſs whereof, we the under-written Miniſters Plenipotentiary of his Britannic Majeſty, and his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty, by virtue of our reſpective full powers, have ſigned the preſent preliminary articles, and have cauſed the ſeal of our arms to be put thereto.

Tranſlation of the Preliminary Articles of Peace, between his Britannic Majeſty and the Moſt Catholic King: ſigned at Verſailles the twentieth of January, 1783.

IN the Name of the Moſt Holy Trinity.

The King of Great Britain, and the King of Spain, equally animated with a deſire of putting an end to the calamities of a deſtructive war, and of re-eſtabliſhing union and good underſtanding between them, as neceſſary for the good of mankind in general, as for that of their reſpective kingdoms, ſtates, and ſubjects, have named for this purpoſe, viz. on the part of his Majeſty the King of Great Britain, Mr. Alleyne Fitzherbert, Miniſter Plenipotentiary of his ſaid Majeſty: and on the part of his ſaid Majeſty, the King of Spain, Don Peter Paul Abarea de Bolea Ximenes d' Urnea, &c. Count of Aranda, and Caſtel Florido, Marquis of Torres, of Vilnan and Rupit, Viſcount of Ruedo and Yoch, Baron of the Baronies of Gavin Seitano, Clamoſa, Eripol, Trazmoz, La Mata de Caſtil-Viego, Antillon, La Almolda, Cortis, Jorva, St. Genis, Robovillet, Oreau, and St. Colme de Farnes, Lord of the Tenance and Honor of Alcalaten, the valley of Rodellar, the caſtles and towns of Maella, Moſones, Tiurana de Villaplana, Tardel and Viladran, &c. Rico, Hombre in Aragon by birth, Grandee of Spain of the firſt claſs, Knight of the Order of the Golden Fleece, and that of the Holy Ghoſt, Gentleman of the King's Bed-chamber in employment, Captain General of his armies, and his Ambaſſador to his Moſt Chriſtian Majeſty; who, after having duly communicated to each other their full powers in good form, have agreed on the following Preliminary Articles:

Article I. As ſoon as the preliminaries ſhall be ſigned and ratified, ſincere friendſhip ſhall be re-eſtabliſhed between his Britannic Majeſty and his Catholic Majeſty, their kingdoms, ſtates, and ſubjects, by ſea and by land, in all parts of the world. Orders ſhall be ſent to the armies and ſquadrons, as well as to the ſubjects of the two powers, to ſtop all hoſtilities, and to live in the moſt perfect union, forgetting what has paſſed, of which their Sovereigns give them the order and example. And for the execution of this article, ſea-paſſes ſhall be given on each ſide for the ſhips which ſhall be diſpatched to carry the news of it to the poſſeſſions of the ſaid powers.

II. His Catholic Majeſty ſhall keep the iſland of Minorca.

III. His Britannic Majeſty ſhall cede to his Catholic Majeſty Eaſt Florida, and his Catholic Majeſty ſhall keep Weſt Florida, provided that the term of eighteen months, to be computed from the time of the ratification of the definitive treaty, ſhall be granted to the ſubjects of his Britannic Majeſty, who are ſettled as well in the iſland of Minorca as in the two Floridas, to ſell their eſtates, recover their debts, and to tranſport their effects as well as their perſons, without being reſtrained on account of their religion, or under any other pretence whatſoever, except that of debts and criminal proſecutions. And his Britannic Majeſty ſhall have power to cauſe all the effects that may belong to him in Eaſt Florida, whether artillery or others, to be carried away.

IV. His Catholic Majeſty ſhall not for the future ſuffer the ſubjects of his Britannic Majeſty, or their workmen, to be diſturbed or moleſted, under any pretence whatſoever, in their occupation of cutting, loading, and carrying away logwood, in a diſtrict of which the boundaries ſhall be fixed; and for this purpoſe they may build without hindrance, and occupy without interruption, the houſes and magazines neceſſary for them, for their families, and for their effects, in a place to be agreed upon either in the definitive treaty, or within ſix months after the exchange of the ratifications; and his ſaid Catholic Majeſty aſſures to them by this article, the entire enjoyment of what is above ſtipulated, provided that theſe ſtipulations ſhall not be conſidered as derogatory in any reſpect from the rights of his ſovereignty.

V. His Catholic Majeſty ſhall reſtore to Great Britain the iſlands of Providence and the Bahamas, without exception, in the ſame condition in which they were when conquered by the arms of the king of Spain.

VI. All the countries and territories which may have been or may be conquered in any part of the world whatſoever, by the arms of his Britannic Majeſty, or by thoſe of his Catholic Majeſty, and which are not included in the preſent articles, ſhall be reſtored, without difficulty, and without requiring compenſation.

VII. By the definitive treaty, all thoſe which have exiſted till now between the two high contracting parties, and which ſhall not be derogated from either by the ſaid treaty, or by the preſent Preliminary Treaty, ſhall be renewed and confirmed; and the two courts ſhall name commiſſioners to enquire into the ſtate of commerce between the two nations, in order to agree upon new arrangements of trade on the footing of reciprocity and mutual convenience; and the two ſaid courts ſhall together amicably fix a competent term for the duration of that buſineſs.

VIII. As it is neceſſary to aſſign a fixed epocha for the reſtitutions and evacuations to be made by each of the high contracting parties, it is agreed, that the King of Great Britain ſhall cauſe Eaſt Florida to be evacuated three months after the ratification of the definitive treaty, or ſooner if it can be done.

The King of Great Britain ſhall likewiſe enter again into poſſeſſion of the Bahama iſlands, without exception, in the ſpace of three months after the ratification of the definitive treaty.

In conſequence whereof, the neceſſary orders ſhall be ſent by each of the high contracting parties, with reciprocal paſſports for the ſhips which ſhall carry them immediately after the ratification of the definitive treaty.

IX. The priſoners made reſpectively by the arms of his Britannic Majeſty and his Catholic Majeſty, by ſea and by land, ſhall, immediately after the ratification of the definitive treaty, be reciprocally, and bona fide, reſtored without ranſom, and on paying the debts they may have contracted during their captivity; and each crown ſhall reſpectively reimburſe the ſums which ſhall have been advanced for the ſubſiſtence and maintenance of their priſoners by the Sovereign of the country where they ſhall have been detained, according to the receipts and atteſted accounts, and other authentic titles, which ſhall be produced on each ſide.

X. In order to prevent all cauſes of complaint and diſputes which may ariſe on account of prizes which may be made at ſea after the ſigning of theſe Preliminary Articles, it is reciprocally agreed, that the ſhips and effects which may be taken in the Channel or in the North Seas after the ſpace of twelve days, to be computed from the ratification of the preſent Preliminary Articles, ſhall be reſtored on each ſide.

That the term ſhall be one month from the Channel and the North Seas, as far as the Canary Iſlands, incluſively, whether in the ocean or in the Mediterranean; two months from the ſaid Canary Iſlands, as far as the Equinoctial Line or Equator; and laſtly, five months in all other parts of the world, without exception or other more particular deſcription of time and place.

XI. The ratification of the preſent Preliminary Articles ſhall be expedited in due and good form, and exchanged in the ſpace of one month, or ſooner if it can be done, to be computed from the day of the ſignature of the preſent articles.

In witneſs whereof we the underwritten Miniſters Plenipotentiary of his Britannic Majeſty and of his Catholic Majeſty, by virtue of our reſpective powers, have agreed upon and ſigned theſe Preliminary Articles, and have cauſed the ſeal of our arms to be put thereto.

ALLEYNE FITZ-HERBERT, (L. S.)
LE COMPTE D'ARANDA. (L. S.)

ARTICLES agreed upon, by and between Richard Oſwald, Eſq; the Commiſſioner of his Britannic Majeſty, for treating of peace with the Commiſſioners of the United States of America, in behalf of his ſaid Majeſty on the one part; and John Adams, Benjamin Franklin, John Jay, and Henry Laurens, four of the Commiſſioners of the ſaid ſtates, for treating of peace with the Commiſſioner of his ſaid Majeſty, on their behalf, on the other part;

To be inſerted in, and to conſtitute the treaty of peace, propoſed to be concluded between the Crown of Great Britain and the ſaid United States: but which treaty is not to be concluded until terms of a peace ſhall be agreed upon between Great Britain and France, and his Britannic Majeſty ſhall be ready to conclude ſuch treaty accordingly.

Whereas reciprocal advantages and mutual convenience are found by experience to form the only permanent foundation of peace and friendſhip between ſtates; it is agreed to form the articles of the propoſed treaty on ſuch principles of liberal equity and reciprocity, as that partial advantages (thoſe ſeeds of diſcord) being excluded, ſuch a beneficial and ſatisfactory intercourſe between the two countries may be eſtabliſhed, as to promiſe and ſecure to both perpetual peace and harmony.

Art. 1. His Britannic Majeſty acknowledges the ſaid United States, viz. New Hampſhire, Maſſachuſets Bay, Rhode Iſland and Providence Plantations, Connecticut, New York, New Jerſey, Pennſylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, to be free, ſovereign, and Independent States; that he treats with them as ſuch; and for himſelf, his heirs and ſucceſſors, relinquiſhes all claim to the government, propriety, and territorial rights of the ſame, and every part thereof; and that all diſputes which might ariſe in future, on the ſubject of the boundaries of the ſaid United States, may be prevented, it is hereby agreed and declared, that the following are and ſhall be their boundaries, viz.

II. From the north-weſt angle of Nova Scotia, viz. that angle which is formed by a line drawn due north from the ſource of St. Croix river to the Highlands, along the ſaid Highlands which divide thoſe rivers that empty themſelves into the river St. Lawrence, from thoſe which fall into the Atlantic Ocean, to the north-weſternmoſt head of Connecticut river; thence down along the middle of that river, to the forty-fifth degree of north latitude; from thence, by a line due weſt on ſaid latitude, until it ſtrikes the river Iroquois, or Cataraquy; thence along the middle of ſaid river into Lake Ontario, through the middle of ſaid lake, until it ſtrikes the communication by water between that lake and Lake Erie; thence along the middle of ſaid communication into Lake Erie, through the middle of the ſaid lake, until it arrives at the water communication between that lake and Lake Huron; thence along the middle of ſaid water communication, to the Lake Huron; thence through the middle of ſaid lake to the water communication between that lake and Lake Superior; thence through Lake Superior, northward of the iſles Royal and Phelippeaux, to the Long Lake; thence through the middle of ſaid Long Lake, and the water communication between it and the Lake of the Woods, to the ſaid Lake of the Woods; thence through the ſaid Lake to the moſt north-weſtern point thereof, and from thence, on a due weſt courſe, to the river Miſſiſſippi; thence by a line to be drawn along the middle of the ſaid river Miſſiſſippi, until it ſhall interſect the northernmoſt part of the thirty-firſt degree of north latitude; ſouth, by a line to be drawn due eaſt from the determination of the line laſt mentioned, in the latitude of thirty-one degrees north of the Equator, to the middle of the river Apalachicola, or Catahouche; thence along the middle thereof, to its junction with the Flint River; thence ſtraight to the head of St. Mary's river, and thence down along the middle of St. Mary's river to the Atlantic ocean; eaſt, by a line to be drawn along the middle of the river St. Croix, from its mouth in the bay of Fundy to its ſource, and from its ſource directly north, to the aforeſaid Highlands which divide the rivers that fall into the Atlantic ocean from thoſe which fall into the river St. Lawrence, comprehending all iſlands within twenty leagues of any part of the ſhores of the United States, and lying between lines to be drawn due eaſt from the points where the aforeſaid boundaries between Nova Scotia on the one part, and Eaſt Florida on the other, ſhall reſpectively touch the bay of Fundy, and the Atlantic ocean; excepting ſuch iſlands as now are, or heretofore may have been, within the limits of the ſaid province of Nova Scotia.

III. It is agreed, that the people of the United States ſhall continue to enjoy, unmoleſted, the right to take fiſh, of every kind, on the Grand Bank, and on all the other banks of Newfoundland; alſo in the Gulph of St. Lawrence, and at all other places in the ſea, where the inhabitants of both countries uſed at any time heretofore to fiſh; and alſo, that the inhabitants of the United States ſhall have liberty to take fiſh, of every kind, on ſuch part of the coaſt of Newfoundland as Britiſh fiſhermen ſhall uſe (but not to dry or cure the ſame on that iſland;) and alſo on the coaſts, bays, and creeks, of all other of his Britannic Majeſty's dominions in America; and that the American fiſhermen ſhall have liberty to dry and cure fiſh in any of the unſettled bays, harbours, and creeks, of Nova Scotia, Magdalen iſlands, and Labrador, ſo long as the ſame ſhall remain unſettled; but ſo ſoon as the ſame, or either of them, ſhall be ſettled, it ſhall not be lawful for the ſaid fiſhermen to dry or cure fiſh at ſuch ſettlement, without a previous agreement for that purpoſe with the inhabitants, proprietors, or poſſeſſors of the ground.

IV. It is agreed, that creditors on either ſide ſhall meet with no lawful impediment to the recovery of the full value, in ſterling money, of all bona fide debts heretofore contracted.

V. It is agreed, that the Congreſs ſhall earneſtly recommend it to the Legiſlatures of the reſpective States, to provide for the reſtitution of all eſtates, rights, and properties, which have been confiſcated, belonging to real Britiſh ſubjects, and alſo of the eſtates, rights, and properties, of perſons reſident in diſtricts in the poſſeſſion of his Majeſty's arms, and who have not borne arms againſt the ſaid United States; and that perſons of any other deſcription ſhall have free liberty to go to any part or parts of any of the Thirteen United States, and therein to remain twelve months unmoleſted in their endeavours to obtain the reſtitution of ſuch of their eſtates, rights, and properties, as may have been confiſcated; and that Congreſs ſhall alſo earneſtly recommend to the ſeveral States, a reconſideration and reviſion of all acts or laws regarding the premiſes, ſo as to render the ſaid laws or acts perfectly conſiſtent, not only with juſtice and equity, but with that ſpirit of conciliation, which, on the return of the bleſſings of peace ſhould univerſally prevail; and that Congreſs ſhall alſo earneſtly recommend to the ſeveral States, that the eſtates, rights, and properties, of ſuch laſt mentioned perſons ſhall be reſtored to them, they refunding to any perſons who may be now in poſſeſſion, the bona fide price (where any has been given) which ſuch perſons may have paid on purchaſing any of the ſaid lands or properties ſince the confiſcation.

And it is agreed, that all perſons who have any intereſt in confiſcated lands, either by debts, marriage ſettlements, or otherwiſe, ſhall meet with no lawful impediment in the proſecution of their juſt rights.

VI. That there ſhall be no future confiſcations made, nor any proſecution commenced againſt any perſon or perſons, for or by reaſon of the part which he or they may have taken in the preſent war; and that no perſon ſhall, on that account, ſuffer any future loſs or damage, either in his perſon, liberty, or property; and that thoſe who may be in confinement on ſuch charges, at the time of the ratification of the treaty in America, ſhall be immediately ſet at liberty, and the proſecutions ſo commenced be diſcontinued.

VII. There ſhall be a firm and perpetual peace between his Britannic Majeſty and the ſaid States, and between the ſubjects of the one and the citizens of the other; wherefore, all hoſtilities both by ſea and land, ſhall then immediately ceaſe; all priſoners on both ſides ſhall be ſet at liberty; and his Britannic Majeſty ſhall, with all convenient ſpeed, and without cauſing any deſtruction, or carrying away any negroes, or other property of the American inhabitants, withdraw all his armies, garriſons, and fleets from the ſaid United States, and from every port, place, and harbour within the ſame, leaving in all fortifications the American artillery that may be therein; and ſhall alſo order and cauſe all archives, record deeds, and papers, belonging to any of the ſaid States, or their citizens, which, in the courſe of the war may have fallen into the hands of his officers, to be forthwith reſtored and delivered to the proper States and perſons to whom they belong.

VIII. The navigation of the Miſſiſſippi, from its ſource to the ocean, ſhall for ever remain free and open to the ſubjects of Great Britain, and the citizens of the United States.

IX. In caſe it ſhould ſo happen, that any place or territory belonging to Great Britain, or to the United States, ſhould be conquered by the arms of either, from the other, before the arrival of theſe articles in America, it is agreed that the ſame ſhall be reſtored without difficulty, and without requiring any compenſation.

On the ſeventeenth of February, the grand debate on the peace commenced in the Houſe of Lords. The preliminary articles having been read by the clerk, the earl of Pembroke moved for an addreſs of thanks to be preſented to his majeſty, for his condeſcenſion in ordering the ſame to be laid before that houſe, to expreſs their ſatisfaction, and to aſſure his majeſty, that they would encourage and promote every exertion of his ſubjects of Great Britain and Ireland, in the cultivation and improvement of thoſe reſources, which muſt tend to the certain improvement of public ſtrength. The queſtion being put and carried, a committee was appointed to draw up the addreſs, which was ordered to be preſented by the whole houſe. To this his majeſty returned the following anſwer. "My lords, I receive with pleaſure this dutiful addreſs, and have great ſatisfaction in obſerving, that the preliminary and proviſional articles appear to you, as they do to me, to afford a reaſonable proſpect of ſuch a peace, as will relieve my people from any burthens, beyond what the expences of the war have rendered unavoidable, and, if properly improved, will enſure the national proſperity. Theſe are always objects next my heart; and every meaſure which has the tendency to promote them, cannot but be acceptable to me. It is my firm purpoſe to execute every article of the treaties on my part with that good faith, which has ever diſtinguiſhed the conduct of this nation. I concur with you moſt entirely on the juſt expectation you entertain of the like attention in North America to the ſtipulations in favour of the unfortunate ſufferers by the war; which are founded in humanity and juſtice, and now recognized by public engagement. I do not entertain a doubt that this and every other article in the treaties depending will be finally ſettled, and performed by the other powers with that ſpirit of liberality and juſtice which becomes them."

As ſoon as this buſineſs came before the houſe of commons, it was productive of very warm debates, in which Mr. T. Pitt, lord John Cavendiſh, lord North, Mr. Fox, Mr. Burke, Mr. Lee, took different ſides of the queſtion, in favour of and againſt the peace. Mr. Sheridan, in his ſpeech, defended lord North's having that day joined Mr. Fox, on grounds of fair reaſoning and conſiſtency. After having for a time canvaſſed, twiſted, weighed, attacked and defended, ſeveral of the articles of the peace, Mr. Chancellor Pitt moved an addreſs to his majeſty, thanking him for laying the preliminary articles before the houſe, and aſſuring him that they moſt heartily approved them. This motion was ſeconded by Mr. Wilberforce. But lord North, after a long, laboured ſpeech, moved an amendment,—"That, whatever may be the ſentiments of his majeſty's faithful commons, in the reſult of their inveſtigation of the terms of the pacification, they beg leave to aſſure his majeſty of their firm and unalterable reſolution to adhere inviolably to the ſeveral articles for which the public faith is pledged, and to maintain the bleſſings of peace, ſo neceſſary to his majeſty's ſubjects, and to the general happineſs of mankind." Mr. Rigby aſſigned his reaſons for voting for the addreſs as originally moved, and Mr. Adam ſupported lord North's amendment with great ingenuity; but upon the queſtion being put for the original motion, and for the amendment, there appeared to be

During lord North's ſpeech, a dog, who had found his way into the houſe, began to bark, and ſet all the members in a roar. His lordſhip joined heartily in the laugh; and when the houſe was reſtored to order, he threw it again into a ſecond fit of laughter, by jocoſely addreſſing the chair, "Sir, I was interrupted by a New Speaker, but as his argument is concluded, I will reſume mine." On the twenty-firſt of February the grand debate was renewed, when lord John Cavendiſh, having opened the buſineſs of the day, read to the houſe the five following propoſitions:—Firſt, That in conſideration of the public faith, which ought to be preſerved inviolate, this houſe will ſupport his majeſty in rendering firm and permanent the peace to be concluded definitively, in conſequence of the proviſional treaty, and preliminary articles, which have been laid before the houſe.—Second, That this houſe will, in concurrence with his majeſty's paternal regard for his people, employ its beſt endeavours to improve the bleſſings of peace to the advantage of his crown and ſubjects.—Third, That his majeſty, in acknowledging the independence of the united ſtates of America, by virtue of the powers veſted in him by the act of the laſt ſeſſion of parliament, to enable his majeſty to conclude a peace or truce with certain colonies in North America, has acted as the circumſtances of affairs indiſpenſibly required, and in conformity to the ſenſe of parliament.—Fourth, That the conceſſions made to the adverſaries of Great Britain, by the ſaid proviſional treaty and preliminary articles, are greater than they were entitled to, either from the actual ſituation of their reſpective poſſeſſions, or from their comparative ſtrength.—Fifth, That this houſe do feel the regard due from this nation to every deſcription of men, who with the riſk of their lives, and the ſacrifice of their property, have diſtinguiſhed their loyalty, and been conſpicuous for their fidelity during a long and calamitous war; and to aſſure his majeſty, that they ſhall take every proper method to relieve them which the ſtate of the circumſtances of this country will permit. It was agreed by the houſe to put each motion ſeparately; and the firſt and ſecond reſolutions were put, and carried Nemine Contradicente. In the courſe of the debate on the third propoſition, commodore Johnſon, in order to prevent future minions of the crown from drawing down the recognition of American independence, as a precedent in ſupport of an unbounded and unconſtitutional prerogative of the ſovereign, moved, that after the word "America," the following inſertion ſhould be made, "By virtue of the powers veſted in him by the act of the laſt ſeſſion of parliament, to enable his majeſty to conclude a peace or truce with certain colonies in North America." This motion was agreed to, and the third reſolution thus amended, paſſed without oppoſition: but the principles of the fourth met with a very different reception. Mr. Fox contended, that the preliminaries and proviſional treaty were inadequate to the relative ſituation of this kingdom with France and Spain. The chancellor of the Exchequer met Mr.

Fox on this ground. He took a vaſt range of ſerious argument, ſevere retort, and pointed ridicule; defending the miniſters, his colleagues, and the peace they had made, in a ſpeech of two hours and a half in length, which arreſted the attention, and excited the admiration of every perſon in the houſe. At half-paſt three o'clock in the morning the ſpeaker put the queſtion, and on a diviſion there were

As miniſtry was thus a ſecond time out-voted, previous to which lord North and Mr. Fox had formed a coalition; all parties expected a new arrangement in adminiſtration would conſequently take place. The houſe of commons, therefore, after the above debate, adjourned to Monday the twenty-fourth; and on Tueſday the twenty-fifth, adjourned again to Friday the twenty-eighth. On Tueſday, March the eighteenth, Mr. Coke of Norfolk gave notice in the houſe, that if a miniſtry was not formed by the twenty-firſt, he ſhould move an addreſs to the king on that ſubject. Monday, the twenty-fourth, came, and no adminiſtration; in conſequence of which Mr. Coke made his intended motion. This being carried, the houſe preſented an humble addreſs, praying, that his majeſty would condeſcend to form an adminiſtration intitled to the confidence of his people, and ſuch a one as might have a tendency to put an end to the unfortunate diviſions and diſtractions of this country. On Wedneſday, March the twenty-ſixth, lord Ludlow reported to the houſe the king's anſwer, "That it was his earneſt deſire to do every thing in his power to comply with the wiſhes expreſſed by his faithful commons." At length, after an inter-regnum (a name adopted by the houſe for the ſpace of time in which there was no adminiſtration) of near ſix weeks, the new miniſters were announced on the ſecond of April. In the new arrangement, viſcount Stormont was appointed preſident of the privy-council, the earl of Carliſle keeper of the privy-ſeal, the duke of Portland firſt lord of the treaſury, lord viſcount Keppel firſt lord of the admiralty, and, to the great aſtoniſhment of the honeſt part of the nation, and all its true patriots, lord North was coupled with the right honourable Charles James Fox, who were made principal ſecretaries of ſtate. Mr. Pitt having on the thirty-firſt of March reſigned his poſt of chancellor of the Exchequer, lord John Cavendiſh was appointed to the ſame. Lord Thurlow alſo reſigned the ſeals, as lord chancellor, and they were put into commiſſion, at the head of which lord Loughborough ſtood.

Several important bills were during the courſe of this ſeſſion introduced into both houſes, and canvaſſed by the moſt eminent ſpeakers. A bill for ſecuring Ireland the excluſive right of judicature and legiſlature, was proceeded upon with great caution, delicacy, and perſeverance. Another, for the proviſional eſtabliſhment and regulation of trade and commerce, between the ſubjects of Great Britain and the united ſtates of America. Reſolutions in favour of the American corps, and of the loyaliſts. Mr. Burke's civil liſt bill. Reports on the Eaſt India company's petition. Cuſtom-houſe bill. The mutiny bill. Prince of Wales's eſtabliſhment, and ſome others, which occaſioned long and violent debates, wherein the abilities and public ſpirit of the ſpeakers on each ſide of the queſtion, were ſufficiently evinced.

Diſpatches from India brought an account of a dreadful rebellion in Benares, during which a province that paid annually to government three hundred thouſand pounds, was loſt and recovered in the ſpace of five weeks. Intelligence alſo arrived at the Eaſt India houſe of the operations againſt Hyder Ally, on the Malabar coaſt, whereby the nabob was defeated by colonel Mackleod, and obliged to make ſeveral retreats with precipitation. At this time a treaty of peace with the Marattas was expected would be ratified. In the mean while no leſs than four engagements happened between Sir Edward Hughes's fleet and that of M. Suffrein; but by reaſon of ſtormy weather, and other caſualties, not one of them proved to be deciſive. The third action indeed was ſo much in favour of the French, as to afford M. Suffrein an opportunity of making a deſcent on Trincomale, which he obliged to ſurrender upon ſummons, and propoſed articles of capitulation.

Since the notification of peace in America, the fate of the loyaliſts in that country, has been ſevere to an extreme. Of thoſe who relinquiſhed their fortunes to fight for their king, numbers have been obliged to exchange a warm ſouthern clime for the cold region of the north, by emigrating to Nova Scotia; and many who, truſting to the mercy of a relentleſs enemy, returned to their families and reſpective homes, have, with the utmoſt inhumanity, been treated as murderers and felons, with the rigour of immediate execution, without trial, or perpetual baniſhment. In the New Jerſey journal, a paper addreſſed to friends, countrymen, whigs, and fellow-citizens, concludes in this manner:

"Now, know all men, whereas information is given that many of theſe horrid wretches above deſcribed (whom Great Britain aukwardly enough ſhakes off, with an inſulting recommendation to the mercy of the people they have been violently endeavouring to deſtroy for more than ſeven years) intend to ſtay in this country, and return to this country again after the Britiſh are gone; in order to give timely notice to all ſuch parricides, and to give them a chance to preſerve their unworthy lives, and to influence them to go to their maſters whom they have ſerved, we, the ſubſcribers, citizens of the ſtate of New Jerſey, do ſolemnly covenant for our country, for its peace and ſafety, and we pledge our faith and our ſacred honours to one another, that we will, with our lives and fortunes, ſupport one another, in endeavouring to have ſuitable laws made (if the preſent are inſufficient) for the puniſhment of all ſuch perſons above deſcribed, who may dare to return into this ſtate, who have acted directly or indirectly, in word or deed, in favour of the enemy, to the injury of the good citizens of this ſtate, or to the injury of any of the citizens of the United States; that we will be vigilant to ſee that the ſaid laws be perfectly and vigorouſly executed. We have too many of thoſe murdering, baſe, and falſe-hearted tories in our country already. We will not willingly and knowingly admit a ſingle individual more.

"For theſe uſeful and important purpoſes, and that we may not breathe in the ſame air, and be ſhocked with the ſight of thoſe monſters of humanity, and to prevent the machinations of ſuch miſcreants in future, and to be a terror to all the baſe among us who dare liſp a word in favour of ſuch murderers, felons, and their abettors, we ſolemnly unite, aſſociate, and bind ourſelves, by all the ties of patriotiſm and ſacred virtue, that we will honeſtly endeavour that the above meaſures ſhall be ſtrictly and fully effected.

"In a word, we are fully determined to hang, according to the law of this ſtate, every ſuch infernal being, without benefit of clergy.

"As witneſs our hands this twenty-ſeventh day of March, A. D. 1783, and in the ſeventh year of our glorious independency and triumphant liberty."

However, to the honour of Engliſh humanity, the Britiſh parliament having taken the caſe of theſe unfortunate fortunate ſufferers under their ſerious conſideration; a conſiderable ſum was voted for their preſent ſupport; and commiſſioners were appointed to enquire particularly into their ſufferings, that a ſettled proviſion might be fixed for them by parliament.

The elements this year, particularly at ſea, ſeemed as it were in league againſt us, with the combined powers by land Beſides the loſs of that fine ſhip the Ville de Paris, or city of Paris, one of Lord Rodney's prizes, and the Royal George, of which we have given an account, his majeſty's ſhip the Centaur foundered at ſea. Captain Inglefield's affecting narrative contains the whole account of the different ſtorms, and the diſtreſs of the ſhip from the firſt gale of wind, as alſo his marvellous eſcape with his pinnace-crew. The officers and men ſaved, who arrived at Fayal, were, captain Inglefield, Mr. Thomas Rainy, maſter, Mr. Robert Bayles, midſhipman, Mr. James Clarke, ſurgeon's mate, Timothy Sullivan, captain's coxſwain, John Gregory, quarter-maſter, Charles M'Carty, Charles Flinn, ——— Gallohar, Theodore Hutchins, Thomas Stephenſon, ſeamen. Thomas Matthews, quarter-maſter, died in the boat the day before land appeared.

Add to theſe thoſe violent tumults by land, which are always to be expected at the concluſion of a peace. At Portſmouth, Newcaſtle-under-line, Whitby, Banbury, Plymouth, Wakefield, and in the iſland of Guernſey, riots and mutinies broke forth, which proceeded to moſt daring lengths. In Ireland, at Dublin, April the third, three or four hundred of the laſt recruited men in the garriſon laid down their arms, inſiſting on their diſcharge, as the war was over, their time of enliſtment being confined to that period. It was alſo ſaid, that general Burgoyne harangued the men, and among other things told them, that from the diſtracted ſtate at preſent of the Engliſh councils, it was not certain whether peace was abſolutely fixed, and gave them his honour, that as ſoon as matters were finally determined, they ſhould enjoy the full conditions of their enliſtment. Which aſſurance happily reſtored order among the garriſon. Differences alſo commenced at Kilkenny, between the Leinſter fencibles and the town's people, which aroſe to an alarming height before they ſubſided. Nor was even Scotland free from diſturbances and domeſtic broils.

The ſhip Bedford, captain Moores, belonging to the Maſſachuſets, arrived in the Downs, on the third of May, paſſed Graveſend the fourth, and was reported at the Cuſtom-houſe the ſixth. She was not allowed regular entry, until ſome conſultations had taken place between the commiſſioners of the cuſtoms and the lords of council, on account of the many acts of parliament yet in force againſt the rebels in America. She lay at Horſleydown, a little below the Tower, and was the firſt which diſplayed the Thirteen Stripes of America in any Britiſh harbour.

His majeſty having created a new order, called the moſt illuſtrious order of St. Patrick, the inſtallation of the knights was appointed to be at Dublin caſtle, the twenty-ſeventh of March.

General Elliot and admiral Rodney had now a ſhare in the diſtribution of royal favours, the latter having been made a lord, and the former, on the third of April, inveſted with the red ribband at Gibraltar. As a further proof of national regard, it was unanimouſly reſolved in the houſe of lords, "That this houſe do highly approve of, and acknowledge the ſervices of the officers, ſoldiers, and ſailors, lately employed in the defence of Gibraltar." The commons alſo voted them their thanks; and have ſince paſſed a penſion bill, beſtowing upon admiral lord Rodney, and his two ſucceſſors, in conſideration of his eminent ſervices, two thouſand pounds a year; and upon Sir George Auguſtus Elliot, and his ſon, for the former's unparalleled defence of Gibraltar, fifteen hundred pounds a year. We may here obſerve, the ſame parliament, which in ſeveral paſt ſeſſions had been remarkably liberal in their pecuniary grants, agreed to no leſs a ſum than fifty-five thouſand pounds, to enable his majeſty to diſcharge the debts of his civil liſt. At the ſame time, the inſolvent debtors bill, introduced and ſupported by the earl of Effingham, was rejected.

In 1775, a year which Britain will have too much cauſe to remember, the national debt amounted to one hundred and twenty-nine millions, eight hundred and ſixty thouſand and eighteen pounds. In January, 1783, this debt was found to be augmented to no leſs a ſum than two hundred and fifteen millions, ſeven hundred and ſeventeen thouſand, ſeven hundred and nine pounds; the intereſt, with the expence of management of which, was ſeven millions, five hundred and thirteen thouſand, eight hundred and fifty-two pounds, nine ſhillings. To the above ſum is to be added, thirty-ſix millions, eight hundred ſixty-ſeven thouſand, two hundred and twenty ſeven pounds, of debt not funded nor provided for in January 1783; ſo that the whole debt, funded and unfunded at this period, amounted to two hundred and fifty-two millions, five hundred and eighty-four thouſand, nine hundred and eighty-ſix pounds, requiring for intereſt and management nine millions, eight thouſand, nine hundred and thirty-one pounds. Hence it appears, one hundred and fifteen millions, ſix hundred and fifty-four thouſand, nine hundred and fourteen pounds, has been contracted from January 1776, to January 1783, of the above debt.

On Tueſday, the fifteenth of July, the royal aſſent was given to ten bills by commiſſion; and the parliamentary buſineſs being finiſhed, on the ſeventeenth his majeſty went with the uſual ſtate to the houſe of peers. Three bills were then paſſed with the royal aſſent, after which his majeſty made a moſt gracious ſpeech from the throne, and prorogued the parliament to September the ninth.

Towards the cloſe of the month of February, the court-martial on the trial of General Murray met, at the Horſe Guards, to receive the deciſion of the court, after its reviſion by his majeſty. Both General Murray, and Sir William Draper who had exhibited the charges againſt him, being preſent, the Judge Advocate proceeded to read the deciſion, which was, "that twenty-ſeven of the charges were frivolous and groundleſs." Of the remaining two the court had found the priſoner guilty, and ſentenced him to receive ſuch reprehenſion as his majeſty might think proper, which his majeſty had been pleaſed to remit. The Judge Advocate then informed Sir William Draper, that it was the pleaſure of the court that he ſhould be required to make an apology to general Murray for having inſtituted the preſent trial againſt him. Sir William acquieſced, and apologized accordingly. When the like requiſition was made of General Murray to Sir William, for having wounded his feelings as a ſoldier, by his conduct to him during his command at Minorca, General Murray vehemently and peremptorily refuſed acquieſcence, declaring that he was the protector of his own honour, and would leave that of every other man to his own vindication. He was, therefore, put under arreſt; but on a meeting of the court-martial a few days after, the affair was accommodated, by changing a word in the propoſed apology, and the matter terminated in ſuch a manner as to leave no poſſible ground for apprehenſion that any future conſequence would take place between theſe two gentlemen.

May the 22d articles were agreed upon between Mr. Oſwald, his Britannic majeſty's commiſſioner, and the commiſſioners of the United States of America.

On the 16th of June Sir Roger Curtis, who had ſo eminently diſtinguiſhed himſelf for his valour as an officer during the ſiege of Gibraltar by the combined armaments of France and Spain, renewed, as deputed from our court, the treaty of peace which had ſubſiſted between Great Britain and the emperor of Morocco.

Preliminary articles of peace, between his majeſty the king of Great Britain and their High Mightineſſes the States General of the United Provinces of Holland, were ſigned at Paris by the plenipotentiaries of the reſpective powers on the 2d of September, likewiſe on the 3d, the definitive treaty with France, Spain, and America: and on the 6th of the following month, by virtue of his majeſty's royal warrant, peace was proclaimed between Great Britain, France and Spain, in due ceremonial form, at the uſual places.

The ſeſſion of parliament was opened by a ſpeech from his majeſty to both houſes, on the 11th of November. When his majeſty had retired from the houſe, his royal highneſs the prince of Wales, who had been previouſly introduced with the uſual ceremonies, and taken his chair on the right hand of the throne, took the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy, and made and ſubſcribed the declaration, and alſo took and ſubſcribed the oaths of abjuration.

Mr. Secretary Fox, purſuant to previous notice, brought forward his motion, on the 18th of November, reſpecting the future regulation of the Engliſh ſettlements in the Eaſt Indies. After a variety of arguments on both ſides the queſtion, the houſe divided for a motion of adjournment, which was carried in the negative by a majority of 109 voices. The queſtion, that the bill be committed, was then carried without a diviſion, and it was ordered to be committed for the 1ſt of December. On that day the principal opponents, Mr. Pitt and Mr. Fox, again diſplayed their eloquence, and went over much the ſame ground as upon the former occaſion: at length, however, the bill was again committed by a majority of 114. But this meaſure of adminiſtration met with a very different fate in the houſe of lords, where, after ſome debates, the motion for the commitment of the bill was loſt by a majority of 19 only.

At a late hour or Thurſday night, the 18th, a ſpecial meſſenger announced to lord North and Mr. Fox, that his majeſty had no further occaſion for their ſervices. At the ſame time they were commanded to ſend the ſeals by the under ſecretaries, as a perſonal interview would be diſagreeable. The next day the right honourable William Pitt was appointed firſt lord of the treaſury and chancellor of the Exchequer; earl Gower, preſident of the council; and earl Temple, ſecretary of ſtate: the latter immediately wrote letters of diſmiſſion to the remaining members of the cabinet, a general and almoſt unexampled reſignation of their adherents was the conſequence.

The parliament adjourned to Monday the 22d, when Mr. Grenville roſe and announced the reſignation of his noble relation, earl Temple, who, he ſaid, had taken this ſtep in order that he might not be ſuppoſed to ſhelter himſelf under the cover of authority againſt any charge that might be brought againſt him, but that he might take it fairly and openly in his private capacity.—Mr. Fox hinted at ſome other reaſon for the reſignation; but the ſlight converſe on this ſubject gave way to a more important concern, the paſſing of the land-tax bill, with ſuch circumſtances of candour and good temper, as did honour to all parties.

When this object was ſettled, an addreſs to his majeſty was moved againſt the apprehended diſſolution of parliament. Lord North's ſpeech upon this occaſion was very ſingular, not only as it was his firſt profeſſed defence of a celebrated coalition, but as it threw a light on ſome important circumſtances in the government of this country, eſpecially that influence in the ſtate which the great ariſtocratical parties have been long known to retain.

The queſtion being at length put, that the houſe agree to the motion for the addreſs, it was carried with ſo great a ſtrength of ſhew, that the friends of the new miniſtry did not think proper to try the queſtion by a deciſion. When the addreſs was preſented to his majeſty, he was pleaſed to return a moſt gracious anſwer, and to aſſure the houſe, that he ſhould not interrupt their meeting by any exerciſe of his prerogative, either of prorogation or diſſolution. It was then finally agreed to by the houſe to adjourn to the 12th of January next.

Though there appeared at firſt ſo much difficulty in forming a cabinet, yet an arrangement of miniſtry was completed in a few days. The duke of Rutland was appointed lord privy ſeal; the marquis of Caermarthen and lord Sydney, principal ſecretaries of ſtate; and lord Thurlow, lord high chancellor.

A. D. 1784.

Purſuant to adjournment, on the 12th of January the houſe of commons met, when debates were maintained by the contending parties with the uſual zeal and ſpirit. After a diviſion of the houſe on the order of the day, upon which there appeared a majority of 39 againſt the miniſter, the houſe went into a committee on the ſtate of the nation.

Mr. Chancellor Pitt moved, on the 23d, that the India bill laid by him before the houſe, be read a ſecond time and committed. The houſe divided on the ſecond reading, when there appeared againſt the bill a majority of 8 only.

This bill being thus rejected, Mr. Fox moved for leave to bring in a bill for the better regulation and government of our affairs in the Eaſt Indies; the two principal objects of which were, the rendering the ſyſtem for the government of India permanent by authority of parliament; and the fixing the government at home. The other ſyſtem as ſecondary, might be modelled to meet the inclinations and opinions of the country. He then called upon the miniſter to declare explicitly whether the houſe was to rely on the promiſe made in anſwer to their late addreſs. No anſwer from the miniſter. He was called upon again and again; but remained ſilent. At length, as if urged by the pointed ſeverity of ſome remarks, he declared that he would not condeſcend to anſwer interrogatories which he did not think gentlemen entitled to put to him, and concluded with aſſigning his reaſons in a ſtile of expreſſion high and elevated.

On the 16th of January the lord-mayor, attended by a great number of the aldermen, went from Guildhall to St. James's, and preſented an addreſs to his majeſty, expreſſing the ſatisfaction they felt at the diſmiſſion of his majeſty's late miniſters, and their earneſt aſſurances of maintaining their zeal and loyalty inviolate. The merchants of London alſo preſented an addreſs of a ſimilar nature.

The houſe of commons met purſuant to adjournment on the 29th, and on the 20th of February Mr. Fox moved for an addreſs to the king, which being alſo carried, was prepared and reported according to the following manner:

TO THE KING'S MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY.

"We your majeſty's moſt faithful commons, impreſſed with the moſt dutiful ſenſe of your majeſty's paternal regard for the welfare of your people, approach your throne to expreſs our reliance on your majeſty's paternal wiſdom, that your majeſty will take ſuch meaſures, by removing any obſtacle to forming ſuch an adminiſtration as the houſe has declared to be requiſite in the preſent critical and arduous ſituation of affairs, as may tend to give effect to the wiſhes of your faithful commons, which have already been moſt humbly repreſented to your majeſty."

On the 25th this addreſs was preſented, and his majeſty was pleaſed to reply in words to the following tendency:

"That he felt the peculiar neceſſity of a ſtrong, united, and extended adminiſtration, and ſuch as might poſſeſs the confidence of the public. That his endeavours to compoſe the preſent diſtractions by an union of the ableſt men upon a fair and equal footing had very recently been uſed, but without ſucceſs: that until ſuch an adminiſtration could be formed as his faithful commons deſired, he could not ſee how it could conduce to the public good to remove his preſent from all the ſituations of executive government; more eſpecially as no charge had been ſpecified againſt any one of them, and as the repreſentations of large and reſpectable bodies of his ſubjects had expreſſed a ſatisfaction in the late change which he had thought proper to make in his councils."

The king's anſwer being read, Mr. Fox roſe, and ſaid, he would not then enter into the conſideration of it, but would barely remark, that it appeared to him to be final on the part of his majeſty, and therefore the houſe could not well take more than one ſtep farther; and as this proceeding on the part of the houſe ought to be final alſo, there ought to be due time for gentlemen to turn the ſubject in their minds, what that meaſure ſhould be. He then moved that his majeſty's anſwer be taken into conſideration on Monday the 8th of March, which was agreed to without any debate. Accordingly on that day Mr. Fox, after ſome exordium, moved a variety of reſolutions, tending on the whole to teſtify the ſurprize and affliction of the houſe on receiving the anſwer which his majeſty's miniſters had adviſed; to aſſure his majeſty that the houſe neither had diſputed, nor meant in any inſtance to diſpute, much leſs to deny his majeſty's undoubted prerogative of appointing to the executive offices of ſtate ſuch perſons as to his majeſty's wiſdom might ſeem meet; at the ſame time again ſubmitting to his majeſty's royal wiſdom, that no adminiſtration, however legally appointed, can ſerve his majeſty and the public with effect, which does not enjoy the confidence of that houſe. But the opponents of adminiſtration in this inſtance loſt conſiderable ground, having, on a diviſion on Mr. Fox's motion, the majority only of an humble one.

Lord Hinchinbroke informed the houſe on the 10th, that their repreſentation had been laid before his majeſty, who graciouſly received it.

The king went to the houſe of peers on the 25th, and having given the royal aſſent to ſeveral bills then ready, made a ſpeech from the throne as follows:

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"On a full conſideration of the preſent ſituation of affairs, and of the extraordinary circumſtances which have produced it, I am induced to put an end to this ſeſſion of parliament: I feel it a duty, which I owe to the conſtitution and to the country in ſuch a ſituation, to recur as ſpeedily as poſſible to the ſenſe of my people, by calling a new parliament.

"I truſt that this meaſure will tend to obviate the miſchiefs ariſing from the unhappy diviſions and diſtractions which have lately ſubſiſted; and that the various important objects which will require conſideration may be afterwards proceeded upon with leſs interruption and with happier effect.

"I can have no other object, but to preſerve the true principles of our free and happy conſtitution, and to employ the powers entruſted to me by law, for the only end for which they were given, the good of my people."

On the 9th of April the general joy of all who had the love of their country at heart, the ratification on the part of the American congreſs of the definitive treaty between Great Britain and America, arrived.

On the 16th of May the new parliament met, when the commons re-choſe Mr. Cornwall their ſpeaker, and on the 19th his majeſty went in the uſual ſtate to the upper houſe, and opened the ſeſſion with a moſt gracious ſpeech from the throne.

On the 20th the definitive treaty with Holland was ſigned at Paris, and in the beginning of July proclamation of peace between Great Britain and the United Provinces, and alſo with the United States of America, was read by the City Common Crier at the Royal Exchange, and other public places of the metropolis; and a day of thankſgiving was appointed on the 29th for that memorable event.

Soon after advices were received of the peace being ſigned between the Eaſt India Company and Tippoo Saib, an event that was followed by the royal aſſent being given to Mr. Pitt's Eaſt India regulating bill, and the prorogation of the parliament.

A. D. 1785.

January the 25th being the day appointed for the commencement of the ſecond ſeſſion of the preſent parliament, his majeſty opened the ſame with a ſpeech, purporting his deſire of their attention to the adjuſtment of ſuch points in the commercial intercourſe between Great Britain and Ireland as were not then finally arranged, on ſuch a ſyſtem as might beſt enſure the general proſperity of his dominions; and his information, notwithſtanding any appearance of differences on the continent, of having received from all foreign powers the ſtrongeſt aſſurances of their good diſpoſition towards this country; together with his hearty concurrence in every meaſure that could tend to alleviate the national burthen, ſecure the principles of the conſtitution, and promote the welfare of his people. After ſome altercation, or rather converſation, a motion for an addreſs to his majeſty on the occaſion was carried, nem. con. in both houſes.

Three great points were ſubmitted by the miniſter to the conſideration of the commons this ſeſſion, on the 3rd of February, namely, an arrangement of our commercial intercourſe with Ireland; a reform in the repreſentation of parliament; and the ſtate of the national finances. Theſe ſeveral ſubjects met with general approbation, and were ſet apart for diſcuſſion on a future day.

Mr. Fitzpatrick preſented a petition the ſame day from certain of the electors of Weſtminſter, which being read, ſtated in the moſt forcible language, the then unrepreſented ſtate of their city; that without any crime being proved, or even alledged, they were, in fact, disfranchiſed; and that, contrary to every principle of the conſtitution, without being repreſented, they were taxed. The novelty and illegality of the ſcrutiny between the Rt. Hon. Charles Fox and Sir Cecil Wray (the two contending candidates) were placed in a ſtriking point of view, without adverting to their reſpective merits. The petition concluded with praying that the houſe would grant redreſs, by compelling the high-bailiff to give a return. It was ordered to lie on the table.

Pursuant to order the high-bailiff attended the houſe on the 8th, when on one of the members deſiring to know what ſteps had been taken in the ſcrutiny in conſequence of the reſolution of the houſe of the 8th of June laſt, he related the whole of the buſineſs from the commencement of the poll; and declared, amongſt other things, that, according to the rate at which the ſcrutiny proceeded, it would laſt upwards of two years, if continued.

A further conſideration of the ſubject being poſtponed to the next day, it was obſerved by the member who ſpoke particularly on it the preceding day, that the queſtion before the houſe was one of the moſt important that could be agitated in parliament. It involved the conſtitution, for it comprehended the prerogative of the crown and the rights of the people. After ſome ſtrictures on the conduct of the high-bailiff, he ſaid, that from the circumſtances which had tranſpired in the courſe of the ſcrutiny, the high-bailiff had avowed, that his mind was ſatisfied he ſhould be able to make a conſcientious return whenever he ſhould be authoriſed by the houſe to put a period to the ſcrutiny. On this conſideration the ſame member contended, that it was incumbent on the houſe to order the high-bailiff to make a return.

Some objections being made to theſe aſſertions, he made the following motion: "That it appears to "this houſe that T. Corbett, high-bailiff of the "city of Weſtminſter, did receive from the ſheriff "of Middleſex a precept to return two fit and able "citizens to ſerve in parliament for the city of "Weſtminſter, returnable on the 17th day of May "laſt, and that he be ordered forthwith to make a "return of the ſaid precept."

This motion was accordingly ſeconded, but being oppoſed and an amendment propoſed, a long debate enſued, and, on a diviſion, there appeared a majority of 39 in favour of the amendment, on the ſide of the miniſter, as was the caſe on ſeveral future occaſions, till the 3d of March, when Mr. Sawbridge, after ſtating the ſituation of the ſcrutiny, and the variety of inconveniences that attended the continuation of it, moved, "That the "high-bailiff of the city of Weſtminſter, by vir"tue of a precept directed to him by the ſheriff of "Middleſex for electing two citizens to ſerve in "parliament, having finiſhed his poll on the 17th "day of May, the day previous to the return of "the writ, be forthwith ordered to make his re"turn."

It was by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in reply obſerved, that there were no new grounds to argue on, and he ſhould therefore move, "that the "houſe do adjourn." After ſome little altercation, the cry of "queſtion," vociferated from all parts of the houſe, which produced a diviſion, when there appeared a majority of 38 againſt the miniſter. The original motion was then carried nem. con.

The order of the day being read on the 9th, "for "taking into conſideration an adjourned queſtion "for the reſcinding the reſolution of the houſe of "the 8th of June laſt, relative to the Weſtminſter "Scrutiny," the point was ſeverally diſcuſſed by able ſpeakers on both ſides, and particularly by Mr. Fox, who made a very long ſpeech, in which he anſwered the objections of ſeveral members, and contended for the queſtion, but without effect, there being a majority of 105 againſt it. The high-bailiff was ordered, by the houſe, to make his return; and Mr. Fox was declared duly elected for the city of Weſtminſter, on a ſubſequent diviſion.

The moſt important buſineſs next agitated in the lower houſe, was, the great queſtion of a reform in the repreſentation of the people, brought not as heretofore by a member of the oppoſition, but by "the miniſter of the crown." The ſubject was introduced by Mr. Chancellor Pitt, in a very eloquent ſpeech to one of the fulleſt houſes that had ever been witneſſed.

The chief end of Mr. Pitt's propoſition was, that transferring from certain boroughs the power of election to counties and towns of greater conſequence, not by compulſory means, but ſo as to make it an act of their own formation.

When he had ſtated the general principle and particular objects of his plan of reform, and enforced his motion with a variety of arguments, he moved, "that leave be given to bring in a bill to amend "the repreſentation."

However, as on former occaſions, Lord North reprobated the motion as a direct attack upon the Britiſh conſtitution, a conſtitution the work of infinite wiſdom, the ſource of many bleſſings, much happineſs, and much glory. His lordſhip concluded his ſpeech with an emphatic wiſh that the friends of that conſtitution would feel as one man, and rouſe at the danger it would be put in if the motion was carried, and therefore hoped they would have the triumph of preventing it.

Mr. Fox declared he was for the principle of the bill ſpecifically conſidered, namely, that of increaſing the number of members choſen by freeholders in proportion to the repreſentatives of boroughs. The only point he ſaid in which he principally differed from the right honourable mover was, that the preſent parliament ſhould not be affected by the reform. He declared he ſhould give his cordial ſupport to the reform; but begged not to be underſtood as going farther, and concluded with aſſuring the houſe, that he would enter his proteſt againſt the majority of electors at boroughs ſelling the minority.

This gentleman was ſucceeded by Lord Frederic Campbell and another member, the warm friends of the miniſter, who likewiſe ſpoke againſt the motion; and after a few words from Mr. Pitt in reply, the houſe divided, when the following numbers appeared,

Noes - - - 248
Ayes - - - 174

Majority againſt the reform 74

The houſe came to the following reſolutions, on the 7th of March, in a committe on the ſupply:

"That 940,000l. be granted to his Majeſty, for "defraying the expences of buildings, rebuildings, "and repairs of ſhips, for 1785."

"That 675,307l. be granted for the ordinary of "the navy for 1785. The ſaid reſolutions to be "reported on Monday."

It was remarked by Mr. Huſſey, that, having compared the eſtimates now to be provided for with the eſtimates at the cloſe of the former war, he found a very material difference. If the navy was ſo conſiderably increaſed as the difference between the two eſtimates appeared to be (411,000l. at the former period, 940,000l. now), then he was willing to give his ſupport to the motion, but he believed the contrary.

To this Mr. Brett replied, that there were 160 ſail of ſhips more now than at the cloſe of the war in 1764; but another reaſon for the great increaſe was, that, at the period alluded to, there were no marines; at preſent there are. The motion was carried.

April the 13th, the houſe reſolved itſelf into a committee on the petition from the fuſtian manufacturers of Mancheſter, &c. againſt the exciſe duty on fuſtians. The witneſſes this day examined were chiefly intended to invalidate the teſtimony of thoſe who had before been adduced in ſupport of the allegations of the petition.—Among them were officers of Exciſe, who ſpoke chiefly to the arts of evaſion practiſed by the manufacturers, and to the means uſed to ſecure the revenue.

There was now a Mr. Faulkner called to the bar; ſeveral queſtions being aſked him reſpecting the Mancheſter trade, a debate took place, in which Mr. Pitt, Mr. Dundas, Lord North, Mr. Eden, and others, took part, Whether he did not think the evidence given by Mr. Walker was in a great meaſure influenced by the tax laid on their fuſtian manufacture? And a ſpirited altercation enſuing, the queſtion was ſo qualified, that Mr. Faulkner in reply ſaid, that although Mr. Walker was undoubtedly deeply concerned and intereſted in the fuſtian manufacture, yet he did not think him capable on that account of giving a falſe teſtimony.

Now a debate very unintereſting took place about the priority of hearing other petitions which were referred to the committee; and the night being far ſpent, it was agreed to refer the further examinations till Friday, when the houſe accordingly reſolved itſelf into a committee, and proceeded to hear counſel on the ſeveral petitions received.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer opened what is commonly called the budget, May the 4th. He ſtated without any formal preface the national expenditure for the current year, in the following manner:

Naval diſburſements	£2,550,307
Army	2,286,263
Ordnance	392,855
Deficiencies	1,612,908
Exchequer bills unfunded	2,500,000
Somerſet Houſe	25,000
Britiſh Muſeum	3,000
Miſcellaneous Services	35,695
Arrears of duty of the Leeward Iſlands	359,836

He calculated all theſe together, to amount to a ſum of 9,737,868l.; of this, he obſerved, there was already provided 6,184,117l. ſo that 3,553,751l. now remainded.

Next he adverted to the ſituation of the Navy debt, and ſtated the amount of our naval bills to be 9,505,808l. as calculated with intereſt up to the 5th of July, 1785; and the ordnance debt to Midſummer next at 504,349l. in all 1,010,157l. which he propoſed to fund; and to prefer the 5 per cent. ſtock rather than the 3 per cent. for that purpoſe, although he admitted there would be an additional intereſt of about 30,000l. to pay annually. He ſtated, that the whole intereſt to be provided would amount to 413,000l. for the payment of which he propoſed, 1ſt, an augmentation of the tax on male ſervants; 2dly, a tax on female ſervants; 3dly, a tax on retail ſhops; as a compenſation for this tax, he propoſed, he ſaid, to move for the repeal of licences granted to hawkers; 4thly, a tax on gloves; 5thly, a 5l. licence on pawnbrokers; 6thly, an additional half-penny per mile on poſt horſes; and laſtly, a regulation on the conveyance of ſalt coaſt-wiſe. All theſe together he calculated to amount to 422,000l. which, he ſaid, was about 9000l. more than wanted in order to make good deficiences. He then made a recapitulation of his taxes as follows:

Men ſervants	£35,000
Women ditto	140,000
Retail Shops	120,000
Gloves	50,000
Pawn-brokers	15,000
Poſt Horſes	50,000
Salt	12,000
Total,	422,000

He would with this increaſe of revenue, together with the old, be able to pay the intereſt of the loan of a million from the Bank, to make good the deficiency that would be occaſioned by the repeal of ſome of the taxes; to provide for the funding of the navy bills; and for raiſing a ſinking fund of a million, which ſhould annually be applied to the gradual diminution of the national debt. In concluſion, he moved firſt the loan of a million from the Bank.

The report of the Budget from the committee of ways and means was brought up the 10th of this month and read.——The debate that enſued was rather witty and ſarcaſtical, than ſolid and rational.

The toll, which had been paid at Blackfriars Bridge, from its being firſt opened, was taken off on the 22d. of June in this year.

July the 7th, in a committee, to conſider of the act relating to the ſale of medicines, and to ſubject all medicines, drugs, oils, eſſences, &c. &c. ſold in packets, boxes, phials, or other incloſures, in any manner whatever; whether ſold by apothecaries, ſurgeons, or any other perſons, to the reſpective duties in the former act; it was reſolved, that every perſon in Great Britain vending the above drugs ſhould take out a licence; thoſe within the bills of mortality 20s. in the country 5s. per ann.

Mr. Pitt on the 2d of Auguſt, brought in his bill for the eſtabliſhment of a commercial arrangement between Great Britain and Ireland, which was read a firſt time, and ordered to be printed; after which the Houſe adjourned to Thurſday the 27th of October; upon which day the parliament was prorogued to December the 1ſt.

A.D. 1786.

On the 24th of January, his majeſty went in the uſual ſtate to the houſe of peers, and opened the third ſeſſion of the preſent parliament. Both houſes preſented an addreſs of thanks to his majeſty, which were graciouſly received.

April the 11th lord Cornwallis was appointed governor general and commander in chief of Bengal; likewiſe Sir Guy Carleton, commander in chief of Quebec, Nova Scotia, &c.

July the 9th, his Royal Highneſs the prince of Wales, in conſequence of being diſappointed of obtaining an addition to his revenue this ſeſſion, by parliament, dropt his eſtabliſhment, and appointed four gentlemen to arrange his affairs, and appropriate the greater part of his income to the payment of his creditors.

The king, on the 11th, went to the houſe of peers, and prorogued the parliament with a ſpeech from the throne.

Auguſt the 2d. an attempt was made by one Margaret Nicholſon, on the life of his majeſty, as he was alighting from his carriage at the gate of St. James's palace. This woman had been obſerved to wait the king's arrival for ſome time, and, previous to the appearance of the carriage, had taken her ſtation between two women that were unknown to her. On the ſight of the carriage, ſhe begged with ſome earneſtneſs, that they would not impede her from delivering a memorial to his majeſty. As the king was alighting, ſhe puſhed forward, and preſented a paper, which his majeſty received with great condeſcenſion. At that inſtant ſhe ſtruck a concealed knife at the king's breaſt, which his majeſty happily avoided, by bowing as he received the paper. As ſhe was making a ſecond thruſt, one of the yeomen caught her arm; and, at the ſame inſtant, one of the king's footmen wrenched the knife out of her hand. His majeſty, with amazing temper and fortitude, exclaimed, "I have received no injury! Do not hurt the woman; the poor creature appears to be inſane."—The woman was immediately taken into cuſtody, and, upon examination, appeared to be inſane: in conſequence of which ſhe was afterwards ſent to the hoſpital of Bethlehem.

On the 19th of September, a plan was ſet on foot for eſtabliſhing a colony in New Holland, for the convenience of tranſporting convicts thither, and with a future view of improving the ſoil, and cultivating the manners of the natives. And in the courſe of the ſame month a commercial treaty with France was ſigned at Verſailles by Mr. Eden and Monſieur Vergennes, as miniſters plenipotentiary for their reſpective kings.

A. D. 1787. January the 23d both houſes of parliament having met, purſuant to their prorogation, his majeſty then delivered a ſpeech from the throne, in which he informed them, that having concluded a treaty of navigation and commerce with the moſt Chriſtian King, he recommended it to them to take ſuch meaſures as they ſhould judge proper for carrying it into effect, aſſuring them, at the ſame time, that, to promote a beneficial intercourſe between the reſpective ſubjects, and add permanence to the bleſſings of peace, ſhould be the grand object of all his negotiations with foreign powers. He further recommended to them to take ſuch meaſures as might appear neceſſary for carrying into execution a plan formed by his direction, for the tranſportation of convicts: and aſſured them of his reliance on the continuance of their exertions to improve the national reſources, and promote the welfare of his people. His majeſty was waited on with an addreſs from both houſes in conſequence thereof.

On the 7th of February, in the lower houſe, Mr. Sheridan brought forward an important charge againſt Mr. Haſtings, late governor general of Bengal. He diſplayed, in his ſpeech, moſt aſtoniſhing powers of elocution, inſomuch that he fixed the attention of the whole houſe, and concluded with a motion that Warren Haſtings be impeached. The chancellor of the exchequer, after a ſpeech that did him much honour, gave his vote for the motion, declaring that the national character, he was convinced, had been debaſed and degraded; and it was only by this act of national juſtice it could be reſtored to its wonted brilliancy, acquired by its ſacred attachments to honour, juſtice, and humanity. Mr. Sheridan's motion was carried by a majority of 107. The miniſter carried his motions with reſpect to the commercial treaty, by a conſiderable majority. The ſeveral articles of impeachment having, by order of the houſe of commons, been taken by Mr. Burke to the upper houſe, their lordſhips proceeded in due form thereupon on the 21ſt of May. Having held ſome debates on different points, Mr. Haſtings was admitted to bail; and purſuant to the tenor of a petition, allowed a copy of the charge, and, for his defence, had counſel aſſigned him.

On the 30th of May his majeſty went in the uſual ſtate to the houſe of peers, and, by a moſt gracious ſpeech from the throne, put an end to the ſeſſion of parliament.

Soon after the receſs, the miniſtry were engaged in attending to diſputes which ſubſiſted in the Republic of the United Provinces of Holland. The malecontents there were become highly refractory and turbulent, and had treated the royal conſort of his ſerene highneſs the Stadtholder, ſiſter to the king of Pruſſia, with the greateſt indignity. As the ſituation of thoſe ſtates became, by rapid degrees, more critical and alarming, and ſeemed likely, in its conſequence, to affect the ſecurity and intereſt of the Britiſh dominions, every method was taken, on the part of his Britannic majeſty, to effect the reſtoration of tranquillity, and the maintenance of lawful government among them.

With this intent a memorial was preſented on the 14th of Auguſt, by Sir James Harris, envoy extraordinary from his Britannic majeſty to the States General, repreſenting the extreme inquietude with which the king his maſter beheld the continuation of their diſſentions; expreſſing his ardent deſire of ſeeing peace re-eſtabliſhed; and aſſuring them, that, if it ſhould be found neceſſary to recur to a foreign mediation, and to invite his majeſty, every effort ſhould be exerted on his part to bring the negociation to a happy, ſolid, and permanent iſſue. His majeſty alſo thought it neceſſary to explain his intention of counteracting all forcible interference on the part of France in the internal affairs of the Republic: and as the king of Pruſſia had taken meaſures to enforce his demand of ſatisfaction for the inſult offered to the princeſs of Orange, and the party which had uſurped the government of Holland, had applied to the French king for aſſiſtance, and that monarch had notified to his Britannic majeſty his intention of granting their requeſt, immediate orders were given for augmenting the Britiſh forces both by ſea and land, which orders were executed with ſurpriſing facility.

During this interval, the rapid ſucceſs of the Pruſſian troops, under the conduct of the duke of Brunſwick, at once obtained the reparation demanded by their ſovereign, and enabled the provinces to deliver themſelves from the oppreſſion under which they laboured, as well as to re-eſtabliſh their lawful government; inſomuch that all ſubjects of conteſt being thus removed, an explanation took place between the courts of London and Verſailles, and declarations were exchanged by their reſpective miniſters, by which it was mutually agreed to diſarm, and to place their naval eſtabliſhment on the ſame footing as in the beginning of this year. A convention was alſo agreed to between the ſame courts, explanatory of the 13th article of the laſt treaty of peace, and calculated to prevent jealouſies and diſputes between their reſpective ſubjects in the Eaſt-Indies.

On the 27th of November the parliament met for the diſpatch of buſineſs, when his majeſty, in his ſpeech from the throne, took occaſion to mention the alarming events that had lately taken place in Holland, and the meaſures adopted by the Britiſh cabinet, in conſequence of the ſame, according to the tenor of what we have related. The motions for addreſs were carried nem. con. in both houſes. Dr. Watſon, biſhop of Llandaff, a prelate of diſtinguiſhed learning and ability, reminded the upper houſe, upon this occaſion, of the ſentiments he had delivered in the laſt ſeſſion, namely, "That an alliance with Holland was an object of the firſt magnitude to this country; and the moment that France could detach the republic from ſuch an alliance, ſo as to tranſfer her marine, and add it to her own, ſuch an event would put an end to the hiſtory of Britain as a great and powerful nation."

A. D. 1788. January the 17th Lord George Gordon, having been found guilty, in the month of June foregoing, in the court of King's Bench, of publiſhing two libels, one againſt the queen of France, and the other againſt the criminal juriſprudence of this country, was ſentenced to three years impriſonment in Newgate, then to pay a fine of 500l. and find ſecurity for his good behaviour for the term of fourteen years.

On the 21ſt of this month Prince Charles Lewis Caſimir Stuart died at Rome. Since the death of his father in 1765, he had aſſumed to himſelf the title of king of England; but was commonly known on the continent by the name of the Chevalier de St. George, and in England by that of the young Pretender. He was juſt 67 years and two months old on the day of his death. This perſon was grandſon to James II. whoſe ſon was recognized, by ſeveral courts of Europe, as king of England, immediately after the death of his father. As ſuch he received kingly honours, had his palace and his guards, and enjoyed the privilege allowed by the Pope to catholic kings, of beſtowing a certain number of cardinal hats. But his ſon, prince Charles, who lately died, did not enjoy thoſe honours. He was indeed, called prince of Wales, during the life of his father; but, after that event, he no longer bore that title; nor would the catholic courts ſtyle him king. To a natural daughter, whom, by his pretended royal power, he lately created ducheſs of Albany, he has bequeathed all his property he had in the French funds, which was very conſiderable. To his brother, the cardinal, he bequeathed his empty pretenſions to the crown of England.

The city of London, in concurrence with many reſpectable counties, cities, and towns of the kingdom, preſented a petition, on the 10th of February, to the Houſe of Commons, praying that the houſe would take into their moſt ſerious conſideration that part of the traffic carried on by this country to the coaſt of Africa, for procuring ſlaves for the cultivation of our iſlands in the Weſt Indies, and humbly recommending to them to make ſuch regulations in it, as in their great wiſdom and humanity ſhould ſeem meet. And on the ſame day Sir Elijah Impey, againſt whom an impeachment, conſiſting of ſix articles, had been brought forward, by a member of the lower houſe near four months before, was, agreeable to his petition, permitted to be heard in his defence. Having, in the courſe of a few days, gone through three of the charges, he expreſſed a wiſh that the houſe would come to a deciſion on the firſt charge before he proceeded on his defence; the further conſideration of the buſineſs was therefore deferred.

On account of the motion for impeachment made by Mr. Sheridan in the lower houſe, and carried by a great majority, as already obſerved, the trial of Warren Haſtings, Eſq; preceded by the uſual ſolemnities, commenced before the lords at Weſtminſter-hall, on the 13th.

It having been obſerved by Mr. Pitt, previous to his motion in the houſe, on the 15th, "That leave be given to bring in a bill for removing any doubt reſpecting the power of the commiſſioners for the affairs of India, to direct the expence of raiſing, tranſporting, and maintaining ſuch troops as may be judged neceſſary for the ſecurity of the Britiſh territories and poſſeſſions in the Eaſt Indies, to be defrayed out of the revenues ariſing from the ſaid territories and poſſeſſions," that as ſeveral learned gentlemen had been conſulted upon the conſtruction of the act of 1784, and had differed in their opinions, he thought a declaratory act neceſſary, in order to obviate every doubt. The motion, after ſome oppoſition from Mr. Fox, was agreed to; and, on the twelfth of March, the declaratory bill, notwithſtanding much oppoſition, was carried through both houſes by large majorities. A proteſt, however, was entered againſt it, by fifteen members of the upper houſe.

In April, a patriotic member in the lower houſe, moved, "That it is highly injurious to the ſervice, and unjuſt to ſet aſide, from promotions to flags, meritorious officers, and officers not precluded by the orders of his majeſty in council." The motion was, however, negatived, after ſtrenuous exertions in its ſupport.

The houſe proceeded, on the 9th of May, purſuant to a former reſolution, to the final conſideration of the firſt charge againſt Sir Elijah Impey. This charge ſet forth, that Sir Elijah Impey, as chief juſtice of the ſupreme court of Calcutta, in 1774, had officially, in divers inſtances, become the inſtrument of Warren Haſtings, at that time governor general of Bengal, in the unprincipled attack on the life of Maha Rajah Nunducomar. Sir Gilbert Elliot, who brought forward the impeachment, having enlarged upon ſeveral circumſtances, relative to that charge, and finding himſelf much exhauſted, begged the indulgence of the houſe till that day week, which was granted. Sir Gilbert accordingly, at the time ſtated, reſumed the ſubject, and, after adducing ſeveral arguments in ſupport of his allegations, moved that Sir Elijah Impey, for his conduct in this affair, was guilty of high crimes and miſdemeanors. A debate enſued upon this motion, in the courſe of which ſeveral gentlemen diſplayed their elocution in ſupport of their reſpective opinions. Mr. Pitt was decidedly againſt the motion. After ſome previous obſervation, he inſiſted that Sir Elijah had acted under the authority of an act of parliament, which he had not violated in any one inſtance. By a majority of eighteen voices this motion was negatived.

On the 18th of June a proviſional treaty of defenſive alliance was ſigned between the miniſters plenipotentiary of their majeſties, the kings of Great Britain and Pruſſia; and on the 11th of the following month the ſeſſion of parliament was cloſed.

November the 5th the centenary of the revolution in 1688, was obſerved by many ſocieties in the metropolis, and other parts of the kingdom, not only with feſtivity, but devotion and thankſgiving. At the moſt reſpectable of theſe ſocieties, a noble earl, who preſided on the occaſion, moved, that application be made to parliament, to obſerve the future anniverſary of the 16th of December, as a day of ſolemn thankſgiving, it being on that day the Bill of Rights was paſſed. It was agreed to; and at another ſociety, a very conſiderable ſubſcription was raiſed towards erecting a column in Runnemede, in commemoration of that glorious day.

The two houſes of parliament met on the 20th, but his majeſty not being preſent in the houſe of peers, by reaſon of the ſevere indiſpoſition, under which he unhappily laboured, and no commiſſion having iſſued, either for holding, or for a further prorogation of the parliament; both houſes agreed unanimouſly to adjourn to the 4th of December; when both houſes met, purſuant to adjournment. The main buſineſs related to the examination of his majeſty's phyſicians, which had taken place the preceding day, before the privy council, and motions reſpecting the ſame were unanimouſly carried, in both houſes, which then adjourned.

The Marquis of Stafford, in the houſe of peers, roſe on the 8th of the ſame month in the abſence of earl Camden, lord preſident of the council, and after ſubmitting a variety of conſiderations to their lordſhips, which were approved by ſome, and diſapproved by others, ſucceſſively moved for the appointment of a ſelect committee, to examine the phyſicians; that the committee conſiſt of twenty-one lords; and that each peer deliver in to the clerk a liſt of twenty-one lords, ſigned by his name, the next ſitting of the houſe. Theſe three motions were agreed to nemine diſſentiente. And in the houſe of commons, the chancellor of the exchequer moved for the appointment of a committee of twenty-one, for the ſame purpoſe; which being agreed to, the chancellor's nomination was unanimouſly approved of and adopted.

On the 10th the examination of the ſeven phyſicians by the ſelect committee was laid before the commons, when it appeared, that they all agreed in the main objects of inquiry. In conſequence of theſe proceedings, a grand queſtion was ſtarted in the houſe of commons, between two great parliamentary leaders, the right honourable William Pitt, and the right honourable Charles James Fox, concerning the right of ſupplying the deficiency of the royal authority, during the incapacity of his majeſty, confirmed by the unanimous opinion of his phyſicians, on their examination by the ſelect committee appointed for that purpoſe. Mr. Pitt, after adverting to the melancholy circumſtance ſo generally lamented, moved, that a committee be appointed to ſearch for precedents of proceeding, in caſe of the interruption or ſuſpenſion of the executive government from the infancy, ſickneſs, infirmity, or other incapacity of the ſovereign. Mr. Fox combated the neceſſity of appointing this committee, and aſſerted, that the heir apparent, if of full age and capacity, had as natural and indiſputable a claim to the full exerciſe of the executive power, during the continuance of the incapacity of the ſovereign, as in caſe of his natural demiſe, and thence inſerred that all further delay was improper. Mr. Pitt declared, that the aſſertion of his opponent, reſpecting the claim of the heir apparent, was little leſs than treaſon, and averred on the contrary, that in caſe of ſuch incapacity, he had no more right to the exerciſe of the executive power than any other ſubject; and that it belonged to the two remaining branches of the legiſlature alone in behalf of the people, to make ſuch proviſions for ſupplying the temporary deficiency, as they might think moſt proper to preſerve unimpaired the intereſt of the ſovereign and the ſafety and welfare of the nation. After ſome further altercation, in which Mr. Burke took a part, Mr. Pitt's motion was put and carried, and a committee appointed accordingly.

The houſe of commons, in conſequence of a motion carried on the 12th, having reſolved itſelf into a committee of the whole houſe on the 16th, to conſider the ſtate of the nation, the chancellor of the Exchequer, after a long introductory ſpeech, which diſplayed great ability, proceeded to move three reſolutions as follow:

I. "Reſolved, That it is the opinion of this committee, that his majeſty is prevented, by his preſent indiſpoſition, from coming to his parliament, and from attending to public buſineſs; and that the public exerciſe of the royal authority is thereby for the preſent interrupted.

II. "That it is the right and duty of the lords ſpiritual, and temporal, and commons, of Great Britain, now aſſembled; and lawfully, fully, and freely repreſenting all the eſtates of the people of Great Britain: to provide the means of ſupplying the defect of the perſonal exerciſe of the royal authority, ariſing from his majeſty's ſaid indiſpoſition, in ſuch manner, as the exigence of the caſe may ſeem to require.

III. "That for this purpoſe, and for maintaining entire the conſtitutional authority of the king, it is neceſſary that the ſaid lords ſpiritual and temporal, and commons, of Great Britain, ſhould determine on the means, whereby the royal aſſent may be given in parliament, to ſuch bills as may be paſſed by the two houſes of parliament, reſpecting the exerciſe of the powers and authorities of the crown, in the name, and on the behalf of the king, during the continuance of his majeſty's preſent indiſpoſition."

Of theſe the firſt was carried unanimouſly; and ſome amendments being propoſed to be made to the ſecond and third, the three reſolutions were communicated to the lords, for their conſent.

The lords took the three reſolutions of the commons into conſideration on the 29th, when the firſt paſſed nem. diſſ. To the ſecond lord Rawdon moved, by way of amendment, "That an humble addreſs be preſented to his Royal Highneſs the Prince of Wales, to take upon him the adminiſtration of the civil and military government of the kingdom, during the continuance of his majeſty's preſent indiſpoſition, and no longer. This produced a long debate, which terminated in a diviſion, contents, 66, non-contents, 99. Majority againſt the amendment, 33. The reſolutions were then agreed to, and the houſe adjourned. A proteſt, however, was entered againſt the reſolutions by 48 peers.

A. D. 1789. January the 2d, the clerk of the houſe of commons announced the death of the late ſpeaker, the Rt. Hon. Wolfran Cornwall, and being directed to adjourn to the 5th, the election of a ſpeaker came on that day, when the Rt. Hon. William Wyndham Grenville was propoſed by the friends of adminiſtration, and Sir Gilbert Elliot, Bart. by the oppoſition. The former was choſen by a majority of ſeventy-one; after this, a meſſage was received from the lords, deſiring a conference, which being acceded to, the commons were informed, that their lordſhips had agreed to the three reſolutions already ſtated, without any alteration whatever.

A re-examination of the king's phyſicians was propoſed and carried on the 6th, on a motion made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, reſtricting it to a ſelect committee of the houſe, in oppoſition to Mr. Sheridan's amendment, that they be re-examined at the bar of the houſe. This re-examination took up ſo many days, that the report of the ſelect committee could not be brought up till the 13th; and on the 16th the chancellor of the exchequer, after various arguments for the different reſolutions he had to propoſe, proceeded to ſtate them in the following manner:

I. "That it is the opinion of this committee, that for the purpoſe of providing for the exerciſe of the king's royal authority during the continuance of his majeſty's illneſs, in ſuch manner, and to ſuch extent, as the preſent circumſtances of the urgent concerns of the nation appear to require; it is expedient that his royal highneſs the prince of Wales, being reſident within the realm, ſhall be empowered to exerciſe and adminiſter the royal authority according to the laws and conſtitution of Great Britain, in the name, and on the behalf of his majeſty, under the ſtyle and title of REGENT of the kingdom, and to uſe, execute, and perform, in the name, and on the behalf of his majeſty, all authorities, prerogatives, acts of government, and adminiſtration of the ſame, which belong to the king of this realm to uſe, execute, and perform, according to the law thereof, ſubject to ſuch limitations and exceptions as ſhall be provided.

II. "That the prince regent ſhould not confer peerages but on perſons of the royal iſſue, and thoſe of full age.

III. "That he ſhould not grant offices, penſions, nor ſalaries for life, or in reverſion.

IV. "That the real and perſonal property of his majeſty ſhould be ſecured, and not be conſidered as appertaining to, or under the controul of the prince regent.

V. "That it is the opinion of this committee, that the care and cuſtody of the king's perſon ſhould be committed to the queen's moſt excellent Majeſty; that her majeſty ſhould have power to remove and appoint, from time to time, all perſons belonging to the different departments of his majeſty's houſhold during the continuance of his majeſty's illneſs, and no longer; and that for the better enabling her majeſty to perform this duty, it is expedient that a council ſhall be appointed to adviſe with her majeſty, on all matters relative to the ſaid truſt, who ſhall alſo be impowered to examine upon oath, at ſuch times as they ſhall think fit, the phyſicians who have attended, or may in future attend his majeſty, touching the ſtate of his majeſty's health."

Theſe reſolutions were all at length agreed to, but not without great altercation, before either of them was carried; and before the lords could communicate their concurrence to the commons, a proteſt was entered on their journals, by upwards of 50 peers.

On the 23d, however, the lords took into conſideration the report from the committee, appointed to conſider the reſolutions of the commons, delivered at the late conference; and the report being read by the clerk, it was moved, to agree with the committee in the ſame, which (upon the queſtion) was accordingly ordered.

Mr. Pitt, on the 27th, moved, in the lower houſe, that the purport of the ſaid reſolutions ſhould be communicated to her Majeſty, and his Royal Highneſs the Prince of Wales, which was agreed to, and the motions ordered to be communicated to the lords, whoſe concurrence being alſo communicated to the commons, on the 30th the joint committee waited on the Prince of Wales, with the reſolutions of both houſes of parliament, to which his royal highneſs replied in terms that did honour to his humanity, liberality, and patriotiſm. The ſame day the committee waited on the queen, and received from her Majeſty an anſwer, expreſſive of the ſatisfaction and pleaſure ſhe derived from the meaſures they had adopted in the preſent ſituation of affairs.

The anſwers of the two royal perſonages being reported to the lords, on the 31ſt, lord Camden roſe, and after ſtating a variety of reaſons for having recourſe to the great ſeal, in the preſent incomplete ſtate of the legiſlature, he ſaid, that two reſolutions would be found neceſſary to be adopted. The firſt was, to eſtabliſh a commiſſion to open and hold the parliament in due form; the ſecond would follow up the firſt at a convenient time, for the purpoſe of impowering the royal aſſent to be given, in his majeſty's name, to the bill of regency, by the ſame, or by another commiſſion. His lordſhip concluded by moving, "That it is expedient and neceſſary, letters patent, under the great ſeal of Great Britain, be impowered to be iſſued by the authority of the two houſes of parliament, in the tenor and form following:" Here followed an exact tranſcript of the writ uſually iſſued under the ſign manual, impowering certain commiſſioners to open and hold the king's parliaments at Weſtminſter. The commiſſioners nominated by the preſent letters patent were, the prince of Wales, the duke of York, the dukes of Cumberland and Glouceſter, the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the lord chancellor, the lords preſident and privy ſeal, the two ſecretaries of ſtate, lord Chatham, lord Weymouth, and ſome other of the officers of ſtate. Their names were however omitted in the commiſſion at the deſire of the prince of Wales, and the dukes of York, Cumberland, and Glouceſter.

The parliament being opened on the 3d of February, the two houſes were deemed competent to all their cuſtomary functions; and, accordingly, in the houſe of commons, the uſual ſtanding orders, at the commencement of a ſeſſion, were now read for the firſt time, and agreed to; and the chancellor of the exchequer moved for leave to bring in a bill, "to provide for the care of his majeſty's royal perſon, and for the adminiſtration of the royal authority during his majeſty's illneſs;" which was accordingly ordered to be prepared and brought in.

The regency bill ſtill continued the ſubject of much conſideration in both houſes of parliament, till the 10th of March, when the lords commiſſioners ſent a meſſage to the commons, to deſire their attendance in the houſe of peers, and announced to them, by his majeſty's command, his happy recovery from his late indiſpoſition, and conſequent capacity for attending to the public affairs of his kingdom, together with his warmeſt acknowledgments for their late proofs of attachment to his perſon and government; to which were added ſome informations of a political nature. On the occaſion, London, Weſtminſter, and the country round for ſeveral miles, were ſuperbly illuminated, and univerſal joy was manifeſted by all ranks of people. The regency bill was conſequently ſet aſide by the lords as unneceſſary.

On the 2d of April, Mr. Fox made a motion for the repeal of the ſhop tax. He ſpoke upon this, as upon every other occaſion, with the utmoſt energy; ſubſtantiated his arguments, by referring to matters of fact, and upon the whole, evinced its partiality, and conſequent oppreſſion. The chancellor of the exchequer, after ſome previous remarks, evidently of a popular tendency, declared he ſhould not oppoſe the repeal, but on the contrary give it his ſupport. The queſtion being put, it was carried unanimouſly; and the repeal took place on the 19th of May following.

On the 8th the earl of Saliſbury, lord chamberlain, ſignified to the houſe his majeſty's appointment of the obſervation of the 23d as a day of public thankſgiving to Almighty God for the removal from his majeſty the late illneſs with which he had been afflicted, and his majeſty's intention, for the greater ſolemnity of that day, of going to St. Paul's cathedral, to return thanks to Almighty God for the great mercy that had been extended to him. Accordingly on the day appointed, their majeſties, attended by the whole royal family, the houſes of lords and commons, and a moſt ſuperb retinue, went to St. Paul's in ſtate, amidſt the joyful acclamations of the populace, who demonſtrated their loyalty and affection by every poſſible token, and particularly on the following evening, by the moſt univerſal and ſplendid illuminations ever exhibited.

On the 9th of June, his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, the firſt time ſince his happy recovery, in order to ſignify to the commons, at the bar of that houſe, his royal approbation of Henry Addington, Eſq. to be their ſpeaker, who had been elected in the room of Mr. Grenville, appointed a ſecretary of ſtate: and on the 23d, a petition was preſented from the city of London, complaining of a propoſed plan of ſubjecting tobacco to the laws of exciſe, and praying to be heard by counſel againſt the proviſions contained in the bill brought into the houſe, reſpecting tobacco. The petition was read and granted.

On the 11th of Auguſt both houſes of parliament were prorogued by commiſſion, after a ſpeech from the lord chancellor, purporting the acquieſcence and approbation of his majeſty with reſpect to the general proceedings during the courſe of the ſeſſion.

A. D. 1790.

January the twenty-firſt his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and opened the ſeſſions with a ſpeech, in which he expreſſed his concern for the continuance of the war on the continent, and the events of which it had been productive.

On the 5th of February Sir John Miller moved, that the clerks of the different cities and market towns of Great Britain, do tranſmit a copy of their ſtandards of weights and meaſures to the clerk of the houſe of commons, with ſpecifications of ſuch articles as are ſold by weight and meaſure. This was agreed to.

On the 9th of February the diſcuſſion of the ordnance eſtimates came on, when Mr. Pulteney ſtated a variety of objections to the greatneſs of the peace eſtabliſhment. In reply to what he urged on this head, Mr. Grenville obſerved, that œconomy was not to be promoted by keeping up leſs eſtabliſhments than were wiſe and neceſſary; it would be a moſt miſerable œconomy, indeed, that lowered the eſtabliſhment to ſuch a degree, as ſhould hold out a temptation to an attack, by which the country might be brought into ſuch a ſituation, that in the ſhort ſpace of one month, the ſavings of twenty years might be ſwept away.

Mr. Burke ſaid, he was an enemy to all abſolute power, whether in the monarch, in an ariſtocracy, or in a democracy; he revered our well-poiſed and well-mingled conſtitution, and deprecated the ſpeculations of the French; they had proved themſelves fine architects; they had deſtroyed in two months what ages would not reſtore; in that ſhort time they had madly pulled down their monarchy, their church, their laws, their army, their commerce, their conſtitution. They had a deſperate democracy, formed of deſperate men—They had an army without a head—without diſcipline—their generals with halters round their necks—their aſſembly forced to ſubmit to the dictates of the army, and the whole empire in one general ſcene of anarchy and confuſion.

Mr. Sheridan roſe, and in the ſtrongeſt terms reprobated the ſpeech of the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Burke); he condemned his alluſions to France as ſtrictly contrary to the ſentiments that ought to be held by an Engliſhman. The right hon. gentleman had that day proved himſelf to be a ſupporter of deſpotiſm, and a libeller of men exerting themſelves in the cauſe of freedom. He conſidered the French revolution as a glorious ſtruggle, and wiſhed them every ſucceſs.

The chancellor of the exchequer highly complimented the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Burke) for the true principles he had laid down of our happy conſtitution; the ground of which he pledged himſelf, with that gentleman, to exert himſelf to maintain ſacred and inviolate, and to reſiſt all attempts to injure, under what maſk ſoever they might be made. However he had diſagreed with the right hon. gentleman on former points, he felt for the principles he had that day advanced, the utmoſt gratitude and reverence, and declared that to the lateſt poſterity the country ought gratefully to revere his name. The reſolutions were then read a ſecond time, and agreed to.

The important conſideration of a repeal of the Corporation and Teſt Acts came on in the houſe of commons the 2d of March, upon the motion of Mr. Fox, who in a ſpeech of conſiderable length expatiated on the hardſhips the Diſſenters were ſubject to, from the reſtrictions impoſed on them by thoſe acts: he alſo contraſted the different principles of perſecution and toleration; ſpoke highly in favour of the loyal and peaceable diſpoſition of that reſpectable body of people; and, towards the concluſion of his ſpeech, entered ſhortly on the origin of the Corporation and Teſt Acts, which were paſſed immediately after the heat of the civil wars; the Corporation, to prevent the admiſſion of ſuch Diſſenters who were conſidered to be antimonarchical; and the Teſt againſt the Roman catholics.

The chancellor of the exchequer expreſſed his ſtrong oppoſition to the motion now ſubmitted to the houſe: he confeſſed his approbation of the right honourable gentleman's arguments againſt perſecution, and for toleration, but could not admit the definition of that word as given by the right honourable gentleman.

The motion was ſupported by Mr. Beaufoy, who contended, that the Diſſenters were treated with unparalleled injuſtice, and that as they had ever proved themſelves to be good citizens, they ought to participate in every privilege, enjoyed by their fellow citizens.

Mr. Martin ſpoke in favour of the repeal; but, in compliance with the inſtructions of his conſtituents, gave his vote contrary to his own opinion.

Mr. Powis argued forcibly againſt the repeal, and hoped he might never live to ſee thoſe acts deſtroyed, for, whenever they were, it would be productive of anarchy and perſecution. Alſo Mr. Burke made a long ſpeech, declarative of his ſentiments againſt the repeal. He perfectly coincided with the arguments of the chancellor of the exchequer, and obſerved, that the turn of affairs in France proved the danger of any ſort of innovation or alteration in the laws of the land; the Teſt Act had been impoſed for the wiſeſt purpoſes, and its good effects were now experienced.

Mr. Fox at length cloſed the debate with a review of all that had been ſaid on it. He confeſſed the candour and ability which Mr. Pitt had obſerved in his reply, and explained a few remarks in which he had miſconceived him. He ſaid, he was ſorry again to differ from his friend Mr. Burke, on ſuch a great conſtitutional queſtion; for he had imbibed from his converſation and talents almoſt all the information of which he was maſter.—At three o'clock the houſe divided, Ayes 105, Noes 294—Majority 189.

Mr. Burke on the 16th of April, preſented a petition from Briſtol againſt the tobacco bill; and on the motion of Mr. Sheridan, the houſe reſolved itſelf into a committee to conſider of the ſeveral petitions that had been preſented againſt that bill, which he ſaid, conſiſted of two parts, the export trade, and the home manufacturers.

Mr. Pitt defended the principle of the bill; and concluded a very difficult and intricate ſpeech with an obſervation tending to convince the committee of the ſmall danger there was that the traders ſhould be driven out of the country in conſequence of the act, as it was his opinion, that the increaſe of the revenue was the greateſt proof of their ſucceſs.

From the obſervations which had fallen, Mr. Sheridan begged leave to withdraw his former motion, and to move for a total repeal of the Tobacco Exciſe Act. And at a quarter before three the houſe divided; when the numbers were, for the repeal, 147; againſt it, 191; majority, 44.

On the 19th of April, in a committee of ways and means, Mr. Pitt informed the houſe, that he hoped to lay before them a ſimple and intelligible ſtatement of the finances of the country, ſuch as he truſted would preclude the poſſibility of much doubt or diſpute upon the ſubject, and give univerſal ſatisfaction. According to which, among other calculations, the average revenue of the laſt three years, ending on the 9th of January, 1790, amounted to £13,123,000

Land and malt ———	2,750,000
	15,873,000

The average of the laſt three years, ending on the 5th of April, exceeded this ſum, and amounted to £13,246,000

Land and malt —	2,750,000
This he ſaid was the ſtate of the annual revenue —	15,996,000

Since the year 1785, they had paid with the loan of one million, by the help of extraordinary aids, various extraordinary expences for putting the navy on its proper eſtabliſhment. They had ſatisfied extraordinaries of the army and ordnance; they had paid large ſums to the American loyaliſts, as alſo the debts of his Royal Highneſs the Prince of Wales. They had paid, ſince the year 1785, above ſix millions on theſe accounts. With reſpect to the national debt, he ſaid 5,184,000l. of 3 per cent. annuities had actually been taken from the burdens of the people.

The ſeveral reſolutions having paſſed the committee, were ordered to be received on the 20th.

On the 9th of May, a meſſage was brought from his majeſty relative to the veſſels captured at Nootka Sound; which on the following day was taken into conſideration, and an addreſs thereupon agreed to.

On the 10th of the ſame month, leave was given to bring in a bill for altering the ſentence for burning women attainted and convicted of certain crimes, and ſubſtituting other puniſhments in lieu thereof.

On the 8th of June, the bill for prohibiting the exportation, and encouraging the importation of corn, till the 28th day of February, 1791, was read the third time, and paſſed.

On the 10th of June his majeſty put an end to the ſeſſion by a ſpeech from the throne, wherein he expreſſed a ſtrong deſire for a juſt and honourable peace, but deemed war under the preſent circumſtances unavoidable.

This year accounts were received at the Admiralty of a mutiny on board the Bounty armed ſhip in the South Sea, under the command of capt. Bligh. This veſſel left England in 1787, on a voyage to the Society Iſlands, for bread fruit trees, intended for our Weſt India ſettlements. Having made good the object of her voyage in 1789, the mutiny took place, and the mutineers, of whom one Fletcher Chriſtian was leader, ſucceeded. The captain, with only nineteen who remained faithful to him, were ſet adrift in a boat, wherein, having agreed to the ſcanty portion of an ounce of bread and one gill of wine per day, after forty-ſix days they reached Timor. A full and copious relation of this extraordinary buſineſs, including the mutiny, &c. is given by Portlock in his Collection of Travels and Voyages, to which we beg leave to refer our readers for a more ſatisfactory account.

On the 10th of July, the trial of the famous Renwick Williams, known by the name of The Monſter, took place. The offence of this man was of a very extraordinary nature—He took an opportunity of inſulting every lady he met unguarded, and ſtabbing her behind. He was indicted upon the ſtatute of 1ſt George I. for aſſaulting Miſs Ann Porter on the king's highway, and feloniouſly and maliciouſly intending to cut and deſtroy her clothes.

There was another count for cutting and tearing her clothes.

Mr. Pigott, leading counſel for the proſecution, ſtated the caſe wirh great preciſion.

Miſs Ann Porter, the proſecutrix, was the firſt witneſs. She ſaid, that on the 8th of January laſt ſhe left the ball room at St. James's, at a quarter paſt eleven o'clock at night, and went towards her father's houſe, accompanied by her ſiſters, and a Mrs. Meale. As ſhe was paſſing the rails of the houſe, ſhe received a violent blow on her hip, and, turning round, ſaw the priſoner ſtoop down; ſhe knew it was him, having ſeen his perſon before, and having been previouſly inſulted by him with language too ſhocking to repeat. Theſe previous inſults ſhe had received from him in the day-time, three or four times, and therefore ſhe took particular notice of him. After having aſſaulted her, he came by the rails of the door, ſtood cloſe to her, and ſtared her full in the face. Her upper and under garment were cut, and ſhe was terribly wounded by ſome extremely ſharp inſtrument.

She ſaw the priſoner afterwards in St. James's Park, on the 13th of June, when ſhe pointed him out to Mr. Coleman. She was then deſired to look at the priſoner at the bar, which ſhe did, and poſitively declared he was the man who had aſſaulted her; ſhe had ſuffered ſo much from him, that ſhe could not be miſtaken in his perſon, which had left a ſtrong impreſſion on her mind. Miſs Sarah Porter, who was followed and inſulted by the priſoner in the ſame manner, told a ſtory of like nature. Their depoſitions were confirmed by Miſſes Rebecca and Martha Porter and Mr. John Coleman.

The proſecutrix's clothes were produced in court. They were cut quite through, from the bottom up to the waiſt. Mr. Tomkins, a ſurgeon, proved the wound the proſecutrix had received, which was inflicted with an extremely ſharp inſtrument. It was three or four inches deep, and about nine or ten in length.

The priſoner in his defence lamented the hardſhip of his caſe. He ſaid, he had no ſatisfaction under the load of reproach and calumny that had been thrown upon him by popular prejudice, proceeding from a fatal miſtake made by his proſecutors, but conſcious innocence. He had been already prematurely convicted; but he truſted the evidence he ſhould adduce would make his innocence manifeſt.—Many witneſſes were then called to prove an alibi; but there were ſome circumſtances ſtated by thoſe witneſſes in which they contradicted each other.

Seventeen witneſſes were called to the priſoner's character, ſome of whom were very handſome women. They all gave him a moſt excellent character for good-nature, humanity, and kindneſs to the fair-ſex in general.

Mr. Juſtice Buller ſummed up the whole of the evidence with his uſual abilities, accompanied by numberleſs appoſite obſervations. He ſaid, if the jury ſhould pronounce the priſoner guilty, he ſhould reſerve the queſtion of law, as it was a new caſe, for the opinion of the twelve judges.

The jury pronounced the priſoner guilty.

The judge then reſpited judgment till the next December ſeſſions, and ordered the recognizances on the other proſecutions to be reſpited till that time, in order that the opinions of the judges might be obtained. The trial laſted upwards of eight hours. The court was more crowded than ever was known.

The new parliament aſſembled on the 25th of November; the next day his majeſty opened the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech from the throne:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"It is a great ſatisfaction to me to inform you, that the differences which had ariſen between me and the court of Spain, have happily been brought to an amicable termination.

"I have ordered copies of the declarations exchanged between my ambaſſador and the miniſter of the Catholic King, and of the convention which has ſince been concluded, to be laid before you.

"The objects which I have propoſed to myſelf in the whole of this tranſaction, have been to obtain a ſuitable reparation for the act of violence committed at Nootka, and to remove the grounds of ſimilar diſputes in future, as well as to ſecure to my ſubjects the exerciſe of their navigation, commerce, and fiſheries, in thoſe parts of the world which were the ſubject of diſcuſſion.

"The zeal and public ſpirit manifeſted by all ranks of my ſubjects, and the diſpoſition and conduct of my allies, had left me no room to doubt of the moſt vigorous and effectual ſupport; but no event could have afforded me ſo much ſatisfaction, as the attainment of the objects which I had in view, without any actual interruption of the bleſſings of peace.

"Since the laſt ſeſſion of parliament, a foundation has been laid for a pacification between Auſtria and the Porte, and I am now employing my mediations in conjunction with my allies, for the purpoſe of negociating a definitive treaty between thoſe powers, and of endeavouring to put an end to the diſſentions in the Netherlands, in whoſe ſituation I am neceſſarily concerned, from conſiderations of national intereſt, as well as from the engagements of treaties.

"A ſeparate peace has taken place between Ruſſia and Sweden; but the war between the former of thoſe powers and the Porte ſtill continues. The principles on which I have hitherto acted, will make me always deſirous of employing the weight and influence of this country in contributing to the reſtoration of general tranquillity."

Earl Poulett moved "an addreſs of thanks to his majeſty for his gracious ſpeech," which was carried unanimouſly.

On the 13th of December, in the houſe of lords, lord Kinnoul after a ſhort preface moved "an addreſs to his majeſty for copies of all the memorials interchanged between this court and that of Spain, from the 10th of February to the 28th of October, reſpecting Nootka Sound."

On the ſame day Mr. Grey made a motion in the houſe of commons, for papers, ſimilar to that of the earl of Kinnoul, which was negatived by 258 to 134: and on the following day (Tueſday, Dec. 14), on the convention being taken into conſideration, the motion for an addreſs of thanks to his majeſty, in approbation of it, was carried by 247 to 123.

Among the ſeveral petitions which were delivered complaining of undue returns, one which Mr. Martin preſented from John Horne Tooke, Eſq; being read by the clerk, threw the houſe into no ſmall ſtate of confuſion, it not being known from its very extraordinary tendency, its contemptuous language, and the novelty of its prayer, under what head of petitions it ſhould be claſſed. It being however neceſſary according to act of parliament, to fix a day and hour for conſidering of all petitions touching elections, the ſpeaker accordingly propoſed the day and hour, and after much debate thereupon it was agreed, "that the ſaid petition be referred to the conſideration of a committee, on Friday the 4th of February next."

The chancellor of the exchequer now brought forward the ſubject of ways and means, for defraying the expences incurred in the armament againſt Spain in the Nootka Sound. To give our readers a clear idea of theſe expences, we ſhall lay the particulars before them in the following abſtract.

To provide for an expence of this amount was a taſk, Mr. Pitt ſaid, of the utmoſt importance, and a load that muſt fall heavily in addition to our preſent burdens. But when burdens were unavoidable, we ſhould always meet them with manlineſs and ſpirit. Thoſe who thought with him, that the advantages of the convention were ſuch as muſt ſhortly repay a large proportion of the preſent expences; and that the honour of the nation had been rightly and fully vindicated; and that other nations had been properly impreſſed with a ſenſe of the weight and conſequence of this empire,—could look to thoſe new burdens with a diminiſhed ſenſe of their preſſure. He then ſaid, he would give the committee a general plan of the means by which he propoſed to provide for the expences lately incurred; and if, in proceeding to this end, there occurred a large ſum, of which the public could avail themſelves without prejudice to an individual, it would be right to take this advantage; he adverted to thoſe accumulated iſſues in the Bank of England—the unclaimed dividends. Mr. Pitt then entered into a long hiſtory of the balances which came under the head of dead and extinguiſhed arrears ſince the year 1727. In that year, he ſaid, the balance was

In 1752, the amount was	60,000
1774, — —	292,000
1776, — —	814,000
And in 1789, July 5, —	547,000

The caſh balance at the preſent time, he had no doubt exceeded this account 100,000l. On this ground he ſtated his firſt propoſition, which was, that 500,000l. ſhould be taken from the bank, to be applied to the diſcharge of the late expences: the conſolidated fund to pledge its ſecurity for this ſum, which was to be conſidered as a debt from the nation to the creditors, if thoſe creditors ſhould ever come forward. To obviate any idea which may poſſibly ariſe of an interruption of payment, he propoſed that a floating balance ſhould be left in the bank of 50,000l.; and that if ever this ſum was broken in upon, it ſhould be immediately ſupplied from the exchequer. By this mode, there could not occur even the remoteſt poſſibility of an interruption of payment, and the public would enjoy the uſe of this ſum without intereſt. The chancellor then proceeded to ſtate the ways and means for defraying the remaining 2,600,000l. It was propoſed, he ſaid, to pay off 800,000l. with this ſum of 500,000l. in the firſt year—to pay an additional 800,000l. in the ſecond year; to diminiſh the taxes then in ſuch a way, that the remaining million ſhould be paid in equal parts in the two ſubſequent years; and that thus in the ſhort term of FOUR years the whole debt may be extinguiſhed.—He truſted, that, in conſidering the nature of the taxes which he had to propoſe to this effect, the committee would conſider that they were merely temporary, and that this was the only way by which we could ſuſtain a permanent ſyſtem for the reduction of our debt.

The firſt tax that he ſhould propoſe was on ſugar; at preſent this article was taxed at the rate of 12s. 4d. per cwt. he intended an additional tax of 2s. 8d. per cwt. the produce of which would be 241,000l. Amongſt other obſervations which he made on this tax, he thought it particularly well-timed now, as it went to defray the expences of preventing a war, which, had it taken place, would have made a much more conſiderable riſe on the price of that commodity. The next tax was on ſpirits, both Britiſh and foreign; and the amount he expected from the increaſe of the duties already paid on them would be as follows: from Britiſh ſpirits 81,000l. brandy 87,000l. rum 67,000l. Malt, at an addition of 3d. per buſhel, 126,000l. and then he would propoſe an addition to what were called the aſſeſſed taxes, ſuch as windows, houſes, ſervants, and horſes, with the exception of the commutation tax. The amount of 10 per cent. taken on theſe taxes, would be 100,000l. To theſe he meant to add ſomething upon game-licences and deputations, which, taken at the rate of one third upon licences, and one half on deputations, would amount to 25,000l. The taxes on bills of exchange and receipts were ſubject to great abuſe. If a mode could be deviſed to prevent evaſion, nothing could be more deſirable. With regard to the former, it was neceſſary to prevent their reiſſuing the ſame bills; and, with reſpect to the latter, it might be of advantage to enforce a large duty on ſums paid with notoriety, which could not be done in minute and miſcellaneous tranſactions. From theſe duties he expected to raiſe one, two, or even 300,000l. yet he would not take it at more than 72,000l. which completed preciſely the ſum of 800,000l. which it was propoſed to raiſe. Recapitulation:

Sugar, — —	£.241,000
Britiſh ſpirits, — —	81,000
Foreign brandy, — —	87,000
Rum, — —	67,000
Malt, — —	126,000
Aſſeſſed taxes, — —	100,000
Game-licences, — —	26,000
Bills of exchange and receipts,	72,000
Total	800,000

Mr. Pitt concluded with moving, "That 1,300,000l. the amount of the ſum to be taken from the Bank, and of the propoſed taxes, ſhould be charged on the conſolidated funds."

Much time was ſpent in debate, and the miniſter was obliged to content himſelf with accepting the required loan from the Bank without intereſt, as long as a floating balance to that amount ſhould remain in the hands of the caſhier. The reſt of this buſineſs was finally ſettled.

The war which had been for ſome time carried on between the ſubjects of his Britannic majeſty and Tippoo Sultan, engaged the preſent attention. On the 21ſt Mr. Hippeſley entered into a very comprehenſive and intelligent detail of our connections and treaties with the native powers in India; which led him to enquire into the nature, cauſes, and conſequences, of the war. He ſtated our alliance with the Rajah of Travancore, and the neceſſity there was for adhering to the treaty agreed upon between us and that prince, as well as taking care to prevent the encroachments of our avowed enemy, Tippoo Saib, whoſe progreſs over the Travancore country, were it to be admitted of, would prove very deſtructive, and ought to be prevented. Though he conſidered Tippoo as a mercileſs tyrant, poſſeſſed of dangerous and ambitious views towards this country, yet he conſidered that every treaty of agreement made with him ought to be as religiouſly and ſtrictly obſerved as poſſible; ſo that, if war was at any time inevitably neceſſary, we might not have the imputation of provoking him to it laid to our charge, by any attempt to force him to commence hoſtilities againſt us or our allies. His object, therefore, in calling for thoſe papers was, to ſee whether the war in India was to be attributed to the turbulent ambition and reſtleſs ſpirit of Tippoo, or the conſequence of any unjuſt provocation which our conduct had given him. What he believed had been the cauſe of the quarrel between Tippoo and the Rajah of Travancore was, that the latter had purchaſed from the Dutch the fort of Cranganore, which was without the moſt northern point of the Travancore country, and of courſe bordered upon Tippoo's dominions; this bargain had been concluded without his knowledge or concurrence, when, on the other hand, he thought he had a title to be conſulted. The Rajah had, previous to this tranſaction, applied to Sir Archibald Campbell, then at Madras, for two battalions of troops to be ſent into his country; which he underſtood had been granted, and which, he doubted not, might have created ſome jealouſy and alarm in the mind of Tippoo, as theſe troops were intended to be ſtationed on the frontiers of his country, when the internal force of the Travancore dominions, before they acquired this fort of Cranganore, was perfectly ſufficient for its defence. He concluded by moving, "that copies of all papers relative to our alliance with the Rajah of Travancore, and all papers relative to tranſactions between the Rajah of Travancore and the Dutch, relative to the fort of Cranganore, might be laid before the Houſe."

This motion being ſeconded, Mr. Dundas obſerving the propriety thereof, agreed to the production of the papers, reſerving to himſelf the privilege of withholding any particular paper, which upon nearer inveſtigation might appear dangerous to produce. Some converſation enſued, and the papers were ordered to lie on the table.

A.D. 1791. Conſiderable time was now conſumed in trying the merits of the different petitions, and on the 15th of February the chancellor of the exchequer brought a meſſage from the king, importing, that "his majeſty judges it expedient to divide the province of Canada into two ſeparate provinces, under the title of Upper Canada and Lower Canada; that his majeſty recommended this propoſal to the conſideration of the houſe. His majeſty alſo recommended to the conſideration of the houſe to provide for the maintenance of the proteſtant clergy in that province." He then moved, "that the houſe ſhould take his majeſty's meſſage into conſideration on Wedneſday next," which was accordingly agreed to.

On the 28th of the ſame month the ſubject of the Indian war was renewed by Mr. Hippeſley, who moved the reading of the act of the 24th of Geo. III. which act prohibited the entering into any war in India for the purpoſe of extenſion of territory, or unleſs hoſtilities were actually commenced againſt us or our allies. He next moved the reading of ſeveral reſolutions of the houſe, entered into in May, 1782, to the ſame purpoſe. He read a letter he had received by the Houghton, ſtating the impolicy of the war entered into, and of the melancholy proſpect of our affairs; after which, he adverted to ſeveral reſolutions of the company entered into in the years 1768, 69, and 70, which turned upon the impolicy of aiding the Mahrattas againſt the only barrier between them and us, the Myſore country. The Hon. Gentleman was ſo extremely indiſpoſed as ſcarcely to be heard, and was unable to proceed further.

The taſk therefore fell upon Mr. Francis, who lamented the indiſpoſition of Mr. Hippeſley, which obliged him in his ſtead to ſtate to the houſe his opinion upon the impolicy and unjuſtneſs of the war into which this country was plunged in India. After a long detail of India tranſactions, he concluded by moving, "that the preſent war with Tippoo Sultan appears to have originated in the purchaſe of the forts of Cranganore and Jacottah from the Dutch by the Rajah of Travancore." This motion was ſeconded by Mr. Hippeſley, but violently oppoſed by Mr. Dundas, who in a ſpeech of conſiderable length combated the arguments of the honourable gentleman. He ſaid, the war in India, on the cloſeſt inveſtigation, would be found conſiſtent with the principles of policy and juſtice, and to have originated in a neceſſity which may be termed irreſiſtible, when conſidered as relating to the faith of the moſt ſolemn treaties.

Major Maitland ſpoke in favour of the reſolution; and pronounced a ſplendid eulogium on the preſent governor-general of Bengal, under whoſe government he had lived ſome time, which he ſhould always reckon amongſt the happieſt periods of his life.

The war with Tippoo Saib was ſupported by Mr. Wilberforce as politic and juſt, but condemned by Mr. Fox, who was replied to by Mr. Pitt. The queſtion being then put, the reſolution was negatived without a diviſion.

On the 2d of March, Mr. Dundas moved, "that the attacks made by Tippoo Sultan on the lines of Travancore, on the 29th of December, 1789, the 6th of March, and the 15th of March, 1790, were unwarranted and unprovoked, and an infraction of the treaty entered into at Mangalore on the 10th of March, 1784." This he followed up with two others; the firſt approving the conduct of earl Cornwallis as highly meritorious, and the ſecond approving the treaties. Theſe were likewiſe carried without a diviſion.

March 28th, the following meſſage from his majeſty was delivered to the Houſe of Commons by the chancellor of the exchequer; a ſimilar meſſage being at the ſame time ſent to the Houſe of Lords:

"George R.

"His majeſty thinks it neceſſary to acquaint the Houſe of Commons, that the endeavours which his majeſty has uſed, in conjunction with his allies, to effect a pacification between Ruſſia and the Porte having been hitherto unſucceſsful, and the conſequences which may ariſe from the further progreſs of the war being highly important to the intereſts of his majeſty and his allies, and to thoſe of Europe in general, his majeſty judges it requiſite, in order to add weight to his repreſentations, to make ſome further augmentation of his naval force; and his majeſty relies on the zeal and affection of the Houſe of Commons, that they will be ready to make good ſuch additional expences as may be incurred by theſe preparations, for the purpoſe of ſupporting the intereſts of his majeſty's kingdoms, and of contributing to the reſtoration of general tranquillity, on a ſecure and laſting foundation. G. R."

The next day was appointed in the Houſe of Lords for the conſideration of his majeſty's moſt gracious meſſage.

Lord Grenville ſtated to the houſe, that his majeſty's endeavours having failed in the negociation entered into, as ſtated by the ſpeech from the throne at the commencement of the ſeſſion, to bring about a peace, in conjunction with his allies, between Ruſſia and the Porte; and the intereſts of his majeſty and his allies being materially concerned to check the further progreſs of the war; his majeſty had judged it requiſite to add weight to his mediation by an increaſe of his naval armament; for the ſupport of which, the meſſage now read, he hoped, would be approved of by their lordſhips. His lordſhip concluded a ſhort ſpeech by moving an humble addreſs to his majeſty for his meſſage, with a promiſe of the ſupport of that houſe to make good the expences that might be incurred in the preparations neceſſary to ſupport the intereſt of his majeſty's kingdom, and to contribute to the reſtoration of general tranquillity on a ſecure and laſting foundation.

A very pointed debate took place, and the queſtion on the addreſs being put, it was carried on a diviſion,

His majeſty's meſſage was likewiſe taken into conſideration in the houſe of commons the ſame day. The chancellor moved an addreſs to the king, which as uſual, was an echo to the meſſage, with the addition that the commons would not fail to afford his majeſty ſuch ſupplies as might be neceſſary to the ſupport of his endeavours for reſtoring the peace of Europe. This motion was ſeconded by Mr. Dundas, and oppoſed by Lord Wycombe, Mr. Fox, Coke, Lambton, &c. The queſtion being called for, the houſe divided,

April the 1ſt the Pruſſian treaty was taken into conſideration in the houſe of lords. Earl Fitzwilliam in a ſpeech of conſiderable length contended, that by the treaty, Great Britain was not bound to aſſiſt Pruſſia in offenſive conduct; and then moved,

"That Great Britain had not become bound, either by the expreſs or implied engagement of the treaty of defenſive alliance, entered into between the king of Great Britain and his Pruſſian majeſty, to take hoſtile meaſures to compel the empreſs of Ruſſia to relinquiſh the advantages ſhe had gained by her arms over the Turks.

"That the progreſs of the arms of the empreſs of Ruſſia was not an adequate or juſt cauſe to induce Great Britain to make war againſt Ruſſia."

Lord Grenville moved the previous queſtion.—Lord Derby, lord Portcheſter, earl of Guildford, viſcount Stormont, and lord Rawdon, were for the reſolution. The duke of Leeds, lord Hardwicke, and the lord chancellor, were for the previous queſtion.

The queſtion being put on the previous queſtion, the houſe divided,

On the 4th of April in the houſe of commons, Mr. Burke called the attention of the houſe to a petition he had in his hand from Mr. Fowke, an old and reſpectable ſervant of the Eaſt India company, who after ſpending 56 years in their ſervice, had returned to this country a poor man. He had taken the oaths of poverty, and had made application to the court of directors for his penſion; but they declared he did not come under the regulation. After expatiating for ſome time on the hardſhip of his caſe, Mr. Burke moved, that the petition be referred to a committee of the whole houſe.

Alderman Le Meſurier ſpoke a few words in a general defence of the court of directors, and the danger of encouraging ſuch interference of parliament. The petitioner, he ſaid, was by no means ſo much diſtreſſed as his petition ſet forth; for that his ſon, who was very rich, had made him a very liberal allowance.

"What then! haſtily replied Mr. Burke, if a man has the good fortune to have an affectionate brother, or a ſon attentive to the duties of filial piety, are the company, therefore, abſolved from their engagements? He contended, however, that Mr. Fowke was really a poor man, and that he had actually known him living at a ſmall villiage on an annuity of 48l. Such was the reward which the company had conferred on the petitioner for 56 years faithful ſervice! They told him,

> "The world was all before him, where to chooſe
> His place of reſt, and Providence his guide."

Mr. Burke's motion was then put and carried.

On the 13th the houſe went into a committee of ways and means, in which the chancellor of the exchequer propoſed the following alterations in the duties of bills exchange: Bills amounting to 2l. and up to five guineas, to pay the old duty of three pence, from five guineas up to 30l. ſix pence. Bills not payable on demand, whether above or below five guineas, ſix pence; 50l. to 100l. one ſhilling; from 100l. to 200l. one ſhilling and ſix pence; and 200l. and upwards, two ſhillings. He then propoſed, that the re-iſſuing of promiſſory-notes ſhould be legal, paying ſix pence duty for a five-guinea note, and ſo in proportion. His next propoſition was an alteration in the receipt-tax, viz. two pence upon all receipts from 40s. to 20l. four pence from 20l. to 50l. and ſix pence from 50l. and upwards. He concluded by moving, "That all the duties on bills of exchange, promiſſory-notes, and receipts, ſhould no longer be paid, or payable."

The reſolutions were put and agreed to, and the report ordered to be received on Monday; which day was likewiſe appointed by the houſe of lords for the trial of Warren Haſtings, Eſq.

On the 18th, the important ſubject of the ſlave trade was renewed by Mr. Wilberforce; that gentleman having before on the 4th of February, ſubmitted a motion relative to its abolition. He now reviewed the evidence before the houſe, commencing with that part which treats of the manner in which ſlaves were obtained from the continent of Africa.—He quoted governor Parry's letter, who condemned the trade, as having been long a diſgrace to the country, and urged the neceſſity of its abolition. He ſaid, from ſeveral proofs of the depredations made upon the coaſts by the captains of the ſlave ſhips, he had not a doubt, could the houſe ſee the miſery occaſioned by this bloody trade, from the obtaining of the ſlaves to their carriage in the middle paſſage, and to their treatment in the iſlands, that there would be an unanimous vote for its abolition, and that the moſt ſtrenuous defenders of the trade would abandon it in deſpair. He went at ſome length into the proof of the mortality it occaſioned among our ſeamen; and, after endeavouring to prove that it would not be finally of any great loſs to the nation at large, moved for a total abolition of the ſlave trade.

Notwithſtanding ſeveral cruelties, too horrid to relate, were mentioned in the courſe of the debate, yet the philanthropic endeavours of Mr. Wilberforce and his friends failed in their deſired effect, there being a majority of ſeventy-five againſt the motion.

The bill for reſcuing a certain deſcription of perſons of the catholic perſuaſion, from the reſtrictions and penalties at preſent upon them, was now taken into conſideration, and being ſimilar to that which paſſed in Ireland ſome years ſince, proceeded without oppoſition through its ſeveral ſtages.

On the 10th of June his majeſty went to the houſe, and having delivered a ſpeech from the throne, expreſſive of his ſatisfaction in the meaſures adopted for defraying the extraordinary expences of the laſt year, in ſuch a manner as not to make any permanent addition to the public burthens; and likewiſe the proviſions made for Canada; alſo his regret at not being yet enabled to inform the houſe of the reſults of the ſteps, which were taken with a view to the re-eſtabliſhment of peace, between Ruſſia and the Porte; the parliament was prorogued to Tueſday, Auguſt the 16th.

Several aſſociations being now formed to celebrate the French Revolution by anniverſary dinners on the 14th of July, as different opinions concerning the ſame prevailed among the people, conſequent tumults took place. Such were the violences and outrages committed, that even the extenſive and opulent town of Birmingham, with its vicinities, was in an uproar for four days. This animoſity was conſiderably increaſed by the religious controverſies which took place, between Dr. Prieſtley and ſome of the clergy of that town. According to the doctor's ſtatement, a violent contention ſubſiſted for years, between the high church party and the diſſenters of that place; the cauſe of which the doctor attributed to the circumſtance of the latter being poſſeſſed of too much civil authority. In ſhort, matters were carried to ſuch a length, that when the commemoration of the French Revolution took place in Birmingham, and upwards of ninety reſpectable characters were preſent for that purpoſe; a conſiderable number of perſons fomented by a ſeditious hand-bill, which was diſperſed by ſome perſon unknown, (for the diſcovering the author, printer, or publiſher of which, a reward of one hundred guineas was offered by the magiſtrates), gathered round the hotel in the afternoon, hiſſing, groaning, and hallooing at the gentlemen as they aſſembled; and, ſubſequent to their departure (which happened two hours after), every window in the front was completely demoliſhed, notwithſtanding the perſonal appearance and interference of the magiſtrates; the mob inſiſting on the doors being opened, that they might go into the room and ſee who were left; and it was only by allowing five or ſix at a time to go in and ſatisfy themſelves that nobody was there. They then proceeded to Dr. Prieſtley's meeting-houſe, and after trying in vain to tear up the ſeats, &c. ſet it on fire and totally conſumed it. The doctor's houſe at Fair-Hill, a mile and a half from Birmingham, next met a ſimilar fate, with the whole of his valuable library, and more valuable collection of apparatus for philoſophical experiments. Here one of the rioters was killed by the falling of a cornice-ſtone. The next day this infatuated mob continued their depredations; for there was no armed force in the town, and the civil power was not ſufficient to repreſs them. Armed with bludgeons, &c. and vociferating "Church and King!" they ſpread terror wherever they appeared. About noon they attacked and demoliſhed the elegant manſion of Mr. John Ryland (late Mr. Baſkerville's), at Eaſy-hill, where many of the rioters, who were drunk, periſhed in the cellars, either by the flames, ſuffocation, or by the falling in of the roof. Six poor wretches, terribly bruiſed, were got out alive, and ſent to the hoſpital, and ten dead bodies have ſince been dug out of the ruins; but a man who had remained immured in one of the vaults from the preceding Friday, worked his way out on Monday, with little injury. Among the articles conſumed at Mr. Ryland's, was the body of the late Mr. Baſkerville, who by will ordered he ſhould be buried in his own houſe, and he was accordingly interred. A ſtone cloſet was erected in it, where he was depoſited in a ſtanding poſture. The houſe was afterward ſold with this expreſs condition, that it ſhould remain there.

In the afternoon the magiſtrates, anxious to preſerve the town from further outrages, until military aid could be procured, attended and ſwore in ſome hundreds as additional conſtables, who, with mopſtaves in their hands, marched up to Mr. Ryland's to diſperſe the mob, who, at firſt gave way, but rallying, after a ſtout conflict, in which many were ſeverely wounded, the Poſſe Commitatus were obliged to retire without effecting any uſeful purpoſe. The country reſidence of John Taylor, eſq. Bordeſley-hall, after the greateſt part of its ſplendid furniture had been demoliſhed or carried away, was ſet on fire, together with the out-offices, ſtables, ricks of hay, &c. and altogether exhibited a moſt tremendous ſcene of devaſtation. Every exertion to preſerve this elegant ſeat was made by captain Carver, but in vain. On offering them his purſe with 100 guineas to ſave the houſe, he was huſtled amid the crowd, with a cry of "No bribery," and narrowly eſcaped their fury. In the night of Friday, the houſe of Mr. Hutton, in High-ſtreet, was completely ſtripped; his large ſtock of paper, his very valuable library of books, and all his furniture deſtroyed or carried away. Fire was ſeveral times brought by a woman (women and boys were particularly active in all the depredations), but the majority of the populace, in tenderneſs to the town, would not ſuffer it to be applied. From Mr. Hutton's they proceeded to his country-houſe at Waſhwood-heath, about three miles from town, which, with its offices, they reduced to aſhes.

The next day (Saturday) the rioters made an attack on Mr. G. Humphrey's elegant houſe at Sparkbrook, but were repulſed, and one man killed; the mob, however, on a ſecond attack, carried their point, and went off after ranſacking the houſe of all its valuable furniture, but did not burn it. Mr. William Ruſſel's houſe, at Showell-Green, experienced all the violence of fire and devaſtation.

The houſe of Mr. T. Hawkes, Moſeley-wake-Green, was ſtripped of its furniture, which was either broke to pieces or carried away. Moſeley-hall, the reſidence of the dowager counteſs of Carhampton (but the property of John Taylor, eſq.) Mr. Harwood's, and Mr. Hobſon's, a diſſenting miniſter, were all on fire at once. Lady Carhampton had notice on the preceding day to remove her effects, as their vengeance was not directed againſt her; the good old lady gave directions accordingly, and ſir Robert and captain Lawley immediately attended on their noble relation, whom they accompanied in ſafety to Canwell, Sir Robert's ſeat.

The whole of Saturday, buſineſs was at a ſtand, and the ſhops moſtly ſhut up, notwithſtanding the appearance of the magiſtrates, and ſeveral popular noblemen and gentlemen; for the reports were ſo vague and various of the number and the ſtrength of the inſurgents, and having no military, ſave a few undiſciplined recruits, no force could be ſent againſt them. In the afternoon and evening, ſmall parties of three or five levied contribution of meat, liquor, and money, with the ſame indifference that they would levy pariſh-taxes; but the night paſſed without interruption in the town.

On Sunday night, ſoon after ten, three troops of the 15th light dragoons arrived amid the acclamations of the inhabitants, whoſe hopes and fears had been viſibly depicted through the day in every countenance, as reports of the near approach of the ſoldiery were ſpread or contradicted. The town was immediately illuminated, and before morning every thing was tolerably quiet, but the rioters were ſtill continuing their depredations in the country.

Several of thoſe rioters were apprehended, convicted, and executed. One at Worceſter ſuffered death, and four at Warwick.

On the 23d. of Auguſt diſpatches were received from the right honourable Sir Robert Murray Keith, knight of the Bath, his majeſty's envoy extraordinary and miniſter plenipotentiary to the court of Vienna, and plenipotentiary at the congreſs of Siſtovo, containing an account that a definitive treaty of peace was ſigned on the 4th inſtant, between the emperor and the Ottoman Porte, under the joint mediation of his majeſty, of the king of Pruſſia, and of the ſtates-general of the United Provinces; and that a ſeparate convention between his imperial majeſty and the Ottoman Porte, for ſettling the limits between the two empires, was afterwards ſigned on the ſame day.

On the 22d of September, his majeſty in council was pleaſed to declare his conſent to a contract of matrimony between his royal highneſs the duke of York and her royal highneſs the princeſs Frederique Charlotte Ulrique Catherine of Pruſſia, eldeſt daughter of his majeſty the king of Pruſſia; which conſent his majeſty has alſo cauſed to be ſignified under the great ſeal. Accordingly the marriage ceremony took place at Berlin on the 30th, with the greateſt magnificence, and every ſatiſfaction was teſtified by the court, and all preſent on the occaſion. On the 24th of November the ceremony was performed at St. James's. In the evening about ſeven o'clock, the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the lord chancellor, and the biſhop of London, came to the queen's houſe. The archbiſhop attended by two pages and his train-bearer; and the lord chancellor in his full robes, with the great ſeal of England carried before him, and his train borne. At half paſt eight o'clock, the prince of Wales, the duke and ducheſs of York, and the duke of Clarence, entered the queen's houſe, and were immediately conducted to her majeſty's drawing-room. The biſhops and the chancellor were in a ſeparate room for near three quarters of an hour, preparing the form of the regiſter. At nine o'clock, the biſhops and the lord chancellor having intimated that they were ready, they were admitted into her majeſty's drawing-room; upon which the proceſſion, attended by the officers of the chapel royal, proceeded to the grand ſaloon. Books of the marriage ceremony were delivered to all the royal family by the archbiſhop of Canterbury. At the requeſt of the archbiſhop, a table was directed to be placed in the ſaloon, which was formed as an altar, and was narrow enough for the archbiſhop to reach acroſs, and join the hands of the royal pair. At half paſt nine, the ceremony was performed by the archbiſhop of Canterbury, aſſiſted by the biſhop of London: his majeſty ſtanding at one end of the altar, and her majeſty at the other extremity; the duke and ducheſs of York in the centre; the archbiſhop oppoſite to them, and the lord chancellor ſtanding behind him; the prince of Wales next to the ducheſs of York, and the duke of Clarence next to the duke of York. The princeſſes were ſeated on chairs at a diſtance from the altar, in the ſaloon.

As ſoon as the ceremony was finiſhed, the ducheſs of York went to his majeſty and attempted to kneel, which his majeſty with ſome difficulty prevented; and, raiſing her in his arms, affectionately embraced her. The certificate of the marriage was then ſigned by their majeſties, the prince of Wales, the duke of Clarence, and laſtly by the lord chancellor. After which, the biſhops and the lord chancellor retired, and immediately left the queen's houſe. The royal family returned to the queen's drawing-room; and at a few minutes before eleven o'clock, the duke and ducheſs of York went to York-houſe; where they were accompanied by the prince of Wales and the duke of Clarence, an elegant ſupper having been provided by direction of his royal highneſs of York, for their entertainment.

This year was remarkable for an inundation and a fire; the former took place on February 2d. when there was the higheſt flood-tide on the river Thames that was ever yet remembered. Above Weſtminſter Bridge it overflowed the banks of the river on both ſides, particularly at Millbank, where it came into the Horſe-ferry Road, and carried away ſeveral logs of timber, &c. In Palace-yard it was near two feet deep; it alſo ran into Weſtminſter-hall, ſo as to prevent people paſſing for two hours. Boats came through the paſſage of Old Palace-yard from the Thames, and rowed up to Weſtminſter-hall gate. The inhabitants in Millbank-ſtreet were obliged to paſs to and from their houſes in boats.—The two Scotland-Yards, and Privy-Gardens, Whitehall, were entirely under water, and many other parts rendered impaſſable for two hours. People were obliged in thoſe places to be taken from their houſes on men's backs; and ſeveral poor people, who kept ſmall ſhops near the barracks in Scotland-Yard, had four feet water in their ſhops, and their beds floating in their rooms. Weſtminſter-hall ſuffered much. The water ran in at the great door for more than an hour, and undid all that had been doing for many weeks, to render the court dry, warm, and comfortable, by braziers, ſtoves, and other artificial means.—Above bridge, the tide roſe three feet higher than uſual. The ground floor of Lord Belgrave's houſe, and the garden, were flooded two feet deep: as were almoſt all the gardens and nurſery-grounds round Chelſea and Lambeth. Below bridge, the low meadows and marſhes were almoſt one continued ſheet of water for ſome hours.

The fire alluded to broke out at half paſt ſix in the morning of the 2d. of March, at the Albion Mills, on the Surrey-ſide of Blackfriars Bridge, which in a ſhort time entirely deſtroyed the whole of that extenſive building, with ſeveral ſmall houſes adjoining, and a very large quantity of corn (we believe not leſs than 10,000 ſacks) ground and unground, to the value of ſeveral thouſand pounds. The manner in which it began cannot be accurately aſcertained; but it is ſuppoſed to have ariſen from the very great friction of the wheels, particularly aggravated by ſome coarſe, high-dried wheat. It is ſaid ſome fire had been diſcovered the preceding evening, which was ſuppoſed to have been extinguiſhed, but which continued ſmothering the whole night. The inſide of the building, conſiſting of timber, made a tremendous blaze, and the heat was ſo great, that the engines could not for a long time approach to be of any ſervice. The floating-engine played; but, owing to the tide being down at the time the fire broke out, water could not at firſt be eaſily procured. The great heat of the flames affected the houſes oppoſite in Albion Place; but the dwelling-houſe, which formed one angle of the mills, was preſerved by ſtrong party-walls. Much of the chaff and parched corn was carried a conſiderable diſtance by the force of the fire and wind. Scotland-yard, Palace-yard, and the Park, were ſtrewed with it. It was ſuggeſted that the fire was not entirely accidental; but no reaſons appeared for any particular ſuſpicion, except the general diſlike in the lower claſs of people, ariſing from an opinion that the undertaking enhanced the price of corn, and decreaſed the value of labour. It is impoſſible to ſay how far this was really the caſe; but the populace, of which great numbers were preſent, ſeemed by no means to pity the ſufferers by the conflagration. The reports reſpecting the loſs were various, from 4,000 to 40,000 ſacks of flour; and the whole value, buildings and ſtock, from 50,000l. to 150,000l.

The following property was inſured:

At the Hand-in-Hand	£.6,000
Sun	5,000
Phœnix	5,000
Union	5,000
Royal Exchange —	5,000
	26,000
Ditto on Stock —	15,000
	£.41,000

But the largeſt inſurance was at Lloyd's, to the amount of 20,000l.

On the 31ſt of January his majeſty went to the houſe and opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne, wherein he noticed the marriage of the duke and ducheſs of York, and the ratification of peace between the Emperor of Germany and the Porte, and the Empreſs of Ruſſia A. D. 1792.

and the Porte, through the mediation of the court of Great Britain, concluding with theſe words:

"I regret that I am not yet enabled to inform you of the termination of the war in India: but the ſucceſs which has already attended the diſtinguiſhed bravery and exertions of the officers and troops under the able conduct of lord Cornwallis, affords reaſonable grounds to hope, that the war may ſpeedily be brought to an honourable concluſion.

"The friendly aſſurances which I receive from foreign powers, and the general ſtate of affairs in Europe, appear to promiſe to my ſubjects the continuance of their preſent tranquillity. Under theſe circumſtances I am induced to think, that ſome immediate reduction may be ſafely made in our naval and military eſtabliſhments; and my regard for the intereſts of my ſubjects renders me at all times deſirous of availing myſelf of any favourable opportunity to diminiſh the public expences."

An addreſs being moved in the houſe of lords, was carried unanimouſly; but in the houſe of commons violent debates enſued: An amendment was moved by Mr. Grey, to the following purport: "That the houſe, ſenſible that the evils of a procraſtinated war muſt be ruinous to the finances of the company, cannot help expreſſing their regret, that the proſpects held out in the ſpeech from the throne, at the commencement of the laſt ſeſſion, have not been realized; nevertheleſs, that their attachment to his majeſty, and their deſire to ſupport the honour of his crown are undiminiſhed."

The debates ſtill continued warm, when the chancellor of the exchequer in reply to Mr. Fox, ſhewed, in order to do away every idea of an improper ſuggeſtion in the ſpeech relative to the reduction of taxes, that the recommendation was equally general with the requiſition of ſupplies, and quoted precedents. "His majeſty, (he continued), neither ſtated at what advance of the ſurplus of the revenue it would be proper to divide, or in what manner the diviſion ſhould be made: the whole was left to the commons to conſider the proportion and the proper manner. He conſidered it policy, ſituated as we were, to endeavour to form a partnerſhip, between the preſent people and their poſterity, by equally dividing whatever might be above the point of revenue deemed proper: with the one aiding the diſcharge of the debt, and, with the other reducing taxes. Having ſaid thus much, he conſidered it his duty to go ſtill further; and as a pledge to prove the favourable circumſtances held out in the ſpeech, he ſhould then ſhortly ſtate the account of the revenue on the permanent taxes for the laſt year, excluding totally from his amount the produce of thoſe raiſed for the expences of the Spaniſh armament and taking at the uſual ſum the land tax and malt duty.

"The produce of the permanent taxes for the laſt year, ending Jan. 5, 1792, would then be, — — £. 16,690,000

Average of the two laſt years, 16,600,000

Average of the three laſt years 16,400,000

And taking in the fourth, which produced 500,000l. leſs than the preſent, the average will be on four years — 16,200,000

"The bulk of this increaſe of revenue aroſe from cauſes, which the more they ſhould be examined into, the more fully would they be proved to be permanent.

"The ſituation of the country alſo admitted of a ſubſtantial reduction of the navy and army. The reduction he ſhould propoſe, would be to the amount of 200,000l. annually, below the revenue report of laſt year, the future permanent expence would therefore be — — £.15,800,000

"The exceſs of the laſt year, after the payment of the annual million, would be 900,000

Exceſs on average of two years — 800,000

On three years — — 600,000

On four years — — 400,000

"Though this ſtatement could not but afford abundance of matter for rejoicing, the houſe ought to look to the plan with great caution, and ſo looking to it himſelf, it was not his wiſh to propoſe the appropriating of more than the ſum of 400,000l. admitted as the average of four years, leaving behind 500,000l. to anſwer any fluctuation, or extraordinary expence, which, however, was not likely to occur. —He propoſed to take off taxes to the amount of 200,000l. annually, and add the remaining 200,000l. to the annual increaſed diminution of the national debt. —The extraordinary expences that remain to be paid of the laſt armament amount to 130,000l. the total of the armament amounted to much more, but has already been defrayed out of the extraordinaries.

"He would firſt propoſe, he ſaid, to relieve the public from the temporary tax on malt; ſecondly, the tax on carts and waggons; thirdly, the tax on female ſervants; fourthly, a tax falling wholly on the poor, viz. the three ſhilling houſe-tax on houſes having leſs than ſeven windows; and fifthly, the laſt halfpenny duty on candles.

"The chancellor of the exchequer thought it alſo neceſſary to ſtate what annuities were conſidered as redeemable, and alluded to as ſuch by his majeſty's ſpeech; viz. the four per cents. Theſe were borrowed for a preciſe time, and are now clearly redeemable. It will be a matter of conſideration to the houſe how far, or in what way, they ſhall be redeemed. He noticed the reports of an intended reduction of the fives, by purchaſing at 3½, and paying off 25,000,000 of the fours: but ſuch a meaſure would be directly contrary to the ſpirit of the act on which the fives were funded. No ſuch payment, by borrowing, could be deemed a good payment. The fours are now redeemable: the fives will be, when twenty-five millions of the debt are clearly diſcharged."

The houſe then divided on the queſtion of amendment, noes 209, ayes 85, majority 124. The original addreſs was then carried without a diviſion.

Nothing material occurred till February the 9th, when Major Maitland made ſix motions for the production of certain papers relative to the war in India; after ſome debate, the motions were put and carried.

On the 17th, in a committee on the ſupply, the chancellor of the exchequer, after a long ſpeech, moved, "That it is the opinion of this committee, that the laſt duty on malt do ceaſe and determine on the 5th of April, 1792."

The motion was put and carried; as likewiſe were the repeal of the four other taxes, mentioned by Mr. Pitt, viz.

1 The female ſervants tax.
2 The tax on waggons and carts.
3 The 3s. on houſes under ſeven windows.
4 The halfpenny a pound duty on candles.

On the 21ſt. Mr. Whitbread moved, that the papers relative to the late Ruſſian armament ſhould be immediately taken into conſideration in a committee of the whole houſe. But Mr. Pitt objecting to this motion, Mr. Whitbread conſented to withdraw it. He then again roſe, and after a very long ſpeech, concluded by moving the following reſolutions:

Firſt, that the poſſeſſion by Ruſſia of Oczakow, and the diſtrict between the Bog and the Dneiſter, did not affect the intereſt of this country, or juſtify the armament.

Secondly, That the negociation between this country and Ruſſia, had been wholly unſucceſsful.

Thirdly, That his majeſty's miniſters had been guilty of groſs miſconduct, tending to increaſe the expence, and diminiſh the influence of Great Britain.

A violent debate enſued, which kept the members till four o'clock in the morning, when an adjournment ment was propoſed by Mr. Taylor, which was agreed to. This ſubject being renewed the next day, the firſt reſolution was negatived without a diviſion, the ſecond was of courſe loſt by the previous queſtion being put and carried, and on the third the houſe divided,

On the 7th of March, Mr. Pitt moved two reſolutions reſpecting a ſuitable eſtabliſhment for the duke and ducheſs of York. The firſt was to enable his majeſty to grant out of the conſolidated fund the ſum of 18,000l. annually, which, added to the 12,000l. already granted to the duke of York out of the civil liſt, and to 7,000l. which would be propoſed in Ireland, would render the amount of his income 37,000l. The ſecond reſolution was for a proviſion for the ducheſs of York, in caſe of her ſurviving his royal highneſs, for which he ſhould propoſe a jointure of 8000l. annually, to be defrayed out of the conſolidated fund.

Mr. Burden moved an amendment, to omit the word eighteen, for the purpoſe of inſerting ten. This amendment after ſome debate being withdrawn, both Mr. Pitt's motions were put and carried unanimouſly.

On the 8th in a committee of the whole houſe, Mr. Pitt obſerved, that having given notice on the preſent day to ſubmit to a committee his propoſitions for a new bill for accelerating the payment of the national debt, and as the principle upon which his reſolutions were founded was likely to be adopted, he would not trouble the committee further than by merely ſtating the reſolutions he ſhould move, as it might be more agreeable and convenient to diſcuſs them when a bill founded thereon ſhould be before the houſe. He concluded by reading two reſolutions, the firſt of which went to continue the effect of the ſinking fund for the reduction of the national debt, ſubſequent to the period when the intereſt of the money in the ſinking fund ſhould amount to four millions annually; and the ſecond, to prevent any future permanent burdens on the country, by enacting, that a proviſion ſhould be made for the ſpeedy payment of every loan entered into, or that an additional ſum, in proportion to the loan ſo borrowed, ſhould be ſet apart for the reduction of the whole national debt.

The queſtion being put on each reſolution, they were agreed to, and the houſe was reſumed.

Mr. Fox then ſaid, he held in his hand a petition from a great number of perſons, complaining of the grievances under which they laboured, by the acts of the 9th and 10th of king William, and by a clauſe in the Toleration Act, which ſubjected to ſevere penalties all who did not agree with the doctrine of the Trinity, according to the Thirty-nine Articles. The petition was ſigned by 1600 perſons, ſome of whom were Unitarians, ſome Arians, beſide many reſpectable churchmen and diſſenters, who were averſe to penalties for religious opinions, and whoſe liberality induced them to petition upon the ground of toleration, and the freedom of religious enquiry.

The petition was brought up and read: it concluded by praying, that leave might be granted to bring in a bill to repeal the acts and the clauſe complained againſt. Mr. Fox gave notice that he ſhould bring on a propoſition on the ſubject as ſoon as poſſible.

On the 15th Major Mairland renewed the ſubject of the war, and concluded by moving ſeveral reſolutions, condemning the war; the two firſt of which were, "That it appears to the houſe that the letter from earl Cornwallis to the Nizam was meant to have, and has had, the full effect of a treaty, executed in due form;" and "That Tippoo Sultan had not, up to the time of the ſignature of that letter, given any offence to the Britiſh government, or conducted himſelf in any manner warranting the commencement of hoſtilities againſt him."

Colonel Phipps, by the aid of his profeſſional knowledge, threw great light on our military operations in India. He concluded by moving amendments to ſome of the reſolutions, and ſaid that he ſhould negative the others.

The queſtion having been put on colonel Phipps's amendment of the third reſolution, the houſe divided upon the ſame,

This ſubject being again renewed on the 28th, Colonel Phipps alſo moved, "That it appears to this houſe, that the agreement entered into by lord Cornwallis with the Nizam, by his lordſhip's letter of the 7th of July 1789; the eſtabliſhment of a military poſt in Travancore; and the origin and continuance of the war againſt Tippoo, are conſiſtent with the wiſe, moderate, and politic views eſtabliſhed by the parliament of Great Britain, in the ſyſtem laid down for our government in India." The queſtion being put was carried without a diviſion.

The ſame day, the chancellor of the exchequer moved, that the ſum of 322,500l. be raiſed by a lottery of 50,000 tickets at 16l. 5s.

Mr. Taylor reprobated the continuance of lotteries, as tending to corrupt the morals of the people, and productive of the greateſt miſchief.—The reſolution, however, was put and carried.

The important buſineſs of the African Slave Trade took place on the 2d of April. After a long and intereſting exordium, Mr. Wilberforce ſaid, by a compariſon of the Weſt India trade and the ſlave trade, it would be found by the muſter rolls, that out of 12,263 men employed in the ſlave trade, 2,640 died in the average of twelve months. But that out of 7640 employed in the Weſt India trade, on an average of ſeven months, 118 only died; but deaths alone in the ſlave trade was not the whole loſs of our ſeamen, for it would be found that numbers quitted their ſhips, and that not more than half the number ſhipped from England ever returned.

Upon a former occaſion, he had ſtated the manner in which ſlaves were obtained from the continent of Africa. He had inſtanced many acts of the moſt dreadful barbarity, and aſſerted, that wars were promoted among the natives for the purpoſe of making a prey of them. He then quoted governor Parry's letter, who condemned the trade, as having been too long a diſgrace to the country, and urged the neceſſity of its abolition. The adminiſtration of juſtice in every part of Africa was, he previouſly obſerved, made an engine of oppreſſion, and ſubſervient to procuring ſlaves; the ſmalleſt offences were puniſhed by ſlavery; and every fraud and violence practiſed by the ſlave ſhip captains upon the poor ſavages, to make them their prey. They were obtained, even according to the admiſſion of Mr. Edwards, of the Jamaica Aſſembly, who was averſe to the abolition, by deſolation and war; their kings were rendered their deſtroyers inſtead of their protectors, and the whole traffick was carried on in one ſcene of blood and wickedneſs. He alſo then declared, from ſeveral proofs of the depredations made upon the coaſts by the captains of the ſlave ſhips, he had not a doubt, could the houſe ſee the miſery occaſioned by this bloody trade, from the obtaining of the ſlaves to their carriage in the middle paſſage, and to their treatment in the iſlands, that there would be an unanimous vote for its abolition, and that the moſt ſtrenuous defenders of the trade would abandon it in deſpair.

Having at that time proved that ſeveral negroes, had been ſeized and taken from the coaſt of the Cameroon river, by Britiſh ſhips; a different colour had been attempted to be put upon that tranſaction, but it remained unrefuted. A tranſaction of a ſimilar kind had now come to his knowledge; an Engliſh ſhip, ſlaving off the Cameroon, had ſent away one cargo to the Weſt Indies, but the captain wiſhed to take another; he ſent a few white men on a watering party, and with them one black man; a native trader ſeized him for a debt, which being made known to the captain, he took a ſtrange kind of revenge; he formed all his crew on the deck, and told them to blacken their bodies, and habit themſelves like negroes, to execute a plan of his to revenge the ſeizing of the negroe. He armed them, and went to the houſe of the unfortunate trader, who, hearing a noiſe, beat a drum, to collect his friends. The captain's party fired, and killed three of the trader's children, and wounded his wife in ſo deſperate a manner that ſhe died in three hours. One of the ſailors was killed, and the others wounded, and they with difficulty regained their ſhip. The captain, however, remained trading as uſual for ſeveral weeks, as if nothing extraordinary, or out of the common train of his buſineſs, had happened; but the Africans proved that they had feelings, and were capable of taking opportunities to ſhew them. One of their chieftains came with his uſual familiarity, to aſk for muſkets, and powder and ball, to go up the country to procure ſlaves, half of which the captain was to have; the captain complied, as he in a court of juſtice proteſted he had frequently done before; he gave the chieftain what he deſired, and proved himſelf to be a true Guinea captain, whoſe avarice was gratified by blood, miſery, rapine, and ſlaughter. The chieftain, however, and his party, had no ſooner obtained the muſkets, and powder and ſhot, than they ſeized the captain, threw him into the boat, and took him to the ſhore; where they compelled him, on promiſe of permitting him to return to his ſhip, to give an order for all his goods; the goods having been obtained, they releaſed the captain, and out-did him in faith and in mercy. Theſe tranſactions came out in a ſuit commenced by the ſailors againſt the captain for a recovery of their wages. The facts were given in evidence by the captain himſelf, as matters not uncommon; but they were circumſtances which fully proved the manner in which the trade was carried on.—The hon. gentleman now ſaid, he would ſtate another tranſaction to ſhew the manner of obtaining ſlaves, a tranſaction which took place no longer ago than Auguſt laſt. Six Britiſh ſhips were anchoring off the town of Malabar; the captains thinking that too high a price was aſked for the ſlaves, conſulted together, and reſolved to fire on the town to compel them to take a lower price; they ſent notice of their determination to fire in the morning if their offers were not accepted; no anſwer being returned, the ſlave captains, when their word had been given for a bloody and cruel purpoſe, kept it; they brought their guns to bear upon a defenceleſs town, and fired on it for three hours, in which time they did conſiderable execution. The chief ſent out to procure a ceſſation, but not offering terms low enough, the captains commenced firing again, and continued until their terms were accepted. By this murderous tranſaction he doubted not but the Liverpool and Briſtol merchants were ſome hundreds of pounds richer, than they would have been had it not been adopted. But bloody and ferocious as theſe captains had proved themſelves, they had not the courage to venture on ſhore to purchaſe the ſlaves, but ſent, as was not cuſtomary, the ſurgeons, from one of whom he had his information. The ſurgeon ſaw three of the poor wretches in the agonies of death, and was informed of twenty more that had been killed.—What rendered this tranſaction ſtill more diſgraceful to England was, that a French ſlave ſhip was on the ſame ſtation when the bloody purpoſe was propoſed; the French captain, however, would not agree to be a participator in it, but purchaſed the ſlaves at the price offered, and ſailed. The Britiſh captains poſtponed their purpoſes until the Frenchman was gone, and then put their bloody deſign into execution. What he ſtated, was no matter of ſecrecy at Briſtol or Liverpool, where the conduct of the captains was not conſidered improper, but, as was to be preſumed by their being furniſhed with new births, their conduct was conſidered meritorious, and men capable of ſuch conduct conſidered the fitteſt for ſlave ſhip captains. Several voices were now heard demanding the names of theſe captains, upon which Mr. Wilberforce obſerved, that it had not been his intention to name the parties, or to call for their proſecution, being averſe to proſecute and puniſh perſons concerned in a trade, while that trade was countenanced by parliament; but as he was called on to name them, he had no objection: The ſhips were the Thomas, Philips, of Briſtol; the Recovery, Kimber, of Briſtol; the Thomas, of Liverpool; the Anatree, of Briſtol; the Betſey, Doyle, of Liverpool; and the Waſp, Houſe, of Briſtol. After dwelling ſome time on the atrocity of ſuch conduct, he called upon the honour, the humanity, and the juſtice of the houſe, to reſiſt and put an end to ſuch proceedings, by voting for the abolition of the trade.

The hon. gentleman next noticed the Middle Paſſage, in which, he ſaid, all attempts to do away the mortality would prove ineffectual, until the houſe could triumph over nature, and enter into reſolutions to influence the mind. The mortality aroſe from a melancholy in the blacks, in conſequence of their being torn from their country, from their relatives and friends; that melancholy could never be done away.—In ſtating the cruelties practiſed in the Middle Paſſage, he ſaid he had it in his power to relate to the houſe the conduct of one of the captains of the ſhips he had before mentioned: a poor negro girl of fifteen, who was in ſuch a peculiar ſituation that induced her, from modeſty, to ſit with her body bending down, was ſuſpended by the wriſts, by order of the captain, and expoſed to the whole crew. He afterward had her flogged; then ſuſpended by her two legs, and again expoſed to the crew; and not having exhauſted his cruel intentions, had her ſuſpended afterwards, firſt by one leg, and then by the other, until, worn out by torture, ſhe fell into convulſions, in which ſhe continued for three days, and then died. The barbarous wretch who thus perpetrated thus murderous deed, was capt. Kimber. —To the ſlaves alone this tyranny and ferocity was not confined; inſtances might be produced of ſhameful conduct to the ſeamen; as a proof of which he need only ſtate that out of a whole ſhip's crew ſix or ſeven only returned. Who was to regulate a trade carried on by ſuch agents, agents bred up in robbery and murder, and whoſe habits and conduct could not be eradicated, but which would continue as long as the trade was permitted? It was a trade too bad to be continued; it was a ſyſtem the houſe ought to condemn, as diſgraceful to the Engliſh nation.—Whichever way it was looked at, robbery, murder, perfidy, and deſolation, ſtared you in the face; in Africa, in the Middle Paſſage, and in the Iſlands, the ſame horrors were to be found, and thoſe who carried on the trade would be found the moſt abandoned beings; they were accuſtomed to cruel and ferocious habits, and proved themſelves to be capable of unmixed, unſophiſticated wickedneſs. Having ſpoken upwards of three hours, he concluded with moving,

"That it is the opinion of this committee that the trade carried on by Britiſh ſubjects for the purpoſe of procuring ſlaves from Africa ought to be aboliſhed." And,

"That the chairman be directed to move the houſe for leave to bring in a bill to prevent the future importation of ſlaves into the Britiſh iſlands."

Mr. Bayley, Mr. Vaughan, Colonel Tarleton, &c. were againſt the motions. Mr. Bayley declared that the trade of Great Britain would ſuffer conſiderably by the abolition, and that the witneſſes who had given evidence in favour thereof, were a ſet of low ignorant wretches, ſelected purpoſely from the refuſe of mankind. Mr. Vaughan declared himſelf to be a Weſt Indian and a merchant, and though at firſt he was for the abolition, yet having gone to the Weſt Indies on purpoſe to be ſatisfied in reſpect to the condition of the ſlaves, he then diſcovered how ſtories were both invented and exaggerated, and that to his knowledge there never was a cauſe for complaint. The colonel likewiſe ridiculed the petitions which lay on the table reſpecting the ſame, and after reading one or two letters to prove that they were the offspring of mendicant phyſicians, and itinerant clergymen, he ſaid that the popular mind had been inflamed by unfair and mutilated extracts from the printed evidence.

Mr. M. Montague, Mr. Whitbread, and Mr. Milbank were for the abolition; the former contended that there were evils in exiſtence, in conſequence of the African trade, which had been proved to the houſe, and a remedy ought to be applied to them efficiently. Mr. Whitbread declared, that though it was proved that the ſlaves in our Weſt India iſlands were treated with the greateſt humanity, and even enjoyed the utmoſt felicity, yet as no mildneſs in practice could make right that which was fundamentally wrong, ſo nothing ſhould make him give his aſſent to the original ſin of delivering man over to the deſpotiſm of man. Mr. Milbank in a very emphatic oration declared, that where there was ſlavery there muſt be oppreſſion.

Mr. Dundas profeſſed to agree in opinion with Mr. Wilberforce, but to differ widely as to the mode. He admitted that the trade was neither founded in policy, nor ultimately eſſential to the Weſt India iſlands, nor was there any good cauſe aſſigned why the propagation of the Creole ſlaves ſhould not be made to keep pace with the conſumption; but he had ſtill his doubts as to the prudence and practicability of the mode which was now before the houſe. He had no doubt of the goodneſs of the head or heart of the gentleman by whom it was produced; but he feared it might run too directly counter to the habits and prejudices of thoſe whoſe intereſts were at ſtake, and excite an alarm on account of the patrimonial rights of individuals. The cultivators, the mortgagees, and the purchaſers in the iſlands, had all acted under the ſanction of parliament, and it would not be fair to proceed without conſulting the intereſt of thoſe whoſe properties had been thus miſled.

Other nations, it had been ſaid, would take up the traffic which we were about to relinquiſh; but that did not weigh with him, if the derelictions were proved to be ſafe and prudent on our part; but until this was made apparent, he ſhould regret to ſee the trade of Liverpool moved to St. Euſtatius, and that of Briſtol perhaps to Oſtend.

He profeſſed himſelf to be therefore for a ſyſtem of moderation and regulation which ſhould continue the trade, but a ſyſtem of regulation which ſhould bear in its boſom the ſeeds of abolition. This ſyſtem he explained: it conſiſted merely in the abolition of the import of negroes after a time to be limited, and in what he termed the termination of hereditary ſlavery. By the latter, he did not mean that every negro child ſhould be free on the death of its parents, but that the importer of the parent ſhould pay for the maintenance and education of the child, the expences of which were to be repaid by ten or fifteen years ſervitude, after which time the ſlave was to poſſeſs his freedom.

This ſyſtem Mr. Dundas contended was leſs viſionary, and more practicable, than what had yet been offered.

He argued againſt the oppoſition which was excited againſt the abolition, by quoting the reſiſtance which had been made in the year 1775, in the extinction of the villenage exiſting in the ſalt-works in Scotland, and latterly to the regulation of the Middle Paſſage. Both theſe meaſures, he obſerved, had been pronounced in the firſt inſtance to be as ruinous as they had ſince been proved to be beneficial! He repeated his confidence that every moderate man would agree with him, and inſtead of acceding to a meaſure which may convulſe the ſtate, would adopt a middle line between the zeal and obſtinacy of the oppoſing parties. Mr. Addington (the ſpeaker) ſeconded Mr. Dundas, having expreſſed the greateſt approbation of his ſcheme. He ſuggeſted that the imports of ſlaves into the iſlands ſhould be limited to ten or twelve years, and that in the mean time bounties ſhould be allowed on the import of females, and on the number of children reared to maturity. He confeſſed that he did not conſider this commerce as a trade but as a crime, and obſerved, that it had in fact received its death wound when it met a firſt diſcuſſion.

Mr. Fox obſerved, that both Mr. Dundas and the ſpeaker had profeſſed to execrate the crime, and yet would not vote for its abolition. If they adhered, however, to their own principles, they muſt vote for the reſolution generally, and afterward diſcuſs the proper period for carrying it into effect.—One of the gentlemen had gone out of his way, to ſuggeſt a bounty on the importation of females into the iſlands for a given time. He could wiſh for his part to ſee how ſuch a clauſe was to be penned, and in what words a Britiſh parliament would vote a reward for the tearing away an additional number of helpleſs women from their homes and connections.

The ſcheme of Mr. Wilberforce, he contended, was more practicable and leſs viſionary than that which was now produced by Mr. Dundas. The former propoſed that which was immediately in the power of a Britiſh parliament; the latter ſuggeſted that which could only tend to involve them in a quarrel with all the colonial legiſlatures. He had ſuggeſted in his termination of hereditary ſlavery, a ſcheme the moſt theoretical and complicated that perhaps had ever been offered to a committee of that houſe. In the plan the ſlave was to be educated at the expence of the importer of his parents. It was then recollected, that this expence muſt in ſome way be defrayed. This it was propoſed to do by a ſervitude of ten or fifteen years, after which time the object of the regulation muſt be as completely a ſlave, as if he had never enjoyed a portion of ideal freedom! In ſpeaking of the unfairneſs of the trade, Mr. Fox obſerved on the crimes which were imputed to the 22,000 unfortunate creatures who were yearly purchaſed.

A great part of theſe was puniſhed for the crime of witchcraft, which, as it appeared, we execrated with ſuch a ſacred horror, that, leſt it ſhould eſcape from puniſhment, we degraded ourſelves into executioners. The next crime was adultery, which we lent our aid to puniſh alſo; but there was this difference between theſe leading crimes, that we appeared to puniſh the former merely becauſe we had no objects at home—of the latter, it could only be ſaid, perhaps, that the objects at home were ſo numerous that we were at a loſs with which to begin.

After ſome remarks on the unfair uſe which had alſo been made of the evidence of lord Rodney, lord Macartney, and other gentlemen, who had never been on the coaſt of Africa, Mr. Fox proceeded to notice the juſtification which had been attempted of this ſyſtem of cruelty. Theſe were all reſolvable into one, namely, the difference of colour. It was ſaid, though he truſted the reports were exaggerated, that there was much riot and anarchy now prevailing in ſeveral parts of France. But if it were propoſed, that Engliſh veſſels ſhould be ſent to the ports of that kingdom to purchaſe the democrates of the ariſtocrates, and vice verſa, every man's blood would run cold with horror! Yet the leading difference between the parties conſiſted merely in their colour; and a more vain, unphiloſophical, irreligious, and blaſphemous diſtinction could not well be ſuppoſed to exiſt. He ſhould therefore hold it his duty to perſevere in the motion, if it ſhould now prove unſucceſsful. If it were ſaid, that other nations may not adopt the example, he, and thoſe who voted with him, ſhould have the ſubſtantial conſolation of having done their duty, and of glorying to lead, where others did not dare, even in ſuch a cauſe, to follow.

Mr. Dundas moved, as an amendment, "That it is the opinion of this committee, that the trade in ſlaves, between the coaſt of Africa and the Weſt India iſlands, ſhould gradually be aboliſhed."

Mr. Jenkinſon went decidedly againſt the original motion. Such a meaſure, in his opinion, could not diminiſh the evil; to extirpate it, as propoſed, was impoſſible.

He concluded with reading an addreſs to the king, praying, that the governors of our colonies may be ordered to iſſue bounties for the rearing of ſlaves, and that every negro woman, having borne five children, ſhould be declared free. He moved, that for the purpoſe of taking this addreſs into future conſideration, "the chairman do now leave the chair."

The chancellor of the exchequer roſe to ſupport all the obſervations of Mr. Fox, except where he lamented the principles of Mr. Dundas and the ſpeaker. Though he differed from them, he was pleaſed to ſee that neither they nor Mr. Jenkinſon actually approved of the trade, but differed only as to the mode and time of aboliſhing it. From this hour, the ſentence on this trade was ſealed. It was gone paſt; nothing remained but to arrange and ſettle the plan of ending it; to do this, they muſt examine the opinions of his right honourable friends, and he would do this rigorouſly. He differed from them entirely. He thought the true courſe was an immediate abolition. He repeated his old ſtatements, to ſhew that the ſtock in the iſlands would be maintained without recruits by this abominable trade, againſt which the feelings and the philoſophy of the age revolted. He next came to the injuſtice of continuing a trade that had ſo long diſgraced the country, and which could not be too ſoon put an end to. He then went to the different reaſonings of the friends to the ſlave trade, and thoſe who wiſhed it might be gradually aboliſhed; all of which he refuted in a clear and argumentative manner. Having gone through the injuſtice of the trade, he replied to what had been ſaid, as to the propriety of a gradual, and not an immediate abolition of it. He called the attention of gentlemen to the ſituation of their own country in the earlier ſtages of its hiſtory; and he read a quotation from Rapin, to prove that the practices of ſelling fellow-creatures for ſlaves, had once prevailed in this iſland, and that in the time of pope Gregory, a number of fine Britiſh youths were ſeen upon ſale for ſlaves in the public market place at Rome. Mr. Pitt commented on this fact with great force and ingenuity, making uſe of it as a moſt powerful appeal to the heart of every Briton, whether, after ſo ſtriking a proof of the happy change that had taken place in this country, which had made us the ſeat of arts, the centre of commerce, and the happieſt and freeſt nation on the habitable globe, enjoying liberty governed and ſecured by law, and living under a conſtitution the envy of ſurrounding nations, and the conſtant object of their imitation, we had a right to ſay that Africa might not emerge from the ſtate of barbariſm and ignorance, in which ſhe was at preſent involved, if we were to put an end to a practice which not only diſgraced ourſelves, to a degree beyond all powers of deſcription, but put it out of the power of the Africans to become an enlightened people, as long as that infernal practice was continued. Mr. Pitt purſued his ſpeech to its concluſion, in one continued blaze of oratorical ſpendour.

The queſtion was then loudly called for, and the houſe divided on Mr. Jenkinſon's motion for adjournment. Noes 234, Ayes 87—Majority 147.

Then on the amendment moved by Mr. Dundas, Ayes 193, Noes 125—Majority 68.

And laſtly, that the motion as amended do paſs, Ayes 230, Noes 85—Majority 145.

On the 23d of April the houſe reſolved itſelf into a committee to conſider on the neceſſary meaſures for the gradual abolition of the ſlave trade. The diſcuſſion being poſtponed till the 25th, Mr. Dundas after a ſhort exordium ſubmitted to the committee his firſt reſolution, "That it ſhall not be lawful to import any African negroes into any Britiſh colonies, or plantations, in ſhips owned, or navigated, by Britiſh ſubjects, at any time after the firſt day of January, 1800."

The motion was ſupported by lord Sheffield; but lord Mornington moved an amendment, which was, that the words, "firſt day of January, 1793," ſhould be ſubſtituted in the place of "firſt day of January, 1800." His lordſhip's amendment was ſupported by Mr. Pitt, Mr. Ryder, Mr. R. Thornton, Mr. W. Smith, Mr. Wyndham, Sir J. Johnſon, Mr. Fox, and Mr. Wilberforce. It was oppoſed by Mr. Dundas, Col. Phipps, Mr. Eſtaricke, &c. On a diviſion there appeared a majority of 49 againſt his lordſhip's amendment.

On the 27th the debate was revived when lord Mornington propoſed a new amendment, namely, "1795," inſtead of "1800."—He then went into argument to prove, that the time to which his amendment would extend the trade, would be fully ſufficient to enable the iſlands to adopt ſuch meaſures as were beſt calculated to promote population, and to try ſuch experiments as had a tendency to leſſen the neceſſity of employing negroes.

A debate conſequently enſued—Mr. Addington oppoſed the amendment, and was replied to by the chancellor of the exchequer, who was for it.—Col. Tarleton reſiſted the amendment, as propoſing an abolition ſudden, violent, and ruinous. The maſter of the Rolls and lord Carhampton, were alſo againſt it. Mr. Fox, and Mr. Wilberforce were eagerly in defence of it.

Sir Edward Knatchbull was againſt the amendment, which, if negatived, he would, he ſaid, move an amendment to the original motion to introduce the year 1796, inſtead of 1800.

The queſtion was then put, and the committee divided, Ayes 130, Noes 161—Majority 31 againſt the amendment.

Sir Edward Knatchbull then moved his amendment to ſubſtitute 1796, inſtead of 1800.

A ſhort debate enſued, in which Mr. Pitt, Mr. Fox, Mr. Dundas, and Mr. Addington ſpoke; after which the committee again divided, and carried the amendment, Ayes 151, Noes 132—Majority 19, for aboliſhing the trade on the 1ſt of January, 1796.

On the 1ſt of May, Mr. ſecretary Dundas, in conſequence of the time he had propoſed for the gradual abolition of the ſlave trade having been changed to a ſhorter period, felt it impoſſible for him with propriety to continue the buſineſs in his hands; he therefore turned it over to thoſe hon. gentlemen whoſe propoſition for a ſhorter period had been carried, begging, at the ſame time, to give notice, that he ſhould give no oppoſition to the report of the reſolution, but reſerve himſelf until the bill ſhould be before the houſe; ſhould that bill not come up to what he conſidered the intention of the houſe, when they reſolved the gradual abolition, he pledged himſelf in ſome ſtage of it to take the ſenſe of the houſe. Mr. Beauſoy then reported the reſolution for aboliſhing the trade on the 1ſt of January 1796. A ſhort converſation enſued, in which it was agreed to defer all oppoſition, until a bill, founded on the reſolution, ſhould be brought in. The reſolution was then read, and agreed to.

The chancellor of the exchequer then moved the houſe to go into a committee to conſider of further reſolutions for the abolition of the African ſlave trade. The houſe reſolved itſelf into a committee accordingly, and Mr. Beauſoy took the chair.

Mr. Pitt, for the purpoſe of prohibiting the carrying of ſlaves from Africa to foreign ports in Britiſh ſhips, and for the purpoſe of limiting the tonnage of the ſhips for the ſupply of the Britiſh iſlands during the period allowed for the continuance of the trade, moved certain reſolutions, which were alſo permitted to paſs, without debate, for the purpoſe of conſidering them in a future committee, or when in the ſhape of a bill.

On Wedneſday, the report of the reſolutions of the committee for the abolition of the ſlave trade, was read and agreed to. The chancellor of the exchequer, in conſequence, and for the purpoſe of haſtening their object, by putting the lords in poſſeſſion of the general outlines of the plan, moved, "That a conference with the lords be deſired, on a ſubject highly important to the juſtice and honour of the Britiſh nation."—The motion was agreed to, and lord Mornington ordered to go to the lords to deſire the ſaid conference.

After the conference with the lords on the ſlave trade, the chancellor of the exchequer moved for leave to bring in a bill, purſuant to the reſolutions adopted by the houſe, for the abolition of the ſlave trade. Leave was granted, and Mr. Pitt, Mr. Fox, lord Mornington, and Mr. Elliot, were ordered to prepare and bring in the ſame.

In the houſe of lords, on May 8, the order of the day having been read, for taking into conſideration the reſolutions communicated to the lords at a conference relative to the ſlave trade, Lord Stormont roſe, and ſtated the neceſſity of their lordſhips proceeding upon evidence adduced at their own bar, on the ſubject of the reſolutions, they having an undoubted right to alter and modify them as they thought proper. He concluded by moving, "That this houſe do forthwith proceed to examine evidence, on the ſubject of the reſolutions ſent up by the commons, relative to the abolition of the ſlave trade," &c.

Lord Grenville moved, as an amendment, to omit the words, "this houſe," for the purpoſe of ſubſtituting the words "a committee above ſtairs," which would tend to diſpatch. He inſtanced the caſes of the Boſton Port bill, and the Regency, in proof, that it was not contrary to the uſage of their lordſhips, to refer matters of great importance to a committee above ſtairs.

The duke of Clarence ſupported the original motion, and inſtanced the caſe of the ceded iſlands, as acknowledged on all hands, as ſtanding in need of greater cultivation.

Lords Sydney and Stanhope were for the amendment; lords Hawkeſbury, Porcheſter, Somers, Rawdon, the lord chancellor, and biſhops of London and St. David's, for hearing evidence at the bar.

The queſtion being put, the original motion was carried,

The petitions againſt the abolition were then read, and counſel ordered to be heard in their ſupport.

On the 11th of May Mr. Fox made his promiſed motion for the repeal of certain acts militating againſt toleration. He ſaid, that the meaſure he was about to propoſe ſhould be adopted on the ſcore of policy in any government whatever, and ſtill more ſo in a country poſſeſſed of ſuch a conſtitution as this. The ſubject of late had been frequently diſcuſſed, and in every diſcuſſion the intereſts of toleration gained ground. All men agreed on the general principle: the only difference was, that certain matters, when propoſed, were ſaid not to come under the head of Toleration, or elſe rejected, on the idea of being inconſiſtent with the political intereſts, or dangerous to the religious eſtabliſhment, of the country. Theſe were weighty reaſons: but the latter ſhould never be carried ſo far as to entrench on the principles of toleration; for, even in any caſe, he was of opinion, that when utility was placed in the ſcale againſt the fundamental rights of juſtice, the latter ſhould preponderate.

He then went at conſiderable length into the details of the ſubject. He ſaid, that whatever part of his natural rights the original formation of ſociety required man to give up, it never was expected of him, nor was it poſſible, that he could give up any part of his opinions; particularly his religious opinions. The prayer of the petition, which he had the honour to preſent, could not be refuſed by a nation, with ſuch a religious eſtabliſhment as ours, which was neither in the dark ages of paganiſm, nor ſhackled by the reſtrictions of popery, which pretended to be infallible. Our eſtabliſhments being founded on human laws, thoſe of the legiſlature of this realm could not with the leaſt ſhow of propriety pretend to infallibility, or perſecute a man for avowing his opinions which he believed to be true.—"Religion," ſaid Mr. Fox, "is the ſource of happineſs and virtue, and the cauſe of morality in moſt individuals; and the principal mandate of your religion is, to do as you would be done by." Theſe ſentiments in favour of toleration, he argued, with much force, were founded in true policy, and countenanced by true religion; in ſupport of which he recited ſeveral extracts from eminent writers on the ſubject, particularly archdeacon Payley and Mr. Gibbon. Thoſe that he pleaded for, he ſaid, claimed no participation whatever in the good things annexed to the eſtabliſhment; they wiſhed not for admiſſion to the offices of the ſtate, civil or military; all that they deſired, was to be freed from the dread and apprehenſion which, in an avowal of their opinions, they had, under ſeveral exiſting laws, of being cruelly perſecuted, even to death, by thoſe who might be vindictive or malevolent enough to put them in execution. All theſe might be incurred on account of a difference of opinion merely ſpeculative. We were, he added, in this inſtance, more unjuſt than even the papiſts; for they not allowing the bible to to be generally read, precluded a difference of opinion on the ſubject; but the church of England, who profeſs to encourage inquiry and the reading of the ſcriptures, threaten thoſe with ſevere puniſhments who preſume to differ from certain orthodox poſitions. One of the clergy (Dr. South) went ſo far as ſeriouſly to aſſert, in his writings, that thoſe who denied the Trinity, were deſcended in a direct line from the devil! Mr. Fox humorouſly, in the courſe of the debate, more than once called the petitioners, his clients, the deſcendants of the devil. Being now on the general ſubject of toleration, he ſaid he did not wiſh entirely to confine himſelf to what merely affected the petitioners: other ſpecies of diſſenters were grievouſly oppreſſed, and for no one good reaſon, particularly the Roman catholics; the only pretext for not repealing the penal ſtatutes againſt theſe was, on account of the ſuppoſed prevalence of the Jacobite intereſt; now this having been long ſince entirely done away, what pretext was there for refuſing them the complete rights of citizens, nay even to admit them into the houſe? Preſbyterians were admitted; but he believed, if the clergy of the eſtabliſhed church, or thoſe beſt affected to their cauſe, were to be individually aſked which they dreaded moſt, the Preſbyterians or the Roman catholics, he was of opinion that the former would be declared the moſt formidable. He then recapitulated the ſeveral acts which he thought were unneceſſarily oppreſſive againſt the Roman catholics, and which he would wiſh to ſee repealed. The marriage act, he always thought extremely impolitic and unjuſt: he had twice carried the repeal of it through the houſe, but it was loſt in the lords. He could not ſee why Quakers and Jews only ſhould be excepted from its effect. As to the proper mode of attempting to obtain thoſe ſalutary ends, he was not perfectly decided. In matters of reform, he thought repeal the beſt, as leaſt liable to the charge of innovation. He enumerated ſeveral ſtatutes which he thought ſhould be repealed on the preſent occaſion, beſide thoſe of the 9th and 10th of William III. the principal of which were the firſt of Edward VI. and the 27th of Elizabeth.

A converſation enſued between Mr. Fox, the ſpeaker, Mr. Burke, Mr. Smith, and the chancellor of the exchequer, in which the latter obſerved, that if the going into a committee were to be conſidered as a mere matter of form, he ſhould not object to it, but if it were to be conſidered, if committed, as having received the countenance of the houſe, he ſhould immediately ſtate his objections to it.

Mr. Burke ſaid, that in his judgment no ground of policy had been advanced to ſhew that in point of prudence in the preſent ſtate of affairs, the acts of the 9th and 10th of William and Mary ought to be repealed. Had the right honourable gentleman, continued Mr. Burke, come forward with a diſtinct propoſition, to relieve from any grievance the Preſbyterians, the Quakers, the Roman Catholics, the Anabaptiſts, &c. the houſe would have been called on to relieve bodies of men recognized and tolerated by the laws of the land; men whom they knew, whoſe principles were known, and whoſe grievances being ſtated, a pacific remedy might be applied for their relief. The preſent queſtion brought before the houſe a body of men for relief from the penalties of certain ſtatutes; but the body of men were not recognized by any law of the land; they were wholly unknown as a body of men in this or in any other chriſtian country, and were to be looked on as a phenomenon, coming under the name of Unitarians, profeſſing principles militating againſt the ſafety of the church, which was one and the ſame with the conſtitution; for in every chriſtian commonwealth the ſtate and the church were to be conſidered as one and the ſame. Unitarianiſm was a new religion, with which the houſe was unacquainted. They all knew what old religions were; they had been acquainted with their good, and with their evil; perſecution had died away, and thoſe religions were looked to as volcanoes burned out, on the ruins of which every bleſſing for man was cultivated and enjoyed; a new volcano was to be looked to with fear and trembling, for its eruption might deſtroy thoſe things which were now charming to nature. The preſent buſineſs, certainly came in a queſtionable ſhape, and ought to be exerciſed, as Hamlet exerciſed the ghoſt; the houſe ought to queſtion it, whether it brought with it airs from heaven, or blaſts from hell; whether its intents were wicked or charitable? The Unitarians, he ſaid, had eſtabliſhed a fund for the diſtribution of pamphlets to the lower claſſes of the people; they were a propagandi to overturn the eſtabliſhed religion of the country; they complained of no grievance, but had alone in their wiſh to obtain the countenance of parliament by a recognition of ſuch a body of men.—The right honourable gentleman was deſirous that the houſe would examine what the deſcription of men was, that now deſired the countenance of the houſe: with the indulgence of the houſe he would ſhew from the writings and proceedings of their chief, Dr. Prieſtley, their true deſcription. The right hon. gentleman read ſeveral extracts from Dr. Prieſtley's works againſt the Trinity: he quoted his aſſertion of a train of gunpowder being laid to blow up the eſtabliſhment, and maintained that, throughout the whole of his writings, a wiſh was expreſſed to induce the people to pull down the church. To prove that the Unitarians mingled politics with their religion, he took particular notice of the meeting in Feb. 1791, at the King's arms tavern, in the Poultry, where Dr. Prieſtley was chairman, and Mr. Lindſay, Dr. Towers, Horne Tooke, &c. had aſſembled. A tavern, he obſerved, was not a very common place for the moderate diſcuſſion of religious topics; but the gentlemen ſo aſſembled had a better ſubject to diſcuſs than the dry one of the 39 articles; they had the diſcuſſion of 39 bumpers, and as a proof of the moderation, innocence, and good-will to the conſtitution of their country, of theſe gentlemen, he would ſtate a few of their toaſts. The right hon. gentleman then mentioned the toaſts—Proſperity to the Unitarian Society—Mr. Fox, and the Repeal of the Penal Statutes againſt certain Religious Opinions—The National Aſſembly of France, and may every tyrannical government experience a ſimilar Revolution—[to the repetition of each of theſe toaſts, the oppoſition ſide of the houſe exclaimed, hear! hear!] Mr. Burke proceeded; he ſaid, he had no doubt but the gentlemen who called out hear! hear! would willingly touch the glaſſes for the toaſts he had mentioned, and bumper them off with pleaſure; he had ſeveral more, however, in his liſt, and would give them, there was

"Thomas Paine, eſq. and the Rights of Man." [hear! hear! was now called out from the miniſterial ſide of the houſe, and a ſtrict ſilence was obſerved on the other ſide.]

What, exclaimed Mr. Burke, are the honourable gentlemen all ſilent! What, no one to put his finger to the glaſs for this toaſt! No one willing publicly to bumper it off!—What, no hear! hear! No three times three, to ſo good, ſo mild, ſo innocent a toaſt! —No, no; the gentlemen, ſo loud in their approbation of former toaſts are now as ſilent as mice. They are conſcious that the petitioners have incorporated politics into their religious ſyſtem, and they know that theſe politics ſo incorporated are the politics of Thomas Paine, whoſe production the right honourable gentleman (Mr. Fox) on a former night had declared to be a libel on the conſtitution, though he would not go the length of declaring it to be an infamous libel!—At this meeting, of which Dr. Prieſtley was the chairman, and Dr. Kippis, Dr. Towers, &c. made a part, the people of England were called on to celebrate, on the 14th of July following, the French revolution. Whatever followed that celebration, and whatever evils fell on Dr. Prieſtley, or others who were at the meeting, thoſe evils were brought down upon them by themſelves; they called for the celebration of the triumph of a mob, and had themſelves to thank for the effects. The pamphlets and papers they had diſperſed, and were diſtributing, he did not conſider merely to be libels on the conſtitution, but as calculated to overturn every principle on which the happineſs and proſperity of Great Britain ſtood. What he knew of theſe men, he knew from their actions; and would prove incontrovertibly, by their own authority, the exiſtence of a plot in this country to deſtroy its conſtitution: he would prove, that the meeting to which he had alluded, had a connection with another, the revolution ſociety; he would ſhew that the revolution ſociety had a connection with cabals and dangerous clubs in foreign countries, calculated to overturn the conſtitution of this country—a conſtitution which the clubs in France had expreſſed their admiration of in many parts, but which admiration the clubs in England had endeavoured to do away, by repreſenting the royal prerogative as unbearable, the lords as ſervile, the clergy as intolerant; and the commons as corrupt. The Unitarians and the revolutioniſts had in their correſpondence with the Jacobin club, and with the body calling itſelf the national aſſembly, expreſſed a hope that England would benefit by the tranſcendent government of France, which was held up by Dr. Prieſtley and his friends, as worthy the imitation of the people in Great Britain. Mr. Burke proceeded further in reading various extracts from ſeveral books written by members of the ſociety, and condemning the licentious clubs of France, when Mr. Harriſon roſe to order, contending that the right honourable gentleman was diſorderly in bringing before the houſe the ſubject of the French revolution, which was in no degree connected with the queſtion.

The ſpeaker ſaid, Mr. Burke was in order, his arguments going to prove that the petitioners held political as well as religious opinions.

Mr. Burke accordingly proceeded, and was replied to by Mr. Smith, who entered into a general defence of the Unitarians.

After a warm debate the queſtion was at length put, and negatived by a diviſion,

The libel bill which was introduced laſt ſeſſion by Mr. Fox and Mr. Erſkine, and loſt in the houſe of lords, was this ſeſſion triumphantly carried in both houſes, and paſſed into a law.

The remainder of the national buſineſs being gone through, his majeſty went to the houſe of peers on the 15th of June, and put an end to the ſeſſions, by a moſt gracious ſpeech from the throne.

The following are the moſt remarkable occurrences which happened during this year.

On the 4th of January their majeſties, the prince of Wales, the duke and ducheſs of York, the duke of Clarence, and ſix of the princeſſes, went to the new theatre in the Haymarket. Such was the curioſity on this occaſion, that undeſcribable confuſion and miſchief enſued, and Mr. Smith, a gentleman belonging to the India houſe, loſt his life. The crowd had aſſembled at an early hour; in conſequence of which, the ſtreet doors were ſoon opened to the lobbies. As ſoon as the lobby leading to the pit was full, by ſome means or other the door was ſhut: numbers continuing to aſſemble, who wiſhed to get to the pit, ſuppoſed that the door had not been opened, as it was only five o'clock: when the uſual period arrived for opening, finding the door ſhut, they grew exceedingly tumultuous, calling out, "Open the door! open the door! or down with the houſe!" The advanced guard arrived about this time, ſoon followed by the king's guard, who attempted to make way, and drive the people from the doors, but in vain; they were diſperſed from their poſts; ſome forced into the highway, and ſome under carriages; and, in the general confuſion, ſeveral loſt their bayonets and ſide arms. At ſix o'clock, the pit door was opened a ſecond time; nor, till this period, would the multitude be convinced that the door had been opened before, much leſs that the houſe was full.—The unfortunate Mr. Smith was injured in the firſt attempt to get in; at the confined entrance he fell down, when the mob cloſed and trampled upon him.

On the 16th in the morning, between one and two, a fire broke out at the Pantheon in Oxford-ſtreet; but it was a little after twelve, when Mr. Temple, the ſecretary to the opera undertaking, perceived a ſmell, which induced him to ſuſpect ſome fire about the premiſes, and to order the watchman, who was conſtantly ſtationed there in the night, to examine the whole. No diſcovery reſulted from this ſearch, which was carried into every apartment of the houſe, except that occupied by the painters in the day-time, who had taken the key of it with them. Mr. Temple and his family, the watchman, and a porter, were the only inhabitants of the building. Soon after one, the ſmell continuing to increaſe, another ſurvey commenced, and a room adjoining to that allotted to the painters, appeared to be injured by the fire, which had then nearly deſtroyed the former apartment, and was become ſo furious, that theſe perſons were only able to give the alarm and make their eſcape. The flames ſoon got to a great height, illuminating all the weſt parts of the metropolis, and were not much checked by what water the engines, when they arrived, between two and three, could throw in upon them. The walls of the building, which, by their thickneſs, prevented the flames from ſpreading to the adjoining houſes, by their height made it difficult to project water over them. At length, between four and five, the roof, which was of wood and ſlate, fell in, and the immenſe column of flame, riſing then to a great height, and continuing for ſeveral minutes, was a dreadful and ſublime object. The fire raged till between ſix and ſeven, and was not entirely extinguiſhed at twelve o'clock on Saturday. The original building coſt 60,000l. of which only 10,000l. was inſured, viz. in the Weſtminſter office; and, on the property, 5000l. was inſured in the Phœnix. Happily no lives were loſt, either by the fire, or by the falling of the dome; but the firemen had left the cotillion-room only ten minutes before the falling of the floor.

April 25th, diſpatches were received from captain Edwards, of his majeſty's ſhip Pandora, (who was ſent out ſoon after the return of captain Bligh from the South Seas, in ſearch of Chriſtian, and the other mutineers who ran away with the Bounty armed ſhip), ſtating that on the Pandora's appearing off Otaheite, two men ſwam from the ſhore, and ſolicited to be taken on board. They appeared to be two of the Bounty's mutineers, and gave intelligence where fourteen of their companions were concealed on the iſland. A part of the Pandora's crew were diſpatched in ſearch of them, and after ſome reſiſtance they were taken, and brought priſoners on board. Chriſtian, with the other nine mutineers, had previouſly ſailed in the Bounty to ſome remote iſland, and every exertion of the Pandora to diſcover their retreat proved ineffectual. On her return home, the Pandora ſtruck upon a reef of rocks in Endeavour Straits. Her crew eſcaped from their perilous ſituation to an iſland in the Straits, except thirty-three men, and three of the Bounty's people, who periſhed by the boat overſetting. Captain Edwards was reduced to the neceſſity of ſending one of his officers and ſome ſeamen, in a ſmall boat, to Timor, which they were fourteen days in reaching, and where a veſſel was procured, which proceeded to the aſſiſtance of the remainder of the crew, who were taken on board, and are, in all probability, by this time, ſafely arrived at the Cape of Good Hope.

So much had the mutineers of the Bounty conformed to the cuſtoms and manners of Otaheite, that when the two men of Chriſtian's crew ſwam off to the Pandora, they were ſo tattooed, and exhibited ſo many other characteriſtic ſtains, that on being firſt received on board, the Pandora's people took them for natives of the iſland. The names of the above metamorphoſed mutineers are, Peter Heywood, a midſhipman, and Joſeph Coleman, the armourer; the latter of whom, captain Bligh obſerves, "was detained by Chriſtian, contrary to his inclination." See PORTLOCK's Collection of Travels and Voyages.

During the ſame month a very ſingular circumſtance occurred at Kilrhyg, in Cardiganſhire, during the ſale of the property of the late Miſs Lloyd, who had been murdered by a villain, who broke into her houſe. A gentleman became the purchaſer of a cheſt for 20s. when, led by curioſity minutely to examine his bargain, he perceived that it had two drawers, behind one of which was ſecreted a japanned cup, containing 500 guineas, and a purſe with eighteen guineas and two crown-pieces. The whole premiſes, and all the furniture, had been repeatedly ſearched previouſly to the ſale, from the knowledge that Miſs Lloyd had a conſiderable ſum of money in the houſe at the time of her death; yet about 200l. hid in different corners, was all that could be diſcovered. The gentleman, much to his honour, returned the property undiminiſhed, to the adminiſtrator; and could not be prevailed upon to accept even the purchaſe money of the cheſt as a tribute to his inflexible integrity.

In the month of June very dangerous riots prevailed in Mount-ſtreet, Groſvenor-ſquare, in which the watch-houſe there, a well conſtructed and handſome building, was very nearly demoliſhed. The whole originated from the aſſembling of about forty ſervants of ſome neighbouring people of faſhion, at a public houſe, to join in a dance on Monday evening, in honour of his majeſty's birth-day. This, to certain over-zealous officers of juſtice, appeared an infringement of the peace, which they took upon them to put an end to, by proceeding to the houſe, taking the whole company into cuſtody, and confining them all night in the watch-houſe. Next day, however, they were all diſcharged; but a few of the unfortunate people, who had been active in a riotous attempt at their liberation, ſupplied their place, and by the exertion of the military all was made quiet, not without ſome perſonal injury to a few, who ſuffered from repeated firings, which were deemed neceſſary to quell the tumult. No life was loſt.

At the ſame time John Kimber's trial came on at the Old Bailey upon a charge of having murdered a negro girl.

Thomas Dowling, ſurgeon of the ſhip, ſwore minutely to the cruel treatment of the girl, as ſtated by Mr. Wilberforce, in the houſe of commons. But, on his croſs-examination, he admitted, that he did not diſcloſe this circumſtance in the Weſt Indies after their arrival, nor at Briſtol after their return, except to a few of his private acquaintance; but that he was ſent to London to give evidence before the committee, for the abolition of the ſlave trade; to give an account of the firing from on board ſlave ſhips on the town of Calabar; and that he mentioned this murder to Mr. Wilberforce, the day before he made his ſpeech for the abolition of the ſlave trade. He admitted too, that in the return he made according to act of parliament, to a public office, there was no mention made of this murder; that that return was required by the act to be upon oath, but that he had not really taken that oath; that he had not kiſſed the book, but that, after it was preſented to him, he returned it to the clerk, and the entry was then made as if all was regular. In truth, the return was not his, but captain Kimber's; that no man, he believed, ſaw the ſuſpending and flogging, except himſelf, Stephen Devereux, the mate, and two boys he had mentioned in his evidence. This he explained by ſtating, that the awning on the deck, when this was done, was barricadoed ſo as to obſtruct the ſight of thoſe on the other part of the deck. He denied he had ever ſaid "he would be the ruin of captain Kimber."

The evidence of Devereux was ſimilar to that of Dowling. But he ſwore he did not know he had ever been accuſed of mutiny on board a former ſhip, in which he had ſerved, and in conſequence of which captain Kimber took him, out of humanity. Three witneſſes contradicted the evidence of Dowling, as to his never having ſaid that he would ruin captain Kimber; poſitively ſwearing that he had made uſe of theſe expreſſions frequently. Three witneſſes alſo contradicted Devereux, on the point of his not knowing that he was charged with mutiny on board the Waſp, and that captain Kimber took him on board the Diſcovery at Calabar, out of humanity. Several witneſſes were called, who gave the captain a good character for humanity. The jury ſaid they were ſatisfied, and the priſoner was acquitted.

On the 19th of December came on before lord Kenyon and a ſpecial jury, at Guildhall, the trial of Thomas Paine, for writing and publiſhing a certain ſeditious pamphlet, under the title of 'The Second Part of the Rights of Man.' The information, which was opened by Mr. Percival, ſtated, that Thomas Paine, being a wicked, malicious, ſeditious, and ill-diſpoſed perſon, and diſaffected to the king and government, had traduced the happy revolution effected by the prince of Orange, afterwards king William III.—the acceptance of the crown by the ſaid prince and queen Mary—the convention parliament, which had conferred the crown on their ſaid majeſties—and the bill of rights, including the ſettlement of the ſucceſſion: that he had endeavoured to repreſent, that theſe were reſpectively contrary to the rights and intereſt of the people; that our hereditary regal government was a tyranny; that our parliament was a wicked, corrupt, and unneceſſary eſtabliſhment; that the king, lords, and commons tyranniſed over the people; and that thus he had endeavoured to infuſe groundleſs diſcontents againſt the king and parliament, as well as againſt our conſtitution, laws, and government.

The Attorney-General then roſe, and in the courſe of a long and able ſpeech, read ſeveral paſſages from the work in ſupport of the information, and contended that the whole was throughout malignant in the intention of the writer, and extremely miſchievous in its tendency. The publication, &c. being proved, Mr. Erſkine entered into a very long defence of the author on the general grounds of the freedom of the preſs; contending, that his client had not gone beyond the bounds of fair and allowable diſcuſſion; that the topics on which he had animadverted, had been treated with ſtill greater force of expreſſion by the duke of Richmond, Mr. Pitt, ſir George Saville, Mr. Burke, &c. illuſtrating his obſervations by various quotations from Locke, Hume, Milton, Paley, and others; and deprecating the ſpirit of prejudice that had gone forth againſt his client. When he had finiſhed, the Attorney General roſe immediately to reply; but the foreman of the jury ſaid,—My lord, I am authoriſed by the jury here, to inform the Attorney General, that a reply is not neceſſary for them, unleſs the Attorney General wiſhes to make it, or your lordſhip. The Attorney General ſat down, and the jury gave in their verdict—Guilty.

Towards the cloſe of this year ſome apprehenſions having ariſen from the dangerous tendency of republicaniſm, which ſeemed to be now prevalent among the people, the Tower was put in a poſture of defence, and great preparations made to prevent any threatening diſorders. Several hundreds of men were employed about the walls of the Tower. The ſtones, which were upon ſundry parts of Tower-hill, have been collected, together with quantities of earth, into old puncheons, uſed in forming barricadoes. The gates were ſhut at nine o'clock, two hours ſooner than uſual. A ſtranger was with difficulty admitted in the day time, and no perſons but officers and ſentinels were ſuffered to appear upon the ramparts.

On the 13th of December, his majeſty went to the houſe, and opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech to the following purpoſe:

"Having judged it neceſſary to embody a part of the militia of this kingdom, I have, in purſuance of the proviſions of the law, called you together within the time limited for that purpoſe, and it is, on every account, a great ſatisfaction to me to meet you in parliament at this conjuncture.

"I ſhould have been happy if I could have anounced to you the ſecure and undiſturbed continuance of all the bleſſings which my ſubjects have derived from a ſtate of tranquillity; but events have recently occurred which require out united vigilance and exertion in order to preſerve the advantages which we have hitherto enjoyed.

"The ſeditious practices which had been in a great meaſure checked by your firm and explicit declaration in the laſt ſeſſion, and by the general concurrence of my people in the ſame ſentiments, have of late been more openly renewed, and with increaſed activity. A ſpirit of tumult and diſorder (the natural conſequence of ſuch practices) has ſhewn itſelf in acts of riot and inſurrection, which required the interpoſition of a military force in ſupport of the civil magiſtrate. The induſtry employed to excite diſcontent on various pretexts, and in different parts of the kingdom, has appeared to proceed from a deſign to attempt the deſtruction of our happy conſtitution, and the ſubverſion of all order and government: and this deſign has evidently been purſued in connection and concert with perſons in foreign countries.

"I have carefully obſerved a ſtrict neutrality in the preſent war on the continent, and have uniformly abſtained from any interference with reſpect to the internal affairs of France; but it is impoſſible for me to ſee, without the moſt ſerious uneaſineſs, the ſtrong and increaſing indications which have appeared there of an intention to excite diſturbances in other countries, to diſregard the rights of neutral nations, and to purſue views of conqueſt and aggrandiſement, as well as to adopt towards my allies the ſtates-general (who have obſerved the ſame neutrality with myſelf) meaſures which are neither conformable to the law of nations, nor to the poſitive ſtipulations of exiſting treaties. Under all theſe circumſtances I have felt it my indiſpenſable duty to have recourſe to thoſe means of prevention and internal defence with which I am entruſted by law; and I have alſo thought it right to take ſteps for making ſome augmentation of my naval and military force, being perſuaded that theſe exertions are neceſſary in the preſent ſtate of affairs, and are beſt calculated both to maintain internal tranquillity, and to render a firm and temperate conduct effectual for preſerving the bleſſings of peace.

"Nothing will be neglected on my part that can contribute to that important object conſiſtently with the ſecurity of my kingdoms, and with the faithful performance of engagements which we are bound equally by intereſt and honour to fulfill." After violent debates on the ſubject of the above ſpeech, an addreſs to his majeſty was carried by a majority of 240.

Dec. 17. Mr. Grey called the attention of the houſe to a pamphlet circulated by ſome of the aſſociations calling themſelves conſtitutional. It was entitled, "A Letter from Thomas Bull," and contained, among other groſs falſehoods and inflammatory expreſſions, an aſſertion, that "it was the Preſbyterians, who by their writing, &c. brought on the American war, by which we are double taxed," &c. Mr. Grey deemed this a ſeditious libel againſt a part of the community, who were remarkable, on the moſt trying occaſions, for their loyalty and affection to the conſtitution, and to the preſent royal family. It not only aſperſed their character, but expoſed both their property and perſons to deſtruction. In a word, to ſuch publications were owing ſome recent riots at Cambridge and Mancheſter, which were begun, not by republican, but by loyal mobs. He therefore moved, that "the ſaid pamphlet be now received and read, as a preliminary ſtep to another motion, namely, "That an humble addreſs be preſented to his majeſty, that he would be graciouſly pleaſed to give orders to the attorney-general to proſecute the authors of the ſaid pamphlet." The tendency of this motion went to extend the protection of the laws equally to every deſcription of his majeſty's ſubjects. The motion was oppoſed on the ground, that it was unneceſſary and improper; its intended implication (that protection was not equally extended to all his majeſty's ſubjects) not being true, and the queſtion being put, it was negatived without a diviſion.

On Wedneſday, lord Grenville moved for leave to bring in a bill relative to the influx of foreigners into this kingdom. It was accordingly preſented and read for the firſt time.

Some preliminary forms occupied the attention of the commons on the 18th, and on the 19th lord Arden moved the ordinaries of the navy, viz. twenty-five thouſand ſeamen at the rate of four pounds per man a month, for the ſervice of the year 1793. This was agreed to; and then the thanks of the houſe were voted to lord Cornwallis, &c. as in the houſe of peers.

On the 20th, the chancellor of the exchequer moved, "That an humble addreſs be preſented to his majeſty, praying, that he will be moſt graciouſly pleaſed to give directions, that there be laid before this houſe copies of his majeſty's orders to lord Gower on his quitting Paris, after the depoſition of their moſt Chriſtian majeſties." This motion was adopted.

The next day, Mr. Secretary Dundas brought up "A copy of the inſtructions ſent to earl Gower ſignifying his majeſty's pleaſure that he ſhould leave Paris. Dated the 17th of Auguſt, 1792."

The chancellor of the exchequer then moved, that it ſhould be read, as follows:

"My lord,

"In lord Grenville's abſence I have received and laid before the king your laſt diſpatches.

"His majeſty has been very deeply afflicted in receiving the information of the extent and the deplorable conſequences of the troubles which have happened in Paris; as well on account of his perſonal attachment to their moſt Chriſtian majeſties, and the intereſt that he has always taken in their welfare, as for the earneſt deſire he has for the tranquillity and proſperity of a kingdom, with which he is on terms of friendſhip.

"As it appears, that in the preſent ſtate of affairs, the exerciſe of the executive power has been withdrawn from his moſt Chriſtian majeſty, the credentials which have hitherto been made uſe of by your excellency, can no longer be valid. His majeſty is therefore of opinion, that you ought not to remain any longer in Paris, as well on this account, as becauſe this ſtep appears to him the moſt conformable to the principles of neutrality which he has hitherto obſerved. His majeſty's pleaſure therefore is, that you ſhould quit that city, and return to England as ſoon as you ſhall have been able to procure the neceſſary paſſports for that purpoſe.

"In all the converſations that you may have occaſion to hold before your departure, you will take care to expreſs yourſelf in a manner conformable to the ſentiments herein communicated to you; and you will take ſpecial care not to neglect any opportunity of declaring, that at the ſame time his majeſty means to obſerve the principles of neutrality in every thing which regards the arrangement of the internal government of France, he does not conceive that he departs from theſe principles in manifeſting, by every poſſible means in his power, his ſolicitude for the perſonal ſituation of their moſt Chriſtian majeſties, and the royal family. He moſt earneſtly hopes that his wiſhes in that reſpect will not be deceived; that the royal family will be preſerved from every act of violence; the commiſſion of which would not fail to excite ſentiments of univerſal indignation throughout all Europe. I have the honour to be, &c. &c.

HENRY DUNDAS."

After ſome general converſation entirely coinciding with the ſentiments of the chancellor of the exchequer on this ſubject, the motion, "That this paper do now lie upon the table, to be peruſed by the members of this houſe," was then put and carried.

On the 24th the houſe having reſolved itſelf into a committee, the ſecretary of war ſtated, that the army had been augmented for the ſervice of the enſuing year ten men to a company, both infantry and cavalry, making an addition to be provided for of 6,200 men. The reſolution he had therefore to propoſe was, "That, including 1,600 invalids, 17,344 effective men, commiſſioned and non-commiſſioned officers included, be employed for the ſervice of the year 1793."

After ſome converſation between Mr. Fox, Mr. Burke, &c. the queſtion was put and agreed to.

The ſecretary at war next moved, "That 697,174l. 18s. $1\frac{1}{2}$d. be granted for defraying the expence of guards and garriſons for the year 1793," which was alſo agreed to; as were the other uſual reſolutions for the ordinary of the army.

Mr. Craufurd moved for the land ſervice of the ordnance for the enſuing year, the ſum of 449,000l. which, with ſeveral other ordnance ordinaries, were agreed to, without debate.

A.D. 1793. On the 7th of January, the houſe reſolved itſelf into a committe of ways and means; to which an account of the ſurplus of the conſolidated fund was ordered to be referred.

Mr. Pitt ſaid, that gentlemen would recollect that laſt year the houſe had voted the growing produce of the conſolidated fund to extend to the 5th of April 1793, in order to defray the expences of the year 1792. He had, however, the ſatisfaction to inform the committee, that the expences of the year were not only defrayed on the 5th of Jan. 1793, but that a ſurplus of 435,696l. 1s. $7\frac{1}{2}$d. remained.

He therefore moved, that this ſurplus ſhould be applied to the ſervices of the preſent year, which was agreed to. The next day an adjournment took place till the twenty-third.

While the alien bill was ſtill under the conſideration of parliament, another meaſure allied to it in principle was introduced by the attorney-general, and this was a bill to prevent the circulation of aſſignats, bonds, promiſſory notes, &c. &c. iſſued under the authority of France: the bill was oppoſed by Mr. Taylor, but paſſed without any farther oppoſition in either houſe. The ſame time an order of council having been iſſued for preventing the exportation of corn to France, and ſome ſhips which had already taken in their cargoes having been compelled to unload, an act of indemnity paſſed the commons on this ſubject, and afterwards received the royal aſſent.

While theſe affairs were tranſacting in parliament, a new arrangement took place in the miniſtry. Lord Loughborough, who in all the late debates had been prominently zealous in ſupporting the meaſures of miniſters, was honoured with the great ſeals of England, and was called to ſucceed lord Thurlow on the woolſack.

About this time intelligence was received of the late cataſtrophe of monarchy in France. Louis XVI. was ſuſpended from the royal authority, Auguſt 10, 1792, and this year, January 17th, pronounced guilty of a conſpiracy againſt the ſtate. It was decreed, that he ſhould die the 21ſt of the ſame month. The following is the official report made to the commons of Paris, by James Roux, prieſt and preacher of the Sans Culottes, one of the commiſſioners named by the commons, to aſſiſt at the execution:

"We come to give you an account of the miſſion with which we were charged. We went to the Temple, where we announced to the tyrant, that the hour for his execution was arrived.

"He deſired ſome minutes alone with his confeſſor. He wanted to give us a packet for you; but we obſerved, "we were only charged to conduct him to the ſcaffold." He anſwered, "That is true;" and gave the packet to one of our colleagues. He recommended his family; and requeſted that Clery, his valet-de-chambre, ſhould be that of the queen and then haſtily ſaid, of his wife. He ſaid to Santerre, 'Marchons (let us go on;) He walked through one court, and got into the carriage in the ſecond. The moſt perfect ſilence reigned during the whole proceſſion. We never loſt ſight of Capet till we came to the guillotine (The name of the machine, in which the axe deſcends in grooves from a conſiderable height, ſo that the ſtroke is certain, and the head inſtantly ſevered from the body.) He arrived there at ten minutes after ten; he was three minutes getting out of the carriage; he wiſhed to harangue the people; Santerre oppoſed it. His head was ſevered from his body. The citizens dipped their pikes and handkerchiefs in his blood."

After this report, general Santerre added: "You have heard an exact account of all that paſſed. Louis Capet wanted to ſpeak of mercy to the people, but I would not let him."

To the above official account we muſt add, that the king arrived at the place of execution at ten in the morning, having been conveyed from the Temple by the way of the Boulevards. He mounted the ſcaffold alone, the commiſſioners, the mayor, and even his confeſſor, remaining at the foot of it. He had on nothing but a white under waiſtcoat, his neck and breaſt open, and his hair rolled up behind as abbés wear theirs. He advanced with a firm ſtep and ſteady countenance on the left ſide of the guillotine, and ſaid, in a firm voice, "Frenchmen, I die innocent; I forgive my enemies; I wiſh that my death may be uſeful to the people." He was then conducted to the guillotine, and ſaid, in Latin, as he placed himſelf upon it, "I commend my ſoul to God." His head was inſtantly ſevered from his body. During this interval, which was only two minutes, the moſt profound ſilence prevailed—not a motion, not a breath was heard.

That this affair cauſed not only much conſternation but great alarm in our own country, the following part of our hiſtory will evince.

On the 28th, Mr. Secretary Dundas, ſtanding at the bar, addreſſed the Speaker, and informed him, that he had a written meſſage from His Majeſty to deliver to the Houſe. He was directed to bring it up, which he accordingly did, and delivered it to the Speaker, who read it from the Chair, the members being uncovered, The meſſage was as follows.

"GEORGE R.

"His Majeſty has given directions for laying before the Houſe of Commons copies of ſeveral papers which have been received from M. Chauvelin, late Miniſter Plenipotentiary from the moſt Chriſtian King, by his majeſty's ſecretary of ſtate for foreign affairs, and of the anſwers returned thereto; and likewiſe copies of an order made by his majeſty in council, and tranſmitted by his majeſty's command to the ſaid M. Chauvelin, in conſequence of the atrocious act recently perpetrated at Paris.

"In the preſent ſituation of affairs, his majeſty thinks it indiſpenſably neceſſary to make a further augmentation of his forces by ſea and land; and relies on the known affection and zeal of the Houſe of Commons, to enable his majeſty to take the moſt effectual meaſures in the preſent important conjuncture, for maintaining the ſecurity and rights of his own dominions, for ſupporting his allies, and for oppoſing views of aggrandizement and ambition, on the part of France, which would be at all times dangerous to the general intereſts of Europe, but are particularly ſo, when connected with the propagation of principles which lead to the violation of the moſt ſacred duties, and are utterly ſubverſive of the peace and order of all civil ſociety.

"G. R."

The chancellor of the exchequer moved that, the houſe ſhould take into conſideration his majeſty's ſpeech on Thurſday next, when an addreſs would be moved, ſtating that the houſe would approve of the meſſage, and an augmentation of his majeſty's forces. He truſted that there was but one prevailing ſentiment on a late calamitous event. He would at preſent ſuppreſs his feelings and emotions on the ſubject. He was convinced that where there were ſuch violations of humanity and religion, that the feelings of the houſe would be in proportion to the enormity of the circumſtances. He did not preſs the buſineſs at preſent, as he conceived it of that magnitude and importance, that it required the moſt ſerious deliberation of a Britiſh Houſe of Commons.

On the 1ſt of February this ſubject being renewed, the chancellor of the exchequer obſerved, that amid the important objects of national concern, it was before impoſſible; he proceeded to the conſideration of his majeſty's meſſage, for the houſe not to direct its attention to the calamity and dreadful outrage againſt juſtice, humanity, and religion, which recently occurred at Paris. This brutality, as great as ever ſtained the annals of hiſtory, was ſuch as muſt excite the ſame emotions throughout this iſland, as in every civilized country in the world. If he were to conſult his feelings, he would wiſh to draw a veil over that melancholy and deplorable tranſaction. Having expatiated much upon the ſanguinary proceedings of France he obſerved, in the courſe of his ſpeech, that France with a jealous eye perceived our happy ſituation, and the contraſt it bore to her diſtracted condition. She ſaw that the wiſe and happy mixture of a monarchical government, not founded on baſe ſuperſtition, and blended with temperate ariſtocracy, and independent democracy, was a government ſuperior to any that could ariſe from their viſionary projects. She ſaw with pain the inviolability of the ſovereign, the operation of the three eſtates, and the check of the laws. Thus ſhe found that we made a ſplendid contraſt to that unfortunate country, where theory and impracticable ſpeculations, in a thouſand ſhapes, had reduced her to the loweſt ebb of miſery and misfortune. If the doctrines which France has promulgated were once to infect the people of this country, ſhe knew that then this country could no longer exiſt. He wiſhed the houſe to turn their thoughts to the communications on the table, which contained circumſtances that claimed the moſt ſerious conſideration of a Britiſh parliament. From the note of the 18th of June it would appear that reiterated aſſurances had been made, that aggrandizement was not the object of France, and that ſhe would obſerve (in conſequence of our neutrality) a ſincere neutrality to his majeſty and his allies. But what was the conſequence? They manifeſted that aggrandizement was their firſt object, in their ſucceſs againſt Savoy, and without diſguiſe publicly announced that they would annex it for ever to the preſent ſovereignty of France. Their military operations in every country manifeſted that aggrandizement was their ſole object; and their decree of the 10th of Auguſt was an illuſtration of what he had aſſerted. If aggrandizement was not their object, why, in conſequence of a temporary occupation of a country, ſubvert every ancient eſtabliſhment, and trample on every law, both human and divine? He intreated the houſe to look to her conduct with reſpect to the Netherlands; ſhe attempted to conſolidate that country with her other conqueſts, and, under the maſk of liberty, would continue to rule them with the worſt of all deſpotiſm, that of the French Jacobins.

She had indeed ſaid, that ſhe would only keep poſſeſſion during the war; but thoſe who recollected the illuminations on the arrival of Dumourier, while the people acted under military law, will perceive, that permanent occupancy, and not a temporary reſidence, was the object of the French. The people muſt ſmile at their idea of liberty, when the magiſtrates were obliged to act within a hollow ſquare formed of French troops, while the tree of liberty was planting in the centre. It was obvious, that they altered their plans, and made new profeſſions, according to the exiſting circumſtances of the times, and on their arrival propoſed adding Hainault to France as the 18th department. In the decree of the 19th of November, the National Convention had farther offered fraternity and aſſiſtance to every people that wiſhed to recover their liberties, to whom they would grant the ſituation of younger brothers. They had intended to propagate their doctrines all over the world, doctrines by which moderation was proſcribed as a crime. The National Convention have given by their acts the greateſt inſult to this country. They received the addreſſes of the moſt contemptible ſocieties, contemptible both in conſequence and numbers, at the bar of their Aſſembly, though treaſonable and ſeditious, with the moſt indecent exultation, and the moſt extravagant theatrical applauſe. In violation of the right of our allies, they had opened the Scheldt; but it had been demanded whether Holland manifeſted her wiſh that we ſhould aſſiſt her to repeal any invaſion on the part of France. To this he would reply, that, admitting no ſuch requiſition to have been made, the neceſſity for our providing ſuch aſſiſtance was no leſs preſſing. Gentlemen would remember how eaſy it had been for Dumourier at Antwerp to have over-run Holland; and that ſuch was the threatening progreſs of the French arms, and ſuch the formidable menace of their ſucceſſes, that it was perhaps impoſſible for the Dutch to ſpeak frankly their deſire of our aid. To ſuffer the farther triumph of that nation, would be the ruin of all legiſlation, of all religion; it would deſtroy not merely the glory of this country, but of Europe, and the world. Seeing then that nothing ſhort of hoſtilities was likely to curb their overweening arrogance and ambition, it became him to ſtate, that war was the moſt likely reſult of the exiſting circumſtances; and that though, until the actual commencement of hoſtilities, the door to pacification and adjuſtment was always open, yet any idea of peace was far from probable.

In conſequence, he came forward with confidence to appeal to the honour and wiſdom of that houſe, and ſhould move, "That an humble addreſs be preſented to his majeſty, thanking him for his moſt gracious communications to the houſe, and aſſuring him of their zeal and readineſs to furniſh that augmentation of forces required by his majeſty for the purpoſes ſtated in the meſſage."

This motion was ſeconded by lord Beauchamp, and ſupported by Mr. Anſtruther and Mr. Windham, but ſtrenuouſly reſiſted by earl Wycomb, Mr. Whitbread, jun. and Mr. Fox. Though they all condemned the atrocious crime which had been committed in France, they ſaw no ſound reaſon why this country ſhould go to war with that nation. The latter of theſe gentlemen (Mr. Fox) proceeded to ſhew that all the topics to which the chancellor of the exchequer had adverted, were introduced into the debate, to blind the judgment, by exciting the paſſions; and that they were none of them juſt grounds of war. Theſe grounds were three: the danger of Holland; the decree of the French convention of November 19th; and the general danger to Europe from the progreſs of the French arms. With reſpect to Holland, the conduct of miniſters afforded a freſh proof of their diſingenuouſneſs. They could not ſtate, that the Dutch had called upon us to fulfil the terms of our alliance.

As to the decree of the 19th of November, the explanation offered by the French executive council, whether it was conſidered or not as a fair general explanation, certainly ſhewed, that they were not inclined to inſiſt on that decree; and that with reſpect to us, at leaſt, they were diſpoſed to peace. But it was ſaid, we ought to inſiſt on ſecurity: but certainly we ought, at leaſt, to tell them what we meant by ſecurity; for it would be the extreme of arrogance to complain of inſult, without deigning to explain what reparation we required.

It had been ſaid, that as a ſecurity they muſt withdraw their troops from the Netherlands.—Were we then come to that pitch of inſolence, to ſay to France,—" You have conquered a part of an enemy's territory, who made war upon you: we will not interfere to make peace, but we require you to abandon the advantages you have gained, while he is preparing to attack you again." Was this the neutrality we held out to France? " If you are invaded and beaten, we will be quiet ſpectators; but if you hurt your enemy, if you enter his territory, we declare againſt you."

That war, Mr. Fox added, was unjuſt, which told not an enemy the ground of provocation, and the meaſure of atonement. It was as impolitic as unjuſt; for without an object of conteſt, clearly and definitively ſtated, what opening could there be for treating of peace? The people here too, who muſt pay, and muſt ſuffer, ought to be informed on what object they were to fix their hopes for its honourable termination.

With reſpect to the general danger of Europe, the ſame arguments applied, and to the ſame extent. To the general ſituation of Europe we had been ſcandalouſly inattentive. We had ſeen the entire conqueſt of Poland, and the invaſion of France, with ſuch marked indifference, that it would be difficult now to take it up with the grace of ſincerity; but even this would be better provided for, by propoſing terms before going to war.

Lord William Ruſſel ſpoke likewiſe againſt the war. The queſtion for the addreſs was carried without a diviſion.

Whatever were the intentions of the Britiſh miniſtry, however, they were completely anticipated by the raſhneſs of the French convention. Diſguſted by the diſmiſſion of M. Chauvelin, and with the refuſal of the Engliſh miniſtry to treat with M. Maret, who arrived from France, about this period, with extended powers, and, it is ſaid, with ſome conſiderable conceſſions, the French convention, on the 1ſt of February, decreed a declaration of war againſt his Britannic majeſty, and the ſtadtholder of the United Provinces.

On the 11th of February, therefore, Mr. ſecretary Dundas brought up a meſſage from his majeſty, announcing to his faithful commons the public declaration of war made by the French againſt his majeſty and the United Provinces.

The meſſage was taken into conſideration the 12th of February, when Mr. Pitt moved an addreſs in anſwer to his majeſty's ſpeech. Mr. Fox moved an amendment, but the amendment was negatived, and the addreſs carried without a diviſion.

The conſideration of the royal meſſage was likewiſe taken into conſideration by the lords, on the ſame day, when lord Grenville, after a long ſpeech, in which he recapitulated all the arguments hitherto uſed in favour of the meaſures of adminiſtration, moved the uſual addreſs, aſſuring his majeſty of their ſupport. Lords Stanhope and Lauderdale reſpectively moved amendments, that went to defeat the object of the addreſs, which, however, was carried without a diviſion.

The ſubject of the war with France was reſumed in the houſe of commons, on Monday, February 18, when Mr. Fox propoſed the following five reſolutions:

" Firſt, That it was not for the honour of Great Britain to make war on France for any interference in her internal affairs, or for the eſtabliſhment of any particular form of government in that country.

" Secondly, That the aggreſſions of France were not of ſuch a nature as to juſtify a war in the firſt inſtance, prior to a negociation to obtain explanation and redreſs.

" Thirdly, That in the late negociation his majeſty's miniſters had not purſued meaſures likely to obtain redreſs, nor to avert a war, not having ſtated the grounds upon which peace might have been maintained.

" Fourthly, That the rights of neutral nations had not been attended to by his majeſty's miniſters in their neglect of interfering againſt the late unjuſtifiable and abominable invaſion of Poland by Ruſſia and Pruſſia. And

" Fifthly, That it is the duty of his majeſty's miniſters to adviſe his majeſty againſt entering into any treaty which might retard or prevent his making a ſeparate peace with France."

It is not neceſſary here to recapitulate the arguments of Mr. Fox in ſupport of theſe reſolutions, as they were greatly expanded, on a ſubſequent day, in a motion made by Mr. Grey.—Mr. Jenkinſon moved the previous queſtion, for which were two hundred and ſeventy againſt forty-four.

Mr. Grey's motion, juſt alluded to, was made on Thurſday, February 21, with a view, by having it on the journals, to ſerve as a kind of proteſt againſt the war. It was as follows:

" That an humble addreſs be preſented to his majeſty, to aſſure his majeſty that his faithful commons, animated by a ſincere and dutiful attachment to his perſon and family, and to the excellent conſtitution of this kingdom, as well as by an ardent zeal for the intereſt and honour of the nation, will at all times be ready to ſupport his majeſty in any meaſures which a due obſervance of the faith of treaties, the dignity of the crown, or the ſecurity of his dominions, may compel him to undertake.

" That feeling the moſt earneſt ſolicitude to avert from our country the calamities of war, by every means conſiſtent with honour and with ſafety, we expreſſed to his majeſty, at the opening of the preſent ſeſſion, " our ſenſe of the temper and prudence which had induced his majeſty to obſerve a ſtrict neutrality with reſpect to the war on the Continent, and uniformly to abſtain from any interference in the internal affairs of France;" and our hope that the ſteps his majeſty had taken would have the happy tendency " to render a firm and temperate conduct effectual for preſerving the bleſſings of peace."

" That, with the deepeſt concern, we now find ourſelves obliged to relinquiſh that hope, without any evidence having been produced to ſatisfy us that his majeſty's miniſters have made ſuch efforts as it was their duty to make, and as, by his majeſty's moſt gracious ſpeech, we were taught to expect, for the preſervation of peace.—It is no leſs the reſolution than the duty of his majeſty's faithful commons to ſecond his efforts in the war thus fatally commenced, ſo long as it ſhall continue; but we deem it a duty equally incumbent upon us to ſolicit his majeſty's attention to thoſe reaſons or pretexts, by which his ſervants have laboured to juſtify a conduct on their part which we cannot but conſider as having contributed, in a great meaſure, to produce the preſent rupture.

"Various grounds of hoſtility againſt France have been ſtated, but none that appeared to us to have conſtituted ſuch an urgent and imperious caſe of neceſſity as left no room for accommodation, and made war unavoidable.—The government of France has been accuſed of having violated the law of nations, and the ſtipulations of exiſting treaties, by an attempt to deprive the republic of the United Provinces of the excluſive navigation of the Scheldt. No evidence, however, has been offered to convince us that this excluſive navigation was, either in itſelf or in the eſtimation of thoſe who were alone intereſted in preſerving it, of ſuch importance as to juſtify a determination in our government to break with France on that account. If, in fact, the States General had ſhewn a diſpoſition to defend their right by force of arms, it might have been an inſtance of the trueſt friendſhip to have ſuggeſted to them, for their ſerious conſideration, how far the aſſertion of this unprofitable claim might, in the preſent circumſtances of Europe, tend to bring into hazard the moſt eſſential intereſts of the republic.—But when, on the contrary, it has been acknowledged that no requiſition on this ſubject was made to his majeſty on the part of the States General, we are at a loſs to comprehend on what grounds of right or propriety we take the lead in aſſerting a claim in which we are not principals, and in which the principal party has not, as far as we know, thought it prudent or neceſſary to call for our interpoſition.

"We muſt further remark, that the point in diſpute ſeemed to us to have been relieved from a material part of its difficulty by the declaration of the miniſter of foreign affairs in France, that the French nation gave up all pretenſions to determine the queſtion of the future navigation of the Scheldt. Whether the terms of this declaration were perfectly ſatisfactory or not, they at leaſt left the queſtion open to pacific negociation; in which the value of the object, to any of the parties concerned in it, might have been coolly and impartially weighed againſt the conſequences to which all of them might be expoſed by attempting to maintain it by force of arms.

"We have been called upon to reſiſt views of conqueſt and aggrandizement entertained by the government of France, "at all times dangerous to the general intereſts of Europe, but" aſſerted to be "peculiarly ſo, when connected with the propagation of principles which lead to the violation of the moſt ſacred duties, and are utterly ſubverſive of the peace and order of all civil ſociety."

"We admit, that it is the intereſt and duty of every member of the commonwealth of Europe to ſupport the eſtabliſhed ſyſtem, and diſtribution of power among the independent ſovereignties, which actually ſubſiſt, and to prevent the aggrandizement of any ſtate, eſpecially the moſt powerful, at the expence of any other; and, for the honour of his majeſty's councils, we do moſt earneſtly wiſh, that his miniſters had manifeſted a juſt ſenſe of the importance of the principle to which they now appeal, in the courſe of late events, which ſeemed to us to threaten its entire deſtruction.

"When Poland was beginning to recover from the long calamities of anarchy, combined with oppreſſion; after ſhe had eſtabliſhed an hereditary and limited monarchy like our own, and was peaceably employed in ſetling her internal government, his majeſty's miniſters with apparent indifference and unconcern, have ſeen her become the victim of the moſt unprovoked and unprincipled invaſion; her territory over-run, her free conſtitution ſubverted, her national independence annihilated, and the general principles of the ſecurity of nations wounded through her ſide. With all theſe evils was France ſoon after threatened; and with the ſame appearance either of ſupine indifference, or of ſecret approbation, his majeſty's miniſters beheld the armies of other powers (in evident concert with the oppreſſor of Poland) advancing to the invaſion and ſubjugation of France, and the march of thoſe armies diſtinguiſhed from the ordinary hoſtilities of civilized nations by manifeſtos, which, if their principles and menaces had been carried into practice, muſt have inevitably produced the "return of that ferocity and barbariſm in war, which a beneficent religion, and enlightened manners, and true military honour, have for a long time baniſhed from the chriſtian world."

"No effort appears to have been made to check the progreſs of theſe invading armies:—His majeſty's miniſters, under a pretended reſpect for the rights and independence of other ſovereigns, thought fit at that time to refuſe even the interpoſition of his majeſty's counſels and good offices to ſave ſo great and important a portion of Europe from falling under the dominion of a foreign power. But no ſooner, by an ever memorable reverſe of fortune, had France repulſed her invaders, and carried her arms into their territory, than his majeſty's miniſters, laying aſide that colluſive indifference which had marked their conduct during the invaſion of France, began to expreſs alarms for the general ſecurity of Europe, which, as it appears to us, they ought to have ſeriouſly felt, and might have expreſſed, with greater juſtice, on the previous ſucceſſes of her powerful adverſaries.

"We will not diſſemble our opinion, that the decree of the national convention of France of the 19th of November 1792, was in a great meaſure liable to the objections urged againſt it; but we cannot admit that a war, upon the ſingle ground of ſuch a decree, unaccompanied by any overt acts, by which we or our allies might be directly attacked, would be juſtified as neceſſary and unavoidable. Certainly not—unleſs, upon a regular demand made by his majeſty's miniſters of explanation and ſecurity in behalf of us and our allies, the French had refuſed to give his majeſty ſuch explanation and ſecurity. No ſuch demand was made. Explanations, it is true, have been received and rejected. But it well deſerves to be remarked and remembered, that theſe explanations were voluntarily offered on the part of France, not previouſly demanded on ours, as undoubtedly they would have been, if it had ſuited the views of his majeſty's miniſters to have acted frankly and honourably toward France, and not to have reſerved their complaints for a future period, when explanations, however reaſonable, might come too late, and hoſtilities might be unavoidable.

"After a review of all theſe conſiderations, we think it neceſſary to repreſent to his majeſty, that none of the points which were in diſpute between his miniſters and the government of France, appear to us to have been incapable of being adjuſted by negociation, except that aggravation of French ambition, which has been ſtated to ariſe from the political opinions of the French nation. Theſe, indeed, we conceive, formed neither any definable object of negociation, nor any intelligible reaſon for hoſtility. They were equally incapable of being adjuſted by treaty, or of being either refuſed or confirmed by the events of war.

"We need not ſtate to his majeſty's wiſdom, that force can never cure deluſion; and we know his majeſty's goodneſs too well to ſuppoſe, that he could ever entertain the idea of employing force to deſtroy opinions by the extirpation of thoſe who hold them.

"The grounds upon which his majeſty's miniſters have adviſed him to refuſe the renewal of ſome avowed public intercourſe with the exiſting government of France, appeared to us neither juſtified by the reaſon of the thing itſelf, nor by the uſage of nations, nor by any expediency ariſing from the preſent ſtate of circumſtances. In all negociations or diſcuſſions whatſoever, of which peace is the real object, the appearance of an amicable diſpoſition, and of a readineſs to offer and to accept of pacific explanations on both ſides, is as neceſſary and uſeful to inſure ſucceſs as any arguments founded on ſtrict right. Nor can it be denied, that claims or arguments of any kind, urged in hoſtile or haughty language, however equitable or valid in themſelves, are more likely to provoke than to conciliate the oppoſite party. Deploring, as we have ever done, the melancholy event which has lately happened in France, it would yet have been ſome conſolation to us to have heard, that the powerful interpoſition of the Britiſh nation on this ſubject had at leaſt been offered, although it ſhould unfortunately have been rejected. But, inſtead of receiving ſuch conſolation from the conduct of his majeſty's miniſters, we have ſeen them, with extreme aſtoniſhment, employing, as an incentive to hoſtilities, an event, which they had made no effort to avert by negociation. This inaction they could only excuſe on the principle, that the internal conduct of nations (whatever may be our opinion of its morality) was no proper ground for interpoſition and remonſtrance from foreign ſtates; a principle from which it muſt ſtill more clearly follow, that ſuch internal conduct could never be an admiſſible juſtifying reaſon for war.

"We cannot refrain from obſerving, that ſuch frequent alluſions as have been made to an event (confeſſedly no ground of rupture) ſeemed to us to have ariſen from a ſiniſter intention to derive, from the humanity of Engliſhmen, popularity for meaſures which their deliberate judgment would have reprobated, aud to influence the moſt virtuous ſenſibilities of his majeſty's people into a blind and furious zeal for a war of vengeance.

"His majeſty's faithful commons, therefore, though always determined to ſupport his majeſty with vigour and cordiality, in the exertions neceſſary for the defence of his kingdoms, yet feel that they are equally bound by their duty to his majeſty and to their fellow-ſubjects, to declare, in the moſt ſolemn manner, their diſapprobation of the conduct of his majeſty's miniſters, throughout the whole of theſe tranſactions; a conduct, which, in their opinion could lead to no other termination, but that, to which it ſeems to have been ſtudiouſly directed, of plunging their country into an unneceſſary war. The calamities of ſuch a war muſt be aggravated, in the eſtimation of every rational mind, by reflecting on the peculiar advantages of that fortunate ſituation, which we have ſo unwiſely abandoned, and which not only exempted us from ſharing in the diſtreſſes and afflictions of the other nations of Europe, but converted them into ſources of benefit, improvement, and proſperity to this country.

"We therefore humbly implore his majeſty's paternal goodneſs to liſten no longer to the councils, which have forced us into this unhappy war, but to embrace the earlieſt occaſion, which his wiſdom may diſcern, of reſtoring to his people the bleſſings of peace."

Major Maitland ſeconded the motion; but as the view with which it was made was perfectly underſtood, and the ſubject had already been ſo amply diſcuſſed, no debate enſued, but the motion was negatived without a diviſion.

Mr. R. Smith then read a petition, ſigned by 2500 perſons of the town of Nottingham, praying for a reform in parliament. The petition ſtated the repreſentation of the people to have paſſed away; that in its ſtead there exiſted the groſſeſt abuſe of the rights of the people; and that their rights were uſurped in a manner which induced members in that houſe not to look to the people, but to others for approbation. It propoſed, as a reform, the empowering all adults to vote for repreſentatives; and to ſhorten the duration of parliaments. Mr. Smith moved for leave to bring up the petition.

The queſtion being put, the motion was negatived, there being, for bringing up the petition, ayes 21; noes 109; majority 88.

The Slave trade was taken into conſideration on the 27th, and after a long and intereſting debate negatived by a majority of 8.

On Wedneſday the 6th of March, ſeveral bills received the royal aſſent by commiſſion, among which was a bill for providing for the families of militiamen.

The ſame day, Mr. Secretary Dundas preſented the following meſſage to the commons:

"GEORGE REX.

"His majeſty having judged it expedient to employ in the ſervice of Great Britain, a body of his Electoral troops, for the purpoſe of aſſiſting his allies, the ſtates general of the United Provinces, and of proſecuting, in the moſt effectual manner, the juſt and neceſſary war in which his majeſty is engaged, his majeſty has directed an eſtimate to be laid before the houſe of the charge attending the employment of the ſaid troops; and his majeſty relies on the zeal of his faithful commons, that they will be ready to make the neceſſary proviſion for maintaining the ſame."

A ſimilar meſſage was ſent to the lords, who, the next day agreed to the cuſtomary addreſs.

March 11, in a committee of the whole houſe on the ſupply, the chancellor of the exchequer proceeded to open what is called The Budget. After an exordium on the eſſential importance of the war, he obſerved, that in ſtating the extenſive ſupplies he ſhould propoſe, he would go farther than had ever been done in preceding wars; for he would not only ſtate what the demands actually were for public ſervice, but even anticipate the expence of future ſervice by eſtimates, and make proviſion for thoſe eſtimates. Every thing he ſhould propoſe would be perfectly agreeable to the ſyſtem of iſſuing annually a million to the reduction of the national debt; and, even under the preſent exigencies of the ſtate, he ſhould make proviſion for the iſſuing of 200,000l. annually, in addition to that million. It was alſo his intention to guard againſt the accumulation of unfunded debt, and for that purpoſe to cloſe an account thereof yearly. The unfunded navy debt, which was now 575,000l. he ſhould provide for a reduction of to that ſum which the houſe had been contented to leave it at for times of peace.—He then proceeded to ſtate the eſtimates; after which he obſerved, that he had great hopes that circumſtances might ariſe, to enable us to take an effective part with our numerous allies in military operations; and he doubted not, if a favourable opening ſhould offer, that the houſe would agree in any meaſure of ſubſidy which might operate to the preſſing of the common enemy on all ſides. Another increaſe of expence would ariſe from the neceſſary encampments which would take place at home. It was impoſſible to form any eſtimate to be depended upon of the expences ariſing from the ſervices he had ſtated; but it was extremely material that a conſiderable ſum ſhould be ſet apart to provide for thoſe exigences; the ſum he propoſed to be ſet apart was a million and a half, in addition to the ſums he had already ſtated for ſpecific ſervices. This ſum he ſhould propoſe to raiſe by Exchequer bills on a vote of credit; but to prevent the accumulation of Exchequer bills, it was his intention to provide for the diſcharge of one million and a half already out. Obſerving that he had now gone through the whole of the ſupply, he ſtated the amount of the total to be provided for to be 11,182,000

11,182,000l. To meet this ſupply, he ſtated the ways and means, which were the land and malt tax 2,750,000l.; ſurplus of the conſolidated fund 700,000l.; a diſpoſable ſurplus, in four quarters, of the permament revenue, 2,185,000l.; the temporary taxes, laid on for the Spaniſh armament, to be continued, 255,000l. impreſt money, 250,000l.; from the Eaſt India Company 500,000l.; which would leave about 4,500,000l. to be ſtill provided for; which he propoſed to be by way of loan, of which, as the commiſſioners for liquidating the national debt, were to furniſh part, would leave only 2,900,000l. to be furniſhed by individuals. Then reminding the houſe, that an act of laſt year went to add to the intereſt of all loans one per cent. for the reduction of the capital, he ſtated, that he would now only look to the terms of ſuch loan by ſpeculation; by ſuppoſing the ſtock at 75, and he ſaw no reaſon whatever for expecting it to be lower; the ſum to be raiſed by loan would create a capital of ſix millions, the intereſt for which would be 180,000l. to which would be to be added the one per cent. for the reduction of the capital, amounting to 60,000l. which, added to the intereſt, produced 240,000l. annually to be defrayed from the revenue of the Conſolidated Fund. To provide for this, he propoſed to render permanent

The additional duty on Bills of Exchange and Game Licences -	£ 85,000
The additional duty of 1d. per gallon on all Britiſh ſpirits - - -	112,000
The 10 per cent. on Aſſeſſed Taxes -	90,000
	287,000

Which was nearly 50,000l. above the ſum neceſſary, and which ſurplus might go to the growing produce of the Conſolidated Fund.

He then entered into ſeveral particulars to ſhew, that there was no reaſon to apprehend, that the ſurplus of the revenue (taken from an average of the three laſt years) would be leſs than he had ſtated it, even in the courſe of a war. In the laſt war, in which this country had a maritime ſuperiority, after the firſt year her commerce, ſo far from ſuffering, actually increaſed; and ſhould the preſent war continue longer than the preſent year, and it was ſcarcely probable that it could be ſo ſpeedily terminated, he hoped that our commerce would by no means be decreaſed. Should the preſent war require a repetition of proviſion, he hoped to ſhew that we had reſources for the next campaign, and probably for another, without having recourſe to any new additional burdens on the people. He concluded his ſpeech by an animated recapitulation of the important objects of the war, and by moving the ſeveral reſolutions.

After ſome debate the reſolutions were ſeverally put and agreed to, the houſe was reſumed, and the report ordered to be made the next day.

While the traitorous correſpondence bill was in agitation, a propoſal was made to lord Grenville by the French miniſtry, for putting an end to the calamities of war by amicable negociation; and a paſſport was demanded for M. Maret, who was to be inveſted with full powers to treat. The letters from M. Le Brun were brought over by an Engliſh gentleman, with proper atteſtations of their authenticity, and by him delivered to the noble ſecretary. Why no notice was taken of this application has never been explained.

About this period the frequency of bankruptcies in London and the principal trading towns in England had, as was already intimated, cauſed almoſt a general ſtagnation of commercial credit. To apply a remedy to this alarming evil, ſeveral of the principal traders and merchants waited upon the chancellor of the exchequer, who promiſed them every aſſiſtance in his power. A ſelect committee of the houſe of commons was accordingly appointed, to take the evidence and opinion of commercial gentlemen upon this ſubject.

May 2, a petition for a parliamentary reform was preſented from Sheffield, which was refuſed to be received on account of the diſreſpectful terms in which it was couched. But petitions for the reform were received from Birmingham, Durham, Glaſgow, Leven, Anwick, Kempſey, Hamilton, and Kirkintulloch.

May 6, petitions for a parliamentary reform were received from Weſtminſter, Suffolk, Warwick, Huddersfield, Dundee, Paiſley, Montroſe, Kilmarnock, Perth, Edinburgh, Dunbarton, Roxburghſhire, Linlithgow, Nottingham, and from certain inhabitants of the pariſh of Aldgate in London. A petition from Norwich having been printed, was, on that account, not received.

After much intereſting debate, the houſe divided, for referring the petitions to a committee, 41 againſt 282.

On the 17th of June Mr. Fox having expatiated much upon the calamities of the war concluded a long and intereſting ſpeech by moving,

"That an humble addreſs be preſented to his majeſty, as the humble repreſentation of his faithful commons on the preſent awful and momentous criſis; a duty which they feel themſelves the more eſpecially called upon to perform at this juncture, as a long and eventful period may probably elapſe before his majeſty can again have an opportunity of collecting, through their repreſentatives, the real ſentiments and wiſhes of his people.

"In the name of the people of England, his majeſty's faithful commons are bound to declare, that they concurred in the meaſures neceſſary to carry on the preſent war, for the objects of defence and ſecurity, and for thoſe objects only.

"That any plan of aggrandizement founded on the preſent diſtreſſed ſituation of France, much leſs any purpoſe of eſtabliſhing among the French people, any particular form of government, never would have had their concurrence or ſupport.

"In expreſſing theſe their ſentiments and opinions on entering into the preſent war, his majeſty's faithful commons are ſenſible that they are only repeating thoſe benevolent declarations, which policy, and a careful attention to the real intereſts of the Britiſh nation, induced his majeſty to uſe in his moſt gracious ſpeech from the throne at the beginning of the preſent ſeſſion of parliament, and in repeated meſſages to this houſe.

"To repreſent to his majeſty, that though his faithful commons have the moſt perfect reliance on his majeſty's ſacred word and promiſe, ſolemnly pledged to this country and to Europe, not to interfere in the internal affairs of France, or to enter into the views and projects of other powers, who, in the preſent war, may be actuated by motives far different from thoſe which govern the conduct of his majeſty; yet they feel it to be their indiſpenſable duty to call his majeſty's moſt ſerious attention to ſome of the circumſtances which have occurred ſince the commencement of the preſent unfortunate conteſt.

"The French arms, which, after a ſucceſsful invaſion of Brabant, had threatened the ſecurity of his majeſty's allies the States-general, have ſince been confined within their own territory, and are now occupied in defence of their frontier towns againſt the united forces of his majeſty and his allies. The danger apprehended from the former conqueſts and aggrandizement of the French nation appears therefore, to be no longer a ſubject of juſt uneaſineſs and alarm.

"Some of the powers engaged in the confederacy againſt France, have, on the other hand, openly avowed, and ſucceſsfully executed, plans of dominion and conqueſt, not leſs formidable to the general liberties of Europe. The rapacious and faithleſs diſmemberment of the unhappy kingdom of Poland, without having produced, as it appears to this houſe, any remonſtrance from his majeſty's miniſters, has exhibited in his majeſty's faithful commons, the higheſt indignation at ſo daring an outrage on the rights of independent nations, and the keeneſt ſolicitude to reſcue the honour of the Britiſh government from the ſuſpicion of having concurred or acquieſced in meaſures ſo odious in their principle, and ſo dangerous in their example to the peace and happineſs of mankind.

"The ſevere calamities which, ſince the commencement of the preſent war, this nation has already experienced; the ſhock given to commercial credit, and the alarming conſequences which the failure of the mercantile and manufacturing intereſt threatens to the public revenue, and to the general proſperity of the country, cannot have failed to attract his majeſty's attention, and to excite in his benevolent mind a ſincere deſire to relieve his ſubjects from diſtreſſes of which they cannot hope for a termination but in the ſpeedy re-eſtabliſhment of peace.

"His majeſty's faithful commons make it therefore their moſt earneſt and ſolemn requeſt, that his majeſty, taking into his conſideration all the above circumſtances, will not fail to employ the earlieſt meaſures for procuring peace on ſuch terms as are conſiſtent with the profeſſed objects of the war, and with that good faith, ſtrict juſtice, and liberal and enlightened policy, which have hitherto ſo peculiarly diſtinguiſhed the Britiſh nation."

A violent debate took place, and the houſe divided on the motion,

On the 21ſt of June his majeſty put an end to the ſeſſion by a ſpeech from the throne, expreſſive of his warm hopes of future ſucceſs in reſpect to the war.

Parliament was now prorogued till the 13th of Auguſt.

Sedition now began to extend its baneful conſequences throughout England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the methods which were adopted for its ſuppreſſion, tended in a great meaſure to promote it. Every month afforded recent inſtances. On the 5th of January this year, one Carter, a bill-ſticker, was tried at the ſeſſions-houſe on Clerkenwell-Green for a libel. The Attorney-General ſtated, that this was an indictment for publiſhing a ſcandalous and ſeditious libel, entitled, "An Addreſs from the London Correſponding Society to the other Societies in Great Britain, united for the Purpoſe of obtaining a Reform in Parliament." It was proved that the defendant had paſted up this addreſs in a public ſtreet, on the 5th of December laſt; the jury found him guilty; the court ſentenced him to ſix months impriſonment, and at the expiration thereof to find ſecurity for his good behaviour for one year, himſelf in one hundred pounds, and two ſureties in fifty pounds each.

In Edinburgh, January the 7th and 8th, the High Court of Juſticiary met to proceed on the trial of Mr. James Tytler, chemiſt; but he failing to appear, they pronounced ſentence of outlawry. He ſtands accuſed of compoſing or writing a ſeditious libel, addreſſed "to the People and their Friends." Afterwards the High Court of Juſticiary proceeded to the trial of John Morton, James Anderſon, and Malcolm Craig, reſidenters in Edinburgh, accuſed of having, with four others, who were admitted as evidences, gone into the Caſtle, on the evening of Sunday, the 18th of November, 1792, with the wicked intention of ſeducing the ſoldiers from their duty and allegiance, and drinking ſeditious toaſts. The pannels pleaded not guilty. The trial laſted till near nine at night, when the jury were incloſed. On Wedneſday they returned a verdict, finding unanimouſly, the libel proven.

On the 8th Daniel Crichton was tried at the ſeſſions houſe on Clerkenwell-green, for uttering ſeditious and treaſonable words: being found guilty, the court ſentenced him to three months impriſonment, and to find ſecurity for his good behaviour one year, himſelf in 50l. and two ſureties in 25l. each.

The 29th of the ſame month, being the day on which the impriſonment of lord George Gordon expired, he was brought from Newgate into court, accompanied by the keeper, two men as his bail, and ſeveral Jews. He had a large ſlouched hat on his head, and a beard of enormous length. He was ordered to take off his hat, which he refuſed. The court directed the cryer to take it off, which he did accordingly. Lord George deſired the court to take notice, that his hat had been taken off by violence. He then deliberately took out of his pocket a white cap, which he put upon his head, and tied a handkerchief over it; after which, he produced a paper, entitled, "the Petition of Iſrael Abraham George Gordon, commonly called lord George Gordon." He ſaid, the petition was an apology for appearing with his head covered, agreeably to the cuſtom of the Jews. By a conformity to this cuſtom, he meant no diſreſpect to the court, as it aroſe purely from the tenderneſs of his conſcience, ſince he had entered into "the holy Covenant of Circumciſion."—The petition was read by the officer of the court, and contained many arguments drawn from the Jewiſh writers, in favour of appearing with his head covered before all men.—The ſentence againſt him for the libels, was, according to his requeſt, publicly read, after which he read a written paper, the ſubſtance of which was, that he had been impriſoned for five years, among murderers, thieves, &c. and that all the conſolation he had, aroſe from his truſt in God; and that he was compelled to find ſecurity for his good behaviour for fourteen years, himſelf in 5000l. and two ſureties, in 2500l. each. He ſaid, that lord Kenyon, who had been his counſel when he was tried for high treaſon, well knew the amount of his income. He had only an annuity of five hundred a year, which was not aſſignable, but granted merely for his aliment. He was obliged to his brother, the duke of Gordon, for the loan of 500l. with which he was then ready to pay the fine amounting to that ſum. He had directed his attorney, Mr. Godfrey, to adopt the meaſures neceſſary to obtain his legal enlargement. For this purpoſe there were two perſons in court ready to become his bail, who were men of unqueſtionable integrity. One was Francis Collins, a hat-maker, and the other John Barnard, gentleman.

The attorney-general objected to the bail; and lord Kenyon told lord George, that the court were bound to ſee that the bail were good men, in point of reſponſibility. An affidavit was produced by Mr. White, ſolicitor to the treaſury, by which it appeared, that both the bail were inſufficient; that John Barnard was only a cart numberer, or carman's book-keeper, and earned but 12s. per week. The bail were both rejected, and lord George was remanded, till he can procure better bail.

An order from council appeared in the Gazette on February, directing that all aliens, who have arrived within this kingdom ſince the firſt of January, 1792, or who ſhall arrive therein during the continuance of the alien bill, or until his majeſty's pleaſure be further ſignified, other than aliens excepted in the bill, ſhall, from and after the 15th day of February, 1793, if ſuch aliens ſhall then be reſident in England, or if ſuch aliens ſhall then be reſident in Scotland, then from and after the 20th day of February, 1793, dwell or reſide only within the limits of the weekly bills of mortality, or within the pariſh of St. Mary-le-bonne, Paddington, Pancras, and St. Luke at Chelſea, in the county of Middleſex, or within ſuch parts of the kingdom as ſhall not be more than fifty miles from the ſtandard in Cornhill, and not leſs than ten miles diſtant from the ſea-coaſt, and alſo from any of his majeſty's dock-yards; and in no other parts whatever.

This month alſo was tried before lord Kenyon and a ſpecial jury, an indictment againſt Thomas Dowling, for wilful and corrupt perjury, in the evidence he gave at the Old Bailey, on the trial of captain Kimber, charged with the murder of a negro girl, as before mentioned. The indictment contained forty-three aſſignments of perjury. There were, however, only two to which the attention of the jury was directed. The firſt charged the defendant with having falſely ſworn, that captain Kimber treated the girl with great cruelty; that he ſuſpended her by the arms and legs, flogged her himſelf, and by his barbarous treatment, a diſorder was brought upon her which led to, and terminated in her death. The ſecond charge was, that the defendant falſely ſwore, that he never declared to any perſon, that he would be revenged upon captain Kimber, and work his ruin. To this charge only the evidence applied.—Three witneſſes were examined in ſupport of the proſecution, the ſubſtance of whoſe evidence was, that the defendant had declared in their preſence and hearing, that captain Kimber had groſsly ill-treated him on board the ſhip Recovery, of which the captain was commander, and the defendant ſurgeon; that he had deprived him of a privileged ſlave, by allowing him only one inſtead of two; and that he would be revenged on him, and work his ruin ſome way or other.—Three witneſſes were called for the defendant, to prove that two of the witneſſes for the crown ought not to be believed on their oaths; but their evidence related only to ſome private and pecuniary tranſactions.—Mr. Wilberforce was examined, who ſtated, that the defendant did not voluntarily offer himſelf to him as a witneſs, reſpecting the cruelties attending any part of the ſlave trade, but that he had ſent for him, in conſequence of his hearing that he could communicate ſome information relative to a tranſaction that had happened upon the coaſt of Calabar.—Lord Kenyon having ſummed up the evidence, the jury after a ſhort deliberation, brought in their verdict, guilty.—Afterwards came on, before lord Kenyon, the trial of Stephen Devereux, for perjury, charged to have been committed by him, on the trial of captain Kimber, at the Old Bailey. Some witneſſes having been called to prove the examination of the defendant before ſir Sampſon Wright, his examination at the Old Bailey, and other matters, and ſeveral witneſſes heard on the part of the defendant, lord Kenyon, with much propriety ſtopped the further progreſs of the cauſe, giving it as his opinion, that the evidence for the proſecution was ſo mainly ſhaken by that brought forward on the part of the defendant, that he muſt neceſſarily be acquitted; and the jury agreeing with his lordſhip in opinion, immediately brought in a verdict of—not guilty.

His royal highneſs the duke of York, now ſet out for Holland, to take command of the Britiſh forces, deſtined to ſerve in the enſuing campaign on the Continent, in conjunction with the allies againſt the French.

One Thomas Spence, who keeps a book-ſtall at the top of Chancery-lane, was tried at the Seſſions houſe at Clerkenwell, for publiſhing a certain ſeditious book, entitled The Rights of Man, Part the Second, written by Thomas Paine. By a flaw in the indictment, he was acquitted.

William Holland, printſeller in Oxford-ſtreet, was alſo tried for publiſhing a certain ſeditious pamphlet, entitled, "An Addreſs to the Addreſſers, on the late Proclamation," and was found guilty. The court ſentenced him to be impriſoned one year, pay a fine of 100l. and find ſecurity for his good behaviour for one year, from the expiration of his impriſonment; himſelf in the ſum of 200l. and two ſecurities in the ſum of 100l. each.

Intelligence was received from Kingſton, St. Vincent, that the Providence, (capt. Bligh) and the Aſſiſtance, (capt. Portlock,) arrived there from Otaheite. They ſailed from England on the 2d of Auguſt, 1791, arrived at Otaheite the 10th of April following, where they remained till the 19th of July, and having effected the object of their voyage, left that iſland in perfect health, and arrived at St. Helena the 17th of December, whence they had only a paſſage of twenty-ſeven days here. It muſt afford no ſmall pleaſure to the inhabitants of this part of the world, to learn, that 300 bread-fruit plants have been landed here, in excellent order, for the purpoſe of being diſtributed among the different iſlands; but our grateful acknowledgments are particularly due to our beloved ſovereign, who, ever mindful of the wants of his ſubjects, directed this beneficial undertaking. The remainder of the plants, amounting to an equal number, are intended for Jamaica, whither capt. Bligh will proceed in a day or two, and thence return to England. A number of other valuable plants are brought by captain Bligh, and ſome of the moſt delicious fruits.—Capt. Bligh had on board two men, natives of Otaheite, going to England with him.—Captain Bligh went out and returned by the Cape of Good Hope. He alſo, in his return, called at Timor, and came through the heretofore unexplored ſtrait between New Guinea and New Holland, which, we underſtand, has been named Providence Straits. This paſſage is mentioned as extremely perilous, and, inſtead of being, as was ſuppoſed and laid down, clear and open, was full of ſhoals, rocks, and ſmall iſlands. The Providence and Aſſiſtance were repeatedly in the moſt imminent danger of being loſt, and though the diſtance, in good ſea room, might be run in a couple of days, ſo ſlow was their progreſs, that it took twenty-one to get through it. At times they could not run more than five miles a day, and they loſt ſome anchors. Some of the iſlands in this ſtrait are inhabited, and a communication was held with the natives, who appeared friendly; but, on a ſudden, a number of canoes put off, and approaching cloſe to the Aſſiſtance, threw in a volley of arrows, by which one man was killed, and two dangerouſly wounded. They, however, retired very precipitately, on the Providence firing at them and ſtriking one of the canoes, by which ſome were killed. There are on board the Providence part of the crew of the ſhip Matilda, a whaler belonging to London, which was wrecked in the South Seas, and had got to Otaheite in their boats. No account could be collected of the Bounty. Only one man died of diſeaſe during the voyage. The aſſembly having met, came to an unanimous reſolution, in conſequence of the unparalled ſufferings of captain Bligh in his firſt voyage, and the unwearied perſeverance to the final accompliſhment of his object, to preſent him with a piece of plate of the value of one hundred guineas, as a mark of the ſenſe this iſland entertained of his diſtinguiſhed merit; and an addreſs to his majeſty alſo paſſed both houſes, expreſſive of their loyalty and firm attachment to the conſtitution.

On the 20th of March in the afternoon about two o'clock, a dreadful accident happened in Liverpool. As the Pelican privateer, belonging to Nicholas Aſhton, eſq. of this town, was cruiſing in the river, by a ſudden guſt of wind ſhe overſet and inſtantly went to the bottom! She was manned with ninety-four choice ſeamen, and had on board upward of forty perſons, excluſive of her crew; out of which number only thirty-two have been ſaved! From one of thoſe that were ſaved, we are informed that it was owing to the guns being looſe that the misfortune happened; that when the guſt of wind heeled her, the weather guns broke through the lee ports, and ſhe inſtantly filled with water. Her maſts at low water mark appear about half out of the water.

On the 25th of the ſame month, a convention was ſigned by the hon. lord Grenville, his majeſty's principal ſecretary of ſtate for foreign affairs, and by count Woronzow, envoy extraordinary and miniſter plenipotentiary from the empreſs of Ruſſia, for renewing the treaty of commerce of the year 1766, between Great Britain and Ruſſia, for the term of ſix years.

On the 7th of May, Mr. Ridgway, bookſeller, was brought into the court of king's bench, to receive ſentence for the publication of three libels of which he had been convicted; namely, The Jockey Club, Paine's Addreſs to the Addreſſers, and the Rights of Man; when the court ſentenced him to be impriſoned two years in Newgate for the firſt; at the expiration of which to be impriſoned another year, and to pay a fine of 100l. for the ſecond; and for the third, the farther impriſonment of one year, with another fine of 100l.—Mr. Symonds was then ſentenced to pay a fine of 100l. for having publiſhed The Jockey Club, and to be impriſoned one year in Newgate, from the expiration of his former ſentence of two years for the publication of the Rights of Man; and for the Addreſs to the Addreſſers, he was ſentenced to the farther impriſonment of one year, and another fine of 100l. After which he was to find ſecurity for five years, for his good behaviour, himſelf in 500l. and two others in 250l. each. Mr. Ridgway was likewiſe to find the ſame ſecurity.

On the 27th Mr. John Froſt was convicted before the court of king's bench, of having uttered certain ſeditious words, at Percy coffee-houſe, on the 8th of November laſt; namely, "I am for equality and no king: the conſtitution of this country is a bad one;" and for having added, on being aſked whether he meant no king in England, "Yes, no king in England." He was ordered to be impriſoned in his majeſty's jail of Newgate for ſix calendar months, and within that time to ſtand in and upon the pillory, at Charing Croſs, for one hour, between the hours of twelve and two; and that he ſhould find ſecurity for his good behaviour, for the period of five years, himſelf in 500l. and two ſureties for 100l. each; and that he be further impriſoned until ſuch ſecurity be found.

On the 30th in the evening the duke de Sicigniano, who arrived in this country about two months ago, being appointed to ſucceed prince Caſtelcicala as miniſter plenipotentiary from the court of Naples, put an end to his exiſtence, by placing a horſe-piſtol to his temple, and blowing his brains out. He had tranſacted buſineſs with lord Grenville on the ſame morning. As ſoon as the event became known, the prince Caſtelcicala, and ſome other foreign noblemen, went to Grenier's hotel to view the body, and the prince took charge of his effects. The next day, Mr. Burgeſs, one of the under ſecretaries of ſtate, at the requeſt of lord Grenville, went to the hotel to make the neceſſary inquiries concerning the ſuicide, and to give orders for the removal of the corpſe and interment. The duke de Sicigniano was a young nobleman of one of the firſt families in Italy, of very amiable manners, and much beloved by thoſe who knew him. His reſidence at Grenier's was owing to its not being quite certain whether prince Caſtelcicala might not be re-appointed to his former ſituation. An expreſs was ſent to Naples, with an account of this melancholy event. On the 3d of June he was interred privately in Pancras church-yard.

On the 5th of June came on at the Old Bailey, the trial of the king v. Eaton, a bookſeller, for publiſhing Paine's Rights of Man, when, after the evidence for the proſecution had been gone through, and Mr. Vaughan had made an able ſpeech in behalf of the defendant, the recorder told the jury, that if they were ſatisfied that Paine wrote this book as a philoſophical man, coolly applying himſelf to the ſound diſcretion of thoſe who were competent to judge upon the ſubject—to men of learning, to philoſophers, who could underſtand the terms in which he wrote—and that he meant to do no miſchief, it was what all authors in this country had a power to do; but that, on the other hand, if he meant to weaken the hands of government, to ſet every thing afloat and into confuſion; in ſhort, if he meant to do miſchief, then he had offended againſt the law: for the diſtinction between the freedom of the preſs, and the abuſe of it, was preciſely this, that every thing may be done by the preſs which is done for the honour, advantage, and benefit of mankind, but nothing can be done that tends poſitively and decidedly to the injury of mankind.

The jury retired at eight o'clock, taking the book with them: at a quarter paſt ten o'clock they came into court, and gave their verdict—"guilty of publiſhing, but without a criminal intent."

This verdict Mr. Vaughan and Mr. Gurney contended was, in ſubſtance and in effect, a verdict of "not guilty;" for the intention of the party was the eſſence of the crime, but that it was in form a ſpecial verdict, which the court was bound to receive and to record.

The recorder informed the jury, they were empowered by the libel bill to give their verdict generally, and wiſhed them to reconſider it. The jury ſaid they had given their verdict, and perſiſted in it, upon which the verdict was recorded.

The counſel then contended that the defendant was in effect acquitted; that if he were convicted of any thing, he was convicted of innocence, and that he ought to be inſtantly diſcharged.—This the recorder refuſed, unleſs the proſecutor would concede the point, that this was an acquittal. The counſel ſtated that the defendant had been out upon bail, had ſhewn no wiſh to withdraw himſelf from the juſtice of his country, and it could ſcarcely be imagined that he would now think of flying from deliverance.

The defendant would, however, have been committed till the point of law could be argued, the next ſeſſions, if Mr. White, ſolicitor for the treaſury, had not handſomely conſented to admit him to the ſame bail upon which he had been hitherto at large.

On the 27th the Attorney General informed the court that he attended in conſequence of the extraordinary verdict found by the jury upon the trial of Mr. Eaton, who was indicted laſt ſeſſions for publiſhing the ſecond part of Paine's Rights of Man, when the jury found the defendant guilty of publiſhing, but without any criminal intention. Notice had been given him, that upon the foundation of this verdict the bail of Mr. Eaton intended to make an application to be diſcharged from their recognizance. The Attorney-General ſaid it was a caſe of conſiderable importance, and he was then ready to argue it, or receive ſuch directions from the judges as they might think fit to give. It would be a queſtion for the judges to decide what the legal import of the verdict was. The caſe was diſtinguiſhed by its novelty, and it was of great concern to the juriſprudence of the country that the law ſhould be ſettled upon this point.

The judges Buller and Wilſon were of opinion that the verdict called for the moſt ſerious deliberation. There was ſome difficulty in aſcertaining what the intention of the jury was when they pronounced this verdict. It would be neceſſary to conſider whether it amounted to any verdict at all, and, if it did, whether it was an acquittal in part, or as to the whole of the charge upon the record.

Mr. juſtice Wilſon ſaid, the jury poſſibly might mean that the ſentiments contained in Paine's pamphlet were not criminal. After ſome converſation between the judges Buller, Wilſon, and the recorder, it was agreed that the caſe ſhould be laid before all the judges, in order that they might enter the proper verdict and ſettle the law upon this point.

On the 11th of July Mr. Eaton was tried in the court of king's bench for publiſhing a libel, entitled "A Letter addreſſed to the Addreſſers, &c." After lord Kenyon had delivered his charge, the jury withdrew about an hour and a half, and then found the defendant guilty of publiſhing.

Upon his lordſhip's diſapprobation of this verdict, the jury withdrew again to re-conſider, and having conſulted for near an hour, they then found the defendant guilty of publiſhing the pamphlet in queſtion. This his lordſhip obſerved, was the ſame verdict; but as they perſiſted in it, it muſt be recorded.

A remarkable occurrence took place this year, on the 23d of September, in the afternoon, when a perſon paſſing an apparently empty houſe in Hatton-garden, was alarmed by the cries of ſome one within, which were repeated in a moſt piteous ſtrain. He knocked at the door but could not obtain admittance, yet ſtill heard the lamentations of a man within the houſe, which determined him to break open the door; he obtained aſſiſtance, and accompliſhed his purpoſe; when all the doors and windows of the houſe were found faſt ſhut; but, upon entering a ſcullery beyond a back kitchen, they found a young man, ſtretched at full length upon a thick board, to which he was ſecured by ropes round his body, arms, and legs; and the board faſtened by a chain to a copper that ſtood cloſe by. The face of the young man was covered with a white woollen night cap, through which two ſmall holes were made, that he might ſee out of. Cloſe to him were five bottles of water and a proportionate quantity of ham and bread, which were placed on each ſide of him, ſo that he could reach it. A green bays and a rug were found near him. —The young man, whoſe name is James Blagrave Campbell, is a clerk in the banking-houſe of Meſſrs. Vere, Lucadou, and Co. in Lombard-ſtreet. On Saturday morning, he went to the above houſe to preſent a bill for payment. The windows of the houſe were then opened, and it had all the appearance of being inhabited. He knocked at the door, which was opened to him, and he was deſired to walk in. He had no ſooner entered the paſſage than the ſtreet door was ſhut, and ſeveral men ruſhed upon him, who inſtantly drew a cap over his face, over which they threw a green bays, and above that a rug. They then ordered him not to cry out, threatening that if he made a noiſe they would murder him. In this ſituation they carried him into the place in which he was found in ſo deplorable a ſtate, where, after having taken from him his pocket-book, containing property to a conſiderable amount, they faſtened him down, and left him, as has been deſcribed. It is unneceſſary to adduce any reaſons to prove that this extraordinary robbery was a concerted plan. The houſe had been empty for ſome time. The young man, when found, was quite exhauſted from the terror he had been in, and from ſix hours continued exertion to make himſelf heard.

On the 30th of September, about eight o'clock in the evening, a large body of people aſſembled at Briſtol, to the amount of four or five thouſand, as they had done two or three nights before, on the bridge, committing the moſt violent acts of outrage, ſuch as breaking the toll-houſes open, and deſtroying all the things that were in them, by making a fire of them.—At laſt the drums belonging to the Herefordſhire militia beat to arms, which ſoon muſtered the ſoldiers; and about three companies formed themſelves in a body oppoſite the council-houſe. The officers then waited on the magiſtrates, to know if they were to ſuffer the mob to continue longer without firing, upon which Mr. Noble, one of the aldermen of the city, with the officers of the regiment, headed the troops on, and marched down to the bridge, when they were ordered to fire by the magiſtrates, which they did in three different directions, which took a ſweep up High-ſtreet, down the Back, and over the bridge. The dead bodies were carried about the ſtreets on hand-barrows for a conſiderable time the next morning. About eleven were killed and forty-five wounded; twenty-four of whom were carried to the infirmary before eight o'clock.—Several letters were picked up on the bridge, declaring vengeance againſt ſome of the aldermen and ſoldiers.

About the ſame time very ſerious riots took place at Birmingham, on account of the collecting of the rate for the money to be raiſed for the compenſation to the ſufferers by the riots in 1791. The military were obliged to be called in, and the riot-act was read; ſeveral perſons were apprehended, and committed to priſon; a reſcue being attempted, the mob were fired at from the windows and ſeveral were wounded; but on the 24th every thing was quiet, and the conſtables were again collecting the rate. None of the wounded were dead: four were in the hoſpital, two of them in a very dangerous ſtate.—All the priſoners in cuſtody, in conſequence of the riot, had been diſcharged, except two or three, who were ordered to find bail for their good behaviour.

Accounts were daily received of the ſanguinary proceedings of France. The unhappy widowed queen being tried upon ſeveral incredible and infamous charges, was pronounced guilty of all. She heard her ſentence with dignity and reſignation; perhaps indeed it might be conſidered by her leſs as a puniſhment than as a releaſe. On the 16th of October, at about eleven o'clock in the forenoon, ſhe was conducted from the priſon of the Conciergerie, to a ſcaffold prepared in the Place de la Revolution, where her unfortunate huſband had previouſly ſuffered. Her behaviour at that awful moment was decent and compoſed. The miniſter of St. Landrey was appointed to diſcharge the office of a confeſſor; and whatever might have been the foibles which diſgraced her early years, we have reaſon, on good authority, to believe that ſhe died a real penitent; and, like her huſband, found in the truths of religion a ſource of conſolation of which the perſecution of her enemies was unable to deprive her; a conſolation which can effectually aſſuage all the evils of adverſity, and can even alleviate the pangs of remorſe.

We ſhall now take a curſory view of the ſucceſs of our army, during the expedition of his royal highneſs the duke of York.

The iſland of Tobago was taken by a Britiſh ſquadron under the command of ſir John Laforey, about the beginning of April; and, encouraged by the diſputes which exiſted between the royaliſts and republicans in Martinico, admiral Gardner attempted a deſcent upon that iſland alſo, and landed there with about three thouſand men. The attempt, however, proved fatal only to the royaliſts, K~13 royaliſts, as he found, on his arrival, the republican party too ſtrong, and was obliged to reimbark his troops, even before he could convey away from certain deſtruction the whole of the devoted party who had probably invited him to undertake the expedition.

In Europe the allied powers were chiefly employed, during the remainder of the campaign, in the blockade of Conde, Valenciennes, and Mentz.

The town of Conde was inveſted, as we have already ſeen, early in the month of April, by a large body of the allied forces, and the works were completed by the 27th. The town was, however, not provided with a ſufficient quantity of proviſions to ſuſtain a long ſiege: the governor (general Chancel), therefore, about this period, ordered the women and children to quit the place; but the prince of Wirtemberg compelled them again to take refuge in the fortreſs. In a few days after this unſucceſsful attempt, the governor ſent them out a ſecond time; but the Auſtrians, after killing many of theſe defenceleſs creatures even in the act of ſupplicating for mercy, forced the governor, from motives of humanity, once more to receive them. From this period the garriſon appear to have exiſted in a ſtate of extreme diſtreſs (having been compelled to ſubſiſt chiefly upon horſe-fleſh), till the latter end of June, when they attempted to eſtabliſh a redoubt upon the road from Conde to Lacoque, in order to diſlodge the Auſtrians from the latter place. After an obſtinate reſiſtance, they were however forced back into the town, and the work was demoliſhed. From this to the 1ſt of July, nothing of importance occurred. On that day a negociation was opened for a capitulation; but the governor conceived it neceſſary to diſpatch a meſſenger to the Convention, and another to general Cuſtine, who at this time had aſſumed the command of the northern army; but the terms not proving acceptable, the negociation was broken off. On the 10th of July the garriſon, after enduring all the rigours of famine, were obliged to ſurrender as priſoners of war. They had originally amounted to 4000 men, but at the time of the capture were reduced to 1500 fit for ſervice.

The victory of Famars enabled the allied forces to inveſt cloſely the town of Valenciennes. On a ſummons being ſent to general Ferrand, the governor, he returned a polite but ſpirited anſwer; and from the firſt commencement of the works, the beſiegers experienced a heavy fire from the garriſon. On the 1ſt of June general Cuſtine arrived to take the command of the armies of the North and the Ardennes, then encamped at Bouchain; but he found himſelf unable to render any effectual relief to Valenciennes. Above 14,000 men of the beſieging army were employed, for the greater part of the ſiege, in erecting works and repairing the batteries. During the beginning of June a very briſk fire was kept up from the fortreſs; and on the 5th the French attacked the advanced poſts, but were repulſed.

In the courſe of the ſiege a difference of opinion exiſted between the Engliſh engineer, colonel Moncrief, and M. Ferraris, the chief engineer of the emperor. The Britiſh officer was for planting batteries immediately under the walls of the city, inſtead of approaching it by regular parallels. M. Ferraris however contended, that the work of the great Vauban was not to be treated with ſo little reſpect, and his opinion was adopted by the council of war. On the morning of the 14th of June the trenches were opened. The Britiſh commander then ſummoned the garriſon; but receiving an unſatisfactory anſwer, the artillery began to play upon the town with great vigour, and in the courſe of the night above 500 red hot balls were poured in upon it. Towards the beginning of July the beſiegers were able to bring 200 pieces of heavy artillery to play without intermiſſion on the town, and the greater part of it was reduced to aſhes. The ſmallneſs of the garriſon, compared with the extent of the fortifications to be defended, prevented general Ferrand, the commander, from attempting frequent ſorties. In one which the garriſon made on the 5th of July, however, they were very ſucceſsful, and killed ſeveral of the enemy, and ſpiked ſome cannon.

The moſt ſingular fact in the hiſtory of this ſiege is, that a conſiderable part of the war was carried on under ground; mines and counter mines innumerable having been formed both by the beſiegers and beſieged. The principal of theſe on the ſide of the former were one under the glacis, and one under the hornwork of the fortreſs; theſe mines were completed and charged on the 25th of July, and in the night between nine and ten o'clock were ſprung with the moſt complete ſucceſs. The Engliſh and Auſtrians immediately embraced the opportunity to throw themſelves into the covered way, of which they made themſelves maſters. The die was now caſt, and on the 26th the duke of York again ſummoned the place, which ſurrendered on capitulation the ſucceeding day: the duke of York taking poſſeſſion of it in behalf of the emperor of Germany.

During the whole of the ſiege general Cuſtine was not able to make any attempt of moment for the relief of the place, and a few ſkirmiſhes only took place between the outpoſts.

In the duchy of Luxemburgh, an action of a more ſerious nature occurred on the 9th of June. The French, under general Laage, attacked the Auſtrians under general Schroeder, near Arlons, and obliged the latter to retreat with great loſs to Luxemburgh. The eminence on which the Auſtrians were encamped was defended by 30 pieces of cannon, arranged on batteries in the form of ſteps, and defended by 8000 men. Theſe the French ſucceſſively attacked and carried with incredible intrepidity.

The king of Pruſſia had been from the beginning of April engaged in preparations for the ſiege of Mentz, and indeed from that time the place might be conſidered as in a ſtate of blockade, and the numerous garriſon ſubſiſted chiefly on horſefleſh. The king was however too much engaged with his new acquiſitions in Poland to form any ſerious attack till the beginning of May. On the 4th of that month his majeſty arrived juſt at the commencement of an attack on the village of Coſtheim, from which however they were not able to diſlodge the French. From this period to the beginning of June frequent and bloody ſkirmiſhes took place between the garriſon and the beſieging army, without any thing deciſive. On the 4th of June the French made a moſt deſperate ſortie upon the village of Marienborn, which they carried, and ſpiked ſome pieces of cannon; and on the 9th they attempted a general ſortie on all ſides, but were every where repulſed.

The combined army opened the trenches before Mentz on the 19th and 20th of June. On the morning of the 24th the garriſon made a ſortie, and ſpiked four pieces of cannon. On the ſame day a large number of women and children were diſmiſſed from the garriſon; but they were fired upon, and the greater part of them deſtroyed by the Pruſſians: ſome of the women in deſpair threw themſelves with their children into the Main. On the 25th another ſortie was attempted by the garriſon, but they were repulſed. On the 7th of July the ſtrong works of the French at Coſtheim were carried by the allies, by which they loſt 800 men, and ſeven pieces of cannon. This ſucceſs was followed on the 15th by the blowing up of the laboratory in Mentz, and the deſtruction of a magazine of hay and ſtraw by the fire of the beſiegers. Caſſel, which covered Mentz on the oppoſite ſide of the Rhine, was ſet on fire on the 17th, and ſeveral ammunition waggons were blown up. On the 18th the French army of the Rhine made a grand attempt for the relief of Mentz. They attempted to force their way through, not far from Landau, and made their attack in three places at once. They were however repulſed in every part by general Wurmſer. This laſt effort therefore proving unſucceſsful, the garriſon capitulated on the 22d, the principal condition of which was, that they ſhould not ſerve for the ſpace of one year againſt the allies.

On the 8th of Auguſt the French were driven from the ſtrong poſition which they had taken behind the Scheldt, and which was known by the name of Cæſar's camp: as the French did not make much reſiſtance on this occaſion, the loſs on both ſides was not conſiderable.

With theſe achievements the ſucceſſes of the allies may be ſaid to have terminated. The protracted ſieges of theſe fortreſſes had given time to the French to recover from the conſternation into which they had been thrown by the defection of Dumourier; and that energy which every thinking man foreſaw would finally defeat the abſurd projects of the allies, began once more to come effectually into action. After the reduction of Valenciennes, a grand council of war was held, in which a project of the Britiſh miniſtry for the ſeparation of the army, and for an attack on French Flanders, was ſubmitted to the allies. The project, it is ſaid, was greatly diſapproved by the experienced Auſtrian commanders; and two other plans were ſubmitted to the council by theſe officers.

The firſt was to penetrate to Paris by the aſſiſtance of the rivers which fall into the Seine, on which the heavy ſtores and artillery might be tranſported. The other, which was that of the prince of Cobourg and general Clairfait, was to take immediate advantage of the alarm which the ſurrender of Valenciennes had occaſioned, and the diſorder of the French armies from the denunciation of the generals, and with 40 or 50,000 light troops penetrate to Paris, while a debarkation might be made on the ſide of Britany, to aſſiſt the Royaliſts in that quarter.

It is evident that none of theſe plans were conſiſtent with true policy. Whatever number of troops had been detached to Paris would certainly have been ſurrounded and cut off; and as to aſſiſting the royaliſts in Britany, there is reaſon to believe, that the aid of foreign troops would not have added to the popularity of their cauſe; beſides that ſuch a circumſtance muſt have rendered their army ſtationary, and conſequently expoſed to the danger of a complete defeat; whereas, it was by occaſionally diſperſing and aſſembling during the night at a moment's notice, and by taking advantage of the woods and covers, that they were enabled, for a length of time, to haraſs the republicans.

That the project of attacking Weſt Flanders was ill conceived, the event ſufficiently proved. Indeed a wiſe ſtateſman would have rejected all theſe plans, and would have embraced the opportunity which the diſtreſſes of the French now afforded, to eſtabliſh an advantageous peace.

In conſequence of the preponderating influence of the Engliſh miniſtry in the grand council of war, on the 12th of Auguſt the Britiſh, Hanoverians, and the Dutch, with ſome Heſſians and Auſtrians, ſeparated from the main army, and commenced their march for Dunkirk.

It has been aſſerted, that in this expedition the duke of York did not entirely rely on the intrepidity of his troops, but that he had alſo an expectation of being admitted into the town by a golden key. He had kept up a ſecret correſpondence with the former governor, general Omeron (who has ſince been executed for treachery) nor did he till his arrival know, that the plan had been diſcovered, and that general Omeron was removed from his poſt.

On the 16th of Auguſt the duke of York encamped at Turcoin, where a council of war was held on the ſucceeding day; on the 18th the Britiſh marched to a camp, which had been marked out near Menin, and found the Dutch, under the hereditary prince of Orange, engaged in an attack on the French outpoſts, in which his highneſs was repulſed. The Britiſh troops almoſt immediately engaged in the action, and with great difficulty and loſs carried the poſt of Lincelles; the works of which were deſtroyed, and the poſt left unoccupied. On the 22d the duke of York marched from Furnes to attack the French camp at Ghivelde, which was abandoned on his approach, and he was almoſt immediately enabled to take the ground which it was his intention to occupy during the ſiege. On the 24th he attacked the out-poſts of the French, who with ſome loſs were driven into town. In this action the famous Auſtrian general Dalton, and ſome other officers of note were killed. The ſucceeding day the ſiege might be ſaid regularly to commence. A conſiderable naval armament from Great Britain was to have co-operated in the ſiege, but by ſome extraordinary neglect admiral Macbride was not able to ſail ſo early as was expected. In the mean time the hoſtile army was extremely haraſſed by the gun-boats of the French; a ſucceſsful ſortie was effected by the garriſon on the 6th of September; on the ſame day the covering army of general Freytag was ſurpriſed and totally routed; and that general and prince Adolphus Frederick both taken priſoners, though they were afterwards reſcued. The conſequence of theſe diſaſters was, that the French were known to be collecting in ſuperior force; the ſiege was raiſed on the 7th, after ſeveral ſevere actions, in which the allied forces ſuffered very conſiderably.

It is in general well underſtood, that if general Houchard, who commanded the French army on this occaſion, had done his duty, he might have effectually cut off the retreat of the duke of York, and probably have captured almoſt the whole of the allied army. For this groſs neglect the French general was afterwards denounced, and ſuffered by the ſentence of the revolutionary tribunal.

The army of the allies which remained under the prince of Cobourg and general Clairfait, was not in the main more ſucceſsful. On the 8th of Auguſt a detachment of this army attempted to form the ſiege of Cambray; but after remaining for ſome days before the town, the Auſtrian general was obliged to raiſe the ſiege. Bouchain was alſo inveſted, but was afterwards relieved. Queſnoy was the only point in which the allies at this period were victorious. That place ſurrendered on the 11th of September to general Clairfait; a conſiderable detachment, which had been ſent for its relief, having been previouſly repulſed by the prince of Cobourg.

A.D. 1794.

On the 21ſt of January, his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and being ſeated on the throne, ſir Francis Molyneux, gentleman uſher of the black rod, was ſent with a meſſage to the houſe of commons, commanding their attendance in the houſe of peers. The commons being come thither accordingly, his majeſty was pleaſed to make the following moſt gracious ſpeech:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"The circumſtances under which you are now aſſembled require your moſt ſerious attention.

"We are engaged in a conteſt on the iſſue of which depend the maintenance of our conſtitution, laws, and religion, and the ſecurity of all civil ſociety.

"You muſt have obſerved with ſatisfaction the advantages which have been obtained by the arms of the allied powers, and the change which has taken place in the general ſituation of Europe ſince the commencement of the war.

"The United Provinces have been protected from invaſion. The Auſtrian Netherlands have been recovered and maintained, and places of conſiderable importance have been acquired on the frontier of France.

"The recapture of Mentz, and the ſubſequent ſucceſſes of the allied armies on the Rhine, have, notwithſtanding the advantages recently obtained by the enemy in that quarter, proved highly beneficial to the common cauſe.

"Powerful efforts have been made by my allies in the ſouth of Europe; the temporary poſſeſſion of the town and port of Toulon has greatly diſtreſſed the operations of my enemies; and in the circumſtances attending the evacuation of that place, an important and deciſive blow has been given to their naval power by the conduct, abilities, and ſpirit of my commanders, officers, and forces, both by ſea and land.

"The French have been driven from the poſſeſſions and fiſhery at Newfoundland; and important and valuable acquiſitions have been made both in the eaſt and weſt Indies.

"At ſea our ſuperiority has been undiſputed, and our commerce ſo effectually protected, that the loſſes ſuſtained have been inconſiderable in proportion to its extent, and to the captures made on the contracted trade of the enemy.

"The circumſtances by which the further progreſs of the allies has been hitherto impeded, not only prove the neceſſity of vigour and perſeverance on our part, but at the ſame time confirm the expectation of ultimate ſucceſs.

"Our enemies have derived the means of temporary exertion from a ſyſtem which has enabled them to diſpoſe arbitrarily of the lives and property of a numerous people, and which openly violates every reſtraint of juſtice, humanity, and religion. But theſe efforts, productive as they neceſſarily have been of internal diſcontent and confuſion in France, have alſo tended rapidly to exhauſt the natural and real ſtrength of that country.

"Although I cannot but regret the neceſſary continuance of the war, I ſhould ill conſult the eſſential intereſts of my people, if I were deſirous of peace on any grounds but ſuch as may provide for their permanent ſafety, and for the independence and ſecurity of Europe.

"The attainment of theſe ends is ſtill obſtructed by the prevalence of a ſyſtem in France equally incompatible with the happineſs of that country, and with the tranquillity of all other nations.

"Under this impreſſion, I thought proper to make a declaration of the views and principles by which I am guided:—I have ordered a copy of this declaration to be laid before you, together with copies of ſeveral conventions and treaties with different powers, by which you will perceive how large a part of Europe is united in a cauſe of ſuch general concern.

"I reflect with unſpeakable ſatisfaction on the ſteady loyalty and firm attachment to the eſtabliſhed conſtitution and government, which, notwithſtanding the continued efforts employed to miſlead and to ſeduce, have been ſo generally prevalent among all ranks of my people. Theſe ſentiments have been eminently manifeſted in the zeal and alacrity of the militia to provide for our internal defence, and in the diſtinguiſhed bravery and ſpirit diſplayed on every occaſion by my forces both by ſea and land: they have maintained the luſtre of the Britiſh name, and have ſhewn themſelves worthy of the bleſſings which it is the object of all our exertions to preſerve."

"Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I have ordered the neceſſary eſtimates and accounts to be laid before you; and I am perſuaded you will be ready to make ſuch proviſion as the exigencies of the time may require. I feel too ſenſibly the repeated proofs which I have received of the affection of my ſubjects not to lament the neceſſity of any additional burthens.

"It is however a great conſolation to me to obſerve the favourable ſtate of the revenue, and the complete ſucceſs of the meaſure which was laſt year adopted for removing the embarraſſments affecting commercial credit.

"Great as muſt be the extent of our exertions, I truſt you will be enabled to provide for them in ſuch a manner as to avoid any preſſure which could be ſeverely felt by my people.

"My lords, and gentlemen,

"In all your deliberations you will undoubtedly bear in mind the true grounds and origin of the war. An attack was made on us and on our allies, founded on principles which tend to deſtroy all property, to ſubvert the laws and religion of every civilized nation, and to introduce univerſally that wild and deſtructive ſyſtem of rapine, anarchy, and impiety, the effects of which, as they have already been manifeſted in France, furniſh a dreadful but uſeful leſſon to the preſent age, and to poſterity.

"It only remains for us to perſevere in our exertions: Their diſcontinuance or relaxation could hardly procure even a ſhort interval of deluſive repoſe, and could never terminate in ſecurity or peace. Impreſſed with the neceſſity of defending all that is moſt dear to us, and relying, as we may with confidence, on the valour and reſources of the nation, on the continued efforts of ſo large a part of Europe, above all, on the inconteſtable juſtice of our cauſe, let us render our conduct a contraſt to that of our enemies, and, by cultivating and practiſing the principles of humanity and the duties of religion, endeavour to merit the continuance of the divine favour and protection, which have been ſo eminently experienced by theſe kingdoms."

In the houſe of lords, lord Stair moved the addreſs of thanks to his majeſty, which was ſeconded by lord Auckland; when lord Guildford moved, as an amendment to the addreſs, "That his majeſty might be prayed graciouſly to take into conſideration thoſe modes which to him ſeemed moſt likely to obtain peace on ſuch terms as appeared proper, and that nothing in the exiſting circumſtances of the French government might be any obſtacle to the furtherance of the peace." A long debate took place, in which the duke of Portland, earl Spencer, the earl of Mansfield, lord Grenville, and the lord Chancellor, ſpoke in favour of the addreſs; the duke of Norfolk, earl of Derby, earl Stanhope, marquis of Lanſdown, and earl of Lauderdale, for the amendment. The earls of Carliſle, Kinnoul, and Hardwicke ſpoke againſt the amendment, and pledged themſelves to ſupport the miniſter in the proſecution of the war. The queſtion being called for the houſe divided,—Contents for the original motion, 97, Non-contents 12.

The proceedings in the houſe of commons took a ſimilar turn to thoſe in the upper houſe, the addreſs to his majeſty being moved by lord Cliſden, and ſeconded by Sir Peter Burrell. The amendment was moved by the earl of Wycombe, and ſeconded by colonel Tarleton. Several members ſpoke on each ſide, and the debate continued till paſt five the next morning, when the houſe divided, for the addreſs 277, againſt it 59.

On the 27th, in the houſe of commons, Mr. Dundas preſented a meſſage from his majeſty, acquainting the houſe, that he had ordered the landing of the Heſſians at the Iſle of Wight and at Portſmouth, on account of ſickneſs; and an addreſs of thanks was ordered to the king for the communication.

Previous to this, Meſſrs. Muir and Palmer having been found guilty of ſedition in Scotland, and ſentenced to be tranſported, Mr. Muir for 14 years, and Mr. Palmer for 7, on the 31ſt of this month earl Stanhope moved an addreſs to his majeſty, praying him to defer the execution of the ſentence of tranſportation paſſed on Mr. Muir, till certain circumſtances had been inveſtigated. The duke of Norfolk was againſt the motion, which the earl of Lauderdale adviſed his noble friend to withdraw. It was alſo oppoſed by the earl of Mansfield, lord Thurlow, and the lord chancellor; the latter defending the conduct of the Scotch judges, and obſerving, that the only method which had ever been adopted, and the only one proper to be adopted by criminals for obtaining a mitigation of their puniſhment, was to petition his majeſty, and that his majeſty was always graciouſly pleaſed to conſider ſuch petitions, and refer them to the judges. On a diviſion, the numbers were 49 againſt the motion, and earl Stanhope ſingly for it.

On the 5th of February, in the houſe of commons, in a committee of ways and means, the chancellor of the exchequer roſe to open the conſideration of the budget. He laid before the committee the different articles of national expenditure for the current year; a conſiderable part of which, he obſerved, had been incurred on account of the critical ſituation in which the nation had been placed. The article which had been generally brought forward firſt was what related to the expences of the navy; of which he would obſerve, that the number of 85,000 ſeamen had been voted for the preſent year; a number, which, in the ſecond year of the war, was conſiderably beyond former precedent; and of which near 76,000 were actually muſtered, and between 50 and 60,000 of the number had been raiſed in the courſe of the laſt year. The expences relative to the ſeamen, &c. he ſtated to be 4,420,000l. the ordinary expences of the navy 558,000l. and the extraordinary expences of the ſame 547,000l. which conſtituted the total expence of this eſtabliſhment to be 5,525,000l. but which ſum was to be conſidered as excluſive of the debt incurred laſt year, on account of the rapid increaſe of our marine force. The next point in the ſupply, which came to be conſidered, was the military force of the nation; and, with reſpect to this, he obſerved that the ſame exertion for rendering it reſpectable had been manifeſted as in the foregoing ſervice; this eſtabliſhment, as the exigencies of the national ſituation required it, was extenſive, and the means taken in the laſt year to render it ſo were vigorous beyond any former example; as by means of the recruiting ſervice upwards of 30,000 Britiſh troops were added to the army, which, including the lately raiſed fencible regiments, and the national militia, conſtituted a force of near 140,000 men; to which might be added between 30 and 40,000 foreign troops in Britiſh pay. The expences of the former, or Britiſh diviſion of the army, were 4,362,813l. the coſt of foreign troops, 1,169,000l. and the extraordinaries of the army about 808,000l. making the total of 6,340,000l. for this branch of the public ſervice. The ordnance came next to be conſidered, which was increaſed in number to near 6000 artillery men, by which the expences of the department were increaſed as follows: in the ordinary, 324,578l. the extraordinary expences 377,162l. and, in that particular part of it connected with the ſea-ſervice 648,271l. by which the total expenditure would barely exceed the ſum of 1,345,000l. ſo that the aggregate number of the national forces amounted to at leaſt 250,000 men. The entire expences, therefore, of the army and navy would be found, on enumerating the foregoing ſums, to amount to 13,210,000l. To theſe were to be added ſeveral cuſtomary expences, amounting in the whole to about the ſum of — —	£.19,940,000

which, deducting the ways and means	8,947,000
left a difference to be provided for of	10,993,000

To provide for theſe exigencies, he propoſed that an additional tax ſhould be laid on Britiſh ſpirits of one penny per gallon; which, in his calculation, formed on a conjectural eſtimate, as were all the following, would produce 107,000l. per ann. an additional duty of ten-pence per gallon on brandy, ditto on rum eight-pence per gallon, which, together, he calculated would amount to 136,000l.—ditto on bricks and tiles one ſhilling and ſix-pence per thouſand, which would be 70,000l.—on ſlates carried coaſtwiſe ten ſhillings per ton—on ſtone ditto at two ſhillings and ſix-pence per ton; theſe together were calculated at 30,000l.—on crown-glaſs, an additional duty of eight-ſhillings per hundred, and on plate-glaſs one pound one ſhilling and ſix-pence—ditto 52,000l. The duties of exciſe on paper, paſteboard, millboard, ſcaleboard, and glazed paper, to ceaſe;—twopence-halfpenny per pound exciſe duty upon paper uſed for writing, drawing, and printing; one penny per pound upon coloured and whited-brown paper (except elephant and cartridge); two-pence per pound for wrapping paper; two-pence halfpenny per pound upon other paper (except ſheathing and button paper); ten ſhillings and ſixpence per cwt. upon paſteboard, millboard, ſcaleboard, and glazed paper to ceaſe. A drawback to be allowed on exportation. That the duties of cuſtoms on the above alſo ſhould ceaſe. Ten pence per pound on No. 1 imported—two pence per ditto on No. 2 imported—ſix pence per ditto upon all other paper imported—twenty ſhillings per cwt. upon paſteboards, &c. imported, which would amount to 63,000l. Laſtly, it was propoſed to lay an additional tax on attorneys. He propoſed that a tax of one hundred pounds ſhould be impoſed on every indenture of clerks of attorneys; and that thoſe who were now clerks ſhould pay one hundred pounds when they were admitted; this tax, it was ſuppoſed, would produce 25,000l. All thoſe articles put together amounted to 911,000l. Drawing towards a concluſion, he recapitulated his entire ſtatement, and pointed out the ſlight burdens impoſed on the public, in conſequence of the neceſſary exertions made to oppoſe an enemy, in a conteſt, in which not only the independence and exiſtence of the nation, but every thing dear to man in civilized ſociety, was involved. He then moved a reſolution relative to the granting of the loan to his majeſty; and the queſtion being put,

Mr. Fox thanked the right hon. gentleman for his very candid and conſpicuous manner of ſtating the financial concerns of the country upon ſo important an occaſion. He concurred with him in the far greater part of his aſſertions, and was happy to ſay, that he approved of the bargain concluded for the loan.

The queſtion was then put and carried.

On the 17th in the houſe of lords, the marquis of Lanſdowne, after a long ſpeech concluded with the following motion:

"That an humble addreſs be preſented to his majeſty, to repreſent to his majeſty, that the events of the laſt campaign have demonſtrated the extreme improbability of conquering France, even under the ſingular circumſtance of a general confederacy formed againſt her:

"That the duration of an extenſive confederacy, neceſſarily ſlow and ill-combined in its operations, is not to be depended on from day to day, and formed, as the preſent is, with powers, who, it is to be apprehended, from the exhauſted ſtate of their finances, waſted by profuſion and war, can only fulfil their engagements to us by being ſubſidized, the great burden of expence and odium muſt ultimately fall upon Great Britain and Ireland;

"That were the war to be in future as ſucceſsful, as it has hitherto proved adverſe, it ought not in ſound policy to be continued, becauſe no acquiſitions of territory can be of real, and much leſs of adequate benefit, at the riſque of prolonging the preſent, and laying the foundation of future wars:

"That a loſs to the nation incalculable, and almoſt beyond imagination, muſt follow from the diminution of product and conſumption; the ſtagnation and deſtruction of capital, and the general decay of trade, which have ariſen in the place of that reduction of debt and taxes, which we were taught to expect, and which is ſo eſſential to our external independence, and to our internal tranquillity and happineſs.

"That the diſmemberment of France, if attainable, ſo far from ſecuring the balance of power in Europe, muſt endanger, if not overturn it; as it cannot fail to augment the ſtrength of the greater European powers, who, from their ambition, and the policy which they have lately adopted of acting in concert, already threaten the extinction of the independent ſtates of the ſecond and third order, upon whoſe preſervation the liberties of Europe eſſentially depend.

"That opinions and ſentiments once widely diſſeminated cannot be controlled by arms, and therefore it behoves every government, which would guard againſt the progreſs of democratic principles, to avoid the evils which gave birth to them in France.

"That the obedience paid by the French nation to its proviſionary government, when in the act of oppoſing a confederacy attempting to controul its interior, though a ſtrong proof that the preſent war is more likely to confirm than to deſtroy ſuch a government, yet is no proof that the French nation will continue that obedience to it, provided we ſuffer them to return to a ſtate of external peace, while it may be yet time for the national good ſenſe to operate:

"That experience has demonſtrated the futility of every attempt to interfere in the internal affairs of France, even if the injuſtice of it were problematical, and that we muſt deſerve the deepeſt reproach which a nation can incur, if, to ſerve the mere occaſional purpoſes of the confederacy, we encourage further revolts in that country, where we find that we are unable to fulfil our promiſes of preſent ſupport, or to ſave thoſe who have put a confidence in us from ruin and extermination.

"Therefore, to implore his majeſty to declare without delay, his diſpoſition to make peace upon ſuch diſintereſted and liberal terms as are beſt calculated to render the peace between any two nations laſting; and to communicate ſuch declaration to his allies, that an immediate end may be put to that daily effuſion of human blood, which, if ſuffered to proceed, muſt change the character of the nations of Europe, and in the place of that improving ſpirit of humanity which has till lately diſtinguiſhed modern times, ſubſtitute a degree of ſavage ferocity unexampled in the annals of mankind."

After a long debate the houſe divided; for the motion 12—proxy 1.—Againſt it 86—proxies 17. Majority 90.

On the 24th, in the houſe of commons, Mr. Sheridan having hinted that he ſhould preſent to the houſe a petition from Mr. Thomas Fiſche Palmer, who was at preſent under ſentence of tranſportation, complaining of the illegality of the ſentence pronounced againſt him, and craving ſuch relief from its conſequences as parliament could afford, ſome converſation enſued, the reſult of which was, that the ſubject ſhould ſtand for conſideration on the Thurſday following.

Mr. Whitbread, jun. then moved, that an addreſs be preſented to his majeſty, praying that the execution of the ſentence againſt Mr. Palmer be poſtponed till after Thurſday next. This produced a converſation and a diviſion, when the numbers were, for the motion 34; againſt it 104; majority 70.

On the 6th of March, Mr. Mainwaring, after ſtating ſeveral improprieties which had obtained reſpecting a due obſervation of the ſabbath, owing to the relaxation or inadequacy of the laws relating thereto, particularly in the inſtance of the practice of journeymen bakers, which part of his propoſed meaſure would go to reſtrain from baking on a Sunday, except from the hours of ten till one incluſive, moved for leave to bring in a bill to explain and amend an act paſſed in the twenty-ninth year of the reign of king Charles II. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. Pitt then moved for leave to bring in a bill for augmenting the militia. After a few words from ſome gentlemen, who reſpectively deferred the full delivery of their ſentiments to a future ſtage of the bill, the motion was agreed to.

Mr. Whitbread now roſe, and after urging many reaſons to prove it was the intereſt of the country to make peace with the Republic of France, which even under its preſent odious tyranny, would ſtill be preferable to war, he concluded with moving, "That an humble addreſs be preſented to his majeſty, to repreſent to his majeſty, that his faithful commons having taken into their ſerious conſideration the various engagements which have, by his majeſty's command, been laid before the houſe, cannot forbear to expreſs their deep concern that his majeſty ſhould have been adviſed to enter into engagements, the terms of which appear to this houſe to be wholly incompatible with the declarations repeatedly made to this houſe from the throne, relative to the profeſſed objects of the preſent unfortunate war.

"To repreſent to his majeſty the affliction and alarm of his faithful commons, that his majeſty ſhould have been adviſed to make a "common cauſe," with powers whoſe objects are unavowed and undefined, but from whoſe conduct his faithful commons have too much ground to dread to carry on war for the purpoſe of dictating in the internal affairs of other countries; views which have been repeatedly and ſolemnly diſavowed by his majeſty and his miniſters, and which are utterly abhorrent to thoſe principles upon which alone a free people can with honour engage in war.

"To repreſent to his majeſty, that if the preſent war had been what his majeſty's meſſage in the laſt ſeſſion of parliament ſtated it to be, a war of aggreſſion on the part of France, and of defence on the part of Great Britain; that by a treaty previouſly in exiſtence between his majeſty and the king of Pruſſia, the co-operation and aſſiſtance of that power were enſured to this country.

"That it does not appear to this houſe that the ſuccours ſtipulated by the defenſive treaty of 1788, have been required by his majeſty, but that a convention has been entered into, the ſtipulations of which have no other tendency than the involving us in ſchemes as foreign to the true intereſt, as they are repugnant to the natural feelings of Engliſhmen; and of impoſing a reſtraint upon his majeſty's known diſpoſition to avail himſelf of any circumſtances which might otherwiſe enable him, conſiſtently with the honour of his crown, and the welfare and ſecurity of the country, to relieve his people from the preſent burthenſome and calamitous war.

"To repreſent to his majeſty, that the irruption of the French into Savoy, and their poſſeſſion of that part of the dominions of the king of Sardinia, did not appear to his majeſty ſo far to endanger the balance of power in Europe, as to induce his majeſty on that account to commence hoſtilities againſt France. That his faithful commons do therefore expreſs their diſapprobation of that part of the treaty recently concluded between his majeſty and the king of Sardinia, by which his majeſty is bound not to lay down his arms until the reſtitution of Savoy ſhall have been accompliſhed; a ſpecies of engagement which it can at no time (excepting in caſes of the greateſt emergency) be either prudent or proper to contract; and much leſs for an object which was not deemed in his majeſty's wiſdom to be connected with the intereſts of this country, ſo as to occaſion a declaration of war, and which cannot now be conſidered by his faithful commons as of ſufficient importance to be made the indiſpenſable condition of peace.

"To repreſent to his majeſty, that it appears to his faithful commons to be the general tendency of theſe engagements to involve us in connexions of undefined extent, for objects which we diſapprove and have diſavowed, and this with powers on whoſe principles of equity and moderation we are inſtructed by experience to have no reliance, and whoſe complete ſucceſs may, in our opinion, prove fatal to the liberties of Europe.

"To repreſent to his majeſty, that having thus expreſſed our ſentiments on the engagements which his majeſty has been adviſed to contract, we feel it our bounden duty moſt humbly and earneſtly to implore his majeſty to conſider of ſuch meaſures as to his royal wiſdom ſhould ſeem adapted (conſiſtently with that national faith which in common with his majeſty we deſire to preſerve religiouſly inviolate) to extricate himſelf from engagements which oppoſe ſuch difficulties to his majeſty's concluding a ſeparate peace, whenever the intereſts of his people may render ſuch a meaſure adviſable, and which certainly countenance the opinion that his majeſty is acting in concert with other powers for the unjuſtifiable purpoſe of compelling the people of France to ſubmit to a form of government not approved by that nation."

A long debate took place, after which the houſe divided; for the addreſs 26—againſt it 138—majority 112.

On the 10th of March, Mr. Adam called the attention of the houſe to the caſe of Thomas Muir, Eſq. and the Rev. Thomas Fiſche Palmer, who had been ſentenced by the High Court of Juſticiary of Scotland to tranſportation for fourteen years. He brought this ſubject before the houſe for the purpoſe of weighing and reviewing, of detecting fallacy and confirming truth. He wiſhed to move for the records, or certain extracts from the records of thoſe two cauſes, the one tried at Perth, the other at Edinburgh; and alſo the notes or minutes of the judge who tried Mr. Muir, that the houſe might be enabled to ſee why the objections of that gentleman had been over-ruled; why evidence had been received upon charges that did not appear in the indictment; and why the teſtimony of one John Ruſſel, who was called on the part of the defendant, had been rejected. He concluded his ſpeech with imploring the houſe to join in an addreſs to his majeſty, praying his majeſty to exerciſe that divine prerogative which alike bleſſes him that gives and him that aſks; and with moving, That there be laid before that houſe ſuch part of the records of the Court of Juſticiary as related to the trials of Meſſrs. Muir and Palmer.

The lord advocate of Scotland contended, that the proceedings of the court were in ſtrict conformity to the known and eſtabliſhed law of Scotland, though perhaps not of this part of the iſland. The entire proceſs of the trial was on the moſt legal, fair, and equitable principle. The challenging of the jurors was becauſe they were friends to the king and conſtitution, and therefore rejected. Had the judges of the court acted otherwiſe, they would have been guilty of a high breach of duty. And he inſiſted, that the puniſhment of tranſportation was very properly adjudged in the caſes in queſtion, as the only means of totally removing from the country men of ſuch turbulent and licentious characters. In this country a goal was a focus of ſedition, where the convicts ridiculed the legiſlature, inſulted government, and made proſelytes to their baneful doctrines.

Mr. Sheridan ſaid, he had never heard a ſpeech that rouſed his indignation more than that of the lord advocate. He had given a moſt horrid picture of the laws of his own country, and ſuggeſted the propriety of introducing them into England. If any of the honourable members he acted with dared to adopt puniſhments in this country ſo repugnant to juſtice, ſo abhorrent to humanity, he truſted that man would not eſcape puniſhment. The real queſtion was, Whether, under all the circumſtances, ſuch a reaſonable doubt was not raiſed as to induce the houſe to accede to the production of the record, &c. as a preliminary to a reviſal of the ſentences? People might ſuppoſe, by the revival of dormant ſtatutes, that the golden age had prevailed in Scotland for a century paſt; but there had in that period been two rebellions, trials for libels, and the magiſtrates of Dundee had been committed for not ringing the bells on the acceſſion of the Hanoverian family to the throne.

Mr. Sheridan then adverted to the proceedings of the ſociety at the Thatched-Houſe Tavern in 1782, contending that the doctrines of Mr. Muir and Mr. Palmer were ſtolen from the reſolutions of that ſociety, which was compoſed of perſons of the firſt rank and conſequence, among whom were the Duke of Richmond and Mr. Pitt. The former, he ſaid, had declared his opinion moſt deciſively in favour of recurring to the voice of the people to bring about a reform of parliament.

He concluded by ſtating, that the two unfortunate gentlemen who were the ſubjects of this diſcuſſion, demanded juſtice and not mercy at the hands of the legiſlature: they conſidered themſelves as unjuſtly condemned, and did not humble themſelves before the throne.

Mr. Fox ſpoke to the illegality of the judgments, and contended that no ſuch diſcretion was veſted in the court as they had aſſumed. In pronouncing ſentence, he remarked, that one of the judges, in the exceſs of his humanity, told Mr. Muir, that the Roman law was the law of Scotland, and that it left it in the diſcretion of the court either to convict to the gallows, to throw him to wild beaſts, or to tranſport for a given period; the laſt of theſe they had adopted, as the mildeſt of the three. The judgments were only to be equalled by thoſe of the Star-chamber or the Revolutionary Tribunal at Paris.

Mr. Pitt vindicated the legality and the propriety of the Court of Juſticiary in Scotland. He ſaid, that theſe gentlemen were not puniſhed merely for expreſſing their wiſhes for a parliamentary reform: their ſentences were inflicted for having depreciated the conſtitution of this country, and recommending the new ſyſtem of France, a nation with whom we are actually at war.

The queſtion being loudly called for, the houſe divided; for the motion 32—againſt it 171—majority 139.

On the 17th of March, General Fitzpatrick roſe, to make a motion relative to the captivity and treatment of M. la Fayette, which he prefaced with a ſpeech, wherein he expatiated on the great ſervices rendered by the character in queſtion to the cauſe of real liberty and order, his loyalty to his ſovereign, and his attachment to the conſtitution eſtabliſhed in France in 1789, for which he ſacrificed every thing. He contended that not only the magnanimity and humanity of the Britiſh nation were in this caſe appealed to, but alſo its juſtice and policy, both of which were deeply implicated. He alluded to the declaration made at Toulon in favour of the conſtitution of 1789, after which it would be inconſiſtent to ſuffer its chief promoter and defender to languiſh in the dungeons of one of our allies; and alſo to the declarations made by the Pruſſian monarch, that M. la Fayette was not his priſoner, but that of the combined monarchs in general. The national policy, he ſaid, was concerned, inaſmuch as we could in no way better ſhew the ſincerity of our declaration than by delivering the perſon in queſtion. At the ſame time he wiſhed to include the preſent companions in his ſufferings, the three members of the conſtituent aſſembly, who eſcaped with him from France, Meſſrs. Lameth, &c. He then moved, "An addreſs to his majeſty, ſtating the opinion of the houſe, that the detention of Meſſrs. la Fayette, Lameth, &c. by his majeſty's ally, the king of Pruſſia, was injurious to the combined powers, and beſeeching his majeſty to take ſuch ſteps therein as to his royal wiſdom ſhall ſeem moſt proper."

Colonel Tarleton ſeconded the motion.

The chancellor of the exchequer ſaid, that in the preſent inſtance there was not a caſe made out ſtrong enough to warrant the interpoſition of the houſe. He ſtated the particulars of the capture, which were by no means extraordinary: the general of an hoſtile army was found within the lines of the enemy, and accordingly taken priſoner. In his opinion the whole was perfectly conſiſtent with the rights of war and the law of nations. Neither did he agree with the hon. gentleman in thinking that M. la Fayette's conduct, or the conſequences of it, deſerved well, either from his own country or mankind in general. He begged leave to diſclaim that this country had any power in the diſpoſal of the character in queſtion; and viewing the ſubject as he did, he muſt reſiſt the motion.

Mr. Burke ſpoke warmly againſt it. He conſidered M. la Fayette as the chief author of all the horrid calamities which had reſulted to France ſince the revolution, and that he had no claim whatever on the compaſſion of his majeſty. Forgiveneſs for his conduct toward this country in the American war, was all that he had a right to expect, and that he believed was already granted him.

Mr. Fox, Mr. Grey, Mr. R. Thornton, and Mr. W. Smith ſpoke alſo for the motion; and Mr. Ryder againſt it. On a diviſion it was negatived by 153 againſt 43.

On the 24th Mr. Sheridan roſe to move "That an addreſs be preſented to his majeſty, praying that he would order to be laid before the houſe a copy of a letter written by the ſecretary of ſtate, dated Whitehall, March 14, to the lords lieutenant of the ſeveral counties, with the plans thereto annexed, &c." This motion was made, in order to bring before the houſe, on a future day, the conſideration of the important ſubject of voluntary contributions. The motion was agreed to.

April 3, Mr. Dundas preſented the following ſtatement of the revenues of the Eaſt India Company:

Revenues.	£.
Bengal Revenue for the laſt year	5,526,934
Madras Revenue	2,476,310
Bombay ditto	242,316
Total	8,245,560
Charges.
Bengal Charges	2,956,068
Madras ditto	1,963,665
Bombay ditto	681,569
Total	5,601,302

Surplus of Revenues	2,644,258
Out of which is to be deducted,
Supplies from Bengal to Bencoolen, St. Helena, &c.	74,184
The intereſt upon debts at Bengal	642,376
Which leaves a balance of	1,927,698
To this is to be added the amount received for the ſale of import goods, &c.	489,389
Leaving a balance of	2,417,537

Having laid this ſtatement before the houſe, Mr. Dundas made the two following reſolutions, which were agreed to:

1ſt, 'That it is expedient, that the Eaſt India company ſhould not be obliged to reduce their bonded debt under two millions ſterling.

2dly, 'That the company be enabled, with the conſent of the board of controul, to raiſe the ſum of one million, over and above their preſent bonded debt.

The ſame day the chancellor of the exchequer preſented a bill to enable the ſubjects of France to enliſt as ſoldiers in regiments to ſerve on the continent of Europe, and certain other places, and to enable his majeſty to grant commiſſions, as officers, to ſubjects of the ſaid country in the ſaid corps.

The chancellor of the exchequer then moved for leave to bring in a bill for the better management of the landed revenues of the crown, which was agreed to.

Mr. Harriſon now prefaced a motion reſpecting ſinecure places, &c. by obſerving, that miniſters ſtood forward in calling on the people to ſubſcribe voluntarily in ſupport of a war, in which, they profeſſed, not only the exiſtence of the conſtitution was involved, but all that was dear to the nation as a civil ſociety. He would now afford theſe gentlemen an opportunity of contributing amply on their part, and, if they did, it would convince the country of their ſincerity in the cauſe, and have the beſt effect in promoting the ſubſcriptions, and the general zeal of the people. The effect of his motion was, that thoſe who held offices, ſinecure places, and penſions, ſhould contribute a part thereof, in certain proportions, to the public ſervice, during the continuance of the war. In 1691, a meaſure, nearly ſimilar, was adopted by that houſe, on the motion of Admiral Ruſſel. What he would propoſe was, that all efficient ſituations producing a nett income of 500l. per annum, and upward, ſhould be liable to a deduction of one fourth of their nett produce; that all ſinecure places and penſions, exceeding 200l. per annum, (except thoſe which were obviouſly given as a reward for meritorious ſervice, ſhould be liable to a deduction of half their amount; and that the amount of all penſions and ſinecure places, poſſeſſed by ſuch as at the ſame time held any efficient place, ſhould be wholly allotted to the public ſervice, reſerving at the ſame time the ſtipend which may be paid to a deputy, for any neceſſary trifling duty in the latter inſtance. He concluded with moving, "for leave for a bill to appropriate certain proportions of the emoluments of ſinecure and efficient places and penſions to a certain amount, to the public ſervice during the war."

The principal opponent of the motion was Mr. Burke, who cenſured it; firſt, as a ridiculous project; ſecondly, as a mean and contemptible one; thirdly, as being on a fallacious ground; and laſtly, as not tending to relieve, but to delude the people. It would not, in the event, amount to the "purchaſe of ſmall beer for the poor of Norwich, at one night's ſupper; and it had a tendency to inſpire the people with diſſatiſfactory ideas of the preſent mode of government, under which they enjoy ſo much practical proſperity. The labours of thoſe who held efficient places in the public ſervice were known but to few, and were too poorly paid. Such a proceeding, by ſapping the foundations of a legal tenure (as all places under the crown were) would go to ſet a precedent, which may end in the deſtruction of all property whatever.

After a long debate the queſtion was loudly called for, and the motion being put, negatived by 117 to 48.

On the 28th, meſſages from the king were delivered to both houſes, ſtating the terms of the ſubſidiary treaty between his majeſty and the king of Pruſſia. This was ordered to be taken into conſideration on a future day.

On the 30th, in a committee of the whole houſe on the Pruſſian ſubſidy, the chancellor of the exchequer obſerved, that his majeſty's meſſage referred to two important points; the firſt related to the treaty concluded with Pruſſia; and the ſecond recommended to the houſe the conſideration of the means for enabling his majeſty to fulfil the ſtipulations thereof. With reſpect to the firſt, whatever might be the intereſts of his Pruſſian majeſty in the iſſue of the preſent conteſt, and his zeal for the cauſe in which he had engaged, his ſituation and circumſtances might be ſuch, as to render it impoſſible for him to afford that aſſiſtance as a principal. He then ſtated, that Pruſſia was bound to furniſh a body of 62,000 troops, over and above its contingent as a part of the empire; but which included the body of 32,000 which was to be furniſhed by a former treaty, on the requiſition of the United Provinces and this country. For the above number was to be paid, in the way of ſubſidy, 50,000l. a month; in addition to this, 300,000l. was to be paid in advance, to enable thoſe troops to be put in motion, and 100,000l. on their return: over and above this it was ſtipulated, that theſe troops ſhould be furniſhed with bread, forage, &c. which had been calculated at a ſum little ſhort of 1,200,000l. per annum. So that this ſum was engaged for by the preſent treaty only in ſuch proportion as would provide for 30,000 men, and a certain proportion of the whole was to be paid by the Dutch: the entire ſum therefore to be paid by this country, would be, from the period at which the payments were to commence, until the end of the year, about 1,350,000l. —He then expatiated on the ſuperior advantages of this treaty, in point of economy, and other important reſpects, to preceding treaties of the ſame kind; and he concluded by moving, That the ſum of two millions and a half be granted to his majeſty, to enable him to fulfil the ſtipulations of the treaty with Pruſſia, entered into for the more vigorous proſecution of the war, and alſo to provide for ſuch exigencies as might ariſe in the ſervice of the year 1794, &c.

Mr. Fox oppoſed the motion, and propoſed, as an amendment, that the words, one million one hundred and fifty thouſand pounds be inſerted inſtead of two millions and a half. On a diviſion there were againſt Mr. Fox's amendment 134 to 33. The motion then paſſed.

On the 30th of May, Mr. ſecretary Dundas, after an exordium, in which he expatiated on our recent ſucceſſes in the Weſt Indies, moved the following reſolutions, which were unanimouſly agreed to:

I. That the thanks of this houſe be preſented to ſir Charles Grey, for his able, gallant and meritorious ſervices in the Weſt Indies:

II. That the ſame be preſented to ſir John Jervis; and

III. That the ſame be preſented to lieutenant general Preſcott, and his royal highneſs prince Edward, and the other officers in that army.

IV. That the thanks, &c. be preſented to admiral Thompſon, for his gallant conduct.

V. That the houſe approve of and acknowledge the ſervices of the non-commiſſioned officers and ſoldiers.

VI. The ſame to the ſailors for their co-operation and gallant conduct, &c.

On the 30th, Mr. Fox after a very ſpirited exordium, began to warn the houſe of the very critical ſituation into which miniſters had brought the country, with reſpect to the preſent unfortunate war. This war, taken in its leaſt unjuſtifiable point of view, namely, the principle on which miniſters affected to ſet out with, that of the defence and preſervation of our allies, he could never bring himſelf to approve of, as he was well convinced every thing we could reaſonably expect might have been brought about by negociation; but how much more muſt he diſapprove, nay dread and reprobate it, when the principles on which it was now obviouſly carried on were different, and its objects entirely changed; for now he could not but perceive that it was on a principle of internal interference in the concerns of France, and a view to the deſtruction of its preſent government. In endeavouring to ſubſtantiate theſe poſitions, he went into a long detail reſpecting the origin of the war, the alliances we had formed on account of it, the operations of the war ſince its commencement, the ſucceſſes and defeats of the allied powers, &c. From all theſe, he pronounced, that the objects which miniſters ſeemed to propoſe to themſelves were abſolutely unattainable, and that nothing ſhort of the ruin of the country was to be apprehended if the preſent ſyſtem was perſiſted in.—He then moved a ſtring of reſolutions expreſſive of theſe ſentiments, and praying his majeſty to order ſuch ſteps to be taken, as might effect a ſpeedy pacification.

Mr. Jenkinſon and Mr. Pitt ſupported the war; and Mr. Fox's motion was rejected by 208 to 55.

About this time univerſal joy was diffuſed through the whole country, by the arrival of Sir Roger Curtis, firſt captain to the admiral earl Howe, who brought the following diſpatch from his lordſhip to Mr. Stephens.

Queen Charlotte at Sea, June 2, 1794, Uſhant,
E. half N. 140 leagues.

Sir,

Thinking it may not be neceſſary to make a more particular report of my proceedings with the fleet, for the preſent information of the lords commiſſioners of the admiralty, I confine my communications chiefly, in this diſpatch, to the occurrences when in preſence of the enemy yeſterday.

Finding, on my return off of Breſt on the 19th paſt, that the French fleet had, a few days before, put to ſea; and receiving on the ſame evening, advices from rear-admiral Montagu, I deemed it requiſite to endeavour to form a junction with the rear-admiral as ſoon as poſſible, and proceeded immediately for the ſtation on which he meant to wait for the return of the Venus.

But, having gained very credible intelligence, on the 21ſt of the ſame month, whereby I had reaſon to ſuppoſe the French fleet was then but a few leagues farther to the weſtward, the courſe before ſteered was altered accordingly.

On the morning of the 28th the enemy were diſcovered far to windward, and partial actions were engaged with them that evening and the next day.

The weather-gage having been obtained, in the progreſs of the laſt-mentioned day, and the fleet being in a ſituation for bringing the enemy to cloſe action the 1ſt inſtant, the ſhips bore up together for that purpoſe, between ſeven and eight o'clock in the morning.

The French, their force conſiſting of twenty-ſix ſhips of the line, oppoſed to his majeſty's fleet of twenty-five (the Audacious having parted company with the ſternmoſt ſhip of the enemy's line, captured in in the night of the 28th) waited for the action, and ſuſtained the attack with their cuſtomary reſolution.

LORD HOWE's VICTORY

In leſs than an hour after the cloſe action commenced in the centre, the French Admiral, engaged by the Queen Charlotte, crowded off, and was followed by moſt of the ſhips of his van in condition to carry ſail after him, leaving with us about ten or twelve of his crippled or totally diſmaſted ſhips, excluſive of one ſunk in the engagement. The Queen Charlotte had then loſt her fore top-maſt, and the main top-maſt fell over the ſide very ſoon after.

The greater number of the other ſhips of the Britiſh fleet were, at this time, ſo much diſabled or widely ſeparated, and under ſuch circumſtances with reſpect to thoſe ſhips of the enemy in a ſtate for action, and with which the firing was ſtill continued, that two or three, even of their diſmantled ſhips, attempting to get away under a ſprit-ſail ſingly, or ſmaller ſail raiſed on the ſtump of the foremaſt, could not be detained.

Seven remained in our poſſeſſion, one of which, however, ſunk before the adequate aſſiſtance could be given to her crew; but many were ſaved.

The Brunſwick, having loſt her mizen-maſt in the action, and drifted to leeward of the French retreating ſhips, was obliged to put away large to the northward from them. Not ſeeing her chaſed by the enemy, in that predicament, I flatter myſelf ſhe may arrive in ſafety at Plymouth. All the other twenty-four ſhips of his majeſty's fleet re-aſſembled later in the day; and I am preparing to return with them, as ſoon as the captured ſhips of the enemy are ſecured, for Spithead.

The material injury to his majeſty's ſhips, I underſtand, is confined principally to their maſts and yards, which I conclude will be ſpeedily re-placed.

I have not been yet able to collect regular accounts of the killed and wounded in the different ſhips. Captain Montagu is the only officer of his rank who fell in the action. The numbers of both deſcriptions I hope will prove ſmall, the nature of the ſervice conſidered; but I have the concern to add, on the ſame ſubject, that admiral Graves has received a wound in the arm, and that rear-admirals Bowyer and Paſley, and Captain Hutt, of the Queen, have each had a leg taken off; they are however (I have the ſatisfaction to hear), in a favourable ſtate under thoſe misfortunes. In the captured ſhips the numbers of killed and wounded appear to be very conſiderable.

Though I ſhall have, on the ſubject of theſe different actions with the enemy, diſtinguiſhed examples hereafter to report, I preſume the determined bravery of the ſeveral ranks of officers and the ſhips companies employed under my authority, will have been already ſufficiently denoted by the effect of their ſpirited exertions; and, I truſt, I ſhall be excuſed for poſtponing the more detailed narrative of the other tranſactions of the fleet thereon, for being communicated at a future opportunity; more eſpecially as my firſt captain, Sir Roger Curtis, who is charged with this diſpatch, will be able to give the farther information the lords commiſſioners of the admiralty may at this time require. It is incumbent on me nevertheleſs, now to add, that I am greatly indebted to him for his counſels as well as conduct, in every branch of my official duties: and I have ſimilar aſſiſtance, in the late occurrences, to acknowledge of my ſecond captain, Sir Andrew Douglas.

I am, with great conſideration,
Sir,
Your moſt obedient ſervant,
HOWE.

P. S. The names and force of the captured French ſhips with the fleet is tranſmitted herewith.

Lord Chatham carried the account of Lord Howe's great naval victory to the Opera, and juſt after the ſecond act, it was made known to the houſe. A burſt of tranſport interrupted the Opera, and there never was witneſſed any ſcene of emotion ſo rapturous as the audience exhibited, when the band ſtruck up the national ſong of Rule Britannia. The joy was too exceſſive to ſubſide in a moment.—It continued for the whole night, and at intervals the acclamations of triumph drowned the performance.—God ſave the king was ſung by Morichelli, Morelli, and Rovedino. Not content with this, the ſpectators ſeeing Banti in a box, ſhe was called on by every voice to ſing God ſave the King! She chearfully obeyed the ſummons, came on the ſtage, and the tranſport of the night was crowned by her ſinging the ſong.

His royal highneſs the duke of Clarence went to Covent-Garden Theatre, where he communicated the joyful intelligence to the manager, who ordered it to be announced to the houſe, which was accordingly done by Mr. Incledon. The muſic played God ſave the King! and Rule Britannia! which were loudly applauded with encore and encore.

Lord Mulgrave and Colonel Phipps in the mean time went to Drury-Lane Houſe, and informed the manager of the glorious atchievements of the Britiſh navy, which he ordered to be announced to the audience by Mr. Suett. The muſic and performers joined in the loyal ſounds of God ſave the King and Rule Britannia! which were loudly applauded by the whole houſe.

The event was celebrated throughout the night by ringing of bells, firing of cannon, &c. and the next day at noon the Park and Tower guns were fired as teſtimonials of ſincere joy.

The metropolis was illuminated for three ſucceſſive evenings, and ſome windows were broken belonging to thoſe who refuſed to exhibit this mark of ſatisfaction at the important victory obtained. Among others, the houſe of Lord Stanhope was damaged, in conſequence of which he next day inſerted the following advertiſement in the newſpapers:

OUTRAGE IN MANSFIELD-STREET.

"Whereas an Hired Band of Ruffians attacked my houſe in Manſfield-ſtreet, in the dead of the night, between the 11th and 12th of June inſtant, and ſet it on fire at different times; and whereas a gentleman's carriage paſſed ſeveral times to and fro in front of my houſe, and the Ariſtocrat, or other perſon who was in the ſaid carriage, gave money to the people in the ſtreet, to encourage them: This is to requeſt the friends of liberty and good order to ſend me any authentic information they can procure, reſpecting the names and place of abode of the ſaid Ariſtocrat, or other perſon, who was in the carriage above-mentioned, in order that he may be made amenable to the law.

June 12, 1794. STANHOPE."

On the 13th of June, in the houſe of lords, lord Grenville roſe, in purſuance of notice he had given, to move the thanks of the houſe to earl Howe, together with all the officers and men engaged in the late victory over the French fleet. His lordſhip ſaid, it was unneceſſary to enter into a detail of facts on this ſubject, to enlarge on it by obſervations, or to dwell on the illuſtrious character under whoſe command this glorious victory was gained: he ſhould, for the preſent, be content with ſaying, that for prudence and wiſdom of deſign, ſkill and courage in execution, and finally, to the glory of the Britiſh character, it was an action which had never been ſurpaſſed even in the hiſtory of the Britiſh navy. He therefore moved, "That the thanks of that houſe be tranſmitted to admiral earl Howe and the other admirals in that engagement, with all their names, together with the officers, &c." Then followed an acknowledgment to all the men who were in the action. The thanks to all the officers to be tranſmitted by lord Howe himſelf; and the thanks to his lordſhip himſelf to be tranſmitted by the lord chancellor.

Theſe motions being read, and ſeveral having ſpoken in high terms of panegyric of the noble earl, the queſtions were put and unanimouſly carried.—On the 16th, a ſimilar vote of thanks paſſed the houſe of commons.

The next day, lord Grenville moved three reſolutions.—Firſt, to thank admiral lord Hood, for his ſervices in the expedition to Corſica.—Secondly, to paſs a like vote of thanks to the officers, ſailors, marines, and ſoldiers ſerving in that expedition;—and thirdly, that the chancellor tranſmit the ſame.

Lord Lauderdale, lord Derby, and the duke of Bedford objected to theſe reſolutions, not on account of the perſonal character and conduct of the noble admiral, but on the general principles of oppoſition to the war; and lord Derby moved the previous queſtion. Lord Grenville, lord Hawkeſbury, and the lord chancellor anſwered the objections. The previous queſtion was negatived by 31 to 5; and then the vote of thanks was put and carried. On this occaſion was entered the following PROTEST.

Diſſentient,

1. Becauſe it has not been the practice of this houſe to vote thanks to officers commanding his majeſty's forces by ſea or land, except on occaſions where they have eminently advanced the honour and promoted the intereſts of their country, by the moſt important and acknowledged ſervices.

2. Becauſe by voting the thanks of this houſe, except in ſuch inſtances, we diminiſh the value of the moſt honourable reward we have it in our power to confer, and leſſen one of the beſt incitements to future ſervice.

3. Becauſe the reduction of Baſtia does not in itſelf appear to us to be ſuch a ſervice as calls upon this houſe for any extraordinary mark of approbation or applauſe.

4. Becauſe whatever the merit of that ſervice may be, the other admirals of the fleet, and the commanding officers of his majeſty's land forces, muſt have had their ſhare in it; and to refuſe thanking them, as had been uſual upon ſimilar occaſions, appears to us to juſtify an opinion that the vote of thanks to lord Hood originated from ſome motive of a private and perſonal nature, which it is improper for this houſe to countenance.

5. Becauſe even miniſters themſelves do not ſeem, in the firſt inſtance, to have conſidered that ſervice as entitled to ſuch a mark of approbation; for though accounts had been received of the reduction of Baſtia previous to thoſe of the victory obtained by the fleet under the command of earl Howe, no intention was announced of moving thanks to lord Hood, till this houſe had paid the juſt tribute of gratitude and honour for that moſt important and ſplendid victory.

BEDFORD, DERBY,
ALBEMARLE, THANET.
LAUDERDALE,

On the 20th, Mr. Long having moved in the houſe of commons, an adjournment till Friday next; when the ſpeaker put the queſtion on that motion, Mr Sheridan ſaid, he did not underſtand what miniſters meant by adjourning the houſe in that manner from day to day. He was ſurpriſed that not a ſingle miniſter then attended in his place: he thought this extremely indecent. If there had been any perſon to have aſſured him that parliament was not to be prorogued on Friday, he ſhould not have oppoſed the adjournment till that day; but there being no one preſent who could give him that aſſurance, he felt it to be his duty to move an amendment to the motion, by leaving out the word "Friday," and ſubſtituting "Thurſday," in its place. His reaſon for moving this amendment was, in order to have an opportunity of bringing forward a propoſition, which, from the late events that had taken place on the continent, he conceived to be of conſiderable importance to the country: he therefore moved, that the houſe do adjourn till Thurſday.

Mr. Jekyll ſeconded this motion, and expreſſed his aſtoniſhment at the abſence of all the king's miniſters. He thought it reaſonable to expect to find them in their places to explain ſome late events, which were extremely curious and ſingular in their nature. He wiſhed thoſe gentlemen had been preſent to give an account to the houſe of the money that had been ſent to the king of Pruſſia. There was alſo another circumſtance which he could not help mentioning:—it had been formerly ſtated by his hon. friend in that houſe, that lord Dorcheſter had written a letter to the Indians reſpecting this country being about to be involved in a war with the American ſtates. The authenticity of that letter was flatly denied in that houſe, and when the ſame ſubject was brought forward by a noble friend of his in another place, this letter was treated as a groſs forgery; but now it had turned out, from the letters of Mr. Hammond, that what his hon. friend had ſaid with regard to that letter was correctly true.

Mr. Grey could not poſſibly account for the abſence of all his majeſty's miniſters on that occaſion, but by ſuppoſing it to be a part of that ſyſtem which had uniformly governed their conduct from the commencement of their adminiſtration. The miniſters of the crown had conſtantly conſidered themſelves as ſomething above the houſe of commons; and if they would not attend their places voluntarily, that houſe had a right to demand their attendance. The houſe, among many other things, had a right to aſk them the reaſon of the non-performance of the treaty with the king of Pruſſia. It was not now more than two months ſince the Pruſſians were to have been in the field, and they had not yet begun to march, though the ſubſidy we had paid for their aſſiſtance was unprecedented in the hiſtory of the country. He thought the king's miniſters would have been better employed in attending their duty in parliament, than in ſettling new arrangements in the cabinet.

Mr. Long ſaid, he could not prevent the hon. gentleman from obtaining his amendment, as he might count the houſe out. Mr. Sheridan explained, after which his amendment was carried.

On the 10th of July, Mr. Sheridan made his promiſed motion on the ſubject of the war. He obſerved, that it was his intention to follow up the motion he ſhould firſt ſubmit to the houſe, which would relate to the Pruſſian ſubſidy, with another to addreſs his majeſty to poſtpone the prorogation of parliament, in order to give the great national council an opportunity of conſidering, from time to time, and of adviſing his majeſty with reſpect to the preſent very momentous ſituation of public affairs; but previouſly to a proceeding of this nature, he thought it neceſſary that the houſe ſhould be informed by miniſters on certain points, in which the national intereſts were deeply involved, and which, from their preſent aſpect, loudly called for an enquiry into the cauſes in which ſuch diſgrace and diſaſter could originate. It was alſo neceſſary, that the repreſentatives of the people ſhould be informed, before they ſeparate, from authority, whether the objects of the war were changed, or whether the abſurd chimerical one, which had been not long ago avowed, of the extirpation of the preſent government of France, was to be perſevered in; in which caſe the people would know what they had to truſt to. In caſe this was ſtill avowed, its abſurdity muſt be evident to all unprejudiced perſons, as events had happened ſince the laſt diſcuſſion of this ſubject, which rendered the accompliſhment of ſuch an object totally impracticable; for notwithſtanding all the extraordinary powers with which the government of this country were armed, the means to pay an enormous ſubſidy, the power to raiſe corps of emigrants, and the like, the reſult was, their whole exertions were defeated, and followed by diſgrace, being driven by the enemy into a worſe ſituation than the allies were in at the commencement of the war. The cauſes of theſe calamitous events called for enquiry, and the firſt queſtion that preſented itſelf was the conduct of the king of Pruſſia. The houſe ſhould be informed, if any, or what troops were ſent by that monarch to join our armies, for which he had been paid an extravagant price, and which he was bound by treaty to have in the field on the 24th of May—but here he feared it would be found, that towards us this prince had manifeſted his accuſtomed treachery, a line of conduct which, if the miniſter had not been fully aware of before, he had been repeatedly warned of. The houſe ſhould likewiſe be informed why miniſters, who muſt know the great want of troops on the continent, ſhould ſo long ſuffer a fine body of men to remain inactive on the coaſt of Hampſhire, and holding out at the ſame time falſe, deluſive hopes to the deſerted and unhappy royaliſts of France; theſe, together with the abſurd and improvident meaſures which had been adopted, joined to the complicated treachery of our allies, were the cauſe of all our defeats and diſtreſſes, and the complete extinction of our hopes; and not only merited our fulleſt enquiry, but were ample grounds for changing the plan and object of the war: converting the former immediately into a defenſive one, and with reſpect to the latter a ſpeedy pacification, which he hoped were the preſent intentions of miniſters and their new colleagues. On the ſubject of the new miniſterial arrangements, Mr. Sheridan ſaid, that notwithſtanding the dereliction of certain parliamentary leaders from thoſe manly and conſtitutional principles, which had led them uniformly to oppoſe the meaſures of the preſent adminiſtration, and to reprobate their mode of acceſſion to office, he had ſtill ſo good an opinion of their principles, that he was convinced the call on them muſt be great indeed, and that they ſaw the national affairs in ſo dangerous a ſituation, as to induce them to ſet aſide all ſubordinate conſiderations, and to accept the conduct of affairs, in order, if poſſible, to ſave the country from the effects of thoſe misfortunes into which their preſent fellow-miniſters had brought her.—The next point to be conſidered was of great importance, and was ſecondary only to the queſtion of the war; he meant the negociation between this country and America, with which the abſurd policy of miniſters had nearly involved us in a rupture. It was well known that the characters of the miniſters of this country were held in the moſt odious light in America; and when he conſidered ſuch to be the reſult of eleven years negociation with that country, and as many experimental annual meaſures, he muſt be of opinion, that the inflammatory anſwer given by Lord Dorcheſter to the Indian chiefs, proceeded from authority: it was, however, in the higheſt degree material, that the houſe ſhould be informed of the preciſe relative ſituation of both countries.—He concluded by making his firſt motion (which, if carried, he ſaid, he ſhould follow up by others) namely, "That an account be laid before the houſe, of the monies paid to his Pruſſian majeſty, purſuant to the treaty made on the 19th of April 1794; and an account of the number of troops employed in co-operation with his majeſty's troops in conſequence."

The chancellor of the exchequer obſerved, that the hon. gentleman's ſpeech affected three queſtions, namely, the object of the war, the circumſtances of the Pruſſian ſubſidy, and the ſtate of the negociation between this country and America. With reſpect to the latter two points, he did not conceive that the conſideration of thoſe matters, in their preſent ſtate, was properly in the legiſlature; but with reſpect to the firſt important concern, he would now, as he had always done, diſtinctly ſtate his ſentiments; namely, that the uniformly avowed objects of the war were not in the leaſt changed; that they were principally the deſtruction of the preſent jacobinical ſyſtem of government in France, which conſummation this country was bound to endeavour to effect, not more by intereſt than with a view to its ſafety and exiſtence, and which ſyſtem would be followed with deciſion and increaſed energy, by thoſe characters who were about to participate in the government of the country; and in ſo doing, not only the ſafety, tranquillity, and independence of Europe would be preſerved, but the emancipation of France from a horde of ſanguinary and deſpotic uſurpers, which were equally deſtructive to that country, and hoſtile to all the regular governments of Europe. That from this great and deſirable end, the powers in alliance would not be deterred by any temporary ill ſucceſſes, which, in an extenſive proſecution of hoſtilities, were frequently to be expected; that the union of ſentiment between the combined powers to this end ſtill exiſted in its full force; and he doubted not but their united reſources, directed with perſeverance and energy, would be productive of the deſired ends. Without the accompliſhment of theſe objects, he contended peace would not be ſecure; and without ſecurity it was not valuable. Theſe objects were clearly defined in ſpeeches and meſſages from the throne, and were promiſed to be adhered to by both houſes of parliament, as they were the groundwork of our treaties with our allies, and could not be deſerted, without abandoning every ſentiment of faith and honour, every regard for our own ſafety and exiſtence, and for that of Europe. Could we think of retreating while in our power to do otherwiſe? The viciſſitudes of war, nor any temporary ill ſucceſs, could ever alter his ſentiments or conduct. He knew how dearly thoſe ſucceſſes were bought by the enemy, and was aware of the daily diminution of their reſources. The objects of the war, therefore, were unchanged, and he doubted not but our united efforts would be crowned with ultimate ſucceſs. With reſpect to the Pruſſian ſubſidy, he would only obſerve, that miniſters were reſponſible for the advice given to the crown in concluding the treaty, and were bound to fulfil the ſtipulations of it; at the ſame time they were bound to oblige the other contracting party to adhere to his part, and to fulfil his engagements, with reſpect to the employment of the troops. He muſt ſay, that ſuch conſideration did not belong to the houſe, unleſs it had a mind to aſſume the direction of the executive government; and, perhaps, the preſent particular mode of employing the Pruſſian troops might be deemed as ſerviceable to the grand cauſe, as if in the heart of Weſt Flanders. Of theſe matters the executive government was to decide, and miniſters in due time were to render an account. On the ſame grounds, he muſt decline anſwering the hon.

gentleman's queſtion reſpecting the American negociation, as it muſt be obvious, that ſuch were not fit ſubjects for diſcuſſion, while a treaty was under conſideration. The idea alſo of continuing the ſeſſion of parliament was not only irregular, but on the ſame grounds ineffectual; for the conduct of the operation of the war being out of its power, to what end could it ſit? As, therefore, the hon. gentleman's motion avowedly led to the diſcuſſion of points which he hoped he had convinced the houſe were not proper for diſcuſſion at preſent, he deemed it his duty to give it a decided negative. The hon. gentleman had ſaid, that miniſters were unpopular in America; and had fortunately coupled with that aſſertion another which anſwered it, namely, that there was a jacobin party in that country. With jacobins, he expected to be always unpopular. The hon. gentleman had aſked, what but great and awful neceſſity could have urged the union now taking place in the cabinet? "This queſtion," ſaid he, "I will anſwer by another. What greater neceſſity can there exiſt to true lovers of their country, than to ſee that the political queſtions on foot, and daily brought into agitation, attack the throne, and go to the ſubverſion of parliament itſelf?" As to the noble characters the hon. gentleman alluded to, and he himſelf (Mr. Pitt) and his friends, they were not now diſputing what deſcription of men were moſt likely to ſerve with effect their government and country; they were not conteſting parliamentary points of legiſlation; they were not arguing the expediency of a particular meaſure adopted for the management of India, nor diſcuſſing what were the merits of a peace made twelve years ago; but were conſidering what were the beſt means to preſerve the lives, liberty, and property, of all Engliſhmen, from the ruthleſs hand of violence, rapine, and aſſaſſination—and, tendering thoſe, thought themſelves bound to abandon party feuds, and unite. They had accordingly united, and on that union ſhould act; and if they failed, ſhould at leaſt have the conſolation to reflect, that they had left no effort unattempted on their part, to reſcue their country from impending ruin, and ſave from utter extinction the order and tranquillity of the world.

Mr. Grey obſerved, that we were engaged in a ruinous war; and by the language held out by the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Pitt) the country had the conſolation to find, that we were ſtill determined to proſecute a project ſo fatal and calamitous in its nature. The right hon. gentleman had called the diſaſters that befel the combined powers in all quarters, mere accidental events and temporary miſfortunes. He would aſk the right hon. gentleman, whether the combined powers were not driven back to the place whence they originally ſet out? The right hon. gentleman had obſerved, that this was a conteſt to reſcue the people of France from the moſt oppreſſive yoke of tyranny that could poſſibly be impoſed upon them, by perſons that had uſurped the executive authority. But how was that to be effected? Did the preſent poſture of affairs afford the moſt diſtant proſpect of ſucceſs? Did the diſpoſition evinced by the people of France, during the moſt ſucceſsful period of the campaign, authoriſe the right hon. gentleman to aſſert, that there was any thing like ſucceſs to be hoped for from our future exertions? But how alarming was it for the country to be given to underſtand, that, notwithſtanding the very great diſaſters that had lately befallen the combined powers, we were ſtill determined to proſecute the moſt deſtructive of projects! Were the armies of France diſbanded? Were they diſorganized? On the contrary, they were more numerous than ever. How many millions more were to be expended, and how much more blood was to be ſhed in the attempt to deſtroy that ſyſtem of government with which at laſt we ſhould be obliged to treat? In his opinion, it would be wiſe and politic to acknowledge the government of France, and immediately to ſet about propoſing terms of peace. To this meaſure his majeſty's miniſters had been repeatedly adviſed; but the right hon. gentleman would not liſten to any thing that fell from that ſide of the houſe, and was reſolved to proſecute this war of deſtruction. The houſe was emphatically told, that the conſequence of the recent coalition (which he termed a monſtrous coalition) would be the continuance of the avowed project of deſtruction. With reſpect to the two laſt points, the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Pitt) had given the anſwer to them that he expected.—With regard to America, the old plea of a pending negociation was reſorted to. As it was wiſe at the preſent very alarming conjuncture for the parliament to continue to ſit by ſhort adjournments, in order to be ready upon any occaſion of emergency to give the moſt ſalutary advice, the motion that was made by his hon. friend ſhould have his decided ſupport.

Mr. Sheridan was ſorry to find that the ſpeech of the right hon. gentleman had confirmed the opinion he had always entertained of him, viz. that he was a miniſter who could not be improved by experience, and who could not be cured of his raſhneſs by the long train of calamitous events which his precipitancy or imbecility had brought upon the country. He was happy that this debate had taken place, becauſe, if no other advantage was gained by it, at leaſt this one had been obtained, that miniſters had taken care that the public ſhould not be deluded by any fallacious hopes of a change of meaſures, by declaring themſelves more than ever wedded to their deſtructive and viſionary ſyſtem of exterminating the French jacobins. But in thus pledging themſelves to theſe ruinous meaſures, miniſters ſeemed either really or affectedly to be ignorant of the total change which had taken place in the opinions of the people of this country reſpecting the war in Flanders. A change more ſudden and more univerſal, he believed, never before took place in the popular opinions of any country. That very object, viz. the conqueſt of France, which ſome time ſince the ſanguine diſpoſition of the people, together with the deluſions practiſed upon them, led them to look to as certain, was now treated as chimerical in the extreme. It appeared to him a matter of no ſmall aſtoniſhment, that in the proſecution of this ſyſtem, they ſeemed to have totally forgotten that there exiſted ſuch a ſpot on the globe as America. He ſhould have ſuppoſed that the innumerable calamities brought on this country by the American war, would at leaſt have had this good effect, that they would have deterred future miniſters from hazarding the proſperity of the country for the attainment of objects to which no human power was adequate.

The queſtion being then put on Mr. Sheridan's motion, was negatived without a diviſion. Mr. Sheridan then ſaid, that having failed in this, he would not trouble the houſe with his other motions.

On the 11th, his majeſty put an end to the ſeſſion by a moſt gracious ſpeech from the throne.

This year February 7th, at eight o'clock at night, his royal highneſs the duke of York arrived at Whitehall from the Continent. His royal highneſs came paſſenger in the Veſtal frigate, which conveyed the Prince Adolphus to Oſtend, and landed at Ramſgate, after a ſhort paſſage of fourteen hours. The duke of York, immediately upon his arrival in town, ſet off for Oatlands, where his ducheſs was. His royal highneſs was accompanied on his journey to England by Colonel Hewgill of the guards, and Capt. Crawford, his royal highneſs's aides-du-camp.

On the night of the 11th, a terrible fire broke out at the floor-cloth manufactory, in Knightſbridge. By it no leſs than 20,000l. worth of property, with the buildings, was deſtroyed, and not a farthing of either inſured. This fire, it is ſaid, was occaſioned by the neglect of a boy, who, in heating ſome colour, ſuffered it to boil over.

The following are ſome circumſtances attending a marriage, which now took place between a branch of the royal family and the daughter of a northern earl.

In 1792, Lady Dunmore, whoſe huſband is governor of the Bahama Iſlands, went with her two daughters into Italy, where they reſided till 1793. His royal highneſs prince Auguſtus, being at Rome, met with thoſe ladies, and very naturally courted their agreeable ſociety; the conſequence of which was, a mutual attachment between his royal highneſs and lady Auguſta Murray, and they were there married. Lady Murray became pregnant, and returned to England. His royal highneſs did the ſame: and, at the inſtance of the lady and her friends, a ſecond marriage took place.—The parties were regularly aſked in the church of St. George's, Hanover-ſquare, and on the 5th of December, 1793, they were again united, according to the ceremonies of the church of England, under the names of Auguſtus Frederick and Auguſta Murray.—The circumſtances having come to the king's knowledge, his majeſty inſtituted a ſuit of nullity in his own name, in the Arches Court of Canterbury, to ſet aſide the validity of this marriage, on the ground of an act of parliament paſſed early in the reign of his preſent majeſty, for the prevention of the marriage of any male branch of the royal family, without the previous conſent of parliament.—On the 8th of February, 1794, Mr. Heſeltine, the king's proctor, ſerved a citation on lady Murray, to anſwer the charges of the ſuit. The privy-council were occupied, for two days, in the inveſtigation of the circumſtances attending the marriage of his royal highneſs prince Auguſtus Frederick and lady Auguſta Murray. The perſons who were examined on this buſineſs, were, lady Dunmore, lady E. Murray, a coal-merchant and his wife, who live in South Molton-ſtreet, where the lodgings were taken, to complete the reſidence of one month in the pariſh of St. George's Hanover-ſquare; the clergyman who married the parties; and a gentleman at Twickenham. It was afterwards finally determined in the Arches Court, Doctors Commons; when ſir William Wynne delivered the judgment of the court, that the ſaid marriage was utterly null and void; and alſo declared that a former marriage pretended to have been at Rome, was alſo, by the law of this country, invalid and illegal.

In the month of May, ſeveral perſons apprehended on a ſuſpicion of high treaſon, were examined before the privy-council, ſix of whom were committed to the Tower; namely, John Horne Tooke, eſq. the Rev. Mr. Joyce, ſecretary to earl Stanhope; Mr. Thelwall, a political lecturer; and Meſſrs. Bonney, Richter, and Lovett. Mr. Adams, ſecretary of the conſtitutional Society; Mr. Hardy, ſecretary of the London Correſponding Society; and Mr. Saints, ſecretary to a ſociety at Norwich, were kept in cuſtody of the meſſengers.

On the 6th of June, at night, a fire broke out in a room adjoining the laundry at Oatlands, the ſeat of the duke of York, which burnt with great fury for nearly an hour and a half, when it communicated to the grand armoury, where arms to the amount of upwards of 2000l. were deſtroyed, and had it not been for the activity of the neighbouring inhabitants, the whole of the houſe had been levelled to the ground. The whole damage was eſtimated at about 3000l. The ducheſs was at Oatlands at the time, and beheld the dreadful conflagration from her ſleeping apartment, which is ſituated in the centre of the manſion, and from which the flames were prevented communicating by inſtantly hewing down a gateway, over which the wing joined to the houſe. Her royal highneſs diſplayed the utmoſt fortitude on the occaſion, and gave her orders with the moſt perfect compoſure. His majeſty viſited her highneſs early on Saturday morning, and gave the neceſſary orders for clearing the ruins, and rebuilding that wing of the houſe which had been deſtroyed.

This month, a ſubſcription was opened at Lloyd's and ſeveral other places, both in the metropolis, and its environs, for the widows and children of the brave men who fell in lord Howe's engagement. The receipts on this occaſion were ample proofs of Engliſh gratitude and benevolence.

June the 25th, the following was given out, in public orders, to the fleet at Spithead:

"PUBLIC ORDERS.

"Queen Charlotte, at Spithead, June 20.

"The commander in chief is directed, purſuant to the king's pleaſure, to make known in the fleet, that his majeſty has deigned to expreſs the higheſt ſatisfaction in the account, reported by the admiral, of the bravery and gallant behaviour of the officers and men ſerving in the fleet, in the actions with the enemy on the 28th and 29th of May, and 1ſt of the preſent month; and is charged, in the manner judged moſt proper, to acquaint all the officers and men (more eſpecially the admirals Graves and ſir Alexander Hood, K. B. the rear-admirals Bowyer, Caldwell, Gardner, and Paſley; and ſir Roger Curtis, firſt captain to the commander in chief) with the juſt ſenſe his majeſty entertains of the zeal and courage they have ſo eminently exerted in his ſervice on thoſe occaſions.

"The commander in chief has alſo been required by the lords ſpiritual and temporal, and by the honourable the commons of Great Britain, in parliament aſſembled, to convey the thanks of their reſpective houſes to the flag officers already named as above; and to the captains and other officers of the fleet, for their bravery and gallant conduct; with their approval and acknowledgment of the ſervices of the ſeamen, marines, and ſoldiers, ſerving in the ſaid fleet, in the ſeveral actions with the enemy as aforeſaid.

"The commander in chief, with the higheſt ſenſe of pleaſure, communicates in this manner, ſuch approval and acknowledgment as above ſtated, to the ſaid officers and ſhips companies; and deſires, in conſequence, that the captains of the different ſhips will ſignify the ſame to their reſpective officers and crews accordingly.

"He is, moreover, to make known at this time, that in a court of common council, holden in the chamber of the Guildhall of the city of London, the 18th inſtant; on conſideration (as it is expreſſed) of the very gallant conduct of the ſeamen, &c. who ſerved on board the fleet in the ſaid actions, and in token of the gratitude of the ſaid court of common council, the chamberlain of the city is directed to pay into the hands of Mr. Thomas Tayler, the maſter of Lloyd's coffee-houſe, the ſum of five hundred pounds, for the relief of the wounded warrant officers, petty officers, ſeamen, &c. and alſo the widows and children of thoſe who ſo glorioully fell on the days before mentioned, in the ſervice of their king and country.

"It is likewiſe to be noticed, that a very conſiderable ſum of money had been previouſly ſubſcribed (and ſtill increaſing in amount) by many reſpectable and generous private gentlemen, making their depoſits with Mr. Tayler, for the like purpoſes; conſonant to the tenour of which, the ſeveral captains of the fleet have been deſired to tranſmit to the ſaid Mr. Tayler, the names of the killed and wounded ſeamen, marines, and ſoldiers, with adequate deſcriptions of the perſons entitled to ſuch relief, with all convenient diſpatch."

On the 26th, their majeſties and three of the princeſſes arrived at Portſmouth, about ten in the morning, ing, the three younger princeſſes being come down the preceding day. The royal party then proceeded in barges, in the cuſtomary proceſſion, and receiving the cuſtomary honours, to viſit lord Howe's ſhip, the Queen Charlotte, at Spithead.—Here his majeſty held a naval levee, and preſented lord Howe with a diamond hilt ſword, valued at 3000 guineas, and a gold chain, to which a medal is to be ſuſpended, to be worn round the neck. After which, the royal party dined with lord Howe on board the ſhip.

During their majeſty's ſtay at Portſmouth, there were great illuminations, and other rejoicings.—Before the king left Portſmouth, he ordered one week's pay to the artificers in the dockyard, and one month's to earl Howe's fleet.

This month, a dreadful fire broke out at Mr. Clove's, boat-builder, at Cock-Hill, Ratcliffe.—It was occaſioned by the boiling over of a pitch kettle that ſtood under his warehouſe, which was ſpeedily conſumed. It then communicated to a barge, lying adjoining to the premiſes, and laden with ſaltpetre and other ſtores. Several other veſſels and ſmall craft, lying near the barge, ſoon took fire, without any poſſibility of getting them off. The blowing up of the ſaltpetre from the barge occaſioned large flakes of fire to fall on the warehouſes of the Eaſt India Company, which took fire. Soon after, the ſaltpetre, which they alſo contained, blew up, with different exploſions, like the rolling, as it were, of ſubterranean thunder. The wind blowing ſtrong from the S. W. and the high-ſtreet of Ratcliffe being narrow, both ſides of it caught fire, which prevented the engines from being of any ſervice. Add to this, it was low water, ſo that no ſupply of water could be procured for many hours. In the courſe of the evening, the fire extended to the premiſes of Mr. Joſeph Hankes, timber merchant, in London-ſtreet, where it raged very furiouſly, and communicated to Butcher-row, the whole of the weſt and part of the eaſt ſide of which were conſumed. The fire had alſo taken its courſe up Brook-ſtreet, caught the premiſes of Mr. Shakſpeare, rope-maker, and burnt through to the fields on the one ſide, and the whole of the dwellings on the other; till at length, it ceaſed, for want of materials to conſume, having reached an open ſpace of ground, where the connection of combuſtible ſubſtance was broken; but, toward Limehouſe, it continued to rage till about ten in the evening. What is very remarkable, the dwelling-houſe of Mr. Bere, a large inſulated building, ſtood uninjured amid the vaſt ſurrounding ruins, that were burning almoſt incredibly near it; and yet not even a ſingle pane of glaſs in it was cracked. Mr. Bere was in the houſe the whole time.

A ſurvey was taken the next day, by the warden and other officers of the hamlet of Ratcliffe, whoſe report was, that out of 1200 houſes of which the hamlet conſiſted, not more than 570 were ſaved.

On account of the great diſtreſs in which this fire involved numbers of poor families, government lent 140 tents, which were pitched in a field adjoining Stepney church-yard, and accommodated the unfortunate ſufferers till they could be more comfortably provided for.—More houſes have been deſtroyed by this fire than by any one ſince the memorable conflagration of 1666.—A ſubſcription was opened at Lloyd's coffee-houſe, for the benefit of the ſufferers, which met with great ſucceſs; and collections were made at the gate of the camp, and at all the avenues leading to the extenſive ruins.

Early in the morning of the 17th of Auguſt, a fire broke out at Aſtley's Royal Saloon, on the Surry ſide of Weſtminſter-bridge. This was ſoon totally deſtroyed, with ſeveral houſes in front of the Weſtminſter road; and alſo the Pheaſant public houſe, and ſome dwellings in Stangate-ſtreet. All Mr. Aſtley's horſes were ſaved; but the whole of the ſcenery, wardrobe, &c. was conſumed.

An unfortunate affair now happened, which was on the point of creating much diſturbance. One George Howe having thrown himſelf out of a three pair of ſtairs window, in Johnſon's Court, Charing-Croſs, was killed on the ſpot. The coroner's inqueſt was taken on his body, at the Barn public houſe, St. Martin's Lane, when the jury returned their verdict, "Accidental death in endeavouring to eſcape from illegal confinement in a houſe of ill fame." On account of this accident, a very numerous populace aſſembled in the evening. The next day they demoliſhed the whole inſide of the houſe, and broke the windows of two other houſes. They were increaſing afterwards, but were kept under by the horſe and foot guards. The populace were exceedingly riotous the enſuing week at Charing-croſs, which occaſioned the picquet guard to be called. The gunſmith, the corner of Angel court, firing once or twice on the inſurgents, they broke his windows before the military arrived, and afterward pelted and maltreated the ſoldiers, who forbore extremities, and diſperſed them with little miſchief.

Diſturbances however became ſo frequent, that the lord mayor cauſed to be circulated and poſted throughout the city a printed requeſt, that every houſe-keeper would uſe his utmoſt to prevent any child or ſervant from appearing in the ſtreet at night, ſetting forth the conſequences that might enſue. An abridgement of the riot act, and of the proclamation therein, were alſo printed and poſted in various parts. An extraordinary number of conſtables were appointed to watch in every part of the town. The gentlemen of the aſſociation paraded all night, as a corps of obſervation; and a great number of guards were kept at the manſion-houſe, to march at the ſhorteſt notice.

Notwithſtanding all this precaution, on the 20th of Auguſt, at two o'clock, P. M. information was brought to the Manſion-houſe, that a riot was beginning in Shoe-lane, whereupon orders were given to all the conſtables to be immediately on duty, to keep the peace of the city; and while they were aſſembling, the two city marſhals proceeded to Shoe-lane, where they found the mob actually breaking into a houſe in Stonecutter-ſtreet, which backs on No. 22, Shoe-lane, which was a houſe of rendezvous. With difficulty the city marſhals turned out thoſe who had entered the houſe, but for want of force could ſecure none of them. At three o'clock, the lord-mayor came on the ſpot with a party of conſtables, and endeavours were made, without effect, to clear the ſtreet, and completely to diſperſe the people. At this time, the mob were no otherwiſe miſchievous than in refuſing to depart, and in ſaluting the chief magiſtrate and peace officers at every effort they made, with hiſſing, hooting, and hallooing.—The lord-mayor, having learnt that other places were threatened, returned to the manſion-houſe, at five o'clock, and inſtantly ſent to the artillery company and to the light horſe volunteers, to deſire that they would aſſemble under arms as ſoon as poſſible, and join him in Shoe-lane. Learning ſoon after that the mob had increaſed, and fearing there was no time to loſe, he ſent to the Tower to requeſt the aid of a detachment of his majeſty's guards, and returned at ſix o'clock to Shoe-lane, where the mob had aſſembled in great numbers; and although there were 100 conſtables preſent, who were very zealouſly aided by the common council and principal inhabitants of the ward, yet it was found, after repeated efforts were made, that it was impoſſible to quell the riot.

Some time after ſeven o'clock, the lord-mayor hearing that the guards were at hand, read the riot act in three different places, in doing which he was ſaluted from ſome of the houſes, and from the mob, with hooting and hiſſing. The detachment of his majeſty's Coldſtream regiment of guards, under the conduct of captain Brice and enſign Lloyd being arrived, they cleared the place, and the avenues leading to it, of the mob, with little difficulty, and without doing the leaſt injury to any one. Soon after the artillery company arrived under the command of ſir Watkin Lewes, their colonel, and were deſired by the lord-mayor to proceed immediately to the manſion-houſe, and to bend their attention toward the eaſtern part of the city.

About eight o'clock, information was brought, that a powerful mob was demoliſhing a houſe in Holborn, nearly oppoſite to Fetter-lane, upon which the lord-mayor proceeded thither, with capt. Brice, and a part of the detachment, being preceded by Mr. Hollier, the city marſhal, with ſome conſtables, who found the rioters in the very act of forcing the door and windows of the houſe. Mr. Hollier ſeized two of them; but being violently aſſaulted from behind, was obliged to let one go, and with great difficulty ſecured the other till the military came up. The mob here was very numerous and daring, ſome of them throwing ſtones, &c. at the peace officers and military. The lord-mayor read the riot act, and with ſome difficulty, though without the leaſt hurt to any one, the guards drove the mob back, and peace was in time reſtored here.

About nine o'clock word was brought, that the mob was in Bride-lane, attempting to demoliſh a houſe there. From the number and turbulent temper of the people in Holborn, it was not poſſible for ſome time to quit that ſituation; but as ſoon as there was an appearance of quiet there, the lord-mayor, with the city marſhal, moved toward Bride-lane, attended by Captain Brice, and a diviſion of the guards, leaving parties in Holborn and Shoe-lane. In Fleet-ſtreet, they were met by Adjutant Dunlop and a diviſion of the light horſe volunteers, who were ordered to go to Holborn. The crowd in Fleet-ſtreet was immenſe. On coming to Bride-lane, the lord-mayor heard that the rioters, after deſtroying the houſe there, were gone to Long-lane; he followed, and in his way meeting with Captain Herries, and another diviſion of the light horſe volunteers, deſired they would attend him, which they did. On coming into Long-lane, they found that the mob had gutted the houſe, and were with great celerity gone to another in Golden-lane, which being underſtood to be out of the city, the lord-mayor was obliged to deſiſt from the purſuit, and to return with Captain Brice, and his diviſion, to the reſt of the detachment in Shoe-lane, leaving Captain Herries to purſue the rioters, which he did with equal gallantry and ſucceſs; for though they were gone from Shoe-lane, when he reached the place, he ſet off with his diviſion at a ſmart trot, and overtook them in Moorfields, in the act of demoliſhing the Saſh public-houſe, in the ſight of a number of the county conſtables. Here the mob attacked the light horſe volunteers with brick-bats, &c. notwithſtanding which Captain Herries forced his way to the houſe, in doing which he received three violent blows from brick-bats or ſtones, and cauſed his two center files to alight and enter the houſe, where they ſeized five rioters, who were by the diviſion conveyed to, and ſafely lodged in, the Shoreditch watch-houſe.

Having done this ſervice, Captain Herries returned to Moorfields after the rioters, but found they were gone, and it was ſaid toward St. Mary Axe; to which place Captain Herries immediately proceeded on a full gallop, and got there before any mob arrived. After having ſo done, and examined the ſtreets in that part of the city, finding every thing was quiet, he went to the lord-mayor, and continued with the light horſe volunteers to patrole the city until they were diſmiſſed at two o'clock in the morning.

When the lord-mayor returned to Shoe-lane, he received advice that the mob intended to come from Moorfields to demoliſh the Ship in Whitecroſs-ſtreet; upon which he ſent to the manſion-houſe to deſire the artillery company would proceed thither, under the command of Sir Watkin Lewes, reſerving the guards to proceed with them to that or any other part of the city, when it could be aſcertained where the mob was gone to. Sir Watkin Lewes accordingly marched with the artillery company to Whitecroſs-ſtreet, and arrived in the critical minute, the mob being then actually proceeding thither from Moorfields, but were effectually prevented by Sir Watkin from doing any miſchief in that part of the city; and finding themſelves likely to be attacked, the rioters retired, and the city was quiet the reſt of the night.

The next day the metropolis, and particularly the city, rung with reports of what the rioters meant to do; liſts of places were handed about, of houſes and public buildings marked out to be demoliſhed, and of perſons deſtined to be murdered; the whole of which had evidently no other object than that of harraſſing, perplexing and terrifying the magiſtrates and peaceable inhabitants. As, however, real attacks were made upon the conſtables ſtationed in Bride-lane and Shoe-lane, the lord-mayor thought it his duty to ſend to the Tower for aſſiſtance; and at two he received a party, commanded by Captain Boulton, who in ſome hours after was followed by another party under the command of Captain Brice, whoſe gallantry and humanity had on the preceding evening appeared ſo conſpicuous. The light horſe volunteers were on duty by three, and the artillery company by five. Multitudes of idle and diſorderly perſons were in the ſtreets, but all ſeemed quiet until about ten that night, when advice came, that the conſtables in Shoe-lane were hard preſſed by a mob with bludgeons and ſtones; upon which part of the artillery company marched thither, and part of the guards took poſt in front of the manſion-houſe, and the reſt of the guards and artillery company remained under arms ready to march on the ſhorteſt notice. The artillery company got to Shoe-lane juſt as the mob had overpowered the conſtables, and perfectly ſecured the place, being aſſiſted by Adjutant Dunlop and a diviſion of the light horſe volunteers, who were, in ſo doing, very much inſulted by a mob in Fleet-ſtreet. The rioters finding the city too well guarded for their purpoſe, flew into the county, and demoliſhed a houſe in Gray's Inn-lane. No other rioting or miſchief was attempted to be done in the city that night.

The next day good hopes were entertained that the rioters would diſcontinue their outrages, and accordingly no military force was aſked for before it became duſk, when a ſmall detachment, under the command of Captain Fuller, came to the manſion-houſe, and were followed by the artillery company. The light horſe volunteers were alſo on duty.

The only riot or alarm that took place any where that night was toward Clerkenwell, to which the light horſe volunteers, on a requiſition from the magiſtrates, marched with great alacrity, but found the danger was over; the rioters, however, attempted to demoliſh a houſe at Battle-bridge, but were diſturbed in the act by the peace officers, who with ſome difficulty ſecured one of them, and diſperſed the reſt.

There being no appearance of further riots, the lord-mayor had the pleaſure to inform his grace the duke of Portland, ſecretary of ſtate for the home department, that he thought the city was perfectly reſtored to good order, and therefore declined the further aid of any military force.

On the 3d of September, came on before the court of oyer and terminer in Edinburgh, the trial of Mr. Robert Watt for high treaſon. The particulars of the charge were, that he belonged to certain committees of the Friends of the People in Scotland, called the committee of union, and the committee of ways and means, whoſe profeſſed aim was, with certain ſocieties in England, to form, at a certain time and place not ſpecified, a convention of perſons, whoſe avowed aim was to uſurp the powers of government, to compel the king and parliament by force to make laws altering the mode and duration of parliament, and thereby to ſubvert the conſtitution; with having, to effect this purpoſe, cauſed certain pikes and battle-axes to be fabricated; with having formed a deſign to ſeize the caſtle, the bank, the judges, &c. and with having attempted to ſeduce the ſoldiery from their allegiance, by cauſing a number of printed hand-bills, addreſſed to a regiment of fencibles, to be diſtributed at Dalkeith. After evidence had been adduced in ſupport of the facts, Mr. William Erſkine, counſel for the priſoner, ſaid, that he would reſt his defence upon the correſpondence carried on between the Right Hon. Henry Dundas, the lord advocate, and the priſoner, by which it would appear that he had attended the meetings of the friends of the people with no other view than to give information of their proceedings. A letter from the priſoner to Mr. Secretary Dundas was read, which ſtated that, as he did not approve of the dangerous principles which then prevailed in Scotland, and was a friend to the conſtitution, he thought it his duty to communicate to him, as a good ſubject, what information he could procure of the proceedings of thoſe who ſtyled themſelves friends of the people. From an acquaintance with ſeveral of the leading men among them, he flattered himſelf he had this in his power; and he then went on to mention ſome of the names of thoſe leading men in Perth, Dundee, and Edinburgh. It concluded with enjoining ſecreſy. To this letter an anſwer was returned, which was alſo read. It acknowledged the receipt of Watt's letter, and, after expreſſing a hope that things were not ſo bad as he had repreſented, deſired him to go on, and he might depend upon his communications being kept perfectly ſecret. Another letter from Mr. Dundas to Mr. M'Ritchie, the priſoner's agent, was next read, in anſwer to one from Mr. M'Ritchie, requeſting of Mr. Dundas, what letters he had of the priſoner's. The anſwer was, that all the letters he had received from Mr. Watt had been delivered to the lord advocate.—The lord advocate then gave an account of this buſineſs: He had converſed with the priſoner, ſeveral times, at his own lodgings; and he had at one time given him ſome information which he thought of importance. This was reſpecting the diſaffection of ſome dragoons of Perth, which, upon inquiry, turned out to be ill-founded. In March 1793, an offer had been made to him to diſcloſe ſome important ſecrets, provided he would give the priſoner one thouſand pounds. This he abſolutely refuſed. However, ſome time after, the priſoner having informed him that he was much preſſed for money to diſcharge a bill of 30l. his lordſhip, who was then in London, not wiſhing he ſhould be diſtreſſed for ſuch a ſmall ſum, ſent an order for the payment of it. All this happened previouſly to the meeting of the convention; ſince which time, at leaſt ſince October laſt, he did not recollect ſeeing or having any connection with Mr. Watt.

Mr. Hamilton, counſel for the priſoner, dwelt long on the correſpondence between Mr. Dundas and Mr. Watt. He ſaid the priſoner had not deſerted the ſervice in which he had engaged; but had not an opportunity of exerciſing it till the very time he was apprehended. He was a ſpy for government; and it was well known, that a ſpy was obliged to aſſume not only the appearance of thoſe whoſe ſecrets he meant to reveal, but even to take part in their proceedings, in order to prevent a diſcovery. A ſpy in an army, he ſaid, was obliged, not only to aſſume the uniform of the enemy, but even to appear in arms; and it would be exceedingly hard indeed, if taken in a conflict, that he ſhould be puniſhed for diſcharging his duty.

After the lord preſident had ſummed up the evidence, the jury retired, at half paſt five in the morning, and, in about five minutes, returned with a verdict—Guilty.

David Downie, on the ſame charge, and nearly the ſame evidence, was likewiſe found guilty; but recommended by the jury to mercy. Watt was executed, but Downie's ſentence changed to tranſportation.

On the 28th of September, in conſequence of a warrant iſſued by the duke of Portland, John Peirce La Maitre, and William Higgins, were apprehended, on a charge of having concerted a plan to aſſaſſinate our moſt gracious ſovereign. Theſe perſons as well as ſome others, were after ſeveral ſubſequent examinations committed for trial, but we are happy to ſay, the charges were found erroneous.

On the 25th of October, Thomas Hardy, John Horne Tooke, Thomas Auguſtus Bonney, Steward, Kydd, Jeremiah Joyce, Thomas Wardle, Thomas Holcroft, John Thelwall, John Richter, and John Baxter, were put to the bar of the Seſſions Houſe, in order to be arraigned for high treaſon, purſuant to the bills found by the grand jury againſt them.—They ſeverally pleaded—Not guilty; and Mr. Tooke, and others, having alledged, that by their ſudden removal from the Tower, they had loſt the opportunity of a day, in conſulting with their counſel, and otherwiſe preparing for their defence, the trials were poſtponed to Tueſday the 28th. The priſoners, moreover, having requeſted to be tried ſeparately, it was ſettled that the trial of Mr. Hardy ſhould be the firſt, and the others to follow as they are named in the indictment. However only the three former, and Mr. Thelwall, had a trial, and were honourably acquitted—of courſe the reſt were acquitted too.

On the 19th of November, a proclamation was iſſued to prorogue the parliament, which was ſummoned to meet on the 25th inſt. to the 30th day of December; which was in the evening forwarded to the members of parliament abſent in the country; in order that they might receive the earlieſt information of it.

Accordingly on the day appointed, his majeſty went to the houſe of lords, and delivered the following ſpeech to both houſes of parliament.

"My lords, and gentlemen,

"After the uniform experience which I have had of your zealous regard for the intereſts of my people, it is a great ſatisfaction to me, to recur to your advice and aſſiſtance at a period which calls for the full exertion of your energy and wiſdom.

"Notwithſtanding the diſappointments and reverſes which we have experienced in the courſe of the laſt campaign, I retain a firm conviction of the neceſſity of perſiſting in a vigorous proſecution of the juſt and neceſſary war in which we are engaged.

"You will, I am confident, agree with me, that it is only from firmneſs and perſeverance, that we can hope for the reſtoration of peace on ſafe and honourable grounds, and for the preſervation and permanent ſecurity of our deareſt intereſts.

"In conſidering the ſituation of our enemies, you will not fail to obſerve, that the efforts which have led to their ſucceſſes, and the unexampled means by which alone thoſe efforts could have been ſupported, have produced among themſelves the pernicious effects which were to be expected; and that every thing which has paſſed in the interior of the country, has ſhewn the progreſſive and rapid decay of their reſources, and the inſtability of every part of that violent and unnatural ſyſtem, which is equally ruinous to France and incompatible with the tranquillity of other nations.

“ The ſtates-general of the United Provinces have nevertheleſs been led, by a ſenſe of preſent difficulties, to enter into negociations for peace with the party now prevailing in that unhappy country. No eſtabliſhed government or independent ſtate can, under the preſent circumſtances, derive real ſecurity from ſuch negociations: on our part, they could not be attempted, without ſacrificing both our honour and ſafety to an enemy whoſe chief animoſity is avowedly directed againſt theſe kingdoms.

“ I have therefore continued to uſe the moſt effectual means for the further augmentation of my forces: and I ſhall omit no opportunity of concerting the operations of the next campaign with ſuch of the powers of Europe as are impreſſed with the ſame ſenſe of the neceſſity of vigour and exertion. I place the fulleſt reliance on the valour of my forces, and on the affection and public ſpirit of my people, in whoſe behalf I am contending, and whoſe ſafety and happineſs are the objects of my conſtant ſolicitude.

“ The local importance of Corſica, and the ſpirited efforts of its inhabitants to deliver themſelves from the yoke of France, determined me not to with-hold the protection which they ſought for; and I have ſince accepted the crown and ſovereignty of that country, according to an inſtrument, a copy of which I have directed to be laid before you.

“ I have great pleaſure in informing you, that I have concluded a treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, with the United States of America, in which it has been my object to remove, as far as poſſible, all grounds of jealouſy and miſunderſtanding, and to improve an intercourſe beneficial to both countries. As ſoon as the ratifications ſhall have been exchanged, I will direct a copy of this treaty to be laid before you, in order that you may conſider of the propriety of making ſuch proviſions as may appear neceſſary for carrying it into effect.

“ I have the greateſt ſatisfaction in announcing to you the happy event of the concluſion of a treaty for the marriage of my ſon the prince of Wales with the Princeſs Caroline, daughter of the duke of Brunſwick: the conſtant proofs of your affection for my perſon and family perſuade me, that you will participate in the ſentiments I feel on an occaſion ſo intereſting to my domeſtic happineſs, and that you will enable me to make proviſion for ſuch an eſtabliſhment, as you may think ſuitable to the rank and dignity of the heir apparent to the crown of theſe kingdoms.

“ Gentlemen of the Houſe of Commons,

“ The conſiderations which prove the neceſſity of a vigorous proſecution of the war will, I doubt not, induce you to make a timely and ample proviſion for the ſeveral branches of the public ſervice, the eſtimates for which I have directed to be laid before you. While I regret the neceſſity of large additional burdens on my ſubjects, it is a juſt conſolation and ſatisfaction to me to obſerve the ſtate of our credit, commerce and reſources, which is the natural reſult of the continued exertions of induſtry under the protection of a free and well regulated government.

“ My Lords, and Gentlemen,

“ A juſt ſenſe of the bleſſings now ſo long enjoyed by this country will, I am perſuaded, encourage you to make every effort, which can enable you to tranſmit thoſe bleſſing unimpaired to your poſterity.

“ I entertain a confident hope that, under the protection of providence, and with conſtancy and perſeverance on our part, the principles of ſocial order, morality, and religion, will be ultimately ſucceſsful, and that my faithful people will find their preſent exertions and ſacrifices rewarded by the ſecure and permanent enjoyment of tranquillity at home, and by the deliverance of Europe from the greateſt danger with which it has been threatened ſince the eſtabliſhment of civilized ſociety.”

The cuſtomary addreſs was moved by Earl Camden; the queſtion being put there appeared—contents 107—non contents 13—majority 94.

In the Houſe of Commons the addreſs was moved by Sir Edward Knatchbull, and ſeconded by Mr. Canning. Mr. Wilberforce moved an amendment: “ To aſſure his majeſty, that we his faithful commons, are determined on granting to his majeſty liberal ſupplies, in order to enable his majeſty to act with vigour and effect, to ſupport his crown and dignity, and for the purpoſe of keeping good faith with his majeſty's allies, for which this country has ever been diſtinguiſhed, and notwithſtanding the diſappointments of the laſt campaign, they are convinced from the zeal of the people, who are ſenſible of the advantages they enjoy under the conſtitution of the country, and his majeſty's good government, that they may promiſe themſelves complete ſecurity, againſt foreign and domeſtic enemies. But on a full conſideration of the events of the war, and in conſequence of ſome tranſactions that have lately happened in France, and between the French and the States General, they think it is adviſeable that his majeſty ſhould order a negociation on ſuch terms, as to his majeſty's wiſdom and goodneſs ſhall ſeem juſt and reaſonable. But if, contrary to the wiſhes of his commons, that ſhould be declined by his majeſty's enemies, they are perſuaded the burdens of the war will be borne with cheerfulneſs, by an affectionate and loyal people.”

This amendment was ſeconded by Mr. Duncombe.

After ſome debate the houſe divided, when there appeared—for the amendment 73—againſt it 246. the original motion was then put, and carried.

We have already remarked, that the priſoners who were committed for trial on a charge of high treaſon were honourably acquitted. The firſt, however, being a trial which laſted nine days (a circumſtance unexampled in the hiſtory of the criminal law of England) it will be naturally expected that we ſhould record the moſt important incidents thereof; which we ſhall therefore do as briefly as poſſible, though the proceedings are ſo voluminous that, properly publiſhed, it is declared they would make 1600 cloſely printed pages in octavo.

Mr. Hardy's trial was on Tueſday, Oct. 28th, at the Old Bailey, before Lord Preſident Eyre, and the other judges under the ſpecial commiſſion, on a charge of high treaſon. The names of the jury were as follows:

Thomas Buck, Eſq. Back-lane, Acton.
Thomas Wood, Eſq. Coal-merchant, Ealing.
William Fraſer, Eſq. Queen's-ſquare, Bloomſbury.
Adam Steinmitz, Eſq. Biſcuit-baker, Limehouſe.
Newell Conner, Eſq. Diſtiller, Shadwell.
John Marſhall, Eſq. Brewer, Shoreditch.
Thomas Sayer, Eſq. Diſtiller, Bow.
Richard Carter, Eſq. Paddington-ſtreet.
Nathaniel Stonard, Eſq. Brewer, Bromley.
Joſeph Nicol, Eſq. Farmer, Willſdon.
John Charrington, Eſq.
Joſeph Ainſley, Eſq. Coal-merchant, St. George's in the Eaſt.

Mr. Wood opened the pleadings. He ſtated, that this was an indictment which had been preferred againſt Thomas Hardy, the priſoner at the bar, for maliciouſly and traitorouſly conſpiring, with John Horne Tooke, &c. to ſtir, move, and excite inſurrection, rebellion, and war againſt our ſovereign lord the king, within this kingdom, and to ſubvert and alter the legiſlature, rule, and government, now duly and happily eſtabliſhed in this kingdom; and to bring and put our ſaid lord the king to death.

The firſt overt act to perfect and bring to effect their moſt evil and wicked treaſon, which he ſtated, was their procuring a convention and meeting of divers ſubjects of our ſaid lord the king to be aſſembled and held within this kingdom, with intent and in order that the perſons to be aſſembled at ſuch convention and meeting ſhould and might, wickedly and traitorouſly, and againſt the will of the parliament of this kingdom, ſubvert and alter, and cauſe to be ſubverted and altered, the legiſlature, rule, and government, now duly and happily eſtabliſhed in this kingdom; and depoſe, and cauſe to be depoſed, our ſaid lord the king, from the royal ſtate, title, power, and government thereof. Mr. Wood alſo ſtated eight other overt acts of this ſpecies of high treaſon.

When Mr. Wood had finiſhed, ſir John Scott, the attorney general, in a ſpeech of nine hours, went into a very full and minute detail of the ſubject of theſe proſecutions for high treaſon.—The counſel for the proſecution then proceeded to produce their evidence, which conſiſted of papers that had been found in the cuſtody of different perſons, and ſeized, under the warrant of the privy council.

Previous to the court's breaking up, about 12 o'clock, a converſation of ſome length enſued, reſpecting the gentlemen of the jury, who wiſhed to be diſcharged on their honour; to which Mr. Erſkine on behalf of the priſoner conſented, but the court were of opinion, that the law would by no means permit the jury to ſeparate after having been once impannelled. The gentlemen of the jury were therefore conſigned to the care of the ſheriffs, by whom certain preparations for their accommodation in the ſeſſions-houſe had been previouſly made. And, the next day, the jury having complained, that their accommodations in the ſeſſions-houſe were uncomfortable, and utterly incapable of affording them the neceſſary reſt, they were provided that evening, and all the ſubſequent evenings of the trial, with beds at the Hummums in Covent-garden.

The 29th, 30th, and 31ſt of October were employed in the production of evidence for the crown, both documentary and oral; which latter took up great part of the morning of Nov. 1. This being finiſhed, Mr. Erſkine, in behalf of the priſoner, addreſſed the jury for the ſpace of ſix hours. The remainder of the day was occupied in the examination of the witneſſes for the priſoner; many of whom gave him an excellent character, ſtating, moreover, that he was a quiet inoffenſive man; and that his object, in connecting himſelf with theſe ſocieties, was merely to procure a parliamentary reform, by all peaceable and lawful means, and, on no account whatever by a ſubverſion of the conſtitution. The court adjourned, at half paſt twelve on Sunday morning, till the Monday following, when the counſel for the priſoner proceeded with their evidence; after which Mr. Gibbs likewiſe addreſſed the court in his favour. He was followed by the ſolicitor general in reply. The next day (Nov. 4) the ſolicitor-general concluded his reply, and the lord preſident commenced the ſumming up, which he finiſhed about twelve o'clock. The jury then retired, and after having been abſent two hours and a half, returned and delivered their verdict—Not guilty. The court then adjourned to Monday the 11th of November.

The next trial being alſo remarkable for ſome peculiar events is worthy notice.

The trial of John Horne Tooke, Eſq. on the ſame charge of high treaſon, came on (Nov. 17.) The names of the jury were as follow:

James Haygarth, Eſq. Southampton-place, New-road, Foreman.
Thomas Harriſon, Gray's-inn-lane, Cow-keeper.
Edward Hale, Highgate, Gent.
Thomas Draine, Limehouſe, Brewer.
Edward Whiting, Stepney-cauſeway, Sugar-refiner.
Norriſon Coverdale, Limehouſe, Rope-maker.
Robert Mairis, Holborn, Gent.
John Cook, Eſq. Great Ormond-ſtreet.
Charles Pratt, Tottenham, Miller.
Matthias Dupont, Enfield, Gent.
William Harwood, Hanwell.
Henry Bullock, Whitechapel, Brewer.

Mr. Tooke, at his requeſt, on account of indiſpoſition, was indulged by the court with ſitting at the table, near his counſel.

Mr. Percival having opened the proceedings, the ſolicitor-general went on to ſtate the caſe, in the ſame manner as had been done by the attorney-general, on the trial of Mr. Hardy. The evidence for the crown was then produced, the examination of which took up till the third day of the trial, Nov. 19.—On that day Mr. Erſkine addreſſed the jury in favour of the priſoner. The fourth day, the witneſſes for the priſoner were called. Theſe chiefly conſiſted of gentlemen who had been engaged in former attempts to procure a parliamentary reform, and ſome of whom had actually attended as delegates from certain diſtricts. They were, as ſucceſſively examined — Major Cartwright, Mr. Fox, Mr. Francis, the duke of Richmond, Mr. Pitt, Mr. Sheridan, Earl Stanhope, the Rev. Mr. Wyvill, Col. Macnamara, Counſellor Fielding, Lord Frederic Campbell, Lord Derby, Mr. Beaufoy, Mr. Simmons, Col. Money, Mr. Maxwell, Capt. Harwood, Counſellor Rous, and the biſhop of Glouceſter. The principal part of this evidence went to prove that Mr. Tooke was a zealous friend to the monarchical and ariſtocratical, as well as the democratical part of our conſtitution; that he was a friend to parliamentary reform on the moderate plan of Mr. Pitt; namely, by a gradual extinction of the rotten boroughs as they could be purchaſed, and adding to the county members; and that he was an enemy to the plan of annual parliaments, and univerſal ſuffrage, which had been firſt ſuggeſted by the duke of Richmond and afterwards adopted by the Britiſh convention at Edinburgh, and by other ſocieties in England.

On Friday, Nov. 20, (the fifth day) Mr. Gibbs alſo ſpoke for the priſoner; the attorney-general replied; and the lord preſident commenced the ſumming up. This his lordſhip renewed the next day, and finiſhed about eight in the evening, when the jury retired, and, in ſeven minutes and a half, returned their verdict—Not Guilty.

The reſt, as already obſerved, were afterwards acquitted.

Having brought the HISTORY of ENGLAND down to this period, we ſhall agreeable to our propoſals, (in order to render this work the moſt complete of the kind) introduce the HISTORY of SCOTLAND, (from its origin to its union with England) after which ſhall alſo be given, the HISTORY of IRELAND, (from its origin to the preſent time); that being completed we ſhall reſume our Hiſtory of England, which ſhall be continued with the greateſt care and preciſion, and carried down to the very lateſt criſis.

BOOK I.

From the FIRST SETTLEMENT of FERGUS, the FIRST KING of SCOTLAND, to the SECOND INTERREGNUM.

CHAP. I.

PRELIMINARY REMARKS on the ORIGIN of SCOTLAND.

AFTER the conqueſt, or rather diſcovery of the whole iſland by Julius Cæſar, Albion and Britannia were the common names given by the Romans to England and Scotland, now, ſince the the Union, called Great-Britain. Many are of opinion (but which cannot be relied on) that the name Albion, or Albium, was given to it from the white rocks which appear to mariners (on the Kentiſh coaſt) as they ſail from France. As to the name of Scots, ſome derive it from the word Scutabrigantes, which Scaliger reads, Scotobrigantes, and is found in ſome verſes of Seneca, in his ſatire on the death of Claudius. Buchanan ſays, the old Scots will not own that name, but call themſelves Britons.

Seeing that ancient traditions reſpecting the antiquity of the Scots nation, has been greatly exaggerated, and abounds with fable, as well as contradictory accounts, we deemed it unneceſſary to take any further notice of them, than barely to mention, that ſome fabulous writers, in order to give their origin a more noble appearance, have taken it from the Trojan fugitives; while others have derived it from thoſe Greek heroes whoſe poſterity conquered Troy; and a third ſort from Spaniſh emigrants, who firſt ſettled in Ireland. But the moſt probable opinion is, that they came from that part of Gaul (then called France) which is moſt contiguous to North-Britain; as the Gauls ſent colonies thither in ſearch of ſupport for their too numerous inhabitants. To this we may add, the concurrent and authentic teſtimony of Greek and Roman authors; who aſſure us, that the ancient Caledonians were originally a colony of Celts from Gaul, who had themſelves wandered thither from the Leſſer-Aſia. The place they finally ſettled in being named Cael-Doch, the country of the Celts or Gauls, the Romans, by tranſpoſing the l in Cael and changing the harſh ch of Doch into an harmonious ending, formed Caledonia; by which name the lands northward of the Friths of Forth and Clyde were anciently called. Some aſſert, that the poſterity of theſe ſettlers were ſtiled Picts, from painting their bodies with woad; but others affirm with more probability, that the latter came from Scythia, and inhabited part of Scotland. Ammianus Marcellinus ſays, the Picts, Saxons, Scots, and Attacotti, vexed Britain with perpetual injuries, by their frequent incurſions after the Roman invaſion.

At preſent Scotland is a flouriſhing country, being ſituated between 1 and 6° of weſt longitude, and 54 and 59° of north latitude. It is about 280 miles long and 160 broad; bounded on the north by the Caledonian ocean; on the eaſt by the German; by the rivers Tweed and Elk, which divide it from England, on the ſouth; and by the Atlantic and Iriſh ſea on the weſt.

We call the northern part of Scotland the Highlands, and the ſouthern the Lowlands; which are divided into the following counties: 1. The ſouthern part contains, Tiviotdale, Tweedale, March, Lauderdale, Liddeſdale, Eſkedale, Annandale, Galloway, Carrick, Kyle, Cunningham, Arran, Clydeſdale, Lenox, Stirling, Fife, Strathern, Monteith, Argyle, Cantire, and Lorne. 2. The northern part contains, Lochaber, Broadalbin, Perth, Athol, Angus, Merns, Marr, Buchan, Murray, Roſs, Sutherland, Caithneſs, and Strathnavern. Thoſe counties are again ſubdivided into ſheriffdoms, ſtewartries, and bailiwicks. The climate is temperate, the air ſeldom clear, and often darkened by thick clouds.

There are ſeveral good harbours well adapted to commerce and foreign trade; and the ſoil is very fertile in the neceſſaries of life. Copper, iron, lead, and coal, are produced in the mountains. In her foreſts, which are from twenty to thirty miles, long, there is plenty of timber: hemp and flax are alſo produced in other parts of the country, which yields a great quantity of corn; and the rivers abound with fiſh of different kinds.

Thoſe who inhabit the extremity of the iſland, where it is colder, eat bread made of oatmeal; and drink a wine, or ſtrong liquor, made of damaged corn: ſome boil whey, and keep it in a hogſhead under ground for ſome months; which is reckoned a wholeſome and pleaſant beverage.

The Highlands of Scotland are a pictureſque, but in general a melancholy country. Long tracts of mountainous deſert, covered with dark heath, and often obſcured by miſty weather; narrow vallies thinly inhabited, and bounded by precipices, reſounding with the fall of torrents; a ſoil ſo rugged, and a climate ſo dreary, as in many parts to admit neither the amuſements of paſturage, nor the labours of agriculture. The ancient Highlanders formerly ſupported themſelves by hunting, fiſhing, and war. Their pretenſions to ſecond-ſight are not ſufficiently grounded in reality to be credited by people of ſenſe.

There are many iſlands near Scotland; the chief of which are the Oreades, which lie ſcattered in the north of Scotland, partly in the Deucaledonian, and partly in the German ſea; they are computed to be thirty-three in number: thirteen inhabited: the reſt being left to feed cattle upon. Next to the Orcades are the Shetland iſlands; the greateſt of which is called the Continent or Main Land: it is ſixty miles in length, and ſixteen broad; on the eaſt ſide of which many petty iſlands ſtand.

As the old Highlanders ſtill retain a few of the ancient cuſtoms, we ſhall here give a ſlight ſketch of their more immediate progenitors.

Hiſtorians generally agree that the Caledonians were tall, well made, and moſt of them yellow haired. The ſkins of beaſts wrapt round them, was, at firſt, their only clothing; but afterwards they wore plain and party-coloured mantles, which were faſtened at top by a contrivance like the preſent breaſt-buckle: this was of either braſs or iron; which metals they greatly eſteemed, and wore in rings round their necks and bodies. The woman's mantle reached down to the ancle, the man's not ſo low; and this diſtinguiſhed the dreſs of the males and females. They fed on veniſon, milk, and the natural growth of their fields and woods; ſome ſay that they ſcrupled to eat fiſh, hares, and poultry. After they had killed their game in hunting, they dreſſed it, by making a pit, which they lined with ſtones: on theſe, properly heated, they put ſome veniſon, then a layer of ſtones over it; and ſo alternately till the pit was full, confining the ſteam with heath. At theſe feaſts, they drank out of ſhells a ſtrong liquor made of barley, which they called Curmi; and which, according to ſome, was what is now called uſquebaugh, the favourite liquor of the preſent Highlanders. They lived chiefly in the woods, in huts made of ſod, and covered with turf: ſome of the heads of clans had little ſtone caſtles built on eminences.

About ten or twelve relations or friends of the Caledonians uſed to live together, and have their wives in common; lying promiſcuouſly on one continued bed of ruſhes, fern, or leaves. The wife of a Caledonian prince being rallied, on this account, by the Empreſs Julia, and other ladies, at the court of Severus, is ſaid to have made this ſmart repartee: "We only do that openly, with the flower of our men, which you do in ſecret with the ſcum of yours." By this cuſtom, barbarous as it was, they prevented cauſeleſs jealouſies as well as real adultery; and made a more general concern for the education of their children, who were always looked upon as the iſſue of the man that originally married the mother. Agriculture and trade were but faintly proſecuted by them, if at all. Diſtant clans plundered each other; but they were hoſpitable to ſtrangers, and uſed to exchange weapons with them in token of friendſhip. Foreigners deemed them a healthy, ſtrong, and brave people. War was their chief ſtudy; hunting their exerciſe; running, leaping, wreſtling, throwing the dart, heaving large ſtones, and darting the lance (at which laſt they were particularly expert) were their accompliſhments. In battle, they uſed darts, ſpears, long ſwords, and ſmall ſhields ſtained with different colours. Their ſpears or lances, which they uſed more than other weapons, had a piece of braſs, in ſhape of an egg, fixed to the lower end of them; and, as they uſually attacked their enemies in the darkeſt nights, they ſhook theſe to terrify them with the noiſe. Like the Britons of the ſouth, they fought alſo with chariots, having ſharp pieces of iron, like ſcythes, faſtened to the axle, which, in the furious manner they drove, made a terrible havock. Veſtiges ſtill remain in many parts of Scotland, to demonſtrate that their worſhip was Druidiſm. The Caledonians appear to have worſhipped the ſun and moon, under the names of Grannius and Diana, and ſtood in great awe of their prieſts the Druids.

It is not recorded that the Caledonians were governed by any particular laws; and if there had been any, the ſword in the hands of men under no regular government would perhaps have rendered them uſeleſs. The aſhes of their great warriors, at their deceaſe, were depoſited in urns; which, with his ſword, and the heads of twelve arrows, were encloſed in a kind of coffin made with ſix large ſtones, which they buried ſix or eight feet deep. Four ſtones marked the extent of the grave; on which it was reckoned a mark of reſpect for paſſengers to pile other ſtones; the larger the more reſpectful. This accounts for thoſe ſtoney hillocks in many parts of Scotland, which the Highlanders called Cairnes; and when they would comfort a dying friend, "I ſhall add a ſtone to your cairne," is yet a common ſaying among them. The religion of the old Scots made them ſuperſtitious. Sanctified girdles were wrapped about women in labour to eaſe their labour, and forward the birth. They imagined that ſtorms were raiſed by the ghoſts of the dead, who tranſported themſelves from place to place; and it was ſuppoſed that they hovered over, aſſiſted, and protected them in time of war.

Having thus given a ſhort account of the manners, cuſtoms, and genius of the Caledonians, from whom the Picts and Scots are ſaid to be really deſcended, we ſhall now proceed, without interruption, to the hiſtory itſelf. But the reader will pleaſe to obſerve, that the firſt thirty-nine kings, mentioned by ſome writers, ſeem to be erroneouſly grounded on the Iriſh deſcent of the Scots; nevertheleſs, in order to render our hiſtory more complete, we ſhall enumerate them in a genealogical liſt.

CHAP. II.

Genealogical Liſt and Characters of the firſt eighty Kings.

FERGUS I. the firſt king of Scotland, was the ſon of Ferchard, a prince of Ireland; and began to reign A. M. 3641, before Chriſt 330 years. He was ſhipwrecked on the Iriſh coaſt, near Carricfergus, and died in the twenty-fourth year of his reign.

Feritharis, the ſecond king, began to reign A. M. 3666, before Chriſt 305. He was brother to Fergus, and a juſt man. Having reigned fourteen years, he was ſlain by means of Ferlegus, brother's ſon to Fergus, the preceding king.

Mainus, the third king, ſucceeded, A M. 3680, before Chriſt 291. He was a wiſe and a good king, and reigned twenty-eight years.

Dornadilla, the fourth king, began his reign A. M. 3710, before Chriſt 261, which continued twenty-ſeven years.

Nothatus, the fifth king, ſucceeded Dornadilla, A. M. 3732, before Chriſt 238. Being a cruel tyrant, he was ſlain in the twentieth year of his reign, by one of his nobles.

Reutherus, the ſixth king, began his reign A. M.

3758, before Chriſt 213. He was a tolerable king, and reigned twenty-five years.

Reutha, the ſeventh king, ſucceeded Reutherus, A. M. 3784, before Chriſt 187. He reigned well; but quitted the kingdom, and led a private life, after a reign of fourteen years.

Thereus, the eighth king, was the ſon of Reutherus. He began to reign A. M. 3798, before Chriſt 173; was an imprudent and cruel tyrant. His nobles expelled and baniſhed him in the twelfth year of his reign. He died in the city of York.

Joſina, the ninth king, aſcended the throne A. M. 3810, before Chriſt 161. He reigned peaceably twenty-three years.

Finnanus, the tenth king, was the ſon of Joſina, and began to reign A. M. 3834, before Chriſt 137. He was a good king, but much addicted to the Druidiſh ſuperſtition: he reigned twenty-nine years.

Durſtus, the eleventh king, ſucceeded to his father Finnanus, A. M. 3863, before Chriſt 107. Being a cruel tyrant, he was ſlain in battle, by his nobles, in the ninth year of his reign.

Evenus I. the twelfth king, ſucceeded his brother Durſtus, A. M. 3873, before Chriſt 98. He was a wiſe and virtuous prince, and reigned eighteen years.

Gilius, the thirteenth king, was a natural ſon of Evenus, and ſucceeded to his father, A. M. 3892, before Chriſt 79. He was a crafty tyrant; and was ſlain in battle, in the ſecond year of his reign, by Cadallus.

Evenus II. the fourteenth king, was the ſon of Dovallus, and brother of king Finnanus; he began to reign A. M. 3894, before Chriſt 77. He was a good king, and reigned ſixteen years.

Ederus, the fifteenth king, was the grandſon of Durſtus, and began to reign A. M. 3911, before Chriſt 60. A wiſe and valiant prince. He died in the forty-eighth year of his reign.

Evenus III. the ſixteenth king, ſucceeded his father Ederus, A. M. 3959, before Chriſt 12. He was a covetous, luxurious, and immoral king. His nobles caſt him into priſon; where he died in the ſeventh year of his reign.

Metellanus, the ſeventeenth king, was brother's ſon to Ederus, and began his reign A. M. 3966, before Chriſt five years. He was a prudent prince, and reigned thirty-eight years. Our Saviour Chriſt was born, and ſuffered death in his reign.

Caratacus, the eighteenth king, was the ſon of Cadallanus and Eropeia, and began to reign A. D. 34. He was a wiſe and valiant king, and reigned twenty years.

Corbred I. the nineteenth king, ſucceeded his brother Caratacus A. D. 54. He was a juſt and wiſe prince, and reigned ſeventeen years.

Dardanus, the twentieth king, was nephew to Metallanus, and began his reign A. D. 72. He was a cruel tyrant, and, being taken in battle, was beheaded by his own ſubjects, after he had reigned only three years.

Corbred II. the twenty-firſt king, was ſurnamed Galdus, and ſon to Corbred I. He aſcended the throne A. D. 76.—Was a worthy and valiant king, and ſignalized himſelf greatly againſt the Romans: he reigned thirty-four years.

Luctacus, the twenty-ſecond king, ſucceeded to his father Corbred II. A. D. 111. He was a lecherous and bloody tyrant, and ſlain by his nobles in the third year of his reign.

Mogaldus, the twenty-third king, was ſon to the ſiſter of Corbred II. and began to reign A. D. 114. He was at firſt a virtuous and victorious prince; but, at length, degenerating to tyranny, luſt, and covetouſneſs, he was ſlain by his nobles in the thirty-ſixth year of his reign.

Conarus, the twenty-fourth king, ſucceeded his father Mogaldus, A. D. 150. Being a libidinous tyrant, he was thrown into priſon by his nobles; where he died in the fourteenth year of his reign: Argadus being made governor.

Ethodius I. the twenty-fourth king, was ſon to the ſiſter of Mogaldus; and began his reign, A. D. 154. He was a good prince; but was ſlain by an Iriſh harper in the thirty-third year of his reign.

Satrael, the twenty-ſixth king, ſucceeded his brother Ethodius I. A. D. 197. He was a cruel tyrant, and ſlain by his courtiers in the fourth year of his reign.

Donald I. the twenty-ſeventh king, was the firſt Chriſtian king of Scotland, and ſucceeded his brother Satrael, A. D. 201. He was a good and religious king, and the firſt who coined gold or ſilver money in Scotland. He reigned ſeventeen years.

Ethodius II. the twenty-eighth king, ſucceeded the throne A. D. 219. He was an unwiſe baſe-minded king, governed by his nobles; his own guards ſlew him in the ſixteenth year of his reign.

Athirco, the twenty-ninth king, was the ſucceſſor of his father Ethodius II. A. D. 235. He was at firſt a valiant prince; but having degenerated and become vicious, and being purſued by his nobles for his wicked life, ſlew himſelf in the twelfth year of his reign.

Nathalocus, the thirtieth king, was ſon to the brother of Athirco, and began to reign A. D. 247. He was a cruel tyrant, ſlain by his nobles, and afterwards caſt into a privy, when he had reigned ten years.

Findochus, the thirty-firſt king, began his reign, A. D. 258. He was a good and valiant king; but was nevertheleſs ſlain by feigned hunters, at the inſtigation of his brother Donald, lord of the iſles, in the eleventh year of his reign.

Donald II. the thirty-ſecond king, ſucceeded his brother Findochus, A. D. 269. He was a good prince; but, being overcome in battle and wounded, died of grief in the firſt year of his reign.

Donald III. the thirty-third king, was lord of the iſles, and brother to Findochus. He began his reign A. D. 270. He was a cruel tyrant, and ſlain by his ſucceſſor in the twelfth year of his reign.

Crathalinthus, the thirty-fourth king, was the ſon of Findochus; and began to reign, A. D. 282. He was a valiant and godly king; having purged the land of the Druidiſh ſuperſtition, and planted Chriſtianity: he reigned twenty-three years. Conſtantine the Great was ſaid to have been born in England in his time.

Fincormachus, the thirty-fifth king, was ſon to the brother of Crathilinthus's father, and began to reign A. D. 304. He was a valiant and godly prince, and promoted Chriſtianity in Scotland. He reigned forty-ſix years.

Romachus, the thirty-ſixth king, was brother's ſon to Crathilinthus, and began his reign A. D. 351. He being a cruel prince, was ſlain by his nobles, who beheaded him, after a reign of two years.

Anguſianus, the thirty-ſeventh king, was alſo brother's ſon to Crathilinthus, and ſucceeded to Romachus, A. D. 354. He was a good king, and ſlain in battle by the Picts, after he had reigned two years.

Fethelmachus, the thirty-eighth king, was another brother's ſon of Crathilinthus, and began his reign A. D. 357. He was a valiant king; overcame the Picts, and ſlew their king; but was afterwards betrayed to them by a harper, who ſlew him in his own chamber, in the third year of his reign.

Eugenius, the thirty-ninth king, was the ſon of Fincormachus, and began his reign A. D. 360. He was a valiant, juſt, and good king. The Picts and Romans ſlew him in battle in the third year of his reign. At this time, the whole Scots nation was expelled the iſle by the above-mentioned invaders, and remained in exile about forty-four years.

Edward the firſt of England, having, in the fourteenth century, deſtroyed the records of Scotland, has left little elſe to be tranſmitted of the above-mentioned kings, or thoſe who filled the throne till near that æra, than that they lived and died. However, as we think it proper the whole ſhould be mentioned, as well for the ſake of method, as to preſerve chronology, which is eſſential to hiſtory, we have carefully collected the following information, which, together with the foregoing, we preſume, will be found to be the moſt accurate account that is recorded concerning the hiſtory, from the firſt eſtabliſhment of monarchy in Scotland.

Fergus II. the fortieth king, of uncertain rank or dignity, aſcended the throne, A. D. 403: it is ſuppoſed he was a native of Scotland. He greatly harraſſed the Britons, till, in 418, they called the Romans to their aſſiſtance; his army was then defeated in a pitched battle, and he himſelf ſlain.

Eugene II. the forty-firſt king, having ſucceeded Fergus II. followed his ſteps. The Romans were very ſoon called home, ſo that the Britons, unable of themſelves to ſtand againſt him, ſued for peace; which was offered them on the following conditions: " 1ſt. That the Britons receive no aſſiſtance from any " foreign power; and if any of them ſhould voluntarily " viſit them, that they oppoſe their progreſs. " 2d. That, without the concurrence of the Scots, " the Britons ſhall neither make war nor peace. 3d. " That the river Humber be the boundary of their " kingdom. And 4thly. That they pay down a certain " ſum for the uſe of the Scots ſoldiers, which, " as a fine, ſhould be continued annually." For the performance of theſe articles, two hoſtages were demanded; but the Britons not chuſing to ſubmit to them, invited over the Saxons, by whoſe aid they routed the Scots at Grantham, in Lincolnſhire; and Eugene was drowned in the river Humber.

Dongard, the forty-ſecond king, was brother and ſucceſſor of the former, he made peace, and continued on good terms with the people till his death, which happened A. D. 457.

Conſtantine, the forty-third king, was another brother of Eugene's, who next filled the throne; of whom different writers give the moſt oppoſite characters. He lived till 479, when his place was ſupplied by his nephew, Congal, the forty-fourth king, who, though in the main a peaceable prince, had, ſome ſay, ſeveral ſkirmiſhes with the Saxons.

Goran, the forty-fifth king, ſucceeded his brother Congal A. D. 501, but ſwerving from the principles of juſtice with which he began his reign, was, together with one Toncet, his iniquitous juſticiary, put to death.

Eugene III. the forty-ſixth king, ſucceeded his uncle Goran, A. D. 535. He aſſiſted the famous king Arthur againſt the Saxons, till the end of his reign, which was in 558.

Conval, the forty-ſeventh king, brother and ſucceſſor to Eugene, continued the alliance; and another brother Kinnatel, the forty-eighth king, aſcended the throne, but being conſumptive, reigned only a year.

Aidan, the forty-ninth king, ſon of Goran, was proclaimed king A. D. 569. He cleared the province of Galloway of many bands of robbers that infeſted it: after which, he grew jealous of the power of Ethelfred, king of the Northumbrians, and invaded his territories; but received at laſt ſuch a mortifying defeat, that, on his return home, he is ſaid to have died of grief. Some authors affirm, that the city of Edinburgh is indebted to this monarch for her origin and name.

Keneth, the fiftieth king, was ſon of Conval. He reigned but twelve months, the crown next came to Aidan's ſon, Eugene III. the fifty-firſt king, who enjoyed it peaceably ſixteen years. It then devolved on his eldeſt ſon, Ferchard, the fifty-ſecond king, who deſtroyed himſelf in a dungeon, to which he was confined by his ſubjects, on account of his vicious life.

Donald, the fifty-third king was the brother of Ferchard. He ſucceeded to the throne, A. D. 632, which, on his death in 646, was filled by Donald's nephew, Ferchard II. the fifty-fourth king, who died after a quiet reign of 18 years, reſulting from his good management, according to ſome; though others brand him as a monſter of vice.

Malduin, the fifty-fifth king, ſon of Donald, ſucceeded A. D. 664. He was a prince of great virtue. He quelled an inſurrection in the ſhires of Argyle and Lenox, which had ariſen in the beginning of his reign; the remainder of which, being in perfect peace at home and abroad, he ſpent in acts of piety: nevertheleſs, his queen, it is ſaid, in a fit of jealouſy, had him murdered; for which fact ſhe and many of her accomplices were burnt.

Eugene V. the fifty-ſixth king, nephew to the preceding, ſucceeded to the throne, A. D. 684. He defeated the Saxons that had deſigned to invade Galloway; he reigned five years, and was then ſucceeded, in 680, by Ferchard's ſon, Eugene VI. the fifty-ſeventh king, who died A. D. 697, leaving his crown to his nephew, Amberkeleth, the fifty-eighth king, who was killed by an arrow in the ſecond year of his reign, as he was eaſing himſelf in a wood. His brother, Eugene VII. the fifty-ninth king, then ſucceeding, concluded a ſolemn treaty with the Picts, with whom his anceſtors had been at variance for more than a century. In order to ratify it, he married Spondona, the daughter of Garnard, king of that nation. Spondona was ſhortly afterwards murdered in her bed by two men, who miſtook her for the king, againſt whoſe life they had conſpired, for having put to death their father. Eugene was ſo nettled at this indignity, that he could ſcarcely be prevailed on to avoid an open rupture with the perſons who had accuſed him. He had nothing after this to diſturb the peace of his reign, which terminated in 715.

Murdac, the ſixtieth king, was ſon of Amberkeleth. He was a pious prince, and repaired the churches and monaſteries which had been injured by war: he died A. D. 730, when the crown was worn by Etfin, the ſixty-firſt king. He is ſaid to have been an excellent monarch: towards the latter end of his reign, growing unfit for ſtate affairs, he appointed four of his nobility as regents, who abuſed their truſt and power, as has ſince but too often happened, ſtriving only to enrich themſelves. The good old king died of grief in 761, on being unable to ſilence the clamours of his ſubjects, by removing theſe obnoxious miniſters.

Eugene VIII. the ſixty-ſecond king, was ſon of Murdac: upon his acceſſion to the throne, he called the late regents to account; one of whom he put to death, and inflicted heavy fines on the others. But reclining in the arms of peace, afterwards gave a looſe to his irregular paſſions, and growing at laſt infinitely worſe than the regents had been, was deſervedly put to death.

Fergus III. the ſixty-third king, was the ſon of Etfin. Proving very libidinous, he fell a ſacrifice to the jealous reſentment of his qeeen; who, whilſt many perſons, ſuſpected to have been guilty of the murder were in torture, confeſſed the deed, and immediately ſtabbed herſelf.

Selvac, the ſixty-fourth king, ſon of Eugene VIII. then aſcended the throne, and proved both wiſe and juſt. In the third year of his reign, one Donald Bane, who called himſelf lord of the iſles, committed depredations in Cantire and Lorn; Selvac ſent a body of forces againſt him, which put him and all his followers to the ſword. Soon after this, Gelcolm, ſon of Donald, made an inſurrection in Galloway; but being taken with his principal followers, their puniſhment put a ſtop to further miſchief: this king died of the gout A. D. 787, and was ſucceeded by Achaius, the ſixty-fifth king, and ſon of Etſin. The Iriſh, upon his acceſſion, made a deſcent on Cantire; but the inhabitants ſoon expelled them. Suffering the loſs of many ſhips in their voyage home, and fearing that the Scots would pay them a viſit in their turn, ambaſſadors were ſent from that nation to adjuſt matters with Achaius, who accordingly concluded a very ſatisfactory treaty. It is reported that Charlemaigne entered into the moſt friendly alliance with this king, and that they aſſiſted each other with troops. Achaius likewiſe, at Charles's deſire, ſent over to him many men of the beſt learning. His preceptor Alcuin being a Scotſman, not a little contributed to improve the friendſhip between theſe monarchs, whoſe ſucceſſors maintained the intercouſe for a a ſeries of years.

Conval, the ſixty-ſixth king, was nephew of the preceding, and began to reign A. D. 819, but dying in five years, the throne was then filled by Dungal, the ſixty-ſeventh king, ſon of Selvac, A. D. 824, though not till after a ſlight oppoſition from ſome of his ſubjects, who endeavoured to bring in Alpin, ſon of Achaius: he appears rather to have deſired the Pictiſh throne, which was then vacant; but the Picts preſented one of their own noblemen. Alpin conſidering this preference as a great affront, Dungar generouſly engaged to force the Picts to elect him, and marched at the head of a large army for that purpoſe; but being drowned in croſſing the river Spey, Alpin, the ſixty-eighth king, became king of Scotland A. D. 831, and, ſtill graſping at the Pictiſh throne, marched onward. The Picts hearing his intentions, ſent offers of peace; but Alpin refuſing every ſubmiſſion but an abſolute ſurrender of the crown, they prepared to give him battle. Before the engagement, Brudus, the Pictiſh king, ordered every attendant, man or woman, to mount on horſeback; and while both armies were fiercely engaged, theſe appearing as he had commanded them, ſtruck ſuch a panic into the Scots, who conſidered them as a reinforcement of regular troops, that turning tail, they were ſlaughtered like ſheep. Alpin and the chief of his nobility were taken priſoners: the latter they put to death before they quitted the field; and at their return home, as they refuſed the greateſt ranſom for him, the king was beheaded at a place now called Pitalpy.

Keneth II. the ſixty-ninth king, ſucceeded A. D. 834. Being ſtrongly bent on revenging his father's murder, is ſaid to have influenced his nobility (who ſeemed rather averſe to the feud) by the following contrivance: A perſon, dreſſed in fiſh ſkins, entered the hall wherein they ſlept after a feaſt the king had given them, and with a long tube thundered in their ears the moſt dreadful threatenings if they did not revenge the death of Alpin. The luminous appearance which this man made, joined to the king's ſolemn declaration of having alſo been viſited by ſuch an apparition, made them conclude him to be an angel ſent on the occaſion; they therefore inſtantly concurred with Keneth's meaſures, who, muſtering all his forces, determined to exterminate the whole race of Picts: he infuſed a ſtrong ſpirit of revenge into all his army, by giving "The death of Alpin" as the watch-word. When they joined battle with the Picts, being victorious, they ſpared neither age nor ſex. Drunken, in order to ſtop their progreſs, offered half his kingdom; but Keneth declaring for all or none, the Pictiſh king united his ſtrength and hazarded another battle; in which being ſlain, and his whole army either put to the ſword or drowned in the Tay, every Pictiſh ſettlement immediately ſurrendered to Keneth, who thereupon ſtiled himſelf king of the Picts as well as the Scots, and was properly the firſt monarch of Scotland. After this conqueſt, by which the name of Picts was for the moſt part abſorbed in the general one of Scots, Keneth ſat down contented; and having made many excellent laws, his glorious reign terminated in the year 854. He was ſucceeded by his brother, Donald V. the ſeventieth king; againſt whom ſome of the Picts revolting, they were ſubdued by others more loyal: he reigned after this in great tranquillity; and in 858, his nephew, Conſtantine V. the ſeventy-firſt king, mounted the throne, the diſaffected Picts went over to Denmark, and invited the Danes to join with them in the recovery of their kingdom. They accordingly readily came over, and landing in Fife, committed many cruelties. The king, being appriſed of this, marched againſt them with the beſt army he could then collect; but as there were many Picts therein, who in the heat of battle joined the Danes, the Scots were totally routed; Conſtantine himſelf being taken priſoner, was carried to a cave by the ſea ſide and there beheaded.

Eth, the ſeventy-ſecond king, brother of the preceding, ſurnamed Swiftfoot, was then declared king, but puſillanimouſly ſuffering the Danes to ravage the country with impunity, his nobility, at the end of his firſt year's reign, put him to death, and in his ſtead proclaimed Gregory, the ſon of Dongal, the ſeventy-third king, A. D. 875. On his acceſſion, he marched againſt the Danes and Picts, whom he drove from Fife into Northumberland: they had, however, thrown a garriſon into Berwick, which having ſubdued, he put the Danes to the ſword; and, making priſoners of the Picts, paſſed the winter in that province. Alfred the Great, of England, being charmed with the martial ſpirit of Gregory, proffered an alliance for the ſecurity of both nations. This was no ſooner agreed on, than Gregory, hearing that the kingdom of Ireland was uſurped by two noblemen, determined to go over and ſettle on the throne Donach, the minor king, who was his couſin. The uſurpers, who had before been at variance, now joined their forces, and prepared to diſpute his landing: their efforts, however, proving ineffectual, Gregory drove them before him, till Brian being killed, Corneil retreated to Dublin, where receiving a reinforcement, he gave Gregory battle, but was defeated and ſlain. Gregory, upon this, declared himſelf guardian to young Donach, appointed a regency, left many of his troops in garriſon, and then returned home: but when Donach came of age, he exchanged the hoſtages he had received from the Iriſh in token of fidelity, for the troops which he had left behind him in that country. This monarch, juſtly ſurnamed the Great, after having built the city of Aberdeen, died in the caſtle of Dundee, A. D. 892.

Donald VI. the ſeventy-fourth king, was the ſon of Conſtantine; he proved a pacific prince, and governed with prudence and juſtice: he died in 903, when Conſtantine III. the ſeventh-fifth king, Eth Swiftfoot's ſon, next acceded. This monarch began his reign by making an alliance with the Danes. He then ſettled the county of Cumberland on Malcolm, the late king's ſon; and in the tenth year of his reign, made a law that every heir apparent of the kingdom, ſhould be made prince of it. Athelſtan, the natural ſon of Edward (to whom Engliſh hiſtorians affirm, though Scots writers deny, that Conſtantine paid homage) ſucceeded to the crown of England, and conſidering Cumberland as part of it, made the neceſſary demand on Malcolm. The prince, refuſing to give up Cumberland, was obliged to take the field in its defence. He was ſupported by the Danes and Scots; and Anluff, an Iriſh prince, who was ſon-in-law to Conſtantine, came over to their aſſiſtance. Theſe united powers were attacked by Athelſtan, who, after a fierce and obſtinate battle, gained a complete victory. Conſtantine died in the Culdee monaſtery of St. Andrew's, A. D. 943, having reſigned his crown five years before to Malcolm, the ſeventy-ſixth king, who cultivated peace; till having, by his great care, ſoon recovered the former condition of his kingdom, he became ally to Edmund of England; that monarch having previouſly reſtored Cumberland. Some add, that, in conſideration of this grant, Malcolm agreed to attend the Engliſh king at all his feſtivals and parliaments. Malcolm, having aſſiſted the Engliſh in taking Northumberland, returned home; and being ſevere in the adminiſtration of juſtice, was murdered by ſome villains at Ulrine, in the county of Murray, after reigning upwards of eight years.

Induff, the ſeventy-ſeventh king, who was the ſon of Conſtantine, acceded to the crown on Malcolm's aſſaſſination. The Scots are ſaid to have recovered, under this king, the city of Edinburgh, which ſome affirm to have been alternately poſſeſſed by the Danes and Saxons. Induff, dying in the year 961, was ſucceeded by Duff, the ſeventy-eighth king, who was the ſon of Malcolm; he proved a virtuous prince, and was particularly careful to ſuppreſs robberies. As the reign of this king was barren of events, Buchanan has ſupplied that defect from his own fancy. He tells a ſtory, that ſome perſons ſaw a waxen image of King Duff on a ſpit, before a large fire raiſed by witches, who reported that Duff's body ſhould really melt like wax; which this hiſtorian ſays did literally happen, though he does not enforce the belief as authentic. Duff died A. D. 965.

Culen, the ſeventy-ninth king, was the ſon of Induff; and proving a moſt execrable monſter, his kingdom, from his example, became the ſeat of fraud and rapine. This brute having raviſhed the daughter of Cadard, thane of Fife, the father ſoon after diſpatched him.

Keneth, the eightieth king, was the ſon of Malcolm; and aſcended the throne, A. D. 970. By his wiſdom and conduct he eſtabliſhed good order and government. Matters were ſcarcely ſettled to his ſatisfaction, before a conſiderable fleet of Danes paid him a very unwelcome viſit. Keneth collected his forces, and conjuring them, as they valued their lives and liberties, to ſtand boldly againſt theſe enemies, who, he told them, were alſo foes to honour, truth, and juſtice, promiſed a conſiderable reward for every Daniſh head; notwithſtanding which, it ſeems, that, in the battle, the Scots were ſeized with a ſudden panic, and were flying with precipitation, till a yeoman of the name of Hay, and his two ſons, ſtopped their inglorious countrymen at a narrow paſs; and, partly by threats and blows, having made an halt, perſuaded them to face the enemy. Hay and his ſons then, armed only with the yokes they had juſt uſed at plough, leading the van, gave the Danes a total overthrow. After the battle, the king gave Hay the barony of Errol, as a reward for his ſignal ſervices. Peace now ſucceeding the late victory, Keneth began to conſider of his ſon's ſucceſſion; and to that end, having cauſed to be aſſaſſinated the perſon whom his people had made prince of Cumberland, he repealed the old law, which made the crown devolve on the uncle, brother, or nephew, rather than on the ſon of a king, eſpecially if a minor. He died, A. D. 994.

CHAP. III.

Liſt of Kings continued—Affairs of the Church, and Lives and Characters of the Kings up to the ninety-ſixth.

CONSTANTINE IV. was ſon of Culen. He, by the aſſiſtance of friends, got the crown in ſpite of the late act in favour of Malcolm, Keneth's ſon, who was obliged to fly for his life; till being afterwards aſſiſted by Keneth, his natural-brother, Conſtantine was defeated and ſlain, A. D. 996.

The throne being now vacant on the death of Conſtantine IV. Grim, grandſon to king Duff, inſiſting on his right to the throne by the old law, accordingly became the eighty-ſecond king; ſo that Malcolm was again diſappointed. War would in all probability have raged afreſh, if the good biſhop Tothad had not undertaken to accommodate matters: the following conditions, drawn up by him, were mutually agreed to, "That Grim enjoy the crown during his life; that it then revert to Malcolm; and after his death, to the next of kin: that in conſideration of Grim's preſent enjoyment of the crown, all the lands between the Forth and Tweed, and the Forth and Clyde, be in the mean time granted to Malcolm." The crown being thus ſecured to Grim for his life, he grew ſo tyrannical, that the people began to wiſh they had choſen Malcolm; and accordingly applied to him for redreſs, he raiſed a large army, and encountering as great a one which Grim, notwithſtanding his behaviour, was ſtill maſter of, he routed his forces; and the king being ſlain, Malcolm aſcended the throne of Scotland, A. D. 1004.

The affairs of the church now demand our conſideration. It is no eaſy matter to determine when Scotland received the firſt light of Chriſtianity. Eaſtern miſſionaries are ſaid to have made many converts there in the third century. In the ſixth century flouriſhed the famous Columba, who crowned King Aidan, and founded the celebrated abbey at Iona. He was a divine, a poet, and an hiſtorian. In the firſt character, he is ſaid to have uſed ſo much auſterity and maceration (the cardinal virtues of thoſe ſuperſtitious times) that he reduced himſelf to a mere ſkeleton: he died at an advanced age in 603.

The Scots and Engliſh were reconciled with reſpect to the time for the celebration of Eaſter, by biſhop Adamnan, a learned and worthy prelate, who ſucceeded Colman. He likewiſe procured the marriage of Spondona, the daughter of the Pictiſh king; and by this act, and many other good offices, he very much conciliated the affections of the Scots and Picts. In 697, Boniface, archbiſhop of Mentz, came into Scotland; and it is ſaid, was offered the crown, which he refuſed. He built a church near Angus, at Telin, and at Reſtnoth; ſettling at laſt at Roſmarky, where, after having built a church, he died. Prince Fiacre, nephew to king Aidan, went about this time over to France, where many churches are dedicated to his memory, and there ſequeſtered himſelf in a cave, which no intreaties could prevail with him to quit.

There were no biſhops of St. Andrew's till 870; that ſee, which includes the counties of Fife, Lothian, Merſe, Sterling, Angus, and Mearns, was then given to Adrian, who ſhortly after was killed by the Danes in the iſle of May; from that time they had a regular ſucceſſion; being firſt elected in Scotland, and then ſent over to Rome for confirmation. It was erected into an archbiſhoprick by Pope Sextus IV. in 1472; the poſſeſſor was declared primate of Scotland, and the revenues at the reformation amounted in Scots money, to £2904. 17s. 2d. which is about £.250 ſterling. Glaſgow, is ſaid to have been founded near three hundred years ſooner; Alexander VI. erected that likewiſe into an archbiſhoprick in 1494; and at the reformation, its revenues appeared to be £987. 8s. 7d. beſides meal, malt, and ſalmon. It is not certain whether the biſhoprick of Galloway or of Orkney is the more ancient; however, it is agreed that both were eſtabliſhed in the ſixth century; the revenues of the former were found, at the reformation, to be worth £1137. 11s. 8d. in money; the latter only £251. 2s. 6d. excluſive of butter, oil, wax, wood, fleſh, and poultry, Scotland, on the firſt planting of religion there, is ſaid to have been very prolific of men of learning and character: among whom Rabanus Maurus and Maidulphus, the former of whom wrote expoſitions on the whole ſcriptures, and the latter a number of excellent tracts (all now loſt to us) were unanimouſly celebrated: they both died at the cloſe of the eighth century; and in the following, the no leſs famous Joannes Erigena.

The right which the father of Malcolm II. and a majority of his nobility, might have to make him heir to the crown, and thereby eſtabliſh for the future a lineal ſucceſſion, not being ſufficiently clear to him, he would not mount the throne till they were nearly unanimous that it was legal. He then ſuffered himſelf to be crowned; and having forgiven every one that had taken up arms under Grim, whoſe body he ordered to be buried with his anceſtors, he made his grandſon Duncan his heir, and accordingly prince of Cumberland; deſpairing, as as he was then in years, of having any male iſſue. He was particularly careful to preſerve peace with England; but Ethelred, by his cruel maſſacre of the Danes, having excited Swein their king to revenge it, that monarch, who was father to Canute the Great, becoming maſter of England, determined alſo to invade Scotland. He accordingly equipped a fleet, and landed near Murray; where he defeated ſome troops, which Malcolm had haſtily collected to ſtop his progreſs. Fluſhed with this ſucceſs, he conſidered the kingdom as already ſubdued; but Malcolm having muſtered all the troops in his power, reſolved to decide the fate of his kingdom by one general battle. The Scots fought for every thing ſacred and valuable; they charged, therefore, with ſuch determined reſolution, that, though victory ſeemed often againſt them, the Danes, after a moſt terrible carnage, were routed. Carnus, their general, was ſlain in the purſuit by Keith, a young nobleman who commanded the clan of Caithneſs. Another Scots officer, however, diſputing the honour with him, it was decided, as uſual in thoſe days, after the battle, by ſingle combat. Keith getting the better, the king dipped his finger in the officer's blood, and made three marks on the conqueror's ſhield, ſaying at the ſame time, VERITAS VINCIT; and hence aroſe the arms and motto of his deſcendants. After this ſignal victory, it is reported that Malcolm, in gratitude, divided moſt of his lands amongſt his ſoldiers, reſerving little elſe than the Muſehill of Scone.

Not long after, another army from Swein, under the command of his ſon Canute, landed in Scotland. Over this attempt, we learn, that Malcolm was ſufficiently victorious to make the following peace: "That "the Danes ſhould leave Scotland, on condition that "the Scots would not aſſiſt their enemies." Matters continued thus till the acceſſion of Canute to the Engliſh throne, when Duncan, refuſing to pay homage for his principality of Cumberland, conſidering himſelf as bound only to the Saxons, and Canute, preparing to compel him, Malcolm marched to his grandſon's aſſiſtance; but before the two armies engaged, Duncan, by the advice of his clergy, agreed to the demand.

Notwithſtanding the generoſity of Malcolm, a few ſtill remained who were the friends of his predeceſſor Grim. Theſe, it was ſaid, ſought only for a convenient opportunity to diſpatch Malcolm; which they effected when the good king, now eighty years of age, was at the caſtle of Glamis. But after the aſſaſſins had perpetrated the deed, propoſing to eſcape by going over Forfar lake, which was then frozen, the ice gave way, and they were all drowned. Malcolm, thus barbarouſly murdered, was doubtleſs one of the greateſt princes that ever ſwayed the Scots ſcepter; and ſome hiſtorians have highly commended him for his legiſlative capacity and talents.

Duncan I. grandſon of the former prince, and eighty-fourth king, ſucceeded to the throne in 1034. His lenity in government ſeems to have given birth to a rebellion, raiſed by one Macdowel; againſt whom Banquo, thane of Lochabar, and Macbeth, the king's couſin, being ſent with troops, he and his clan were deſtroyed. On their return, the Danes, under the command of Swein, Canute's brother, were invading the kingdom: they therefore ſpeedily joined the forces which Duncan himſelf had raiſed and headed; and the Danes being with ſome difficulty routed, repaired to their ſhips, ſet ſail, and never afterwards viſited Scotland. Peace being now eſtabliſhed, Duncan endeavoured to reform his kingdom; while Macbeth, who was become very popular, aſpired to the crown. Macbeth was at the head of a ſtrong party, who favoured the old eſtabliſment; and being nephew to the king, imagined that if he was dead, he could eaſily obtain the crown. Accordingly, he determined to ſacrifice his uncle; and his wife, being privy to the deſign, urged him to a ſpeedy execution of it. He therefore murdered Duncan at Inverneſs, where he was on a yearly circuit, which he uſed to take round his dominions, in order to adjuſt the quarrels of his ſubjects, and redreſs their grievances.

A. D. 1040.

Macbeth was crowned at Scone, and acknowledged the eighty-fifth king of Scotland. But Duncan's two ſons, Malcolm and Donald, ſurnamed Bane (or the Fair) who had eluded the ſnares he had laid for them, gave him great uneaſineſs. Malcolm, the lawful heir, had fled into England, and his brother into the Ebrides or Weſtern Iſles, where he ſuſpected they were forming ſchemes to dethrone him. This thought, added to the checks of that upright arbiter conſcience, made him ſuſpicious and cruel. Banquo, the very man who had aſſiſted him in attaining the crown, he treacherouſly put to death. His ſon Fleance eſcaping, alarmed the nobility; ſo that moſt of them retired to their reſpective caſtles. On this behaviour of his nobles, finding himſelf ſuſpected, he proceeded to open tyranny. Macduff, thane of Fife, a man of power, was thought to be attached to Malcolm, the king's ſon; Macbeth therefore devoted him to deſtruction, and inhumanly put to death his wife, his children, and his ſervants. Macduff having eſcaped, ſoon after reached England, where meeting prince Malcolm, he propoſed that he ſhould aſk aſſiſtance of the Engliſh to regain his throne. King Edward furniſhed him with 10,000 men, with which, under the command of Sibard, prince of Northumberland, his mother's father, they entered Scotland. Macbeth, through his cruelties, having now only a few mercenaries to ſtand by him, retreated to the caſtle of Dunſinan, from which, on the approach of Malcolm, he fled; but being purſued, he was overtaken and killed by the injured Macduff. Thus fell Macbeth, in the year 1056; according to Buchanan, he was ten years a good king, and during ſeven a moſt inhuman tyrant.

In the year 1057, Malcolm, ſurnamed Canmore, i. e. Greathead, being thus, after a long exile, reſtored to his country, was declared the eighty-ſixth king; though not till Macbeth's ſon, Lulach, whom a faction had ſet up to oppoſe him, was defeated and ſlain. To Macduff, who had been ſo greatly inſtrumental towards his reſtoration, and to his poſterity, he gave the privilege of crowning future kings, and the poſt of honour in all their royal armies. He next reinſtated thoſe who had been deprived of their eſtates by Macbeth. In theſe and other liberal actions he was engaged, when William the Conqueror having reduced England, Edgar Atheling, the laſt male branch of the Saxon line, giving up all hopes of ſucceeding to the crown, on his return to Hungary, with his mother Agatha and his ſiſters Margaret and Chriſtiana, was, by ſtreſs of weather, driven into Scotland. Malcolm treated them kindly, and becoming very ſoon enamoured with Margaret, he married her. William having intelligence of the affair, and imagining that it would raiſe factions in favour of Edgar, demanded that Malcolm ſhould give him up; which being refuſed, William declared war with Scotland. After many battles with various ſucceſs, a peace was concluded between the two kingdoms on the following terms: "That Edgar ſhould renounce all claim "to the crown of England; no Engliſh exiles be "henceforth admitted into Scotland; and that "Malcolm ſhould do homage to William for part "of his dominions," for all Scotland, according to ſome hiſtorians.

Soon after peace was proclaimed with England, a formidable band of robbers infeſted the counties of Lothian and Merſe, but were at laſt with difficulty extirpated. Malcolm now enjoying perfect tranquillity, began a reformation in his court, which was rather diſſolute; in this he was aſſiſted by his queen, a woman of great piety, virtue, and accompliſhments.

Malcolm was the firſt who introduced Engliſh cuſtoms, manners, language, and titles, into Scotland. He created Macduff, earl of Fife, the firſt who received that dignity; he alſo created barons, and gave thoſe nobles, who ſerved him in perſon or in the ſtate, their reſpective titles: for before this there, were no other than knight and thane. Walter, who, according to report, was Banquo's grandſon, and had ſubdued the rebels in Lothian and Merſe, he created his high ſteward. And as ſurnames began now to take place from the offices or lands which a man enjoyed, Stewart became the name of his family, which many of the kings of England and Scotland afterwards bore.

William Rufus about this time ſucceeded his father the Conqueror. Growing jealous of Edgar, to whom his father, on the peace with Scotland, had granted eſtates in Normandy, he began to diſtreſs him; and as Malcolm took part with his brother, it occaſioned a war. Malcolm entered England, and having made a conſiderable booty, retired. Rufus, to repair his loſs, determined to invade Scotland; and though he actually landed forces there, yet before any battle enſued, Malcolm and he came to an accommodation: "Edgar was to enjoy his "eſtates; and Malcolm, on receiving yearly twelve "gold marks, agreed to pay homage to Rufus for "certain lands he held in England." This treaty being often diſregarded by Rufus, Malcolm went in perſon to him at Glouceſter, in order to ſettle it firmly. Rufus is here ſaid to have refuſed ſeeing him, and to have demanded ſuch extraordinary homage, that Malcolm, enraged at the inſult, levied forces, and beſieged the caſtle of Northumberland; in a ſally from which, on the 6th of June 1093, both he and his ſon were ſlain; the former according to Scots hiſtorians, by Mowbray, the governor of the caſtle, with a ſpear, on which, in token of ſubmiſſion, he tendered the keys; the latter in revenging the murder of his father.

Writers are univerſally agreed, that Malcolm, who reigned thirty-ſix years, was a prince of great abilities; and though his temper was naturally ferocious, it was greatly ſoftened by the engaging one of his wife Margaret, who ſurvived him but a few days. He had iſſue ſix ſons and two daughters; Edward juſt mentioned, Edmund and Ethelred, who died in England, Edgar, Alexander, and David, who ſucceeded to the crown; Matilda, or Maud, afterwards queen of England, and Mary, counteſs of Bononia.

Notwithſtanding the great pains Malcolm had taken to ſettle the lineal ſucceſſion, Donaldbane, who during the reign of his brother had kept himſelf in the iſles, made his appearance after his death, at the head of a ſtrong party, in favour of the old collateral ſucceſſion. The late king, by his ſtrong attachment to his brother-in-law Edgar Atheling, and by ſettling eſtates on the exiles, who followed his fortune, had greatly diſobliged his nobility. Theſe, and other unpopular circumſtances, joined to the minority of his ſurviving ſons, made it no very difficult matter for Donaldbane to oppoſe a law, not much revered for its antiquity: ſo that it is very probable he came to the crown without the aid of Magnus the Barefoot, king of Norway; though ſome have aſſerted that Magnus received the principality of the iſles for his aſſiſtance. Donald, however, was crowned at Scone; and became Donaldbane VII. the eighty-ſeventh king. He immediately expelled the foreigners who were his brother's favourites; before which, Edgar Atheling, hearing of Donald's proceedings, had his brother's children conveyed to the Engliſh court; where was likewiſe one Duncan, a natural ſon, who had long ſerved in Rufus's army, and was very much in favour.

Rufus having encouraged Duncan to diſpoſſeſs Donald; with the aſſiſtance of Engliſh troops, he accordingly performed it. After which, A. D. 1095, he claimed the crown himſelf, though the Scots thought he was acting in behalf of Malcolm's heir; but being then in no condition to refuſe him, they were obliged to comply, and he became Duncan II. the eighty-eighth king. Soon after, Malpedir, earl of Mearns, killed him, while he ſlept in the caſtle of Monteith, and then reſtored Donald, who had employed him.

Edgar, the ſon of Malcolm, being now of age, and having by his uncle's intereſt obtained a ſufficient number of Engliſh forces, entered Scotland at the head of them. Force ſeemed needleſs; for the Scots, during the uſurpations, had been ſo greatly harraſſed, that they no ſooner beheld their prince, than they flocked to his ſtandard; and leaving Donald defenceleſs, he was taken and confined in priſon the remainder of his days.

Edgar, the eighty-ninth king, acceded to the throne of his father, A. D. 1098; and, as his people ſeemed to deſire peace, he therefore preſerved it; for nothing more remarkable happened in his reign than the marriage of his ſiſter Matilda to Henry I. of England.

With reſpect to the affairs of the church in this century, nothing material occurred, except that Malcolm Cranmore, in the beginning of his reign, founded the biſhopricks of Murray and Caithneſs. The value of the former was, at the reformation, in money, £1649. 7s. 7d. of the latter, £1283. 19s. beſides oatmeal, ſheep, and poultry. The foundation of the cathedral at Durham is ſaid to have been laid by the ſaid king.

In this century, the Scots were exceedingly well received in Germany; where fifteen monaſteries were founded, by a prince of that nation, who had ſerved in the wars of Charlemagne; and all the abbots were choſen from among the Scots.

In this century, mention is alſo made of three perſons who rendered themſelves particularly famous in Scotland, by their learning and piety. Turgot, prior of Durham, Veremudus, archdeacon of St. Andrews's, both wrote chronicles of their times, which it is ſuppoſed are loſt; but the hiſtory of Marianus Scotus, which commenced from the creation, and ended at 1083 of the Chriſtian æra, is ſtill extant.

Edgar was ſucceeded by Alexander I. the ninetieth king, A. D. 1107, who rendered himſelf obnoxious to his nobility by the ſeverity of his behaviour towards them, and his indulgence to the clergy. He ſoon afterwards applied himſelf almoſt wholly to religious matters; ſo that there is nothing in his reign more remarkable than the introduction of ſilver coin. He died on the 8th of May 1124; and, having never been married, was ſucceeded by his brother David, the ninety-firſt king. David, ſhortly after his coronation, viſited his brother-in-law, Henry; whoſe daughter Maud, being, by the ſudden death of her brother, heireſs to the crown, David promiſed Henry to maintain her right to it. Henry dying ſoon after, he had occaſion to perform his engagement; for the throne was immediately uſurped by Stephen, who likewiſe, in a very haughty manner, ordered David to do him homage for the lands of Northumberland, Cumberland, and Huntingdon. David called him uſurper; and, acquainting him with his promiſe to Henry, he prepared to aſſiſt Maud, who now, in 1139, had come over from Germany, with her brother the earl of Glouceſter. Notwithſtanding the haughty and abſurd behaviour of Maud, nothing could ſhake the fidelity of David, who never left her till he had put Stephen in her power. He concluded an advantageous peace with Stephen, who ſoon after adopted Maud's ſon Henry (by the earl of Anjou) as his heir. Some ſay, Stephen intended that honour to David's ſon Henry, who was in great favour with him, and had reſided many years in England; but that excellent prince, who was greatly beloved by the Scots, died in 1150, four years prior to the death of Stephen. David, ſickening at the loſs of his only ſon (by Matilda, neice to William the Conqueror) ended a ſplendid reign of twenty-nine years, at Carliſle, on the 24th of May 1153. He was a pious prince; left behind him the greateſt character for valour, and its uſual concomitant, generoſity; and is conſidered by many to have compiled that ſyſtem of Scots laws called Regium Majeſtatem: but the Engliſh aſcribe to their own judge Glanville the merit of that work.

Malcolm IV. the ninety-ſecond king, was grandſon of David, ſurnamed, from his vow of celibacy, the Maiden. He ſucceeded to the throne A. D. 1153. In the beginning of his reign, Somerled, thane of Argyle, an ambitious man, put himſelf at the head of a large army; conſiſting partly of his own vaſſals, and partly of lawleſs perſons, drawn to his ſtandard by the love of plunder, or excited by a conſciouſneſs of guilt, and began to ravage the country. But the celebrated Gilchriſt, earl of Angus, being ſent againſt him, gave him a total defeat, and obliged him to fly for refuge into Ireland, where he probably died. Gilchriſt, after this, cruſhed ſeveral leſs rebellions; and had juſt reſtored peace in Scotland, when an extraordinary meſſage was ſent to Malcolm, from Henry II. of England: this monarch required Malcolm either to give up Northumberland, Cumberland, and Huntingdon, or prepare to defend them. Malcolm, fond of peace and retirement, made a compoſition, and gave up the two former counties, on condition that on doing homage he ſhould quietly enjoy Huntingdon.—His nobles, diſguſted at this ſubmiſſion, obliged him to declare war againſt Henry, for recovery of Northumberland and Cumberland; but, in a peace, which he very ſoon concluded, he gave up all right and title to the former; and Henry ceding the latter to him as a fief of England, Malcolm then devoted himſelf wholly to his monks; amongſt whom, in 1165, he ended his days: for he rendered his perſon and authority contemptible by the alienation he made of Northumberland, and that ſcandalous puſillanimity apparent in every part of his conduct.

His brother, William, the ninety-third king, ſurnamed Lyon, ſucceeded him A. D. 1165. He inſtantly demanded the reſtoration of Northumberland; and at length determined to recover it by force of arms. A war commencing, he was, in the firſt battle (through an unſkilful diviſion of his troops) taken priſoner by a party of the enemy in Scots habits, and immediately, in a very ignominious manner, hurried away to Richmond, and afterwards conducted to Henry in France, who committed him to the caſtle of Falaiſe. Here the captive king, impatient under confinement, on the promiſe of his own liberty, gave up that of his country: for William was ſcarcely returned to his people, before Henry and his ſon (whom he had made co-partner in the government) ordered William with his brothers and barons to attend them at York, where the former did homage for all Scotland; and the latter ſwore fealty to Henry againſt William their king, if he ſhould at any time refuſe to acknowledge himſelf a vaſſal of England.

Richard, Henry's ſucceſſor, in conſideration of 10,000 marks of ſilver (a vaſt ſum at that time) remitted the homage for all Scotland, and gave him poſſeſſion of Cumberland, Weſtmoreland, and Lancaſter, as a feodary of England. William, for this favour, aſſiſted him in a cruſade, and baffled the deſign of his brother John, who, during Richard's abſence, would have uſurped the throne. Richard, in gratitude, paſſed a charter, which ſtipulated, amongſt other things, "That whenever the king of Scotland entered England upon ſummons, he ſhould receive from the king one hundred ſhillings per day for his expences: when at court, thirty in money, twelve of the king's fine loaves, as many biſcuits of fine wheat, four gallons of his beſt and eight of his common wine, two pounds both of pepper and cinnamon, two cakes of wax about twelve pounds each, four wax candles, forty long, and eighty common ones; and that on his quitting the kingdom, he ſhould be reconducted by the biſhops and ſheriffs, with the ſame allowance of an hundred ſhillings per day." This grant, dated the 12th of April 1194, freed the Scots from a great expence, as well as from that diſgraceful part of feudal ſubmiſſion, namely, attending the court of England on the moſt trifling occaſions.

Upon the death of Richard, William renewed his homage for his Engliſh lands to his ſucceſſor John. He alſo made a faint effort to recover Northumberland, which Richard, notwithſtanding his great regard, had ſtill kept himſelf; but it was never afterwards conſidered as belonging to Scotland.

William was at this time diſſatisfied with John, for having built a fort at Berwick; and the latter not being on very good terms with his people, was glad of any pretext to keep his army in motion: he therefore quarrelled with William concerning this fort; and marched to the confines of Scotland, where William was prepared for his reception. Here both kings concluded a treaty without bloodſhed: John received 11,000 marks of ſilver, demoliſhed the fort, promiſing it ſhould not be rebuilt, and marched his army back again. This action, except quelling an inſurrection, which had been raiſed in Caithneſs by one Godred, was the laſt that William performed; who, continuing a faithful ally to John, died, after a few years of uninterrupted but ſhameful tranquillity, in the 74th year of his age. Throughout his long reign of forty-nine years, he appears, to have been weak and irreſolute: the brighteſt ſide of his character was, the ſacrificing his own honour and grandeur to his people's eaſe and happineſs. By his wiſe Ermengarda he had Alexander, who ſucceeded him, and two daughters; Margery, who was married to the famous Hubert de Burgh; and Iſabel (whom Henry III. would have married, had his peers been willing) to the earl marſhal of England.

In reſpect to the ſtate of eccleſiaſtical affairs during this century, it appears that Alexander I. founded the abbies of Scone and St. Columba, and was a great benefactor to the ſee of St. Andrews. His ſucceſſor David, beſides founding the abbies of Jedburgh, Kelſo, Melroſe, Newbottle, Holyroodhouſe, and Kinloſſe, erected the biſhoprics of Roſs, Dunkeld, Brechin, and Dumblain. In 1175, it was propoſed to the Scots to elect the archbiſhop of York for their metropolitan, which was prevented from taking place, chiefly through the ſpirited behaviour of a young canon, named Gilbert; for which ſervice he was afterwards promoted to the biſhopric of Caithneſs. King William was alſo a great friend to the clergy; among other benefactions, he founded the abby of Aberbrothwick, to the memory of Thomas-à-Becket; and afterwards erected another at Lindores.

Alexander II. the ninety-fourth king, came to the crown in 1214, when he was but ſixteen years of age; but behaved with ſuch ſenſe and ſpirit, that many Engliſh barons put themſelves under his protection, againſt the tyranny of John; who was ſo exaſperated at this behaviour, that he invaded and ravaged many parts of Scotland. The young king now met John near the river Eſk, when the latter retreated, and ſet fire to ſeveral towns as he quitted them. Alexander not being able to overtake him, returned from Richmond through Weſtmoreland.

The Engliſh, unable to bear the tyranny of John, had invited over Lewis, ſon to the king of France. Lewis accordingly came over, and on his arrival in London, the barons and citizens took the oath of allegiance to him. This prince, though never crowned, acted as ſovereign of England; and Alexander did homage to him for the lands he held of that crown. Alexander moſt heartily eſpouſed the cauſe of Lewis, and therefore made head againſt John, who was ravaging Carliſle and Northumberland: he diſpoſſeſſed him of theſe places in right of Lewis, whoſe affairs, however, very ſoon declining, owing to the pope's ſentence of excommunication againſt his adherents, Alexander withdrew his aſſiſtance. Lewis was ſoon obliged to quit the kingdom, on Henry III. John's ſon, being crowned king, between whom and Alexander there ſeems to have been perfect peace, which was eſtabliſhed by the marriage of Henry's eldeſt ſiſter Joan, in 1221, to the Scots monarch.

By this time one Gilleſpy, at the head of a number of lawleſs free-booters, committed moſt dreadful ravages in Murray and places adjacent: he conſumed the town of Inverneſs to aſhes, and ſlaughtered the inhabitants with great cruelty: he was at laſt ſubdued, and himſelf and two of his ſons beheaded. Another inſurrection was ſoon after raiſed by the baſtard ſon of the laird of Galloway, who had left his lands to his three daughters. When Alexander prepared to chaſtiſe him, being almoſt deſerted by his followers, he threw himſelf at his feet, and the king, after having righted his ſiſters, generouſly pardoned him.

In 1235, Scotland being at reſt after thoſe inteſtine diſturbances which are often moſt fatal to a kingdom, Alexander and his queen paid a viſit to their brother Henry, on account, as ſome ſay, of the diſgrace of Hubert de Burgh, who was likewiſe his brother-in-law. During his ſtay at court, a diſpute happened concerning the right to Northumberland, ſo often diſputed by former kings. It was at laſt ſettled that Henry ſhould allow yearly, eighty marks in lieu of it. On Alexander's return to his own court, having loſt his wife whilſt in England, and having had no iſſue by her, he married the daughter of Eugelram de Cuſſey, a powerful French nobleman: and in 1241, it was agreed that Alexander's infant ſon ſhould marry the daughter of Henry. Scotland being again at peace, a party of volunteers went to the aſſiſtance of Lewis of France, who was engaged in a cruſade againſt the Infidels, from which ſcarcely one of them returned. Soon after this, Alexander formed a deſign of ſubduing the Ebrides; but in the midſt of his preparations was ſeized with a fever, and died much lamented in the 51ſt year of his age, and 35th of his glorious reign. He was certainly a ſpirited and wealthy prince; was the firſt who bore the lion for his arms; and he appears by his juſtice, piety, addreſs, and good-nature, to have been greatly beloved by the Engliſh, as well as by his own ſubjects.

Alexander II. left no iſſue, except his ſon Alexander III. the ninety-fifth king, who ſucceeded him in the 9th year of his age, and was crowned at Scone on the 15th of Auguſt 1249, in great pomp. In the firſt year of this king's reign, the factious and powerful family of Cumins created much uneaſineſs throughout the realm, carrying a high hand over the reſt of the nobility and gentry. To check their proceedings, it was deemed neceſſary to haſten the king's marriage; he therefore, in 1252, ſet out for that purpoſe; and the nuptials were ſolemnized on Chriſtmas-day, in the preſence of the king, queen, nobility, and clergy. Henry would now fain have received homage for all the Scots dominions; but the young king replied to Henry's demands, that marriage was the only buſineſs which he then came to execute, nor could he tranſact any other without the concurrence of his nobility. Henry on this anſwer, declared he had no thoughts to ſap the independency of Scotland; Alexander choſe him for his guardian, and then returned to his kingdom. The clan of the Cumins aſſerting that Alexander, by making himſelf the ward of Henry, endangered the liberties of his country, confined the young couple in Edinburgh caſtle; and, beſides other cruel treatment, debarred them from each other's embraces. The queen, however, had the addreſs to acquaint her father of theſe proceedings, who immediately came into Scotland, and, uſing great circumſpection and judgment, reſtored them to their dignity; their jailers ſubmitting to be fined for their behaviour. Henry returned to England, leaving the Scots ſatisfied, and Alexander now at age to manage his ſubjects himſelf; and he ſoon gained, by his juſtice and moderation, the entire confidence of his people; but a ſtorm was now gathering, by which the liberty of the whole kingdom was endangered.

Donaldbane, Malcolm Canmore's brother, on the uſurpation of Macbeth, had taken refuge in the Ebrides or Weſtern Iſles, which were then, and had ever ſince been, in the poſſeſſion of the king of Norway. Alexander II. intended, as we obſerved before, had he lived, to have annexed theſe Ebrides to his dominions. The recollection of this circumſtance, and the tender age of his ſucceſſor, ſeems to have ſuggeſted to Haco, king of Norway, a deſign to invade Scotland: as a pretext, he told Alexander, that Donaldbane had promiſed his predeceſſor Magnus, as a gratification for his protection and ſervices, that Bute and Arran ſhould be conſidered as part of the Ebrides. Haco therefore deſired they might be immediately given to him; but on a refuſal, fuſal, he came over, on the 1ſt of Auguſt 1263, with a fleet of one hundred and ſixty ſail of ſhips. Alexander, in the greateſt conſternation at this unexpected attack, ſent remonſtrances to Haco, who, having landed his troops, ſubdued Arran and Bute, and taken the town of Air, would liſten to no offers of peace. Alexander, in the mean time, having raiſed a ſmall army, met the Norwegians at a place called Larges. In the battle which enſued, the lines of the invaders were broken, and a moſt horrible carnage followed: 20,000 of the enemy are reported to have been ſlain on the ſpot; ſuch of them as eſcaped to their ſhips were wrecked the day following; and Haco, who in a little veſſel had reached the Orkneys, died there of grief at his diſappointment. Magnus, Haco's ſon, finding that, in conſequence of this defeat, many of the iſles had ſurrendered to Alexander, ſent over offers of a treaty. It was ſoon after agreed, that all the Ebrides, and the Iſle of Man, ſhould be, in future, the ſole right of the kings of Scotland; and that their reſpective inhabitants ſhould enjoy their privileges, as when ſubjects to Norway, any of whom ſhould, if they thought fit, be at liberty to depart with their effects, unmoleſted. Alexander, in conſideration of theſe iſlands, agreed to pay Magnus annually one hundred ſilver marks, and, according to ſome, gave him one thouſand in hand. To conciliate the parties, a marriage was afterwards concluded between Margaret, Alexander's daughter, and Eric, ſon and heir to Magnus, which took place by proxy at Roxburgh, on the 15th of July 1281. Thus happily for Scotland terminated an invaſion, which at firſt ſeemed to forebode very fatal conſequences.

The tranquillity of the realm being thus ſecured, Alexander with his queen paid a viſit to his father Henry: and at his court, at Woodſtock, Margaret was delivered of a ſon. Alexander, during his ſtay with Henry, conſtantly received his five pounds per day, and conſidered it, not as his father's bounty, but his own right. On his return to Scotland, he aſſiſted king Henry with 5000 men againſt his rebellious barons. He likewiſe, in 1270, out of affection to Lewis of France, augmented the Scots guard about his perſon, from twenty men, which had continued a cuſtom from the year 883, to one hundred: ſo that it was ſaid, the Scots were faithful to a proverb: the name of this guard is not entirely aboliſhed in France. Two years after this died Alexander's friend and father Henry, to whoſe ſucceſſor Edward, Alexander proved a good ally. In 1278, he attended at Weſtminſter, as the firſt peer of England, and was thanked by Edward for his great ſervices. And in ſwearing fealty to him for the lands which he held in England, Alexander, having before taken notice of an ambiguous expreſſion, which the biſhop of Norwich had ſuggeſted to Edward, declared aloud, "None but God hath right to the "homage of my kingdom."

The queen and children of Alexander being dead, he was adviſed, in order to prevent diſputes concerning the ſucceſſion, to marry again, and therefore eſpouſed Jolet, the daughter of the earl of Dreux; but before ſhe brought any iſſue, as he was hunting in the county of Fife, his horſe took fright, ruſhed down a precipice, called the Black Rock, and killed him on the ſpot. This melancholy fate befell him on the 19th of March 1285, in the 45th year of his age, and the 37th of his reign, after having left many proofs of his great wiſdom, valour, and juſtice.

This excellent prince limited the equipages of his nobility, and gained Scotland the firſt name of a trading country. His ſubjects, who were ſaid to be now more civilized than either the Engliſh or French, from perſonal affection, and the bad conſequences they foreſaw would ariſe by this chaſm in the ſucceſſion, lamented his untimely death, which is indeed a fatal æra in the Scots annals: for Edward of England ſeems, even in the life-time of Alexander, to have formed deſigns prejudicial to the liberties of Scotland. His natural cunning prevented him, however, from giving much cauſe of ſuſpicion. During the diſputes which ſucceeded, he imagined, that her independency might the more eaſily fall a prey; and the hot-headed chiefs, who, in a few years, were ſcrambling for the crown, gave Edward, perhaps, a better opportunity to carry his point than his moſt ſanguine expectations could ſuggeſt.

The diſputes concerning the ſucceſſion have been conſidered, by ſome Scots hiſtorians, as beginning immediately on Alexander's death; but it ſeems to be pretty certain that Margaret, the young princeſs of Norway, who was Alexander's grand-daughter, was, in 1285, univerſally deemed his ſucceſſor, though a mere infant. Six agents were choſen to act during her minority, all Scotſmen, at which Edward was very much mortified; as he expected, being grand-uncle to the queen, to have been made her guardian. However, finding the Scots extremely jealous of their independency, and as he was bent on having power over them, he ſecretly concluded with Eric, the father of Margaret, a treaty of marriage between her and his ſon, the prince of Wales, though they were both very young at this time.

It might probably have been happy, had the firſt ſcheme for uniting the two kingdoms taken place; for the ſtates of Scotland hearing of the treaty of marriage, agreed to it (though under articles highly to the honour of that kingdom) and the young queen was ſent for over. The regents and principal nobility went to the Orkneys, in order to receive and conduct her to the throne. This was in the year 1290.

Margaret, who was of a very delicate conſtitution, and then but ſeven years old, not being able to bear the fatigue of a tempeſtuous voyage, died in her paſſage. This circumſtance, which filled the Scots with grief, was highly agreeable to Edward. That monarch, who, in the intended marriage, ſeemed to have the probability of her early death in view, now took his meaſures accordingly. His conduct, as will hereafter appear, gave birth to ſuch fierce wars between the two kingdoms, as had nearly proved the deſtruction of them. The firſt interregnum, in 1291, now began.

Advice was no ſooner brought to Edward, of the young queen's death, and that in conſequence, there were many competitors for the vacant throne, than he prepared for a journey into Scotland, in order to prove, as he ſaid, that the kingdom was a fief of his own. But before he could ſet out, the debates in the Scots parliament concerning the rights of ſucceſſion, from the importance of the ſubject and the intricacy of the titles, ran ſo high, that archbiſhop Fraſer, to prevent the ſword, as uſual, from being finally appealed to, made a motion to the nobility, that the king of England ſhould be choſen arbitrator. This being agreed to, on the 10th of May, Edward convened them in the pariſh church; and by the mouth of his juſticiary Roger de Brabançon, declared, that as he did not doubt that they had deſired him for their arbiter under a ſenſe of his being the lord of their kingdom, he required them, by way of form, to acknowledge him as ſuch, before he proceeded to the cognizance of their affairs. The Scots, aſtoniſhed at this extraordinary demand, replied, that they had never thought of ſuch a conceſſion; and Edward, after expreſſing a feigned ſurpriſe at their demur, and vowing that he was determined to maintain his right, granted them three weeks conſideration. During this interval, Edward was tampering with the candidates; and, to heighten his own importance, encouraged more to offer themſelves; ſo that before the three weeks were expired, they amounted to 12. As theſe were the moſt powerful families in Scotland, and as it were dependent on his will, he rightly imagined they would not thwart his deſign. When the ſtates met him in June, he ordered his chancellor to read over what he called undeniable proofs of his right to the ſovereignty of Scotland: theſe were in fact mere Monkiſh forgeries; however, as ſoon as the chancellor had ended, he, without waiting for the Scots reply, addreſſed himſelf to the competitors, and firſt aſked Robert de Bruce, whether he would have juſtice done him from the king of England, as liege lord of Scotland? Bruce anſwered in the affirmative, and the reſt followed his example; after which Edward himſelf declared, that notwithſtanding his office of arbitrator, he reſerved the liberty of making and proſecuting, as he pleaſed, his own claim.

Theſe acknowledgments were, no doubt, very diſagreeable to the bulk of the Scots; yet, either intimidated by his threats, or cajoled by his promiſes, all who were preſent ſwore implicit fealty to him; inſiſting however, that the diſpute relative to the ſucceſſion ſhould be terminated in their own kingdom; to which Edward agreed, though he at the ſame time told them they muſt not conſider it as a precedent. Berwick was then appointed the place of deciſion; and on the 2d day of Auguſt the competitors were to urge their claims. Mean time, as Edward ſaid, that as in quality of umpire he ought to have the power of executing his ſentence, he deſired that the kingdom might be made over to him, that he might diſpoſe of it in future to the perſon to whom it appeared to appertain.

The barons certainly attended to this demand, in whatever view they might conſider it; for Gilbert de Umfraville, earl of Angus, was the only man who refuſed to give up the forts in his poſſeſſion, till he was over-ruled by the impatient ambition of the competitors. Theſe on the day appointed made their appearance; but the claims of ten being found defective, the conteſt lay wholly betwixt Bruce and Baliol. Bruce was the ſon of Iſabel, ſecond daughter to David, earl of Huntington, who was third ſon of king David the 1ſt; and Baliol was the grandſon of Margaret the eldeſt daughter. The former added, in ſupport of his claims, that Alexander III. had declared, that he ſhould ſucceed him, which he offered to prove from ſeveral who had heard the promiſe. Edward diſmiſſed the competitors till the 2d of June following; when, after having taken the beſt advice, and maturely conſidered the ſubject, he told them the ſucceſſion ſhould be finally ſettled on that day. Againſt this day forty council were retained by Bruce, the ſame number by Baliol, and twenty-four by king Edward, to eſtabliſh his demands.

The cauſe coming now to a hearing, Baliol, as being the grandſon of an eldeſt daughter, inſiſted, by the laws of nations, he had a juſter right than Bruce, who was the ſon of a ſecond daughter; and all the other claimants being nonſuited, Edward, reſerving the proſecution of his own right to be tried by him or his ſucceſſors whenever they thought fit, declared John Baliol, the ninety-ſixth king. He accordingly ſwore fealty to Edward, and was accepted by the Scots as king. His homage being atteſted by ſixteen biſhops, and the principal nobility of both kingdoms, Edward returned home exulting, and Baliol went back to his dominions covered with ſhame.

Scarcely a week had paſſed before the king of England had an opportunity to aſſert his ſupremacy: for the new king had a ſummons ſent him to appear in perſon, at Weſtminſter, at the inſtance of Macduff, earl of Fife; whoſe eſtate having been ſequeſtered by the former regency, Baliol refuſed to reſign. John appearing at Weſtminſter, in conſequence of Edward's ſummons, and having taken his ſeat in parliament as firſt peer of England, expoſtulated with Edward concerning the rectitude of his proceedings, in citing him to appear in England to anſwer matters which only concerned Scotland; and Baliol appealed to his promiſes. Edward inſiſted on his right to judge of the affairs of Scotland; adding, with a guſt of paſſion, that their king ſhould appear before him as often as he ſaw fit. The plaintiffs preferred their cauſes; and Baliol, as defendant, would have anſwered by proxy, but this indulgence was denied him; and the vaſſal king was obliged to appear at the bar as a private perſon.—Baliol declared that he muſt conſult his ſubjects, before he would anſwer to the earl of Fife's charge. This behaviour was judged a contempt of the court: and Edward declaring he would ſeize Berwick, Roxburgh, and Jedburgh, till Baliol ſhould come to a ſenſe of his duty; that weak king, who had only made a flaſh of reſolution, immediately acknowledged Edward's ſovereignty, and moſt humbly begged his leave to conſult the Scots parliament. This requeſt, at Macduff's inſtance, was granted; and Baliol, after having promiſed to appear on a day appointed, was permitted to retire. Greatly chagrined at this mortifying treatment, he returned to his people, who, though they deſpiſed his perſon, gave an ear to a propoſal which he made, of reſigning his power to twelve of them, who ſhould conſult together on means for ſhaking off their ſlaviſh dependence. They conſidered Edward's rupture with France as a very favourable juncture. The twelve regents therefore renewed the ancient league offenſive and defenſive with that kingdom, and concluded a treaty of alliance between Baliol's ſon, Edward, and king Philip's niece. Theſe negociations were not, however, carried on ſo privately, but Edward gained intelligence of them; which, at ſo critical a time, greatly diſpleaſed him. But to be certain as to the truth of Baliol's tranſactions, or rather of thoſe of his regents, he ordered him to appear. He was anſwered by the Scots, that the pope having abſolved their king from his allegiance and fealty, he was no longer to expect his homage. This meſſage was delivered to him by the bold abbot of Aberbrothwick. On which Edward exclaimed, "How fooliſhly does this "ſtupid ſon of mine behave! well, if he will not "come to us, we will go to him;" and ſending his nephew againſt the French, he prepared to be as good as his word. Before he proceeded to hoſtilities, in 1296, he made an offer of the crown to Robert Bruce, the ſon of Baliol's rival, and the father of his heroic ſucceſſor. This offer, Bruce, who was much in favour with Edward, thankfully accepted; and in conſequence of it, gained over a ſtrong party to the intereſt of Edward, who, having thus gotten what he aimed at in the propoſal, began his march. He advanced before Berwick with an army of 40,000 men; but was received ſo warmly, that, to execute his purpoſe, and ſave the time and expence of a regular ſiege, he had recourſe to ſtratagem. He made a ſhew of raiſing the ſiege, and a ſtrong party of his troops, habited like Scotſmen, approached their walls. The garriſon had received advice that Baliol was marching to their aſſiſtance; and imagining this body of troops to be a detachment from that army, they opened their gates to receive them. The credulous Scots found their miſtake too late; for the Engliſh being in poſſeſſion of their gates, now poured in upon them, and maſſacred, without reſpect to perſon, age, or ſex, 7000; ſome ſay, double that number was ſlaughtered: Edward then drew a deep ditch round the town, which became part of England from that time.

The ſiege of Dunbar was the next object: he therefore marched forward for that purpoſe; but Baliol, at the head of a large army, impeded his deſign.

ſign. Edward beheld his approach with pleaſure. He imagined, that to defeat this army, would be, in effect, to conquer all Scotland, which was the great object of his ruinous ambition. With the moſt paſſionate deſire, therefore, he haſtened to conqueſt, and ſucceeded; for the Scots were routed, with the loſs of 10,000 men. Dunbar, Jedburgh, and Roxburgh, immediately ſurrendered; as did alſo Edinburgh, on Edward's approach with a reinforcement of 40,000 men from Wales and Ireland. Being now almoſt totally maſter of Scotland, Baliol was ſo ſurpriſed, that he ſent agents with offers of any, even the moſt abject, ſubmiſſion to obtain Edward's forgiveneſs. Accordingly, in the preſence of many nobility and clergy of both kingdoms, he was uſhered into a church-yard at Montroſe, mounted upon the moſt ſcurvy horſe that could be procured, and by way of ſpear, he was equipped with a white wand: thus accoutred, he appeared before king Edward, who received him with ineffable contempt. In the moſt doleful ſtrains the pageant monarch then ſtript himſelf of his crown and kingdom, abjured the league with France, and confeſſing the utmoſt ſorrow that he had ever offended his liege lord, moſt humbly implored his clemency. After this ceremony had been performed in ſeveral other places, the inſenſible Baliol was ſent under a guard to England, and there confined. The nobility (except William Douglaſs, who would not acknowledge Edward, and on that account died in jail) now renewing their fealty, Bruce put Edward in mind of his promiſe; but the king ſternly replying, “Have we “ nothing to do but to win kingdoms for thee?” Bruce, who knew the king's temper too well to contend, retired to his eſtate. Edward had now completed his deſign; and having inſtituted Warren, earl of Surrey and Suſſex, his lieutenant in the kingdom; Hugh de Creſſingham, his treaſurer; and William Ormeſby, his juſticiary, returned joyfully to England; taking along with him the crown and regalia, and a marble chair, in which the kings were always crowned at Scone, and which the common people among the Scots believed to have been Jacob's pillow at Padan-Aram, and the palladium of their liberty. His cunning thus took advantage of their credulity; for the taking of this ſtone, which is ſtill in Weſtminſter-abbey, greatly reſigned them to what they thought their fate; and he took care, beſides, to deſtroy, with the moſt barbarous policy, every valuable record in the kingdom, in which the hiſtory and antiquities of Scotland had been carefully preſerved till that period. Theſe tranſactions made way for the ſecond interregnum.

The regents appointed by Edward acted with ſuch prudence, that liberty ſeemed juſt taking her laſt farewell of a people to whom ſhe had formerly been ſo dear; when Sir William Wallace, a patriotic hero, equal to any that antiquity can produce, ſtood forth, and revived, by his bold example, the drooping ſpirits of his countrymen. His reſolution of loſing the laſt drop of his blood in defence of Scotland's independency (connected with ſome exploits, which he, who was a man of gigantic ſtature and amazing ſtrength, had almoſt ſingly performed) was not long made public, before he was joined by Malcolm, earl of Lenox, Lord William Douglaſs, governor of Berwick, Sir John Graham, Sir Neil Campbell, Sir Chriſtopher Seton, Sir John Ramſay, Sir Fergus Barclay, Andrew Murray, Adam Gordon, and many others, with their friends and dependents. This brave compact, under the command of Wallace, ſoon began to diſtinguiſh itſelf. The king's regents were routed; Ormeſby, who had ruled with the greateſt ſeverity, narrowly eſcaped with his life. The caſtles of Dundee, Forfar, Brechin, and Montroſe, were recovered; and Wallace, at the head of his forces, entered Aberdeen juſt as the Engliſh had ſet it on fire. The fame of his exploits had now reached Edward in France, where, not expecting this event, he had carried his whole force. He ordered his lieutenant Warren, but he being infirm, he deputed the young Lord Piercy, to march againſt theſe ſworn foes to ſlavery. Wallace's army was now, in 1297, encamped at Sterling, conſiderably augmented, and increaſing daily. To attack it, the Engliſh were obliged to croſs the Forth, by a wooden bridge, which, when half the army had paſſed, gave way; ſome ſay, as Wallace had contrived, but rather being naturally unable to ſuſtain ſo great a weight. Wallace fell upon ſuch as had paſſed the bridge, and thoſe who eſcaped the ſword, were drowned in the river, while the party on the other ſide were almoſt totally deſtroyed by the earl of Lenox. This memorable defeat was on the 15th of September; after which, the Scots forces, by plundering the Engliſh, diſſipated their fears of a famine, that, by a neglect of agriculture, ſeemed to be haſtily approaching. The ſtates of Scotland, for his great ſervices, had now choſen Wallace their protector; while Edward haſtily returned from France to ſubdue the Scots. He had ſtill but too powerful a party in Scotland: for Bruce conſidered Wallace as an ambitious upſtart; and he became the protector's mortal enemy.

Bruce had hitherto remained neuter; but being obliged, on Edward's arrival in England, to declare either for him or his country, he made choice of the former, and gained over the inhabitants of Galloway: ſo that when the king, with a great army, approached the borders of Scotland, he received a conſiderable reinforcement from this nobleman. In the mean time, Wallace, with about 30,000 men, was encamped near Falkirk, in an excellent diſpoſition. Some diſaffected troops in his army beginning now to diſpute about the point of honour, Edward took notice of it, and began his attack; the charge was re-echoed by the Scots with ſuch an uncommon noiſe, that the king's horſe taking fright, threw him, and broke two of his ribs. Edward, regardleſs of his pain, charged in perſon with the utmoſt fury; and Wallace, who had animated his troops only with theſe words, “Behold Edward, “ and fly if you can,” ſuſtained the ſhock without diſorder. He was then ready for a general charge in his turn, when Cumin, who had been refuſed the poſt of honour, filed off with his diviſion without aſſailing the enemy; thus Stuart and his brave troops were entirely expoſed and cut to pieces. Bruce and his party now wheeling round a hill with an intention of ſurrounding the few troops which remained, Wallace had juſt time to retreat beyond the river Caron. In this battle, fought on the 22d of July 1298, there fell upwards of 10,000 Scots, and ſcarcely 100 Engliſh; and it is imagined that this great ſlaughter, and perhaps the defeat, was as much owing to the treachery of Cumin, whoſe deſertion put Wallace's whole army into diſorder, as to the ſuperior number and ſkill of Edward's forces. Bruce, who was ordered to purſue, finding, on his coming to the river Caron, that Wallace had paſſed it, agreed to a parley. Bruce taxed the protector with temerity and ambition, in taking arms againſt ſuch a king as Edward was, to become himſelf the monarch of Scotland. Wallace warmly diſclaimed any thoughts as to the crown, replying with a patriotic indignation, “To you the miſeries of your “ country are owing; You left her overwhelmed “ with wars, and I undertook the cauſe which you “ betrayed; a cauſe which I will eſpouſe as long as “ I breathe.” It is ſaid, that theſe words had ſo great an effect on Bruce, that, ſtung with remorſe, he retired to his eſtate, where he ſoon after ended his days.

In the midſt of his victories, Edward was obliged to return to England for proviſion; and in his march back, Wallace kept continually galling his rear. Wallace retired to the woods, where, with a few friends, he harraſſed the Engliſh detachments and convoys, till the year 1303; notwithſtanding Cumin had, by the interpoſition of the pope and the king of France, obtained a truce; which expiring in July, and the Scots refuſing to ſubmit to Edward, he ſent a large army among them, with orders, as the Scots writers affirm, to lay waſte the country. This army, which had ſeparated itſelf into three diviſions, proceeded ſo incautiouſly, that one party was ſurpriſed at Roſlin by 10,000 Scots, headed by Cumin and Fraſer, and defeated. The ſecond diviſion hearing of this diſaſter, coming up ſoon after, ſhared the ſame fate; and the third now appearing, the Scots, almoſt fainting with fatigue, not only ſtood the ſhock of it, but after an obſtinate ſtruggle, gained the victory. Scots writers are greatly elevated on this occaſion, repreſenting each diviſion of the Engliſh as ſuperior in number to all the Scots army; but this circumſtance is denied by ſome Engliſh hiſtorians, and the triple conqueſt placed in a very different light. Edward, ſome ſay, on this ever memorable defeat, levied a greater army than ever, and, entering Scotland, ſpread deſolation far and wide; ſo that the Scots, having been denied aſſiſtance from their faithleſs ally the French, were forced to ſue for peace, which Edward, not willing to drive the Scots to deſperation, granted them; and a treaty was concluded at Stratford, on the 9th of February 1304, and was the only inſtance of Edward's clemency to the Scots. Upon their ſubmiſſion, he only impoſed ſmall fines on the nobility; and on the 15th of October, in the following year, he granted a pardon, from which only Wallace, that enemy to ſlavery, had the diſtinguiſhed honour of being excluded. The gallant leader being thus exalted, was ſoon after betrayed at Glaſgow, by his pretended friend Monteith. Edward, to his everlaſting diſgrace, tried and executed him as a rebel; though the hero, who never had acknowledged him for his ſovereign, pleaded, with great juſtice and force of argument, Not guilty, to the indictment.

Religious orders in the church of Scotland increaſed greatly during this century: for, in 1219, the biſhop of St. Andrew's introduced the Dominicans, Franciſcans, and Jacobines; and, in 1256, a houſe was allotted at Perth for the Carmelites.

The pope having convened in 1280, a council at Lyons, all the biſhops of Scotland (except Dunkeld and Murray) were preſent at it. It was there ordered, that no fees were to be paid even to the biſhops or archdeacons, unleſs they performed their duty in perſon, if not lawfully prevented; pluralities were alſo ſuppreſſed, and the Minorites, Predicants, Carmelites, and Hermits of St. Auguſtine, were the only order of the Mendicants that were allowed.

In this century flouriſhed Duns Scotus; and likewiſe Michael Scot, and Thomas Lermonth, commonly called Thomas the Rhymer, two reputed prophets, who are ſaid to have foretold the union with England, among other ſurpriſing things.

The Engliſh yoke was very impatiently borne by the Scots; during the interregnum, Robert Bruce, earl of Carrick, ſoon perceived this. His father, whom Wallace had ſtung with remorſe, it is generally thought, had, in his retirement, enjoined this ſon of his to ſtrive for the Scots crown, when he ſaw an opportunity. He had in confidence communicated his deſign of being king of Scotland to Cumin, who being a powerful nobleman, it was neceſſary he ſhould be in his intereſt. Cumin, who appears to have had ſimilar views, betrayed his confidence. Bruce meeting him afterwards in a monaſtery at Dumfries, reproached him for his baſeneſs; and high words from hence ariſing, Bruce, in his paſſion, ſtabbed him, on the 10th of February 1306. After this deed, which ſome writers have aggravated, and which cannot be juſtified, the voice of the people called him to the throne, as his birthright. He was accordingly crowned at Scone on the 25th of March following, in the preſence of the biſhops of St. Andrew and Glaſgow, and many noblemen of diſtinction.

This news affected Edward with aſtoniſhment; he prepared immediately with all haſte to cruſh the new king, before he could collect any conſiderable ſtrength. Accordingly, he entered Scotland with a numerous army; and Robert, with a few undiſciplined troops, waited to receive him at Perth. Here enſued a battle, in which Bruce was defeated, though he performed prodigies of valour. Edward then ravaged Scotland once more, and gave free ſcope to the violence of his temper: he murdered every male relation and friend of Bruce's that he could find; among whom were three of his brothers. He put the king's ſiſter in a wooden cage, where he kept her as a ſpectacle; in ſhort, every day gave freſh inſtances of the inveterate hatred he bore them.

Robert having, in the mean time, eluded Edward's ſearch, by flying to the Orkneys, was concluded to be dead; and the king of England leaving the earl of Pembroke in his ſtead, returned to quiet his domeſtic affairs. Upon his departure, Bruce, having given his friends intimation of his retreat, very ſoon collected 1000 men, and in the depth of winter attacked and routed the Engliſh forces. His troops every day increaſing, Edward now collected all the force in his power, and determined, as he declared, to deſtroy Scotland from ſea to ſea. But death fruſtrated this horrid deſign; for arriving at Carliſle, he was ſeized with a flux, which carried him off, at Burgh on the Sands, on the 7th of July 1307, in the 68th year of his age; having, as it is reported, ordered his ſon to continue the march, and carry his corpſe before the Scots, as a terror to them.

Edward II. did not ſo much meditate the conqueſt of Scotland, as the reſtoring his great favourite Gaveſton, who had been baniſhed by his father, and whom he now haſtened to recal. He left, however, ſome forces behind him, under the command of John, earl of Richmond, which Bruce defeated, and afterwards reduced many ſmall forts belonging to the Engliſh, with whom, after this, he concluded a treaty, that he might gather ſufficient force to reduce the ſtrong caſtles of Edinburgh, Perth, Sterling, and Berwick, which ſince Edward's firſt conqueſt of Scotland had been in their poſſeſſion. In 1312, having, as he imagined, effected his purpoſe, he beſieged Berwick; but a famine obliged him to raiſe the ſiege, and make excurſions into England for proviſion. On his return, he ſurpriſed and took the caſtles of Roxburgh and Perth, and laying cloſe ſiege to Edinburgh, he became maſter of it with much difficulty. He gained great reputation by theſe exploits, added to the reduction of the Iſle of Man, which he compaſſed, to ſecure a communication with Ireland.

When Edward, hearing of theſe conqueſts, recollected his father's laſt words, "reduce the Scots" he aſſembled an army (which according to the beſt accounts conſiſted of 100,000 men) and marched into Scotland. Robert, with 30,000 choice troops, lay encamped at Bannocburn, a place, which by nature, hindered his troops from being ſurrounded or attacked in flank. On the 25th of June 1314, Edward's army began the attack; but, under an aſſurance of victory, in ſo irregular a manner, that Robert's veterans whom he had learned to fight with broad ſword and target, diſordered, cut them in pieces, and, in ſhort, obtained as complete a victory as any recorded in hiſtory. Robert with one ſtroke killed Sir Richard Bohun, reckoned the ſtrongeſt knight in England, and had very nigh taken king Edward, who eſcaped by the goodneſs of his horſe. In conſequence of this ſignal victory, the Scots gained a prodigious booty. There were found in the Engliſh camp waggon loads of chains and fetters, which Edward had prepared for the Scots. The priſoners, doubtleſs, expected that theſe would now be their portion: on the contrary, he behaved with the greateſt lenity; and exchanged the nobility amongſt them for his wife and ſiſter, whom Edward I. had carried to London. Stirling, Dunbar, and Berwick, now ſurrendered to Bruce, who became in reality king of Scotland.

EDWARD, the brother of Bruce, had eſcaped the rage of Edward I. and his genius alſo prompted him to aſpire to a kingdom. Underſtanding therefore that the Iriſh, being ſorely oppreſſed by their Engliſh governors, were ripe for a revolt, he borrowed forces of Robert, and landing at Carrickfergus with about 7,000 men, deſtroyed Dundalk, and drove the Engliſh out of Ulſter. Moſt of the Iriſh, who conſidered themſelves as relative Scots, now declaring in his favour, he was crowned king; while Robert kept dallying Edward of England till 1317, with offers of peace. Edward Bruce was then hard preſſed by the Engliſh, and Robert went over to his aſſiſtance; having been of great ſervice to his brother (who, the year after however, was ſurpriſed and ſlain) he retired to his own dominions, on receiving intimation that Edward of England had thoughts of invading them. That monarch would have been glad to have exchanged Ireland for Scotland; of which, in the king's abſence, he had endeavoured to become maſter. He had beſieged Berwick; which Robert immediately, on his arrival, marched to relieve, and driving the Engliſh before him, ravaged York. This conduct ſo enraged the archbiſhop of that city, that he raiſed an army of 10,000 men, and commanded it himſelf; but the infatuated prelate was defeated at Mitton, on the 21ſt of September 1319. This was called the White Battle, from the number of prieſts and monks who fought in their ſurplices, and were drowned or ſlain.

After this victory, Robert concluded a truce with England, and, till 1322, cultivated the arts of peace. But Edward in the mean time raiſed a large army, broke the truce, and, in July, invaded the kingdom. He penetrated as far as Edinburgh, where his vaſt army was again defeated, and himſelf purſued to York. Robert, in his return, burnt the town of Rippon, and fined Beverly in a conſiderable ſum. Edward now gave over all thoughts of ſubduing the Scots, and made peace with Robert. The affairs of commerce and intercourſe were likewiſe regulated; and Scotland, after her fatigues, enjoyed perfect reſt till the death of the Engliſh king in 1326, when war was again renewed.

In 1328, Edward III. by the advice of his queen, and her great favourite Mortimer, in conſideration of 30,000 marks, renounced all fealty and homage from the Scots for himſelf and ſucceſſors. This great point being gained, Robert ſat down contented; but in the year following, a leproſy, with which he was afflicted, increaſed ſo faſt, as to put an end to his life on the 11th of June 1329, in the 54th year of his age, and 24th of a glorious reign. He had ordered before his death, according to the cuſtom of the times, that his heart ſhould be carried to the Holy Land, which Sir James Douglas faithfully performed. He had previouſly ſettled the ſucceſſion on his grandſon, the great ſteward of Scotland. On his death-bed, he deſired that the Ebrides, or Weſtern Iſles, might never be governed by one man, leſt it ſhould excite him to rebellion; and that his countrymen in future prefer ſkirmiſhes and ſudden attacks to pitched battles, in their wars with England.

Robert Bruce was the firſt that introduced repreſentatives of boroughs in parliament, and had an equal genius for the field or cabinet. He was one of the greateſt princes that ever ſwayed the Scots ſceptre, whether conſidered as a warrior, a monarch, or a man. He was twice married: by the earl of Mar's ſiſter he had a daughter, who eſpouſed Walter, high ſteward of the kingdom; the other, Elizabeth, daughter of Henry de Burgh, brought him a ſon, who now, in the ninth year of his age, ſucceeded him, as David II. the 98th king, under the guardianſhip of Randolph, earl of Murray.

The government of Randolph, which commenced A. D. 1329, was a time of great felicity to the Scots: he proved rigidly juſt; for in 1332, he executed a malefactor, though the pope had pardoned him; and as the good regent died ſoon after this circumſtance, ſome ſuſpect that, for his irreverence to the pontiff, he was poiſoned by an enthuſiaſtic monk. Duncan, earl of Mar, was appointed his ſucceſſor.

But an unforeſeen revolution very ſoon took place. The mock monarch Baliol, having obtained his liberty, through the interceſſion of the pope, died at his eſtate in France, in 1314, leaving behind him two ſons, Edward and Henry. The former, inſtigated by one Twenge (a wretch whom the late regent had outlawed) to aſſert his claim to the Scots throne, liſtened to his advice; and, diſcloſing his ſentiments to Edward, king of England, requeſted his aſſiſtance, and offered, if ſucceſsful, to hold the crown of him as ſovereign, in the manner of his father. Edward, though he greatly regretted that he had been induced by Mortimer to reſign his ſupremacy over Scotland, was, however, a prince of too much juſtice or policy to violate openly a truce, which, notwithſtanding, he heartily wiſhed were expired. It is certain, that Baliol carried on matters ſo privately, that he landed at Kinghorn, with about 4,000 Engliſh and Scots volunteers, on the 1ſt of March 1332, without oppoſition. The ſtates, being appriſed of his intentions, levied a conſiderable force, in order to ſtop his progreſs. By the imprudence of the earl of Mar, and the valour of Baliol's troops, this army was defeated at Dupplin, the regent and many of the principal nobility being ſlain.

Perth ſoon after ſurrendered to the conqueror, who, proceeding to Scone, aſſumed the crown, and beame the 99th king. In conſequence of which, he declared, that he would conſider every one as a traitor, that ſhould refuſe to ſwear fealty to him. On this declaration, he was joined by many men of power, and his party now grew very ſtrong. The few, who ſtill continued faithful to David, appointed Sir Alexander Murray his regent; who being ſoon after taken priſoner by Baliol, (who had routed what forces he commanded) the royal party loſt ground every day. They, nevertheleſs, choſe lord Archibald Douglaſs regent, who applied to king Edward in behalf of the young king. On the other hand, Baliol, who had now become, in a manner, maſter of Scotland, ſent to him his homage, equally ſlaviſh as his father's had been.

The truce between England and Scotland being now expired, Edward conſidered himſelf at liberty to purſue the bent of his inclination. The ſubmiſſion of Baliol was highly agreeable to him; but yet he would not ſeem to quarrel with the other party, without ſome plauſible pretext. He told the regent he ſhould not concern himſelf with their eſtates, any further than claiming the caſtle of Berwick for himſelf, whoever poſſeſſed it. That caſtle his grandfather had ſolemnly annexed to his crown; and therefore, he ſaid, though recovered by Bruce, through the ſupineneſs of his father, it was nevertheleſs his right. King Edward ſoon after, with a vaſt force, laid ſiege to Berwick. After he had battered the place for more than a month, with very little ſucceſs, he raiſed the ſiege in order to relieve his queen, whom the Scots, in their turn, had beſieged in Bamborough caſtle; but they retiring at his approach, he returned to Berwick, and attacked that fort with redoubled vigour. The regent determined, at all events, to relieve this garriſon; and Edward, having received news, that he was advancing with a large army, poſſeſſed himſelf of a very advantageous ſtation on Halidon-Hill. The regent, unmindful of the late king's dying injunctions, was reſolute to attack Edward, though thus advantageouſly poſted. This raſh boldneſs terminated in a total defeat of the Scots army; the regent, with moſt of the nobility, fell, and 15,000 common men were either killed or made captive. Berwick immediately ſurrendered on this memorable victory, which, as it is ſaid, coſt the Engliſh only a knight, an eſquire, and fifteen ſoldiers.

After this defeat David and his young queen fled to France, which was almoſt the overthrow of the Brucean intereſt. Philip received them with a kingly hoſpitality, and ratified the following treaty: "I. A perpetual alliance and confederacy between both nations. II. That the Scots and French ſhould mutually ſuccour each other againſt the Engliſh, with men of war, to be waged and victualled at the expence of the party aſſiſted. III. That neither nation ſhould aſſiſt the Engliſh with money, victuals, or advice, without the conſent of both kings, under the penalty of being declared guilty of high treaſon. IV. That the French ſhould make no peace or truce with the Engliſh, except the king of Scots may be compriſed, named, and allowed therein; and that their pragmatic ſanctions be reciprocally confirmed at each change or ſucceſſion of them."

In the mean time, Edward Baliol had called a parliament, which met the beginning of February 1334, in the abbey-church of Holyrood-houſe. Here, in conſideration of the good ſervices of Edward king of England, he granted that monarch 2000l. ſterling per annum; and further, to ſhew his gratitude, as he called it, he followed Edward to Newcaſtle, where, on the 19th of June, after having given that king ſole and ſeparate right to ſeveral towns, counties, and caſtles in Scotland, he paid him the moſt ſlaviſh homage for the remainder of his kingdom. But when the Engliſh, in conſequence of this infamous ceſſion, came to take poſſeſſion of theſe places, the Scots began to look around them. They perceived that their king was Edward's tool, and that this ſtep would probably lead to the enſlaving the whole country.

By theſe means the Scots were ripe for revolt, when John Randolph, earl of Murray, came over from France, with Philip's promiſe to reſtore young David; and acquainting his countrymen, that, purſuant to the treaty, ten capital ſhips were coming over for that purpoſe, the Bruceans determined to commence hoſtilities. Robert the high ſteward of Scotland, and Sir Colin Campbell, declaring for king David, ſurpriſed and took the caſtle of Duncan in Kyle. This little ſucceſs determined numbers of the nobility to join them; and the high ſteward, who, though very young, was a man of great abilities, was choſen king David's regent. The French, who were never hearty friends, having in all this year ſent the Scots no aid, Bruce's party, blocked up by Edward of England, who poſſeſſed Edinburgh caſtle, and the paſſes of Stirling and the Forth, was without proviſions, money, and arms. But in the cauſe of liberty, what hardſhips will not a reſolute people endure! they retired to their fortreſſes, from which they ſurpriſed the Engliſh detachments, and lived on the plunder they had ſeized.

The royaliſts remained in this ſituation till the ſpring of 1336, when Philip of France began to ſtir in favour of David. He found a martial diſpoſition in the young monarch, whom he now intruſted with the command of 26 gallies, ſufficiently victualled and manned, with which he made deſcents on Guernſey and Jerſey. He was unable to land in his own dominions: but as Edward went to England, to conſult his parliament about proceeding againſt the French, his friends were able to aſſemble; ſo that having taken Dunoter, Kineff, and Lauriſter caſtles, and being joined by Sir Alexander Murray, who was taken priſoner in 1332, and now made joint-regent, they grew ſtrong enough, in the ſpring 1337, to reduce the caſtle of Bothwell, and were almoſt in a condition to engage Baliol's party. But, mindful of their late king's directions, they retired to their ſtrong holds, and only occaſionally ſkirmiſhed with the Engliſh. By theſe means it appears, that at the cloſe of the year, Perth, Cowper, Stirling, and Edinburgh, were all the fortified places that were in the poſſeſſion of either Baliol or his paramount. But in the beginning of the year 1338, Sir Alexander Murray, the regent, died; and Robert, the ſteward of Scotland, being now ſole regent, prepared to enter heartily into king David's cauſe: and Philip of France, with whom Edward had been tampering concerning the Scots, having ſolemnly declared he would ſupport them to the utmoſt of his power, war between theſe two nations was the conſequence; and the latter, who meditated the conqueſt of France, reſolved to take himſelf the head of his army.

In 1339, Edward was preparing for this expedition, when Sir William Douglas went to France, to acquaint king David how matters ſtood in Scotland; and to repreſent the probability of his reſtoration, if the French, in conſequence of their treaty, would furniſh him with troops. Philip, as an earneſt of his intentions to ſerve the Scots, immediately ſent back Douglas with five ſhips, ſome troops, and plenty of proviſions. With this aſſiſtance, the regent was enabled to ſubdue the caſtle of Perth, which, in the abſence of Douglas, he had laid ſiege to. But Edward of England, very likely not thinking himſelf yet ſufficiently able to cope with the united power of France and Scotland, concluded a truce to Midſummer 1340, in which both nations were comprehended. No ſooner was this truce expired than Douglas retook the caſtle of Edinburgh, by the following ſtratagem: Being well acquainted with its ſituation, he, at day-break, preſented himſelf with about twelve of his trueſt friends before the caſtle, diſguiſed like ſailors and waggoners, with carts attending them, in which they pretended that they had brought proviſions to the garriſon. The porter let Douglas come into the outer court: Douglas inſtantly killed him, and, taking the keys of the caſtle from off his arm, admitted his followers; having previouſly concealed a large body of armed men, under the ruins of adjacent buildings, who emerged from thence at the ſound of a horn; and thus he became maſter of the garriſon, all which they put to the ſword, except Leigh, the governor, and ſix Engliſh eſquires. The next year, Douglas plied Stirling ſo warmly, that the garriſon was glad to capitulate for life and limb, notwithſtanding a reinforcement from Edward, who was indefatigable in the ſervice of his country.

At this time Douglas had left the Engliſh only the caſtles of Berwick and Roxburgh. At the former, were the two Edwards with a conſiderable force; but the Engliſh army, tired out with following the Scots in their receſſes, where they often fell into ambuſcades, and being beſides in want of proviſions, concluded a truce to the end of the year 1342. The baſis of it was, "That unleſs king David returned to his people, with a force ſufficient to withſtand his enemies, by June, the Scots would own Edward for their ſovereign, and would never acknowledge either him or his poſterity."

This truce redounded much to the credit of the Scots, as they herein acted as a free and ſpirited people: they knew that David was now of age to command an army; and under the preſumption that he was indulging in ſloth, or, at leaſt, that he was dilatory in urging Philip's aſſiſtance (as it never appears that the Scots had any other aid from him, than what Douglas brought over) they undoubtedly thought, and with the greateſt propriety, that a king, who would make no efforts for a crown, or a people's liberties, was unworthy of government. David, on hearing of this truce, told the French monarch, he would be dallied with no longer: whereupon troops were granted him; and in May, he and his queen, accompanied by ſeveral Daniſh and Swediſh knights as volunteers, landed at Innerberry, from whence, amidſt the enthuſiaſtic ſhouts of his people, he proceeded to Perth. Here having viewed his army, and the deſolate ſtate of his kingdom, he was eager to ravage England; and eſpecially to reduce Berwick, in which caſtle his competitor Baliol reſided as Edward's governor. His nobility, however, adviſed peace, and David was at laſt, with difficulty, brought to conclude a two years truce with Edward, who employed this time in ſubduing the French; while David regulated his civil affairs, received an oath of fealty from his ſubjects, and conſtituted Robert, the great ſteward of Scotland, his heir, in default of iſſue to ſucceed him.

No remarkable occurrence took place till the year 1346, when David, whilſt Edward was in France, prepared to invade England. He was more than 60,000 ſtrong, and would have laid waſte all the county of Cumberland, if the monks had not compounded for their poſſeſſions, by raiſing him 1000l. He eſtimated an Engliſhman's life at threepence, for whoever could not pay him that ſum was put to the ſword. The queen of England having raiſed an army, headed them herſelf, and, on the 17th of October, oppoſed David near Durham. In this battle the Scots were not only totally defeated, but their king, though he performed the greateſt perſonal exploits, was taken priſoner, by a party under one John Coupland, two of whoſe teeth he daſhed out before he yielded to him. The brave Douglas, with the biſhops of St. Andrew and Aberdeen, the earls of Monteith, Sutherland, Fife, and many more, ſhared their monarch's fate; and Hay, lord conſtable, Keith, lord marſhal, Stragutrin, lord chancellor, with other men of note, and above 20,000 common men, were ſlain. The Engliſh loſt four knights and five eſquires, but how many common ſoldiers is uncertain. Coupland hurried away his royal captive to Bamborough caſtle, which was his friend Piercy's; nor would he tell where the king was, or let him be delivered up to the queen, till he had ſeen Edward in France, who giving him 500l. per annum, with the honour of knighthood, ordered that he ſhould deliver David to his valiant conſort, to be lodged in the Tower, till himſelf arrived in England. On the 2d of January 1347, David was accordingly lodged in that fortreſs; but Monteith, having long before ſworn fealty to Edward, was executed as a traitor.

Now Baliol having reduced ſeveral forts, Robert the ſteward, under-regent of Scotland, propoſed to ſtop his progreſs. But at this time, a moſt dreadful plague, brought from Aſia, over-ran Europe: no leſs than twenty millions of ſouls are ſaid to have fallen by this calamity, which cauſed a ceſſation of arms all over Europe till 1353. The ſtates of Scotland, mean time, and till 1355, when the truce with England expired, had made many ineffectual negociations concerning their king's ranſom. And though they paid for his maintenance while he was in captivity, they would not procure his enlargement on terms they could not with honour comply with.

John, Philip's ſucceſſor, had now ſent them over ſupplies of money, which determined them to recommence hoſtilities. They ſtormed Berwick, which, however, in 1356, was retaken; and this year Edward Baliol reſigned all his pretenſions to the Scots throne, on condition of receiving, out of the cuſtoms of the towns of Hull and Boſton, 2000l. per annum; with which he lived privately on his own eſtate till 1363, when he died at Doncaſter.

David reſtored to the Crown—The Conditions—Robert the Second—He ſurpriſes Berwick—Engliſh retake it—Invaſion of England propoſed—Chevy-Chaſe Battle—Death of the King—Robert III.—Scheme of the Earl of Crawford—Scots defeated—A Truce—Tragical End of the Duke of Rotheſay—Sudden Death of Robert—Scotland interdicted—Interdiction removed.

AFTER Edward Baliol's renunciation, in the treaty which ſoon took place in 1357, Edward, for the firſt time, called David king of Scotland; and on the third of October, in this year, David obtained his liberty on the following conditions: "I. That 100,000 marks be paid, by 10,000 yearly,

“ and that twenty hoſtages be given for the performance of it. II. Till this ſum be paid, that both kingdoms preſerve peace with each other. III. On failure of payment, that David again ſurrender himſelf, or the lord ſtewards, Douglas and Murray, in his room.” The clergy and nobility bound themſelves, together with David, for the true performance of theſe articles. But before Edward parted with David, he is ſaid to have gratified himſelf with dining with his crown on his head, between David and John, king of France, whom the glorious Black Prince had, the preceding year, made captive; after which David returned joyfully to his kingdom.

The price of David's liberty being great, he applied to France for aſſiſtance; but that court pleading ſimilar diſtreſſes (as indeed they might with great juſtice) his clergy are ſaid to have aſſiſted him greatly. In 1359, he eſtabliſhed with England a treaty of commerce, and procured his ſubjects the liberty of ſtudying at Engliſh ſeminaries. In 1363, Edward propoſed a fœderal union with David; the ſubſtance of which was, That Edward would remit the remainder of the ranſom; that he would reſign all the places in his poſſeſſion, which had been formerly conquered by Robert Bruce; that in all treaties with other powers, each king ſhould either be ſtiled in the plural number “ the kings,” or elſe “ the king of England and Scotland;” and in ſhort, that the king of England was willing to grant, by advice of his council, whatever the Scots could reaſonably aſk, if king David would conſtitute king Edward his heir, by way of equivalent.

From this period, the hiſtory of Scotland grows very dark; all that we know for certain is, that on David's return from a viſit, which he had paid to Edward, he died without iſſue at Edinburgh, on the 22d of February 1370, in the 48th year of his age, and the 41ſt of his reign. As a monarch, he is ſaid to be credulous, vain, and bigoted; but ingenuous, ſober, and affable, as a man.

The high ſteward, Robert (concerning whoſe genealogy it is ſufficient to ſay, that he was the lineal deſcendant of Walter, on whom Malcolm III. as has been remarked, firſt beſtowed the office) agreeable to the act of ſucceſſion, mounted the throne in 1370; he was the firſt of the family of the Stuarts.

On his acceſſion, a truce of fourteen years with the Engliſh taking place, and no civil tranſaction having been handed down, nothing material tranſpired till the death of king Edward III. and his valiant ſon in 1377. Robert afterwards ſurpriſed Berwick; but the Engliſh ſoon retook it. The year following, one Mercer, an able Scots ſeaman, ſcouring the ſeas in a kind of piratical manner, annoyed the Engliſh conſiderably: but John Philpot, a ſpirited alderman of London, having fitted out a little fleet, at his own expence, took the rover with fifteen rich Spaniſh ſhips, which he had under convoy. From this time, till 1384, a ſkirmiſhing war was carried on with intervening truces.

The Scots, in 1385, renewing their ancient league with the French, were aſſiſted by that nation with 50,000l. and ſome troops, the number not known. Richard II. of England, being made acquainted with this circumſtance, entered Scotland with a pompous army, like Edward II. with an intention to ſubdue the people, and lay waſte the country. Robert, appriſed of his intentions, paſſed the Forth, with the moſt valuable of his effects; leaving a body of troops under lord Douglas, who ſhould occaſionally harraſs the enemy. Richard, paſſing Berwick, found the country deſolate; continuing, however, his march to Edinburgh, he levelled that city with the ground. When he had performed this martial feat, the duke of Lancaſter adviſed him to carry his arms acroſs the Forth, and follow Robert; but the weak king, who, it ſeems, imagined that the duke had a ſiniſter deſign in this advice, declared he would not advance a ſtep further: in ſhort, he left Scotland (Douglas continually haraſſing him) without doing one ſingle action, which could compenſate for his expenſive preparations; Douglas, on the contrary, obtained a truce of two years for his countrymen.

In the courſe of the laſt five years, the Iriſh having made deſcents on the weſtern parts of Scotland, Robert now determined to make repriſals. One William Douglas was ſent on this expedition: he executed his commiſſion with great ſucceſs; for after having defeated the Iriſh militia of Dundalk and Carlingford, he loaded twelve ſhips, which he found in the harbour, with booty. In his return home, he laid waſte the Iſle of Wight, and then landed his ſpoils near Loch Riar.

Robert, elate with this ſucceſs, calling a parliament at Aberdeen in 1388, propoſed an invaſion of England. The ſtates concurring, he accordingly raiſed two armies of 15,000 men each; one under the command of the earls of Fife and Monteith, William Douglas, and Alexander Lindſay; and another under the earls of Douglas, March, Crawford, and Murray. The former entered Cumberland by the Weſt Marches, and the latter ravaged Northumberland. Both armies met, according to agreement, near Newcaſtle, which was defended by Henry and Ralph Percy, ſons to the earl of Northumberland. William Douglas having ſelected 2000 foot and 300 horſe, determined to ſtorm the caſtle next day; before which, it ſeems, he received a challenge from Henry Percy, ſurnamed, from his fierce valour, Hotſpur, whom Douglas, at the firſt onſet, diſmounted and deprived of his ſpear and pennant, with which he had boaſted he would return in triumph to Scotland. Henry, mortified at this defeat, ſwore Douglas ſhould never carry a ſpear of his into Scotland: ſallying out, therefore, in queſt of Douglas, with 600 horſe and 8000 infantry, he found him encamped at Otterburn. Hotſpur attacked the Scots by moonlight with ſuch reſolution, that they were on the point of being routed, when the brave Douglas ruſhed into the middle of the Engliſh, with his battle-ax in his hand. The Scots, in admiration of their leader, and reinforced by the earl of Dunbar, returned with vigour to the charge, and obtained a complete victory; though not without the loſs of their heroic commander, who, having proceeded too incautiouſly into the main body of the Engliſh, was ſurrounded and cut to pieces, together with his chaplain, who fought by his ſide; 200 Engliſh were left dead on the field; and Hotſpur and his brother, with above 100 perſons of diſtinction beſides, were made priſoners.

In this celebrated battle, commonly called Chevy-Chaſe fight, which was fought on the 21ſt of July, only 100 Scots were killed, but double that number were taken priſoners. Both parties, with reſpect to their priſoners, behaved with the greateſt generoſity; being exchanged for each other, or allowed to fix their own ranſom. In conſequence of this battle, a truce was agreed on, till Auguſt 1392, in which the allies of both ſides were comprehended; though the Scots now very juſtly began to look on the French as a ſelfiſh people, not to be confided in.

Robert, king of Scotland, being grown very infirm, had for ſome time given the reins of government to his ſon, the earl of Fife, and did not ſurvive this truce; for he died on the 19th of April 1390, in the 75th year of his age, and the 19th of his reign, at his caſtle of Dundonald.

This prince does not appear to have been fond of fighting; but was mild, juſt, and (what he is greatly to be praiſed for) unwilling to undertake any affair without the full concurrence of his parliament. Robert was the firſt who introduced the coining of gold in Scotland. He ſeems likewiſe to have been the firſt king who made uſe of any device or emblem: his coronet, over a terreſtrial globe, had the following motto, Vanitas vanitatum; et omnia vanitas! Vanity of vanities; all is vanity.

Robert III. the hundredth and firſt king, whoſe real name was John, ſucceeded A. D. 1390; but the ſtates of Scotland, who could not forget the wretched John Baliol, and who reflected with rapture on his ſucceſſor, Bruce, not having yet diveſted themſelves of their Caledonian ſuperſtition, changed it to Robert. The king having been lamed by a kick from an horſe, and being likewiſe both ſickly and of a meek diſpoſition, after he had prolonged the truce with the Engliſh till 1398, reſigned the adminiſtration of affairs almoſt entirely to his brother, the earl of Fiſe, who had been regent in the life-time of his father.

The two powerful clans of Chattan and Kay being continually at enmity with each other during the truce, and diſturbing the peace of the realm, the earl of Crawford was made the inſtrument of ſilencing their ſquabbles; which he brought about by this artful ſcheme: he propoſed that thirty of each clan, champions for both tribes, ſhould decide their reſpective differences by the ſword; at the ſame time that the king, who, with his nobility, were to be ſpectators of the combat, would pardon the offences of both, and reward the conquerors. The Highlanders readily cloſed with the propoſal; and a day was appointed for the ſixty champions to meet at the North-Inch of Perth. Both parties engaging with the moſt unbounded fury, the Chattans obtained a complete victory over the Kays; only one of that clan eſcaped the death which all the reſt had met with, by ſwimming over the Tay, which indeed he was prudent in doing, ſince, beſides the ſadler (who engaged to ſupply the places of one of the Chattan clan) there was a third part of the Chattans ſtill remaining. The reader from this reſolution, may form ſome idea of thoſe ancient clans.

Henry, the Engliſh monarch, who ſince his acceſſion in 1400, ſeems to have an eye to the independency of Scotland, countenanced the revenge of March againſt the duke of Albany; and, under pretence of being lord paramount of Scotland, in 1400, invaded that kingdom; as well to right the earl of March (whoſe eſtates had been ſeized by the earl of Douglas) as to aſſert his own ſupremacy. He entered Scotland with a vaſt force, having a fleet attending to ſupply it with proviſions. He behaved at firſt with lenity, in hopes to draw the Scots to his ſtandard; but, not ſucceeding to his wiſh, he afterwards laid ſiege to Edinburgh caſtle. Rotheſay's brave defence, together with the inſurrection of Owen Glendour, in Wales, obliged Henry to raiſe the ſiege, and conclude a truce for two years with the Scots.

The Engliſh were again ſtirred up by the earl of March, who had been diſſatisfied with the truce. The Scots, appriſed of his intentions, determined to be beforehand with him; and earl Douglas met him at the head of a large body of Engliſh forces, on Homeldon-hill. Here the Scots were ſo galled by the Engliſh archers, that, in ſpite of all the efforts of Douglas, and of Sir John Swinton, who, with a choſen party, charged the enemy ſword in hand, they were totally defeated; Douglas himſelf, who received five wounds, and loſt an eye, was taken priſoner, with ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction.

Lord March was ordered by Henry not to diſpoſe of his priſoners, till he ſaw them; when, being made acquainted with the amazing valour of lord Douglas, he is ſaid to have diſmiſſed him without ranſom, and the others on trifling fines. In ſhort, the diſturbances in his own kingdom now ſtrongly inclined him to a peace with the Scots, eſpecially as it was reported that Richard II. was ſtill living in that kingdom. This report, though groundleſs, haſtened the concluſion of a truce till 1405. In the mean time king Robert became acquainted with the tragical end of his ſon, the duke of Rotheſay, whom Robert had arreſted, and confined in the caſtle of Falkland, where he was ſtarved to death; but as the regent's power was above the reach of puniſhment, the old king could only prevent the ſacrifice of his other ſon, by ſending him into France. The veſſel, in which he ſailed, was met by an Engliſh privateer, off Flamborough-head; the captain of which, as the truce was juſt then expired, took and carried her to London, and Henry confined the young prince and his retinue in the Tower; deſtroying, by this action, the character for generoſity which had always hitherto been beſtowed on him by the Scots.

No ſooner was Robert informed of his ſon's captivity, than (perhaps imagining it to be a ſcheme of Albany his brother) he was ſeized with ſuch agony of grief, that he became immediately ſpeechleſs, and died in three days afterwards, on the 29th of March 1405. He had been in his youth remarkably handſome; and is allowed to have poſſeſſed the virtues and abilities of a private man and a chriſtian; but ſcarcely any qualification requiſite to adorn a ſovereign prince.

Pope Boniface had interdicted Scotland in this century, becauſe Robert Bruce refuſed to make peace with the Engliſh: however, upon an humble remonſtrance to his holineſs, ſigned by the nobility and clergy, the interdiction was ſoon removed; after which, the only thing remarkable is, that the biſhops, whoſe eſtates, at their deceaſe, had always been at the king's diſpoſal, now obtained the liberty of leaving their effects as they thought proper; and if they happened to die inteſtate, they became, like thoſe of the laity, the property of the neareſt relative.

CHAP. III.

Young James delared King—Duke of Albany, Regent during his Confinement—Caſtle of Jedburgh laid in Ruins—Inſurrection of Donald—His Defeat and Pardon—James confined at Windſor—Ambition, &c. of the Regent—Succeeded by his Son—James reſtored to Liberty on Conditions—Crowned at Scone—His Proceedings—Cruelty of Duff—His Puniſhment—Earl of Roſs's Rebellion—A Price offered for his Head—His Life ſpared—The Scots and Engliſh under Arms—King aſſaſſinated, &c.

YOUNG James, as ſoon as his father's death was known, was declared the hundredth and ſecond king, A. D. 1405, by an aſſembly of the ſtates, which at the ſame time appointed, or rather continued, the duke of Albany regent, till he ſhould be ſet at liberty.

The royal priſoner was treated with much reſpect by Henry; and the regent was ſo far from deſiring his ſovereign's enlargement, that, without any efforts for his releaſe, he concluded a truce with England till 1409. But neither the generoſity (if it may be ſo called) of Henry, nor the power of Albany, could prevent the Scots from murmuring; and it ſeems, that during the truce they committed ſeveral irregularities, which Henry had the prudence to overlook.

The truce being near expiring, they grew exceedingly clamorous; and immediately on its expiration, a party ſeized the caſtle of Jedburgh, (which the Engliſh had garriſoned ſince the battle of Durham) and laid it in ruins. The regent, perceiving that the people were bent on war, and concluding that it would be as unſafe as impoſſible for him to check them, prepared to muſter an army, under the command of the earl of March, who had now forſaken the Engliſh.

The inſurrection of Donald, lord of the iſles (a title of very indefinite ſignification) who had quarrelled with the regent concerning his right to an eſtate, diverted the Scotch from marching into England. Donald, receiving intimation that Henry of England would eſpouſe his cauſe, ſeized the lands in diſpute, and levied a conſiderable force, in order to maintain them. The regent ſent Thomas, earl of Mar, againſt the rebel lord, who after an obſtinate ſtruggle, was defeated at Harlaw. Donald, on this defeat ſued for pardon; and on reſigning all claim to the eſtates in queſtion, and again ſwearing fealty to the crown of Scotland, obtained it. At the cloſe of this expedition the regent concluded a freſh truce, with the Engliſh, till 1415.

On the death of Henry IV. in 1413, the Scots had great expectations of their ſovereign's enlargement; but Henry V. on the contrary, confined James pretty cloſe at Windſor; and, without liſtening to any propoſals of ranſom, prepared to invade France. Here, whilſt Henry was reaping never-fading laurels, the duke of Albany was at his wit's end to hinder the Scots from taking the advantage of his abſence from England, to releaſe their king; but the duke's ambition, and political ſhifts, were put an end to by his death in 1420: and it muſt be owned, that he left the kingdom in a very flouriſhing condition, notwithſtanding his perſonal vices whilſt regent.

Murdoch his ſon, was immediately appointed his ſucceſſor, who not having the ambition (or the abilities) of his father, entered heartily into his maſter's ſervice. Henry V. had imagined, that while James was a priſoner in England, the Scots would not aſſiſt the French; and though this was pretty much the caſe, during the late regency, yet now, both out of reſentment, and to preſerve their faith with a people, who, notwithſtanding, had always uſed them ungratefully, they proved an excellent ally: though the combined force of the Scots and French could not ſtop the victorious Henry, who, however, was unfortunately cut off by a fever in the midſt of his conqueſts.

In 1422, Henry VI. his ſucceſſor (or rather his counſellors) being uneaſy at the ſtrong attachment of the Scots to the intereſt of France, gave ear to propoſals for James's liberty; and it was agreed, that he ſhould enjoy the crown, on condition, "That the Scots withdrew their aſſiſtance from the French, and paid 40,000l. for the expence of his maintenance." Theſe conditions being agreed to, the commiſſioners of both nations concluded a ſeven years truce; twelve hoſtages of the principal nobility were given for the performance of articles; and James, as ſoon as the treaty was concluded, having married Joan, the earl of Somerſet's daughter, returned in great ſplendour to his country, together with his conſort (whoſe fortune ſtruck off 10,000l. of the debt of England) and he was, on the firſt of May, crowned at Scone.

James, being determined to reform his kingdom, was too wiſe and too bold a prince not to begin with his nobility. He made a general law againſt leagues and combinations, and then called the late regent to account for his mal-adminiſtration. And though hiſtorians do not mention the particular crimes with which that nobleman and his two ſons were charged, they were nevertheleſs all three condemned and beheaded, purſuant to a ſentence in parliament. This ſevere act ſtruck the reſt with terror; and they promiſed faithfully to adhere to ſeveral wiſe ſtatutes and laws which James had cauſed to be enacted.

In 1426, he viſited the county of Inverneſs, the inhabitants of which were particularly barbarous; conſidering rapine and violence to be law, and bloodſhed and murder only matters of courſe. James, who knew that rough meaſures would have little effect on men accuſtomed to hardſhips and ſlaughter, invited the chieftains to the caſtle; where he made them acquainted with the nature of his laws, which he ordered not only to be obſerved by themſelves, but by thoſe under them; for whom, he told them, they, in a great meaſure, muſt be anſwerable. At the ſame time, in order to ſhew his authority, he executed three of the principal. One of theſe cruel free-booters was Duff, a man remarkably wanton in his barbarity: he had ſhod a poor woman with iron, like a horſe, for repining at his cruelties; and then whipping her out of the town, bid her ſeek redreſs from the king. James hearing the ſtory, ſhod Duff in like manner, and having had him flogged three times round the caſtle, hung him in chains.

One of the leading men, in this barbarous county of Inverneſs, was Alexander, earl of Roſs. Some call him lord of the iſles; however, he was ſo powerful, that James, to keep well with him, had winked at ſeveral crimes; and by affability and acts of kindneſs, endeavoured to make him his friend. The earl, it ſeems, promiſed fair; but James had no ſooner left Inverneſs, than he grew rebellious, and at the head of the clans, Hatton and Cameron, attacked the caſtle, which the king had garriſoned. James, ſhocked at his diſſimulation, and enraged at his ingratitude, offered a price for his head; when Roſs, not thinking himſelf ſafe, even amongſt his own troops, quitted them; and ſkulking about from place to place, endeavoured to get to Ireland: but not being able to effect his eſcape, nor procure a pardon, he determined to throw himſelf at the king's feet, and hazard his clemency. Accordingly, as well by way of diſguiſe, as to excite compaſſion, he, by ſome means or other, procured an old black rug, wrapped up in which, he appeared before the king and queen, at Holyrood-chapel, during the time of divine ſervice. His wretched plight, and moving addreſs, intereſting the queen in his favour, ſhe prevailed with the king to ſpare his life; and James threw him into priſon till his death, to prevent his doing further miſchief.

Being now the protector and encourager of learning and arts, James reigned in the utmoſt tranquillity, and was univerſally beloved by his people. He had received an excellent education whilſt in England, where he became perſonally acquainted with Gower and Chaucer; and was himſelf a thorough judge, and no mean compoſer, of poetry and muſic. And though the univerſity of St. Andrew was eſtabliſhed in the former reign, in 1411; yet ſquabbles between the monks, and the inattention of the regent, having ſtinted the growth of ſcience, James, by taking that ſeminary under his patronage, may not improperly be conſidered as its founder. He not only rewarded induſtry and merit in the fine arts, but in agriculture, trade, and manufactures. By theſe means, his court became the receptacle of men of genius, and the whole kingdom aſſumed a new face; for he had introduced a better ſtyle of architecture; had regulated weights and meaſures, and the wages of labouring men; beſides, ſides, eſtabliſhing ferries and inns, for the eaſe and convenience of travelling: he alſo enacted ſumptuary laws, which expreſsly prohibited any but his principal nobility from wearing gold or ſilver lace, or valuable furs; and in reſpect to diet, he encouraged that kind by which agriculture was moſt improved.

The king was thus buſied till 1435; and the truce with England having been prolonged till that time, ambaſſadors now arrived from that nation with offers of perpetual peace. Lord Scroop, we are told, had orders to propoſe a marriage between his maſter, Henry VI. and the princeſs of Scotland. This propoſal being rejected, as James before determined to beſtow his daughter on the dauphin, greatly exaſperated the Engliſh, who reſented the affront, and proceeded immediately to hoſtilities.

The two nations were now in arms; the Scots under the earl of Angus, and the Engliſh under lord Northumberland. The armies encountered each other on the 10th of September 1436, at a place called Popperden; victory, after much wavering, declared for the former.

The next year, James determined to take the field in perſon, having meditated the ſieges of Roxburgh and Berwick. He was lying before the former, at the head of a vaſt army, when the queen, greatly fatigued, overtook him, with the unwelcome tidings of a conſpiracy againſt his life. The horrid deſign received its birth from the following circumſtances: The earl of March had forſworn his allegiance, and fought againſt his country; notwithſtanding which, Robert, the regent, on the earl's repentance, had pardoned and reſtored him to his eſtates. James, who had maintained, that it was in the breaſt of a king only to excuſe treaſon, having lately declared that pardon to be void, had deprived the earl of his title, and affixed his lands to the crown, by an act that was highly pleaſing, declaring the pardons and grants of the late regents of no effect; and though the king had not greatly inforced the act, yet having made a precedent, and continuing daily, by propoſing a militia, and other politic maxims, to leſſen the power of his barons, they were in continual fear of being deprived of their poſſeſſions and importance. The earl of Athol, who imagined he ſhould be one of the firſt objects of the act, determined, at a proper opportunity, to deſtroy the king, that he and the reſt might preſerve their eſtates: ſuch was the ſtate of affairs on the queen's arrival; but it does not appear that ſhe was acquainted with particulars, ſince the king, on her information diſbanded his army (in which whether he acted with ſpirit and prudence, is left to the reader) and retired to the Dominican convent near Perth, in order privately to aſcertain the parties engaged in the conſpiracy.

Athol, fearing to be diſcovered, made haſte to execute his purpoſes; and having obtained admittance into the convent by bribery, together with Robert his grandſon, and his kinſman Graham, planted themſelves one night in the lobby of the king's antechamber. James was at ſupper with his queen, and thinking himſelf ſufficiently ſecure, had retained no body-guard, ſo that on the outer doors being opened by Straton the cup bearer, they were prepared to ruſh in. He made a ſtand againſt them, calling out Treaſon! Treaſon! which alarming thoſe who were within, a young lady, the queen's attendant, ran immediately to faſten the door; but not readily finding the bar, ſhe boldly thruſt her arm into the ſtaple inſtead of it. In an inſtant, however, having diſpatched Straton, her arm was broken; and the wretches, falling on the king, he expired under thirty wounds, in the 44th year of his age, and the 13th of his reign, A. D. 1437.

This excellent prince was below the middle ſize; but yet ſignalized himſelf by martial and robuſt exerciſes. His manners and politics were too elevated for the people whom he governed; for had his ſubjects been properly civilized, they muſt infallibly have been happy under his government, and revered him for his juſtice, generoſity, and uncommon abilities. But a rude people, and a jealous and powerful nobility, could not brook the introduction of taxes (in order at firſt to pay his captive-money in England) nor his ſtrong efforts to break the ariſtocratical connection. Though his maxims were in general diſagreeable, his ſubjects ſeem to have been ſo far from deſiring his death, that they made uſe of every method to detect and apprehend the perpetrators of it. They were all three diſcovered; and ſeparately ſuffered death, under the moſt excruciating torture. Graham was ſo abandoned a wretch, that being aſked how he could lift his hand againſt a king, he proteſted he took ſuch delight in ſin, that were the Almighty to forgive and allow him a place in heaven, he ſhould rather wiſh to aſſociate with infernal ſpirits.

JAMES II. the hundredth and third king, was but ſeven years of age when he aſcended the throne in 1437. It was therefore thought neceſſary to appoint proper perſons to conduct affairs during his minority. The earl of Douglas, the greateſt nobleman in Scotland, was accordingly conſtituted lieutenant-general; Sir William Creichton chancellor, and Sir Alexander Levingſton, the keeper of the king's perſon: but parliament was to have the ſupreme direction.

Previous to the late king's murder, a truce with the Engliſh, till May 1447, having been agreed on, it was now ratified by the ſtates. But Douglas dying, matters took a different turn; for the parliament then throwing the whole power of government into the hands of the ſurvivors, Levingſton to be military, and Creichton civil governor; and refuſing a ſhare of it to the earl's ſon, that young nobleman, full of ambition, but void of prudence, withdrew immediately from court; and retiring amongſt his vaſſals, refuſed ſubmiſſion to the joint-miniſters These, inſtead of taking meaſures to humble him, grew jealous of each other's power, and at laſt quarrelled. Creichton, who is ſaid to have been the abler man, got poſſeſſion of the king's perſon, whom he confined in the caſtle of Edinburgh, burgh. Levingſton repreſented this outrage to the queen-mother, by whoſe contrivance he regained her ſon, packed in a clothes cheſt. Hereupon the two miniſters were ripe for open defiance; but the earl of Douglas having, by his example, taught many others to rebel, neceſſity conſtrained them to unite.

On the 2d of Auguſt 1440, they therefore called a parliament; which voted that, on the notice of any rebellion, "ſlaughter, burning, robbery," the tranſgreſſors ſhould be puniſhed, and the injured redreſſed. This was principally intended againſt Douglas; who now marched about with 1000 horſe in his train, and acted like an independent prince. But Creichton, afraid to uſe force againſt this nobleman, determined, as a ſtateſman, to make uſe of his proper weapons, diſſimulation and artifice. He ſent to the earl a letter, which invited him to take the lead in all public affairs. The bait took; Creichton met him in his way up; and uſhering him, his brother, and Sir Malcolm Fleming, with much ceremony, into Edinburgh caſtle, a ſplendid entertainment was provided. Towards the end of the feaſt there was placed before them a bull's-head; which, in thoſe times, being the ſignal of inſtant death, they ſprang from the banquet, and attempted to ſave themſelves: their efforts, however, were in vain; for being in a moment ſurrounded, they were dragged into a back court, and immediately beheaded. This cruel piece of policy was executed on the 24th of November, and produced good order and tranquillity in Scotland till 1443, however unjuſtifiable the act may appear.

The prince was now fourteen years old, and poſſeſſing ſenſe, ſpirit, and reſolution, determined no longer to be under the guidance of his tutors. He demanded the caſtle of Stirling from Levingſton, and that of Edinburgh from Creichton; but as they refuſed to reſign them till he ſhould be at full age, he called a parliament, and proclaimed them traitors. The whole kingdom was immediately in a blaze. Creichton put himſelf at the head of a ſtrong body, and over-ran the eſtates of the earl of Douglas, whom the king, deteſting the manner of his predeceſſor's murder, had taken into favour. This nobleman, notwithſtanding his ſeeming ſubmiſſion to James, was exceedingly ambitious and ſelf-important; he ordered his military tenants to retaliate on Creichton, whilſt he was contriving with the earls of Crawford and Roſs to re-eſtabliſh the feudal power, which James, as well as his father, deſired to aboliſh. The earl thought that Sir William Creichton would be a good acquiſition; he therefore perſuaded the king to pardon him; and he was ſoon after reſtored to his office of chancellor: both he and the earl hated Levingſton, whom now they cauſed to be impriſoned; and his eldeſt ſon to be beheaded, who was a man of great accompliſhments.

On the expiration of the truce with England, the earl of Northumberland paſſed Solway-Frith with an army, and ravaged the country. The Scots, headed by the earl of Drummond, met and defeated them at Sack, by which they became poſſeſſed of a prodigious booty. The following year a treaty of marriage having been concluded, between the king, and Mary, the daughter of the duke of Gueldres, the princeſs, with a grand retinue, landed in Scotland, and in July was married and crowned at Holyrood-houſe.

James, who was now of age, began to conſider Douglas as a formidable nobleman. On intimation of his feudal intrigues, he was determined to curtail his exorbitant power. This the earl could not bear; beſides, the king had releaſed Levingſton whom he now favoured, and eſteemed Creichton more than ever; ſo that Douglas, ſeeing that he could not be the firſt man at court, retired diſcontentedly to his eſtates. He renewed a league with the lords Hamilton, Murray, Roſs, and others, who all ſwore to maintain their ancient rights. In ſhort, he did all in his power to diſturb the peace of the kingdom; it was rumoured, that he even aſpired to the throne. The king, offended at the ingratitude of the earl, ſaw his conduct with concern; yet, being unwilling to involve the people in a civil war, ſent a meſſage, with a ſafe-conduct to him, deſiring an interview at Stirling; intending, by the moſt friendly arguments, to prevail on him to drop his connections and return to his duty. When they met, he expreſſed great duty towards his ſovereign, but ſtoutly refuſed to diſſolve the confederacy; on which the king was ſo exaſperated, that he ſwore he ſhould: drawing his dagger in a tranſport of rage, "This ſhall break the league," ſays he to the earl, and plunged it in his heart. This bloody buſineſs was tranſacted in February 1452; and though ſome charge Creichton as the contriver, yet it is more likely that the murder was the effect of the king's inſtant reſentment on finding the earl ſo deaf to his reaſons, and ſo provoking to his authority.

The civil war which the king had ſought to prevent, now broke out in conſequence of the death of Douglas. The earl's adherents attacked the caſtle, where the king kept on the defenſive. All was anarchy and confuſion: neutrality was no where permitted, ſo that unhappy Scotland bled at every pore. The rebels were ſo ſtrong, that till the king was joined by the earl of Huntley, who had muſtered the Leſlies, Ogilvies, Grants, Irwins, and Forbeſes, he was unable to give them battle. Thus reinforced, James attacked them, on the 18th of May, near Brechin, and gaining a victory, it fixed the crown more firmly on his head. The Scots ſuffered extremely by a famine the enſuing winter, as the inſtruments of agriculture had been uſed in war.

The earl of Crawford, who was the chief man in the Douglas faction, having, in the following ſpring, ſubmitted to James, and been pardoned by him, rebellion retired to her native Highlands; and the earl of Douglas, in expiation of his offence, propoſed to undertake a pilgrimage. James ſubmitted his conduct in this rebellion to biſhop Kennedy, to Creichton in particular, and his parliament in general; and it is remarkable that ſo formidable a rebellion ſhould be ſo ſoon and ſo eaſily quelled; which ſeems to evince that the Scots Lowlands were at that period almoſt unanimouſly loyal, and ſubmiſſive to civil government. The pilgrimage, undertaken by the earl of Douglas, was, in fact, only to carry off his ſiſter-in-law, commonly called the Fair Maid of Galloway, with whom he had fallen deſperately in love. He terminated his pilgrimage in England, where he ſwore allegiance to king Henry, who, ſome ſay, allowed him 500l. a year, till he ſhould recover his eſtates from king James; and thus (a practice not uncommon) he made piety the cloak of his treaſon and luſt. The latter, notwithſtanding, was very ſoon diſappointed; for the Fair Maid, diſliking his perſon and manners, eloped from him, and returned to Scotland. James granted her part of the Douglas eſtate, and appropriated the remainder to his own uſe.

As the royal revenues were not deemed ſufficient, a parliament met on the 4th of Auguſt 1455, in which the members ſeem to have forgotten their feudal barbariſm, and to have entertained ideas of true liberty. To ſupport the dignity of the crown, they annexed to it caſtles and lands in different parts of the kingdom for his majeſty's reſidence. Theſe were always to be royal poſſeſſions; the king could not alienate them without the full concurrence of parliament. In caſe he did, the ſucceeding king had power to retake them, without a proceſs of law, with all the profits and revenues from the time when ſuch lands were alienated. They likewiſe enacted, that no office ſhould be hereditary, except the guardian of the Marches. Theſe and ſeveral other acts, tending to the ſecurity of the frontiers, were not revokable even by the king; whoſe power, and that of his ſucceſſors, was by this parliament firmly bounded and eſtabliſhed.

The reſtleſs Douglas, having maintained, during theſe tranſactions, a ſecret correſpondence with Roſs, lord of the Iſles, excited that nobleman to rebellion. Roſs accordingly declared himſelf independent of the crown of Scotland; and, in March 1456, he raiſed an army, and committed the greateſt barbarities in Murray and Inverneſs; but not being aſſiſted by Douglas, as he had expected, he ſued for pardon, and obtained it, through the interceſſion of his counteſs, who was a great favourite with the king.

The king, being now in a ſtate of tranquillity, regulated his coin by the Engliſh ſtandard; and, like his predeceſſor, enacted ſumptuary laws. He forbad the diverſion of foot-ball and goff, ordered butts and bow-marks in every pariſh; and that the male inhabitants, between the years of twelve and fifty-two, ſhould every Sunday practiſe ſhooting. He was very ſevere in puniſhing beggars, who were not under fourteen, or above ſeven years of age; and limited the number of ſailors, as the Scots about this time were much addicted to piracy.

After four years employed in making theſe neceſſary regulations in Scotland, the diſputes between the houſes of York and Lancaſter had put England into a flame; and it is a ſtrong proof of the moderation of James, that he did not take advantage of theſe commotions. Henry's queen, after ſuffering ſeveral defeats, applied to James for protection and aſſiſtance, offering to give up Douglas (though he had been of great ſervice to her) and in caſe, through the aid of James, ſhe ſhould prove victorious, to aſſign over to him Berwick and Northumberland. James had no great reaſon to favour the houſe of Lancaſter; and declined to do it till he found that the duke of York (who had alſo made him great offers) was guilty of double-dealing. He then determined to beſiege Berwick and Roxburgh, and afterwards to enter England in behalf of Henry, or rather of his queen. Great preparations were made for this expedition, in which the king was excellently ſerved by his ſubjects. Roſs, lord of the Iſles, joined him with a ſtrong body of Highlanders; and, to extenuate the rebellion which he had been guilty of, offered always to ſuſtain the firſt ſhock of the enemy. The loyal earl of Huntley had alſo joined him, and now the king laid cloſe ſiege to Roxburgh. He had a fine train of artillery; and commanding a general diſcharge of it, he would needs ſtand by and ſee that his orders were punctually performed. This curioſity proved fatal to him; for a cannon, which he ſtood cloſe to, burſt in the exploſion, and killed him on the ſpot. This melancholy accident befel him in the 30th year of his age, the 23d of his reign, and the 3d of Auguſt 1460.

This prince was robuſt, tall, and active: he was brave, juſt, and temperate: but is ſaid to have been paſſionate; of which, indeed, his murdering Douglas is a proof. His deportment, though martial, was vaſtly engaging, familiar, and inſinuating. As his father had began to ſhake the pillars of ariſtocracy, he poſſeſſed abilities that, had he lived, muſt effectually have overturned them; Scotland would then have been the firſt in ſubverting the feudal ſyſtem which at that time governed all Europe.

The queen, on the death of the king, carried her ſon, James III. to Kelſo, where he was crowned, being but ſeven years old. She then returned to the ſiege, which was carried on ſo much in earneſt, that the caſtle ſurrendered on capitulation. She next demoliſhed Wark, and then returning to Edinburgh, called a parliament; which, after ſome altercation, conſtituted her the king's tutrix. The diſpute in England having terminated this year, 1461, in favour of the houſe of York, obliged Henry, his queen, and their only ſon, to fly to Edinburgh, where they were kindly received. The Lancaſtrians, however, were ſtill a ſtrong party, poſſeſſing many caſtles; in particular, Berwick, which Henry preſented as a debt of gratitude to the Scots.

Douglas had now ſided with the other party; and excited Roſs, lord of the Iſles, once more to rebellion. He renewed his cruelties with his claim of independency, and ſwore to aſſiſt Edward of England, as well againſt his own country as the houſe of Lancaſter. This nobleman, in the midſt of his barbarities, is ſaid to have died raving mad; but his ſon renewing the rebellion in 1564, Edward growing very popular, and the queen-regent being dead, the ſtates of Scotland, for the ſecurity of the kingdom, concluded a truce with England till 1519, in which Douglas and Roſs, as ſubjects of England, were included; but as it was ſtipulated in this truce, that James ſhould, in no reſpect, aſſiſt Henry or the houſe of Lancaſter, that weak prince, retiring in diſguiſe, was diſcovered in Lancaſhire, by Sir Edward Talbot, who hurrying him to London, he was by the exulting Edward, impriſoned in the Tower: but the queen and her young ſon arrived ſafe in France.

James's perſon and education had been committed to the care of Kennedy, biſhop of St. Andrew's, a man of great worth and learning; who dying, the ambitious family of the Boyds contrived to get the young monarch from lord Kennedy, the biſhop's brother. They ſucceeded at an hunting-match; and the king was ſo pleaſed with his change of ſituation, that he created the head of the Boyds, earl of Arran; gave his own ſiſter in marriage to him, and appointed him his proxy for his own alliance with the daughter of Chriſtian, king of Denmark and Norway. The royal nuptials, in conſequence of which Shetland and the Orcades were conſidered as the queen's dowry, were ſolemnized in July.

The Boyds had loſt much ground during the earl of Arran's abſence; and ſo uncertain is the favour of a young king, that the earl, though he brought a blooming bride to his maſter's arms, was received with the moſt mortifying coolneſs. He ſaw the ſtorm gathering over his head, and determined to provide againſt the ſhock. He had ſcarcely returned to Denmark, before he was impeached in parliament; his wife, by the moſt barbarous deſpotiſm, divorced; and himſelf (though he had procured an act, dated the 25th of October 1466, juſtifying his conduct in ſeizing the king) condemned and outlawed. James devoting himſelf to ſtudies unworthy of a king, very ſoon diſregarded his nobility, and choſe himſelf intimates out of the very dregs of even a foreign people. He thought himſelf under conſtraint in the company of his nobles, and ſeemed to take infinite pains to undo all that his father and grandfather had done reſpecting the power of the barons, and to work his own ruin. However, the parliament ſtill conſulted the good of the nation, by making many wiſe ſtatutes, the moſt material of which was an act concerning the fiſhery. Certain lords were ordered to provide buſſes, nets, &c. for that purpoſe. Had this act been well attended to, the Dutch had ſtill, very probably, been inconſiderable; but on the contrary, in a great meaſure, by this very article, they enriched themſelves to a degree capable of diſputing the ſovereignty of the ocean.

The king now (1477) became addicted to judicial aſtrology, and an abſurd belief of witchcraft. Thus poſſeſſed with the bigotry of an enthuſiaſt, he put to death his own brother, the earl of Mar, on the ſole authority of an old woman, who pretended that he had a deſign on his life. The duke of Albany, his other brother, apprehenſive of a ſimilar fate, fled into France, and from thence into England, where, entertaining a deſign to dethrone his brother, he promiſed Edward IV. that he would ſwear fealty and do homage to him, if, by his aſſiſtance, he might obtain the kingdom. Edward inſtantly concurred with his deſign: he ardently longed to ſecure Scotland, and therefore broke the truce, and aſſiſted Albany with forces, under the command of the duke of Glouceſter, who laid ſiege to Berwick.

An army was raiſed by James, in 1482, to oppoſe the Engliſh; but the chiefs, who commanded in it, thought they had then the beſt opportunity of cruſhing the king's unworthy favourites, whom they accordingly ſeized in the king's pavilion, at the camp of Lauder. Cochran the maſon, whom he had created earl of Mar, Rogers the muſician, whom he had knighted, Torfiſan the fencing-maſter, and four others of the ſame claſs, without any form of trial, were hung up directly in his preſence, over a bridge, and he made no efforts to ſave them. After the nobility had offered this grateful ſacrifice of odious favourites to their country, inſtead of proceeding againſt the enemy, they drew off in ſeparate diviſions, and the poor deſerted James retired, with grief, to his reſidence at Edinburgh caſtle.

The two dukes, leaving 4000 men in the mean time before Berwick, advanced with the main body to Edinburgh. Meeting with no oppoſition in their march, they committed no miſchief. This moderation was probably owing to Albany, who, not finding his countrymen ſo hearty in his deſigns as he expected, pretended that he only ſought aſſiſtance from the Engliſh, for the recovery of his eſtates, without having any views detrimental to his brother. The ſtates, therefore (for the king ſeems at this time to have been a mere cypher) reſtored him to them; and the caſtle of Berwick was ceded to the Engliſh, who had inſiſted on being paid for their trouble.

The duke of Albany now became exceedingly popular; and James, who began in the following year to recover his authority, made him his prime miniſter. But the duke beginning to tamper afreſh with ſome of the nobility, who notwithſtanding the meanneſs and imprudence of the king, continued his friends, grew ſuſpected. Guilt and fear, which are always inſeparable companions, made him haſtily retire to his caſtle at Dunbar; from whence he fled, and once more ſought the protection and aſſiſtance of the Engliſh. Richard received him kindly; but his own domeſtic concerns incapacitated him from affording any other aid than five hundred horſe; with which, and what few volunteers he and the earl of Douglas (ſtill a priſoner in England) could jointly obtain, he propoſed to plunder Lochabar fair. The old earl attended him in this ſcandalous expedition. They thought to have ſurpriſed the market-place, but were diſappointed; and ſuffered a ſhameful defeat from the borderers, who alſo made captive that old rebel, Douglas. This happened in 1484. Kirkpatrick, by whom he had been taken, carried him in triumph to Edinburgh. The earl appeared before his king with a ſullen pride, and even turned his back on him; nevertheleſs, James, with a generoſity which ſome have thought faulty and ill-timed, pardoned his crimes, and allowed him to retire to the abbey of Lindores, where he had received his education, and where he ſoon after died. The duke of Albany having in this defeat loſt his friend Douglas, and, being afterwards unable to procure any aſſiſtance from the Engliſh, retired to France, where he ended his days.

James might have lived on good terms with his nobility, and been an happy monarch, had he not purſued worſe meaſures: but ſtill continuing his unpopular conduct, his nobles, piqued at his diſregard of them, formed a dangerous confederacy. On the firſt news of it, he ſhut himſelf up in Stirling caſtle, forbidding any perſon in arms to approach it on pain of death.

The conſpirators were headed in 1487, by the king's eldeſt ſon, then about fifteen years of age; ſo that the extent of their deſign was then no longer a ſecret. James was given to underſtand, that he might, if he choſe, reſign his crown to his ſon, without bloodſhed. This he refuſed; on the contrary, he raiſed forces by proclamation, in order to ſubdue the rebels. Both parties met at Bannockburn, a field in which the great Bruce had gained the greateſt renown. The confederate lords attacked him with great ſpirit, repulſed and defeated his forces. Whereupon James fled, and was purſued and taken at the houſe of a miller, where Borthwick ſtabbed him to the heart. Thus he fell on the 11th of June 1488, in the thirty-fifth year of his age, and in the twenty-ninth of his reign.

He was certainly a weak, mean, jealous, and credulous prince; though many errors of government, into which he fell, may be attributed to his want of a ſettled and regular education: this defect, however, might have been ſupplied by able counſellors; but he hated his nobility, and they effected his ruin. As a man, he was juſt and merciful, and remarkably handſome. His juſtice is indeed queſtioned by ſome, for uttering coin, which, for its exceeding baſeneſs, was called black money; but as ſoon as he found it was diſagreeable to his people, it was called in. The many edifices he erected, ſhewed he had a good taſte of architecture.

Reign of James IV. the hundred and fifth King—He enters Northumberland with an Army—Conſequences—His Marriage with the King of England's Daughter—He aſſembles a Parliament—Tranquillity of the King—His Difference with England—Himſelf and Army defeated—Is ſlain, &c.—The Queen Regent—Her Regency forfeited through a haſty Marriage—Duke of Albany elected Regent—The Queen perſuaded to fly to England with her Children—The Infants taken from her—Her Endeavours to procure a Divorce—Diviſions, &c.—Queen's Party encreaſed—Divorce obtained, &c.—The young Monarch eſcapes to his Mother—Earl of Angus, &c. indicted for Treaſon—James returns to Edinburgh—Marries the King of France's eldeſt Daughter—Queen's Death—Two remarkable Trials—An attempt to invade England—King's Death, &c.

AS ſoon as the news of the late king's death, which was for ſome time unknown, reached the ears of young James, he is ſaid to have diſcovered much contrition and filial regard. But the young monarch's grief was but of ſhort duration; and as he diſcovered, as well towards his people as himſelf, an excellent diſpoſition, it was ſucceeded by tranquillity throughout the kingdom, which for ſeveral years had been unknown. Parties (the bane and diſgrace of a nation) coaleſced; and the parliament, liament, which met in 1493, was wholly intent upon what is too often only a ſecondary conſideration,—the ſervice of their country. Obſerving the neglect of the law reſpecting the fiſhery, they enacted, that all maritime towns ſhould provide veſſels at leaſt twenty tons burthen for that ſervice; and that idle perſons ſhould be preſſed to man them. This act was followed by ſeveral others relative to their trade and civil policy: and in regard to their religion, they held the pope's authority ſo cheap as to paſs a vote, that none ſhould be conſidered as his legates but cardinals, and ſuch as were natives of Scotland.

James, who came of age in 1494, took a circuit round his dominions, that he might diſcover and redreſs his people's grievances. He made ſuch wiſe regulations in behalf of the poor, that (to uſe his own expreſſion) "the bulruſh guarded the cow." He alſo every-where encouraged agriculture, rightly conſidering it as the great ſource of a nation's eaſe, opulence, and glory: in ſhort, ſcarcely any thing was omitted, which tended to promote the welfare of his people, inſure his own happineſs, and circulate his fame. There cannot be a greater proof of James's good character, than that ſo ſhrewd, cautious, and parſimonious a monarch as Henry VII. of England, ſhould invite him to be his ſon-in-law. This match, which would have been the moſt illuſtrious of any in Europe, was prevented by the arrival of Perkin Warbeck, who was ſet up by the dutcheſs of Burgundy to perſonate one of the children of Edward IV. both of whom were generally thought to be murdered by Richard III. Perkin had at one time a very ſtrong party in England, who really believed him to be the identical duke of York. He was a young man nearly of James's age, ſenſible and engaging; and the Scots monarch, who had a great deal of the knight-errant in his diſpoſition, conſidering him as a diſtreſſed prince, not only gave him a very hoſpitable reception, and his own couſin in marriage, but entered ſo warmly into his cauſe, as to endeavour to place him on the Engliſh throne.

The principal, if not the ſole, motive of James in this action was glory: in 1497, he raiſed a formidable army, with which, accompanied by the pretender, he entered Northumberland. A maniſeſto was alſo publiſhed againſt Henry as a traitor, tyrant, and murderer; and all loyal ſubjects were invited to join their lawful prince; but not a man of the leaſt conſequence repaired to his ſtandard; ſo that James, who now began to think that he had been impoſed on, after ravaging the country, returned with a conſiderable booty to his dominions. Henry being at this time engaged in quelling a very powerful rebellion, and in no condition to reſent the affront, as a ſalvo for his honour, procured the Spaniſh ambaſſador (who was treating with Henry on a marriage between Ferdinand's daughter and the prince of Wales) to prevail on James to diſmiſs Perkin, and ſolicit an accommodation. James needed little intreaty to part with Perkin, whom he now believed to be the ſon of a proſelyte Jew of Tournay. A ſeven years truce with England was patched up; and Perkin, whom James would not betray, was allowed a ſhip to convey him to the continent; but determining to try his fate once more in England, he landed in Cornwall, was taken priſoner at Taunton, and executed at London as a traitor, in November 1499. But Henry, ſtruck with the uncommon beauty of his wife, and finding that ſhe was not pregnant, made her a lady of his queen's bed-chamber, to which a ſuitable revenue was annexed.

An end being now put to the diſturbances in England, Fox, Biſhop of Durham, was ordered, in 1500, to hint to James, that an alliance with the king of England would be advantageous: James now thought ſo too, and therefore he demanded Henry's daughter in form. Margaret was accordingly given to him, with a portion of 30,000l. though being then but ten years old, ſhe was not to enter Scotland till 1503, nor was her fortune to be paid till after conſummation. This negociation, which gave birth to the future union, paved the way to a preſent peace between the two crowns, which was ratified on the 4th of January 1502. Henry, in his treaty, called himſelf king of France as well as of England; but it is memorable to obſerve, that the former title was obliged to be ſtuck out, before James would ratify his conditions; a compliment to the French, which that nation had never merited, from her former conduct towards the Scots.

Now peace being concluded with England, James, in 1502, aſſembled his parliament, which voted proper courts of juſtice all over the Highlands, where, though moſtly wanted, they had been greatly neglected: ſo there was now hardly a ſpot in Scotland, where the inhabitants could not immediately appeal for redreſs. Premeditated, as well as accidental murder, was exceedingly common; the perpetrators of the former were therefore ordered to be puniſhed by death. Severe laws were enacted againſt ſmuggling, and all tranſmarine ſuits were to be ſettled by arbitration. The parliament then conſiſting of three eſtates, viz. great barons, leſſer barons, and clergy, next began its own regulation. In the feudal ſyſtem, the leſs was always accountable to the greater. If the baron had vaſſals under him, the king exacted the ſervice of the baron; and originally attendance in parliament, which formerly was called the king's court, was a point of duty. Accordingly, every baron, great or ſmall, was obliged to attend the king's ſummons till the time of Robert Bruce; who, finding that it gave the latter trouble and uneaſineſs, diſpenſed with their attendance. James I. enacted this into a law, obliging them, however, to ſend a certain number of men, whom they beſt reſpected, to repreſent them all. But the attendance of the greater barons was on no pretence to be omitted. As James IV. complained that his boroughs were not properly repreſented, it was enacted by the parliament then ſitting, that the great councils of all capital towns ſhould regularly, againſt every meeting of the ſenate, chuſe and ſend burgeſſes, who, together with the other barons, ſhould debate on ſuch uſeful acts as ſhould, from time to time, be offered to their conſideration, by the lords of articles (noblemen who were appointed to prepare and bring in bills). But, notwithſtanding this act, it does not appear that they were quite regular, in this reſpect, till the reign of James VI.

The young queen ſet out for Richmond in Surry on the 16th of June, in company with her father, and attended by his prime nobility. The king ſaw her to his mother's ſeat at Colleweſton; after which, he reſigned her to the earls of Surry and Northumberland, who conducted her to the borders of Scotland, where ſhe was received with tenderneſs by his majeſty; and the next day, in the moſt ſuperb and elegant manner, eſcorted to Edinburgh. For ſeveral weeks there were the greateſt rejoicings: nothing was omitted to give the young queen a favourable idea of her change, and to contribute to her happineſs.

Every thing ſeemed to render James completely happy: he was in perfect peace abroad; allied to a monarch, if not the greateſt, perhaps the richeſt in the world; in the moſt friendly correſpondence with his nobles, who repaid his confidence with affection and duty; and, conſcious of no crimes, he was happy in himſelf. His ſtudy was his people's proſperity; and literature and the fine arts were his amuſements. In 1507, he chaſtiſed the Netherlands for plundering his merchantmen, by ſending againſt them a ſquadron under the command of the famous Barton.

On the demiſe of Henry VII. his ſon Henry VIII. aſcended the throne of England in 1509. James congratulated his brother-in-law on the occaſion, and they lived in perfect amity for four years, during which time James had greatly augmented his navy, and had built (more indeed for ſhew than ſervice) a ſhip called the St. Michael, 250 feet from ſtem to ſtern, and 40 within her ſides, which (ſays one) were ten feet thick: ſhe was commanded by Barton, and ſeems to have been the greateſt veſſel then in Europe.

We are now come to the moſt diſagreeable part of James's reign; his unhappy difference with England, which brought on his ruin. We have remarked, that it was cuſtomary, whenever the Engliſh invaded France, for the Scots, as the ally of the latter, to make a diverſion into England in their favour. Henry was at this time at war with that nation; and James, whoſe notions of honour and punctilio ran exceedingly high, was attacked on his weak ſide, both by the French miniſters, then at his court, and his own clergy, by arguments and perſuaſions, not a little forcible on the mind of a young high-ſpirited prince. It appears, that the Engliſh king had expected James would break with him, and therefore had prepared himſelf againſt it; ſo that when James attacked Berwick and Norham, they made a moſt vigorous reſiſtance. However, he took the latter; and then, contrary to the earneſt diſſuaſions of his wife, he proceeded on his march into England, at the head of 50,000 men, amongſt whom were all his principal nobility, who were as paſſionately fond of glory as their ſovereign. James was ſtopped in his career by the earl of Surry, at the head of 26,000 choice troops, near Flodden; where James and his gallant army, by the ſuperior conduct of Surry, who was an excellent commander, were defeated. James, ſcorning to ſurvive his diſgrace, ruſhed into the thickeſt of the enemy and was ſlain; and moſt of the nobility, retaining the ſame ſentiment, ſhared the fate of their prince.

Many attribute this memorable defeat, which happened September 9, 1513, to the treachery of the earl of Hume, who drew off unaccountably with his diviſion. The Engliſh, however, did not know that they had gained a victory till the next day, when they found themſelves maſters of the field and the Scots artillery. Thus fell the great James, in the 40th year of his age, and the 25th of his reign, in a battle raſhly undertaken, unfortunately conducted, and fatally determined.

He was of a middle ſtature, robuſt, and of a pleaſing aſpect: his genius was elevated and enterpriſing: in manners, he was gentle, affable, polite, and, as a king, he may be ſtiled the father of his people. He was ſlow in making a reſolution; but, when once reſolved, he never receded: the too fond affection of popular applauſe was his failing; and if he had a fault, it was his immoderate attachment to the fair ſex. He maintained a literary correſpondence with the princes of his time, and wrote Latin in a ſtile perfectly claſſical. No greater proof can be given of his zeal to promote the arts and ſciences, than his introducing the art of printing into his dominions, where the book firſt printed was a breviary of the church of Aberdeen in 1509. This art had been known in England ever ſince the year 1471.

Every nobleman in thoſe days, for the benefit of his family and dependents, ſtudied ſurgery; and James, who was himſelf an adept in that uſeful art, ordained pupils of leſs quality, who, before his death, were eſtabliſhed at Edinburgh into a regular ſociety. Being a king of great abilities, and excellently diſpoſed, he was extremely regretted by his ſubjects. Be this as it may, it is very certain, that Scotland, while an independent kingdom, was at the zenith of her glory during the reign of this great prince.

Nothing very material occurred relative to the church during this century. It may be obſerved, in general, that as James III. by his indiſcreet promotions, created much diſturbance; ſo the clergy, in conſequence, once remarkable for mutual agreement and ſobriety, grew factious and encroaching; conſequently the Reformation, which, towards the cloſe of this century, began to dawn, appears to have been abſolutely neceſſary, if conſidered only in a political view.

In this century was founded the three univerſities of St. Andrew, Glaſgow, and Aberdeen: the firſt in 1412; the ſecond in 1457; the laſt in 1493: and the tutors attended their reſpective claſſes many years gratis; ſo great was their zeal for the propagation of ſcience.

Before the late king undertook his ill-adviſed expedition, he had bequeathed the regency of the kingdom, during the non-age of his ſon (an infant of a year old) to his queen. The important office, however, was to be taken from her on a re-marriage; and, as this was the condition of her authority, it was univerſally believed that ſhe would remain a widow. But it proved otherwiſe; for every thought of that youthful queen ſeemed to center in a paſſion for the earl of Angus. This accompliſhed young nobleman was chief of the houſe of Douglas, and, next to lord Hume, the moſt powerful of any that had ſurvived the battle of Flodden. The affection between him and the queen was mutual; and love, though he ſeldom exerts his power in a royal breaſt, was ſo impetuous, that, within the ſpace of a year, the regency was forfeited. The queen married the earl without making her intention known, either to the ſtates of the kingdom, or to her brother Henry, who had ſhewn great tenderneſs towards her; having generouſly recalled his troops, inſtead of purſuing the advantage which the late defeat had given him over the Scots.

Great confuſion followed upon this haſty marriage: one part of the nation was for continuing the queen: but lord Hume, who hated the Douglas family, and finding that he had not intereſt ſufficient to procure the office for himſelf, determined to exert all he had in favour of the duke of Albany; who, chiefly through his means, was accordingly elected regent. Albany was the ſon of that duke, who was brother to James III. and had taken ſhelter in France, after his defeat at Lochmaben. The circumſtance of his being a Frenchman was favourable to his election, but far from being ſo to the intereſt of Scotland; and he landed at Dumbarton, on the 18th of May 1515, when his knowledge of the language and conſtitution was very ſuperficial.

The prior of St. Andrew's was pitched upon by the duke for his inſtructor; for, being a man of ſenſe, he was deſirous, as much as poſſible, to avoid erring in his regency, through ignorance. The prior, though an able politician, was jealous and revengeful; in giving Albany the neceſſary information, he was alſo too crafty to let ſlip ſo fair an opportunity of maliciouſly mingling his perſonal reſentments. As Hume, the lord chamberlain, had diſguſted him, he therefore, in the characters which he gave the duke of the principal men in the realm, drew a moſt odious picture of that nobleman; nor did he exhibit a more flattering portrait of Angus. Thus prepoſſeſſed, the regent behaved with uncommon reſerve to theſe noblemen, whoſe favour and intereſt ought rather to have been courted by a conduct diametrically oppoſite. Such an impolitic demeanour could not but excite ſurmiſes. Should the king's brother die, Albany was preſumptive heir; it was therefore intimated to the queen, that ſhe would do well to fly with her two babes to England:

and by putting them under her brother's protection, be aſſured of their ſafety. This advice was extremely agreeable to one who mortally hated the regent. She accordingly prepared for her flight; but her intention being diſcovered, the infants were taken from her, and delivered to the care of three noblemen, who were deſervedly beloved by the public. The queen was then informed that ſhe might proſecute her journey; and the regent was beforehand with her, in acquainting Henry with his conduct, which he fully juſtified; but though he admitted his reaſons, he was, on many accounts, adverſe to his regency; it is therefore thought, that he ſecretly ſtimulated the earl of Hume, who, finding himſelf to be ſuſpected, had taken arms, and was ravaging the borders of Scotland.

The death of the king's brother, January 1516, really alarmed Henry: he ſent miniſters to Scotland with offers of a laſting peace, on condition that the regent was removed; but though that condition was not complied with, he thought it prudent to conclude a truce with the ſtates of the kingdom, till the feaſt of St. Andrew in 1520.

The integrity with which the regent acted, clearly appearing to Hume, he diſbanded his forces, and was received into favour. But Hepburn devoted to deſtruction both him and his brother William, whom he repreſented as a traitor. Theſe charges could not be proved, but more feaſible ones were produced. They were therefore cited for the murder of the late king, for non-performance of their duty at Flodden, and for unnatural crimes with each other. Though both theſe articles were unſupported by ſufficient evidence, yet they were condemned to die, and accordingly beheaded on the 12th of October. Hume was warden of the Marches, and the lord chamberlain; the former poſt the regent conferred on his intimate friend Sir Andrew D'Arcy, a Frenchman, commonly called the chevalier de la Beauté. The duke having thus ſettled every thing to his ſatisfaction, he left his power chiefly in the hands of D'Arcy, and determined to retire into France for about ſix months.

The reſentment of the Scots could now no longer be reſtrained: they in general diſapproved of the ſentence inflicted on the Humes; they were exaſperated againſt D'Arcy; and the preſence of the queen, who had left England before the regent had arrived in France, rendered them, to the laſt degree, vindictive.

On September 29, 1517, a party, conducted by Sir George Douglas and Sir David Hume, waylaid La Beauté. His attendants being all cut off, he attempted to make his eſcape: unfortunately for him, his horſe plunged into a bog, which leaving him the prey of his enemies, they greedily tore him in pieces. Douglas, with a ſavage fury, ſeized his head, and fixing it by the hair to his ſaddle-bow, rode in triumph to Dunbar, and ſtuck it on the battlements. The ſtates took very little cognizance of this action; though they did not chuſe to defend it.

The regent's preſence became now indiſpenſibly neceſſary: it would have been convenient much ſooner, but the intrigues of Henry, or rather of his artful miniſter Wolſey, had been ſufficiently powerful to keep him in France. On November 19, 1521, however, he arrived in Scotland, which he found the ſeat of confuſion. Summoning a parliament on the 26th of Jan. following, he was determined to be ſevere on the earl of Angus, who had aſſembled his military tenants, to act againſt the earl of Arran; though, on the regent's arrival, he had diſbanded his forces, and was diſpoſed for peace. He made diligent ſearch after the murderers of his friend D'Arcy, but they had taken ſanctuary in England. And though he conſidered Angus in a great meaſure acceſſory, yet a year's baniſhment in France was the greateſt puniſhment he could obtain for that nobleman.

This ſentence was no ways diſagreeable to Angus; he rather choſe to comply with it, than be the occaſion of further diſorder. The queen's violent paſſion for him had long ſince not only evaporated, but he had now become ſo much the object of her hatred, that ſhe was purſuing every method to procure a divorce: ſhe had even applied to the regent for aſſiſtance; and this circumſtance, with many additions, having been carried to the ears of her brother Henry, that monarch grew more and more exaſperated againſt the regent, whom he now conſidered as having alienated her from his intereſt, that his own might be more effectually promoted.

Henry had been promiſed by Francis, the French monarch, that the regent ſhould never return to Scotland; and the king of England made a breach of this promiſe, one pretext for a war againſt Francis. Henry had no great antipathy to the Scots; his nephew was exceedingly dear to him; but as he ſaw the regent now acting altogether like a vice-roy of France, inſtead of being the protector of an independent people: he deemed it proper to let the Scots know, that they muſt either remove him, or expoſe themſelves to his reſentment. The Scots vindicated the actions of their regent, and conſidered this demand of Henry as an attack on their liberty, when in fact they were little better than the tools of France. They peremptorily refuſed to diſmiſs the duke; and let Henry know, that though hoſtilities were far from being agreeable to them, they could nevertheleſs defend themſelves againſt his attacks.

As ſoon as the Engliſh ambaſſadors were diſmiſſed, the regent went over to France; where he communicated to the king the ſentiments and reſolution of the Scots parliament. As Francis did not queſtion but that Henry would make good his threats, the regent was diſpatched back again with about 4000 troops (all that Francis could then ſpare) with particular injunctions not to make peace with England without his concurrence. Henry made uſe of every ſtratagem to intercept the regent; notwithſtanding which, he landed in Scotland, with his troops, in Auguſt 1523. The truce being nearly expired, he ſummoned a parliament to debate on the neceſſary meaſures to be taken with Henry; whoſe generoſity of ſpirit had even led him, not only to propoſe a laſting peace with the Scots, but, at the ſame time, to negociate a treaty of marriage between their king and his eldeſt daughter. Theſe offers the regent prevailed with them to reject, as not being agreeable to Francis; Albany, likewiſe, made uſe of the moſt powerful arguments againſt it; but every oppoſition was at length borne down by that perſuaſive logic, Bribery.

An alliance being thus refuſed, which would have made the king of Scotland the undoubted heir of the Engliſh crown, the regent naturally enough concluded, that he ſhould find no difficulty in perſuading them to invade England; but here he was miſtaken: for though he led them to the borders, repreſented the Engliſh as their very worſt enemies, ſtormed and ſoothed, yea, flattered and bribed, they flatly refuſed to croſs the Tweed. The fatal field of Flodden, which gave the ſevereſt blow that the feudal ſyſtem ever felt, had not yet been forgotten by them; and they knew that the earl of Surry, at the head of 40,000 men, was prepared for their reception, had they advanced. Henry had ordered the earl not to attack the Scots; and the regent was under the mortifying neceſſity of leading his troops back again, without coming to action.

The queen's party, by the artifice of Wolſey, had ſo far increaſed during the winter, that the regent had, in great meaſure, loſt his influence. It was publicly declared, that the king was now of fit age to take the reins of government; and Albany, in all probability, now began to conſider, that when that event took place, his majeſty might requite him after the manner of his predeceſſor. He determined therefore to take care of himſelf in time; and ſet ſail for France, on the 14th of May 1524, with a reſolution never to return to Scotland.

On this agreeable news, Henry ſent the earl of Angus (whom he had before invited from his exile) into Scotland; in order to ſtrengthen the Engliſh intereſt, by a reconciliation with his wife. But he found the queen's hatred too deeply rooted; and as ſhe had connected herſelf, in politics, with the earl of Arran, Angus found he was excluded from any ſhare in the adminiſtration. Angus knowing that Henry ſuſpected Arran to be in the French intereſt, formed a party againſt him, and was ſoon joined by the earls of Lenox and Argyle. The queen, in the mean time, as well to prevent her brother's receiving any impreſſions to her diſadvantage, as to manifeſt the integrity of the earl of Arran, ſent the earl of Caſſils to deſire a laſting peace with him, and alſo an alliance agreeable to his former propoſal. But Henry, on the Scots refuſal, had promiſed his daughter to the emperor Charles V. of Germany; however, he concluded a three year's truce with Scotland, that he might have time to conſider what part he ſhould act.

The earl of Angus had found means, before this truce expired, to alienate the young king from his mother, and to gain his entire confidence. The queen had obtained a divorce from her huſband, and was now his bittereſt enemy; but, as the king, her ſon, had created him his chancellor, he was above her reach. Angus very ſoon grew intoxicated with power, and not only committed the greateſt exceſſes himſelf, but connived at them in others. He had enticed the king to Falkland, where, though he treated him with all imaginable reſpect, promoted every exerciſe and pleaſure by day, and pandered for him by night, the young monarch, ſurrounded as he was by flattery and diſſipation, conſidered himſelf as little better than his priſoner. He had very probably become acquainted with the earl's miſuſe of power; and this conſideration might have been a further incitement to his eſcape from Falkland to his mother at Stirling, which he therefore effected in June 1527, during the abſence of Angus, and in the habit of a groom.

No ſooner was the king's arrival at Stirling publickly known, than numbers of the nobility, who hated Angus, repaired thither to aſſiſt his majeſty, in caſe a freſh attempt ſhould be made to retake his perſon. Their zeal and foreſight was timely: for Angus, immediately on receiving news of the king's flight, aſſembled 2000 troops, and was marching with all haſte towards Stirling. But the lords Maxwell and Lochinvar, with the like number of men, had taken poſſeſſion of the town, in behalf of their ſovereign; and upon the approach of the earl, they repulſed him with the greateſt reſolution and loyalty. The king then, by the advice of his nobles, indicted the earl of Angus, his brother George Douglas, his uncle Archibald Douglas, and Alexander Drummond, with ſome of their chief dependents, for treaſon. The Douglas's, unable to ſtand their ground, retired into England for refuge. The king being in poſſeſſion of their eſtates, winked at their obtaining an aſylum in England; and the truce being now expired, he concluded another with his uncle for five years, in which time a laſting peace was to be conſidered on by both parties.

In the mean time the king aſſembled 8000 forces, and proceeded to the ſkirts of his kingdom, that he might puniſh the licentious borderers: of theſe, the moſt daring ſeems to have been one John Armſtrong of Gilnock-Hall. This fellow, who had a number of vaſſals under his command, lived in the greateſt ſtate and affluence, by levying contributions on the Engliſh. The king ordered him to appear by ſuch a day, and anſwer for his conduct. Armſtrong, thinking that the king would rather approve than condemn him, and at the ſame time fond of diſplaying his magnificence, appeared before his ſovereign attended by twenty-ſix gentlemen on horſeback, richly capariſoned, as his body-guard. James, aſtoniſhed at his inſolence, let him know that he had preſumed to exerciſe a power which belonged only to majeſty, and then ordered him to be hung up on the ſpot: having ſtrengthened his authority by a few more examples, he left the borders of his kingdom ſomewhat civilized, diſmiſſed his forces, and returned to Edinburgh.

From this time, namely, in 1532, the king grew prodigiouſly attached to his clergy, remembering how he had been uſed by Angus; and conſidering the reſt of his nobility as having the ſame will, if ever they ſhould have the ſame power; he employed his prelates to aſſiſt him in becoming independent of his nobles. The clergy, it muſt be obſerved, were dependent on him; for every king of Scotland had the ſole right of nomination to vacant biſhoprics and abbeys; and therefore he was pretty certain that they would heartily concur in his deſign. He well knew they would be of the greateſt ſervice to him; for beſides their private influence, they were reckoned (as has been obſerved) one of the three eſtates of parliament; and as they regularly returned members, they often occaſioned a majority. Cardinal Beatoun, archbiſhop of St. Andrews, was ſelected from among them, to be his boſom friend; he was a man of genius, and rendered the king the moſt important ſervices, in return for his confidence.

James then ſet about repairing his fortifications, and furniſhing his magazines; and thinking it now no longer neceſſary to diſſemble his intentions, he firſt treated his nobles with apparent coldneſs; removed them ſoon after, by degrees, from places of profit and truſt; and then, effectually to mortify them, the vacant poſts were beſtowed on eccleſiaſtics. The nobility bore the king's frowns with great impatience; and though they were obliged to ſubmit, at that time, to his encroachments, they determined to aſſert their privileges the firſt opportunity.

At this juncture, 1535, the king's attachment to his clergy proved extremely unfortunate; his uncle, who had diſclaimed the pope's authority, deſired an interview with James, at York. Now, though James was deſirous of an intimate connection with Henry, and therefore had no objection to the propoſed interview, he yet determined to be governed by his clergy; and as they loudly inveighed againſt Henry, as an arch heretic, againſt whom the pope had publiſhed five ſeparate bulls; as they declared that their king could not be ſafely truſted in his hands, and made uſe of every argument that malice could invent, to blacken the character of Henry, and diſſuade him from going, James, who was a bigoted catholic, approved their zeal, and declined the interview with his uncle.

Now Henry had ſo managed matters with the emperor, that he ſtill had it in his power to give his daughter Mary to James; he offered her, or the princeſs Elizabeth, to him: and the reaſon of his deſiring a meeting with his nephew, was to confer with him concerning the Reformation; and to ſettle matters relative to his ſucceeding him. James, unwilling to ſhock Henry by a blunt denial, pretended that the pope had forbidden him to ſet a foot in England; and he ſoon after received a brief to that effect from his holineſs.

The king was next adviſed by the clergy to marry a princeſs of France; which advice the yielding monarch readily complied with, though the emperor

Charles had offered him the choice of two princeſſes of his own houſe, of exquiſite beauty and prodigious fortune: but the emperor was conſidered as a favourer of the Reformation. Francis having offered James the choice of either of his daughters, he determined to take a voyage to France, in order to eſpouſe the moſt agreeable; which, in his eyes, proved to be Magdalen the eldeſt daughter, and their nuptials were accordingly, on January 7, 1537, celebrated with great pomp. Her fortune was 100,000 crowns of the ſun, and her jointure adequate to that ſum. The king of France likewiſe agreed to pay James 30,000 franks during her life. But this was but a trifling addition to her fortune; for the young queen fell ill, and died of a fever on the 22d of July, ſhortly after her arrival in Scotland.

Two very remarkable trials ſucceeded the queen's death. The clergy not content with having driven the nobility from court, which was doubtleſs as far as the king's vengeance againſt them extended; they followed them in their retirements, and ſtrove to draw from the elder barons ſuch words as they might be able to conſtrue into treaſon. The old nobles avoided the ſnare; but John Forbes, the chief of a great family, being a young man, leſs cool and reſerved, fell into it. He was accordingly accuſed of forming a deſign to murder the king, and reſtore the earl of Angus to his eſtates; and though the whole proof of this charge centered in a few incautious words, they were deemed ſufficient evidences to bring him to the block. Forbes was no ſooner executed, than it was whiſpered to the king, that certainly the lady Jane Douglas (who was ſiſter to the earl of Angus, and the only one of his family then in Scotland) muſt certainly have been privy to the deſign of Forbes; and, as ſhe did not diſcover it, ought to be conſidered as his accomplice. She was therefore forthwith apprehended; and, though known to be a woman of exemplary virtue, unacquainted with courts, and almoſt ignorant of the name of faction; though not the leaſt ſhadow of proof could be produced, ſhe was ſentenced to death by her arbitrary judges (who now met rather to condemn than to try); and the king, who might have pardoned her, choſe rather to gratify an unmanly revenge againſt a relation to the earl of Angus, and accordingly ordered her to be burnt alive, under the pretence alſo of being guilty of witchcraft.

Theſe executions, which are moſt indelible blots in this reign, being over, the king ſet on foot a negociation for a marriage with Mary of Guiſe, dutcheſs dowager of Longueville; and though Henry ſtrove to hinder this marriage, it was concluded on; and Mary landed in Scotland in the ſpring of the year 1538.

Henry, though he had been much provoked by his nephew's conduct, was yet unwilling to break with him, being averſe to hoſtilities; and accordingly, in January 1540, appointed Sir Ralph Sadler to be his ambaſſador at the court of Scotland.—Sadler was charged with private diſpatches to James, chiefly concerning the Reformation; and Henry urged him, a ſecond time, to give him an interview, notwithſtanding the interdiction of the pope; which he ridiculed, and would fain have perſuaded his nephew alſo to deſpiſe. He wiſhed eagerly that his nephew would imitate him, by ſeizing the revenues of all the abbies within his dominions; and he told him ſo. James, who afterwards produced theſe diſpatches in public, declared, that he could not, in conſcience, prevail on himſelf to commit ſuch a ſacrilegious action. But this was, indeed, a ridiculous reaſon for the Scots king to give, who had already beſtowed on five of his natural children the abbies of Kelſo, Coldingham, Melroſs, Holyrood-Houſe, and St. Andrew's; the revenues of which (nearly equal to thoſe of the crown) he reſerved for them in his exchequer, till they ſhould become of age.

James, who had reaſon to expect that his uncle would quarrel with him ſhould he again refuſe the interview, thought fit, with the advice of Beatoun, to temporiſe. Sadler was therefore ordered to return ſuch an anſwer to his maſter, as led Henry to conclude, that James would give him the meeting he ſo much deſired; for Henry entertained ſo good an opinion of his own abilities, that he did not doubt, if he could but confer with his nephew, he ſhould ſoon be able to free him from the ſuperſtition of popery, and perſuade him to join his meaſures.

Accordingly Henry, in 1541, went to York where he fully expected to have met his nephew; who, inſtead of appearing there, tranſmitted ſuch paltry excuſes, that the king of England ſaw plainly that James did not intend to meet him at all. And as he now heartily deſpiſed him, he ſent ſuch a meſſage to him from York, as cardinal Beatoun conſtrued into a declaration of war; and it certainly was attended by ſome ſkirmiſhes on the borders. Henry, indeed, was not of a temper to digeſt ſuch an affront: the more he reviewed the behaviour of James, the more was he exaſperated; ſo that in the year following he threatened to invade Scotland.

The invaſion of England, which James had been meditating, though oppoſed by the nobility, was now, in 1542, firmly reſolved on; and Beatoun undertook to cajole the nobles into concurrence.—Some, and chiefly lord Maxwell, unwilling to exaſperate the king ſtill more againſt them, agreed, though it was then November, to enter England, by the Solway, with 10,000 men.

Highly pleaſed with this intelligence, James took the fatal reſolution of conſtituting Oliver Sinclair, a minion of his, commander in chief in that expedition. Oliver kept his commiſſion a ſecret till the Scots troops had paſſed the borders, and advanced to the Firth of Solway, where Sir Thomas Wharton had haſtily collected about 500 men, which he had poſted advantageouſly, and with which he intended to oppoſe their progreſs. Sinclair then read his commiſſion, which (ſays an elegant hiſtorian) produced an effect not to be paralleled in hiſtory. Their contempt of the general, and hatred of the king, overcoming the fear of death and the love of liberty, the whole 10,000 men, on the example of the nobles, ſubmitted, without ſtriking a blow, to ſo inferior a number.

James, being informed of this aſtoniſhing circumſtance, ſunk to the ground with indignation and grief; he had been anxious about the event of the expedition, and therefore the news affected him the more; and as he had violent paſſions, he fell a prey to them; for he languiſhed in the moſt deplorable condition till the 13th of December, and then expired in the 30th year of his age, and not without ſuſpicion of being poiſoned.

James was of the middle ſize, fair and comely, unqueſtionably brave, vigilant, and temperate; but a contemporary hiſtorian (who knew him perſonally) ſays, that whatever virtues he might have, they were more than equalled by vices. In this reign, May the 7th, 1532, the court of ſeſſions was founded.

THE ſoul of James was ſo totally abſorbed with grief and reſentment, that though he muſt have been ſenſible that his end was approaching, he had not taken one ſtep towards ſettling a regency during the long minority of his daughter, who at his death was about eight days old; for the court of Scotland was ſo irregular when this unfortunate princeſs was born, that hiſtorians are not agreed as to the preciſe day. But though the king had neglected this great point, the boundleſs ambition of cardinal Beatoun inſtigated him to frame a will, by which he himſelf, having been prime miniſter in the late reign, now claimed the regency. His forgery being ſpeedily detected, the iniquitous and aſpiring prelate was tumbled from his towering height, and the important office of regent conferred on James Hamilton, earl of Arran.

This nobleman, being naturally timid, the choice of him was in many reſpects unhappy: for this failing was productive of the greateſt inſtability in his conduct, at a time when wars with England, factions at home, and, above all, the dawning Reformation, required the utmoſt ſteadineſs and reſolution. No wonder therefore that the regent ſoon expoſed himſelf to the artifice of ſo ſubtle a ſtateſman as Beatoun, who, after a few weeks impriſonment, was allowed to return to his caſtle of St. Andrew's; though by forging a will for the late king, the laws of his country might have convicted him of high-treaſon; but inſtead of this, the intriguing cardinal very ſoon held the maſter-wire, whilſt Arran, having the name of regent, was anſwerable for conſequences.

Whatever the deſigns of Henry VIII. were, he had generouſly diſmiſſed all the noble captives who had ſurrendered themſelves at Solway; they returned to Edinburgh in the middle of January, charged with a propoſal of peace, and then of uniting the two kingdoms by a marriage of his ſon Edward with their infant queen. This propoſal was ſtrongly ſeconded by the earl of Angus (now returned from exile) and much urged by Sir Ralph Sadler, the Engliſh ambaſſador, who expatiated ſo largely on the happy effects ſuch an union would produce, that the regent ſeemed exceedingly deſirous of it. The earl was a friend to the Reformation; and as he knew that an alliance like this would greatly promote it, the treaty was accordingly concluded on; and the young queen, when ſhe ſhould attain her 10th year, was to be ſent into England. Henry, in the mean time, promiſed to preſerve inviolable peace, and not to interfere in the government of Scotland.

The ratification of this treaty gave no diſguſt to Beatoun: for though he mortally hated the king of England, and diſliked the alliance, he knew it would be no difficult matter to perſuade the regent to renounce Henry's friendſhip, and declare for the intereſt of France. The weak and irreſolute Arran, within the ſpace of a month, was cajoled—not only to break the treaty—but to abjure the doctrines of the Reformation in the Franciſcan church at Stirling. The regent now gave himſelf up wholly to the cardinal, and to the queen-mother, who eſpouſed Popery with all that fiery zeal which bigotry can inſpire. They had obtained an act for the proſecution of the reformed, whom they began to butcher with the moſt unremitting cruelty. This occaſioned a ſtrong diviſion in favour of Henry and the Reformation, which was headed by the earls of Angus and Lenox, who engaged the cardinal's party, but were defeated, and fled to England for refuge.

Henry was now ſo exaſperated at the treatment which he had received, that he determined the Scots ſhould feel the weight of his reſentment. Accordingly, on the 3d of May 1544, a conſiderable body of troops landed at Leith; and the Scots, believing that Henry had full employment for all his troops in France, being unprepared to oppoſe their progreſs, they entered Edinburgh with great eaſe, and terribly ravaged all the country round.

This impolitic invaſion, Beatoun did not omit to take advantage of, by employing every art to wean the Scots from the Engliſh: he repreſented Henry as the vileſt of encroachers, who by thus enforcing his odious alliance, and eſpouſing the cauſe of heretics, was ſtriking at the very root of their liberties. In ſhort, he ſo ſucceſsfully applied himſelf to the paſſions and prejudices of a tenacious and iraſcible people, that, in general, the alliance with ſuch an excommunicated wretch as Henry was thought on with abhorrence. And had not Francis I. concluded a peace with England, in which the Scots, contrary to the inclination of Henry, were comprehended, they were determined on a war, which would probably have proved very fierce and bloody, being chiefly a religious one.

Scotland being now at peace, the cardinal began to redouble his rage againſt the Proteſtants. The Reformation notwithſtanding the perſecutions of that famous prelate, every day gained ground. George Wiſhart, a man of good family and ſound learning, had recommended the doctrines of the Reformation, with a meekneſs and candour which always accompanies true piety: his miniſtry, which had been moſtly confined to the houſes of his friends, had met with ſuch conſiderable ſucceſs, that Beatoun, conſidering him as the prop of the Reformation, reſolved at all events to bring him to the ſtake. And though the ſeeds of the Reformation had, in 1546, received a parliamentary ſanction in Scotland, and the regent before his apoſtacy had allowed Engliſh bibles to be publicly read; yet Wiſhart was ſeized, and the cardinal, by his legatine authority, brought him to the fiery trial; which, though aggravated by every circumſtance which bigotry and barbarity could inſpire, he endured, on the 1ſt of March, with a primitive reſolution and conſtancy.

The execution of this worthy man was viewed by Beatoun from his caſtle of St. Andrew's; and he now conſidered hereſy to be nearly extinguiſhed; he therefore gave a looſe to his paſſions, and behaved every where with the moſt uncontroulable inſolence: but he one day ſo groſsly inſulted Norman Leſley, ſon of the earl of Rothes, that he determined the cardinal's life ſhould appeaſe his reſentment. Accordingly, Leſley, with fifteen of his friends, gaining admittance into his caſtle, and entering his chamber, found him ſitting in a chair. Leſley then very gravely addreſſed himſelf to the cardinal, recapitulating his cruelties, and adviſed him inſtantly to implore divine forgiveneſs; he then with the greateſt deliberation gave him two ſtabs in the body; and the reſt following his example, the wretched prelate fell a ſpeedy ſacrifice, exclaiming with his lateſt breath—"I am a prieſt."—Finding that their intention had taken air, they admitted upwards of one hundred more of their friends into the caſtle, which was preſently ſurrounded by a number of troops, ſent by the clergy to reſcue their cardinal. The conſpirators let them know that they had come too late; and to convince them of it, they threw the lifeleſs trunk amongſt them, out of the very window from which the cardinal had triumphantly beheld the tortures of the pious Wiſhart a few weeks before: thus was Scotland delivered (though by means not juſtifiable) of the moſt powerful man in it; who, according to all report, was unhappily at the ſame time the moſt bigoted, the moſt wicked, unrelenting, and cruel. The conſpirators kept poſſeſſion of the caſtle for five months. At laſt being beſieged in form, by a body of French troops, under the command of Leon Strozzi, they capitulated for life and limb; and as Strozzi deemed them his priſoners, they were accordingly tranſported into France, together with the cardinal's immenſe treaſures.

This aſſiſtance from the French rouſed the jealouſy of the Engliſh: they conſidered it as an infringement of the peace; and Henry VIII. dying in the beginning of the year 1547, the Commons of England impowered the regent duke of Somerſet to proceed with vigour againſt the Scots, and compel them to forſake the French; and if other means ſhould fail, to oblige them likewiſe to fulfil the alliance with England, which had been ſo ſolemnly agreed on. But the queen-dowager managed affairs too artfully even to ſuffer the Scots to conſent to the union.

Both nations now reſolved on war; and in the beginning of September, the duke of Somerſet entered Scotland at the head of 18,000 men, whilſt a fleet of ſixty ſail of ſhips appeared on the coaſt. The Scots had prepared themſelves for the duke's reception. But before matters came to an extremity, Somerſet publiſhed a manifeſto, urging a union of the two nations, by a match between the princeſs and Edward, and wrote a letter to the regent, informing him, that on aſſurance that the queen ſhould not be diſpoſed of to a foreign prince, he would immediately withdraw his troops.

Notwithſtanding this, the fickle regent was prevailed on by the queen dowager and her party, not only to diſregard the duke's applications, but to treat his reaſonings with contempt; whereupon both parties prepared for battle. The Engliſh were encamped at Preſton-Pans, and the Scots at Muſſelburg. Somerſet had ſecured an eminence, which not only commanded a communication with his fleet, but gave him the advantage of the wind and ſun. The Scots, under all theſe diſadvantages, were raſh enough to begin the attack. They were armed with bucklers, and pikes eighteen feet long, and moved in ſo firm a phalanx, that they actually diſperſed the Engliſh cavalry; but ſuch batteries of artillery were diſcharged on them from the ſhipping, and the foreign fuſileers, that they were obliged to give ground. The earl of Angus, who had lately deſerted the Engliſh intereſt, and now commanded the Scotch van-guard, endeavoured to ſhelter his troops, in ſome meaſure, by retiring towards the main body; which motion being unhappily miſtaken for a flight, the whole army fell into a confuſion, which the Engliſh, taking advantage of, ſoon rendered irretrievable. An univerſal rout, and a terrible carnage enſued. The Scots were purſued five hours; and the three roads, by which they fled, were covered with pikes, bucklers, and dead bodies. This was called the Battle of Pinkey, one of the moſt fatal which the Scots had ever fought, and in which they loſt at leaſt 10,000 men. Two thouſand are ſaid, in the purſuit, to have counterfeited death, and to have thus eſcaped in the night, amongſt whom was Angus; amongſt the priſoners were the earl of Huntley, the lords Yeſter, Hamilton and Wemys.

The duke then plundered Leith, and burnt Kinghorn; but, through a want of proviſion, was ſoon obliged to return to England with his forces; and the queen-mother, by her artful conduct, induced the Scots to ſue to the French king for aſſiſtance and protection for the young queen; who returning a favourable anſwer, ſhe was ſhortly after bethrothed to the dauphin, and the Engliſh thereby effectually diſappointed.

The Scots having, in 1548, obtained 6000 troops from France, were now reſolved to annoy the Engliſh, though the duke of Somerſet had offered them a ten years truce on very moderate terms. They accordingly endeavoured to diſpoſſeſs them of the garriſons they had in Scotland; but they were unable to reduce Haddington, the ſiege of which place they carried on ſo bunglingly, that the aſſailants were often knocked down by women, with plummets fixed to ſtrings, which they held in their hands. On this occaſion, D'Eſſe the French general grew ſo unpopular that he deſired to be recalled; and monſieur Des Termes was nominated in his ſtead, who bringing with him conſiderable ſupplies of money, men, and ammunition, on landing in Scotland, and being joined by his country, found himſelf at the head of no deſpicable army. He laid cloſe ſiege to Haddington, which capitulated; and next reduced Broughty-caſtle.

Skirmiſhes and trifling ſieges continued on both ſides, till 1550, when the queen-dowager made a viſit to her daughter in France; the chief intent of which was, to obtain the regency, by means of the French king; which the weak and flexible Arran was eaſily prevailed on to abdicate upon ſeveral liberal promiſes made him, and the offer of a public ratification of his conduct.

When the queen-dowager returned to Scotland, in 1554, ſhe took poſſeſſion of the government, and ſoon teſtified the ſenſe, prudence, and reſolution, of which ſhe was miſtreſs, by taking a progreſs, in perſon, into the northern parts of the kingdom. The natives there, in conſequence of the factions at court, had recovered all their natural contempt of law and equity; but the queen adopted ſuch wiſe meaſures, that without much blood-ſhed, they were reduced to a ſtate of ſubjection; and reviving a former law, ſhe left every chieftain anſwerable for the good behaviour of his dependents. She behaved with ſo much diſcretion, by ſeeming to diſregard all religious diſputes, that, though a Catholic herſelf, ſhe gave no offence to either party.

From an attachment to the French intereſt, the queen had raiſed many of that nation to offices of truſt and dignity; and had ſo far forgotten herſelf, as to propoſe a ſmall, but a fixed tax on land, expreſsly to maintain a body of regular troops for the French ſervice. About three hundred of the leſſer barons waited on the queen, and remonſtrated ſo ſenſibly and boldly againſt the tax, which they conſidered as a direct innovation upon their rights and privileges, that the queen very prudently abandoned it when ſhe ſaw her error, and knew the determined reſolution of the Scots.

The French were exceedingly ſolicitous of promoting a war with England. But as the Engliſh crown had now devolved on Mary, a princeſs, whoſe only ambition was to fight for the church of Rome, and whoſe great delight was, from a blood-thirſty zeal, to butcher the beſt of her own ſubjects :—the Scots having received no injury, were determined to offer none; and therefore flatly refuſed ſo far to humour the French, as to provoke a people, with whom they declared, that, " while they had no " ſiniſter views on their independency, they were " diſpoſed to live in peace." This conduct hurt the French; and ſhewed to the regent, who had propoſe the war, the bounds of her authority. However, ſhe haſtened to conclude her daughter's marriage with the dauphin, which ſhe imagined would neceſſarily enlarge it.

The concluſion of this affair being equally deſired by the king of France, eight perſons were immediately ordered to be preſent at the ceremony, as repreſentatives of the whole Scots nation. They were, the archbiſhop of Glaſgow, the biſhop of Roſs and Orkney, the earls of Caſſils and Rothes, lord Fleming, lord Seaton, the prior of St. Andrew's, and John Erſkine, of Dun. And as ſome of the perſons, who were thus highly honoured, were zealous advocates for the Reformation, it may ſerve to ſhew that the Proteſtant intereſt had gained very conſiderable influence by this time.

The French betrayed a ſpirit of deep deceit and artifice reſpecting the marriage treaty, which is as much characteriſtical of that people, as plain dealing and honour is of Britons. For though the right of ſucceſſion, in default of iſſue, was ſecured to the houſe of Hamilton, and ratified in the moſt ſolemn manner by the king of France, the young queen, and the dauphin; yet Mary, whoſe youth and inexperience can alone excuſe her, had been perſuaded to ſubſcribe three deeds, whereby in failure of an heir, ſhe had, by free gift, aſſigned over her kingdom to the crown of France, declaring every other future promiſe or deed to be void and of no effect. Under this deluſion, the marriage was celebrated, on the 24th of April 1558, with great pomp and ſplendour; and the Scots deputies were treated with the utmoſt elegance. After a proper ſtay in France, having executed their commiſſion, they thought of returning home; but they had ſcarcely taken leave of the court for that purpoſe, when four out of the eight, viz. the biſhop of Orkney, the earl of Rothes, the earl of Caſſils, and lord Fleming, ſuddenly died, which ſome attributed to poiſon, though perhaps without foundation.

The Reformation, meeting with no check, made an aſtoniſhing progreſs: half the kingdom had by this time renounced Popery. And as many perſons of rank and fortune had avowed themſelves to be Proteſtants, they now began to make demands, which obliged Mary to lay aſide the maſk. They moved, that the eſtabliſhed religion, throughout the whole kingdom, ſhould be that which they profeſſed.

Elizabeth, who in 1559 ſwayed the Britiſh ſceptre, had completed ſuch an eſtabliſhment: and this conſideration, in all probability, encouraged the Scots to be reſolute in their demand. But the reformers little knew what cruel orders had been tranſmitted from France, when the utter extinction of Proteſtants were decreed by fire and ſword; and the earl of Argyle, the prior of St. Andrew's, and other leaders of the party, were devoted to immediate deſtruction. But the regent was too politic and moderate to execute ſuch deſperate commands. On the contrary, though the Popiſh clergy made a great clamour, as foreſeeing the downfall of their pride and luxury, Mary allowed to the Proteſtants the free and public exerciſe of their religion. But as ſhe had been heard to declare, " That the perform" ance of promiſes was no further to be urged to " princes, than was conſiſtent with their own con" veniency;" they were deſirous to ſecure themſelves by a parliamentary ſanction. But ſhe treated this application with contempt, and threatened the abridgement of former privileges. The famous John Knox, and other preachers, animated their adherents in Perth with the moſt enlarged ſentiments of religious liberty. Returning from one of Knox's ſermons, fired with violent zeal, a prieſt imprudently prepared to celebrate maſs as they paſſed. They could no longer reſtrain their reſentment; but with the moſt outrageous fury, unanimouſly fell upon the churches and monaſteries in that city, and after deſtroying every image and picture therein, they almoſt levelled them with the ground. This riot, though believed to have been merely accidental, the regent conſidered as a determined thing. She inſtantly levied forces, and began her march to Perth. The Proteſtants, on this intelligence, ſwarmed together from all quarters; ſo that in a few days, though the queen was 7000 ſtrong, they were in a condition to face her. Both parties, however, being little deſirous of coming to extremities, concluded a treaty; which, on the part of the queen, was very ſoon broken. Accordingly, the Proteſtants aſſembled afreſh, called themſelves The Congregation, and again took arms. This produced another treaty, which was alſo ſoon broken.

The regent being no longer to be truſted, the Proteſtants aſſembled in arms once more, and proceeded to action. They were led on by James Stewart, prior of St. Andrew's, and Arran, the ſon of the late regent, who had been obliged to fly from France for uttering ſome very free ſpeeches againſt Popery. Numbers daily flocking to their ſtandard, they were ſoon ſuperior to the queen's forces, although lately conſiderably augmented by the French.

The Proteſtants ſaw the ancient inhabitants of Leith driven from their houſes, which were now occupied by a ſtanding army of foreigners: therefore, though they primarily inſiſted on the legal eſtabliſhment of their religion, they afterwards declared, that if the French forces were not ſpeedily diſmiſſed, they would themſelves expel them Scotland, with thoſe who abetted them. As the regent refuſed to comply with their demands, the Congregation, having ſo great a cauſe depending, aſſembled the whole body who were attached to their party, to deliberate on what meaſures they ſhould adopt. Willox and Knox appeared for the whole order of divines; who, in full aſſembly, having maintained, " That it was lawful for ſubjects not " only to reſiſt tyrannical princes, but to deprive " them of their unſcriptural authority;" every individual member of the convocation roſe up in order, and gave his ſuffrage for diſmiſſing the queen from her office of regent.

The Congregation hereupon was joined by the late regent himſelf, who, by way of douceur for his reſignation of that poſt, had, by the French king, been created duke of Chatelherault. He was ſhortly afterwards followed by Maitland, the queen's chief ſecretary, a ſtateſman of the moſt conſummate abilities, who ſecretly had long favoured the Reformation. This great man diſcovered to the lords of the Congregation, that, without a miracle, it would be impoſſible for them to accompliſh their purpoſes. He adviſed, therefore, not to hazard an engagement with their undiſciplined, though numerous troops, againſt ſuch forces as the French, which, by the martial reigns of Francis I. and Henry II. had become veterans in the art of war. But he propoſed that they ſhould aſk aſſiſtance from the Engliſh, with whom, it is imagined, both he and Knox had long maintained a private correſpondence. The Congregation ſoon after took poſſeſſion of Edinburgh; but here, being ſtill urged not to riſk a battle, through want of money, and other leſs eſſential cauſes, they were reduced to the greateſt diſtreſs. In this ſituation, Maitland renewed his propoſal, informing them, that if they thought the cauſe, in which they now ſuffered, was ſufficiently deſperate and momentous to demand it, they might depend on aid from England.

They having at length complied, Cockburn, of Ormiſter, was immediately ordered to repair to Berwick, where Sir James Crofts and Sir Ralph Sadler commanded, who had already received direction to ſupply the preſent exigency of the Proteſtants, by the payment of 4000 crowns. But Cockburn's party, in returning with the money, was intercepted and ſtripped of the ſupply by the earl of Bothwell, who at that time was the only nobleman of note in the queen's intereſt.

Notwithſtanding this accident, the Scots were kept from deſponding by the continual harangues of Knox and his brethren. But the count de Martigues arriving, in 1560, from France, with 1000 foot and ſome cavalry, the whole force of their eloquence was neceſſary, in order to hinder the Congregation from diſperſing. On this occaſion, the diligent prior of St. Andrew's aſſembled 600 horſe, with which he aſſailed the French, beat up their quarters, intercepted their proviſions, and cut off their ſtraggling parties. The French general advancing along the coaſt diſcovered a fleet ſtanding for the Frith of Forth, and ſuppoſing it to be a powerful reinforcement, expreſſed great demonſtrations of joy; which were ſoon damped when they learned, to their utter dejection, that the fleet was from England, for the aid of the Congregation, and that a powerful army would ſoon follow: they then retreated to Stirling with all haſte.

After this timely relief, the Proteſtants repaired to Berwick, and, through the duke of Norfolk, concluded the following treaty with Elizabeth, "That no cloſer union with France ſhould ever be ſuffered; and to prevent the encroachments of that power, the queen of England promiſed to employ in Scotland a conſiderable army, which the Scots agreed to ſecond with their forces. No place in Scotland was to be put into the hands of the Engliſh; whatever was taken from the enemy, ſhould, at the diſcretion of the Scots, either be kept or demoliſhed; and if any invaſion ſhould be made on England, the Scots bound themſelves to aſſiſt Elizabeth with part of their forces." This treaty was ratified, and hoſtages given to Elizabeth for the due performance of it.

The queen's army, which conſiſted of 6000 foot and 2000 horſe, arrived in April, and as the troops which had been intended for the aſſiſtance of the French, under D'Elbeuf, had, by a tempeſt, been diſperſed ſeveral ways, the regent was unable to keep the field. The French, however, had thrown themſelves into Leith, where they were determined to ſtand a ſiege: in the height of which, on the 10th of June, died the queen-regent, who was the inſtrument, rather than the cauſe, of all theſe troubles; being in her own nature (according to ſome) a woman of an excellent diſpoſition and ſingular abilities. On her death, the French, foreſeeing that their party would neceſſarily dwindle, made overtures of peace; which being hearkened to, it was concluded on the 6th of July. The French agreed to recall their troops from Scotland; the Proteſtant religion was left to the deciſion of parliament; an act of oblivion was paſſed; and the ſovereign authority delegated to the lords of the Congregation: after which, the French and Engliſh armies quitted Scotland at the ſame time, and tranquillity was happily reſtored.

The Scots now applied themſelves to the eſtabliſhing their religion: in this, the ardour of the nobles was little inferior to that of Knox and Willox. A very numerous parliament, therefore, met in Auguſt; and, in a few days, overturned popery, that ancient ſuperſtitious ſyſtem of religion, though it had been eſtabliſhed ſo many centuries. Not one of the Popiſh party in this parliament had the boldneſs to attempt a vindication of their doctrines; ſo that the Proteſtant religion being voted, without oppoſition, the reformed teachers were ordered to draw up a confeſſion of faith; which they accordingly did, and it was univerſally approved of.

The death of Francis II. the huſband of Mary, and ſucceſſor of Henry II. was an event which the Scots ſuppoſed would give firmneſs and ſtability to their new ſyſtem, which was formed after the model of the reformed church of Geneva. The following year, abbies and cathedrals, and every monument of popery, which had eſcaped the firſt rage of the reformers, were aboliſhed by act of parliament.

Religious government, in which a people's liberty or ſlavery muſt, in a great meaſure, depend, having been thus happily ſettled; in 1561, the ſtates of the kingdom appointed the prior of St. Andrew's to wait on the queen, and invite her to take into her own hands the reins of government. Though ſhe had been educated in the catholic religion, and hence many dreaded her return; yet, upon the whole, the invitation was ſincere. On the other hand, Leſley, biſhop of Roſs, was privately commiſſioned by the papiſts (who were ſtill a conſiderable body) to adviſe her, that if, when ſhe came over, ſhe would land at Aberdeen, where the Proteſtant doctrine had made the leaſt progreſs, ſhe ſhould be joined by 20,000 men, at the head of whom ſhe might eaſily re-eſtabliſh popery, and overturn the fabrick of preſbytery, not yet thoroughly cemented.

Though Leſley obtained the firſt audience, his embaſſy was diſregarded, while the prior was received with the greateſt affection and confidence. She expreſſed towards her people, ſentiments the moſt tender and equitable; but accuſtomed as ſhe was to the ſplendour and gaiety of the French court, ſhe could not think of leaving it without regret. Whilſt ſhe was preparing for this voyage, thoſe fatal jars with England commenced, which embittered and ſhortened her days. By the ſixth article in the late peace, Mary (who had been perſuaded by her father-in-law Henry II. not merely to uſe, on every occaſion, the arms of England, but even to lay claim to the crown) after acknowledging that the crown of England and Ireland did of right belong to Elizabeth, had ſolemnly promiſed that ſhe would never hereafter uſe the titles, or bear the arms of thoſe kingdoms. But as the treaty was never ratified, ſhe ſtill retained her pretenſions, as ſhe meant to revive her claim when a favourable opportunity offered.

It is not, however, improbable (as Elizabeth's own ſubjects could not deny the queen of Scots to be her immediate heir) that matters might have terminated amicably, if Mary, inſtead of promiſing to abſtain from bearing the title of queen of England "in all times to come," had engaged not to aſſume that title, "during the life of Elizabeth, or the lives of her lawful poſterity."

On the part of Elizabeth, female jealouſy had no inconſiderable ſway in this affair. Though a great queen, ſhe had, in her diſpoſition, a ſtrong tincture of vanity; was prodigiouſly fond of dreſs, uncommonly ſolicitous to diſplay her charms, and exceedingly delighted with the incenſe of flattery. Mary landed ſafely at Leith, on the 19th of Auguſt, after thirteen years abſence from her native country; having eſcaped an Engliſh fleet, which, it is thought, lay in wait to intercept her.

The Scots, not expecting her arrival ſo ſoon, were under a neceſſity of eſcorting her to Holyrood-houſe, over a barren country, with very little pomp. However, on her entering Edinburgh, this was amply recompenſed by the moſt unbounded teſtimonies of joy. But the Sunday following, theſe expreſſions of approbation were a little contradicted; for ſhe commanded maſs to be celebrated in the chapel of her palace. The populace, notwithſtanding the awe with which her preſence had inſpired them, would on this occaſion have proceeded to violence, but for the timely interpoſition of the prior of St. Andrew's: by his means, the queen and her domeſtics, then and ever after, were allowed the undiſturbed exerciſe of their religion. This indulgence produced the queen's royal aſſent to the Reformation; and alſo a proclamation, that any attempt to alter or ſubvert it ſhould be deemed felony. The prior and Maitland, perſons very much in favour with the people, now became her chief favourites; and none but Proteſtants were promoted to offices of value or importance.

Mary ſoon began to experience the cares of government: her favourable regard to the prior of St. Andrew's, was a thorn in the ſide of the earl of Huntley, who was a bigoted papiſt, and had greatly flattered himſelf with the thoughts of enjoying the queen's entire confidence; he therefore conſidered the prior as the rival of his power, and, not being able to vent his private revenge on his rival (afterwards created earl of Murray) he madly ruſhed into open rebellion. The new-made earl inſtantly undertook to quell the inſurrection, which he accordingly effected with a handful of men; and in the engagement, Huntley, who was extremely corpulent, was trampled to death. It is generally believed, that the crown itſelf was the object of this ambitious nobleman.

In 1563, Mary began to new model her court; and, as far as ſhe was able, France was her pattern. Knox, and the rigid reformers of thoſe days, have repreſented her as introducing not only luxury, but indecency; though it is probable, that they beſtowed theſe hard names merely on regal ſtate, and the innocent diverſion of dancing. Her ſubjects in general now wiſhed that ſhe would take into her conſideration one important concern. As ſhe had been a widow two years, they wiſhed for her marriage, that ſo the crown might deſcend in an uninterrupted line from ancient monarchs. Elizabeth warmly recommended to her the eſpouſal of her favourite, Robert Dudley, earl of Leiceſter. But a match with an Engliſh ſubject was no way agreeable to Mary's high ſpirit. She, however, treated Elizabeth's miniſters with great reſpect; and, giving an evaſive anſwer, propoſed, in her turn, to the Engliſh queen, a marriage between her and the earl of Arran. On this occaſion, the two queens entered into a correſpondence, which was carried on till the ſpring of 1565, with equal politeneſs and diſſimulation. At length Mary declared, that if Elizabeth would publicly acknowledge her right of ſucceſſion to the Engliſh crown, ſhe would honour the earl of Leiceſter with her perſon. This declaration, which Elizabeth could by no means brook, put an end to the correſpondence.

Henry Stewart, lord Darnly, ſon of the earl of Lenox, who had been exiled by the regent, duke of Chatelherault, arrived about this time in Scotland. This nobleman was ſcarcely twenty years of age, in ſtature above the common ſize, perfectly well ſhaped, and handſome to effeminacy. Being well verſed in ſuch arts as could add eaſe and elegance to his form, he at once decided in an affair which had been the object of many political intrigues. The queen ſaw him as the only man whom ſhe determined to eſpouſe. On his recovery from a fit of the meaſles, in which ſhe was his conſtant attendant, ſhe publicly avowed her regard; and though her choice of him was rather diſagreeable to Murray and many of her ſubjects, and entirely ſo to Elizabeth, he received her hand on the 29th of July.

As a proof of her affection, ſhe iſſued out orders that he ſhould be entitled king of Scots, and that all writs of law ſhould run in the joint names of king and queen. This violent ſtretch of prerogative not a little alarmed her ſubjects. Murray, being now become the object of the king's hatred, and having received intimation that his life was in danger, ſummoned his military tenants; but having in vain attempted to rouſe the inhabitants of Edinburgh to arms, either in order to revenge the plot formed againſt him, or to prevent the ill effects of the queen's fondneſs, he retired with his forces to Dumfries. He ſent letters to Mary from thence, full of ſubmiſſion, offering to accommodate matters, and imploring her forgiveneſs: but the queen rejected his offers, and advanced towards him with 18,000 men. On this he fled into England, and put himſelf under the protection of Elizabeth, who, as ſome hiſtorians aſſert, had excited him to take arms merely to diſtreſs the queen of Scots, on account of her marriage with Darnly, of which in the ſtrongeſt terms ſhe had expreſſed her diſpleaſure. Here he not only found an aſylum, but a ſupport, though Elizabeth, in order to ſave appearances with Mary, affected openly to diſcountenance him.

The proſperity of Mary's affairs had not only rooted her averſion to Murray, but inſpired her with ſentiments no leſs prejudicial to the whole Proteſtant party, than the revival of Popery. This, notwithſtanding her former ſolemn engagements, ſhe certainly had attempted, in a parliament which was to have met on the 12th of March 1566, but for the following unexpected event: The queen's violent paſſion for Darnly ſoon began to abate; ſhe found, that, beſides his perſon, he had nothing to recommend him; the little underſtanding he had was ſtill leſſened by ſelf-conceit, raſhneſs, and imprudence: his fondneſs for amuſements, and proneneſs to many of the vices of youth, together with his impatient temper, led him into ſcenes of the deepeſt debauchery; he drank to exceſs, affronted the queen in public, and brought infection to her bed. Mary reſenting his ungrateful behaviour, took little care to hide her diſguſt. The king, before his marriage, had cultivated an acquaintance with one David Rizio, the ſon of a muſician in Turin. By ſervility and inſinuation this man gained admittance into the queen's family, who retained him for his ſkill in muſic, and he ſoon crept into conſiderable favour. Darnly therefore imputed the alienation of the queen's affections to this man (who had of late refuſed to accompany him in his extravagancies) rather than to his own miſconduct.

Darnly, ſuſpecting that the queen's intimacy with Rizio had ariſen to a criminal correſpondence, imparted the matter to earl Morton, and the lords Lindſay and Ruthven, who propoſed the having him tried by parliament, and hanged publicly if guilty; but the king's revenge was ſo vehement, that he declared the wretch ſhould be aſſaſſinated in the queen's preſence, though ſhe was ſix months advanced in her pregnancy; proteſting that if they refuſed their aſſiſtance, he would ſtab him with his own hand.

Accordingly on the 9th of March 1566, whilſt Rizio and the counteſs of Argyle were at ſupper with the queen, Darnly, by a private paſſage, ſuddenly entered the apartment. Ruthven, and three or four of their truſty accomplices, followed in armour. The queen and her company were terribly alarmed. Rizio, concluding himſelf to be the intended victim, ran for ſhelter behind the queen's back, and clung to her clothes; while Ruthven, with his drawn dagger, commanded him to leave the room. But the queen ſtill protecting him, he was ſevered from her; and being pierced with fifty-ſix wounds, he expired in the adjoining apartment.

The palace was for ſome time kept poſſeſſion of by the conſpirators, who carefully guarded the queen, and extorted from her, in the king's preſence, a promiſe of pardon. Murray, in the mean time, returned according to agreement, and was well received, both by the king and queen, but carefully avoided taking part with the aſſaſſins. Darnly having publicly proteſted againſt any participation in the murder of Rizio; Morton and his aſſociates, apprehenſive of bad conſequences from this baſe uſage, fled precipitately to Newcaſtle. Mary then returned to Edinburgh, where ſhe employed all the rigour of the law againſt the perſons who had been any ways concerned in the murder of her favourite. It appears, however, that only two men of inconſiderable rank were executed.

The king, by his proclamations, endeavoured to perſuade the public that he was not an acceſſary in this crime; but the queen knew full well the contrary. Her hatred to him therefore increaſed, and as he perſevered in his lewd and riotous courſes, ſhe wiſely abridged his power. Thus circumſtanced, and diſregarded by the nobility, he, for ſome time, retired to his father's houſe, where he lived unpitied and neglected, as an outcaſt from ſociety.

James Hepburn, earl of Bothwell, a moſt bigoted Papiſt, who had formerly ventured almoſt ſingly to oppoſe the meaſures of the Congregation, became now a new favourite with Mary. As the queen was bent on the reſtoration of Popery, having actually written to pope Pius V. for a nuncio, and in the mean time allowed great indulgence to prieſts, Bothwell enjoyed her entire confidence. But he being Murray's implacable enemy, and the queen deſiring to be on good terms with that nobleman, ſhe laboured to reconcile them, and at laſt procured a mutual promiſe to bury in oblivion all paſt injuries.

The queen's delivery being now at hand, ſhe fixed her reſidence at Edinburgh caſtle, as the place of the greateſt ſecurity for her perſon. Here, on the 19th of June, ſhe was delivered of her only ſon James, who afterwards, by his acceſſion to the throne of England, united two ſeparate kingdoms into what they ſeemed formed for by nature—One Great Monarchy. His baptiſm, at which queen Elizabeth, the king of France, and the duke of Savoy, ſtood ſponſors, was celebrated, though after the Romiſh manner, with uncommon magnificence.

The irkſomeneſs of the king's ſituation now made him determine to quit Scotland. But as the queen thought that his departure would probably ſpread their quarrel all over Europe, and that, in ſuch a caſe, ſhe herſelf might ſuffer in the opinion of many, ſhe ſo artfully managed matters, as to prevent his intended flight: and in the mean time, tranſmitted from Jedburgh, where ſhe was holding a court of juſtice, an account of his and her tranſactions to the king of France.

In a ſkirmiſh with the borderers, Bothwell had at this time received a wound, which obliged him to be carried to Hermitage-caſtle. The queen no ſooner heard of this, than ſhe, from various motives, travelled from Jedburgh, eighteen miles over a moſt rugged road, in order to ſee him. But finding his indiſpoſition to be ſlight, ſhe returned to Jedburgh the ſame day; but the hurry of her ſpirits, together with the fatigue of her journey, threw her the next morning into a fever; from which, however, her youth and excellent conſtitution very ſoon recovered her. Perfectly to re-eſtabliſh her health, the queen fixed her reſidence at Craigmillar. The king ſtill remained in a contemptuous ſolitude at Stirling; from whence, the following year, he removed to Glaſgow: here he was ſeized with a dangerous diſtemper, the effect, as ſome ſay, of poiſon; nor did the queen once viſit him till he was out of danger.

But on a ſudden the queen appeared to be reconciled to him. Complaining of the badneſs of the air where he then was, ſhe prepared a houſe for his reception at Edinburgh, which had the advantage of an healthful ſituation. The king, overjoyed at her return of affection for him, and believing it to be ſincere, was carried thither in a litter, being ſtill weak. The queen and Bothwell aſſiduouſly attended him; and the former ſlept ſeveral nights under his roof. But conſidering her former behaviour, and what afterwards enſued, the queen's kindneſs appeared to be rank artifice; and while the wretched Darnly fondly dreamed of future happineſs with his wife, it is the opinion of the moſt credible writers, that ſhe was plotting his deſtruction, in concert with the earl of Bothwell.

About eleven at night, on Sunday the 9th of January, the queen left his majeſty in order to be preſent at a maſque in the palace. At two next morning, the houſe in which the king lay, was blown up with gunpowder. The noiſe and ſhock, which this ſudden exploſion occaſioned, alarmed the whole city. The inhabitants ran to the place whence it came. The dead body of the king, with that of a ſervant, who ſlept in the ſame room, were found lying in an adjacent garden, without the city wall, without any bruiſe or mark of violence upon them. Thus fell Henry Stewart, lord Darnly, whoſe memory, nothing but the manner of his death could have preſerved, and rendered lamentable.

Bothwell was generally ſuſpected to be the author of this execrable deed. Lenox, Darnly's father, boldly charged him with it. He was accordingly tried; but by his own great influence, and the queen's dexterous management, who ſtill treated the ſuppoſed murderer with the greateſt familiarity, he was acquitted. This verdict in his favour, was far from being the ſenſe of the nation. The people in general murmured; for only eleven days were allowed to prepare for his trial, beſides other ſuſpicious proceedings; but as they only murmured, without raiſing any commotion, he diſregarded them, and haſtened to complete his laſt great project, which was nothing leſs than a marriage with the queen. To their own diſcredit, and the diſhonour of their country, moſt of the nobility atteſted his innocence in writing.

As there remained nothing now but the celebration of the nuptials (the queen's affections having been previouſly engaged) Mary, to her utter ruin and diſgrace, conſented to their taking place on the 15th of May 1567.

One ſtep was ſtill wanting to the completion of Bothwell's deſires. The young prince had been intruſted to the care of the earl of Mar, a nobleman every way deſerving of ſuch a particular confidence. The earl was tampered with to reſign his charge; but his integrity was proof againſt the moſt flattering promiſes. Inſtead of giving up the prince, he, with Argyle, Athol, Mar, Morton, Glencairn, Home, Lindſay, Boyd, and others, entered into a confederacy for the ſafety of his perſon, and the abolition of Bothwell's power. Their intention was no ſooner made known, than the inhabitants of Edinburgh, and parts adjacent, joined them in arms. The queen and Bothwell, after publiſhing manifeſtoes in vindication of their conduct (which were little regarded) retired to Dunbar. They were quickly followed by the confederates, whom Bothwell, in his deſperate ſituation, determined to withſtand with his diſheartened followers; and on the 15th of July, both armies, in number nearly equal, were ready to engage.

Bothwell's forces were poſted on a riſing ground, to the greateſt advantage; but they were ſeized, notwithſtanding every endeavour to animate them, with ſuch a panic, that the queen, who ſaw the enemy ſurrounding them, gave up every thing for loſt. And Bothwell himſelf taking his laſt leave of her, rode off the field in the utmoſt diſmay. The unhappy queen then ſurrendered herſelf to Kirkaldy of Grange, who headed an advanced body of confederates, and was a brave and generous man.

The confederate lords, to whom ſhe was conducted by Kirkaldy, treated her with great reſpect, but the ſoldiery inſulted her with the utmoſt inſolence and barbarity. She was afterwards led a public ſpectacle through the ſtreets of Edinburgh, covered with duſt and bathed in tears; and then impriſoned in the caſtle of Lochlevin. The reaſon aſſigned for this laſt piece of ſeverity, is, a caſket was diſcovered in Edinburgh caſtle, which contained a ſecret correſpondence with Bothwell, in the courſe of which, during Darnly's life-time, ſhe had written love-ſonnets to him; and as ſome of the letters (which ſome perſons believe to be forged) ſtrongly proved that ſhe was equally guilty with Bothwell of the late king's death, having contrived the very manner of it herſelf. This circumſtance occaſioned her to be ſtrictly confined.

Being at no pains to conceal her attachment to the wretch who had ſo daſtardly forſaken her, they tendered her alſo a paper to ſign, in which ſhe ſhould renounce all ſhare in the government, agree to the coronation of the young king, and to the appointment of the earl of Murray as regent, who was juſt then returned from France, where he had retired ſoon after the king's murder. In deep deſpair ſhe ſigned this deed, on the 24th of July; James was crowned at Stirling on the 29th; and Murray was prevailed with to accept the regency on the following day.

Moſt hiſtorians have conſidered Mary as queen of Scotland till her death, as ſhe had declared, that her compliance and reſignation were extorted. But every national concern was from this time (1597) tranſacted in the name of her ſon.

The diſappointed ambition of Bothwell ſoon led him to fit out a ſmall ſquadron of ſhips, and to act as a pirate againſt his own countrymen. A reward of a thouſand crowns being ſet on his head, Kirkaldy ſailed in queſt of him, and diſperſed his fleet; on which, in the greateſt diſtreſs, through want of proviſion, Bothwell attacked a rich ſhip which belonged to Norway; but the Norwegians coming with armed boats to her aſſiſtance, he and his crew were taken priſoners. The latter were all executed, but Bothwell's character being diſcovered, the wretch was favoured with impriſonment for life; and died in the tenth year of his captivity, unpitied by his countrymen, and unaſſiſted by ſtrangers.

After Mary had been impriſoned near ſix months, by flattering her keeper's brother, a youth of eighteen, with the hope of even a marriage, ſhe, through his aſſiſtance, had the good fortune to accompliſh her eſcape; and travelled poſt with her deliverer to Hamilton, where, in a few days, ſhe found herſelf at the head of an army of 6000 men.

Her flight affected the regent with the greateſt aſtoniſhment. He ſoon received intelligence of her ſituation, and concluding that ſhe would ſhortly march towards the capital, he reſolved to meet her half way. Having drawn together about 4000 men, he marched to Dunbarton, and poſted his troops advantageouſly on an eminence, called Langſide-Hill: here, on the the 13th of May 1568, Mary's party attacked him with the utmoſt impetuoſity, but with ſo little judgment, that the regent, having ſtood the ſhock of their furious onſet, threw them into diſorder and routed them. But as the ſoldiers were conjured to ſpare their countrymen, few were killed, though many priſoners were taken.

On this bad ſucceſs, Mary, dreading the thought of falling again into the power of her ſubjects, determined to throw herſelf on the protection of Elizabeth. For that end, ſhe fled with ſurpriſing celerity to Carliſle; where ſhe arrived, before the regent knew even the route ſhe had taken. Lowther, the deputy-governor of that place, received her with many marks of reſpect. She inſtantly wrote a long letter to Elizabeth, ſtrongly repreſenting the ingratitude of her own ſubjects, and imploring that aid which her preſent diſagreeable ſituation required, and which the Engliſh queen, it ſeems, had formerly promiſed.

It having been maturely conſidered in council, what courſe Elizabeth ſhould take with Mary in this emergency, ſhe reſolved to keep her in England, and at the ſame time ſo to manage matters with Mary, that it might ſeem her own deſire. Accordingly, lord Scroop and Sir Francis Knolles were diſpatched with letters, full of the moſt kind and condoling expreſſions: on receipt of theſe, Mary deſired to be eſcorted to London, in order to obtain a perſonal interview; but Scroop and Knolles, agreeably to their private inſtructions, informed her, that their miſtreſs could by no means admit of ſuch a viſit, till Mary had cleared herſelf from having had any concern in her huſband's murder. On this cruel rebuff, ſhe offered to ſubmit the proof of her innocence to the cognizance of Elizabeth; and was conducted to Bolton-caſtle in Yorkſhire, in the mean time.

As matters now ſtood, Elizabeth well knew a public inquiry before her into the conduct of Mary would manifeſt her own ſuperiority; ſuch a propoſal was the very thing which that jealous queen aimed at, and therefore ſhe determined forthwith to bring Mary to trial. In the mean while, by a maſter-ſtroke of policy, ſhe required the regent to defend his conduct before her at Weſtminſter. As ſhe knew that the regent could not dare to diſobey her ſummons, ſhe likewiſe expected that he would naturally, for his own ſake, accuſe Mary of being acceſſary to the death of her huſband; and in that caſe, ſhe could uſe ſuch meaſures as would lay her rival entirely at her mercy. The regent arrived at London in October, accompanied by the earl of Morton, the biſhop of Orkney, lord Lindſay, and Pitcairne, commendator of Dumfermling, as commiſſioners in his behalf. To theſe were added, as aſſiſtants, Balnaves of Hall-hill, Macgill of Rankeilor, two able civilians, Maitland, the late ſecretary, and Geonge Buchanan.

The unhappy queen was treated by Elizabeth with the greateſt ſhew of affection, and had empowered Leſley, biſhop of Roſs, lord Boyd, lord Herries, lord Levingſton, Sir John Gordon of Lochinvar, Sir James Cockburn of Stirling, and Gavin Hamilton, commendator of Kilwinning, to act in her behalf. Elizabeth appointed Thomas Howard, duke of Norfolk, Thomas Ratcliff, earl of Suſſex, the earls of Arrundel and Leiceſter, lord Clinton, Sir Ralph Sadler, and Sir William Cecil, on her part.

Elizabeth, in the mean time, amuſed the French and Spaniſh ambaſſadors with repeated promiſes of aſſiſting the Scots queen, as far as might be conſiſtent with her honour; this conſideration prevailed on Mary to ſuffer the ignominy of a public trial. It was at firſt intended to have been conducted at York; but an intrigue between the duke of Norfolk and Mary's commiſſioners having been diſcovered, it was on that account moved to Weſtminſter. The cauſe was opened in November. Mary's deputies having recapitulated the ſeveral articles—of her impriſonment,—of the extorted deed,—and of the uſe of her ſon's name to ſalve the uſurpation of her authority,—the regent and his party were by them denominated traitors. The regent, in vindication of his own conduct, alledged, that the infamy of her marriage with Bothwell, rendered it neceſſary to take arms in order to diſſolve it; and that his other proceedings reſulted wholly from the ſhameful attachment which ſhe ſtill profeſſed for that unworthy nobleman. Nothing concerning the king's murder was hinted at, this being thought ſufficient for his defence.

Elizabeth's aim, at all events, was to have Mary accuſed of her huſband's murder. Accordingly, at the next meeting of the commiſſioners, ſhe was accuſed of it. Mary's commiſſioners refuſed to reply to this bold charge, till they ſhould have obtained for their queen, the audience with Elizabeth, which ſhe had requeſted. But Elizabeth, who had now ſeen all the letters of Mary to Bothwell, not only refuſed the interview, but replied to her requeſt in ſuch terms as ſufficiently indicated that ſhe believed her guilty; and Mary herſelf, by not producing proof of her innocence, but propoſing to accommodate matters with her ſubjects without it, not a little ſtrengthened the opinion. Whatever were Elizabeth's real ſentiments on this head, ſhe propoſed to ſettle all diſputes between the queen and her people in the following manner: "That Mary ſhould make a formal reſignation of her crown, ratify the regent's authority, and conſent that both herſelf and her ſon ſhould reſide in England." To this propoſal, Mary, now ſeeing the extent of Elizabeth's friendſhip and generoſity, and conſidering that ſuch a ſtep would effectually blaſt her reputation and endanger her perſon, replied, "Inſtant death is leſs terrible than ſuch an ignominy; I will part with life before I will with my own hands give away my crown; no! whatever befalls me, my laſt words ſhall be thoſe of a queen of Scotland." On this declaration the regent was diſmiſſed, in February 1569 without either an approval or cenſure of his conduct. The commiſſioners for Mary followed ſoon after; and ſhe was removed to Shrewſbury, where the miſerable queen was ſoon afterwards cloſely confined in priſon.

On the regent's return to Scotland, he found a ſtrong faction of Papiſts united in Mary's favour. However aſſured of Elizabeth's protection, he took ſuch vigorous meaſures as ſoon broke the confederacy. The following year, Elizabeth, who it is ſaid had diſcovered that Mary had entered into a conſpiracy, with a view to ſet herſelf on the throne of England, and reſtore the Popiſh religion, determined, as ſhe foreſaw that to detain her any longer, would only be to occaſion continual cabals and inſurrections, to reſign her into the hands of the regent. But the execution of her deſign was prevented by the murder of this great man.

The regent had, it ſeems, deprived one Hamilton of Bothwellhaugh of a part of his eſtate, in favour of one of his friends, who, beſides taking poſſeſſion, had uſed his wife ſo ſeverely, as had deprived her of her ſenſes. For theſe injuries, though he owed his life on a former occaſion to the regent's clemency, Hamilton vowed revenge. Accordingly, on the 23d of January 1570, he poſted himſelf in an old houſe at Linlithgow, and as the regent paſſed by, he ſhot him in the belly, ſo that he died in the greateſt anguiſh the ſame night, univerſally regretted by his countrymen, who long and affectionately remembered him by the appellation of the Good Regent. The murderer eſcaped to France. Elizabeth ſunk the dignity of queen in the exceſs of her ſorrow for the loſs of Murray. She often ſtiled him her beſt friend, and lamented his death as ſuch. On the other hand, Mary imagined that, the regent being dead, her party in Scotland, which before was far from inconſiderable, would now increaſe; and ſhe flattered herſelf that it would ſoon arrive at ſufficient power, when joined with her friends on the continent, to demand her liberty: but truth ſoon convinced her that ſhe was born to ſuffer; and ere long to drink a cup of ſorrow, embittered with the moſt afflicting circumſtances.

Soon after the regent's death, Scotland became the ſeat of anarchy. King's men and queen's men, were titles of diſtinction; but the king's party at length prevailed; and at a convention held at Edinburgh, on the 12th of July, they proclaimed the earl of Lenox regent. As this nobleman was a man whom Elizabeth extremely approved, ſhe laboured to confirm his regency, by procuring a coalition of parties: but this was ineffectual; all that ſhe was able to accompliſh was, a ceſſation of hoſtilities till the 7th of April 1571; during which time a negociation was ſet on foot by Elizabeth for Mary's enlargement, which proved abortive through the folly of the Scots commiſſioners, who would conſent to nothing that tended to ſubvert or impair the king's authority.

No ſooner was the truce, procured by the Engliſh queen, expired, than party-rage flamed again as fiercely as ever. The queen's men laboured ſtrongly to get poſſeſſion of the king's perſon; but they were continually diſappointed in their deſign. At laſt, they made a bold attempt to ſurpriſe the king's party at Stirling: but though the alarm was great, the moſt conſiderable loſs on the king's ſide was in the death of Lenox the regent, who was killed after he had ſurrendered himſelf.

The office of regent was now filled by the earl of Mar, who, by his moderation, humanity, and diſintereſted behaviour, for ſome time ſilenced the voice of party; and it was expected that a treaty with Elizabeth, favourable for the captive queen, would ſoon take place; but Elizabeth had now diſcovered an affair, which proved extremely injurious to Mary's cauſe. The duke of Norfolk, the greateſt and the beſt beloved ſubject then in England, though a profeſſed Proteſtant, appeared to have joined with the pope and the king of Spain, in order to introduce popery, and dethrone Elizabeth. In due ſeaſon, he was to have been the leader of the revolt; and if the ſcheme ſucceeded, Mary (privy to every circumſtance) was to be proclaimed queen both of England and Scotland, and then, as a reward for this great ſervice, ſhe was to marry him. Elizabeth had twice before diſcovered him to have been a partizan for Mary; but his intentions being then of no very criminal nature, ſhe had forgiven him. But Norfolk's third offence, ſhe thought, was of a nature too daring and atrocious to merit a pardon. He was accordingly tried by his peers; and the charge of treaſon appearing fully againſt him, he was executed for the offence.

The following year, 1572, when Mary underſtood that Elizabeth had entered into a league, offenſive and defenſive, with Charles IX. of France, and that the very mention of her name was therein omitted; ſhe began to frame her mind to the rigour of her fate, and to think, as her expreſſion was, of no kingdom but that of Heaven. However this may be, it is very certain, Mary was highly diſguſted with the alliance between France and England; and whilſt Elizabeth expected the greateſt ſecurity from it, the horrid maſſacre of Proteſtants perpetrated a few months afterwards, and in which, at Paris alone, where it commenced, 10,000 were butchered, rendered the alliance, in her eyes, equally dangerous and diſgraceful. All the Proteſtant powers were greatly alarmed by this fatal event; and many of Mary's party in Scotland, on this occaſion, through fear for their religion, forſook the queen and adhered to the regent; who ſteered through the ſtraits of faction with the greateſt judgment. Had Providence been pleaſed to ſpare the life of this excellent nobleman, he might have deſtroyed the diſtinction of parties, and procured advantageous terms for the queen. But before the cloſe of this year, he fell a prey to a lingering diſeaſe; and his death, which happened October 29, was followed, November 27, by that of the juſtly celebrated reformer John Knox, whoſe memory every true Scots Proteſtant muſt neceſſarily revere.

Morton ſucceeded the earl of Mar in the regency, on whoſe acceſſion, the queen's party, foreſeeing little ſucceſs from an oppoſition, gave up moſt of the fortified places in their poſſeſſion, and retired peacefully to their eſtates; which had been almoſt exhauſted, to little purpoſe, in the queen's ſervice. The civil wars, which had ſubſiſted five years in Scotland, were therefore now brought to a period; and Mary had not the ſhadow of ſovereignty in any part of the kingdom.

The domeſtic tranquillity of the kingdom was in ſome danger of being diſturbed by another cauſe, in 1575. Epiſcopacy was not wholly ſet aſide: one Andrew Melvil, a man of great learning and ſenſe, having juſt returned from Geneva to his native country, ſtarted a queſtion, in a public aſſembly, concerning the authority of chapters, and the election and order of biſhops, and declaimed boldly againſt all church authority not warranted by ſcripture. This raiſed a ferment in the nation. And though the regent had, for political ends, eſpouſed epiſcopacy, Melvil acted, and was ſupported, with ſo much reſolution and firmneſs, that he was obliged to give into Melvil's ſcheme of preſbytery, and renounce his own.

Morton's regency, from this time, grew exceedingly unpopular; and as he delighted in the inſolence of office, he created himſelf every day new enemies. The earl of Lenox ſoon appeared as his open foe; and during their ſquabbles for two years, James, the young king, was bandied about from one party to another, according to the ſucceſs of either. But in 1580, James, being then in the 15th year of his age, eſcaped from his toils, aſſerted his authority, and terminated the quarrel. He received Lenox into favour: but deteſted Morton, who was devoted to deſtruction. While ſome plauſible pretext was to this end diligently ſought after, one captain Stewart accuſed him of being (as his words were) act and part in the murder of lord Darnly. Morton was tried for this offence, found guilty of being a confidant, though not an aſſiſtant in the murder, and beheaded for that crime in June 1581; notwithſtanding the queen of England made powerful interceſſion in his behalf. After ſentence was executed, the body of this nobleman, who was allowed to poſſeſs many virtues, and great abilities, was thrown by common porters into the burial place of criminals; and none of his friends durſt attend it, or even diſcover their affection by the leaſt ſymptoms of ſorrow. Before this nobleman's execution, Stewart, his accuſer, had been created earl of Arran; and now the friendſhip and favour of James was equally ſhared between him and Lenox. They ſoon engaged him in ſuch unpopular meaſures, as drew againſt him a conſpiracy of his principal nobility; although their aim was, to bring the young king to a ſenſe of his error, in giving countenance to two ſuch unworthy favourites.

In 1582, the king was ſeized at Ruthven by the tutor of Glamis. James, finding his liberty not to be procured either by complaints, expoſtulations, or threats, burſt into tears. "No matter, cry on," ſays Glamis fiercely, "better for children to weep, "than bearded men." In other matters, he was treated with great reſpect, though guarded at the ſame time with the greateſt vigilance. Scots hiſtorians call this enterprize, "The Raid of Ruthven." They committed Arran, the moſt obnoxious to them, inſtantly to priſon; but before they ventured any further, in Auguſt 1582, they forced James, by threats, to ſignify an approbation of his preſent ſituation; to forbid, by proclamation, all attempts againſt the perſons concerned in the Raid of Ruthven; and to command Lenox to leave the kingdom before the end of the enſuing month.

The fame of this exploit ſoon reached the ears of Mary, though in the ſolitude of a priſon. Anxious for the ſafety of her ſon, ſhe forgot her own diſtreſs; and ſummoning to her aid all the mother, all the queen, ſhe wrote a letter to Elizabeth, beſeeching her to procure the deliverance of her ſon. But before Elizabeth had any way interpoſed in the behalf of James, he eſcaped out of the hands of the conſpirators; and attaching himſelf ſoon after to Arran, with as much fondneſs as ever, that artful favourite perſuaded him to make the confederates acknowledge they had been guilty of a fault, in detaining him ſo long a priſoner. James, in July 1583, urged them to acknowledge this, promiſing, at the ſame time, that on ſuch a confeſſion, they ſhould receive a pardon: but the nobles were too haughty, and too fearful of Arran's power, to make ſuch a declaration. They fled into England, and were received into the protection of Elizabeth, who interceded ſo warmly in their favour, that they ſoon afterwards returned to Scotland, and obtained a full pardon.

Elizabeth having been alarmed by ſeveral conſpiracies, formed againſt her life and government, and the unhappy Mary being ſuſpected to be privy to them, the Engliſh entered into an aſſociation to defend their queen againſt all enemies, foreign and domeſtic; and a commiſſion of twenty-four perſons was appointed to examine ſuch offences, exclude the offenders from all right to the crown, and puniſh them with death. All this was evidently aimed againſt Mary, who had lately been removed to Tuthbury. In her confinement at this place, ſhe endured the moſt cutting affliction: here ſhe received a letter from her ſon, in which he refuſed to acknowledge her to be queen of Scotland; informed her, that his affairs and her's were entirely ſeparate; and that in the latter he ſhould take no concern. This cruel and ungenerous letter threw her into unſpeakable agonies. When ſhe had a little recovered herſelf, ſhe exclaimed, "Let not my allies "treat him any longer as a king; he holds that "dignity by my conſent; and if a ſpeedy repentance "does not appeaſe my juſt reſentment, I will "load him with a parent's curſe, and ſurrender my "crown, with all my pretenſions, to one who will "receive them with gratitude, and defend them "with vigour."

The preſent diſpoſition of James afforded Elizabeth an opportunity to form a league offenſive and defenſive with him, which was accordingly concluded on the 5th of July 1586. As the foundation of the treaty, both parties bound themſelves to defend the Proteſtant religion.

It was extremely probable, that from theſe preparations, Elizabeth's council had reſolved to put to death the Scots queen, on the very firſt occaſion that offered. The late ſtatute was peculiarly ſevere againſt her. The words by or for, which had been ſo carefully inſerted therein, was a trap, which it was impoſſible that Mary could ever avoid; it made her life a forfeiture for any deſign, which, without her knowledge, might be formed by ſome zealous or mad-headed partizan: and it was not long ere ſuch a circumſtance, through the inconſiderate affection of the Engliſh Papiſts, actually tranſpired. This is known by the name of "Babington's conſpiracy," in Engliſh hiſtory.

William and Gilbert Gifford, who were Engliſh Papiſts, had inſtilled into one Savage, their countryman, that it would be a meritorious act to kill Elizabeth, an excommunicated heretic, as a means of reſtoring the Catholic religion in England, and by the aſſiſtance of the French forces, ſet Mary on the throne of England. This affair being communicated to Anthony Babington, a gentleman of fortune in Derbyſhire, he engaged in a conſpiracy with Tetchbourne, Barnwell, Savage, Tilney, Charnock, and Abington, to aſſaſſinate the queen; while Ballard, an Engliſh prieſt, concerted meaſures with Mendoza and lord Paget, to invade England. But Walſingham, Elizabeth's ſecretary, having learnt the ſecrets of the plot from Polly, and Gilbert Gifford, two of the conſpirators, and Maud, who was his ſpy, Ballard, the principal and moſt active agent, and the reſt of the conſpirators, were arreſted, brought to trial, and all, except Windſor, executed as traitors, being fourteen in all, amongſt whom were Naue and Curle, Mary's two ſecretaries, who, with Babington, confeſſed on their trial, that they had written to, and received ſeveral letters from Mary, on the ſubject of the plot.

Mary being now conſidered as the prime cauſe of the dangers to which Elizabeth was expoſed, a commiſſion of forty peers and five judges, was iſſued to try her; of which, notice was given her by a letter from Elizabeth to her, at Fotheringay-caſtle, October 11, 1586. The trial came on the 25th of the ſame month, when ſentence was pronounced upon her, chiefly from the evidence of her ſecretaries, reſpecting the plot, but it ran in general for having broken the ſtatute of the 26th of Elizabeth, and as being acceſſary to Babington's conſpiracy. This ſentence was four days afterwards confirmed by the parliament, but did not derogate from the title of James to the crown of England.

Mary, before the trial, proteſted her innocence in the moſt ſolemn manner; alledging, that not being a ſubject, ſhe had no right to be tried by the laws of England; objected to Babington's confeſſion, and that of her two ſecretaries, as having probably been extorted from them by the rack; and affirmed, that the commiſſioners could prove nothing of the charge againſt her from her papers. She received the news, that the judges had condemned her to die, with great reſolution, and ſeemed to triumph that religion was the cauſe of her death. She then wrote a long letter to queen Elizabeth, deſiring certain favours concerning her death, burial, and ſervants.

Elizabeth is thought to have acted with great diſſimulation in the laſt ſcene of this tragedy; for, though it is probable ſhe was deſirous of Mary's death, yet ſhe did not conſent to the execution of the ſentence, till ſeveral of her nobility had conjured her on their knees, to conſider that Mary's life was incompatible with her ſafety, and the civil and religious liberties of her kingdom.

On the 7th of February, the unhappy queen was warned of her approaching fate. Several feeble attempts to ſave her had been made by France, Spain, and her ſon James; but Mary, who placed no confidence in ſuch interceſſions, and knowing the envious diſpoſition of her rival Elizabeth, had prepared herſelf for death, from the firſt moment that the parliament had approved the ſentence. When ſhe was therefore informed, that ſhe muſt die the next morning, it is ſaid ſhe heard the cruel mandate without emotion. She proteſted her ignorance of Babington's conſpiracy, while ſhe placed her hand upon a bible which caſually lay by her.

After the two earls had withdrawn, her domeſtics flocked around her, and teſtified their affection and ſorrow by a flood of tears. In the utmoſt ſerenity ſhe endeavoured to compoſe and comfort them. She then fell on her knees, and implored heaven, now that her ſufferings were approaching towards a period, that ſhe might receive aid to endure what remained with decency and with fortitude. About eight o'clock in the morning, the meſſengers of death came, and conducted her to the ſcaffold. After much entreaty ſhe had prevailed on the two earls to allow Sir Andrew Melvil, the maſter of her houſhold, together with her phyſician, her ſurgeon, two men and two maid ſervants, to attend her and perform their laſt offices. She mounted the ſteps of the ſcaffold with cheerfulneſs, ſurveyed the block and the ax unmoved; and having croſſed herſelf, ſhe with great compoſure ſat down in a chair. She liſtened to the warrant for her execution, which was then read, with ſuch an air, as ſignified that her thoughts were differently engaged: having been denied a prieſt ſhe refuſed to join in devotion with the dean of Peterborough; but falling on her knees, ſhe repeated a prayer in Latin; after which, raiſing her voice, ſhe prayed in Engliſh for the proſperity of the Catholic church, and her ſon, and for Elizabeth; then lifting up, and kiſſing the crucifix, ſhe thus addreſſed it, "As thy arms, O Chriſt, were " extended upon the croſs, ſo, with the outſtretched " arms of thy mercy, receive me, and pardon my " tranſgreſſions." Having finiſhed her devotions, ſhe ordered her women to prepare her for the block. Her gown and doublet being taken off, ſhe embraced all her ſervants, and ſmilingly bid them farewell. A linen handkerchief was tied round her eyes; and then Mary, with calm and undaunted fortitude, laid her head on the block, and began to rehearſe the 31ſt pſalm; and having repeated the 5th verſe, "Into thine hands I commit my ſpirit; " thou haſt redeemed me, O Lord God of truth," (which was the ſignal given) one executioner held her hands, whilſt the other at the ſecond ſtroke cut off her head; and holding it up, ſtill ſpouting her blood, the dean cried out, "So periſh all queen " Elizabeth's enemies!" The earl of Kent alone anſwered Amen, as every ſpectator, except him and the dean, were drowned in tears. Thus fell, in the 46th year of her age, and the 18th of her captivity, Mary Stuart, queen of Scotland and of France, purſuant to a ſentence, the juſtice of which muſt ever be problematical.

Party writers have given her the moſt oppoſite characters. Some aſcribe to her the poſſeſſion of all virtues; whilſt others impute to her all the vices incident to human nature. She was both imprudent and unfortunate; particularly in her marriage with Darnly. Her attachment to Rizio was beneath the dignity of a queen. However brutally ſhe might have been treated by Darnly, honour, prudence, and juſtice, called upon her not to countenance his murderers. Few have attempted to palliate the atrocious crime of marrying Bothwell, the very man whom the nation in general ſuſpected of having committed the barbarous deed, and who, on his death-bed, proteſted that their ſuſpicions were not unjuſt. For this ſhe deſervedly loſt the love of her ſubjects; who deprived her of her crown in a manner which amply ſhewed that this fatal ſtep, which includes her ſtrong attachment to Popery, was the occaſion of it. The legality of the ſentence by which ſhe was executed, has been already called in queſtion; but as it ſeems impoſſible to exculpate Mary from a privity and concurrence to ſome of the many plots againſt Elizabeth, perhaps the policy of government neceſſarily dictated ſuch a cruel meaſure. If the caſe be changed, by ſuppoſing Mary's ſchemes to have taken place, there is little reaſon to imagine that Elizabeth would not herſelf have fallen a ſacrifice; therefore, though one would be far from approving ſuch rigorous precaution, the reader, if he finds himſelf diſpoſed greatly to blame the Engliſh queen for her ſeverity, may conſider, that ſelf-defence is the firſt law of nature in every ſituation.

Mary was tall in her perſon, her ſhape elegant, and the air of her countenance unſpeakably beautiful. Skilled in every female art and accompliſhment which makes beauty irreſiſtible, and being at the ſame time polite, inſinuating, ſprightly, and affable, ſhe was not ſo much an auguſt queen as an agreeable woman. Her body was interred, with royal pomp, in the cathedral church of Peterborough; but when her ſon James aſcended the Engliſh throne it was depoſited amongſt the monarchs of England in Weſtminſter-abbey.

Her only iſſue by Darnly was king James; and by Bothwell ſhe had a daughter, who was a nun at Notre Dame de Soiſſons.

THE ſeverity of the Engliſh towards his mother excited little reſentment in the breaſt of James, who knew his intereſt too well to quarrel with them on that account; he was perſuaded to join with the pope, France, and Spain, to revenge the affront. He bluſtered a little at firſt, it is true; but as Elizabeth pretended that Davidſon, her ſecretary, whom ſhe had driven from her preſence and fined in 10,000l. had executed the warrant without her privity, nay, contrary to her expreſs order and intention, he admitted this excuſe, and appeared perfectly ſatisfied. And that he really was ſo, is evident, from his entering, in 1588, into a ſolemn covenant with Elizabeth, for the defence of the Proteſtant religion againſt every enemy.

James had, previous to this covenant, performed an exploit truly magnificent and royal. He had long obſerved the mortal, and almoſt hereditary feuds which ſubſiſted among many of the greateſt families in his kingdom; and from his natural love of peace, from his high regard to prerogative, and from anxiety for the welfare of his kingdom, which their violent differences tended not a little to weaken, he exerted a noble effort to reconcile them. The parties at variance met each other by his order at the palace of Holyrood-houſe; where, at a ſplendid entertainment he had provided for them, he prevailed upon theſe haughty and adverſe chiefs to ceaſe their diſcord, and mutually promiſe to obſerve the moſt perfect harmony.

Having thus united the ſtrength of the kingdom, James kept his ſubjects under arms, to hinder the Spaniards from landing in an hoſtile manner in his dominions; though after their armada, which they arrogantly called invincible, had been defeated by the Engliſh fleet. James, with great humanity, received upwards of 700, who had ſuffered ſhipwreck on that dangerous and unknown coaſt, in returning home round Scotland.

The moſt terrifying apprehenſions of the Engliſh being removed by the deſtruction of the armada, Elizabeth in the warmeſt manner, thanked James for his ſteady attachment to her, during that important criſis. And James having now alſo nothing to fear from Philip (to whoſe flattering promiſes he had replied, that he expected no other favour from him than, as Polyphemus promiſed Ulyſſes, to be made his laſt morſel) he made overtures of marriage to the eldeſt daughter of Frederic the Second, king of Denmark: but that princeſs was afterwards given to the duke of Brunſwick. James, however, who was bent on an alliance with that family, paid his addreſſes to the ſecond daughter, Anne; and the marriage, notwithſtanding the efforts of Elizabeth to prevent it, was accordingly agreed upon and performed by proxy.

James having for ſome time impatiently waited for the arrival of his bride, fitted out ſome ſhips in queſt of her; and, arriving at Upſal on the 23d of November, ſpent ſeveral months with his queen at the court of Denmark; and on the 1ſt of May 1590, arrived ſafely at Leigh. The people, who during the king's abſence had preſerved the moſt orderly behaviour, hailed their ſovereign with joyous affection. The ſolemnity of the queen's coronation was conducted on the 17th of the ſame month, with great pomp, no biſhop being preſent; the moſt material parts of the ceremony being performed by Robert Bruce, a Preſbyterian miniſter of great reputation.

For two months, all was mirth and feſtivity at court. But when the Daniſh nobles and gentry, who accompanied the queen in her voyage, had taken their leave, inſtead of the delightful calm which James had fondly but fooliſhly imagined would enſue, there ſpeedily aroſe a hurricane of the worſt evils that could befal an ariſtocratical conſtitution. Through the king's unceaſing paſſion for pomp, pleaſures, and ſports;—through the inſtant enforcement of his own haſty reſolves, and the indolence in executing the maturer ones of his council;—through the diſregard of real crimes, and his unremitting cruelty in puniſhing the imaginary ones of witchcraft and magic, in which he firmly believed, on account of which ſome perſon or other continually ſuffered;—and through his general credulity, the conceit of his own abilities, and his want of ſterling courage:—the clergy became diſcontented, the nobility were divided, the barons grew poor, and the commons were oppreſſed. Heavy taxes were levied, and badly applied; and as this was a circumſtance particularly exaſperating, laws were broken, proclamations diſobeyed, diſaffection, rapine, and murder, became the conſequence of theſe impolitic meaſures.

In 1591, amongſt the many perſons executed by James for ſuppoſed necromancy, ſome had accuſed Francis Stewart, created by James, earl of Bothwell, of making frequent inquiries concerning the king's fate; while others, having loſt their reaſon by the tortures to which they were put, declared, that, at the inſtigation of that nobleman, they had raiſed the ſtorms which had alarmed his majeſty, and endangered the life of his queen. Bothwell, on this evidence, was lodged in priſon: from thence, by intoxicating his keepers, he ſoon made his eſcape; and being of a ſpirit too turbulent and haughty to brook ſuch an indignity, the ſuffering of which he attributed to the artifices of his enemy, Maitland, the chancellor, he formed a deſign of becoming maſter both of him and his majeſty. In this deſign, which he attempted to put in execution Dec. 27, he had certainly ſucceeded, if the citizens of Edinburgh, alarmed at the uproar in the palace, to which, through a private paſſage, he had gained acceſs by the treachery of ſome of the king's attendants, had not run ſpeedily to their arms; their timely interpoſition delivered both James and his chancellor from imminent danger; and the followers of Bothwell being routed, he himſelf with ſome difficulty made his eſcape by favour of the night.

This raſh enterpriſe failing, the bold earl fled precipitately towards the north; and James ordered the earl of Huntley to purſue him and his followers, with all the wrath of vengeance. In ſuch commiſſions as theſe, a general officer had the opportunity of gratifying his private revenge; and Huntley, being at perſonal enmity with the earl of Murray, under pretence of executing a part of his commiſſion, conſumed the houſe, and took away the life of that accompliſhed nobleman, heir to regent Murray, whoſe memory was ſtill affectionately revered by the people; who hereupon roſe tumultuouſly, ſhook off all reſpect for men in power, and openly inſulted his majeſty, on a report (ſome ſay not without foundation) being induſtriouſly circulated, that this murder was perpetrated with the connivance and even by order of the king, who, it was publicly talked, was jealous of him, becauſe the queen a few days before had ſaid many things in his favour. Though the magiſtrates prevented their doing any miſchief, they threatened James ſo much, that he thought fit to leave Edinburgh, and retire for ſome time to Glaſgow. But this popular clamour ſoon ſubſided: Huntley ſurrendered himſelf to juſtice; but whether James was really an acceſſary, or whether from the power of the chancellor, with whom Huntley was cloſely connected, he was not ſo much as tried; and (ſo fickle are the commonality!) Murray's death, notwithſtanding the dangerous appearance but a few days before, paſſed off unrevenged and diſregarded.

In 1592, the king loſt much of his popularity. His toleration of Papiſts inſpired the clergy with a belief that he inclined to Popery. They ſaw that he too much ſavoured the Popiſh faction; therefore thought that this was the time to inſiſt on the repeal of thoſe ſevere laws, which, in 1584, a venal miniſtry had enacted, and which were then evidently framed to overturn the conſtitution, as well as the diſcipline of their reformed church. To procure theſe acts of parliament, the inventors had recourſe to the moſt illegal, clandeſtine, and iniquitous methods. By theſe means, it was then enacted, "that refuſing to acknowledge the juriſdiction of the privy council;—pretending an exemption from the authority of the civil courts;—attempting to diminiſh the rights and privileges of any of the three eſtates in parliament, were actions which amounted to high-treaſon. The holding aſſemblies, whether civil or eccleſiaſtical, without the king's permiſſion or appointment; and uttering, either privately or publicly, in ſermons or in declamations, any falſe and ſcandalous reports againſt the king, his anceſtors or miniſters, were pronounced, in like manner to be capital crimes."

Since the Reformation, the pulpit and church judicatories had been eſteemed ſacred; and the clergy had, in the former, uſed unbounded liberty, and, in the latter, abſolute and independent juriſdiction; they therefore conſidered theſe ſtatutes as moſt galling fetters on their privileges, and determined to ſeize the firſt opportunity to ſtrike them off; and James, by reaſon of his unpopularity, and through fear of Bothwell, was under a neceſſity of giving way to his clergy, who puſhed their demands with vigour: ſo that in a very little time all the hated acts reſpecting their order in 1584, were either totally aboliſhed and reſcinded, or explained in ſuch a manner as gave general ſatiſfaction. The ſame parliament, at the expreſs inſtance of the clergy, though much againſt the inclination of the king (whoſe high notions of prerogative, made him exceedingly averſe to any ſyſtem which was calculated to maintain the liberty of the ſubject) eſtabliſhed in the moſt ample manner, general aſſemblies, provincial ſynods, preſbyteries, kirk ſeſſions, in ſhort, every branch of preſbyterian church government. Bothwell, who had endeavoured to ſeize the king at Falkland, was alſo attainted, together with all his adherents, in this parliament.

A general alarm was at this time ſpread throughout the kingdom by the following event: Philip of Spain, piqued, but not diſheartened at the deſtruction of his arrogantly ſtiled Invincible Armada, had conceived a deſign (being convinced of Elizabeth's ſuperiority at ſea) of invading England, through Scotland; at the ſame time to divide the force of the Engliſh queen, and to diſtract her councils, he intended to fit out a ſquadron which was to make a deſcent on Cornwall. For this end, his emiſſaries were making a powerful party amongſt the Papiſts in Scotland. As George Ker, brother to the lord Newbottle, had been eaſily gained, and was exceedingly buſy in Philip's intereſt, the zeal with which he acted laid him open to ſuſpicion, and he was ſeized juſt on the point of his embarking for Spain. His papers being ſearched, there appeared amongſt them ſeveral blanks ſigned by the earls of Angus, Huntley, and Arrol. Ker being put to the torture, confeſſed that theſe blanks were for the ſervice of Philip, and that he, together with Crichton and Tyrie, two jeſuits, had orders from theſe noblemen to fill them up with offers of their moſt faithful ſervices to that monarch; directing him to land his forces either in Galloway or at the mouth of the Clyde; promiſing that they ſhould there be joined by them and the other Catholics in the kingdom; and that then, having firſt re-eſtabliſhed Popery in Scotland, they would proceed to ſubdue England. His confeſſion was afterwards confirmed by Barclay of Ladyland, and Sir David Graham of Fintry, whom he had accuſed as being privy to the whole ſcheme.

The miniſters of Edinburgh were uncommonly alarmed, and particularly active on this diſcovery. Their great apprehenſions, and their zeal for Proteſtantiſm, hurried them into actions, which, if not inſolent, (as ſome have called them) were, however, unbecoming. They ventured to preſcribe, and almoſt inſiſted, that no conſideration ſhould induce the king to pardon the authors of ſo deteſtable a treaſon. James, though highly offended at this activity in his clergy, was obliged to temporize, and adopt their plan. He marched in perſon againſt the three earls, who, neglecting the ſummons to ſurrender themſelves, had taken refuge in the Highlands. Having placed garriſons in all their caſtles, and obliged their vaſſals, as well as all the barons in the counties through which he paſſed, to ſubſcribe a bond of loyalty to himſelf, and of firm adherence to the reformed religion, he left behind him the earls of Athol and Marſhall, as his lieutenants, and returned home. He then tried Graham, who being by his peers found guilty of miſpriſion of treaſon, was beheaded. But Ker eſcaped from his confinement; and as the ferment in the nation was now pretty well ſubſided, James, according to his uſual indulgence to Papiſts, made uſe of no methods towards bringing him or his employers to juſtice.

He proceeded, in the mean time, againſt Bothwell (who was a Proteſtant, and who had lately appeared within a mile of Edinburgh at the head of 400 horſe, but was repulſed by the citizens) with all that rancour, which hatred mingled with fear can inſpire into an ungenerous breaſt. He had retired to the north of England, from whence, at the inſtance of James, he was ferreted out by Elizabeth, who was nevertheleſs highly diſpleaſed with every ſtep of the king's late conduct. She indeed conſidered the neglect of James in puniſhing the Popiſh lords as a tacit acknowledgment that he approved their deſigns; and ſhe had joined the wiſhes of the people in adviſing him to hang them up as examples of terror for the future. All the rigour, however, which James could be perſuaded to exerciſe towards them, was, to drop all proſecutions and inquiry reſpecting their correſpondence with Philip, and to allow them the alternative of either renouncing the errors of Popery, or of quiting the kingdom: but the rebels, with the greateſt audacity, refuſed to perform either, continued openly their treaſonable correſpondence, and bade him defiance. But James at length drove them out of the kingdom, to wipe off Elizabeth's ſuſpicion.

James, after his arrival at years of maturity, aimed at an exceſs of refinement, in which, he uſed to ſay, the great ſecret of king-craft conſiſted. Knowing himſelf to be the undoubted heir to the throne of England, and that the Proteſtants there would moſt readily receive him as ſuch; yet as he knew that Spain, and other Popiſh powers, might, on the deceaſe of Elizabeth, make ſome plauſible pretences to that crown, he choſe not to irritate the whole body of Papiſts, by puniſhing ſeverely a few individuals, how much ſoever they might deſerve it, leſt, in caſe of any oppoſition to his acceſſion to the Engliſh throne, they ſhould unite againſt him; but, on the contrary, that by treating them with lenity beforehand, they would, on ſuch an oppoſition, unanimouſly ſupport him. This explanation will ſerve to unriddle the ſeeming abſurdity and impolicy of the king's former, as well as ſubſequent conduct, both towards Proteſtants and Papiſts.

Bothwell, towards the cloſe of 1595, harraſſed in every quarter, and in his diſtreſs deſerted by his followers, fled for ſafety firſt to France, and then to Spain and Italy; where embracing Popery, the future incidents of his life in thoſe kingdoms (for James would never ſuffer him to return) were diſtinguiſhed only by the meaneſt debauchery. Near this period, alſo, the king loſt his chancellor; and as he really loved him and was fond on every occaſion to exerciſe the powers of his pen, he honoured him with an elegy, which is far from a contemptible performance for the age in which it was compoſed.

James now began to reflect, that as Elizabeth was far advanced in years, ſhould her death happen whilſt he was at variance with Angus and the other two Popiſh lords, who were ſurrounded during their reſidence abroad by Philip's emiſſaries, they might join the Spaniſh king, and, at the ſame time, make a diviſion amongſt his own ſubjects, in order to prevent his ſucceſſion; he therefore permitted their wives to occupy their houſes, and enjoy the revenues of their eſtates. As this indulgence inſpired them with ſentiments of the king's returning favour, they accompliſhed his wiſhes by preſenting a petition to him, in which they implored his licence to return to the kingdom and reſide on their eſtates; offering to abjure Popery, and give ample ſecurity for their future good behaviour. James, who wiſhed to comply with this petition, haſtily aſſembled a convention of the eſtates; and the petition was granted, as moſt of the aſſemblies were devoted to his will.

But James, who had, previous to this, in vain endeavoured to borrow money of Elizabeth, found himſelf under the neceſſity to diveſt himſelf of his natural ſloth, and to apply for ſome time to buſineſs. He was really ſo poor, that, to raiſe a ſupply for his late expeditions againſt Bothwell, and the Popiſh lords, he had been forced to pawn his jewels. His exchequer was now at the loweſt ebb; and as his exceſſive love of expenſive pleaſures, and his many needy dependents, made him unfit to be truſted with even his own money, he ſeems to have been ſenſible of it, and to have ſeen the neceſſity of committing the care of his finances to ſome perſons of known abilities, worth, and frugality. Eight gentlemen were appointed to this important truſt, from their number, denominated Octavians. They were inveſted with ſuch great power, as amounted to the whole executive part of government. Every lucrative and honourable office fell into their hands, and the courtiers complained that the king himſelf had now nothing to diſpoſe of. However, money ſoon flowed apace into the exchequer, as the utmoſt harmony was obſerved, the king's taxes and revenues were regularly received, and frugally, as well as regularly, applied.

If the courtiers diſliked the Octavians, the clergy, who were in general poor, beheld them with averſion: beſides, some of theſe Octavians were avowed Papiſts. This circumſtance created a great diſlike in the clergy againſt the king: but when they heard that he had recalled the Popiſh lords, they loſt all temper; and while they loudly inveighed againſt the treaſon of others, their violent indignation and zeal precipitated themſelves into ſuch actions, as, without much injuſtice, might eaſily be conſtrued into open rebellion. To all their preſbyteries were ſent letters, adviſing the return of Angus, Huntley, and Errol, and ordering that they ſhould be publicly excommunicated, together with all others who were ſuſpected of favouring Popery. They exhorted them to excite the people to defend the Proteſtant faith, and their juſt rights; and they alſo choſe one of the moſt eminent clergymen, out of every corner of the kingdom, to reſide conſtantly at Edinburgh, and meet every day the miniſters of that city, in an aſſembly which they called "the ſtanding council of the church."

But what exceeded all bounds was, the intemperate fervor of Black, miniſter at St. Andrew's. In his ſermons he reviled James, curſed his miniſters, affirmed that all kings were the offſpring of the Devil, who now appeared to rule the court, and that the queen of England was an atheiſt. The king reſenting theſe reiterated inſults, ſummoned Black to appear before his council to anſwer for his audacious ſpeeches, and for the ſeditious doctrine which he had promulgated; and commanded the miniſters to retire to their reſpective churches: but he was obeyed in neither; Black, and his brethren declaring, that the king's authority was of leſs weight than the power and intereſt of the church. James, by this bold reply, kindled into rage; and obſerving that he was little better than a cypher in his own kingdom if this were the caſe, he determined to try the event. The courtiers, who deſired nothing better than to ſee the king and his clergy at variance, employed not a few artifices to aggravate the diſpute; in conſequence of which a tumult aroſe in Edinburgh, on the 17th of December 1596, which expoſed the king to no little danger: for whilſt he was ſitting in the Tolbooth at the court of ſeſſion, where he had given an haughty anſwer to a petition which the clergy had very abruptly preſented, the rabble without, on the return of the deputies, with his majeſty's reply, preſſed tumultuouſly into the room in which he ſat, and inſiſted that the petition (enforcing the perpetual baniſhment of the Popiſh lords) ſhould be granted. James, alarmed at their bold intruſion and furious manner of ſalutation, retired in haſte, without ſpeaking a word, and ſhut the gates behind him. On this, all was riot and confuſion. One recited the ſtory of the wicked Haman, the reſt made the application, and ſallying forth, ſhouted, "The ſword of the Lord and of Gideon!" They then called aloud for the king, and ſome of his counſellors by name, that they might be ſacrificed to their fury. But the city magiſtrates found means to quell them, and the rioters were at length diſperſed.

However, the king next morning withdrew to Linlithgow; happy in having eſcaped the rage of an inſurrection, which in the end was as fatal to the clergy as it was favourable to the eſtabliſhment of regal authority. A convention of the eſtates being called, the barons deemed the late violent tranſactions to be high treaſon. And matters ran ſo high againſt the citizens of Edinburgh, who with ſuch boiſterous imprudence had ſupported the clergy, that the court party threatened to lay the city in aſhes, and to erect a pillar where it ſtood, in token of their guilt, and of the king's vengeance. But James was mild; he waved the rigour of the law; and though he ſtripped the citizens of many of their moſt valuable privileges, he allowed them to purchaſe their pardon, by the payment of a conſiderable ſum of money.

The miniſters of Edinburgh, in 1597, foreſeeing no other hope of ſafety, had fled to Newcaſtle. James was determined to humble them; but finding he could not accompliſh his end by force, he reſolved to try the effect of flattery and promiſes. This reſolution was indeed political, and perhaps the only one by which he could poſſibly have completed his purpoſe. James, therefore, by proper agents, plied his arts ſo ſucceſsfully, that, at two different general aſſemblies, a majority condemned their own raſhneſs, and that of their brethren, and declared in favour of thoſe meaſures which were moſt agreeable to the king. The miniſters returned to their reſpective charges; and James, for the remainder of his reign, found means to eſtabliſh almoſt an abſolute dominion both over them and all eccleſiaſtical affairs.

This great point being gained, the king ſoon made large ſtrides towards the introduction of epiſcopacy. Under pretence of rewarding the clergy for their late dutiful compliance with his will, he propoſed that ſuch paſtors as he ſhould appoint might be empowered to ſit in parliament as repreſentatives for their whole order, with the ſame freedom and dignity which abbots and biſhops had been allowed formerly. But ſuch was the general averſion to the leaſt idea of prelacy, that eaſe, honour, and profit, had no charms, and the miniſters ſtrove as eagerly to ſhun preferment, as the ſons of the church now-a-days endeavour to obtain it. Every diſcerning man ſaw through the veil of the king's pretended generoſity. Notwithſtanding this, James and his miniſters acted their parts ſo artfully, that the weakeſt of the order, which generally, in every body of people, form a majority, being gained over, clerical ſeats in parliament were, at a general aſſembly on the 7th of March 1598, pronounced both lawful and expedient, and James ſoon procured the ſanction and authority of the ſenate of his kingdom to ratify their reſolution.

The Octavians having, during the late ſquabbles, fallen out among themſelves, reſigned their places, by which the nation loſt the great benefit of a juſt and regular œconomy. The king therefore being again maſter of his own exchequer, deſired Elizabeth, in 1599, to ſend him a company of players, which ſhe accordingly complied with; and the immortal Shakſpeare is ſaid to have been one of the number. The clergy, as it is reaſonable to ſuppoſe, from their temper and diſpoſition, loudly exclaimed againſt the king for his conduct in that reſpect: they cenſured even Shakſpeare's drama as wicked and unedifying, and mentioned all players with the greateſt contempt and deteſtation. But as James thought fit to grant to thoſe whom Elizabeth had ſent him his royal licence and protection, the clergy lowered by degrees their ſtrains of invective, and great numbers of perſons flocked to the theatre.

Domeſtic peace being now eſtabliſhed in Scotland, the king, ſenſible of his own happineſs, found leiſure to write a treatiſe on the Art of Government. It was entitled Baſilicon Doron, and addreſſed to his ſon prince Henry. And notwithſtanding it abounds with an oſtentatious ſhew of pedantic erudition, ſome are of opinion that few better books for juſtneſs of compoſition, and propriety of ſentiment, have been ſince publiſhed on that ſubject. James maintained an amicable correſpondence with Elizabeth, and a political but ſecret one with her miniſter Cecil, who, in the courſe of letters, took care to beſpeak the good-will of his future maſter, on every occaſion.

As the adventure of the king's meeting Mr. Ruthven with a pot of money, the ſeveral ſurpriſing incidents that followed, the king's aſſaſſination and eſcape from earl Gowry's houſe (though publiſhed by his own authority) abounds with ſo many glaring abſurdities ſurpaſſing belief, it is thought unneceſſary to trouble the reader with the particulars.

James was now near the ſummit of happineſs in Scotland; for in March 1603, tidings were brought him that Elizabeth, the great, the deſerving queen of a loyal becauſe a loving, and of a powerful becauſe a free people, was in all human probability on the bed of death: nor were their preſages groundleſs, for ſhe expired on the 24th of March 1603; and James the VI. of Scotland, by the name and title of James I. of England, was inſtantly declared her ſucceſſor. James was ſpeedily informed of the joyful news, with this pleaſing additional circumſtance, that the Engliſh were, to a man, impatient to hail him as their lawful ſovereign. The king received this intelligence with decency and moderation, and began to make preparations for his departure. He committed his children to the care of ſeveral noblemen, and directed his queen to follow him in about twenty days. On the Sunday before his departure, he made a long harangue to his people in the high church of St. Giles at Edinburgh; and the people, loth to loſe their king, who had lately grown very popular, anſwered his affectionate ſpeech with tears and lamentations. James, having promiſed to viſit them frequently, left Scotland on the 5th of April. The eagerneſs with which the Engliſh ſtrove to entertain him during his journey to their kingdom, together with the vile adulation of the courtiers and biſhops, occaſioned an honeſt plain Scotchman very juſtly to obſerve, that, "They would ſpoil a "good king." He tarried four day's at Cecil's ſeat at Theobald's in Hertfordſhire, and arrived in London on the fifth, which was the 7th of May.

Eccleſiaſtical and civil affairs have been neceſſarily ſo blended, during this and the preceding reign, that very little of the former remains unnoticed. Here, however, it may not be improper to give ſome account of the Culdees, who, indeed, according to the ſtrict rules of compoſition, ought to have been mentioned much earlier. The Culdees took their name from two Celtic words which ſignify a Black-hood, and are ſuppoſed by many to have been the firſt regular chriſtian clergy in Scotland. Their great overſeers latterly had the title of epiſcopi, or biſhops, who only performed the public ſervice, while the inferior ſort viſited the ſick, and relieved the needy. Hungus, king of the Picts, under whoſe reign they are mentioned by two reputable hiſtorians, was their great patron; Brudus, the laſt king of that people, gave them the iſle of Lochleven; and the town of Balchriſtic was preſented to them by Malcolm Canmore. They were plundered, and otherwiſe ill-treated, during the following reigns, until they were reſtored to their eſtates and dignity by Alexander I. The Scots antiquarians and hiſtorians are agreed, that they were an order who differed, in many reſpects, from the church of Rome. They were Preſbyters, and neither practiſed auricular confeſſion nor divers other ridiculous ceremonies which Popery afterwards introduced, though they kept Eaſter according to the Romans, together with Chriſom and Tonſure; but when the Romiſh perſuaſion made head in Scotland, many conformed to all its abſurdities. Till this time they were in great reputation for learning and piety. By their law, a married man might become a Culdee; but that on profeſſing himſelf as ſuch, he muſt repudiate his wife, or any other woman with whom he might cohabit. The Culdees, even when Popery was the eſtabliſhed religion in Scotland, had a right to a vote for a biſhop of St. Andrew's; but their chief biſhop, Robert, dying in 1159, and David and his ſucceſſors neglecting them, their order dwindled by degrees, and became entirely extinct towards the cloſe of the following century.

The firſt general aſſembly of the reformed Scots church was held at Edinburgh on the 20th of December 1560, and the ſecond on the 26th of May following. At theſe meetings a committee was appointed to ſettle eccleſiaſtical diſcipline and policy; the members were John Douglas, rector of St. Andrew's, John Winrame, ſub-prior, John Spotſwood, John Rowe, and John Knox; but Knox led every debate, and was not to be controlled. At theſe meetings, and in a book afterwards publiſhed, they declared, " That ordinary " vocation to the miniſtry conſiſteth in election, " examination, and admiſſion;—other ceremonies, " than the public approbation of the people, and " declaration of the miniſter, that the perſon there " preſented is appointed to ſerve the church, we " cannot approve:" ſo that impoſition of hands was excluded, as was, ſoon afterwards, reading and ſinging at funerals, leſt that practice, they ſaid, ſhould encourage ſuperſtition.

Knox had ſuggeſted a project for the comfortable maintenance of himſelf, his brethren, and their poſterity, by ſecuring the whole of the Popiſh eccleſiaſtical revenues to them and their heirs, and diſtributing the ſame by annual deacons. He propoſed likewiſe to found ſchools from tythes on corn, hay, hemp, lint, fiſh, fleſh, wood, butter, cheeſe, &c. He greatly urged his ſcheme, and diſplayed the importance of deacons and elders: but the nobility and men in power, who, during the rage of reformation, had enriched themſelves with the ſpoils of ruined monaſteries, abbeys, and priories, were loth to refund; ſo that, notwithſtanding the zeal which they profeſſed for the Proteſtant faith, and for the abolition of Papacy, the love of money prevailed over every other conſideration: Knox's ſcheme fell to the ground; and they, by their illiberality to its public profeſſors, ran the riſk of nipping the Proteſtant faith in the bud.

Let us now proceed to view James on the throne of England. His manners, ſo widely differing from thoſe of Elizabeth, to whoſe court the Engliſh had been ſo long accuſtomed, made no very favourable impreſſions. Elizabeth knew how to be familiar with dignity, and to recover her princely deportment with a good grace. The familiarity of James to his courtiers was ridiculous; the ſtate which he affected was diſguſtful; and his tranſitions to each mode of this unbecoming behaviour, were ſudden, frequent, and ungraceful. His views, and thoſe of the Engliſh were, from the firſt of his acceſſion, fundamentally different:—James was fixed on ſtretching the royal prerogative, which had been ſtrongly bounded in Scotland; and the Engliſh were intent on contracting it:—from a natural fondneſs for his native land, he was deſirous to introduce Scots laws and cuſtoms; the Engliſh, from ſimilar motives, determined to keep them out: finally, the former was ſtrongly bent on procuring an union of both nations; the latter on oppoſing it; nor were even the Scots themſelves eager for it.

In order to deſtroy every idle pique of ſuperiority between the two nations, and thereby to pave the way for the Union, which he had ſo much at heart, James iſſued a proclamation before the meeting of a parliament, conſequently by virtue of his prerogative, in which he ordered himſelf every where to be ſtiled king of Great-Britain. This done, he opened his firſt parliament with a long and elaborate ſpeech, in which, after diſcloſing the depth of his wiſdom and learning, he inconſiſtently paid the Engliſh ſome compliments on their wiſe and hearty choice of him for their king, at the ſame time that he declared the crown which he then wore was his birthright. He further ſaid, " That as in his perſon the houſes of " York and Lancaſter were united, the flames of " civil war could never rekindle." He then boaſted of the peace which he had ſo long maintained with his neighbours; of the tranquillity which had ſubſiſted between him and his Scots ſubjects, and particularly of late years with his clergy. In regard to religion, he expreſſed himſelf in very general and indefinite terms; and upon the whole his ſpeech was but coldly received: ſo that he was greatly diſappointed in his expectation of applauſe. However, he diſſembled his mortification, and very prudently conferred honours on ſeveral of his new ſubjects, particularly on the Howard family (who had been conſiderable ſufferers on account of his mother) having admitted the lords Thomas and Henry into his privy council, though the firſt was ſuſpected, and the laſt a known Papiſt.

James ſounded his parliament the following year, 1604, on the ſubject of an Union, which he was ſo eager to accompliſh. He found the Engliſh in general exceedingly averſe to it, though the propoſal found a powerful advocate in the famous Sir Francis Bacon. It was unanimouſly agreed, however, when it was again brought upon the carpet three years after, to deſtroy all hoſtile diſtinctions between the two kingdoms; and as all thoughts of a cloſer connection were at that time abandoned, this was a kind of federal union.

James now began to heap on his Scots favourites ſuch profuſion of bounty, as tended to the deſtruction of their neglected country. They grew wanton, pliable, and luxurious. Their friends and countrymen flocked to London, in hopes of favour and preferment. A proper ſpirit for trade and commerce at home, was thus deſtroyed; and to impoveriſh their country ſtill more, the nobility preſſed grievouſly their tenants, in order to increaſe thoſe rents which they conſtantly laviſhed away in England. James, though he ſaw the evil tendency of theſe proceedings, was, perhaps, both unable and unwilling to reſtrain them; however, he diſpatched into Scotland a very affectionate letter, and appointing the earl of Dunbar to the principal management of affairs there, he recommended unanimity to his ſubjects in general, and the cultivation of commerce.

James now conſidering himſelf to be firmly eſtabliſhed on the throne, encouraged, in 1605, a ſevere proſecution of Popiſh prieſts. This in all likelihood gave riſe to the gunpowder plot, which was diſcovered this year, but happily fruſtrated on the memorable 5th of November, the day before its intended execution. The heads of this horrid plot were Robert Cateſby, who gained to his party Thomas Brey, John Grant, Ambroſe Roſhwood, John and Chriſtopher Wright, Francis Treſham, Guy Fawkes, Sir Edward Digby, Robert and Thomas Winter, Thomas Bates, and Robert Keyes, who were to reſtore the Romiſh religion. The king claimed the merit of the diſcovery, boaſted much of his own great ſagacity on the occaſion, and tranſmitted a full account of it into Scotland. But while he bleſſed God, who had given him the foreſight to avoid this blow, he was himſelf levelling a ſevere ſtroke againſt the Scots clergy, by inſiſting, in his letter to the parliament, that the temporalities of biſhops ſhould in Scotland, as they were in England, be annexed to their fees. The clergy in general violently oppoſed this meaſure, as wholly repugnant to the rules and orders of the eſtabliſhed church. Six Preſbyterian miniſters, rather than comply with the king's letter, had choſen a priſon; and ſome others who had been ordered up to London by James, to attend him and his prelates, defended their ancient liberties with the utmoſt intrepidity. Andrew Melvil, and his nephew James, greatly diſtinguiſhed themſelves on this occaſion. The latter, who was a man of modeſty, learning, piety, and moderation, when he was examined touching his behaviour, nobly declared, “ I am a “ free ſubject of the kingdom of Scotland, which “ hath laws and privileges of her own as free as “ any people in the world, and to which I will “ ſtand.” He nevertheleſs preſerved the greateſt decorum, which, from a natural impatience of temper, was wanting in his uncle, who ridiculed the church of England in a very indecent epigram; and, upon his examination, was guilty of perſonal abuſe; for being placed near proud Bancroft, archbiſhop of Canterbury, he ſhook his lawn ſleeves, and called them Romiſh rags. For this behaviour he was ſent to the Tower, and kept there three years; but his nephew and the reſt were diſmiſſed. James, nevertheleſs, laid aſide his project till towards the latter end of his reign, when he found means, by degrees, pretty nearly to effect his purpoſe. Mean time the ſix impriſoned miniſters were baniſhed into ſeveral parts of the kingdom; but Andrew Melvil, through the interceſſion of the duke of Bouillon, obtained his free diſcharge, and died of the gout ſoon afterwards at Sedan.

After this time, no remarkable occurrence happened during ten years. The earl of Dunbar died in 1610, and James elevated one Carr, who had been his page, to the important office of treaſurer, formerly enjoyed by that deſerving nobleman. This young man was regarded by the king with uncommon affection. He took the pains himſelf to teach him Latin, created him in a very ſhort ſpace of time viſcount Rocheſter and earl of Somerſet, and, together with the duke of York, inſtalled him a knight of the garter. But this minion, who was inſolent, artful, wicked, and ungrateful, ſoon became, in both kingdoms, as obnoxious as favourites who acquire unmerited power, and exerciſe it without moderation, commonly are and always ſhould be. In 1561, he was undermined by Villiers, a new favourite, and his fall was as ſudden as his riſe. On this occaſion, the poſt of treaſurer was conferred on the earl of Mar; and James determined to viſit Scotland, having lately received a large ſum of money from the Dutch for delivering up their cautionary towns.

Before he ſet out, he tranſmitted a letter, informing his Scots ſubjects, that his intention of viſiting them proceeded from a “ ſalmon-like in- “ ſtinct,” and not from any deſire to make the leaſt alteration in the civil or eccleſiaſtical polity of their kingdom. But the truth of this declaration was owing, perhaps, to his ſubjects, who, during his ſtay amongſt them, took care that no material innovation ſhould be made. James ſeized every occaſion to mortify the Preſbyterians; and by the publication of his book of Sports, enforcing the obſervation of what are called Holy-days, and by many other unpopular meaſures, he not only manifeſted his utter averſion to the ancient kirk, but his attachment to prelacy and the church of England, of which, by the eccleſiaſtical conſtitution of England, he was the head and lord. In ſhort, James left Scotland in 1617, with impreſſions much to his diſadvantage, having, by his example, greatly encouraged Popery, and widened every difference amongſt the clergy and laity by his inconſiſtent conduct.

James loſt his queen about two years after his return to England. Her character was that of an artful, intriguing, and unprincipled woman. From this time he fell into great contempt, and was wholly governed by Villiers, whom he had created duke of Buckingham, and by Gondemar, the Spaniſh ambaſſador. Mean while the French preſſed the renewal of the ancient league with Scotland. The Scots privileges were accordingly, in 1623, eſtabliſhed throughout France; and in Paris the Scots guard was revived, under the command of the duke of Lenox, and lord Gordon was appointed his lieutenant. About this time James inſtituted the order of Knights Baronets of Nova Scotia, an hereditary honour firſt conferred on thoſe who adventured to ſettle in that part of North-America, from whence the order was denominated. Sir William Alexander of Menſtrie deviſed the ſcheme, and undertook that it ſhould be made a colony, provided that, on payment of a certain ſum of money to the king, thirty of his countrymen might be entitled to a portion of land there, and the rank of baronets in England. To this James ſpeedily agreed, and it is among the laſt memorable actions of his life: for having, in 1624, concluded a treaty of marriage between his ſon Charles, the prince of Wales, and Henrietta Maria, daughter of Henry IV. of France and Mary of Medicis; he was, in March the following year, attacked by a diſeaſe, which ſome of his phyſicians deemed to be a tertian ague, and others the gout; and he died on the 27th of that month, 1625, in the 59th year of his age. Some are of opinion, that Buckingham, adminiſtering to him poſſets in the abſence of his phyſicians, and applying plaiſters with his own hand, haſtened his death.

The character of this monarch has been greatly obſcured by the different parties adopted by Engliſh hiſtorians, who have obſerved no medium: for whilſt one party called him the Solomon of the age, the others will not allow him a grain of ſenſe; and whilſt that extols him for his excellent management in preſerving peace with all his neighbours for ſuch a ſeries of years, this attributes the bleſſing to puſillanimity and cowardice. As king of Scotland, in which light he is here to be conſidered, his behaviour, in many reſpects, manifeſted that he was neither a fool nor a perſonal coward; though he might be ſo in a political ſenſe. His conduct in civil affairs was generally uniform and conſiſtent; but in matters reſpecting religion, always the contrary; which renders the reality of his own faith very dubious. As to his perſonal and domeſtic character, his appearance was very mean, and it was rendered more ſo by the coarſeneſs of his general converſation, which he conſtantly interlarded with that fooliſh, unmanly, and impious habit, ſwearing, and which, when agitated by paſſion, hurried him too frequently into the moſt ſhocking blaſphemy. Notwithſtanding the vaſt ſums which he laviſhed on his favourites, and his exceſſive fondneſs for eaſe and pleaſure, to which he would ſacrifice the moſt urgent buſineſs, he ſeems to have been by nature covetous; for it is ſaid, he would ſooner part with an hundred pounds which were not in his own poſſeſſion, than with twenty ſhillings which he had in his pockets. This temper often led him to cheat himſelf, by accepting two or three thouſand pounds for his privy purſe, when the parties, with whom he agreed, by bargaining in their turn with his financiers, prevented ten times that ſum from being paid into his treaſury. But now and then, it is ſaid, when he found himſelf monſtrouſly duped, he would fly from his bargain. It was on this account that one of his courtiers called him, "The wiſeſt " fool in Chriſtendom." He was ſo regular in every reſpect, that another uſed to ſay, "Were he " aſleep ſeven years, and then awakened, he would " tell where the king had been every day, and what " diſhes had been ſerved on his table."

With regard to religion, he is ſaid to believe, that the Proteſtant and Romiſh were equally good, provided the pope's deſpotic power was aboliſhed; and that he had in view the chimerical project of reconciling them both.

CHAP. II.

Arbitrary Diſpoſition of Charles I.—His Coronation—Enthuſiaſm—Petitions—Conceſſions—The Old and New Covenant—Leith fortified—Hoſtilities—Treaty of Pacification concluded—Spirited Acts—Grievances complained of—Demands of the Covenanters—King's Departure for England—His Diſtreſs—He is made Priſoner—Beheaded, &c.

CHARLES I. who became the hundredth and ninth king, had not one ſpark of the partiality for his native country, which fired his father James; but he flamed with all his ideas of prerogative and of an hierarchy, ſubject to his own domination. Theſe things were not unobſerved by the Scots; and being but little inclined to love a monarch who ſeemed ſo regardleſs of procuring their affection; and having acquired ſome juſt notions of liberty, they had a long time, out of fear of his committing arbitrary actions when perſonally preſent, put off, on various pretences, the ceremony of his coronation. The performance of it was however, at length fixed for the ſummer of 1633, when the ceremony was accordingly performed with ſuch unuſual pomp, that many ſtrangers, enticed by report of the vaſt and expenſive preparations, came over from the continent merely to behold it's magnificence. But whatever ſums were diſburſed on this occaſion, Charles determined they ſhould be made up in and from Scotland. For, the formality of the coronation ſet aſide, the king's principal views in viſiting his Scots ſubjects were to fleece them of money, and through the aſſiſtance of biſhop Laud, to eſtabliſh every item of his beloved epiſcopacy, which had been omitted by his father.

Laud had, for this latter purpoſe, compiled a book of common prayer to be uſed in Scotland, which was in many reſpects more exceptionable to the Preſbyterians than even that made uſe of in England.

Charles diſplayed his arbitrary diſpoſition in parliament, as well as in the church. To intimidate the members, and carry every point which he intended, he pulled a liſt out of his pocket, and ſaid, "I have all your names here, and will " know who will do me ſervice, and who will not." Three bills were then brought in by the lords of articles; one to confirm the royal prerogative, another to regulate the habits of clergymen according to the king's pleaſure, and a third was the reſumption of church-lands and tythes. The firſt two were tacked together; but when the earl of Rothes propoſed that they ſhould be divided, and the members in general were proceeding to a debate, they were told by the king, that to vote was their buſineſs, not to argue. They voted: but though the queſtion was actually carried in the negative, Hay, the clerk-regiſter, an infamous tool of arbitrary power, declared it to be in the affirmative: and as it was death for any perſon to challenge the award, if it were found juſt, none choſe to run that riſk, and ſo the bill paſſed. Having thus proſtituted the ſacred name of parliament, Charles conducted all his meaſures by ſimilar practices: he made Edinburgh a biſhopric, and placed therein one Forbes, who was ſtrongly ſuſpected of Popery, and then returned precipitately to London, in order to advance his favourite Laud to the ſee of Canterbury, which was vacated by the death of Abbot, it's former more worthy poſſeſſor.

That reſentment of Charles's unconſtitutional proceedings, which the people of Scotland could with difficulty reſtrain whilſt he was amongſt them, manifeſted itſelf, ſoon after his departure, by the moſt ſettled and univerſal diſcontent. As churchmen were now preferred to the moſt important civil offices, by the appointment of ſuch an infamous miniſter as Laud, the Scots ſaw plainly, that without one great effort they muſt bear the yoke of church-tyranny, and be plunged of courſe into the moſt abject ſlavery. They were in this frame of mind, when, on the 23d of July 1637, Hanna dean of Edinburgh prepared publicly to read the liturgy, drawn up by Laud. Scarcely had he uttered a ſentence, ere the lower claſs of people, interrupted the ſervice by execrations, outcries, and the moſt violent expreſſions of abhorrence. Hanna, afraid to proceed, ſhut the book and retired from the deſk; Forbes himſelf then ſtepped into it, and confiding in the power and importance of his epiſcopal office, began to harangue. The preſence of a man whom they hated, and on ſuch an occaſion, put them paſt all bounds. The prelate was ſaluted by the women with their joint-ſtools, bibles, and other miſſile weapons. The church was filled with the general clamour of "A pope! a pope! anti- " chriſt! Stone him! ſtone him!" and the biſhop, with much difficulty, eſcaped with his life from theſe enthuſiaſts. The tumults in other churches being nearly the ſame, a petition by ſome of the clergy was drawn up, to pray his majeſty not to enforce this diſagreeable liturgy; which petition, it is but common juſtice to ſay, was firſt ſigned by Spotſwood and Maxwell, and then by the other chief officers of ſtate. Beſides this general petition, there were no leſs than ſixty-eight private ones to the ſame effect.

Such a petulant and indeterminate anſwer was ſent by Charles into Scotland, that the oppoſition to the liturgy, which at firſt aroſe only among the lower claſs of people, was now univerſally ſupported. A national covenant was therefore formed, of the ſame nature with that which James had drawn up in behalf of Elizabeth on the Spaniſh invaſion, and it was ſworn to with the utmoſt alacrity; all ranks, ages, and ſexes, flocking to ſubſcribe their renunciation of Popery, their reſolution to maintain, at all hazards, the true religion of the Scots church, and (though conditionally) their firm attachment to the king's perſon and gorvernment.

The king began now to conſider his people's petitions, and the conſequences; and therefore diſpatched the marquis of Hamilton to propoſe, in his name, that if the covenant were diſſolved, the liturgy ſhould be ſuſpended, till the Scots, in a legal way, could receive it. Hamilton was told by theſe noble aſſerters of their country's freedom, that before they would break up their covenant, (which ſome, inſtead of ink, had actually ſigned with their blood) they would renounce their baptiſm. The king no ſooner heard of their determined reſolution, and their great ſtrength (for they had met Hamilton to the number of 60,000) than he then offered to aboliſh entirely the diſagreeable liturgy, and alſo the high commiſſion which he had erected, together with every act that, upon fair debate, could be proved oppreſſive and unconſtitutional. Notwithſtanding theſe conceſſions, which were conſidered as extorted, and as the Scots were in a condition to make a noble ſtand, they therefore declared, that nothing could drown their jealouſy, or ſtifle their reſentment, but the total abolition of epiſcopacy, and the reſtoration of their ancient religion as ſettled by Knox.

Affairs ſtood thus in 1639, when Charles, piqued to the quick at their obſtinacy, urged on by Laud, and ſupported by every Papiſt in England, determined to ſubdue their obſtinacy by force of arms. The Scots, appriſed of his intentions, and being ſpirited up and furniſhed with money by Richlieu, the intriguing miniſter of Lewis XIV. whom Charles had diſguſted, took the neceſſary meaſures for their own defence. Having enforced the ſigning of the covenant, under pain of excommunication; driven all the biſhops out of the kingdom, and in fact utterly aboliſhed epiſcopacy themſelves, they choſe for their general Alexander Leſley, an experienced officer, who had ſerved in Sweden with great reputation. Before the king proceeded to hoſtilities, he, to perplex the Scots, by ſeeming proofs of his ſincerity, revived the old covenant, which had been drawn up by his father, and, ſigning it himſelf, his agents quickly diſperſed it through Scotland. Some thouſands, by this artifice, renounced the new covenant, and came over to his intereſt; and Old and New Covenant then became the diſtinctions of each party.

The king, and the principal of the Scots ſubjects, were now at avowed defiance. He had iſſued a proclamation, commanding his loyal ſubjects to meet him in arms at York, and the marquis of Hamilton was ordered to prepare a fleet. The covenanters, appriſed of theſe proceedings, planted garriſons in the moſt important towns, and proceeded to fortify Leith, the ſeaport of Edinburgh, with ſuch unanimous reſolution, that not only the nobles and gentry, but even women of every rank, employed their hands and ſhoulders indiſcriminately with common labourers, till they had completed the fortifications.

On the 2d of June the king appeared at Berwick, at the head of a conſiderable army; while Hamilton and his fleet were hovering in Leith road in a very ſhattered condition. The main forces of the covenanters were then encamped near Duns. Charles advanced, and a few immaterial ſkirmiſhes enſued, in which the Engliſh acted againſt the Scots with viſible backwardneſs, and furniſhed them as it has been reported, with intelligence of every individual proceeding in the royal camp. At length the covenanters advanced with the whole body of their troops: but before they proceeded to unſheath the ſword, and iſſue out all the horrors of a civil war, it was agreed to diſpatch the earl of Dumſerling to his majeſty with an humble petition, ſupplicating his majeſty to appoint worthy and proper perſons, affected to the true religion and common peace, to make known his majeſty's pleaſure, remove grievances, and bring matters to a ſpeedy and happy accommodation.

The favourable reception their dutiful petition met with from moſt of the leading men in the royal army, induced Charles to appoint proper commiſſioners, to treat on the propoſed pacification. Theſe were the earls of Arundel, Eſſex, Holland, Saliſbury, Berkſhire, and the ſecretary Cook. And thoſe deputed by the covenanters were the earls of Rothes and Dumſerling, lord Loudon, Sir William Douglas, Mr. Alexander Henderſon, moderator of a general aſſembly which the covenanters had eſtabliſhed at Glaſgow, and Mr. Archibald Johnſtone, it's clerk. The tent of the earl of Arundel, general of the king's troops, was the place of aſſignation. Hither the Scots commiſſioners repaired with a ſafe-conduct under the king's own hand. Whilſt Arundel was opening the conference in a ſet ſpeech, the whole committee were put into the utmeſt conſternation, by the abrupt entrance of the king himſelf, ſaying, as he approached, that underſtanding the Scots gave out they could not be heard, he had come to hear them in perſon. Notwithſtanding this unmanly intruſion, which the aſſembly rightly ſuppoſed was on purpoſe to over-awe their debates, lord Loudon, a young nobleman full of zeal, and warm from the univerſity, began a ſpeech; but he was inſtantly interrupted by the king, with "Sir, I will not admit of any of your excuſes for your paſt actions; but if you come to ſue for grace, ſet down your deſires particularly in writing, and you ſhall receive your anſwer." This, though thus arbitrarily impoſed, was complied with, and a treaty of pacification was at length concluded on, to the following effect, That the king withdraw his fleet and army; that the Scots diſmiſs their forces; that the king's forts be given up to him; no meetings allowed unwarranted by parliament, and that all diſputes ſhould be immediately ſettled by an aſſembly.

This pacification, thus patched up, and couched in ſuch general terms, was agreeable only to the ſervile commiſſioners who had made it. Neither the expreſs abolition of epiſcopacy, nor one ſyllable concerning the Glaſgow aſſembly, had ever been directly mentioned, and therefore the people eaſily ſaw, that the king would in parliament, with his authority over the Scots, reſume his former carriage towards them, and find means to interpret the vague terms contrary to their intention, and highly to their diſadvantage. Their ſuſpicions proved but too juſt. It was ſoon diſcovered that he made uſe of mental reſervation; and previous to the meeting of parliament, on the 20th of Auguſt, he employed every ſpecies of the meaneſt duplicity. Pretending that he had committed a manifeſt ſoleciſm in politics, by treating with his own ſubjects, he prorogued the parliament; and leaving matters in the moſt anxious uncertainty, he returned to London, appointing the earl of Traquaire his high commiſſioner, which poſt had been refuſed by the marquis of Hamilton.

The Scots had, ſince the pacification in 1640, diſſolved the form of an army; but diſbanded the ſoldiery with ſo much precaution, that, ſtill keeping the officers in pay, they could be collected into a body on the ſhorteſt notice. Obſerving the king's diſpoſition and deſigns, and having intelligence of what was going forward at the Engliſh court, they aſſembled themſelves in parliament on the 11th of June, and there diſcovered that order, judgment, and moderation, and diſplayed ſuch talents, in ſettling their civil and religious liberties, which proved them to be glorious promoters of the cauſe of freedom, and muſt reflect for ever the moſt brilliant luſtre on every individual then preſent. They aboliſhed the lords of articles, and the power of churchmen as legiſlators; confirmed the former determination againſt epiſcopacy; and deviſed many other acts highly worthy of a people who were determined not to be frightened out of their liberties, by menaces, or the loud ſounds of epiſcopal authority, and royal prerogative. Theſe patriotic acts were ſent up to London, under the care of the earls of Dumferling and Loudon, to be preſented to the king for his royal aſſent; which aſſent was refuſed, under pretence that they came unauthenticated by his commiſſioner Traquaire.

Theſe ſpirited acts, together with a letter written to the king of France, and ſigned before the pacification, by the principal Scotch nobility, but never ſent, furniſhed Charles with a faint pretext, but full reſolution, to invade Scotland once more, and liſten to no propoſals of peace with them, unleſs they admitted his will as their ſupreme law. But inſtantly, on the leaſt hint of his deſign, the Scotch forces were reunited, and receiving a large ſupply of money from the exaction of the tenth penny throughout the land, and from Richlieu, the French miniſter (whoſe aſſiſtance Charles had refuſed); being alſo ſpirited up by Montroſe, they took the reſolution, by firſt invading England, to prevent the king from obtaining the advantage of naval, as well as land forces.

An army of 25,000 men, under the command of Leſley, ſoon appeared on the Engliſh borders, attended by committees of the ſtates, without whoſe concurrence no ſtep of the leaſt importance was to be taken, and ſurrounded by pedlars, who procured them the moſt minute intelligence. Having defeated a ſmall body of troops under the command of lord Conway, who was ſent to reconnoitre, they took poſſeſſion of Newcaſtle, and there publiſhed a manifeſto, ſetting forth their grievances, and appealed to the leaguers in France in juſtification of their own conduct. They proteſted that their invaſion was purely defenſive; but at the ſame time declared, that with their ſword in one hand, and covenant in the other, they were ready to penetrate into the bowels of England.

Mean while the king had formally denounced them traitors, and at the head of 20,000 men, which he had raiſed with great difficulty, was advanced as far as Northallerton; but unwilling to riſk his three crowns on the event of a ſingle battle, he returned to York, and revived an antiquated cuſtom, which had never been practiſed ſince the time of Edward IV. he there, by writ under the great ſeal, ſummoned a council of all the peers: Wentworth, earl of Strafford, an arbitrary vindictive nobleman and the king's favourite, was for war; the marquis of Hamilton, a favourite alſo, and every other member except Strafford, warned Charles againſt driving the Scots to deſperation, and earneſtly begged him to give ear to, and redreſs their grievances, which only could produce that peace which they thought it his majeſty's intereſt to preſerve. The king at length ſignified his intention of liſtening to the grievances complained of, which were expreſſed in the following terms.

“ I. That his majeſty would be graciouſly pleaſed to command, that the laſt acts of parliament may be publiſhed in his highneſs's name, as our ſovereign lord, with the eſtates of parliament convened by his majeſty's authority.

“ II. That the caſtle of Edinburgh, and other ſtrengths of the kingdom of Scotland, may, according to the firſt foundation, be furniſhed and uſed for our defence and ſecurity.

“ III. That our countrymen in his majeſty's dominions of England and Ireland, may be freed from cenſure for ſubſcribing the covenant, and be no more preſſed with oaths and ſubſcriptions, unwarrantable by our laws, and contrary to the national oath and covenant approved by his majeſty.

“ IV. That the common incendiaries, which have been the authors of this combination, may receive their juſt cenſure.

“ V. That all our ſhips and goods, with all damages, may be reſtored, and made good.

“ VI. That the wrongs, loſſes, and charges, which all this time we have ſuſtained, may be repaired.

“ VII. That the declarations made againſt us as traitors may be recalled, by the advice and council of the ſtate of England convened in parliament; and that his majeſty may be pleaſed to remove the garriſons from the borders, and any impediments which may ſtop free trade; and with their advice to condeſcend to all particulars that may eſtabliſh a ſtable and well-grounded peace, for the enjoying of our religion and liberties, againſt all force, moleſtation, and undoing, from year to year, or as our adverſaries ſhall take the advantage.”

Theſe demands, which concluded with a kind of apology for having advanced ſo far into England, were ſigned by the earls of Rothes, Montroſe, Caſſils, Dumferling, and ſeveral gentlemen of wealth and importance; who likewiſe wrote a very affectionate and well-timed letter to the lord-mayor, aldermen, and citizens of London, preſſing them to continue the Newcaſtle trade, and aſſuring them of perfect ſecurity; which meaſure was extremely judicious, and had a very happy effect.

But the arbitrary Charles boiled with reſentment at the high demands of the covenanters, though his rage was impotent; for his peers inſiſted on the appointment of commiſſioners to treat with the Scots, and on the appointment of ſuch only as might be agreeable to them. They were accordingly the following popular noblemen: the earls of Bedford, Hertford, Eſſex, Saliſbury, Warwick, Briſtol, Holland, Berkſhire; viſcount Mandeville; the lords Wharton, Paget, Brooke, Pawlet, Howard, Saville, and Dunſmore. And to obviate every difficulty, which might ariſe from the ignorance of Scots laws, the earls of Traquaire, Morton, and Lanerk, were appointed their aſſiſtants. Secretary Vane, Sir John Burrough, and Lewis Stewart, were in like manner appointed to aid the Scots commiſſioners, who were the earl of Dumferling, lord Loudon, Sir Patrick Hepburn, Sir William Douglas, John Smith, Alexander Wedderburn, Alexander Henderſon, and Archibald Johnſtone. The vaſt difference in the quality and number of each kingdom's commiſſioners muſt ſtrike the reader immediately. The firſt meeting was held at Rippon on the 2d of October. After many debates, or rather after the moſt friendly conferences, in which both parties concurred to bound the royal prerogative, curtail the exorbitant power of the clergy, and ſtop the growth of Popery, a truce was concluded on the 26th day of the ſame month. A free intercourſe was reſtored, and the ſum of 850l. a day, which the Scots had before levied on the inhabitants of Newcaſtle, and places adjacent, was allowed them during the continuance of their army in England, together with the importation of all neceſſaries for its uſe, duty free. But as to the more material parts of the treaty, it being impoſſible to ſettle them before the 3d of November, when the Engliſh parliament was to meet, the deciſion was therefore (though much againſt his majeſty's inclination) nation) referred to that meeting in London. In conſequence of this adjournment, John, earl of Rothes, lord Urquhart, William Drummond of Riccarton, and Hugh Kennedy of Air, were added to the number of the former commiſſioners; and the army of the covenanters enjoyed the advantage of living in a fine country, at eaſe, and in the greateſt plenty, till their cauſe was determined; during which time they purchaſed a good ſtore of arms, and introduced the moſt excellent diſcipline. Notwithſtanding this, the Scots wiſhed that their affairs had been ſettled, that they might have returned to their own country, as they were apprehenſive that the very heavy contributions, whilſt they remained in England, might render all in the north of that country their enemies. But the Engliſh patriots conſidered the Scots forces as the greateſt aid in completing their deſigns on Laud and Strafford, who, on the motion of the Scots deputies, were ſhortly after attainted, and deſervedly brought to the block.

In 1641, the Scots army returned into their own country, having been ſatisfied in all their demands, and in conſideration of their loſſes and neceſſities, been voted 300,000l. by the Engliſh, who ſtiled them their brethren. Charles, who had been taken in hand by his Engliſh ſubjects, determined to repair to the parliament, then ſitting in Scotland, though highly mortified that thoſe men ſhould be called brethren by his parliament, whom he had not long before denounced traitors. He reſolved on this ſtep at the inſtigation of the earl of Montroſe, who had now openly eſpouſed his cauſe, and had, it is ſaid, inſtilled into him a notion, that, as he had granted them all their demands (though this was in fact done by parliament) the Scots, by his management of them, might be brought to aſſiſt him in humbling the parliament of England, with whom he was now at variance. In full aſſurance therefore of ſuch an unlikely ſupport, he appeared in their parliament on the 17th of Auguſt, lord Balmerino being preſident, and addreſſed it in a ſpeech which very plainly ſhewed the fond attachment Charles ſtill preſerved for his prerogative, even while he made profeſſions, which, if he meant to fulfil, muſt have deſtroyed it. He diſtributed honours even amongſt his enemies with a very liberal hand. Several of the principal covenanters were ſworn in privy-counſellors; Loudon was made an earl and chancellor of the kingdom. Argyle, Glencairn, Lothian, and Lindſay, were jointly to diſcharge the office of treaſurer. The firſt was created a marquis, and the laſt two earls; general Leſley was created earl of Leven, and made keeper of Edinburgh caſtle; and to Mr. Alexander Henderſon, he gave the revenue of the royal chapel, and beſtowed church preferments on ſeveral other of their popular preachers, whom he attended at divine ſervice, ſeeming to conform himſelf entirely to the eſtabliſhed church.

But ſanguine as the king's hopes might have been of ſuccour from the Scots, ſome of whom, it is ſaid, were touched with a ſenſe of his diſtreſſed condition; both houſes of the Engliſh parliament, by naming committees to attend the Scots parliament, entirely baffled them, and prevented the bad conſequences of too good an underſtanding between Charles and his countrymen.

In the beginning of the following year, the horrid rebellion broke out in Ireland, and haſtened the king's departure for England. Parties had run ſo high, and the Preſbyterian intereſt there became ſo predominant, that, when Charles arrived at his palace, he was, in a manner, blocked up by the citizens of London, who imagined him to have been privy to the horrid tranſactions in Ireland. On this, his majeſty retired firſt to Hampton-court, from thence to Windſor, and at laſt to York, and the reins of authority were now in the hands of the parliament; not, however, before the Scots commiſſioners had endeavoured to accommodate matters; for which both houſes returned them thanks: but as, in their interceſſion, they had expoſtulated pretty freely with the king, he rejected their advice with diſdain.

A melancholy ſcene now happened in England: a purple tide, from the veins of patriots and fellow-citizens, over-ran her fineſt counties. The Scots were not idle ſpectators of theſe bloody proceedings: for, by the treaty between them, and the two houſes of parliament in England, which was finiſhed in 1643, the Scots agreed to raiſe an army of 18,000 foot and 3000 horſe on Engliſh pay; but they were to defray their own expences, nor was a ceſſation of arms to be concluded without mutual agreement. Thus, in fact, the Scots, by their ſituation, became the arbiters of England's fate, and by prudent management muſt have been gainers, whatever might have been the iſſue of the war.

Mean time, the earl of Montroſe had renounced the national covenant, and declared for the king; and aſſembling a conſiderable party of Highlanders, he ſtrove eagerly in the cauſe of Charles, in order to make ſome recompence for what he termed his former diſloyalty: but though by his aſtoniſhing victory over the covenanters at Kilſyth, in 1645, he reduced Edinburgh, and almoſt all Scotland to the king's obedience, who had created him his lieutenant-governor, and captain-general in Scotland; he was totally defeated ſoon after by Leſley at Philiphaugh, and the power of the covenanters was re-eſtabliſhed.

The royal cauſe in England was ruined by the deciſive battle of Naſeby; and the king, in the utmoſt diſtreſs, betook himſelf, on the 5th of May 1646, to the Scots army, at that time encamped before Newark. He undoubtedly choſe this ſtep, as the leaſt of the two evils; upon the ſuppoſition that the Scots were leſs exaſperated againſt him than the Engliſh. Charles was received with the utmoſt reſpect; but they watched him ſo narrowly, that he ſoon perceived himſelf to be in reality their priſoner. After the hurry and conſternation which had ariſen in the Scots army on the king's ſudden appearance, was, in ſome degree, ſubſided, it was reſolved, by the covenanters, to acquaint the Engliſh parliament that his majeſty had repaired to their camp.

In the mean time, all the officers and men of note laboured earneſtly to cloſe the breach between the king and his parliament, to mutual ſatisfaction; and for that end, the earl of Loudon, in particular, urged the king, as the moſt ſalutary meaſure, to comply with their demands, and aſſent to the propoſitions.

This nobleman's ſpeech concludes in the following loyal and preſſing terms: “If it pleaſe God ſo to incline your royal heart to this advice of your humble and faithful ſervants, who, next to the honour of God, eſteem nothing more precious than the ſafety of your perſon and crown, our actions ſhall quickly make it appear to all the world, that we eſteem no hazard too great for your majeſty's ſafety; and that we are willing to ſacrifice our lives and fortunes for eſtabliſhing your throne. Now, Sir, we proſtrate ourſelves at your majeſty's feet, and in the loweſt poſture of humility, do beg that your majeſty may in the end grant the ſuit of your moſt faithful ſervants, who have no private aims, but only the glory of God, and the ſafety of your majeſty's perſon, poſterity, and crown before our eyes. The granting our deſires will revive our fainting ſpirits, refreſh our ſad hearts, which are overwhelmed, and like to break with ſorrow, and will turn the prayers and tears of many thouſands of your people into “ praiſes to God, and make them embrace your “ majeſty with acclamations of joy.”

The ſenſe of the Scots in general appears by the unanſwerable arguments the earl made uſe of, and which were delivered in a free but reſpectful manner: they had, however, no effect upon Charles; who, to the chagrin and diſappointment of his friendly adviſers, though urged to comply by his queen, and all his friends in France, declared, that he never would agree to the parliament's propoſitions, becauſe he held them, he ſaid, to be abſolutely ſubverſive of that juſt power, to which, by the laws of God, and of the land, he was born; and to which, therefore, no perſuaſions, no intreaties, no arguments, could prevail on him to conſent.

The propoſitions being thus rejected, the Engliſh parliament demanded that Charles ſhould be given up; and the Scots, after ſome immaterial diſputes concerning the right to the diſpoſal of his perſon, prepared accordingly to reſign him in form. The commons of England, having alſo ſignified that they had no further need of the Scots army, voted, in conſideration of its good ſervice, and for the payment of arrears, four hundred thouſand pounds, half to be paid on the reſignation of the king, and the remainder in two years; for which they gave no other ſecurity than their public faith. At Newcaſtle, on the 30th day of January 1647, a committee, conſiſting of the earls of Pembroke and Denbigh, the lord Montague, Sir John Cooke, Sir Walter Erle, Sir John Holland, Sir James Harrington, Mr. Crew, and general Brown, as the parliament's commiſſioners, received the unhappy monarch from the Scots, and conducted him, under a ſtrong guard, to Holdenby.

From the time that the Scots had given him up, the parliament, and the independent leaders in the army, had alternately made uſe of the moſt circumventing arts, in order to gain poſſeſſion of his perſon; the latter at laſt prevailed. Whilſt theſe were thus ſhuffling and cutting for the unfortunate king; in Scotland, a large party, under the marquis now duke of Hamilton, touched with his ſufferings, and melted with pity, eſſayed, by force, to effect his enlargement. But Hamilton, more unſucceſsful in the royal cauſe than Montroſe had been, was not only defeated in his attempt, but taken priſoner, and afterwards beheaded; whilſt Oliver Cromwell, who had conquered him, and who now began greatly to diſtinguiſh himſelf, continuing his march to Scotland, was welcomed, on his arrival at Edinburgh, with many demonſtrations of eſteem, by a committee of covenanters appointed on the occaſion.

Cromwell left Edinburgh at the latter end of the year 1648;—and on the 30th of January following the king ſaw in death a period to his troubles. He was beheaded in the 49th year of his age, and the 24th of his reign, by order of parliament, and buried at Windſor.

Not to enter into particulars relative to his unhappy fate, his deportment at the ſcaffold, his ſentence, and ſuch traits of his character with which a hiſtory of Scotland has little concern; it will ſuffice to ſay, that his whole reign, like thoſe of his ſons, Charles and James, was but a continued conſpiracy againſt the religious and civil liberties of his people.

THE Scots covenanters (to whom the independents of England, who now took the lead in that kingdom, had become extremely obnoxious) determined, how much ſoever they had proceeded againſt the father, to acknowledge and proclaim the ſon. Accordingly, under certain conditions, which he complied with, prince Charles was invited over from the Hague, where he heard the tidings of his father's death, being then in the 18th year of his age. He arrived in Scotland in the ſummer of 1650, and having ſolemnly taken the covenant was crowned at Scone on the 1ſt of January 1651.

The commonwealth of England highly diſapproved of theſe proceedings; in conſequence of which, Cromwell marched into Scotland, and, with ſome difficulty, took poſſeſſion of Leith and Edinburgh. Charles, mean time, was furniſhed with a good army, and reſolved to command it in perſon, appointing Leſley, lord Leven's ſon, his lieutenant-general. He encamped at Torwood, between Edinburgh and Stirling; and the county of Fife ſupplied him with proviſions. But as Cromwell ſoon cut off that communication, the king was reduced to great ſtraits; being yet unwilling to quit his ſtrong intrenchment to attack Cromwell's veterans, he ſtole a day's march of that able general, and poſted to Worceſter, where he expected to be ſo well received as to be very ſhortly in a fit condition to proceed to London: but Charles, in this expectation, was too ſanguine. Cromwell, who, it is ſaid, wilfully permitted the king to take this ſtep, leaving in Scotland George Monk, to command during his abſence, hurried exultingly after Charles, and attacked him in camp at Worceſter with ſuch ſkill and reſolution, that the royal forces were totally routed, and their young leader narrowly eſcaped being taken priſoner. This happened on the 3d of September.

Charles now finding himſelf to be without ſupport, took great pains to conceal his perſon, and retire into France. But on the king's defeat, Cromwell repaired to London; and a committee of parliament congratulating him on his ſucceſs, he made a preſent to each of them of an horſe, and two Scots captives.

Cromwell's ambition began now to expand itſelf; and whilſt he was taking large ſtrides towards the protectorſhip in England, Monk, his lieutenant-general, was equally ſucceſsful in curbing the royaliſts in Scotland. In conſequence of which, commiſſioners were ſent from England to govern that kingdom, and they took their reſidence at Dalkeith. Having procured oaths of fidelity from the principal magiſtrates and perſons in office, they promulgated public acts, in the name of the commonwealth of England; one of which was a kind of an act of grace, wherein they promiſed

“ The protection of the Engliſh parliament to “ all magiſtrates and miniſters who ſhould live “ peaceably under their authority; and an indemnity “ for all acts of violence during the late commotions, “ to all merchants, tradeſmen, and handicraftmen,

" craftmen, whoſe eſtates were not above five hun-" dred pounds ſterling; and to all others, who were " not ſoldiers and priſoners, whoſe eſtates did not " exceed two hundred pounds."

From this time to the death of Cromwell in 1658, there is a very diſagreeable chaſm in the hiſtory of Scotland. On the demiſe of this great man, Charles, who during the protectorate, had reſided chiefly at the French court and at Breda, began to purſue thoſe meaſures which he conceived might be moſtly conducive to recover his crown. He underſtood that there were many parties in Scotland; and therefore he employed Mr. James Sharp, afterwards the memorable archbiſhop of St. Andrew's, to effect an union of all to his intereſt. Charles himſelf had ſecured the confidence of Monk by a letter, dated the 21ſt of July 1659, which he diſpatched to him by Sir John Grenville, and of which the following is a copy:

" SIR,

" I cannot think you wiſh me ill, nor have you reaſon ſo to do; and the good I expect from you will bring ſo great a benefit to your country and to yourſelf, that I cannot think you will decline my intereſt. The perſon who gives or ſends this to you, has authority to ſay much more to you from me: and if you once reſolve to take my intereſt at heart, I will leave the way and manner of declaring it entirely to your judgment, and will comply with the advice you ſhall give me; the reſt I refer to the perſon that conveys this to you. It is in your power to make me as kind to you as you can deſire, and to have me always

Your affectionate friend,

C. R."

On the receipt of this letter, and after conferring with the bearer, Monk, who was an old trimmer, preſently grew zealous in the cauſe of his royal maſter. He convened the chief of the nobility and gentry of Scotland, who were at Edinburgh, and told them, that he was reſolved to march to England in ſupport of the parliament. As the protector, Richard Cromwell, had been depoſed, the Scots royaliſts, who, by Sharp's intrigues, were now pretty numerous, imagined, that this reſolution was equivalent to a declared intention of reſtoring the king: ſuch in fact it was, though in an affair of that conſequence, Monk choſe to act with the utmoſt ſecrecy and circumſpection. Sharp, who alone, perhaps, was privy to his real deſign, though he affected to be ignorant of it, accompanied him to London, from whence he held a regular correſpondence with his brethren in Scotland, and not only paved the way for Charles's reſtoration, but for that of epiſcopacy, and for all the horrid acts of perſecution and cruelties which followed its eſtabliſhment.

Mean time, in 1660, the king had publiſhed a declaration from Breda, granting a general pardon to ſuch of his ſubjects, not excepted by parliament, who ſhould embrace it within forty days. This, backed by the addreſs of Sharp with the Scots, and of Monk with the Engliſh, met with ſuch ſucceſs, that he was invited home without any terms, proclaimed at London on the 4th of May, and at Edinburgh on the 14th; and on the 29th he entered the former city, amidſt ſuch joyous acclamations, that he ſatirically aſked, " What had become of the " people who had kept him ſo long abroad?"

The Scots, as well as the Engliſh Preſbyterians, who had been the principal inſtruments of his return, ſoon ſaw the error of their ill-timed generoſity. All the ſolemn engagements, which ten years ago his majeſty had made to uphold the covenant, and eſtabliſh Preſbytery, were now entirely diſregarded; having ſecretly embraced Popery, while abroad, and conceived an utter averſion to Preſbyterians, the king was reſolved, that, as in Scotland monarchy was reſtored, ſo ſhould prelacy, adopting that abſurd maxim of his grandfather, No biſhop, no king. Charles, therefore, ſettled a miniſtry which conſiſted of the moſt violent high-churchmen; and the earl of Middleton, becauſe he was the moſt zealous for the hierarchy, and was of a temper which would ſtick at nothing to ſerve his maſter, was appointed high commiſſioner in parliament. Middleton, eager to ſhew his capacity for the office, procured, at one vote, a repeal of every act of the Scots parliament from 1640 to 1648; after which, by a ſingle act, he overthrew the eſtabliſhed government of the kingdom, deſtroyed the national covenant (the abetters of which were alſo from henceforth to be accounted as traitors) and reſtored epiſcopacy. When his moſt intimate friends inſinuated, that ſlower proceedings might, in the end, prove more ſecure, he anſwered, " That the " parliament was now at his beck; that he loved " to ſerve his maſter genteelly, and do his buſineſs " at one ſtroke."

The commiſſioners accordingly pointed out three perſons, one of the nobility, one of the gentry, and one of the clergy, who had been the moſt leading men in the kirk or Preſbyterian party, and devoted them to inſtant deſtruction. They were the marquis of Argyle, Johnſton of Wariſton, and Mr. James Guthrie. The marquis, an amiable man, as he was led to the block, heroically declared, that he could die like a Roman; but he rather choſe to ſuffer as a Chriſtian, which he accordingly did. Guthrie was a ſtrict follower of Knox, of the moſt rigid principles, and of a temper ſomewhat ſingular. The king had formerly honoured him with a viſit, at a time when he was ill in his room at Stirling; and whilſt his wife haſtily roſe to hand his majeſty a chair, he would not ſuffer it, ſaying, " Sit ſtill, ſit ſtill, good wife, the king is a young " man, and can reach a chair for himſelf." Though thus deficient in good manners, he was a man of learning, ſtrong natural parts, and great piety, and he met his ignominious fate on the gibbet with a primitive reſolution. Johnſton by flight eſcaped for the preſent, but ſuffered with pious reſignation and Roman fortitude two years afterwards. Theſe were the proceedings in the year 1661, in which, to the great regret of hiſtorians, eighty-five hogſheads of Scots records were loſt in their conveyance by ſea, to Leith from London, where they had been carried by Cromwell.

That covenant which Charles had ſworn to maintain being thus aboliſhed, and the very perſons ſlaughtered whom he had ſolemnly promiſed to protect; and having, contrary to his plighted faith, introduced epiſcopacy, he proceeded, in 1662, to eſtabliſh the church of England hierarchy by perſecution, than which nothing can be more unreaſonable, more inconſiſtent to humanity, more unjuſt and impolitic, or more directly oppoſite to the ſpirit and precepts of the chriſtian religion. Were conſcience controulable by human laws, or amenable to human tribunals, Charles, in this reſpect, and even the church of Rome might be excuſed; but conſcience is not to be forced into conviction; all attempts that way can never produce it, and muſt only add to the number of hypocrites or martyrs. Bent, nevertheleſs, on this diabolical reſolution; and though he knew the Scots' invincible averſion to prelacy, Charles conferred the metropolitan ſee of St. Andrew's on Sharp, as well in reward of his paſt ſervices, as that he rightly judged him to be a fit prime agent for that bloody buſineſs. The other ſees were alike filled by men who were agreeable to the diſpoſition of Charles, and fatal proofs ſoon appeared, that the government of Scotland was become truly epiſcopal. Deprived of a comfortable ſubſiſtence, and driven from their peaceful abodes, the Preſbyterian miniſters, in 1663, preached undauntedly in the fields, and on the hills, to hearers who flocked to them inceſſantly; which they boldly continued, notwithſtanding an act againſt non-conformity, that, for its ſingular ſeverity, was called the Biſhop's Dragnet. Juſtices of peace were impowered to commit theſe conventiclers to priſon, without trial or juries; and any one found guilty of a third offence was ordered to be baniſhed to America. One Sir James Turner was employed by the council, it is ſaid, to act, in this reſpect, both as an informer and as a proſecutor, though he was beſides impowered to be at once the judge and executioner of every law reſpecting church-government. Being backed by a body of 20,000 foot and 2000 horſe, a kind of ſtanding army, at the earl of Middleton's command, he performed his commiſſion with the moſt cruel punctuality and exactneſs; levied fines without proceſs, and committed the moſt wanton injuries without the leaſt provocation. Beſides theſe oppreſſions in eccleſiaſtical affairs, it was declared that no perſon, who refuſed to ſign a renunciation of the ſolemn league and covenant, ſhould be elected into any kind of office; but, on the contrary, that every perſon, who ſo refuſed, ſhould, from that time, forfeit his privileges as a freeman and a merchant. Thus the wretched Preſbyterians, both clergy and laity, were diſtreſſed by every poſſible method that their enemies could invent.

The commonality, who for the moſt part were Preſbyterians, aſcribed the ſource of theſe calamities to Sharp. Of this opinion the prelate, who doubtleſs merited a great part of the ſuſpicion, was well aware: he therefore urged all his great credit at court, to procure in Scotland a court of inquiſition, or, as himſelf was pleaſed to term it, an High Commiſſion for Church Affairs; and procured it without much difficulty. By this grant, the privy-council was thrown out of any ſhare in eccleſiaſtical government; and the number of members of his inquiſition ſerved in a great meaſure to wipe off any particular odium which had already been, or might in future be, caſt upon himſelf. From the temper of the man, it is very natural to imagine, that he ſtrove as much as poſſible to keep the great ſhare which he had in this buſineſs, a profound ſecret. This unlimited court of high commiſſion was authoriſed

> “To take cognizance of, and puniſh all offenders, who went about corrupting and warping the people from their allegiance, reſpect, and obedience to the laws, and all who expreſſed their diſſatisfaction to his majeſty authority, by contravening acts of parliament, or council, in relation to church affairs.”

Its members were the archbiſhop of St. Andrew's, the lord Montroſe, the earls of Argyle, Athol, Eglington, Linlithgow, Hume, Galloway, Annandale, Tweedale, Leven, Murray; the biſhops of Edinburgh, Galloway, Dunkeld, Aberdeen, Breechin, Argyle, and the Iſles; the lords Drumlanerk, Pitſligo, Fraſer, Cockran, Halkertoun, and Bellenden; the preſident of the ſeſſion, the regiſter, the advocate, Sir John Hume, juſtice clerk, Mr. Charles Maitland, the laird of Philorth, elder, Sir Andrew Ramſay, Sir William Thomſon; the provoſts of St. Andrew's, Aberdeen, Glaſgow, Air, and Dumfries, Sir James Turner, and the dean of guild of Edinburgh. Five of theſe, including particularly, an archbiſhop or a biſhop, were conſtituted a quorum; and their commands were to be obeyed by every officer in the kingdom, whether civil or military.

From ſuch a motley court of biſhops, peers, military officers, and common magiſtrates, veſted with ſo abſolute an authority, the moſt unaccountable, unjuſt, and cruel proceedings followed: perſecution ſallied forth with all her mercileſs attendants; and the wretched Preſbyterians, whilſt Papiſts reclined in ſecurity and at eaſe, were devoted victims to her barbarous power. The ſufferings of theſe men, which are very properly called thoſe of the church of Scotland, for ſeveral years, under this deteſtable commiſſion, in point of ſeverity, equalled, and, allowing for a Proteſtant country, perhaps exceeded thoſe inflicted by a Spaniſh inquiſition; and muſt for ever riſe in judgment againſt the infamous contriver of them.

Under ſuch a weight of calamities, we need not wonder, that in 1666 the people in the weſtern and moſt oppreſſed part of Scotland grew deſperate. They attempted to throw off the general burden; and putting themſelves, to the number of 2000, under the command of Wallace, they ſeized on Turner, who was then in that part of the kingdom, and were about to put him to death, when reading his inſtructions, and finding that even that bad man had not acted up to the full rigour of them, they generouſly ſpared him. Advancing to Pentland-hills, they were there oppoſed, on the 28th of November, by general Dalziel, whoſe ſuperiority of cavalry, in the engagement which immediately enſued, occaſioned their total defeat, Wallace, their leader eſcaping to Holland. Few were killed, Dalziel's troops taking particular care to make as many as poſſible priſoners, that they might be reſerved for the cool, and therefore more cruel, purpoſes of a future barbarity.

The council, hearing of this defeat, ſequeſtered the eſtates of all the inſurgents into the hands of the lord treaſurer. The poor wretches themſelves, who were made captive, were crouded into a narrow loathſome dungeon without light or air, where they experienced ſuch miſery, as the reader may form ſome idea of, by recollecting the ſufferings of their countrymen not many years ago in the Black Hole at India, which was a ſimilar place of confinement. Such as ſurvived their impriſonment, were brought to light only to ſuffer the moſt inhuman and excruciating torments. The circumſtances of which are thus deſcribed, and commented on, by an accurate hiſtorian:

“Their puniſhment came under the cognizance of the council; and the common queſtion was agitated, whether by their receiving quarter in the field, it was not underſtood that their lives ſhould be ſpared? It paſſed in the negative. Ten of the moſt conſiderable of the priſoners were tried, and hanged with circumſtances of ſeverity, if not injuſtice. Some of the priſoners ſuffered the inhuman torture called the Boots, which was inflicted by the leg being put into a caſe, into which wedges were gradually driven by iron hammers; and if the accuſed did not anſwer the interrogatories as his tormentors pleaſed, the bone of his leg was ſhattered to pieces, and the ſubſtance of it converted into a jelly. Nothing could be drawn from the ſufferers, but that oppreſſion and injuſtice had impelled them to take arms. Commiſſions were iſſued through all parts of the weſt for trying the priſoners; and executions became ſo frequent, that the hangmen themſelves relented, and refuſed to perform their office; and one of them even preſented a long and ſerious remonſtrance in his own vindication. Had the rebellion been unprovoked, it muſt have been inexcuſable; but the inſurgents were far from being of ſanguinary diſpoſitions, as appears from the gentle treatment they gave to Sir James Turner, one of their capital enemies. The preciſe number of the ſhocking executions cannot be aſcertained; yet they were ſo frequent as to produce from court, under the hand of Charles himſelf, an order for ſtopping them."

Archbiſhop Sharp was conſidered as the principal cauſe of theſe ſeverities: which, ſeconded by the archbiſhop of Glaſgow, he not only continued, againſt the king's expreſs order, but even propoſed to hang up every man in the kingdom who would not renounce the covenant and conform to epiſcopacy. On this report, the principal covenanters fled to Holland; but one Mitchell, who is repreſented to be a young enthuſiaſtic preacher, reſolved to aſſaſſinate the author of their diſtreſſes. He accordingly, in July 1668, diſcharged a piſtol at Sharp in his coach, who, however, received no harm; and Mitchell whom nobody offered to ſtop, walked coolly off to his lodgings, and eſcaped at that time all ſuſpicion, but two years after he was executed for the attempt.

It is ſaid, Sharp was now, in 1669, under a cloud with even his maſter Charles, though he ſoon recovered his favour, and recommenced his ſeverities. In the foregoing year, a militia had been raiſed, conſiſting of 20,000 horſe and foot, maintained by a tax on land, which, as has ſince been but too cuſtomary, was very unequally aſſeſſed. Thus ſupported, Sharp ventured to fine the magiſtrates of Edinburgh in 50l. ſterling for ſuffering a ſingle conventicle to be held in that city; and he and his brethren were employed day and night in iſſuing mandates for ſuppreſſing conventicles, and for puniſhing thoſe who frequented them.

In 1672, the earl of Lauderdale coming into play, and being veſted with great power, ſome indulgence in religious opinions was granted; but this indulgence proved more in favour of the Papiſts than the Preſbyterians. Three years afterwards, on that nobleman's decline, perſecutions were again renewed: and in the year 1676, the ſpirit of witchburning ſo prevailed, as reflected no ſmall diſgrace on the ſenſe and learning of the prelates.

Sharp, whoſe fertile genius for every thing wicked was never idle, now deviſed a ſcheme which was truly diabolical: he propoſed to iſſue commiſſions for raiſing and arming the Highlanders (excluſive of the ſtanding forces and of the militia) and of turning them looſe in all parts amongſt the covenanters, to riot at diſcretion. He gained this horrid point; and in February 1678, 6000 Highlanders marched forwards, and were particularly diſperſed over Cunningham and Kyle, where, as well as in every other place, through which they paſſed, or in which they were quartered, they committed as great outrages as if they had been in an enemy's country.

The execution of Mitchell took place about a month previous to this march. He had endured the torture with ſuch fortitude, as acquitted him by the laws of his country: but at length, the generous motives of preventing the torments of others, who were apprehended on ſuſpicion, backed by promiſe of life and limb, induced him to confeſs that he was the perſon who ſhot off the piſtol. On this repreſentation, the faithleſs and unrelenting archbiſhop repreſenting, that if Mitchell were ſuffered to eſcape with impunity, he might not only renew his attempt, but excite others to aſſiſt him; and as in that caſe his life muſt be expoſed to every villain, he inſiſted that Mitchell (notwithſtanding his pardon had been entered in the council-book) ſhould be executed, ſaying, "Let him glorify God in the graſs-market," alluding to the place where he was executed.

Mitchell's death, together with the cruelties perpetrated by the Highlanders, were reflected on with horror and deteſtation, and haſtened, in all probability, that circumſtance which Mitchell's puniſhment was intended to prevent: for, in the year following, the archbiſhop, who, according to Mr. Wodrow, was then inventing new and more violent projects, was way-laid, ſay ſome, in a journey to his dioceſe, by nine perſons (ſome of whom were men of fortune) with a prepared and determined reſolution to diſpatch him. Theſe were David Hackſtoun of Rathillet, John Balfour of Kinloch, George Balfour of Gilſtoun, James Ruſſel of King's-Kettle, Robert Dingwall, Andrew Guillan, Alexander Henderſon, Andrew Henderſon, and George Fleming, who met the archbiſhop and his daughter in a coach, on the 3d of May; and ſhouting out, "The Lord has delivered him into our hands," they then ſtopped his horſes, cut his traces, and binding his ſervants, they dragged him from his carriage, after having diſcharged their carbines at him without doing him any hurt; a circumſtance which, according to the humour of the time, was then attributed to magic; believing him to be proof againſt bullets, they aſſaulted him with their ſwords; and, regardleſs of his cries and entreaties, they executed their purpoſe in a manner barbarous indeed, but ſuch as might be expected from perſons of warm diſpoſitions, when the grand object of their hatred was in their power, and they conceived it meritorious, even in the ſight of God, to deſtroy him. Thus ſtopped in his bloody career was James Sharp, archbiſhop of St. Andrew's, between whoſe character, as well as fate, there is ſuch a ſtriking reſemblance of thoſe of cardinal Beatoun, that the parallel may eaſily be drawn by the reader.

The Preſbyterians affected in general highly to diſapprove this violent proceeding in their nine enthuſiaſtic brethren; yet, as the fact was irrevocably done, they bleſſed God, and adored his rightous providence, for the general good which they fondly imagined would reſult from this particular evil. Contrary, however, to their expectations, as it was oppoſite to juſtice, the commiſſioners ſtigmatized the whole body for this offence of a few, and on them revenged the death of this their chief member, by redoubled ſeverities. As to the actual perpetrators, it does not appear that any of them, excepting Hackſtoun, could, notwithſtanding the moſt diligent ſearch, be apprehended. Two years afterwards, this man was taken, and in a ſummary way condemned. He was ſo little fearful of death, that when, previous to his execution, his hands, according to his ſentence, were amputated, he aſked with great compoſure, if they choſe to cut off his feet: he vaulted from the ſcaffold, and after he was hanged, his heart being cut out, it was obſerved to palpitate on the knife, as ſome writers aſſert.

Thoſe covenanters who ſtill remained in the kingdom, being by the ſeverity of the government harraſſed and hunted again into rebellion, were forced once more to try their fortune in the field. Eighty of them, headed by a young preacher, one Hamilton, firſt aſſembled in arms at Rutherglen, in Clydſale. Theſe, Graham of Calverhouſe, a man who was ever forward to execute ſanguinary purpoſes, was ordered to ſuppreſs. But though he attacked them whilſt at prayers, Hamilton, whoſe forces were then augmented to thrice their original number, repulſed that able officer, killed thirty of his men, and had very nearly numbered him amongſt forty ar fifty whom they took priſoners.

The inſurgents took heart, and became more enterpriſing on this ſucceſs; and as their number daily increaſed, they at length poſſeſſed themſelves of Glaſgow: having expelled the eſtabliſhed clergy, they ſent forth a proclamation, under the name of "The oppreſſed Proteſtants, now in arms in Scotland," declaring, that they fought in defence of their religion and liberties, againſt Popery, prelacy, and the king's ſupremacy. As they committed but little diſorder, they were quietly ſuffered to aſſemble, and be joined by their brethren, that the victors might be enriched by the greater number of forfeited eſtates, as there was ſufficient force in the kingdom at any time to cruſh them.

Such an exaggerated account of their inſurrection, and of their force, was in the mean time tranſmitted to London, that Charles thought it expedient to ſend his ſon, the duke of Monmouth, into Scotland, to head his forces. He was ordered not to treat, but, to fight, with the diſſidents. He ſpeedily arrived at Edinburgh, marched againſt them at the head of the Scots guards and ſome regiments of militia, having Dalziel for his lieutenant, and encountered them at Bothwell-bridge. Unable to ſtand the fire of his artillery, Hamilton, who is ſaid to have been deficient both in courage and conduct, fled with ſeveral of his followers in great confuſion. On which, upwards of twelve hundred, without ſtriking a ſtroke, ſurrendered themſelves priſoners, and ſeven hundred were killed in the purſuit. The duke viewed his miſerable captives with an eye of compaſſion: he engaged to procure ſome mitigation of their ſufferings; three hundred were ſhipped off to America, but died in their paſſage; and ſuch as promiſed to live peaceably, notwithſtanding they might ſuffer ſome rigour under their preſent government, were diſmiſſed.

This victory was gained on the 22d of June; and Monmouth, having iſſued proclamations againſt harbouring ſuch of the diſſidents as had been in arms, and who, on his promiſe of pardon, had not ſurrendered themſelves, on the 6th of July ſet out for London. Thus terminated this inſurrection; and happy was it for the Diſſenters, that their conqueror was of a diſpoſition ſo heroic. He performed his promiſe to them, by procuring an act from his father, which was not a little in their favour; but coming through the hands of the Scots commiſſioners, they took care to clog it in ſuch a manner, as almoſt to mar it's utility. Synods and public aſſemblies, however, were now permitted; and it is thought, that Monmouth, with a view to popularity, would have intereſted himſelf greatly in the diſſenting cauſe. But the generous duke, who was the darling of the Engliſh, and greatly eſteemed by the Scots, had, ſoon after his return, incurred his majeſty's diſpleaſure. This unhappy circumſtance was ſeverely felt in Scotland, whither the duke of York, now reconciled to the king his brother, was ſent as his viceroy, towards the cloſe of the year 1679.

The character of the duke being every way oppoſite to that of Monmouth, indulgence hung her head, and under his auſpices perſecution triumphed. His highneſs ſoon called a praliament, and paſſed many acts equally unconſtitutional, inconſiſtent, and oppreſſive. One of theſe was the noted ſtatute, impoſing, on perſons in office, a teſt oath, by which they were to acknowledge the king's ſupremacy, renounce the covenant, and embrace the doctrine of paſſive obedience; notwithſtanding that, a confeſſion of faith was at the ſame time ratified, which, in ſome meaſure, inculcated maxims of lawful reſiſtance. Few eccleſiaſtics of ſenſe or decency could digeſt ſuch an abſurd act. Many, conſequently, rather than take the oath, reſigned their livings. But whilſt the creatures of the court, and their tools the biſhops, ſwallowed every abſurdity it contained, the earl of Argyle refuſed to ſubſcribe to it, any further than it was conſiſtent with itſelf and the Proteſtant religion. The duke by this was greatly diſpleaſed; and as Argyle was a man of power, and a Preſbyterian, his ruin, from that time, was reſolved on. And accordingly the good earl, in 1681, was proceeded againſt with ſuch unjuſt and ſhameful ſeverity, that merely on this account he was tried for leaſing-making and perjury, and being convicted, by a packed jury, he was condemned to die. Being reſpited, however, till the king's pleaſure ſhould be known, and underſtanding, by ſuch perſons whom he had commiſſioned to intercede with Charles in his behalf, that he was to expect neither juſtice nor mercy, he ſeized a lucky opportunity to make his eſcape, and fled to Holland.

The duke, from this time, acted in Scotland with ſuch deſpotiſm, as if he were reſolved to root up the very conſtitution. By his order, the ſolemn league and covenant was, with great formality, committed to the flames. The earl of Aberdeen, who is called the Jefferies of Scotland, was made chancellor; and agreeable to that title he acted with ſuch unrelenting ſeverity againſt Diſſenters, for two years, that during that period, their ſufferings alone form the hiſtory of the kingdom. Women with child, and with ſucking children at their breaſts, were impriſoned, and, in their confinement, ill-treated. The houſe of a father was no ſhelter for even ſtriplings, who, on the ſlighteſt miſdemeanor, were tranſported, as ſlaves, to Jamaica or America; and this puniſhment was deemed mild. Indeed it was really ſo, when compared with the ſufferings of others, who being told by ſome ignorant enthuſiaſtic preachers, that to ſay "God ſave the king," was idolatrous, were, to the number of thirty, hanged up for their refuſal. Many, unable to bear their hardſhips, abandoned their native country, and ſettled in Carolina. Whilſt others of a diſpoſition artful and vindictive, being ripe for a revolt, made uſe of this ſcheme in order to join their ſuffering friends in England, who maintained a correſpondence with Argyle in Holland. Argyle was to ſupply them with arms, and the duke of Monmouth was to furniſh them with money: but the plot, called Rye-houſe plot, in which they engaged, miſcarried; and Bailie of Jerviſwood, a man of integrity and abilities, who managed the Scots part in it, was apprehended and ſent priſoner to Scotland. But though nothing capital could be proved againſt him, it was the duke's pleaſure that he ſhould ſuffer. He was accordingly convicted of treaſon; and executed immediately after his trial, leſt, being almoſt reduced to the brink of the grave, a natural death ſhould diſappoint the duke's vengeance.

We are now come to 1685, when an univerſal anarchy ſeemed to reign in Scotland. The common people, deprived of their paſtors, who on divers pretexts were either baniſhed, impriſoned, or murdered, were plunged in a ſea of troubles: they aſſembled in many petty ſocieties, publiſhed ſeveral papers, which at that time were called treaſonable, and promulgated the doctrine of Knox. On theſe proceedings, the blood-hounds of perſecution were let looſe, and inceſſantly worried them to death.

This barbarous period will be ſufficiently characteriſed by the following order in council, which was ſtrictly executed: "It being put to the vote in council, whether or not any perſon, who owns, or does not diſown, the late traitorous declarations upon oath, whether they have arms or not, ſhould be immediately killed before two witneſſes, and the perſon or perſons who are to have inſtruction from the council for that effect? Carried in the affirmative. The lords of his majeſty's privy-council do hereby ordain any perſon, who owns, or does not diſown, the late treaſonable declarations upon oath, whether they have arms or not, to be immediately put to death; this being always done in the preſence of two witneſſes, and the perſon or perſons having commiſſion from the council for that effect."

Notwithſtanding the duke's horrid cruelties he was accompanied, on his return to England, with encomiums from the ſervile biſhops of Scotland, for his mild adminiſtration in that kingdom. But Charles well knew that this was all deceit. He ſeems at this time to have thought that it was his brother's intereſt rather to tolerate than proſecute the Preſbyterians, and that by his ſeverity he had exceeded his commiſſion.

Scotland was governed by lord Perth, in the duke's abſence. This nobleman was every day deviſing for that wretched people a freſh ſpecies of torture: he beheld their agonies with viſible ſatisfaction. The duke of York had done the ſame: but the king now ordered Perth to deſiſt, and his brother to repair back again to Scotland, call a freſh adminiſtration, and endeavour, by gentle uſage, to make the Diſſenters his friends. The duke by no means reliſhed this command, and he would fain have evaded it; but the king peremptorily ſaying, "Brother, either you muſt go or I," he began to make preparations for his journey. But before his departure, it was prevented effectually by the king's death, which happened on the 6th of February; a circumſtance which to the duke was, no doubt, extremely agreeable.

Charles had reigned over Scotland thirty-four years, and was in the 54th year of his age. A Popiſh prieſt, during his illneſs, adminiſtered to him the ſacrament: and he expired in the communion of the Romiſh church.

CHAP. IV.

James VII. the hundred and eleventh King—Cruelty of Perth—An Invaſion threatened by the Earl of Argyle—Conſequent Proclamation for defending Scotland—Caſtle of Ardkinglaſs ſeized—The Earl taken Priſoner, &c.—Papiſts preferred to vacant Offices—A Public Thankſgiving for the Queen's declared Pregnancy—James's pitiful Retreat—Himſelf and Poſterity cut off from the Crown—William and Mary offered the Crown—Their Acceptance and Coronation—Epiſcopacy exploded—Committee of the Lords of Articles aboliſhed—Viſcount of Dundee perſiſts in the Cauſe of James—Conduct of Breadalbane—Deceit and Cruelty of Campbell and his Party—Progreſs of Trade—Death of William.

THIS king never took the coronation oath, but received the crown in 1685. Officers were continued in their places, and the government flowed on in its wonted channel. Perth, in order to ingratiate himſelf with his new maſter, embraced his religion, and he marked his change of faith by freſh puniſhment of the Diſſenters. Women were not exempted from his cruelties: previous to tranſportation, they were either ſeverely whipped, or branded with hot irons; while others were inhumanly drowned.

The earl of Argyle, for the baſe uſage he had received, was now meditating revenge. Mrs. Smith, a wealthy and zealous widow in Amſterdam, had preſented him with ten thouſand pounds ſterling, to purchaſe ammunition and arms. His intended invaſion being no ſecret, a proclamation was iſſued for putting Scotland in a poſture of defence. The views of Argyle, in this invaſion, are not very clear; but whatever his ſchemes were, the ill ſucceſs of his expedition not only rendered them abortive, but deprived him of life. The earl and his followers landed at a place called Tobermore, in the iſle of Mull; from thence they proceeded to Kintyre, where his eſtate lay, and there he was joined by Sir Duncan Campbell, at the head of 1200 men. Argyle's whole force did not amount to two thouſand; and theſe ſplit and divided into ſo many diſconnected parties, that no regular plan of operation could be purſued. Rumbold, who commanded one of the regiments, ſeized the caſtle of Ardkinglaſs, where he was ſoon blocked up. Argyle, with the reſt of his forces, proceeded into the Lowlands; but being obliged to leave his magazines behind him in the caſtle of Allengreg, they to his utter ruin, fell into the hands of the earl of Dumbarton, who was following him at the head of a pretty conſiderable army. Argyle endeavoured to repair this loſs by attempting a march to Glaſgow; but being miſled by his guides, he fell in with Dumbarton. On this event, the moſt part of his followers thought only of providing for their own ſafety; and diſperſing in ſmall bodies they eſcaped imperceptibly. The poor earl, thus deſerted, quitted his horſe, and attempted to make his eſcape; but was taken priſoner, and conducted to Edinburgh, where, in a very little time, and without undergoing the formality of a ſecond trial, he was beheaded, purſuant to his former ſentence; whilſt the duke of Monmouth, experiencing the like bad ſucceſs, ſhared the ſame fate in England.

In the following year 1686, Papiſts were preferred, in both kingdoms, to vacant offices of truſt and emolument. James mightily extolled the loyalty of his Romiſh ſubjects in Scotland, and deſired, in a letter to the ſtates, that they might be allowed all poſſible indulgence; and by way of inſuring the due performance of his pleaſure, in this reſpect, the earl of Murray, who was a ſtrong one, was appointed high commiſſioner: but an event ſoon took place, which was no leſs diſagreeable to the king, than it was, in itſelf, ſudden, unexpected, and extraordinary. At a very full parliament, which met in the ſummer of this year, the members almoſt unanimouſly ſtood up in ſupport of their religious liberties. The preſs, which in the former two reigns had been carefully locked up, now regained her liberty, and ſhortly teemed with the moſt zealous performances againſt the indulgence of Papiſts: whilſt others reaſoned after the moſt daring manner in defence of the diſpenſing power. James might have baffled a few of his ſubjects, however ſenſibly and ſteadily they thwarted him; but he found it was impoſſible to carry a diſagreeable point in favour of the Papiſts, againſt an united parliament; and therefore, in order to procure any degree of eaſe for his Romiſh ſubjects in Scotland, he was obliged to tolerate all modes of religion, by aboliſhing the teſt. He performed this matter entirely in the ſtile of an abſolute monarch; for in a proclamation iſſued on the 5th of July 1687, it was ſaid, that, "The king, by his ſovereign authority, and prerogative royal, and abſolute power, ſuſpends, ſtops, and diſables, all penal and ſanguinary laws for non-conformity to the religion eſtabliſhed by law." The Preſbyterians, believing that the abolition of the teſt was principally intended for their advantage, were eager to return his majeſty an addreſs of thanks: but finding that the Papiſts gained ground every day, they ſoon changed their thoughts.

There was public thankſgiving in Scotland towards the beginning of the year 1688, on account of the queen's declared pregnancy. And news came in the ſummer, that ſhe was brought to bed of a ſon. On this occaſion, the Papiſts were tranſported with the moſt extravagant joy; whilſt, from a variety of probable and ſtrong circumſtances, the Preſbyterians, and the favourers of the prince of Orange, adopted a notion that the birth was altogether ſpurious. However that circumſtance may be, James having by this time rendered himſelf obnoxious to his Proteſtant ſubjects in both kingdoms by his tyranny, and the haſty ſteps he imprudently took to introduce Popery, an invitation was tranſmitted to the prince of Orange in Holland, to come over to England with an army, and accept the crown, which had been forfeited by James, through his unconſtitutional conduct. The prince accordingly landed in England, where he was joyfully received; and as ſoon as the important event was known in Scotland, that country rang with ſhouts of approbation. But when this intelligence was ſucceeded by an account that James had made his pitiful retreat, the joyous Scots ran riot in their expreſſions of ſatisfaction; whilſt many of the nobility and gentry inſtantly repaired to London, the populace, eager to expreſs their abhorrence of James, and his Popiſh miniſters, aſſembled in bodies, patrolled the ſtreets, and every where inſulted both Papiſts and Epiſcopalians. The earl of Perth, unable to controul their intemperance, and being apprehenſive for his own ſafety, having been compelled, on the prince of Orange's ſucceſs, to diſband the army, reſigned the great ſeal, and retired from Edinburgh; and the biſhops, more out of fear for themſelves than from any other motive, ran haſtily to London, where they chimed in with the tone of the Engliſh. The populace, thus left to themſelves, grew very riotous. The king's chapel at Holyrood-houſe, which had been fitted up in the moſt ſuperb ſtile, having been intended for a Popiſh ſeminary, was deſpoiled of all its images, ornaments, and rich furniture; and in general every houſe of note, which belonged to a Papiſt, ſhared the ſame fate. In every ſtreet his holineſs was burnt in effigy; and Down with Popery was the univerſal cry.

The nobility and gentry, who had, in the mean time poſted to London, were invited to St. James's, where the prince of Orange aſked their advice concerning the affairs of Scotland. For mature deliberation, they repaired to Whitehall, and choſe the duke of Hamilton their preſident; and it was reſolved, that the prince of Orange ſhould be invited to aſſume the reins of government in Scotland, and appoint a general meeting of the ſtates on the 14th of March. The prince received their offers in very obliging terms; and then the members of this council returned to Edinburgh. They found, on their arrival, that the duke of Gordon had poſſeſſed himſelf of the caſtle of Edinburgh in behalf of king James. They therefore proclaimed him a traitor, and beſieged the caſtle in form; but the duke had the addreſs to manage his affairs in ſuch a manner, that he obtained very favourable terms for himſelf and the whole garriſon, after a ſiege of three months.

When the Scots parliament met, they proceeded immediately to nominate a committee for ſettling the government. Eight lords, eight knights, and eight burgeſſes, were accordingly appointed to manage this great affair. In the courſe of their proceedings, no man diſtinguiſhed himſelf more than Sir John Dalrymple: who, when the throne was declared vacant, propoſed the following vote, which met with the moſt ready aſſent:

"The eſtates of the kingdom of Scotland find " and declare, that king James VII. being a pro- " feſſed Papiſt, did aſſume the royal power, and " acted as a king, without ever taking the oath re- " quired by law; and had, by the advice of evil " and wicked counſellors, invaded the fundamental " conſtitution of this kingdom, and altered it from " a legal and limited monarchy to an arbitrary deſ- " potic power; and had governed the ſame to the " ſubverſion of the Proteſtant religion, and viola- " tion of the laws and liberties of the nation, in- " verting all ends of government, whereby he had " forfeited the right of the crown, and the throne " was become vacant."

This vote having cut off James and his poſterity from any right to the crown of Scotland, an act directly paſſed for ſettling it upon king William and queen Mary. Sir John Dalrymple and Sir James Montgomery, were then deputed to make them a ſolemn tender of the crown. Thoſe gentlemen were received with great courteſy; and their majeſties accordingly took the coronation oath, though not till king William, obſerving a paſſage therein which required the extirpation of Papiſts, and other enemies to the true worſhip of God, had declared, to his immortal honour, that, being averſe to perſecution, he took the oath in no ſenſe which might ſubject himſelf to promote, encourage, or even countenance it.

On the coronation of William and Mary, in 1689, the king proceeded to ſettle the adminiſtration of Scotland; and the parliament which met on the 17th of June, took under conſideration, in the firſt place, the ſettlement of the church.

It was voted, "That prelacy and ſuperiority of " any office in the church, above Preſbyters, is, " and has been a great and inſupportable grievance " and trouble to this nation, and contrary to the " inclination of the generality of the people ever " ſince the reformation, and therefore it ought to " be aboliſhed."

Epiſcopacy in Scotland, was thus finally exploded; though it is ſaid, that the re-eſtabliſhment of Preſbytery was attended, at firſt, with the moſt terrible abuſes. The old epiſcopal miniſters were not barely deprived of their livings, but are ſaid to have been driven with their wives and children into the fields, where many of them, through a cruel and unjuſtifiable negligence, periſhed by cold and hunger.

The affairs of religion being thus ſettled, the parliament totally aboliſhed that infamous committee called the Lords of Articles; and, in fine, rectified ſeparately every abuſe which had been permitted in the two preceding reigns.

Though William was, in 1690, firmly eſtabliſhed on the throne of Scotland, yet the viſcount of Dundee perſiſted in the cauſe of the abdicated James: retiring to the Highlands, he ſummoned the clans to join him, and entered Lochabar at the head of two thouſand men. James had ſpurred on this nobleman, by the promiſe of a numerous reinforcement from Ireland, where he then was; inſtead of which, Dundee only received about three hundred naked recruits. Mean time, general Mackay advanced with William's forces as far as the paſs of Killikrankie; and the viſcount, notwithſtanding his diſappointment, determined to attack him; which he did with ſuch vigour, ſword in hand, that Mackay's troops gave way, and were totally defeated. But as the victory was purchaſed with the loſs of the viſcount himſelf, who fell by a random ſhot as he was giving orders about the purſuit, the rebels upon the loſs of their leader, made no proper uſe of their good fortune, but, as is uſual with mercenaries, buſied themſelves wholly in plunder. Shortly afterwards, however, theſe Highlanders were headed by Sir Hugh Cameron of Lochiel, who attempted to ſurpriſe Inverneſs; after which he marched to Strathſpey in the county of Murray, where he received ſome ammunition, clothes, and arms, which James, in two frigates, had ſent from Dublin, under the care of colonel Buchan, who had orders to command what forces could be raiſed in his name. But Buchan had ſcarcely joined Cameron, and put himſelf at the head of his Highlanders, ere a Dutch colonel of the name of Levingſton, with about three thouſand men, attacked and defeated them at a place called Cromdell. Levingſton having received no orders to make the moſt of victory, all the Highlanders, excepting about four hundred, who were either killed or taken priſoners, were allowed to retire without purſuit; and though ſome time afterwards they were promiſed a pardon by king William, if they would conform to his government, they refuſed the offer at the inſtigation of Cameron, who would never treat, he ſaid, with the prince of Orange, as he ſtiled him.

William pitied the miſtaken notions of theſe people, and was exceedingly willing to procure their allegiance; which the earl of Breadalbane, in 1694, undertook to effect, provided he was furniſhed with 15,000 pounds. The earl accordingly received the money, and he intended to have parcelled it out among the heads of the Highland clans; but he ſoon found that he had engaged for more than it was in his power to perform. Cameron indeed promiſed to acknowledge the king's authority and live peaceably; but though military execution was denounced againſt ſuch as would not take the oaths before the cloſe of the year, Macdonald of Glencoe refuſed to ſubmit. Breadalbane, piqued at the inefficacy of his ſcheme, and particularly exaſperated againſt Macdonald, who, beſides his refuſal, had committed ſome depredations on his eſtates, repreſented the obſtinacy of this Jacobite in ſuch ſtrong terms, that orders came from king William to puniſh him and his tenants as by proclamation had been threatened.

A fair opportunity now offering, Breadalbane was reſolved not to let it ſlip, in order to glut his vengeance; and the king, being ignorant of Macdonald's ſubmiſſion, which, by an unlucky incident, was not made till the laſt day of December, when the time ſpecified in the proclamation was elapſed, captain Campbell of Glenlyen was ordered to march, in 1692, with a body of troops into the valley of Glencoe to inflict the puniſhment which had been threatened, but under pretence of collecting the land-tax. When they arrived, Macdonald aſked whether they were to be greeted as friends or enemies; and Campbell declaring that they came as friends, the old Highlander took him into his own houſe, where he was treated with the moſt cordial hoſpitality. The inhabitants in general threw aſide their firſt ſuſpicions, and loaded their viſitors with repeated tokens of friendſhip, little ſuſpecting that theſe very men were ſhortly to butcher them, being charged with ſtrict orders to ſecure all the paſſes in the valley, ſo that none might eſcape, and that no priſoners ſhould be made, that the execution might be as terrible as poſſible. Old Macdonald was ſhot through the head in the arms of his lady, who died dilirious the next day. The laird of Auchintrincken, who was then viſiting that family, was piſtolled without heſitation, though he had taken the oaths three months, and carried about him a protection from the government; and one Drummond, a ſubaltern officer, clove the ſkull of a boy not eight years old, whilſt imploring his mercy, embracing his knees, and offering to ſerve him for life. In fine, about forty perſons were inhumanly ſacrificed, and chiefly in their bed; but the paſſes not being properly ſecured, upwards of one hundred and fifty eſcaped. Before morning, the village, by Campbell's direction, was ſet on fire; and though the orders which had been given to this wretch did not extend to the death of females and children, yet being driven out naked into the deep ſnow, which then covered the ground, many died before they could reach any habitable place, which was at leaſt ſix miles from the valley. This bloody tragedy ſullied the character of king William, who ſcreened the actors of it from public reſentment; and in all probability, it ſowed the ſeeds of thoſe two rebellions which ſprung up in 1715 and 1745. But Johnſton, the king's ſecretary, managed matters ſo dexterouſly, as to prevent them at this time from coming to extremity. On the contrary, every thing in an enſuing parliament went on very ſmoothly. His majeſty was voted a ſupply of above one hundred and fifty thouſand pounds ſterling; ſix regiments were added to the ſtanding force of the kingdom, and many recruits were raiſed for the royal navy.

In 1693, the Scots being eaſy, ſecure, and freed from the thraldom of religious perſecution, began to reflect on the advantages of trade. All ranks of people deviſed ſchemes of commerce. In particular, one Paterſon, who had noted the oppoſition which the Eaſt-India company in England had met with in obtaining their charter, propoſed the inſtitution of a Scots company, which ſhould trade to Africa and the Indies.

As Paterſon's ſcheme was plauſible, ſhares in this company were coveted with the utmoſt avidity. The parliament had granted it their ſanction, and eſtabliſhed in 1695 a national bank, which ſtill continues. 300,000 pounds were ſubſcribed in England, and 200,000 pounds were offered by the merchants of Hamburgh. Matters thus went on very favourably; but a ſevere famine, which ſubſiſted in Scotland for two years, hindered the adventurers from embarking for Darien, where it was propoſed to ſettle the factory, till the year 1698. They then ſet ſail from the Frith of Forth on the 17th of July, and in a number of ſhips, manned with 1200 ſailors and ſoldiers, laden with proper kinds of merchandize, together with artillery and military ſtores, ſteering their courſe round the Orkney Iſles, they took in ſome proviſions at Madeira, and proceeded directly for the Iſthmus of Darien, where they took poſſeſſion of an harbour near Golden-Iſland, in which it was declared, that neither Spain, nor any other power, had any concern. But ſeveral trading companies in different kingdoms having united to oppoſe them, and applied to king William for that purpoſe, particularly the Spaniards, French, and Dutch, and the governors of the Weſt-India iſlands having received orders for the inhabitants to hold no intercourſe with the Scots ſettlers, they were obliged to abandon their project in 1699. The news of which, when it reached Scotland, threw the kingdom into the utmoſt diſtreſs; for the Scots had exhauſted all their wealth and credit in the undertaking: ſo that thouſands of families were reduced nearly to a ſtate of beggary.

In 1700, the Jacobites in Scotland imagined that they had good cauſe for exultation. The death of the duke of Glouceſter, which happened on the 29th of July, removed, as they imagined, the only bar to the intereſt of the prince of Wales. That faction, therefore, grew eager, vigilant, and enterpriſing; and, indeed, affairs in England wore about this time ſuch a melancholy aſpect, that, if the abdicated king would have ſuffered his ſon to have receded from ſtrict Popery in matters of religion, it has been thought, that an inſurrection in his favour, and, in the end, a revolution, would have taken place. King William, not inſenſible how unpopular he was, thought fit to order a parliament in Scotland (which met on the 28th of October) conſtituting the duke of Queenſbury high commiſſioner. In this parliament, the miniſters and their agents ſtirred themſelves ſo ſucceſsfully, that the king's intereſt gained much ground. It was declared, that the ſafety and happineſs of the people of Scotland depended, under God, upon the preſervation of his majeſty's government and Proteſtant ſucceſſion; to maintain which, they paſſed an act for keeping on foot three thouſand men, for two years, to be maintained by a land-tax. King William expreſſed a due ſenſe of the loyal proceedings of this parliament; and the earl of Argyle was honoured with the title of duke, for having concurred with the high commiſſioner in the management of this ſeſſion. Theſe proceedings, added to the ſettlement of the crown of Great-Britain, which was made the following year upon the princeſs Sophia, electoreſs of Hanover, rendered the death of James, which happened at St. Germain's on the 16th of September following, as well as the proclamation of his pretended ſon in France, as king of England, of no avail.

A very important project, which William, ever ſince his ſucceſſion to the crown, ſeems to have had at heart, has not yet been diſcloſed. It was an union of his two kingdoms; which having before warmly recommended to the ſerious conſideration of his parliament, he appears this year to have endeavoured to accompliſh. He had made great arrangement for this important end, and was proceeding with the utmoſt ſpirit, when death diverted his purpoſe, and called him to an union with the bleſſed.

This excellent prince left the world on the 8th of March 1702, in the fifty-ſecond year of his age, having worn his earthly crown thirteen years; during which, with a character formed of as many great and good qualities, and ſhaded by as few blemiſhes as perhaps are incident to humanity, he was doubtleſs a glorious inſtrument in the hand of Providence to reſcue theſe realms from the ſlaviſh yoke of Popery, and it's conſtant attendant, arbitrary power.

CHAP. V.

Conſequences of the Death of William II—An Oppoſition—Six Acts paſſed—Propoſals for an Union—Sudden Diſputes—Two Bills carried againſt the Court—Duplicity of Fraſer—His Confinement—Reſolutions formed—Articles of the Union between Scotland and England.

THE death of William II. operated differently on the various parties, which at this time ſubſiſted in Scotland. The pretender's party entertained ſuch miſtaken notions of his ſucceſſor, that to place their young maſter on the throne in her ſtead, was conceived to be a matter eaſily practicable. The Preſbyterians, who had alſo imbibed ideas equally falſe, were ſeized with a panic; but happily for the whole kingdom, the bold conjectures of the one were as futile as the apprehenſions of the other were alarming and diſmal.

The duke of Queenſbury, the earls of Marchmont, Melvil, Seafield, Hyndford, and Selkirk, of whom the Scots miniſtry conſiſted, was a knot of ſtaunch revolutioniſts. Immediately on the notice of king William's deceaſe, they aſſembled at the croſs of Edinburgh, and with the uſual ſolemnity proclaimed the princeſs Anne of Denmark, who had already taken the coronation oath in the preſence of twelve Scots counſellors. Her firſt expreſs into Scotland, after theſe proceedings, continued the old parliament, and confirmed the duke of Queenſbury in his office of high commiſſioner. But the Jacobites, eager to diſturb the peace of their country, declared, that this convention parliament, which had continued thro' king William's whole reign, was by his death diſſolved, and that it became neceſſary to call a new one.

This oppoſition was headed by the duke of Hamilton, who was joined, among others, by the marquis of Tweedale, and the earls of Mareſchall and Rothes; ſo that when the parliament met on the 9th of June, they objected to it's legality; and having entered a formal proteſt againſt all it's proceedings, they withdrew, and were accompanied by ſeventy-ſix members. In the mean time, adminiſtation conducted the requiſite meaſures for the eſtabliſhment of their own legality, dignity, and power, with cool circumſpection, and with a ſteady vigour. They expelled Sir Alexander Bruce, for uſing ſevere expreſſions againſt Preſbytery, and then paſſed the ſix acts which follow.

For recognizing her majeſty's royal authority.

For adjourning the court of ſeſſion.

For the legality of their preſent meeting.

For the ſecurity of the Proteſtant religion, and Preſbyterian church-government.

For a land-tax.

And the laſt act enabled the queen to appoint commiſſioners, who ſhould meet in order to conſult about a union of the two kingdoms, as her majeſty had earneſtly recommended that important object to their conſideration.

All theſe acts were naturally diſagreeable to the ſeceders, who reſolved to ſend a remonſtrance to the queen, which they accordingly drew up; but the lord Balantyre their agent was refuſed an audience; and in Scotland the dean and faculty of advocates were proſecuted by the lord advocate, for having, by a vote amongſt themſelves, approved of the ſeceſſion. The ſeceders were thus gradually falling into contempt, when the queen nominated twenty-three Engliſh, and twenty Scots, of the firſt rank and fortune in both kingdoms, as commiſſioners to treat on an union; and they met on the 22d day of October, at the Cockpit, near Whitehall. On the 20th of the next month, they proceeded to adjuſt preliminaries, which imported, "That nothing agreed on among themſelves ſhould be binding, except ratified by her majeſty and the reſpective parliaments of both nations; and that unleſs all the heads propoſed for the treaty were agreed to, no particular thing agreed on ſhould be binding."

The firſt propoſal, and which was the baſis of all the ſucceeding negotiations, was, "That both nations ſhould be united in one monarchy, and one parliament, with a mutual communication of trade and privileges."

The lord keeper of the great ſeal of England amended this propoſal, and moved, "That the two kingdoms ſhould be inſeparably united into one monarchy, under her majeſty, and her heirs and ſucceſſors, and under the ſame limitations according to the act of ſettlement."

To quicken their councils, the queen paid a viſit to the commiſſioners on the 14th of December 1702. But whilſt matters were accelerating with mutual harmony, an unlucky mention of the Darien company gave birth to ſuch diſputes, as put an end to all further proceedings of this commiſſion. On this unhappy diſagreement, the queen piqued by the ſuppoſition that ſhe had been impoſed upon, changed the Scots miniſtry the following year.

On the 6th of May a parliament aſſembled; and the duke of Queenſbury, who ſtill maintained his poſt of high commiſſioner, acted ſo artfully in conjunction with the new miniſtry, that even the Jacobites in general found it needleſs to oppoſe his meaſures, but joined the revolutioniſts in voting for a ſupply. Purſuant to an act of indemnity which her majeſty had iſſued, previous to the meeting ing of this parliament, many diſaffected members returned home, and a coalition, at leaſt in appearance, took place between both parties for ſome time.

Two bills of the greateſt importance were, in conſequence of this unanimity, carried againſt the court. The firſt imported "That after the queen's deceaſe, without heirs of her body, no perſon, at the ſame time king or queen of Scotland and England, ſhould have the ſole power of making war with any prince, ſtate, or potentate, whatſoever, without conſent of parliament." The ſecond was intended to circumſcribe the prerogative: it was called an Act of Security, which occaſioned much altercation in parliament, and ſuch diſturbance in the city, that the guards were kept in readineſs to ſuppreſs any inſurrection which might enſue, and to protect the high commiſſioner, who had refuſed the royal aſſent.

Mr. Fletcher, of Salton, greatly diſtinguiſhed himſelf during theſe commotions in parliament. Moſt part of this extraordinary man's life had been ſpent in Holland with the earl of Argyle, and the duke of Monmouth: his principles were thoroughly republican; and he poſſeſſed conſummate abilities, undaunted courage, and inflexible integrity: he planned both the late acts; and having obſerved that the nation muſt be enſlaved ſhould it either willingly, or by commiſſion, ſubmit to the ſucceſſor of England, without ſuch ſtipulations as ſhould ſecure their independency, he boldly declared, that for his own part, he would rather join in the nomination of ſome bigoted Papiſt, under thoſe conditions, than to the trueſt Proteſtant, if they muſt be diſpenſed with. But Fletcher (who in the courſe of this ſeſſion, propoſed many patriotic bills) was told by the lord chancellor, with great truth and frankneſs, that his ſchemes were adapted to a commonwealth, and were inconſiſtent, and therefore uſeleſs, under a monarchy. In ſhort, the commiſſioner, who had hampered himſelf by his over politic compliance with the Jacobites, not knowing rightly how to act at this delicate juncture, prorogued the parliament to the 12th of October.

In 1704, during the receſs, an odd kind of plot was diſcovered to have been conducted by Simon Fraſer, the ſame man, who, when lord Lovat, ſuffered on Tower-hill at London, for having a chief hand in the rebellion of 1745. Fraſer had neither fortune nor principle, having been outlawed for raviſhing a ſiſter of the marquis of Athol. Thus abandoned, he repaired to the court of St. Germain's, where he inſinuated, that if the French king would furniſh him with officers, ammunition, and money, he would raiſe ſuch a body of troops in favour of the pretender, as might be ſufficient to place him on the throne of Great Britain. Lewis ſeemed to promiſe him his aſſiſtance; but Fraſer's character was ſo infamous, that though he was ſent back into Scotland, to uſe his intereſt amongſt the clans, two perſons were ſent along with him to judge of his connections with the Jacobite nobility, and to report back to France how far he was to be depended on. Fraſer, mean while, diſcloſed the affair to the duke of Queenſbury; and as he pretended that what he had done was merely to ſound the French king, for the ſecurity of queen Anne's government, the duke encouraged him in holding a correſpondence with the Jacobites. On the other hand, when he returned into France, he changed his ſtory, and deſired leave of Lewis XIV. to maintain a connection with the Scots Proteſtants for the ſervice of the pretender. But the French king had received ſuch accounts from his agents, as led him to conclude, with great juſtice, that Fraſer was the ſpy of both parties, and was endeavouring to recover his ſhattered fortune, by declaring himſelf to be by turns a friend to each, at the ſame time that in reality he was well affected to neither. In conſequence of this opinion, Lewis put an effectual ſtop to his intrigues, by clapping him into the Baſtile, where he was confined ſeveral years.

The affair being publiſhed in Scotland, the duke of Queenſbury, though he had diſcloſed the motives of his conduct, which were in general ſatisfactory, was thought, by having given ſo much countenance to that abandoned outlaw, to have been the pretender's friend: he therefore loſt his poſt of high commiſſioner, which was conferred on the marquis of Tweedale.

On the 6th of July, the parliament met after the prorogation; and proceeded, in the firſt place, to ſettle the ſucceſſion. The earl of Machmont paſſed an act for excluding any Popiſh ſucceſſor; but this motion, though highly conſtitutional, was objected to, and violent heats between the court and the country party ſucceeded. At laſt an expedient was offered by Sir James Falconer of Pheſdo, which, when put to the vote, met mith a general aſſent. In conſequence thereof, it was reſolved,

"That the parliament would not proceed to nominate a ſucceſſor, until a previous treaty with England, reſpecting commerce and other matters, ſhould be diſcuſſed; and that it would make the neceſſary limitations and conditions of government, before the ſucceſſor ſhould be nominated."

A ſupply was however granted; and they confirmed the act of ſecurity, which provided, "That in caſe the queen ſhould die without iſſue, a parliament ſhould immediately meet and declare the ſucceſſor to the crown, different from the perſon poſſeſſing the throne of England, unleſs before that period a ſettlement ſhould be made in parliament, of the rights and liberties of the nation independent on Engliſh councils." And they were impowered, by a clauſe in it, to arm the ſubjects, and put them into diſcipline for the defence of the kingdom. The whole vote, but eſpecially this clauſe, which the Engliſh interpreted to be a prelude to hoſtilities, was ſo reſented by their parliament, that, on the 11th of January following, a grand committee, appointed to conſider of the ſtate of the nation with regard to Scotland, came to ſome reſolutions for a bill, which was ſtrongly urged to be paſſed for the ſecurity of the kingdom of England. By which reſolutions the Engliſh took up the indeciſion of the Scots parliament with a very high hand, and were determined to ſhut up all connections of commerce, unleſs the long-deſired union could be effected. In the mean while, the marquis of Tweedale was laid aſide; and the duke of Argyle, a moſt promiſing young nobleman, was, in 1705, appointed high commiſſioner in his room. On this, Tweedale joined his friends, who had been removed along with him, and formed a party under the name of the Flying Squadron. This party, though it owed it's riſe to Tweedale's diſmiſſion, was deſirous to diſtinguiſh itſelf as a knot of independent patriots. And as not one of the members was a Jacobite, they ſupported the appearance with ſome propriety, and, though it was not their intention, greatly facilitated the union; for as they joined the Jacobites, who violently oppoſed it, the conſiderate and unprejudiced part of the kingdom concluded, that an union muſt be effected to ſave the honour of the nation, and alſo from a war, and probably an introduction of the pretender. The neceſſity of an union, therefore, appeared daily more apparent. It was wiſely thought to be a chimerical and impracticable ſcheme for one ſovereign to govern two ſeparate, independent nations, differing as much from each other in laws and intereſts, as in genius and purſuits; unleſs ſtanding armies, like thoſe of Charles II. and his brother, were always maintained to enforce due obedience.

As the revival of ſuch military government was much dreaded, the parliament proceeded in good earneſt to ſettle this deſirable treaty. They met in autumn; and the duke of Hamilton propoſed, that the act for the union ſhould have a clauſe, importing, "That it ſhould no ways derogate from any fundamental laws, ancient privileges, offices, rights, liberties, and dignities of the Scots nation." But this motion was overruled. At length, after much altercation, and violent oppoſition from the republican genius of Fletcher, the act for the treaty of union was completed; and to the amazement of the Jacobites, the duke of Hamilton himſelf moved (and, being put to the vote, it was carried in the affirmative) that the queen ſhould again appoint commiſſioners. This weighty point being finiſhed, a ſupply of fifty thouſand pounds ſterling was voted, and then the parliament adjourned.

No ſooner was the queen appriſed of the reſolves of the Scots parliament, than ſhe removed, in 1706, the marquis of Annandale from his office of ſecretary of ſtate, to that of lord preſident of the council, and ſupplied the place by the earl of Mar. She then appointed proper perſons to be commiſſioners for England and Scotland, who aſſembled again at the Cockpit on the 16th day of April. Preliminaries were adjuſted in much the ſame manner as they had been on the ſame occaſion four years before, which were agreed to by the Scots commiſſioners. A fœderal and not an incorporated union was the aim of every one of them, except the duke of Queenſbury, when they firſt aſſembled: but the Engliſh commiſſioners declaring themſelves ſo fully convinced that nothing but an entire union would ſettle a perfect and laſting friendſhip between the two kingdoms, the other Scots commiſſioners, for the good of their country, concurred with the duke of Queenſbury.

The queen paid them two viſits; and they proceeded with ſuch diligence, that by the 22d of July, the articles of this famous treaty were finiſhed, ingroſſed, and executed, by every commiſſioner, except Lockhart of Carnwath, who could never be prevailed upon to ſign or ſeal it. The day following, the lord keeper, in the name of the Engliſh, preſented the important inſtrument to her majeſty, at the palace of St. James's: a ſealed duplicate was alſo delivered by the lord chancellor of Scotland; the queen received them with the higheſt ſatisfaction, and made a gracious reply to a ſhort ſpeech made on the occaſion by each commiſſioner.

We ſhall here, in order to make this new Hiſtory of Scotland more complete and valuable than any other work of the kind, preſent our readers with a correct copy of the Articles of the Union between Scotland and England.

ARTICLES of the UNION

Between SCOTLAND and ENGLAND.

" I. THAT the two kingdoms of Scotland and England ſhall, from the 1ſt of May 1707, be united into one kingdom, by the name of Great-Britain; and that the enſigns armorial of the ſaid united kingdoms be ſuch as her majeſty ſhall appoint; and the croſſes of St. Andrew and St. George be conjoined in ſuch a manner as her majeſty ſhall think fit, and uſed in all flags, banners, ſtandards, and enſigns, both by ſea and land.

" II. That the ſucceſſion to the united monarchy of Great-Britain ſhall be to the princeſs Sophia and her heirs; and that all Papiſts, or perſons that marry Papiſts, ſhall be for ever excluded from inheriting the imperial crown of Great-Britain, agreeable to the proviſion for the deſcent of the crown of England, made in the firſt year of the reign of their late majeſties king William and queen Mary, entitled, "An act for declaring the rights and liberties of the ſubject," &c.

" III. That the united kingdoms of Great-Britain ſhall be repreſented by one and the ſame parliament, to be ſtiled the Parliament of Great-Britain.

" IV. That the ſubjects of the united kingdoms ſhall have freedom of trade and navigation to all places within the ſame, and plantations belonging to it; and that there be a communication of all other rights, privileges, and advantages, except where it is otherwiſe expreſsly agreed in theſe articles.

" V. That all ſhips or veſſels belonging to the Scots, at the time of ratifying the treaty of Union of the two kingdoms in the parliament of Scotland, ſhall be deemed Britiſh built, the owners making oath that, at the time of ratifying the treaty of Union in the parliament of Scotland, the ſame did, in the whole, or in part, belong to them.

" VI. All parts of the united kingdom to be under the ſame regulations of trade, and liable to the ſame cuſtoms and duties, excepting and reſerving the duties upon export and import of ſuch particular commodities, from which any perſons, the ſubjects of either kingdom, are eſpecially liberated and exempted by their private rights, which, after the Union, are to remain ſafe and entire to them in all reſpects as before the ſame; and that from and after the Union, no Scots cattle carried into England ſhall be liable to any other duties, either on the public or private accounts, than thoſe duties to which the cattle of England are or ſhall be liable within the ſaid kingdom; and ſeeing by the laws of England there are rewards granted upon the exportation of certain kinds of grain, wherein oats grinded or ungrinded are not expreſſed, that from and after the Union, when oats ſhall be ſold for 15s. ſterling per qr. or under, there ſhall be paid 2s. 6d. ſterling for every quarter of the oatmeal exported, in the terms of the law, whereby, and ſo long as, rewards are granted for the exportation of other grains; and that the beer of Scotland have the ſame reward as barley: and in reſpect the importation of victual into Scotland would prove a diſcouragement to tillage; therefore that the prohibition, as now in force by the law of Scotland, againſt importation of victual from Ireland, or any other place beyond ſea, into Scotland, do after the Union remain in the ſame force as now it is, until more proper and effectual ways be provided by the parliament of Great-Britain for the diſcouraging the importation of the ſaid victual from beyond ſea.

" VII. That all parts of the united kingdom be liable to the ſame exciſes upon all exciſeable liquors, excepting only that the 34 gallons Engliſh barrel of beer or ale, amounting to 12 gallons Scots preſent meaſure, ſold in Scotland by the brewer at 9s. 6d. ſterling, excluding all duties, and retailed, including duties and the retailer's profit, at 2d. the Scots pint, or eighth part of the Scots gallon, be not after the Union liable, on account of the preſent exciſe upon exciſeable liquors in England, to any higher impoſition than 2s. ſterling upon the aforeſaid 34 gallons Engliſh barrel, being 12 gallons the preſent Scots meaſure.

"VIII. Foreign ſalt in England ſhall pay the ſame duty as in Scotland: but in regard that the duties of great quantities of foreign ſalt imported, may be very heavy upon the merchant importer; that therefore all foreign ſalt imported into Scotland ſhall be cellared and locked up under the care of the merchant importer, and the officers employed for levying the duties on ſalt: and that the merchant may have what quantities thereof his occaſions may require, not under a weight of 40 buſhels at a time, upon his giving ſecurity for the duty of what quantities he receives, payable in 6 months. That ſalt made in Scotland ſhall be exempted for 7 years from the Engliſh duty; but from the expiration of the ſaid 7 years, ſhall be ſubject to the ſame duties as ſalt made in England: that Scotland ſhall, after the ſaid 7 years, remain exempted from the duty of 2s. 4d. per buſhel on home ſalt, impoſed by an act made in England in the ninth and tenth of king William III. of England: and if the parliament of Great-Britain ſhall, at or before the expiring of the ſaid 7 years, ſubſtitute any other fund in the place of the ſaid 2s. 4d. of exciſe upon the buſhel of home ſalt, Scotland ſhall, after the ſaid 7 years, bear a proportion of the ſaid fund, and have equivalent in the terms of this treaty. No ſalt whatſoever ſhall be brought from Scotland to England by land in any manner, under certain penalties denounced. All fleſh exported from Scotland to England, and ſhipped in Scotland to be exported beyond ſea; and proviſions for ſhips in Scotland and foreign voyages, may be ſalted with Scots ſalt, paying the ſame duty for what ſalt is ſo employed, as the like quantity of ſuch ſalt pays in England, and under the ſame penalties, forfeitures, and proviſions, for preventing of frauds, as are mentioned in the laws of England. And that, for the encouragement of the herring fiſhery, there ſhall be allowed and paid to the ſubjects, inhabitants of Great-Britain, during the preſent allowances for other fiſhes, 10s. 5d. ſterling for every barrel of white herring that ſhall be exported from Scotland; and that they ſhall be allowed 5s. ſterling for every barrel of beef or pork ſalted with foreign ſalt, without mixture of Britiſh or Iriſh ſalts, and exported for ſale from Scotland to parts beyond ſea; alterable by the parliament of Great-Britain.

" IX. That whenever the ſum of 1,997,763l. 8s. 4½. ſhall be enacted by the parliament of Great-Britain on land, that part of the united kingdom, now called Scotland, ſhall be charged with the additional ſum of 48,000l. as the quota of Scotland for ſuch tax, and ſo proportionably for any greater or leſſer ſum raiſed in England on land; the ſaid quota to be aſſeſſed in the ſame manner as the ceſs now is in Scotland, but ſubject to ſuch regulations as ſhall be made in the parliament of Great-Britain.

" X. That Scotland ſhall not be charged with the ſtamp duties now in force in England.

" XI. Nor with the duties payable in England on windows.

" XII. Nor thoſe on coals and culm.

" XIII. Scotland ſhall not pay the malt duties during its continuance in England. (This was to expire the 24th of June 1707.)

" XIV. Scotland ſhall not be charged with any other duties impoſed by the parliament of England before the Union, except thoſe conſented to in this treaty; and if the parliament of England, in their proviſion for the ſervice of the year 1707, ſhall impoſe any further cuſtoms, Scotland ſhall have an equivalent for the ſhare thereof they may be liable to; and Scotland ſhall not be charged with any impoſition on malt made or conſumed in that kingdom during this war.

" XV. Whereas, by the terms of this treaty, the ſubjects of Scotland, for preſerving an equality of trade throughout the united kingdoms, will be liable to ſeveral cuſtoms and exciſes now payable in England, which will be applicable towards payment of the debts of England contracted before the Union, it is agreed, that an equivalent ſhall be anſwered to Scotland for ſuch part of the Engliſh debts, as Scotland may hereafter become liable to by reaſon of the Union, other than ſuch for which appropriations have been made by parliament in England, of the cuſtoms and other duties on exports and imports, exciſes on all exciſeable liquors, in reſpect of which the debts equivalent are herein before provided; which equivalent is herein ſtipulated to be 398,085l. 10s. ſterling, to be granted by the parliament of England, in the manner as in this article is particularly and at large explained.

" XVI. That the coin be of the ſame ſtandard throughout the united kingdom as now in England, and a mint to be continued in Scotland, under the ſame rule as the mint in England; and the preſent officers of that mint be continued.

" XVII. That the ſame weights and meaſures be uſed throughout the united kingdom as are now uſed in England; and ſtandards ſhall be kept in burghs, agreeable to the ſtandard of the Engliſh exchequer.

" XVIII. That the laws for the regulation of trade, cuſtom, and ſuch exciſes which Scotland is to be liable to, ſhall be the ſame as thoſe in England; other laws in Scotland to remain as before the Union, but alterable by the parliament of Great-Britain. Laws which concern public right, policy, and civil government, may be the ſame throughout the united kingdom; but no alteration ſhall be made in the laws which concern private right, except for evident utility of the ſubjects of Scotland.

" XIX. The courts of ſeſſion, and other courts, ſhall remain in Scotland the ſame as before the Union, ſubject nevertheleſs to ſuch regulations, for the better adminiſtration of public juſtice, as ſhall be made by the parliament of Great-Britain; and that hereafter none ſhall be named by her majeſty, and her royal ſucceſſors, to be ordinary lords of ſeſſion, but ſuch who have ſerved in the college of juſtice as advocates, or principal clerks of ſeſſion for the ſpace of 5 years, or as writers to the ſignet for the ſpace of 10 years, with this proviſion, that no writer to the ſignet be capable to be admitted a lord of the ſeſſion, unleſs he undergo a private and public trial on the civil law before the faculty of advocates, and be found by them qualified for the ſaid office, 2 years before he be named to be a lord of the ſeſſion; yet ſo as the qualification made, or to be made, for capacitating perſons to be made ordinary lords of the ſeſſion, may be altered by the parliament of Great-Britain, &c.

" XX. That all heritable offices, ſuperiorities, heritable juriſdictions, offices for life, and juriſdictions for life, be reſerved for the owners thereof, as rights of property, in the ſame manner as they are now enjoyed by the laws of Scotland; this treaty in any wiſe notwithſtanding.

" XXI. The rights and privileges of the royal boroughs in Scotland, as they now are, ſhall remain entire after the Union, and notwithſtanding thereof.

" XXII. That by virtue of this treaty, 16 of the peers of Scotland, at the time of the Union, ſhall ſit and vote in the houſe of lords, and 45 members of the repreſentatives of Scotland, in the houſe of commons, of the parliament of Great-Britain; the choice whereof to be according to the act paſſed in Scotland for that purpoſe, which act is hereby declared to be as valid as if it were a part of, and engroſſed in this treaty: and in caſe her majeſty ſhall, on the 1ſt of May 1707, declare this preſent parliament to be the firſt of Great-Britain, the preſent parliament of England may be ſo on the part of England, and the 16 peers and the 45 commoners to ſit with them, ſuch parliament to continue no longer than the Engliſh parliament by law is allowed to continue.

" XXIII. That the aforeſaid 16 peers of Scotland mentioned in the laſt preceding article, to ſit in the houſe of lords of the parliament of Great-Britain, ſhall have all the privileges of parliament which the peers of England now have, and which they, or any peers of Great-Britain, ſhall have after the Union, and particularly the right of ſitting upon the trial of peers; and that all peers of Scotland, and their ſucceſſors to their honours and dignities, ſhall, from and after the Union, be peers of Great-Britain, and have rank and precedency next and immediately after the peers, and the orders and degrees in England at the time of the Union, and before all peers of Great-Britain of the like orders and degrees, who may be created after the Union.

"XXIV. That from and after the Union, there ſhall be one great ſeal for the united kingdom of Great-Britain, which ſhall be different from the great ſeal now uſed in either kingdom: and that the quarter of the arms, and the rank of the precedency of Lyon, king at arms, of the kingdom of Scotland, as may beſt ſuit the Union, be left to her majeſty; and that the privy ſeal, ſignet, caſſet, &c. now uſed in Scotland, be continued; but that the ſaid ſeals be delivered and adapted to the Union, as her majeſty ſhall think fit: that the crown, ſceptre, and ſword of ſtate, the records of parliament, and all other records, rolls, and regiſters whatſoever, both public and private, general and particular, and warrants thereof, continue to be kept as they are, within that part of the kingdom called Scotland, and that they ſhall ſo remain in all time coming, notwithſtanding the Union.

"XXV. That all laws and ſtatutes in either kingdom, ſo far as they are contrary to, or inconſiſtent with, the terms of theſe articles, or any of them, ſhall, from and after the Union, cloſe, and become void, and ſhall be ſo declared to be by the reſpective parliaments of the ſaid kingdoms."

Such is the tenor of that treaty, which had the public faith alone for its guarantee, and that deſtroyed the independency of each kingdom upon the other, but opened a channel through which a greater tide of ſplendor, power, and opulence, has flowed into Great-Britain, than could ever have been beheld by the natives of England and Scotland when diſunited.

Notwithſtanding theſe unanimous proceedings at London, the bulk of the Scots nation was highly averſe to the Union, which, till ratified by that parliament, was ſtill incomplete.

The duke of Queenſbury acted as high commiſſioner at the meeting of the parliament in Scotland; and on the 3d day of October he produced a letter from the queen, in which ſhe hoped that the terms of the treaty would prove acceptable. Theſe terms had till then been induſtriouſly kept ſecret; but when, after being recited in parliament, they became known to the whole nation, ſuch a flame kindled, as, it was imagined, no art or induſtry could poſſibly extinguiſh: yet, amidſt all the fury of this national antipathy, the dukes of Queenſbury and Argyle, the earls of Montroſe, Seafield and Stair, and thoſe other truly patriotic noblemen, who eſpouſed the Union, ſilenced the popular clamour in ſo great a meaſure, as at laſt to effect a ſolemn ratification of the treaty on January the 16th, 1707, and which received the royal aſſent on March the 6th following, by touching it with the ſceptre, conformably to the old cuſtom that ſtill ſubſiſts of paſſing all other acts. To effect this, the above lords reaſoned publicly in parliament, and ſoothed the populace without, with the moſt flattering expectations. By promoting the inſertion of an act in treaty, which ſettled unalterably the Preſbyterian church government as the eſtabliſhed form of religion in Scotland, they cooled the reſentment of the clergy; who, notwithſtanding the toleration granted by her majeſty ſoon afterwards to epiſcopacy, have ſince, even amidſt the terror of rebellion, preſerved equally inviolate their faith and loyalty. And thus, with the timely diſtribution of 20,000l. the commiſſioner having accompliſhed the great purpoſe of the court, adjourned the parliament on the 25th of March, and ſet out for London. Forty noblemen with their equipage, and upwards of 400 gentlemen on horſeback, met him as he approached the capital. Next day, amidſt freſh ſhouts of the people, he waited on the queen at Kenſington, where he met with a gracious reception.

After the entire completion of the Union, the duke of Queenſbury was immediately appointed ſecretary of ſtate for Scotland; an exchequer was eſtabliſhed there in 1708; and in the year following, ſome articles for the treaty underwent a few material alterations. The eldeſt ſons of Scots peers, particularly, were diſqualified from being choſen in parliament for any part of Scotland; as was alſo a Scots peer, if he was made a peer of Great-Britain, from voting for the 16 peers, who at every new parliament are elected to repreſent Scotland in the Britiſh houſe of lords.

During the remaining years of queen Anne's reign, little tranſpired worthy notice, beſides the famous duel which was fought in Hyde-Park, on the 15th of November 1712, between the duke of Hamilton and lord Mohun. After a moſt obſtinate conflict, the latter was killed on the ſpot, and the former expired the next day.

Since the Union Scotland has been called North-Britain, and by this coalition is now in conjunction ſtiled Great-Britain, being under the ſame government of one king and parliament, with a reſerve of all the ſtatute and municipal laws of Scotland, &c. prior to that æra, according to the articles; ſo that the legiſlation, being removed and placed in one general parliament of Great-Britain, the laws in common are now paſſed by the two countries in conjunction.

The number of inhabitants of Scotland was lately computed about 1,500,000. The ſoil has been greatly improved ſince inhabited by the Caledonians: the air is very temperate, and ſome counties, particularly the Lothians, Fife, Buchan, Angus, Mearns, Aberdeenſhire, Roſs, Murrayland, &c. have good ſtore of grain, with which they trade to Spain, Holland, Norway, &c. The ſkirts of the country, eſpecially northward, abound with timber, particularly fir-trees, &c. of a vaſt magnitude. It has produced men of eminence in every branch of literature. The courts of civil judicature are, 1. The college of juſtice, or a venerable bench of 15 ſenators. 2. The juſtice, or juſticiary court for criminal cauſes. 3. The court of exchequer. 4. The court of chancery. 5. The ſheriff's court in every county. 6. Juſtices of the peace. 7. The commiſiariot all over the kingdom. 8. The court of admiralty. 9. A delegated number of privy counſellors.

The Treaty of Union having been perfectly completed by the concurrent ratification of the Engliſh Parliament, Scotland of courſe ceaſed to be an independent kingdom, and therefore its remaining Hiſtory is conſequently included with that of Great-Britain from the reign of George I. to which our readers are referred for the moſt important tranſactions which ſucceeded; while, according to our next agreement, we ſhall, with equal accuracy and attention, complete our Undertaking with a New HISTORY of IRELAND from the Earlieſt Period to the Preſent Time.

A NEW, AUTHENTIC, AND COMPLETE

HISTORY OF IRELAND,

FROM THE EARLIEST PERIOD TO THE PRESENT TIME.

BOOK I.

From the ORIGIN of this COUNTRY to the laſt PAGAN MONARCH.

CHAP. I.

INTRODUCTION.

IT is not at all wonderful that the hiſtory of this iſland (the moſt weſterly in this part of Europe) ſhould be dark and perplexed during the earlier ages. This we know has been the caſe with regard to moſt countries, Great-Britain not excepted. Before the uſe of letters, what can we have to trace but tradition? Let the general complexion of the tales of Druids, Bards, &c. evince how uncertain is ſuch a dependence. Yet to reject the whole of their accounts, becauſe a part is apparently fabulous, would by no means anſwer the end; and by ſuch a conduct our hiſtory would neither prove agreeable nor ſatisfactory to the reader.

Thoſe among the ancients, who were acquainted with the iſland, muſt at firſt have known little more than the coaſts and utmoſt borders of it; and for that reaſon, as well as the little diſpoſition the Iriſh had at that time to aſſociate with ſtrangers, their accounts are not ſuch as can command credit from a judicious hiſtorian.

Certainly, the natives of Ireland, in early times, were moſt rude and unpoliſhed, from whence ſoever they derived their origin. That it was not from Caledonia, but more probably from South Britain, we infer from reaſons that will appear in the courſe of this work. The moſt moderate of the Iriſh hiſtorians date their æra from the Mileſian expedition, of which though ſome have doubted, it appears to be founded on ſuch grounds of probability as may well warrant its acceptance, though fictions have been mingled with the account. Where it has appeared poſſible, we have endeavoured to winnow the chaff from the corn, having conſtant recourſe to the beſt authorities, and uſing every effort to exerciſe an unprejudiced judgment.

It has been aſſerted, that theſe Mileſians brought with them from Spain the worſhip of the true God; yet it appears, that the Iriſh at a later period were immerſed in idolatry, elſe there had been no occaſion for their converſion by St. Patrick.

In the midſt of hiſtorical perplexities, we have thought proper nearly to follow the general track of writers in the relation of the Mileſian expedition; according to whom it appears, that the principal royal perſonages in martial ſkill, or other abilities, were choſen chief of the provincial kings, or, in other words, were ſet up for monarchs of Ireland. It ſeems that the revenue of this monarch aroſe partly from a ſettled ſtipend, and partly from taxes levied or preſents made by the provincial aſſemblies. The chiefs who aſſiſted the princes at theſe aſſemblies kept Brehons (a ſort of lawyers) who gave their opinions on theſe and other occaſions, and were commonly applied to for the determination of controverſies, (though robbery and plunder were not puniſhed by this inſtitution) till their power was aboliſhed by the Engliſh.

The cuſtom of taniſtry, whereby the heir to a crown might be ſet aſide, in favour of the younger branch, prevailed among the great; the law of gavel kind, as well as that called coigne and livery, was common among the lower orders of the people of Ireland. Foſterage of children, and what was called goſſipry or ſworn brotherhood, where the parties were not at all related, prevailed alſo in that country.

Out of four kingdoms, the monarchs of Ireland, as they were called, found means to create a fifth, called Meath. In the midſt of their royalties, the Iriſh were formerly much under the direction of Druids and Bards, who were their philoſophers and hiſtorians, and had great obligations to their militia.

Their hiſtorians have ſpoken highly of their buildings, eſpecially of the royal palace of Tarah, where the aſſembly of the eſtates was held; yet we cannot give any great degree of credit to the magnificence of their edifices in early times. Subſequent experience ſeems to have contradicted theſe accounts, and, indeed, moſt of their ancient ſtructures of note bear the mark not of Iriſh but of Daniſh original.

With regard to their laws, they muſt have been ſuppoſed to vary: their cuſtoms have likewiſe experienced a change; yet theſe latter may, in a great meaſure, be traced among the vulgar, who are willing to retain the former manners, as well as the common religion of their country.

Having ſaid thus much by way of introduction, we ſhall now proceed in a regular manner with our hiſtory.

C H A P. II.

Minute Account of Ireland—Deſcription of the Giants-Cauſeway—General Hiſtory of the Country—Different Accounts reſpecting the firſt Inhabitants, &c.

IRELAND, or Hibernia, is computed to be about 285 miles in length, and from the eaſtern part of Down to the weſt of Mayo, in width about 160 miles, lying between 51° and 55° 20′ of north latitude, and between 6 and 10 degrees of longitude from London. Great-Britain is on the eaſt, New England on the weſt, the Hebrides on the north, and ſouthward from the Point where Cape Clear forms the Land's End, is the Spaniſh coaſt of Galicia.

According to the preſent deſcription of Ireland, it conſiſts of four provinces, namely Leinſter, Ulſter, Connaught, and Munſter. According to this diviſion it contains the following counties and principal towns.

	COUNTIES.	CHIEF TOWNS.
I. Leinſter, 12 counties.	Dublin	Dublin
	Louth	Drogheda
	Wicklow	Wicklow
	Wexford	Wexford
	Longford	Longford
	Eaſt Meath	Trim
	Weſt Meath	Mullinger
	King's County	Phillipſtown
	Queen's County	Maryborough
	Kilkenny	Kilkenny
	Kildare	Kildare
	Carlow	Carlow
II. Ulſter, 9 counties.	Down	Down
	Armagh	Charlemont
	Monaghan	Monaghan
	Cavan	Cavan
	Antrim.	Carrickfergus
	Londonderry	Derry
	Tyrone	Omagh
	Fermanagh	Iniſkillen
	Donegal	Donegal
III. Connaught, 6 counties.	Leitrim	Leitrim
	Roſcommon	Roſcommon
	Mayo	Balinrobe
	Sligo	Sligo
	Galway	Galway
	Clare	Ennis
IV. Munſter, 5 counties.	Cork	Cork
	Kerry	Tralee
	Limerick	Limerick
	Tipperary	Clonmel
	Waterford	Waterford

The territory of Meath is now ſunk and loſt in the province of Leinſter.

The government of Ireland is veſted in a lord-lieutenant, the repreſentative of the king, who, together with lords and commons, form the legiſlature of the kingdom. There was, however, a certain dependance in the two laſt branches formerly, which appears recently to be done away, of which more will be ſaid hereafter.

The eſtabliſhed church here is epiſcopal; yet there are many ſects tolerated; and the Roman catholics, who have lately received much encouragement, conſtitute, in a vaſt proportion, the greateſt number of the inhabitants of the iſland.

The natives of Ireland, who differ, however, in ſome meaſure, according to the different ſtock from whence they have been derived, are in general robuſt and healthy; the men being ſtout and warlike, and of a high and impetuous ſpirit, the women fair and well-proportioned.

It is a point in diſpute when the uſe of letters was introduced among the Iriſh; but it appears that writing was in uſe in the iſland long before the time of St. Patrick. Their letters were eighteen in number. The climate, where the country is not infeſted with bogs, will be found in moſt reſpects like that of England, as might be expected from its vicinity; if there be a difference, the weather is generally milder, though, by a miſtaken notion, the ancients ſeem to have run into the error of ſuppoſing it ſubject to the extreme of cold. It is ſaid the Phœnicians thought ſo; and indeed it might ſeem ſo with regard to their own land. Thus alſo we have been told > "The Grecian bards record her in their ſtrains,

> "Frozen Iërne bound in icy chains;"

but experience has proved the contrary.

It has been ſaid that Ireland was formerly very woody; but the contrary ſeems to have been the caſe for a ſeries of years, woods being frequently planted there, and every proper method uſed for their preſervation.

The paſturage is very good, and ſince the recent alteration of ſyſtem, the ſheep-walks are likely to be much encouraged, for the woollen manufacture; though the cultivation of flax for that of linen, is an object apparently more worthy the attention of the commercial inhabitants of Ireland.

The river Shannon, which riſes in Leitrim, is long, wide, and deep in general, but there is a chain of rocks, whereby its navigation is interrupted. The Boyne, which empties itſelf at Drogheda; the Ban, or Banna, and laſtly the Liffey, which waters Dublin, are the principal rivers in the kingdom; though there are other ſtreams in various parts, which contribute to the health of the inhabitants, and fertiliſe the land. The harbours on the coaſt are reckoned the moſt convenient for commerce of any in Europe.

Though the country may be conſidered on the whole as rather level, yet there are ſeveral mountains; and there is one in the county of Down, the perpendicular height of which is ſuppoſed to be a thouſand yards from the level of the ſea.

With regard to the animal produce of Ireland, they are nearly the ſame with thoſe of this iſland. Thoſe who have aſſerted it to be deficient in birds and bees, have lain under a great miſtake, ſince there is ſtore of game, and honey is made in the country.

That it produces no venomous creatures is certain, which we may naturally attribute to the healthineſs of the ſoil; ſeveral attempts have been made to bring over ſome noxious creatures which have proved ineffectual, as they died immediately.

The iſland has never been famous for mineral treaſures, yet, iron, lead, copper, and even ſilver ore, have at different times been dug out of the bowels of the earth. There are quarries of ſlate and marble; turf for firing is dug out of the bogs, and this is all the account to which they turn ſo many acres of land, which by care and cultivation might be rendered profitable. Coals, which are much ſcarcer, their late rivalſhip of Great Britain has cauſed them to ſeek for with uncommon avidity.

The traveller will find here many natural curioſities.

ſities. One of the greateſt of theſe is the Giant's-Cauſeway; of which we ſhall here ſubjoin a brief deſcription.

This cauſeway comprising a vaſt pile of ſtony columns, is ſituate about eight miles from Coleraine, in the county of Antrim. It is compoſed of angular ſhapes from three ſides to eight. The eaſtern point where it joins the rock, terminates in a perpendicular cliff, formed by the upright ſides of the pillars, ſome of which are thirty three feet high. Each pillar conſiſts of ſeveral joints or ſtones lying one upon another, from ſix inches to about twelve in thickneſs; and ſome of theſe joints are ſo convex that their pre-eminences are nearly quarters of ſpheres, round which is a ledge that firmly holds them together; every ſtone being concave on one ſide, and fitting in the exacteſt manner the convexity of the part beneath it. The pillars are from one to two feet in diameter, and generally conſiſt of above forty joints; and one may walk along upon the tops of the pillars to the water's edge. From the bottom, which is of black ſtone, to about the height of ſixty feet, the cliffs are divided at equal diſtances by ſtripes of a reddiſh ſort, which reſemble a cement, about four inches in thickneſs. Upon this there is another ſtratum of the ſame black ſtone with another five inches thick of the red. Over this is likewiſe a ſtratum ten feet thick, divided in the ſame manner, then, one of the red ſtone twenty feet deep, and above that a pile of upright pillars and a ſtratum of black ſtone twenty feet.

Over this again riſes another pile of pillars which in ſome places equal the tops of the cliffs; but in others do no riſe ſo high: in others again, theſe pillars appear above the cliffs, theſe laſt are called chimneys. The face of the cliffs extends about three Engliſh miles.

The gentleman from whom we have this account, meaſured the moſt weſterly point at high water, to the diſtance of three hundred and thirty feet from the cliff; but was told that it extended ſixty further on a deſcent at low water, till it was loſt in the ſea. On meaſuring the eaſtern point, he found it five hundred and forty feet from the cliff, and ſaw as much more of that as of the other winding to the eaſt, and in the ſame manner loſt under water.

This was the gigantic cauſeway, by which (according to the old fable) Ireland was to have been joined to Great Britain, but Heaven deſtroyed the work, and puniſhed the author of it for his preſumption. But that the whole is the ſtupendius performance of nature, common ſenſe muſt certainly lead every one who ſees it or reads this deſcription, to imagine.

We ſhall now proceed with the general hiſtory of the country.

As the time and manner of making the firſt ſettlement in Ireland have been diſputed, ſo alſo has the origin of the ſeveral appellations which Ireland has received. Some aſſert that it was called Ireland from Ir, one of the firſt Mileſian chiefs, who was buried in this country: the name of Ierne, or Inerne, it is ſaid to have received from the Phœnicians. That of Hibernia it probably might have received from a ſmall alteration of Iberia, by which denomination Spain has been known. At leaſt this ſolution may appear ſatisfactory to all who acknowledge the authenticity of the account of the expedition of Heber and Heremon. It was alſo called Inis-fail.

It appears however that the iſland had another appellation beſide all theſe; being termed Scotia, before Scotland was known by that name, and afterwards Scotia-major by way of diſtinction and eminence. The North Britons, however, are not willing to allow this, becauſe it is followed by ſome deductions, namely that the Scyths or Scots firſt ſettled in Ireland, and their colonies afterwards peopled the Hebrides, and the country ſince called Scotland.

According to ſome of thoſe authors that delight in myſterious antiquity, Cain's daughter ſettled in Ireland 300 years before the flood, and afterwards three men and fifty women arrived there, all of whom died of a diſtemper in a week's time, and then the land was left uninhabited till the world was drowned. Who will believe this fable? We have a ſtill more circumſtantial account of a certain number of perſons who being denied a place in Noah's ark, built one of their own, which waſted them to Ireland forty days before the deluge happened, and that one of them named Fionan ſurvived it. Thus we begin to be involved in a labyrinth of error and abſurdity.

There are other writers indeed, who rather more modeſtly aſcribe the peopling of Ireland to Partholanus a deſcendant of Magog, the ſon of Japhet, who following the example of Nimrod, ſet himſelf up for a ſovereign, and with 1000 people ſailed to the Iriſh ſhore, after he had been repelled from Greece, where his parents had become the victims of his ambition.

Unhappily however, a party of the gigantic deſcendants of Nimrod landing there alſo, though they were routed and moſtly ſlain in battle by Partholanus and his followers, yet their dead carcaſes being denied burial, the ſtench occaſioned ſuch a plague as ſwept away the victors, and again left the land deſolate.

But as it ſeems that people had at that time an extraordinary knack of finding their way to Ireland without the guide of the compaſs or any other direction, from the moſt diſtant countries, ſo it chanced that Nemedius another deſcendant of Magog arrived there about thirty years after this period and took poſſeſſion of it. It happened that he had ſome Fomorians among his troops, theſe revolted and at laſt effected the conqueſt of Ireland. Yet ſome of the army with the Nemedians having retired to Belgia, and acquired the appellation of Firl Bolgs, for which many contradictory reaſons have been given, five thouſand of them returned and once again got poſſeſſion of the country.

The whole of theſe tranſactions are ſet down to have happened before the year of the world 2700, if they happened at all. Modern writers generally differed in the recital; and thus far moſt of our intelligent readers, as we conceive, will be inclined to coincide with their opinion. Indeed it is more probable that Ireland was firſt peopled from South Britain, as has been hinted, and then what becomes of theſe ſtories?

In effect, it is likely the Firl Bolgs were the Belgians, who derived their deſcent from Belgia, but before this period were ſettled in Britain; and from thence paſſed over into Ireland, where they remained till they were diſpoſſeſſed by another colony, to whom the Iriſh give the name of Tuatha-de-Danans. But theſe alſo the writers in queſtion aſſert to be deſcendants of Nemedius, who, after much wandering, returned poſſeſſed of magic art to ſuch a degree, that they could even revive the dead, and by their ſkill made themſelves maſters of Ireland, while the Firl Bolgs, or Belgians, retired to the Hebrides, though they ſoon after joined another newly arrived colony to expel theſe enchanters; but not being ſucceſsful, the victors, who defeated them, kept the ſurvivors in ſlavery till the arrival of the Mileſian race.

It appears that theſe Tuatha-de-Danans were Damnonian Britons, who might poſſibly have brought with them their Druids, their cuſtoms, and ſuperſtitions. All that paſſed before their arrival, if not abſolutely fictitious, is yet ſo much involved in fable and perplexity, that nothing but the apprehenſion of being charged with hiſtorical neglect, could have occaſioned us to preſent our readers with the recital; for which reaſon we will ſpare them the pains of peruſing the further accounts of the enchantments recited at this period. Thoſe who wiſh to hear more concerning them we refer to Keating, and other fabulous writers, who prefer the gloſs of fiction to the truth of hiſtory.

CHAP. III.

Arrival of Ith—His Death—The three Sons of Mileſius fight, and are ſucceſsful—Diſputes—Heremon ſole Monarch—Iſland invaded by the Britons—Relieved by the Picts—Their Settlement, &c.—Progreſs of the Iriſh Sovereigns—An Interregnum—Monarchy reſtored—Succeſſion of Kings—Royal Aſſembly of Teamor eſtabliſhed—Reigns continued till the Birth of Chriſt.

A Leader of the name of Ith, a Gadelian, belonging to a race of heroes, who after various adventures had ſettled in Spain, drawing forth a new colony, ſailed from Galicia, in order to make diſcoveries. Landing in the north of Ireland, where the Tuatha-de-Danans, or Damnonians, were ſettled, with only 150 men, he found three brother princes involved in diſputes concerning the government, which they ſhared between them. After a fair deciſion, he intended to return to his ſhips; but one of them treacherouſly purſuing him with a ſtrong body of men; though he fought valiantly he could not regain his veſſel till he was mortally wounded, to the grief of his little army; and at their return, a ſecond expedition to Ireland was reſolved upon by theſe Gadelians, in which, however, ſomething will reaſonably be placed to the account of ambition, and the deſire of acquiring a new dominion.

The three ſons of Mileſius conducted the expedition, their father being deceaſed. After having been much perplexed by a fog, attributed to magic, they landed in Ireland. Heber, Heremon, and Amergin, as we are told, reimbarked by agreement, in order to try their fortune in a ſecond landing. There is great reaſon to ſuppoſe they met with a repulſe. Be that as it may, they encountered a violent ſtorm, and were driven on a different part of the coaſt; and after having engaged the Tuatha-de-Danans in three ſeveral battles, they remained entire victors.

It is to be obſerved, that the followers of theſe ſons of Mileſius were called Gadelians; and Keating vouches for them that their anceſtors were cotemporaries with Moſes. Without aſſerting or denying this ſtory, we cannot but obſerve, that the relation of their ſettlement in Spain (from whence ſoever they ſprung) ſeems to be as well authenticated as many other matters which we deduce from ancient hiſtory.

It appears that ſome trivial diſputes occaſioned dreadful conteſts between Heber and Heremon ſoon after their conqueſt. Heber fell in this diſpute, and Amergin, the other brother, ſoon after loſing his life in another, Heremon remained ſole monarch of Ireland.

We are told that the iſland was now invaded by the Britons, and that the natives were relieved by the Picts, who chanced to land on their ſhores. But when they had thus ſerved their allies, they began to think they had a right likewiſe to ſerve themſelves. But as Heremon had raiſed a force which theſe new-comers could not reſiſt, they were obliged to accept of terms, the reſult of which was their being obliged to withdraw to the Hebrides, having firſt been allowed to marry and take with them a number of Iriſh females; on condition, however, that if they ſucceeded in their intended ſettlement, they ſhould give the preference to the female line.

The Picts departing, had the wiſhed for ſucceſs, not only in the Hebrides, but alſo in the north of Scotland, and held the dominion through a line of ſeventy ſucceſſive kings. "Theſe Picts (ſays a well known author) became afterwards the Caledonian Britons, whoſe origin was from Scythia; who, in the time of Agricola were a very conſiderable people, both for their number and valour, and were remarkable in antiquity for painting their bodies, from which cuſtom the name of Pict is derived. But the ſame author is of opinion, and with great probability on his ſide, that the Iriſh writers have placed this expedition rather too early. However the fact ſeems eſtabliſhed; and thus gives an account of the origin of the Pictiſh nation, which continued in Britain till they were totally deſtroyed by Kenneth II. of Scotland.

At a place called Airgiod Roſs died Heremon, the firſt Mileſian monarch of Ireland, in the 14th year of his reign. His three ſons, Maimhne, Luighne, and Laiſhne, ſucceeding him, reigned jointly for three years, when Maimhne died a natural death, and the two other brothers were ſlain at the battle of Ard Ladbron by four ſons of Heber, who reigned but one year, at the expiration of which time they were ſlain in an engagement with Trial, the ſon of Heremon. The victor ſat on the throne ten years, as did his ſon Ethrial for twice that term. This prince was killed in battle by a ſon of Heber, named Conmaul, who after having won ſeveral battles, which he fought againſt the Heremonian family, proved victorious in all except the laſt, which he loſt, together with his life, and was ſucceeded by Tigherman of the race of Heremon.

This prince had continual wars with the race of Heber, and deſtroyed moſt of their adherents. His reign laſted twenty-three years; and the Iriſh ſay that he was the firſt who eſtabliſhed idolatry in the iſland. They add that he was ſtruck dead while he was worſhipping their idol, as were many of his followers.

An interregnum of about ſeven years ſucceeded; after which Eadgothach, a ſon of Ith, was raiſed to the throne, who inſtituted certain laws, by which the quality of every perſon in the kingdom ſhould be diſtinguiſhed by his dreſs. He was ſlain by two deſcendants of Ir, recorded by hiſtorians to be the firſt Mileſian monarch that died in Ireland. The victor princes governed by turns for forty years. They were called Ceormnia and Sobhairce. Sobhairce fell by Achy Faobherglus.

He was the ſon of Conmaol, ſon of Heber Fionn, and derived his name from the green colour of his weapons. This prince obliged the Picts, ſettled in the Highlands, to pay him homage and tribute. He was at laſt ſlain at the battle of Corman, by a prince of the Heremonian line.

Fiachadh Labhruine, the ſon of Smiorgoil, ſucceeded to the crown by this victory, and reigned for twenty-four years monarch of Ireland. But he was killed at the battle of Bealgadion, fighting againſt the family of Heber.

Achy Mumho, grandſon of Achy Faobherglus, reigned twenty-two years; but at laſt was defeated and ſlain by Angus Olliamachach. In his reign ſeveral woods were cleared, and many lakes began to flow.

Falling in battle, Eagna Airgtheach, grandſon of Achy Faobhorglus, ſucceeded him, and is ſaid to have reigned with great magnificence. He ordered ſilver targets to be given to thoſe who diſtinguiſhed themſelves in the military line.

He was ſucceeded by Rochtheachta, the ſon of Maine; but after a reign of twenty-five years, he was ſlain by a prince of the race of Ir.

Scoohnu, who ſlew him, after reigning five years was killed by his own ſon.

The parricide, Fiachadh, who was ſurnamed Fionſgothach was killed by Muinheamhoin, the ſon of Caſcethach.

Muinheamhoin was the ninth deſcent from Heber Fionn. He ordered that the gentlemen of Ireland ſhould wear a chain about their necks, and provided for the military other marks of diſtinction. He died of the peſtilence, a conſequence, as we may ſuppoſe, of the yet uncleared lands in the country.

His ſon, Aldergoidh, ſucceeded him, and was the firſt monarch that introduced the cuſtom of wearing gold rings in Ireland. Being killed in battle, he was ſucceeded by Ollam Fodhla, of the line of Ir.

This prince introduced many uſeful laws; and is ſaid to have undertaken the taſk of tranſmitting to poſterity the voyages of the firſt Iriſh adventurers.

Setting aſide ſome ſtories, which appear rather fabulous, there is no reaſon to doubt that Ollam Fodhla founded the royal aſſembly of Teamor or Tarah, though perhaps the account relative to its regularity in times ſo remote may not meet with an equal degree of credit from every reader; however, as we find it on record we ſhall relate it.

“ This aſſembly was denominated Fees Fiambroch, ſignifying a meeting of the nobility, gentry, prieſts, hiſtorians, and men of learning or diſtinguiſhed abilities in various arts and profeſſions. They met in this royal palace once every three years, by a parliamentary ſummons, in order to deliberate on the moſt important concerns of the ſtate, where they enacted new laws, and repealed ſuch as were old, and judged to be burthenſome. In this aſſembly the ancient records of the iſland were peruſed and examined; and if any falſehoods were detected, they were eraſed, that poſterity might not be impoſed on by falſe hiſtory; and the author who endeavoured to abuſe the world by perverting matters of fact, by repreſenting them in improper colours, or introducing fancies and inventions of his own, was ſolemnly degraded, and diſmiſſed with marks of infamy. His works were likewiſe deſtroyed, as being unworthy of credit, and were not to be admitted among the archives, or received among the records of the kingdom. Neither was this expulſion the whole of his puniſhment; he was liable alſo to fine or impriſonment, or any other puniſhment which this parliament of Tarah thought proper to inflict on the delinquent.

“ Six days before the buſineſs of the ſeſſion began were ſpent in feaſting, and reciprocal acts of civility and hoſpitality. The place of meeting was a convenient room in the palace beforementioned, which was long and narrow, the ranges of ſeats being on each ſide, and the table fixed in the middle. A proper ſpace was allowed between the ſeats and the wall, and at the ends of the table, for the ſervants to attend, and paſs to and fro, during the feaſt. A magnificent entertainment being provided, as ſoon as it was ſerved up the trumpet was three times ſounded, by order of the grand marſhal. At the firſt blaſt, all the ſhield-bearers belonging to the princes and nobility came to the door, where they delivered their ſhields to the grand marſhal, who hung them in their order upon the wall, by the herald's direction, on the right ſide of the table, each being diſtinguiſhed by its particular device. At the ſecond blaſt, the target-bearers of the military officers attended, to deliver their targets, which were hung up in other places, in like manner. This ceremony being over, the kings and princes, and all the company, entered the apartment at the third blaſt; when each taking his place under his ſhield, the entertainment was conducted with the greateſt order and decorum.

“ The ſix days appointed for feaſting being ended, the antiquities of the kingdom being examined, the ſeveral orders began to inveſtigate the laws, and ſettle any diſputes that exiſted between particular provinces. We are likewiſe informed of ſeveral inſtances of the proper attention to matters of a more private nature, ſuch as the puniſhment of rapes and robberies, the former of which hiſtorians ſay the monarch bound himſelf never to forgive thoſe who ſhould commit in his dominions.”

When we conſider the few events of any conſequence, which occurred worth notice in ſuch a number of years, it will be no matter of wonder that the hiſtorian ſhould dwell with ſome degree of pleaſure on the reign of a prince, who eſtabliſhed ſuch an aſſembly as we have juſt mentioned, though perhaps the account of it may, in ſome meaſure, have been exaggerated; and this we may, in particular, conceive to be the caſe with regard to their examination of the antiquities of the kingdom, diſgracing thoſe who attempted to mingle falſities with hiſtories. In this caſe, whatever might be the intentions of Ollam Fodhla, either through the remiſſneſs or partiality of the examiners, it appears that there was much labour loſt, elſe ſhould we not be perplexed with ſuch fables and contradictory accounts as ſtood upon the Iriſh records. Many of ſuch matters, which are ſet down, even from what is called the Pſalter of Tarah, are of ſuch a nature, that few hiſtorians would chuſe to hazard their credit by aſſerting. What ſhall we conclude then? but that ſomething was done, though not ſo much as we are told, nor ſo much as might have been effected by the powers that we find veſted in the aſſembly.

It has already been obſerved that the monarch preſided, for whom a throne was erected in the middle of the apartment, the ſovereign's face being turned to the eaſt. With regard to the provincial kings who aſſiſted, the diſpoſition was as follows: the king of Ulſter was on the right-hand, the king of Munſter on the left, the king of Leinſter ſat oppoſite to the monarch, and the king of Connaught was behind the throne. The reſt of the company were placed on either ſide, under their devices, as has been already mentioned; while the nobility, eccleſiaſtics, civil and military officers, and deputies of provinces, were ranged near the particular diſtricts to which they belonged. Such was the order eſtabliſhed in this aſſembly.

After a reign of forty years, Ollam Fodhla died a natural death, much regretted by his ſubjects.

He was ſucceeded by his ſon Fionnachta, ſo named, as it is ſaid, from a prodigious quantity of ſnow that fell in his reign.

Slanoll, his next brother, ſucceeded him, and died alſo in peace at Tarah, after a reign of fifteen years, but of what diſorder we are unacquainted.

The third ſon of Ollam Fodhla, named Geide Ollgothach, now reigned; of whom we only learn, that in his time the Iriſh ſpoke very loud, and that he was ſlain by his nephew.

This was Fiachad, the ſon of his brother Fionnachta, who ſucceeded him, and reigned twenty-four years; but was dethroned and ſlain by a ſon of the former monarch.

His ſucceſſor was called Beerngull, who reigned twenty years, and was killed by a prince named Olliol.

He was the ſon of Slanoll, and grandſon of Ollam Fodhla; he ruled ſixteen years and was ſucceeded by Siorna Saoghalach, of the Heremonian line, who reigned twenty-one years, and was ſlain by Rotheacta. The conqueror was deſcended from Achy Faoborghlas, of the line of Heber, who ruled for ſeven years, and periſhed by fire.

He was ſucceeded by his ſon Eilm, who reigned only one year, and was killed by the grandſon of Siorna Saoghalach, of the family of Heremon.

Giallcadh was the ſon of Olliol Olchaorn. He likewiſe fell, and was ſucceeded by Art Imlcach, the ſon of Eilm, who reigned twenty-two years. He was ſlain by Meadhna Fionn Fail, who reigned in his ſtead.

Nuadha, who was Olliol Olchaorn's grandſon, reigned twenty years; but he was ſlain by Breaſrigh.

This prince who was a grandſon of Eilm ſucceeded him; after having fought ſeveral battles, he was killed by Hehy Apthach.

He was ſurnamed Apthach, from a word ſignifying a plague, becauſe the peſtilence prevailed during his reign: he was deſcended from the line of Ith. He was ſlain by a deſcendant of the line of Ir, after having reigned only a twelvemonth.

Fionn the ſon of Bratha, related in the fourth degree to Ollham, ſlew and ſucceeded him.

The next monarch was Seadhna Jonadraice, the grandſon of Art, of the race of Heber Fionn, remarkable for eſtabliſhing military diſcipline among his ſubjects. He was murdered by Simeon Breach his inhuman ſucceſſor, who ordered him to be torn limb from limb.

After a reign of ſix years, this wretch, who was of the line of Heremon, was ſeized by the ſon of Seadhna, who commanded him to be put to death by the ſame torture as he had cauſed the former monarch to ſuffer.

Duach Fionn, Seadhna's ſon, having reigned five years was ſlain by Muredach Balgrach.

Muredach the ſon of Simeon Breach, aſte rhaving reigned four years, was ſlain by Eadna, the ſon of Duach Fionn.

Eadna, who was of the Heberian race, is ſaid to have erected a mint and coined money at Airgied Roſs. He died of the peſtilence.

Lughaidh Jardhauin, his ſon, after reigning nine years, was ſlain by Siorlamb. Siorlamb was of the line of Ir. He reigned ſixteen years.

Achy Uarceas, the ſon of Lughaidh Jardhauin, ſucceeded him. Having been in exile for the ſpace of twelve years before he came to the government, he embarked his followers on board a fleet with which he uſed to infeſt the coaſt. He was accuſtomed to employ a ſort of boats called Uarceas on theſe expeditions, from which circumſtance his ſurname was derived. Achy Fuadhmuine ſlew him after he had reigned twelve years.

This Achy and his brother Conniny Beg Aglach, of the Heremonian line, afterwards jointly ruled the land. After five years they loſt the kingdom to Lughaidh Lamdhearg, ſon of the former monarch, who reigned ſeven years; but was defeated and ſlain by Conniny. This prince revenged his brother's death, ruled ten years, and then was ſlain by Art, the ſon of Lughaidh Lamdhearg.

Art, after having enjoyed the ſovereignty for ſix years, was ſlain by Duath Lagrach.

Fiachadh Tolgrach ſucceeded, but in ten years time was killed by Olliol Fionn, the ſon of Art.

Olliol Fionn having reigned nine years, was killed by Argiodhamar Fiacha and his two ſons.

Olliol Fionn's ſon Achy ſucceeded, but after reigning eleven years was killed by Duach.

He was ſucceeded by Argiodhmar, who met with the ſame fate after twenty-three years reign.

Afterwards Duach Lagrach who vanquiſhed him, governed for ten years.

Lughaide Laige, ſucceeded him, reigned ſeven years, and then was ſlain by the grandſon of Airgiodhmar.

Airgiodhmar was of the family of Ir: after a reign of twenty one years he was drowned.

His ſucceſior was Diotharba, deſcended of the ſame family, and who was ſaid to have governed for the ſame term. Ancient hiſtorians tell that theſe princes laſt mentioned ſucceeded thus by mutual agreement; but the long term of twenty-one years for each which they aſſert, together with other circumſtances, muſt tend to render the matter very improbable.

It appears in the reſult, however, that Mucha, the widow of one of theſe kings, oppoſed Diotharba, vanquiſhed him, and afterwards was married to Kimbach, the female not being uſed to rule in Ireland.

Kimbach revived the laws and regulations of Ollam Fodhla, which about this period are confeſſed to have been much neglected. He reigned with his queen in peace for ſeven years. Mucha enjoyed the ſovereignty for ſome years after his death, but this princeſs, at laſt, loſt her crown and life in a conteſt with a prince of the Heberian family.

Reachta Rigdhcorg was the prince that diſpoſſeſſed Mucha; whoſe foſter child revenged her death, after he had reigned twenty years.

Ugaine, or as ſome call him Eugenius the great, who ſucceeded, was a brave prince, of the line of Heremon; he annexed the weſtern iſles to his dominions; we are told likewiſe that he obliged the Picts to pay him tribute, and engaged his ſubjects to ſwear allegiance to him and his race; but all this could not guard him againſt the conſequences of perfidy and treaſon.

It is related that this Iriſh monarch had twenty-five ſons, who making their progreſs through the kingdom, were guilty of much oppreſſion. In conſequence of a petition preſented to Eugenius, we find it recorded as being determined in council that having twenty-five ſons, the kingdom ſhould be divided into as many parcels and thus ſhared (we will ſuppoſe for their progreſs rather than for future dominion) and by that diviſion it is related that for a number of years afterwards the taxes were regulated. This ſovereign was at laſt killed by a wicked brother who ſuppoſed that he ſhould ſucceed him. But in this the traitor was diſappointed. The death of Eugenius was revenged by a ſon that the former had by Cruthach, a daughter of the king of France. This prince was called Laughaire Lorck. He ſucceeded to the crown, after he had ſlain his father's murderer; but was not cautious enough to avoid a ſimilar fate. The circumſtances are thus related in hiſtory.

King Laughaire had a brother named Cobthach, whom he treated with great tenderneſs, and to whom he allowed a revenue befitting a prince. But this did not ſatisfy Cobthach; as his brother had a ſon, and a grandſon, he feared that his moſt ardent deſire of aſcending the throne would never be gratified. Whether his grief for this circumſtance occaſioned him to fall ſick, or whether he only feigned an indiſpoſition, his ſituation became ſuch that his life was declared to be in danger. The king viſited him; but being attended by his guards, Cobthach affected to be offended, as he intimated that ſuch an attendance, ſeemed to indicate that his brother entertained a ſuſpicion of his loyalty. Unwilling to give him offence, Laughaire diſclaimed all ſuſpicions of that nature, and promiſed for the future he would viſit him in a private manner.

The king reſolved to keep his word; and he was no ſooner departed than this unnatural traitor conſulted one of his confederates, who adviſed that he ſhould feign himſelf dead when the monarch came next to ſee him. This ſcheme was accordingly carried into execution. Laughaire made his next viſit alone, and ſuppoſing his brother to be deceaſed, as he lay motionleſs, threw himſelf on the body to bewail the loſs, when Cobthach took the opportunity of treacherouſly ſtabbing him with a concealed poignard.

Though his infamous deſign had thus far ſucceeded, yet the uſurper ſtill remaining in fear of his brother's deſcendants, put his ſon to death, and meditated to diſpatch his grandſon alſo. On this prince he exerciſed many cruelties; the effect of which was to take away his ſpeech, and to throw him into convulſions. The uſurper now thinking his ſenſes ſo irreparably injured, that he was no longer to be dreaded as a competitor, aſſuming an affectation of mercy and indulgence, deſiſted from ſeeking the life of one whom he thought now incapable of giving him any annoyance, and ſuffered the young prince, whoſe name was Maon, to be conveyed to Munſter.

During this youth's retreat, Cobthach played the tyrant; and yet he ſwayed the ſcepter for thirty years before he was overtaken by vengeance.

Maon having reſided in Munſter till the uſe of his ſpeech and his other faculties were unexpectedly reſtored, he went over into Gaul. There he claimed relationſhip with the king of the country, where his grandmother Cruthach was born, as we have already noticed. He was promoted to a command in the Gallic ſervice; and at laſt receiving aid from that country, he landed at Wexford with two thouſand men, while the uſurper dwelt in perfect ſecurity. As ſoon as Maon had received intelligence of the place of his reſidence, he marched thither ſecretly and expeditiouſly, and had the good fortune to ſurpriſe this tyrant, who was ſlain, with all his miniſters and attendants.

The conqueror was afterwards proclaimed monarch of Ireland, by the name of Labra Longſeach, which denomination he received from his ſpeaking when he was thought to be deprived of the faculty of ſpeech. With regard to this prince, there is little recorded of him more than that he brought over with him from Gaul the invention of a ſort of green-headed partiſans, for the uſe of the ſoldiery, except a ridiculous fable of his being accommodated with the ears of an horſe, as we are told of king Midas's having aſſes ears, in the fables of antiquity. Such abſurdities diſgrace, and almoſt lead ſome people to diſpute, the truths of hiſtory. Having reigned eighteen years, we find that Labra Longſeach was killed by a ſon of Cobthach.

He was named Meilge Malbthach; and after a reign of ſeven years, was ſlain by Modchorb.

This prince, who was of the line of Heber, was killed by Angus Ollam, the grandſon of Labra Longſeach, who reigned eighteen years.

Jarn Gleofathach, of the poſterity of Cobthach, ſlew Angus, and ſucceeded to the crown; but he fell by the hand of Fearchorb, the ſon of Modchorb.

During the ſpace of eleven years Fearchorb ſwayed the ſceptre; but he was killed by the ſon of the former monarch.

Conla Cruad Cealgach, of the Heremonian line, who vanquiſhed and ſucceeded him, died a natural death.

His ſon, Olliol Caiſhiaclach, reigned twenty-five years. He was ſlain by Adamhar Folteahoin, at Tarah.

This Adamhar, who was a deſcendant of Heber, reigned but five years.

Achy Foltleathan, the grandſon of Conla, ſucceeding, reigned eleven years. He was ſlain by Fermus Fortamhuil, a prince deſcended from the Heremonian line. He fell by the hand of Angus Turmy.

Of Angus, the ſon of Achy Foltleathan, we find it related, that once he was ſo much overcome with liquor as to violate the chaſtity of his own daughter. The princeſs proving with child, he was aſhamed of this enormous crime, and could ſcarcely endure afterwards to appear in public; yet the mode by which we are given to underſtand he thought to atone his crime, muſt appear to the feeling reader full as ſhocking as the crime itſelf. He cauſed a male child, the fruit of this inceſtuous connection, to be conveyed away privately, and put into an open boat, which was intended to be drifted, and ſubmitted to the mercy of the winds and waves. Indeed, according to the cuſtom often uſed in theſe expoſals, the infant was furniſhed with mantles, and ſome rich jewels were placed by him; yet with all this he muſt have periſhed, if ſome fiſhermen had not taken him up and put him to nurſe. As it fell out, his progeny afterwards became kings of Scotland. Angus was killed at Tarah.

Connall, the ſon of Adamhar Folthoin, ſucceeded him on the throne. Having reigned nine years, he was killed by a prince of the Heberian line.

Niadh Seadhamhuin, who ſlew him, ſat upon the throne for ſeven years; but was himſelf ſlain by Eadna Aighnath.

Eadna was the legitimate ſon of Angus. The Iriſh writers tell us that he was of a diſpoſition remarkably bountiful. Having governed the iſland for twenty-eight years, he was killed by Crimthan.

This Crimthan was ſurnamed Croſgrach, from the ſlaughter he made in battles; but though a valiant chief, Rugrhuide or Rogenus ſlew him, and mounted the throne.

He was among thoſe whom we find ſurnamed the Great, was the ſon of Sithric, and drew his deſcent from the family of Ir. After a ſeventy years reign he died a natural death.

Jonahdmar, the grandſon of Adamhar, of the race of Heber, ſucceeded; but he had reigned only three years, when he was ſlain by Breaſal Bodhiaba.

Breaſal, who was the ſon of Rogerus, was the next monarch; and is ſaid to have derived his name from a great mortality that prevailed among the cattle in Ireland during his time.

Lughuide Luaghne, having killed Breaſal, after a ſeven years reign, himſelf completed only five, before he was ſlain by Corgall Clariogneach.

Congall, the ſon of Rogerus, was of the family of Ir. He fell by the hand of Duach, after having reigned thirteen years.

His ſucceſſor was the ſon of Carbry Loiſgleathan, of the line of Heber. Some hiſtorians obſerve that his father had another ſon called Degad. Both princes were ſuppoſed equally worthy to fill the Iriſh throne; but that Duach, being the elder, aſſumed the ſovereignty as his right, which while the other aſpired to, he treacherouſly cauſed him to be ſurpriſed and blinded. But afterwards allowing him a handſome revenue to ſubſiſt on, theſe writers add, that the king was afterwards ſurnamed Dalta Degad, i. e. Degad's foſter father. The intelligent reader, however, will poſſibly conceive that the behaviour of the Iriſh monarch towards this prince, could hardly merit ſuch a title. Another hiſtorian gives us a different, and, I believe, a more authentic account of the matter; for he ſays, that this Degad was not the ſon of Duach, but of Fiacha, the young prince, who was expoſed by his unnatural father, as already mentioned, and taken up by fiſhermen. It is added, that having obtained a ſettlement in Ulſter, where the race of Ir became jealous of him, he fled to Duach, who cordially received and ſupported him with the greateſt hoſpitality. Duach, after a reign of ten years, was killed by Fachtna Fathach; but we hear this Degad was ſo much beloved by the people, that he was elected king of Munſter, where his race flouriſhed, and ſome of them afterwards ſucceeded to the crown of Scotland.

Fachtna Fathach, who had ſlain Duach, next mounted the throne, and having reigned eighteen years, was killed by Achy Feyloch.

This prince reſtored, as far as he could, the diviſion of the Iriſh provinces. Connaught he divided at firſt into three; but thoſe who held two of them, refuſing a requiſition of his, to build a royal palace within the juriſdiction of either, Irnie, who had the third portion, freely offering any part of the country that fell to his ſhare, for that purpoſe, the monarch conferred the whole provincial kingdom on him in return for this ready compliance, and he took poſſeſſion by force of arms. Achy alſo married him to his daughter Meaba, and admitted him to a ſhare of his councils. The palace was built according to the king's wiſhes, which edifice was called Rath Cruachan, where many matters of public concern were tranſacted.

After the king of Connaught had reigned many years, he was at laſt ſlain at Tarah. His queen Meaba, however, ſucceeded in the government. And here paſſing over ſome contradictory accounts it appears, that this princeſs married Olliol More, after the deceaſe of her firſt huſband.

During her ſecond widowhood, we are told that having removed her reſidence to the borders of a lake, ſhe was accuſtomed in ſummer mornings to divert herſelf with ſwimming, which, it ſeems, was her favourite amuſement.

Forbhuide, the ſon of Connor, king of Ulſter, took the opportunity when he came with his father's deputies to an aſſembly of the ſtates to put in execution a deſign that he had formed of killing the queen, which he did by ſlinging a ſtone at her with ſo good an aim (as it ſeems he had practiſed before at a mark) that ſhe ſunk down dead immediately to the bottom of the lake.

Connor, king of Ulſter, the father of this treacherous prince, was a chief of great proweſs, and had formerly carried on wars againſt the province or kingdom of Connaught. This king once boaſting of his exploits gained the palm from two other heroes, who diſputed the preference of valor and ſkill with him. At this conference, he unluckily produced a ball made of the brains of a former hero called Meſaydra, which by mixing them with lime, and drying them in the ſun, had acquired the hardneſs of a ſtone, and was kept as a trophy according to the barbarous cuſtom of the age and country. But two fools whom he kept for his diverſion having run away with it to play with, it was taken from them by one Ceat, who afterwards invaded Ulſter, and inviting Connor to a parley treacherouſly wounded him with it. The wound did not prove mortal; but the perſon who undertook to cure the king told him that any paſſion or violent agitation would prove fatal to him, in conſequence of the ſtroke. He kept the rules preſcribed by his ſurgeon for ſeven years; but at the end of that time, throwing himſelf on ſome occaſion, into a great rage, the wound broke out afreſh and he expired. To add to this wonderful death of Connor ſome pretend that this event above related happening in the paſſion week, the king's rage was cauſed by reflecting on what the Saviour of the world had ſuffered at that ſeaſon; but the ſtory is vague; and beſides it appears that this prince died before the commencement of the chriſtian æra. Connor, according to the tenor of his hiſtory, was endued with valour and many good qualities; but he was guilty of inceſt with his mother, in a drunken fit, and beſides broke his word with and cauſed two lovers to be aſſaſſinated who had ſurrendered themſelves to him at diſcretion. An hoſtage that he had given for their ſafety deeming his honour concerned, took up arms againſt the king, and after many ſkirmiſhes put himſelf under the protection of Meaba, which circumſtance involved Ulſter and Connaught in a bloody war, the final ſettlement of which brought on the end of the queen of Connaught, in the manner above recited.

Connor was remarked for having reformed the ſect of Bards and Philoſophers called Fileahs, and having ſet ſome of them to reviſe the laws, and to reduce them to one ſingle code, which it is ſaid was done in ſuch a manner that the ordinances iſſued by them under the auſpices of the king, were called "Heavenly judgments," though theſe Fileahs had before been much diſreſpected by the people.

Achy Arem ſucceeded Achy Feyloch in the monarchy, and we find him recorded as the firſt who adopted the cuſtom of burying the dead in graves dug in the earth. Before his time, it appears that the bodies of the defunct were only covered with clay, or ſtones. After having reigned ten years, he was ſlain by one named Stodheeall.

Eiderſgoil, the grandſon of Degad, next aſcended the throne; after a ſix years reign, he was killed by Nuadha Neacht.

This prince deſcended from the family of Heremon, and was ſlain after a reign of a few months by Conary.

The father of Conary having been killed by a prince of Leinſter, the monarch levied a fine on the province, which he obliged the people to bind themſelves and their ſucceſſors for ever to pay, and alſo inſiſted that Oſſory ſhould be given up to him, which he annexed to Munſter his native county.

Conary was ſurnamed the great, on account of his long and flouriſhing reign, which continued for ſixty years: few particulars however are recorded of this long reign, which at laſt he ended by an aſſault of ſome deſperate ruffians, whom he had baniſhed. Theſe returning, with a Welch prince at their head, landed in Ireland, and marching ſuddenly to the palace of Tarah, ſlew Conary, as ſome ſay by ſetting that building on fire, ſo that he periſhed in the flames; but others aſſert that they ſlew him in another manner, after he had rebuilt the palace which was burnt ſome years before that event took place.

In the reign of Conary, JESUS CHRIST was born, while Auguſtus Cæſar was emperor of Rome, and conſequently from this period commenced the chriſtian æra.

Names and Characters of ſucceeding Monarchs—Firſt Plebeian War—The ſecond, &c—A perpetual Tribute eſtabliſhed—A Refuſal to pay it—Conſequent Battles—Domeſtic Broils—Emigration of the Iriſh to Scotland—The Militia—Introduction of St. Patrick to Ireland—Further Particulars till the Eſtabliſhment of Chriſtianity.

LUGHAID Riadbhearg of the royal line of Heremon, ſucceeded to Conary. Having married a daughter of the king of Denmark, he was ſo much grieved at her death, that he fell upon his ſword, and thus ended his liſe after a twenty years reign.

Connor Abraidhruead the ſon of Fergus Fairge, ſucceeding, reigned only a twelvemonth.

Crimthan Nuadhna his ſucceſſor, the ſon of Lughaid, reigned ſixteen years, and died by a fall from his horſe.

About this time, the lower orders of the people (ſuppoſed to conſiſt chiefly of the Firl-bolgs, or Belgians) overthrew the power of the monarch and his nobility. By their means, after what was called a plebeian war, Corbry, one of their demagogues, was promoted to the throne, and reigned five years.

But his ſon Moran moſt virtuouſly and diſintereſtedly perſuaded the people to reſtore the royal family, which they accordingly did in the perſon of Feredach, the ſon of the late monarch, Crimthan.

Some writers have ſuppoſed that this Feredach, or Ferednach, was reſtored by Fin or Fingal, a king of Morven in Caledonia; but it will appear in the courſe of this hiſtory that the chronology cannot well be made to agree with this period of hiſtory, as alſo that this Fin was really a general of the Iriſh militia, whom we ſhall diſcourſe of preſently. This Feredach who was ſurnamed "the Juſt," appointed Moran who had reſigned to him, his chief miniſter. Having reigned twenty-one years, he died a natural death, and was ſucceeded by Fiachad Fian: he was the ſon of Daire, of the race of Heremon, and after a reign of only three years was killed by the ſon of the former monarch. After a ſeven years reign, Fiacha was ſlain in the beginning of the war. And ſome of the Iriſh writers ſay that a number of perſons, the principal among his nobility, were likewiſe aſſaſſinated. But the authors are ſo little to be depended on, in regard to this circumſtance, that we ſhall nor here trouble the reader with them.

We ſhall only obſerve that Elim the principal champion of their cauſe, ſucceeded to the crown.

Yet this new-elected prince, though he had been aſſiſted by ſome of the provincial kings, did not find himſelf able to preſerve that authority which he had aſſumed. The people themſelves began to be uneaſy under his adminiſtration, and at length Tuathal Techtmar, who had taken refuge among the Picts, returning from North Britain, defeated and ſlew the uſurper, and cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed monarch of Ireland.

This was the prince who calling a parliament in which ſome ſalutary laws ware paſſed, obtained alſo a decree for ſeparating a certain parcel of land from the four different provinces, which were to be erected into a kingdom called "Meath," under the notion of their being demeſne lands appropriated to ſupport the dignity of the crown. And in theſe diſtricts, thus appropriated, the monarch built four royal palaces, in order to add to the ſplendour of his ſovereignty.

An inſult given by the king of Leinſter to this monarch, occaſioned the latter to invade the provincial kingdom with fire and ſword. The king of Leinſter not finding himſelf able to reſiſt the forces levied againſt him, ſubmitted to the diſgraceful condition of a perpetual tribute. The princes and people of this diſtrict, fulfilled the terms of this treaty, juſt as long as they could not do otherwiſe, as will ſufficiently appear in the ſucceeding pages of this hiſtory. Tuathal Techtmar was at laſt killed by Mal, the ſon of Rugruidh, who was deſcended from the family of Ir.

Having reigned four years, he was ſlain by Feadlim Reachtmar.

This was the ſon of Tuathal Techtmar. Having eſtabliſhed the law of retaliation, and reigned ten years, he died a natural death.

Cathir, the Great, or more properly called "the Rich," ſucceeded to Feadlim. He was killed by Conn, after having reigned about three years.

Conn Ceal Cathac, ſurnamed "the Hero of an Hundred Battles," was the next monarch. He demanded the Leinſter tribute, but at firſt was ſo unſucceſsful in his conteſt with the provincial prince, that he was baffled, and even ſaw the palace of Tarah taken and poſſeſſed by his opponent for four years. At laſt, however, the monarch ſucceeded, and the tribute was paid for the preſent by the king of Leinſter, though the right of demanding it was ſtill reſerved for a bone of contention.

Conn was involved in many domeſtic broils; and much confuſion, of which we have indeed a confuſed account, happened in the reign of this "Hero of an Hundred Battles," who after having ſlain one of his rivals in his bed, was himſelf aſſaſſinated by certain ruffians diſguiſed in the dreſs of women.

This was done by means of the king of Ulſter; but he did not ſucceed to the monarchy, which was afterwards poſſeſſed by another Conary, who reſolved to increaſe the power of the tribe of Degad from whence he was deſcended. After a nine years reign, we find he was murdered by a relation of the name of Nemeth.

Art, ſurnamed the Melancholy, ſucceeded, one of whoſe ſiſters was firſt married to Conary, and afterwards to Nemeth. In his reign Olliol Olum, king of Munſter, having baniſhed Mac Conn his chief judge, applied to Art for his aſſiſtance againſt this Mac Conn, who had commenced rebel. This aſſiſtance was granted; but the revolters having received ſuccours from Bien Britt, prince of Wales, and from other quarters, Ireland was invaded, and Art, being deſerted by Fin or Fingal, the captain of the militia, was killed by Lugaid; though this Lugaid was a brother of Olliol Olum, five of whoſe ſons were ſlain notwithſtanding they were deſcended from the ſame mother as the rebel chief.

Mac Conn thus ſucceſsful, now gave to Ireland a monarch of the race of Ith; but in the ſpace of three years he was aſſaſſinated by the contrivance of Cormac the ſon of Art.

It is proper here to take notice of an emigration of the Iriſh to Scotland, which happened in the third century.

There was one of the ſons of Olliol Olum, who was diſtinguiſhed by the name of Achy Ruada or Riada, and he was allowed to raiſe a body of forces ſufficient to eſtabliſh himſelf in Ulſter. The acquiſitions they made there (in ſpite of the oppoſition of the family of Ir) took the name of Dalriada, or the portion of Riada. This Achy obſerving a tract of land oppoſite his diſtrict on the Caledonian ſhore, which he thought deſirable, embarking with his followers, obtained a ſettlement among the Caledonian Picts; known long afterwards by the appellation of the Albanian Dalriade, a name given to the inhabitants of Argyleſhire, who were originally deſcended from this Iriſh colony.

We ſhall not notice here the endeavours that have been made to overthrow an account which is reſted on the beſt authorities that can be deduced from hiſtory. They have been only endeavours; ſo let them reſt in peace in due time, with the aſhes of their authors.

But to return. Mac Conn having been ſlain by Cormac, the latter doubted not but that he had ſecured to himſelf the monarchy of Ireland. Yet it happened that he was inſulted and diſgraced, the rules of hoſpitality being violated. Fergus, who cauſed this to be done, ſet himſelf up for monarch of Ireland.

Cormac, now become a wanderer, condeſcended to aſſociate himſelf with Lugad Laga, though that chief (who was reputed invincible) had ſlain the king's father. In this his deſire of revenge prevailed; and it was fully gratified; for Lugad and a chief called Thady with their army engaged the forces of Fergus, and his brothers; theſe three in number were all ſlain by the hand of Lugad. The impetuous Lugad was ſo terrible in his anger that even his friends were obliged to keep out of his way till the ardour kindled in his boſom by the fight was abated. The conſequence of this deciſive battle was the advancement of Cormac to the ſovereignty of the iſland.

Being eſtabliſhed on the throne, he reviſed the laws, and framed many good regulations; he had a large and commodious palace, and maintained a very conſiderable body of houſehold troops. He was famous in war, and gained a ſettlement in that part of North Britain called Albania; and is ſaid to have opened ſeveral ſchools, and brought to light the famous pſalter of Tarah, which is ſo remarkable for containing the records of the early periods of Iriſh hiſtory. But as it is not to be expected that a perſon can always be fortunate, ſo Cormac was baffled in an expedition he made to claim a tribute from the king of Munſter, and obliged to return diſappointed to his own hereditary dominions. Yet further troubles awaited him. A great perſon of the monarch's court, who though he had formerly offended him was received again into favour, being ſeized by his ſon, had his eyes put out. This action ſo highly provoked Angus, a chief who had been his interceſſor and ſurety, that he broke forth into open rebellion. When they came to a conteſt, Angus ſlew the ſon of Cormac as he ſtood by his father's ſide, and at the ſame time, ſtruck out one of the monarch's eyes with his javelin. Yet he was routed with loſs, and obliged to fly for ſhelter to the king of Munſter.

Even during his father's lifetime, Carbry Liffechar aſcended the throne, as on account of the blemiſh he himſelf had received, it was deemed improper that he ſhould exerciſe the ſovereignty: Cormac therefore, having delivered to Carbry a book called "Advice to Kings," (which we are aſſured was extant ſo late as the year 1670), he withdrew to a ſmall houſe at Annevil where he ſpent his time in attention to philoſophy, and other uſeful ſtudies.

From the inſtance of the book above mentioned, were there no other, thoſe may be confuted who pretend to deny that the uſe of letters had been introduced in Ireland even at ſo low a period as the latter end of the third century. For though it ſhould not be acknowledged that their Mileſian anceſtors imported this knowledge; yet it might have been acquired by the Iriſh in their intercourſe with other nations.

We find it added that this prince in his retirement, by the light of nature, diſcovered the abſurdity of idol worſhip. Being choaked with the bone of a ſalmon, the Druids were inclined to declare it a judgment; while ſome writers have been weak enough to attribute this cataſtrophe to their vindictive enchantments.

Achy Gunad was ſuffered to aſſume the monarchy after the death of Carbry for ſome reaſon which we are unacquainted with. However he held the ſovereinity but one year; and being aſſaſſinated, Carbry Liffechar reaſcended the throne.

This monarch was unhappy in his ſubjects. The deſcendants of Fin or Fingal, general of the militia, being divided into two factions, their civil wars embroiled all Ireland. The cauſe of Oſſian, Fingal's ſon (the ſuppoſed author of the poems publiſhed by Mr. Macpherſon) was eſpouſed by his ſiſter's huſband, the king of Munſter; while the other party was ſupported by the king of Connaught, in whoſe cauſe the monarch himſelf, not very prudently, embarked.

In a great battle fought between theſe fierce contending powers, on one ſide fell Oſcar the ſon of Oſſian, and his ally the king of Munſter. On the other ſide the king of Connaught was wounded, and Carbry himſelf was ſlain. Such was the conſequence of the monarch's being too ready to interfere in the diſputes of his ſubjects.

Two ſons of Mac Conn ſucceeded to Carbry, and reigned jointly at firſt, but afterwards quarrelling the elder ſlew the younger, and was himſelf ſlain by the militia of the country.

We have here a long account of the inſtitution and cuſtoms of the body of militia, which was commanded by Fin in the time of Cairbor, which troops, we are informed, were ſubſiſted by billeting them upon the country from Allhallow-tide till the month of May, but during the other part of the year, they were obliged to provide for themſelves by hunting, fiſhing, &c. which alſo contributed to their health by the wholeſomeneſs of the exerciſe. The deſcription of their qualifications is prolix, ſeems much exaggerated, and in ſome reſpects ſo romantic (not to ſay improbable) that we have not thought it neceſſary to copy what might have the appearance of invention rather than of a fact recorded in hiſtory. Indeed, if the Iriſh ever had ſuch a militia, it was wonderful that they did not keep them up; ſince according to the repreſentation we have of them, they might have prevented the effects of ſubſequent foreign invaſions.

It is not to be underſtood, however, that there is a ſhadow of doubt with regard to ſuch an inſtitution having exiſted in Ireland, as beſides the teſtimony of hiſtory we have many other collateral evidences, among which may be reckoned the burnt earth, now often turned up by the plough, which the huſbandmen well know to have been occaſioned by fires made in pits in the earth, wherein theſe brave men uſed to dreſs their food, baking it in theſe ſubterraneous ovens, in a manner not unlike that which we find was in uſe in ſome of the new diſcovered iſlands. The burnt ſoil ſo dug up is known by the name of Fulacht Fionn to this day.

But to return. The two Mac Conns being ſlain, Fiachty Stabtine the ſon of Carbry Liffechar, of the old Heremonian line, ſucceeded to the monarchy. Having married a daughter of the prince of Wales, he had a ſon by her named Murcdach Tireach, a prince of merit, but whoſe merit and the favours conferred on him by his father, excited the envy of the people. The family of the Collas, his kinſmen, taking advantage of this diſpoſition, endeavoured to raiſe an inſurrection, reſolving to deſtroy a monarch whom it appears that they had formerly offended, thereby verifying the proverb, "That the aggreſſors never forgive."

By treachery they turned their arms againſt their king, whom they defeated and ſlew while his ſon was abſent on an expedition.

Colla Vais from a rebel now became monarch of Ireland; but he held the ſovereignty only four years, for Muredach, who had long kept together a brave and loyal band, attacked the uſurper and defeated him; in conſequence of which he and his brothers fled into Albania.

Muredach being thus left in peaceable poſſeſſion of the throne, uſed every poſſible means to make his people happy.

Within three years, however, the Collas returned, and ſurrendering themſelves to Muredach; his clemency was ſuch that he not only pardoned them but received them into his favour, and afterwards yielding to their reſtleſs diſpoſition lent them ſeven thouſand men to invade Ulſter, on pretence of an old affront put upon Cormac the ſon of Art, from whom they were deſcended.

They ſucceeded after a bloody conteſt, but in the mean time Muredach loſt his crown and life to a chief named Colbach, while his forces were abſent on this unjuſt undertaking.

Some attribute the clemency of Muredach to the Collas, and their confidence in ſurrendering to him to the effect of a prediction, "That if he put them to death, his race ſhould never aſcend the throne:" however that might be, it ſeems that he loſt his own life by injudiciouſly aſſiſting them in an expedition, the conſequence of which was their eſtabliſhment in Ulſter.

On what pretence ſoever Colbach who was of the race of Ir, ſlew Muredach, it is certain that before a twelvemonth expired he was killed by a ſon of that monarch.

After he was ſlain by Achy, the latter ſucceeded to his father's throne: he had a ſon named Niall, or Neal, by a Welch princeſs, and died at the palace of Tarah after a reign of eight years.

The next monarch was Crimthan, of the line of Heber, who is reported to have made expeditions into Gaul and Britain. That he made ſome expeditions into Britain is not impoſſible; but that he returned with honour or advantage is not ſo likely; ſince, by the correſponding chronology of hiſtory it appears that the Picts whoſe ally we muſt ſuppoſe him, were, at this time, repulſed by the Roman power. Crimthan died by poiſon which was adminiſtered by his own ſiſter.

Niall or Neal, ſurnamed "Of the Nine Hoſtages." He brought over ſuccours to the Dalriadas planted in Britain, who were much oppreſſed by the neighbouring Picts. The Iriſh writers ſay that the name of Albania was exchanged for that of Scotia Minor, in order to preſerve the remembrance of the former inhabitants.

This Niall, in his ninth year, went again over into the Northern parts of Britain, where entering into an alliance both with the Picts and the natives, they jointly carried deſtruction before them whereever they came. He afterwards paſſed over with his victorious army into Armorica or Bretagne, in Gaul, (now Britanny) and from thence it ſeems they returned laden with ſpoils, having met with little oppoſition, becauſe the Roman legions were now every where retiring from their provincial conqueſts, being called home for the neceſſary defence of Italy.

Amongſt the priſoners taken in Armorica were two hundred young children; and we find that one of theſe was Patrick, afterwards the great apoſtle of the Iriſh nation, who firſt became acquainted with the people there when he was about ſixteen years of age.

After this ſucceſs another expedition to Armorica was reſolved upon, when Niall concerted meaſures ſo well with the Dalriadas, that the Iriſh and Scotch armies met on the banks of the Loire. Here fortune ſeemed to aſſure Niall of ſucceſs; for the natives fled on all ſides before the allied army. But while he was thus triumphing, he was cut off in an unexpected manner.

At Niall's firſt acceſſion to the throne, a ſon of the king of Leinſter poſſeſſed himſelf of the palace of Tarah, the monarch then making no uſe of it. Being informed of this outrage about a week after it was committed, the offender was required to quit the palace; but he gave no heed to this requiſition, and ſome ſkirmiſhes paſſed before the monarch could regain his right. To aggravate this inſolence, the ſame prince had maliciouſly ſlain the ſon of Niall's favourite Druid, even while he was entertained at his father's houſe, in violation of the rules of hoſpitality.

As he was apprehenſive of the conſequences of theſe deeds he fled to Scotland; and from thence, we are informed, that he paſſed over to Gaul, where the confederate armies lay. There he inliſted himſelf under the banners of the Scotch chief, who likewiſe uſed his endeavours to reconcile him with the Iriſh monarch; but the latter was ſo much irritated againſt him, that all ſolicitations of this ſort proved vain. His thoughts being bent on revenge, or rather aſſaſſination, nothing leſs than the death of this victorious monarch could ſatisfy him; therefore, watching an opportunity while Niall was ſitting careleſsly on the banks of the Loire, from the covert of ſome trees he ſhot an arrow at the monarch, which was ſo well directed that it gave him a mortal wound. When Niall fell, the hopes of both armies fell with him, as he was conſidered in the light of the ſpirit of their cauſe (ſuch as it was), and the very ſoul of their whole undertaking. The invaders retired, and the country was delivered from their arms, through a happy event, though thus treacherouſly brought about by an aſſaſſin.

Dathy, who ſucceeded Niall, was of the line of Heremon. He held the monarchy for twenty-three years. The Iriſh writers ſay he fought ſucceſsfully abroad; but received his death by a ſtroke at the foot of the Alps. From thence his body was brought and interred in his native ſoil. This Dathy was the laſt Pagan monarch of the iſland.

BOOK II.

From the MISSION of St. PATRICK to the ACCESSION of King JAMES I.

CHAP. I.

The Miſſion of St. Patrick—Chriſtianity eſtabliſhed—Succeſſion of Kings, &c.—Turgeſius's Demand, and Malachi's Stratagem—Landing of the Norwegians—Various Incidents—Submiſſion of the Iriſh under King Henry II.

WE have already obſerved that this tutelar ſaint of Ireland was firſt brought to that country when he was but a child, in the ſituation of a captive. But his miſſion took place in the reign of Laogary, the ſon of Niall or Neal, in the year 430. It appears, however, that there were chriſtians on the iſland before the time of Laogary; and we find that Palladius, the immediate precurſor of St. Patrick, was ſent expreſsly to the believers. This biſhop meeting with little ſucceſs, quitted Ireland, and purſuing his deſign in North Britain, died among the Picts.

As for Patrick, warmed with the hopes of overcoming all difficulties, he firſt ſet out for Britain; where he preached but a few days, and then croſſing the Iriſh ſeas, he arrived ſafe at Wicklow. Having advanced into the country, he was ſo ſtrongly oppoſed by a Pagan chief called Nath, that he and his followers were obliged to reimbark; but inſtead of returning to Rome or Britain, they proceeded along the coaſt to that part of Ulſter called Ullagh. There they were ſeized as pirates, and carried before a chief named Dichu, who was not only convinced of the miſtake, but was alſo made a proſelyte. From this time the affairs of the Chriſtians began to take a ſavourable turn; and at length the miſſionary coming to Tarah converted the monarch and his court. The writers of the earlier ages have not failed to interſperſe ſome miracles in their accounts, among which that of freeing the iſland from venomous animals, was reckoned the greateſt; but as this is given up by the moſt ſenſible perſons of all perſuaſions, it would be needleſs to ſay any thing further here on the ſubject.

Patrick founded a biſhop's ſee at Clogher, but ſurrendered it to one Mac Curtin. Removing two years after to Ardmagh, which he reſolved to make the metropolitan ſee, he eſtabliſhed there ſeveral ſeminaries of learning. Then he paſſed over to Britain, and returned from thence with thirty holy men, whom he conſecrated biſhops, and indeed ſeems to have acted as patriarch of his own church, the pope not interfering. We likewiſe read that the Iriſh biſhops went on conſecrating each other, and that there were no archbiſhops there till a certain legate brought four palls thither, a cuſtom before unknown in Ireland. After frequent journeyings from place to place, returning for the laſt time from Rome, having eſtabliſhed Chriſtianity, and greatly contributed to reforming the records of the country, St. Patrick died on his way to Ardmagh, and was buried at Down, in the year 491.

To return to Laogary. In the early part of his reign, he tranſported a large body of troops to the aſſiſtance of the Picts, who were at that time making inroads into the ſouthern provinces of Britain, and were every where victorious, till the arrival of Saxon ſuccours, when they were totally defeated by Hengiſt and Horſa, in a bloody battle at Stamford in Lincolnſhire.

The next war that Laogary engaged in, was for the recovery of the Leinſter tribute, but being taken priſoner, he did not obtain his releaſe till, by oath, he ſolemnly renounced his claim. Notwithſtanding, he broke this agreement, and was ſlain in battle, or, according to ſome, killed by lightning, in the 30th year of his reign, while he was again endeavouring to enforce what he had ſworn never more to demand.

Olliol Molt, the ſon of Dathy, ſucceeded; and he alſo warred for the recovery of that tribute, which had coſt his predeceſſor ſo dear. But though he ſeemed likely to ſucceed in this, he was cut ſhort in his career, by Lughad, the ſon of Laogary, who had been ſet aſide. This prince defeated and ſlew him in a pitched battle, and reigned in his ſtead.

Lughad was continually engaged in war. In his reign the Dalriadas, ſettled in North Britain, are ſaid to have been forced by the Picts to retreat to Ireland; from whence, however, they returned with ſuch a force as enabled them, not only to regain, but even to extend their poſſeſſions.

The manner of Lughad's death is uncertain, but it is moſt probable that he died ſuddenly; and after a five years conteſt for the throne, Murketagh, the grandſon of Lorn, of the family of Eirk, who had gained much glory in the Pictiſh wars, was choſen monarch. After fighting many battles, and holding the reins of government for twenty-one years, in the midſt of diſturbances, this prince died a natural death.

His grandfather, Lorn, had got himſelf acknowledged king of Albanian Dalriada; and the plans he laid for gaining the Scotch ſovereignty being brought to perfection by his brother Fergus, who outlived him, the latter has been eſteemed the founder of the Scotch monarchy.

Tuathal Maol Garb ſucceeding, reigned ſeven years, and was famous for nothing but the many battles that he fought.

Dermod, the ſucceeding monarch, Niall's grandſon, of the line of Heremon, reigned twenty-two years, during which period there were continual wars between the provincial kings. He fell by the ſword, was ſucceeded by Fergus and Donald, who reigned but one year, dying after a ſignal victory, which they gained over the king of Munſter.

Achy, the ſon of Daniel, next ſucceeded, who aſſociated his uncle with him in the government.

Ainmerach next mounted the throne, who was ſlain after a ſhort reign by Fergus Mac Neill, and ſucceeded by Badan, who fell by the hands of aſſaſſins.

The next monarch was Hugh, the ſon of Ainmerach, deſcended from Niall, of the Heremonian line. He called an aſſembly, not at Tarah, but at Dromceal, the object of which was to enforce a ſmall tribute from the Dalriadas; to expel, or at leaſt repreſs, the bards or poets, who were grown equally lazy and troubleſome; and to enact ſome neceſſary ordinances. To this meeting the nobility, gentry, and clergy, were invited, and hither came Columb-Kill from Albania uninvited; himſelf only an abbot, yet attended by twenty biſhops, forty prieſts, fifty religious of different orders, and having thirty ſtudents in his train.

Paſſing by ſome improbable recitals, and miraculous tales, it appears that this abbot (afterwards ſainted) got ſome mitigation of the poets intended ſentence; but could not obtain a remiſſion of the tribute of the Dalriadas, which was his principal aim; ſo that, after an almoſt fruitleſs errand, he returned in diſguſt, obſerving, "That the Dalriadas were the care of heaven, and would certainly be delivered from that oppreſſion."

Hugh, like many other preceding monarchs, demanded the Leinſter tribute, which being peremptorily refuſed, he ſent his ſon with an army to enforce the claim. The army was defeated, and the prince was killed; yet the monarch made a ſimilar attempt, and the conſequence was, that his troops were defeated, and he was ſlain in battle.

Two other Hughs ſucceeded, and both fell by the ſword, the firſt after a reign of only ſix, and the other of twenty ſeven years.

Moulohoba reigned four years, and fell in the field.

Suibne Meam, his ſucceſſor on the throne, was killed by Conal Claoin, and Donald reigned in his ſtead.

This prince, who was the grandſon of Ainmerach, and deſcended from the race of Heremon, died a natural death.

Two brothers, named Connal and Kellach, deſcended from Hugh the Firſt, ſucceeded. Hugh periſhed in a bog, and Connal was killed by Dermod, the ſon of Hugh Slaine.

Dermod (together with a prince of the name of Blathmac), ſucceeded; and both princes died of the plague, after a ſeven years reign.

Sachnuſach was the next monarch, who died after a ſhort reign, as did Kionfola, his ſucceſſor. The Picts landed, and made ſome depredations in Ireland in the reign of both theſe princes.

In Fionachta's time, who next aſcended the throne, the Welch and Engliſh invaded the iſland; but, as we are told, were both ſo roughly handled, that they were glad to reimbark with loſs and diſgrace.

grace. The ſame is related of the Welch in the ſucceeding reign of Longſeach, who at laſt loſt his life fighting againſt the king of Connaught, and left his throne to Congall, who is reported to have been a Pagan, and after a reign of ſeven years died ſuddenly.

Feorgall, a great-grandſon of Hugh, was the next monarch, in whoſe reign the Welch making another attack, were again defeated. But this prince loſt his life in battle, while he was endeavouring to enforce the odious Leinſter tribute, ſo contrary to reaſon and juſtice.

Fogarthach, Kinneth, and Flaithertach, ſucceeded. The two former fell by the ſword; but the latter reſigned his crown, a little while before his death, and gave himſelf up to ſtudy and retirement.

After his deceaſe, Hugh the Fourth aſcended the throne; he defeated the troops of Leinſter in a pitched battle, in which the provincial king was ſlain. The victor in that conteſt, wherein he was ſeverely wounded, ſurvived only to be ſlain in fight by Donald, the ſon of Mortough, who reigned twenty years, and died a natural death.

Donald was ſucceeded by Niall, the ſon of Feorgall, in whoſe reign famine and earthquakes made great devaſtations. He died at the abbey of Jona, in the Scotch dominions, whither he had retired from religious motives, and was ſucceeded by Donchada, in whoſe reign the Danes firſt commenced their piracies. This monarch died a natural death, after a reign of twenty-ſeven years.

Hugh the Fifth next aſcended the throne. Not only the Danes, but the Norwegians alſo, infeſted Ireland, while inteſtine commotions prevailed; and the monarch, after having reigned twenty-two years, was ſlain in the field, but not fighting againſt the Danes, whom he left in poſſeſſion of near half the country at his death.

Connor, the ſon of Donogh, was the next ſucceeding monarch. Inſtead of endeavouring to repulſe the foreigners, he entered into conteſts with his own ſubjects, ſuffered the people of Leinſter to be defeated by the common enemy, and died a natural death, leaving a mangled kingdom to his ſucceſſor.

Niall, his ſon, who ſucceeded him, trod in his ſteps, and buſied himſelf in invading the province of Leinſter, in order to place there a king of his own chuſing, while the Danes and Norwegians were making their uſual depredations; carrying all before them, and then fighting each other for the plunder. Indeed we are told, that twelve years being thus miſpent, the monarch rouſed himſelf, gave battle to the Danes, and conquered; but ſoon after this event, he loſt his life, in an endeavour to reſcue one of his retinue from drowning; and Malachy, king of Meath, the nephew of Connor, was elected by the Iriſh.

But the Danes, who had by this time made a ſettlement in the iſland, ſet up their chief Turgeſius, who was ſupported by the arrival of a great fleet from his country. As they were now too ſtrong for oppoſition, they committed unheard of ravages and cruelties: as ignorant men, they commenced hoſtilities againſt learning—as Pagans, they wiſhed to deſtroy the veſtiges of Chriſtianity. For their defence they built certain forts, called Raths, from whence they could iſſue and plunder with ſecurity: and thus Turgeſius, and his people, held the iron rod of oppreſſion over the natives, till, according to the teſtimony of the Iriſh writers, they were relieved by a very ſingular event, which is thus related:

Turgeſius permiting Malachy to retain the honorary title of monarch, and to be attended with a ſlight guard, uſed ſometimes to viſit him, and had conceived a paſſion for his daughter, whom he wiſhed this injured prince to reſign to his deſires. Malachy pretended to comply, and promiſed, on a night appointed, to ſend the princeſs, together with fifteen other more beautiful young virgins, to the tyrant's caſtle, ſo that he might take his choice, and if he remained ſtill prejudiced in her favour, ſhe was at his ſervice. In the mean time he concerted matters for a quite different purpoſe.

The Iriſh princeſs and her train repaired to the place, where being expected, they were admitted to Turgeſius and fifteen of his favourites, whom he had brought with him, all intent on love and dalliance. He had no ſooner embraced Malachy's daughter, in confirmation of his choice, than the ſuppoſed virgins, drawing ſwords from under their garments, ruſhed on his laſcivious unſuſpecting chiefs, and put them to death; while the monarch with his guards broke in, at an appointed ſignal, and made the tyrant priſoner. The uſurper's ſoldiers were every where attacked, as had been concerted, and ſlaughtered, under cover of the darkneſs, and himſelf condemned to die, as a puniſhment for his uſurpation and cruelties. This ſerved as a token for falling on the Danes in all quarters of the iſland, whoſe raths were taken, and themſelves ſubdued with a terrible ſlaughter, none ſurviving but ſuch as ſubmitted to become the ſervants of thoſe, over whom they had formerly lorded it with ſuch tyranny.

The Iriſh monarch reſuming the government, the land was reſtored for ſome time to tranquillity; but notwithſtanding this expulſion, the Eaſterlings could not keep from the coaſts; and we likewiſe find, that, by a ſtrange infatuation (probably under the notion of encouraging trade) they were even ſuffered to rebuild the cities of Dublin, Waterford, and Limeric, which had been deſtroyed in the courſe of former wars.

From this ill-judged policy naturally aroſe continual diſputes; and it was not long before the Norwegians, in their turn, made themſelves maſters of many fortified and ſea-port towns, being oppoſed by the Danes only, and not by the native Iriſh.

A prince of the royal blood of Denmark, ſoon after took the command of his countrymen, and preſently reduced numbers of the Iriſh, who had before kept their independence, to ſubjection.

Thus affairs were beginning to take their former turn, when the foreigners met with a ſevere check from Hugh, the ſixth of that name. This prince dying a natural death, was ſucceeded by Flan; in whoſe time the inteſtine broils were renewed, and particularly by an eccleſiaſtical prince named Cormac, whom the monkiſh writers ſurnamed the Holy. This prince-biſhop, whoſe hand is known in the Pſalter of Caſhell, was inſtigated by an abbot to commence a war againſt the king of Leinſter, in order to recover a certain tribute, that we cannot find he had the leaſt title to. It is ſaid there was a prophecy, that he ſhould die in the attempt; yet he reſolved to proceed, encountered a ſuperior force, ſaw his army routed, and was thrown violently from his horſe into a pit, from whence he was relieved and remounted by his flying ſoldiers; but afterwards attempting to climb a ſteep precipice, he fell and broke his neck; and thus ended his raſh expedition and his life together. Thus fell Cormac the Holy, king of Munſter.—Let the reader make his own comments on the matter.

Flan, who had joined in chaſtiſing Cormac, dying, after a reign of thirty-ſeven years, was ſucceeded by Niall, the ſon of Hugh the ſixth, who reigned three years, defeated the Danes in Ulſter, but was ſlain in oppoſing a body of theſe freebooters, that ſtormed Dublin under their chief Sithric.

Donogh, the ſon of Flan, ſucceeded. His reign was remarkable for a ſevere conteſt between this Sithric and Ceallachan king of Munſter, who fell into an ambuſh laid by the Dane, and was taken priſoner. He was then required to deliver up Cork, Caſhell, Waterford, and Limerick, a demand which he thought proper to diſſemble a compliance with; but being permitted to ſend one of the Iriſh captives to communicate this requiſition and negociate for his ranſom with the regent of Munſter, he privately ſent a charge to him not to comply, but rather haſten to attack the enemy by ſea and land.

When Sithric heard the firſt part of theſe tidings at Ardmagh, he ordered thoſe who had the charge of the city to engage the Momonians: they did ſo, and were defeated, while he removed with his priſoners on board the ſhips. The Munſter army followed, but ſaw the enemy for the preſent out of their reach. However, in a ſhort time, the Iriſh fleet, to their enemies aſtoniſhment, came up. But the admiral was ſlain, yet Fingall, who ſucceeded him in command, boarding Sithric's ſhip, flung himſelf and the Dane overboard together. Two other of the Iriſh chiefs following the example, Sithric's brothers were likewiſe plunged with them into the ſea; and the Danes having thus loſt almoſt all that was worth contending for, and fearing to engage men that ſet ſo little value on their lives, yielded a deſerved victory to their opponents; a victory which Ceallachan improved by falling upon and routing the Danes in all quarters.

Fearghna ſucceeded to the crown of Munſter on the death of this prince, but being taken off by a conſpiracy, Mahon, the ſon of the regent who ſo well executed Ceallachan's orders, was elected. He had two brothers, one of whom, Brian Boiromhe, was afterwards elected monarch of the iſland, as will be ſeen in the ſequel. Mahon unfortunately ended his life by a conſpiracy of his own ſubjects.

After a weak monarch, whoſe reign it will be preſumed, as far as relates to his own government, was ſcarcely worth recording, ſucceeded Congall, ſon of Melmith, of the race of Heremon, who acted with ſpirit againſt the Danes and defeated theſe perpetual troublers of the peace in a great battle, wherein they loſt 7000 men. By this time, Brian Boiromhe had become king of Munſter on the demiſe of his brother, and invaded the kingdom of Leinſter with ſucceſs, becauſe he found the people there attached to the Daniſh cauſe, whoſe united forces were not able to withſtand the power of this hero's arms.

Malachy ſucceeded to Congall; and though at firſt we find him praiſed for his ſpirit, was at length depoſed by the ſuffrage of the people, on account of ſome real or ſuppoſed neglect, and Brian was elected in his room; the provincial kings and chiefs withholding their aſſiſtance from the former.

On the reſignation of Malachy, Brian was proclaimed monarch, who made the former many preſents, and confirmed him in his hereditary kingdom of Meath; and in the next year received the ſubmiſſion of the kings of Ulſter and Connaught, in order to ſtrengthen himſelf in his newly acquired ſovereignty. Yet ſeveral of the petty chieftains were diſpoſed not to acknowledge him. Againſt ſome he ſent his ſon who reduced them to ſubmiſſion: others he in perſon ſubdued. But while he was thus employed, a party of the Danes began to plunder Ulſter, another party landed in Munſter and burned Cork; after which being joined by ſome Leinſter people, they entered Meath, where they made terrible havock; but Murtough, the ſon of Brian, falling in with theſe laſt took their king and his ſon priſoners, whom he cauſed to be put to death, routed the Danes, and purſued them and their Leinſter allies to the gates of Dublin.

The monarch, beſides every where ſuppreſſing the Danes, turned his attention to the arts of peace, rebuilding and repairing thoſe churches which had been deſtroyed or defaced, erecting many new ſeminaries of learning, and cauſing ſuch wholeſome laws to be eſtabliſhed, and enforced, as contributed to keep good order in the kingdom.

Brian kept his court at Cean Coradh in Munſter, where he had thirteen fortified palaces, and is ſaid to have lived in great dignity and ſplendour.

But all the happineſs the people might have expected from the valour and abilities of ſuch a prince was overturned by an event which appears as extraordinary as it was unexpected, as the Iriſh writers give us the relation.

They tell us that Brian intending to fit out a navy for the protection of the coaſts, ſent to the king of Leinſter, for three of the largeſts maſts that could be found in his territories. Three tribes, accompanied by the king in perſon, were appointed to convey them; but quarrelling for precedence, the provincial prince not only declared in favour of one of them, but diſmounting helped to bear it on his ſhoulders, in which action the ſilver button that cloſed his mantle flew off, and he proceeded to the court of Brian, where he deſired the queen who was his ſiſter to fix another in its ſtead. But ſhe, on being informed of the circumſtance above related, reproached her brother for his meanneſs, though what he had done was in honour of her huſband, and threw the mantle into the fire.

Maolmorda, thus rouſed by his ſiſter, it ſeems was ſo weak as to be angry with the monarch for his own ſervile behaviour, which had never been required. The next day, interfering in a game of cheſs, which he cauſed prince Mortogh to loſe to Duncan the ſon of Coning, ſome ſharp words aroſe, and the provincial prince, who only waited for occaſion of offence, departed the next morning without leave, after having thrown out ſome hints of joining the remaining Danes, which Mortogh little regarded. But Brian being informed of the cauſe of Maolmorda's departure, ſent a herald with a rich preſent, to requeſt his return. The king of Leinſter returned the civility by ſtriking the herald ſo ſeverely over the head with a ſtick that he made a fracture on his ſkull. This man who was conveyed back on a litter, repreſenting the affair, the monarch was adviſed to ſend a body of troops in purſuit of Maolmorda, to bring him back, and compel him in perſon to anſwer for his infamous behaviour.

But Brian ſlighted this ſalutary advice, replying that he would chaſtiſe the offender at pleaſure even at his own door. This might be the anſwer of heroiſm; but could not be looked upon as that of prudence. As the aggreſſor ſeldom forgives, Maolmorda requeſted the aſſiſtance of the Danes, 12,000 of whom having joined him, he ſent a challenge to the monarch to meet him at the head of his troops and give him battle at Clontarf.

The challenge was accepted, Brian was old, and had been perſuaded to retire to his tent while his ſons managed the fight. The engagement was bloody, till at length the Danes giving way, the troops of Leinſter followed; a general rout enſued, clear victory remaining to the monarch's troops though purchaſed with the loſs of 4000 men, and of their general Murtogh, who was treacherouſly murdered by a wounded Dane that had requeſted his aſſiſtance. But the Iriſh ſuſtained a ſtill greater loſs in the death of their king, who as they ſay, was by ſome means ſo ſlightly guarded that he was ſlain in the 88th year of his age by a party of flying Danes, who paid with their lives for the aſſaſſination.

On the Daniſh ſide, the ſon of the king of Denmark was ſlain, with the chief of the inhabitants of Dublin, and above 4000 ſoldiers. Maolmorda, king of Leinſter, was alſo killed, with the principal of his nobility and 3700 of his forces, who might be conſidered as the victims of his implacable and ill-placed reſentment.

Brian had brought with him Malachy king of Meath; but no ſooner did the trumpet ſound, than this depoſed monarch ſeparated his forces from the Iriſh army; and retiring to a convenient diſtance, ſtood a calm ſpectator of the battle which was to decide the liberties of his country.

The judicious reader may perceive that there was ſomething extraordinary in the conduct of this war, the management of it, and the manner of the monarch's death; but we have related the whole matter as we have found it, drawing our account from the beſt authorities extant.

The Iriſh army, it ſeems, did not think of purſuing the advantage they had gained; but ſeparated after the engagement, and Donogh, Brian's ſon, was left to go home only with his Momonians. To the diſgrace of a part of the Iriſh, he was inſulted, and even threatened to be fought with, by ſome of the petty princes; and though, by perſeverance and courage, he overcame all obſtacles in the end, yet, after the loſs ſuſtained at the battle of Clontarf, and the injury ſuffered by being harraſſed by his own countrymen, not above 850 of this warlike tribe returned ſafe to Munſter.

After the death of Brian, Malachy was reſtored to the monarchy, and took ſome ſteps to recommend himſelf to the people's favour. Among the reſt he took Dublin by ſtorm, and gave the city up to plunder; yet after the loſs of the Momonian monarch, there was ſcarcely any thing but confuſion; one petty chief riſing up againſt another, and the remaining Danes uſing their endeavours, wherever there was an opportunity, of putting in for their ſhare of plunder. Among the reſt, they made an attempt againſt the king of Leinſter, who fell in the conteſt; but his ſucceſſor ſo completely revenged his cauſe, that, defeating the enemy, he put almoſt a final period to their ſtrength and intereſt in Ireland. While theſe things paſſed, Malachy died a natural death.

Donogh, whom ſome ſuſpected of having made quick conveyance of his brother Teig, did not immediately accompliſh his attempt of ſucceeding his father. With ſome of his followers he went over to Germany, and ſerved under the emperor; but returning, he received the crown of Munſter and its apendages; and beſides this his power was acknowledged by the ſouthern part of the kingdom. But a ſtrong party was formed againſt him by Dermod, king of Leinſter, on behalf of Turlogh, the ſon of his brother Teig. Donogh fought valiantly; but was at laſt obliged to fly the kingdom, and retire to Rome, where he ſolicited the pope's authority to contribute to his reſtoration. Not ſucceeding in this, he took the habit of a religious in the abbey of St. Stephen, and left his nephew Turlogh in poſſeſſion of the throne, who died of a lingering illneſs, after a twenty years reign.

His ſon Murtogh ſucceeded him; but after many bloody battles, was obliged to divide his ſway with a Donald, of the Heremonian race. Worn out either with cares or with ſickneſs, this prince retired to the monaſtery of Liſmore, and afterwards taking the habit of a monk at Ardmagh, he ſpent the remainder of his days in acts of piety and devotion. Donald V. his partner in the monarchy, died about two years afterwards, and made way for a king of Connaught.

This was a Turlogh, ſurnamed the Great, who had been kindling continual wars in the iſland before he advanced thoſe claims to the monarchy which it took ſome years to eſtabliſh. Having conſtituted his ſon king of Meath he made frequent incurſions into Leinſter and other provinces, but received ſome checks from the ſon of Donald, who called in foreign power, and prevailed ſo far that the monarch was forced to deſiſt from hoſtilities, and to give hoſtages for his future good behaviour. Yet he was a prince of general good character, had not his virtues been eclipſed by ambition.

Dying, he might properly be ſaid to have been ſucceeded by Mortogh in the government of the greateſt part of the iſland; but he was oppoſed by Roderic the ſon of Mortogh, and never inaugurated. While he yet aſſumed the name of monarch, he invaded Ulad, in the territory of Ulſter, and when a peace was made by mediation, cauſed three of the chiefs of the country to be aſſaſſinated, and the prince's eyes to be put out; in revenge for which treachery, the chief of Orgial, who had been ſurety for the latter, attacked Mortogh and ſlew him in battle, in the year 1166.

After his death Roderic O'Conner, the ſon of Turlogh the Great was ſolemnly inaugurated; yet he found that he did not reign thoroughly in the hearts of his ſubjects; though he tried to awe them into ſubjection.

But Ireland was now on the point of ſuffering an extraordinary revolution, on the eve of becoming a province to the Engliſh, whom they could have no reaſon at that time to ſuſpect of the leaſt intention to invade them.

This great event was firſt brought about by what might not improperly be called a private quarrel, though it originated between princes. Dermod, king of Leinſter, ſtole away the wife of Tighernan O'Rourk, king of Breffny, who applying to the monarch, the latter together with the forces of Meath and Oſſory invaded the offender's dominions, who reſolved to withdraw from the ſtorm and implore foreign aſſiſtance.

Turning his thoughts on the Engliſh, he determined to apply to Henry the ſecond, ſon of the empreſs Matilda, and croſſing to Briſtol, and from thence to France, he went in ſearch of that monarch. He was found in Aquitaine, and the Iriſh prince engaging to hold his dominions as a fief of the Britiſh crown, Henry did not ſet about raiſing an army for the purpoſe, but gave him letters of authority and recommendation to ſuch as ſhould think proper to aſſiſt him.

With theſe, Dermod returned to Briſtol, and, after waiting a long time in vain, at length met with Richard Clare, earl of Pembroke, ſurnamed Strongbow, who came into his views on a promiſe made him by Dermod of giving him his daughter in marriage, with the right of ſucceſſion to the crown of Leinſter.

After this negociation the Iriſh prince went into Wales, where he engaged Maurice Fitzgerald, and Robert Fitz-Stephen, ſons of a princeſs of South Wales, by promiſes, to grant him aſſiſtance. Theſe matters being ſettled, Dermod went over privately to Leinſter, where he lay on the watch for intelligence. The expected auxiliaries had not arrived, but he collected a number of Welch and Flemings with whom he made ſome attempts, but being met by the monarch of Ireland, after a ſkirmiſh or two, he ſubmitted on being allowed ten cantreds or hundreds out of thirty-one, in the province of Leinſter, and promiſing O'Rourk one hundred ounces of gold for his protection.

But nothing was farther from the intention of Dermod than to keep his agreement. As ſoon as he heard that Fitz-Stephen, Hervey de Mountmaurice, and Maurice de Pendegraſt, were landed at Banough Bay, he put himſelf at the head of a body of troops, and joining them, took Wexford. The people of Oſſory next felt his fury, and their forces being routed after a deſperate battle, in which the Engliſh almoſt alone gained the victory, two hundred heads being cut off and brought him, he leaped and ſang a hymn with ſavage exultation, even biting off the noſe and lips of one of the deceaſed whom he moſt hated. But Roderic ſoon after this coming up to attack them, another treaty was concluded, which reſtored Dermod to his kingdom of Leinſter, on condition that he ſhould hold it of Roderic, as monarch of Ireland: and he deſigned to keep this treaty as well as he had done the former one, though he had now given his own ſon as an hoſtage.

He ſoon after found a pretence for laying waſte the lands round Dublin; but entered into a treaty with the Eaſterlings, and left one Haſculf, their countryman, governor of the city, in order to aſſiſt Donald, prince of Limeric, who was then in arms againſt Roderic, who was much diſtreſſed between them.

Dermod now aſpired to the monarchy of Ireland; but was adviſed to repreſs his eagerneſs, and to ſend to haſten the earl of Pembroke's levies, which advice he complied with. The earl having applied to king Henry, and received an equivocal anſwer, which he choſe to conſider in his own favour, that nobleman reſolved to proceed, firſt ſending before him a choſen band of men under the command of Raymond, a gentleman of his houſehold; they landed near Waterford, where with difficulty they defeated a body of the Iriſh that oppoſed them, and then ſullied their victory by barbarouſly breaking the limbs of their captives, and throwing them into the ſea: this act that ſavages might be aſhamed of, was perpetrated at the inſtigation of Hervey de Mountmaurice.

Strongbow, though he had received what amounted to a prohibition from his ſovereign, embarked for Ireland, and before he was joined by Dermod's troops took Waterford by ſtorm. The ſtreets were filled with ſlaughter, when the king of Leinſter arriving, the earl claimed the king's promiſes, and eſpouſed his daughter Eva that very day; and the night was ſpent in feſtivity and rejoicing, though the morning opened with ſcenes of bloodſhed. On this marriage is founded a claim of the crown of England to the ſovereignty of Ireland; the earl having reſigned to K. Henry all pretenſions in the iſland.

While Dermod triumphed thus in one quarter, his preſence was found neceſſary in another; for he received intelligence that Haſculf, governor of Dublin, had revolted, and that Roderic had marched to his aſſiſtance. The king of Leinſter repaired thither, and finding that the Iriſh monarch had unwiſely raiſed his camp to go on another expedition, attacked and took the city with great ſlaughter.

Roderic now ſent the provincial prince a letter, in which he threatened to preſent him with his ſon's head if he extended his conqueſts beyond Leinſter; but Dermod void of compaſſion as of faith, ſlighted the intimation, and the other proved too merciful to put his menace in execution.

Juſt at this juncture, Henry thought proper to recal Strongbow and all his ſubjects from Ireland; but the earl pacified his maſter, by ſending him a ſubmiſſive letter by Raymond, in which he obſerved, “That as all he had acquired or could obtain, was got by his majeſty's favour, ſo it ſhould all be returned to him, and uſed at his will and pleaſure.”

In the interim, Dermod attacking his rival O'Rourke was foiled; and ſoon after the former died in the midſt of thoſe wars wherein he had involved his country.

The earl of Pembroke then took poſſeſſion of Dermod's eſtate, and likewiſe of Dublin, the capital of Leinſter; but this city was ſoon after inveſted by ſea and land, while he and his party were reduced to the greateſt extremity. He now propoſed terms to the Iriſh monarch, the principal of which was that on condition of his withdrawing his army, Leinſter ſhould be held of him as a feudatory tenure.

But Roderic expecting no leſs than to clear the iſland of foreigners, returned for a final anſwer, “That unleſs the Engliſh would ſurrender Dublin, “Waterford, Wexford, and all their fortified places, “and promiſe at an appointed time to embark for “their native country, he would proceed to ſtorm “the place.” This threw the beſieged into confuſion; but Miles Cogan being then in the city, adviſed a ſally, which he ſaid, would have a great chance for ſucceſs, on account of its being unexpected. His counſel was followed, and by the unpardonable negligence of the Iriſh, they were caught unprepared, and their camp being ſurpriſed, were forced to raiſe the ſiege with precipitation.

The earl of Pembroke now marched to ſuccour Fitz-Stephen, whom he thought to find defending Wexford; but the place was already taken, and he made priſoner. On the approach of the Engliſh army, the Iriſh ſet the town on fire; and retiring to a neighbouring iſland, ſent Pembroke word, that if he preſumed to follow them, they would not only defend themſelves to the utmoſt, but alſo certainly preſent him with the heads of Fitz-Stephen, and all their priſoners.

This menace had the deſired effect; for Strongbow deſiſting, marched to Waterford, where he found letters intimating how neceſſary it would be for him to make his perſonal appearance in England, before he indulged the idea of purſuing farther conqueſts.

To England he accordingly repaired, and meeting Henry at Newnham, in Glouceſterſhire, after the king had held off for ſome time from motives of policy, this conqueror renewed his oaths to him as his liege lord, promiſing to hold all that he poſſeſſed or might poſſeſs in Ireland, in dependance on, and under fealty and homage to the crown of England.

This matter being ſettled, both the earl and his ſovereign went to Pembroke, where ſhips were getting ready to convey them to Ireland.—Dublin had been again attacked during this interval; but the aſſailants failing in their attempt, it ſtill remained in the poſſeſſion of the Engliſh.

King Henry arriving ſafe at Waterford, landed 500 knights, and a ſtrong body of archers, from about 400 ſhips, and afterwards proceeded to Wexford. Here the citizens brought their priſoner Fitz-Stephen to him as a criminal, who had diſturbed their peace, and diſobeyed his orders. The king reproached, menaced, and put him in chains, while (perhaps knowing the real temper of his ſovereign) he offered not a word in his defence.

Proceeding from Waterford to Caſhells, king Henry received the voluntary ſubmiſſion of the king of Limeric, and the chief of Oſſory. At this time he was prevailed on to reſtore Fitz-Stephen to his liberty; but annexed Wexford to his own royal domain.—Marching to Dublin, he was welcomed with real pleaſure by the citizens, whoſe trade depended much on their connections with the Engliſh, and who would probably even have received the firſt adventurers in a friendly manner, had they not profeſſed to ſupport a tyrant, who ſeemed bent on committing ravages and depredations.

In effect, the moderation of the king of England, who proceeded without offering any hoſtilities, and appeared deſirous to do juſtice and ſupport order, might well engage a people, that had ſuffered ſo much by the contrary practice from their own countrymen, as well as from foreigners. O'Rourke and many other princes, and at laſt Roderic O'Connor himſelf, repaired to Henry to ſwear fealty, the laſt agreeing to pay a certain tribute, and though ſtill continued nominal monarch of Ireland, to hold his monarchy dependant on the Engliſh ſovereign.

Thus the country acknowledged ſubmiſſion to Henry without his ſhedding a drop of blood, and thus Ireland firſt began to be reckoned an appendage to the Britiſh crown.

New Arrangements—Various Proceedings of Raymond, &c.—Battle between O'Connor and the Engliſh—Names and Anecdotes of thoſe appointed to the Government—Freſh Contentions—Iriſh in Arms again—Sundry Occurrences.

AS ſoon as Henry had received the ſubmiſſion of the Iriſh in the various diſtricts, having ſettled ſeveral of the Iriſh princes at Dublin, he went to Caſhell, where he held a ſynod, in which many apparently good ordinances reſpecting ſucceſſion to lands, and others matters civil and religious, were iſſued. Some have ſaid, that this was chiefly done in conformity to the terms of a bull granted by pope Adrian, in which the ſovereign very liberally gave away the dominion of Ireland to the king of England, on condition, "That the "laborious people of Ireland, ſhould by his "means, be reformed and recovered from their "filthy and abominable converſation, that as in "name, ſo in life and manners, they may be chriſ"tians." The Iriſh ſeem much offended at this idea; yet their lives at this period, as well as their inteſtine commotions, might give room for the obſervation. As to any right founded on a bull of this ſort, if the authority be ever ſo unqueſtionable, it is certainly ſuch as no Proteſtant prince can conſiſtently adduce in ſupport of his claim to any kingdom.

As to king Henry, though he owed much to the proweſs of the firſt Britiſh ſettlers, yet much more was left him to effect by dint of policy; and it appears that allowing for times and circumſtances, his plan of government was not an unwiſe one. At his departure for England, he left Strongbow in poſſeſſion of the province of Leinſter, holding it as a fief; but, at the ſame time, Hugh Lacey, juſticiary of Ireland, leaving him the government of Dublin, and beſtowing Meath on him, which latter ſtep offended O'Rourk, king of Breffney; becauſe it had been, in part, granted to him by Roderic. On this account, the laſt mentioned prince was not backward in ſhewing his reſentment. However, it being propoſed by ſome who wiſhed to preſerve the peace of the country, that theſe differences ſhould be accommodated, the rivals met on a hill near Dublin, when O'Rourk being found to meditate treachery, was ſlain by a Welch knight, named Griffith.

The Engliſh after this met with ſome checks; and before the earl of Pembroke could put himſelf into a condition to ſupport their cauſe, he was ſent for over to England, and ordered back again in the quality of lord lieutenant, Lacey reſigning as ſoon as he was made acquainted with his royal maſter's orders.

The diſpoſition of the Iriſh in moſt places to revolt, and the aim of ſome of the new comers to act more like plunderers than warriors, increaſed the confuſion in which the country was involved.—Raymond and Harvey de Mountmaurice had quarrelled; the former ſoon after departed into Wales: in his abſence the Iriſh carrying all before them to the very gates of Dublin, his preſence was again ſolicited; and he was married to the beautiful ſiſter of Strongbow.

Yet Raymond was recalled on a charge, (perhaps not ill-grounded) that he carried on a ſort of piratical war; but the ſoldiers refuſing to ſerve under any other chief, the command of the forces was given to him, and it was thought proper to ſuſpend his recal; and ſome advantages were gained by the Engliſh over the Iriſh monarch.

With this prince, Henry now renewed his treaty, and indeed granted him what might be eſteemed much, if the other had not remembered that almoſt all was once in his poſſeſſion, and that he was now but a king under a LORD PARAMOUNT.

In the mean time, the earl of Pembroke dying, Raymond's wiſe ſent for him, to take the command at Dublin, whither he accordingly repaired, and there celebrated the earl's funeral.—Fitz-Aldelm, deſcended from William the Conqueror, was the next ſent by king Henry as his deputy: This was the great founder of the family of the Bourks, that afterwards made ſuch a conſpicuous figure in the Iriſh hiſtory.

By this time the king had granted a charter to the citizens of Briſtol, which eſtabliſhed an intercourſe with a mutual charter, intended for diffuſing the benefits of trade and commerce. Theſe and other well-planned regulations, were made in this reign; but neither the Iriſh nor the Engliſh chiefs were to be prevented from levying wars upon each other. In the courſe of theſe, the famous John de Courcy performed many brave actions; but the Engliſh were more than once defeated, notwithſtanding his extraordinary valour, as he could not be preſent every where. In particular, with a ſuperior army, Roderic O'Connor gave one Sir Armoric, who diſdained to fly, a moſt terrible overthrow, in the end of which, his troops turning back to back, fought deſperately till they were almoſt all ſlain on the field.

After the death of king Henry, Richard I. ſucceeded to the crown of England; and Iſabella, only daughter of Strongbow, being married to William Lord Moſefield, (who was afterwards created earl of Pembroke), that nobleman came over in the character of lord juſtice and chief governor, in the year 1192. The country remained in tranquility during his government. He reſigned it to Hugh Valois, who continued in office till the death of the king, who after various wars in the Holy Land, and being treacherouſly confined, as he was on his way home, by Leopold, duke of Auſtria, when he had obtained his releaſe, received his death by a chance arrow, as he was beſieging a caſtle belonging to one of his vaſſals.

Thus fell Richard, ſurnamed Cœur de Lion, and was ſucceeded by John already lord of Ireland, who aſſumed the crown in manifeſt injury to his nephew Arthur, which proved the ſource of bloody wars, and the occaſion of Louis the dauphin's diſplaying the French ſtandard in Britain.—This fickle prince diſplaced the lord juſtice, in the firſt year of his reign, fined him, and appointed Myles Fitz-Henry, a natural ſon of king Henry's, and brother to Fitz-Gerald, to ſucceed him. But he being removed, and Courcy diſgraced and ſeized, Hugh Lacey was again made lord juſtice.—He not knowing how to uſe his power with moderation or humanity, cauſed Courcy's natural ſon to be murdered, and other outrages to be committed in the country; in conſequence of which latter the natives frequently took opportunities of making retaliation.

On a voyage which John made to Ireland, Lacey and his dependants, thought proper to withdraw to France, and the king reconciled matters much better with the natives, than could have been reaſonably expected from one of his character.

In the mean time it ſeemed to be intended, that Courcy, (then a priſoner in England) ſhould end his days in the Tower of London. But fortune had ordered otherwiſe. King John having a diſpute with Philip of France, concerning a tract in Normandy, it was determined to decide it by a ſingle combat. The French king had a champion in readineſs; but the Engliſh monarch was at a loſs, till one of his attendants ſuggeſted the idea of ſending for Courcy, whoſe valour and prodigious perſonal ſtrength were well known. He was three times ſolicited before he would comply, though not only his releaſe, but great rewards were offered him. At laſt, however, he yielded, and being properly dreſſed and dieted, appeared at the time appointed. The liſts being provided, he repaired to the place. The French champion came firſt, and having taken a turn reſted himſelf in his tent. Courcy being then ſent for, who was very leiſurely preparing himſelf, "I think, (ſaid he) any one of this company would " not be in great haſte if he was invited to ſuch an " entertainment." However, when the trumpets ſounded, the champions meeting, he beheld his opponent with a ſtern countenance: the latter ſtalked along, till Courcy drawing his ſword, which he had cauſed to be ſent him from Ireland, the other, neither liking his looks nor the weapon, ran away; and afterwards found means to convey himſelf to Spain.—On this, the Engliſh ſhouted victory! while K. Philip, in the midſt of his diſappointment, expreſſed a deſire to ſee ſome ſpecimen of the extraordinary ſtrength of the champion, that had won this bloodleſs triumph. To gratify this deſire a ſtake was fixed in the ground, on which a ſhirt of mail and a helmet were placed.—Courcy again drawing his truſty ſword, and glaring grimly about him, he clove both the helmet and the ſhirt of mail, and ſtruck his weapon ſo deep into the ſtake, that none but himſelf could diſengage it. Being aſked, why he looked ſo ſternly now his antagoniſt was fled? he replied, that if he had miſſed his deſign he would have cut off the heads of both the princes. All that he ſaid was taken in good part; king John diſcharged him from his troubles, made him ſome rich preſents, and reſtored him to his former poſſeſſions.

After the king's arrival in England, Henry de Londres, archbiſhop of Dublin, was appointed to the government; a man of great firmneſs, who openly oppoſed the king's ſubmiſſion to the pope—a circumſtance once little expected.

But John having worſe ſucceſs in England than in Ireland, ſigned Magna Charta, which his barons extorted from him ſword in hand; and this led to the reſignation abovementioned. This weak prince died in the midſt of inteſtine commotions, whilſt a foreign power was diſputing the ſovereignty with him in the heart of his own land, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Henry III. a minor, who was proclaimed king at two years of age, and in whoſe minority Louis and his Frenchmen, according to a treaty, quitted Britain, after having experienced ſome diſappointments.

Geoffrey de Moriſco, with whom Sir Edmund Butler was aſſociated in the latter end of king John's reign, was ſtill continued in office in Ireland; but Henry de Londres, the former chief governor, was now joined with him; yet this latter being deemed too ſolicitous about eccleſiaſtical affairs, he was removed, and ſucceeded by William Earl Marſhal, who was ordered to ſeize on Connaught as forfeited, and to deliver it to Richard de Bourg. After ſeveral changes, earl Marſhal was ſlain fighting againſt the Iriſh, in a great battle on the Curragh of Kildare; and the king of Connaught, with a becoming ſpirit, made a voyage to England to complain of the ravages of thoſe, who had by falſe aſſertions cauſed his demeſnes to be wreſted from him.—He was heard with moderation, and his lands reſtored with juſtice.

Theobald Butler and Cogan were next conſtituted lords juſtices, in whoſe time nothing remarkable happened.

Sir John Fitz-Geoffrey ſucceeded; and while he held the reins of the viceroyalty, complaints were renewed by the Iriſh; in anſwer to which, the king told them, that all Iriſhmen who choſe to ſubmit to his authority might claim benefit of the Engliſh laws.—The king's ſon having cauſed a writ to be iſſued, which ran differently from thoſe in England, it was ſuperſeded by the royal authority.

When Alan de la Zouch was chief juſtice, we find it mentioned that ſome troops were embarked for England, with a deſign of aſſiſting thoſe who were in rebellion againſt the king; but the fleet being encountered and defeated by prince Edward, the deſign came to nothing. Yet the prince continuing to exerciſe a power not pleaſing to his father, in removing chief magiſtrates, all perſons were ordered, in ſuch caſes, to pay no regard to his authority.

The next governor was the famous Longſword, earl of Saliſbury, who ſlew O'Neal, and other Iriſh inſurgents, but was ſoon after put to death, as ſome ſay, by the treachery of his own people.

When William Den was lord juſtice, there was a great commotion in Munſter, chiefly occaſioned by the M'Carthies, who claimed Deſmond as their patrimony. They ſucceeded ſo far as to ſurpriſe Thomas Fitz-Gerald and his ſon; and for a long time carried all before them: and in the midſt of theſe tranſactions the lord juſtice dying, was ſucceeded by Richard de Capella. The Burks and Geraldines now quarrelling with each other, Maurice Fitz-Gerald, Fitz-Thomas and others, carried matters ſo far as to ſeize on the lord juſtice, Burk, the heir of Ulſter, Butler, Cogan, and others; but theſe were releaſed by order of a parliament that met at Kilkenny.

Henry hearing of theſe diſturbances, wrote to the great men in Ireland to keep the peace of the nation; and ſoon afterwards recalling Capella, ſent over David Barry in his room.

Henry, in the mean time was ſufficiently embarraſſed. Theſe, having recourſe to arms, engaged the king's forces with various ſucceſs; till at the battle of Lewes, Simon de Mountfort, earl of Leiceſter, made his ſovereign priſoner; and ſoon after compelled prince Edward to ſurrender on conditions. But the victor ruling the kingdom at pleaſure, diſguſted ſome of the barons, who found means to deliver the heir to the crown from his captivity. This prince being joined by a conſiderable body of loyal troops, attacked the earl at Eveſham, who ſtill holding the king his priſoner, placed him in the front of his army, where he was wounded, and in danger of being ſlain. After a bloody engagement, Simon de Mountfort's forces were routed, and himſelf ſlain. Thus king Henry was ſet at liberty, and the power of the rebellious barons broken.

But affairs in Ireland appeared to be growing worſe. About the year 1200, Sir John Ufford, the lord juſtice, having been replaced by Richard de Exceſter, and he ſucceeded by Sir James Audley, the Iriſh were almoſt every where ready to carry fire and ſword among the Engliſh ſettlers; and the king of Connaught defeated Walter Burke, in a bloody battle. Theſe wars were followed by a famine and peſtilence, which contributed to ſpread devaſtation over the country.

Sir James Audley dying, Maurice Fitz-Maurice Fitz-Gerald ſucceeded him as lord juſtice, and continued in that office till king Henry dying, his ſon Edward, ſurnamed Longſhanks, aſcended the throne, and the king's peace was proclaimed in Ireland, this prince affirming that he was both willing and able, by God's help, to do juſtice to all his ſubjects.

However, the Iriſh were not diſpoſed to peace, but raiſed commotions every where; and Maurice being betrayed by his followers, was impriſoned at Ophaly.

The next year Waller Genevil ſucceeded, who was lately returned from the Holy Land. The Highland Scots now made a deſcent on Ireland, and committed many depredations; in return for which, the Engliſh at Ulſter landed in Scotland, and made retaliation.

Soon after this, the Engliſh were overthrown by the natives, in a great battle at Glinbury; and Thomas Clare was obliged to ſurrender the caſtle of Roſcommon. And, beſides, the Iriſh princes quarrelled and fought with each other. Ufford being cited to anſwer, why he permitted ſuch enormities? replied, that things had been exaggerated; and as to what concerned the Iriſh princes, it was neceſſary to let one knave or rebel cut another's throat. And the king was ſatisfied with this anſwer.

Robert Fulborne, biſhop of Waterford, was next appointed lord juſtice, during whoſe government, and that of his ſucceſſor, John Sandford, archbiſhop of Dublin, we hear of nothing but riſings of the natives, and civil wars between the Engliſh ſettled in Ireland.

The next lord juſtice was Sir William Veſey, between whom and Thomas Fitz-Gerald, baron of Ophaly, there was ſuch animoſity, that they impeached each other of high treaſon. And the lord juſtice having appointed Hay his deputy, repaired to England, whither his opponent followed him. Accuſing each other before the king, the matter ended in a challenge; but when the day appointed came, and all things were prepared for the combat, Veſey was miſſing: diſtruſting either his cauſe or his courage, he had withdrawn himſelf to France, and ſo diſappointed the people aſſembled of a duel.

In conſequence of this behaviour of the lord juſtice, the king cauſed all his lands in Kildare, to to be given to Fitz-Gerald, and ſettled on him, and his heirs for ever.

But returning to Ireland, elated with his ſucceſs, he began to carry matters with a high hand, and made Richard Burke, earl of Ulſter, and his brother, priſoners, who were releaſed by order of government, when William Doddingſwel was lord juſtice.

This lord chief juſtice dying, Thomas Fitz-Thomas Fitz-Gerald, for a time, filled the place, but was removed, to make room for John Wogan, who did all in his power to keep matters quiet; but going over to aſſiſt the king in his Scottiſh wars, William de Roſs, prior of Kilmanhaim, being left deputy, the old confuſions were renewed, which Wogan, on his return, could not ſettle.

While Ireland was involved in bloodſhed, Edward the Firſt died, after having conquered and given laws to Scotland, whoſe champion William Wallace, he unworthily put to death, for aſſerting the liberties of Scotland.

He was ſucceeded by his ſon Edward, a puſillanimous prince, who continued thoſe claims upon Scotland, which he was not able to ſupport. He had to contend with Robert Bruce, the legal heir to the Scottiſh crown; and he found it no eaſy matter, even at firſt ſetting-out, (though he made ſome parade) to ſupport ſuch a conteſt.

This prince ſent Pierce Gaveſton, a favourite of his, into Ireland as chief governor, where he broke the power of the revolters, and filled the office wiſely and worthily; but returning into England, he was taken priſoner at Scarborough, and executed as a traitor (againſt the king's will) by thoſe who envied his greatneſs.

Sir John Wogan was again ſent over after the departure of Gaveſton; and in the month of October following Roger Mortimer came into the country with his wife the heireſs of Meath, and took peaceable poſſeſſion of that diſtrict.

The lord juſtice who was not in a condition to ſuppreſs the Iriſh in their depredations, made a voyage to England, leaving Sir Edmund Butler, his deputy.

Edward II. invading Scotland, was totally defeated by Robert Bruce, at the battle of Bannocbourn, himſelf eſcaping with difficulty and leaving 20,000 Engliſh dead on the field.—Nor was this all:—In order to return the compliment, it was concerted between the conqueror and his brother Edward, that the latter ſhould invade Ireland; where he doubted not of receiving ſufficient aid from the natives. Accordingly after having made a ſlight eſſay, in which he took the caſtle of Man, and made Lord O'Donnel priſoner, Edward Bruce at length landed near Carrickfergus, with about 6000 men, and was preſently joined by numbers of the Iriſh, his brother, the king of Scotland, alſo promiſing to ſuccour him. After having defeated Roger Mortimer, and the Engliſh in various battles, he cauſed himſelf to be crowned king of England at Dundalk, and ſat down quietly in his quarters, holding courts of juſtice; and, as if in time of peace, attending to the adminiſtration of civil affairs.

He failed, however, in a deſign upon Dublin, where the Engliſh had drawn together 30,000 men. This and what was more cogent, a ſcarcity of proviſions, drove him back to Ulſter, where he found the famine yet more ſevere; and this cauſe obliged Robert, who had landed, to quit the iſland.

The pope, by his bull, commanded the Engliſh and Scots to conclude a truce for two years; but the latter refuſed compliance, and Edward Bruce reſolved to quit his poſt, and hazard an engagement with John Birmingham, whom Alexander Bicknor, then lord chief juſtice, had ſent with an army to oppoſe him. The conſequence was, that the Scotch prince was totally defeated and loſt his life in battle, at a time when his brother had once more landed in Ireland, and had even ſent him advice not to fight till they could effect a junction.

Robert Bruce, hearing of this diſaſter, returned to Scotland, and the Iriſh thus diſappointed were almoſt every where reduced.

The lord juſtice dying, John Birmingham ſucceeded him, who in the 15th year of king Edward II. met him with a body of troops at Carliſle, leaving Ralph de Gorges his deputy, who was ſoon afterwards ſucceeded by Sir John Darcey.

In the year 1322, the face of affairs was changed in England; for the weakneſs of king Edward, and the wickedneſs of his adulterous queen, brought about the deſtruction of that prince, who was barbarouſly murdered by thruſting a hot iron up his body; and Mortimer his mother's favourite for ſome time ruled the land without controul.

Edward III. being proclaimed king, Thomas Fitz-John, earl of Kildare, was made lord juſtice. In the mean time, Fitz-Thomas, afterwards earl of Deſmond, quarrelling with the lord Arnold Poer, the latter, though he had the worſt, refuſing to comply with the citation of the lord juſtice, (who ſummoned both parties to appear before him) quitted the kingdom. His oppoſers now became ſo powerful, that thoſe who inhabited the fortified towns began to ſtand on their guard; but thoſe whom they feared, diſavowed any intent of troubling the peace of the ſtate, and requeſted a charter of pardon.

The inhabitants of Leinſter ſet up a king of their own, deſcended from the Macmorroughs; but this chief marching at the head of a large body of forces towards Dublin, was met and defeated by Sir Henry Tratherne, and Waller de Vale. He was confined in Dublin caſtle, but afterwards eſcaped by means of a cord, which coſt the man his life who furniſhed him with it.

As if the air of England had bred quarrels, freſh contentions among the Engliſh took place, which were attended with much bloodſhed. In the mean time, a ſort of revolution took place in England, the young king delivering himſelf, the nobles, and the people, from the tyranny of Mortimer, who was ſeized at Nottingham Caſtle, committed to the Tower of London, and afterwards tried, condemned, and executed as a traitor, and his body hung upon a gibbet, a woeful ſpectacle of "ill-woven ambition "ſhrunk up ſo prematurely."

Sir Anthony Lacy being ſent over as lord juſtice, during whoſe adminiſtration a parliament aſſembled, whither the earl of Kildare repaired, with others who had been concerned in levying ſoldiers againſt their neighbours, and on renewing their oaths of allegiance, and ſwearing to keep the king's peace, each received his pardon; and in the beginning of March this year, the king and parliament framed articles for the tranquillity of Ireland, which they ſent thither directly.

The lord lieutenant hearing that the Iriſh had been up in arms, ſuſpecting that ſome of the lords and great perſons abſent from the late parliament were concerned, gave orders for arreſting ſeveral perſons, among whom were Walter Burk, Maurice Deſmond, Henry Mandeville, and lord William and Walter Birmingham. Lord William was executed; but Walter eſcaped becauſe he was in Holy Orders. Maurice Deſmond, after having been impriſoned for a year, was diſcharged on bail, and ſent over to England.

About this time a vexatious matter happened, occaſioned by William Burk, earl of Ulſter, having been murdered by ſome of his own ſervants. His wiſe and daughter being gone to England, where the latter was married to the duke of Clarence, two of the Burks ſeized on the greater part of the eſtate, and then went over to the ancient Iriſh, whoſe cuſtoms they adopted, even varying their names according to the genius of the natives. The murder was revenged by the country people; but that could not make amends for this deſertion.

A hard winter cloſed this year, which producing a ſcarcity, poſſibly gave no ſmall encouragement to the plundering that went forward. The king had formed a deſign of going on a viſit to Ireland in perſon; but other affairs prevented its being put in execution. However a plan was formed for the reſumption of all lands, ſigniaries, &c. granted by Edward the third or his father, to ſubjects inhabiting Ireland; theſe lands were to be ſeized till the merits of the perſons and cauſes and conditions of the gifts could be redeemed.

This circumſtance naturally occaſioned much murmuring; and a parliament was called, to endeavour to mitigate matters; but the earl of Deſmond and many other leading men refuſed to attend, held meetings of their own, and ſent ſuch remonſtrances to government, as, together with other circumſtances, operated, in the end, to procure a repeal of the odious ordinance.

Sir Ralph Ufford being inſtituted lord juſtice, was equally diſtinguiſhed by the native Iriſh and Engliſh ſettlers. The earl of Deſmond again refuſing to attend a parliament that was ſummoned to meet at Dublin, the chief governor ſet up the royal ſtandard in Munſter, and ſeized on that nobleman's lands: he ſurrendered, being bailed by the earl of Ulſter and twenty-four knights; but forfeited his recogniſances. The earl of Kildare being apprehended on the ſame account, was admitted to bail by the ſucceeding lord juſtice; for the former ill-beloved magiſtrate died in April the next year, and his widow was glad to ſteal away as privately as poſſible, fearing the inſults of the enraged populace.

Sir Roger Darcy, Sir John Morris, and Sir Walter Birmingham ſucceeded each other as lords juſtices, the latter of whom procured the accuſed earl of Deſmond leave to go over and plead his cauſe in England. And the ſame magiſtrate, with the aſſiſtance of the earl of Kildare, reduced the O'Mores then in arms, the earl paſſing over the ſeas to ſerve king Edward in his French wars, in gratitude for the indulgence ſhewn to his couſin Deſmond. And this year was fought the famous battle of Creſſy, which was won by Edward the third againſt the king of France.

To Sir Walter Birmingham, lord juſtice, ſucceeded lord Carew, Sir Thomas Rokeby, and afterwards the earl of Deſmond, who notwithſtanding the charges which had been exhibited againſt him, was deemed worthy of that high office. After him, Sir Thomas Rokeby was again appointed chief magiſtrate, who received authority (with the advice of the chancellor and treaſurer) to pardon all crimes and miſdemeanors, treaſon excepted.

The next year was fought the battle of Poictiers, in which John king of France was taken priſoner by the prince of Wales, and conveyed to London.

James, earl of Ormond, who had already been lord juſtice, was left deputy when the duke of Clarence, who ſucceeded him, paſſed over to England, who, on his return, appointed Sir Thomas Dale, to fill that office: during the remainder of king Edward's reign ſeveral ordinances were enacted, moſt of which tended to the regulation of thoſe inhabiting within what was called the Engliſh Pale: And, in the year 1537, Edward died at Shene, aged ſixty-four, the Black Prince having paid the debt of nature before him, whoſe ſon Richard the ſecond, ſucceeded to the crown when he was but eleven years old. The care of this young king and of the realm, was committed to the earl of Cambridge and the duke of Lancaſter his uncles, the former of whom poſſeſſed a remarkable degree of power.

The earl of Ormond was ſucceeded by Alexander Bailſcott; after whom John de Bromwick was made lord juſtice, at the ſame time an act paſſed recalling the Iriſh abſentees; and Sir Nicholas Dayworth was ſent over to ſurvey the poſſeſſions of the crown in the iſland.

To John de Bromwick ſucceeded Mortimer, earl of March and Ulſter, before whoſe arrival the French and Spaniſh gallies, which had done much damage in the Iriſh ſeas, were attacked by the Engliſh, and obliged to take refuge in Kinſale harbour. And after the earl of March, John Cotton, dean of St. Patrick's, was conſtituted lord juſtice; but he was ſoon after ſucceeded by Philip de Courtenay, who held that office for ten years, till behaving himſelf ill, he was at laſt arreſted and puniſhed for many miſdemeanors.

About this period Richard II. then a minor, experienced many troubles in England, the chief of which was occaſioned by a poll-tax, hateful in itſelf, and rendered more ſo by the behaviour of ſome of thoſe who collected it; one of whom having treated the daughter of Wat Tyler, a peaſant, with ſome indecency, her father having killed him on the ſpot, raiſed an inſurrection, and being at the head of 100,000 men, carried all before him. Meeting his ſovereign in Smithfield, he behaved with the greateſt inſolence; and as he often lifted up his weapon during the conference, it was thought he deſigned to murder him. Sir William Walworth, mayor of London, obſerving this, ſtruck the traitor down with his mace, whoſe fall was immediately completed by his being run through the body. His rout preparing to revenge their leader's death, the king, not then above ſixteen, put himſelf at their head, ſaid he would be their captain, and would redreſs their grievances, and led them into St. George's Fields, where being met by a party of citizens, they immediately threw down their arms, and on receiving an extravagant charter, they diſperſed intirely; and thus ended the rebellion. Happy had it been for Richard if at a later period, he had diſplayed as much reſolution.

The king, though much perplexed at home, attended to the affairs of the Iriſh, and appointed Robert Vere, earl of Oxford, to govern Ireland; but he proved diſagreeable to the parliament, and Sir John Stanley was appointed in his room, in whoſe time Roger Mortimer, earl of March, was proclaimed heir apparent to the crown. Alexander de Balſcot was the next lord juſtice, in whoſe time the O'Neals made a ſubmiſſion. James earl of Ormond ſucceeding, ſlew 600 of the Mac Mahons in the county of Kerry. The king afterwards went over in perſon, where he behaved with wiſdom and moderation, ſettling matters by negociation, rather than by the ſword, and knighted four Iriſh kings before he returned to England.

But notwithſtanding theſe appearances, the Iriſh roſe in arms again, and the lord juſtice himſelf was ſlain by the O'Brians; on which Roger Gray was made locum tenens, and ſucceeded by Holland, duke of Surry.

King Richard now reſolved on another voyage to Ireland, whither he paſſed with a conſiderable army, landing at Waterford, and proceeding from thence to Dublin, in the year 1339. The Iriſh now received ſeveral checks, affairs were likely to be put once more on a better footing, when the king was recalled by a moſt formidable inſurrection raiſed by his couſin, Henry of Bolingbroke whom he had baniſhed, but who returned as he ſaid to recover his eſtates which were ſeized by the crown in his abſence. But being joined by ſeveral of the nobility and chief men who diſliked Richard's miniſters, and at length even the duke of York then regent, he took Briſtol Caſtle where he butchered the earl of Wiltſhire, Sir John Buſh, and Sir Henry Green, and proceeded to diſpoſe of every thing at pleaſure.

An army of 10,000 men had been levied for the king in Wales, but could not be kept together till his arrival. At his return he loſt all ſpirits and retired to the caſtle of Conway, from whence he was finally brought by the duke of Northumberland and others to London, and impriſoned in the Tower; and having reſigned his crown to his treacherous couſin, was ſtoned to death in Pontefract caſtle, or otherwiſe made away with by order of the uſurper.

Henry of Lancaſter was crowned on the 13th of October in the year 1339; and Sir John Shirley, lord lieutenant of Ireland, being called into England, left his brother Sir William, his deputy. He ſurrendered his office to Stephen Scroop, a perſon choſen to pave the way for Thomas duke of Lancaſter. He had ſome ſucceſsful encounters, and the O'Birnes ſurrendered their caſtles to him; he alſo puniſhed ſome of the Engliſh for certain enormities.

Sir James Ormond's adminiſtration was marked with ſome ſucceſſes againſt the Scots, and he is ſaid with 20 Engliſhmen to have defeated 200 Iriſh.

Sir Stephen Scroop ſucceeding, ordered the earl of Kildare and three of his family to be arreſted, and kept them in priſon till he had extorted three hundred marks from them. This year the king gave the ſword to the city of Dublin, and changed their provoſt for a mayor.

The Iriſh affairs were much confuſed in the time of Henry the fourth, chiefly on account of the troubles that prevailed in England, which was ſubject to the incurſions of the Welch and Scots, the former of whom under Glendower often baffled him.

The Scots, indeed, received ſome checks, the chief of which was a great defeat they ſuſtained at Holmedon-Hill, where A. Douglas, Mordake, earl of Fife, and others of rank were made priſoners by Henry Percy, ſurnamed Hotſpur, ſon of the earl of Northumberland. But ſome diſputes ariſing concerning the diſpoſal of thoſe captives, whom the victor refuſed to deliver up to the king, ſuch words enſued as gave birth to a breach, and finally to a rebellion. Percy propoſed to join Glendower, who then held Mortimer earl of March priſoner, and to ſet him on the Engliſh throne: but this hot chieftain, in conjunction with Douglas, beſieging Shrewſbury, engaged the king before Glendower could come up. The battle was bloody; but Percy breaking in upon the king's lines, was ſlain, and a total rout of the inſurgents enſued. However the king was in danger, in the courſe of the fight, the prince of Wales wounded, and 1500 ſoldiers ſlain, among whom were many knights and gentlemen, and 3000 miſerably wounded. This hazard which Henry eſcaped, occaſioned him to rule for the future with rather more moderation.

He pardoned Northumberland, and many others who, as he well knew, though not in the field, had been deep in the late conſpiracy; yet Northumberland revolted again, and was ſlain in a great battle at Bramham-Park; and another rebellion in which the arch-biſhop of York and the lord Haſtings were the principal actors, was ſuppreſſed. Owen Glendower continued to be very troubleſome, till the prince of Wales purſuing him cloſely he was deſerted by his followers, and died in obſcurity.

Henry ended a reign and life of anxiety when he had it in idea to go to the holy wars; inſtead of which he expired in the Jeruſalem chamber at Weſtminſter, thereby, as it was idly ſuppoſed, verifying a prediction that he ſhould die in Jeruſalem. A. D. 1413.

Henry of Monmouth, well known for the wildneſs and diſſipation of his youth, now aſcended the throne by the ſtyle of Henry V. king of England and lord of Ireland; and ſoon after his acceſſion, Sir John Stanley dying at Ardee, the nobility elected Thomas Crawley, lord chief juſtice, who was archbiſhop of Dublin; but, as little could be expected from this eccleſiaſtic in repreſſing the troubles in that country, he was ſuperſeded by Sir John Talbot, who had ſome ſucceſs, and would have prevailed ſtill further but that the army was ill paid, and he had brought no force from England, the king being intent on his French wars. And in the year 1415, he gained a great victory over the French at Agincourt, while the natives were employed in plundering and burning the poſſeſſions of his ſubjects in Ireland.

James, earl of Ormond, coming over as lord lieutenant, held a council at Dublin. He took Golmolin caſtle, and in his time thirty articles of accuſation were exhibited againſt the biſhop of Caſhell. There was alſo a diſpute between the biſhop of Cloyne and another biſhop: the former accuſation was ſuppreſſed, and the latter buſineſs was referred to Rome for a determination.

Confuſion, as uſual, prevailed in Ireland, while Henry was purſuing his foreign conqueſts, and died in France in the year 1422.

His ſon Henry VI. was proclaimed while yet a child; and Thomas Beaufort, duke of Exeter, and his brother Henry, biſhop of Wincheſter, were nominated to take charge of this prince's education.

Little was done in the affairs of Ireland, except when the duke of York was lord lieutenant; who putting in his claim to the crown, bloody wars enſued, and though the duke loſt his life in a battle againſt queen Margaret at Wakefield, yet after various ſucceſſes his ſon Edward IV. was crowned.— This monarch was indeed depoſed by the earl of Warwick, who firſt ſet him up, but whom he had offended; but at length defeating that warrior at Barnet, and the queen afterwards at Tewkeſbury, the young prince was taken and ſlain at the concluſion of the battle, and Henry met a ſimilar fate in the Tower.

During contentions of this nature, our hiſtory is but barren; and as the mere ſucceſſion of chief governors, and unimportant ſkirmiſhes, can be productive of little entertainment, being arrived at this period, we ſhall cut theſe ſhort, and ſpeak only of matters of importance.

Richard duke of Glouceſter, who ſucceeded, firſt as lord protector, and afterwards mounted the throne by the title of Richard III. having by his tyranny rendered himſelf hateful, was obliged to hazard his crown and life, both which he loſt at the battle of Boſworth Field, fought againſt Henry, earl of Richmond.

The conqueror, having eſpouſed Elizabeth, hiereſs of the houſe of York, was crowned king, by the ſtyle of Henry VII. His reign was famous for the alienation act, the breaking of military followings, and the appearance of a falſe earl of Warwick, and a perſon that aſſumed the name of the duke of York, one of the young princes reported to be murdered in the tower.

This young man, known by the name of Perkin Warbeck, was entertained in France, acknowledged by the ducheſs of Burgundy as her relation, and afterwards landed in Munſter.

Sir Edward Poynings being then lord lieutenant, took ſuch meaſures as obliged Perkin to quit the kingdom. He then went over to Scotland, where he married the kinſwoman of king James; who diſmiſſing him, he went to Cork: but afterwards landing in England, and in vain aſſaulting Exeter at the head of 6000 men, he withdrew to Taunton, and hearing that the king's forces were marching towards him, he ſtole away from his troops, and ſought refuge in the monaſtery of Beaulieu. His lady was taken by the lord Daubeny, whoſe behaviour was ſo winning, that ſhe was ſent to attend the queen, and gratified with a conſiderable penſion.

Perkin ſurrendered, on promiſe of pardon, and being conducted to London, rode through the city amidſt the hiſſes of the populace. He was committed to the Tower, where his captivity being rendered eaſy, he was prevailed on to ſign a recantation, which, however, many have thought to be vague, and in ſome paſſages contradictory. However, in the end, he was executed. In this reign, the earl of Kildare fought a great battle againſt Ulick Burk and his allies in Connaught, wherein the latter were routed with great ſlaughter.

This earl who had formerly been accuſed in England, and had cleared himſelf, was now rewarded with the order of the garter; and he remained lord lieutenant at the death of Henry VII. which happened at his palace at Richmond, in the year 1509. His eldeſt ſon Arthur being dead, and leaving no iſſue, his brother Henry VIII. ſucceeded, who choſe at that time to continue the great officers in Ireland.

In the mean time, there had been continual animoſities prevailing between the Geraldines and the Butlers. But matters having at one time proceeded ſo far, that James earl of Ormond fled to a church for ſanctuary, Kildare, permitting him to come out unhurt, a ſort of temporary reconciliation took place between thoſe noblemen. The deputy dying, his ſon Gerald ſucceeded him. In the very next year he had the good fortune to defeat ſeveral of the Iriſh chiefs, and obliged them and their followers to fly to the woods for ſhelter.

CHAP. III.

Contentions between the Butlers and Ormonds—Conſequences—Further Arrangements—Reign of Mary—Of Elizabeth—Various Occurrences.

THIS period was marked by great contentions between the Butlers and the Ormonds in Ireland, whilſt continual complaints were heard in England about the miſmanagement of the earl of Kildare, who was recalled, and Thomas Howard, earl of Surrey ſubſtituted in his room; but the former was ſent over again, his accuſers not having been able to ſubſtantiate any of the charges againſt him.

He was obliged to repair to England a ſecond, and a third time, on accuſation of carrying on a ſecret correſpondence with the earl of Deſmond; and the laſt time was ordered to leave a deputy, for whoſe conduct he could be anſwerable, and accordingly he left his ſon in that office.

But, ſome time after the earl's departure, a report being ſpread that he was beheaded in England, the lord deputy immediately entered into a league with divers of the ancient Iriſh, and going to the Council Chamber, followed by a crowd of armed men; and after having delivered a ſpeech againſt Henry's tyranny, which contained ſome truths mixed with many invectives, he declared himſelf an open enemy to the king's government, ſurrendered the ſword of ſtate to the lord chancellor, and ſoon after beſieged Dublin Caſtle, the citizens engaging not to interrupt him on condition he would commit no depredations on them.

But they broke this engagement as ſoon as they found an opportunity, and he was routed in a ſally: Then having patched up a ſort of treaty, and given hints of an intended ſubmiſſion, he fortified his caſtles, and repaired to Connaught to ſtrengthen himſelf by an alliance with the natives. From thence he returned at the head of 7000 men; but his caſtle of Mirooth being ſurrendered in his abſence, by the perfidy of one Pareſe, his army began to melt away from him. After this, being defeated by the lord deputy in a pitched battle, he could only carry on a piratical war; of which when he became weary, he ſurrendered at diſcretion, to Sir William Brereton, and was ſent over to England, where it is moſt probable that he thought to mollify the king by his ſubmiſſion.

But Henry ordered him to be arreſted on his way to Windſor, and he and his five uncles to be hanged, though three of them were enemies to their nephew's proceedings. The old earl of Kildare is ſaid to have died of grief in priſon. And thus was a noble family almoſt ruined by the miſconduct of one who had neither conſtancy enough to remain loyal, nor a ſufficient ſhare of prudence to retain the power he once had in his hands, which might have rendered his revolt ſucceſsful.

King Henry having by this time broke with the pope, and baniſhed the pontiff's authority from England, was reſolved to exclude it from Ireland; likewiſe George Brown, one of the new preachers, as they were then termed, was conſecrated biſhop of Dublin.

A parliament was ſoon after called to paſs the ſupremacy act, and eſtabliſh the ordinances. In the mean time, the native Iriſh were every where buſied in committing depredations; a commiſſion came over from the pope, forbidding the inhabitants to own the king's ſupremacy, together with the form of an oath, denying ſuch authority, and O'Neal, who boaſted his deſcent from the ancient princes of the country, was pitched on for the champion of the cauſe.

About this period, the lord Grey, formerly lord juſtice, appeared to anſwer charges preferred againſt him in England, moſt of which were probably falſe; yet he was condemned and executed, and all his effects confiſcated.

After ſeveral ſkirmiſhes the earl of Deſmond, and ſome of the Iriſh chiefs, ſubmitted; but what furniſhed ſtill greater matter of temporary ſatisfaction to Henry was, that O'Neal following their example, came to England, and preſented himſelf to the king at Greenwich, where he promiſed to renounce the name of O'Neal, and adopt the Engliſh manners; after which he was created earl of Tyrone, and two of his numerous followers were knighted.

Sir William Brabazon, and Sir Anthony Saintleger ſucceeded each other, and the latter was chief governor, when the king died in the 56th year of his reign and the 80th of his age, leaving behind him the name of an uſeful tyrant, who had done much evil, and yet good came thereof.

His only ſon Edward VI. whom he had by the lady Jane Seymour, ſucceeded to the throne when he was but nine years old. He adopted the new religion, and continued Sir Anthony Saintleger in his office. But the old work of ſkirmiſhing and depredations went on in Ireland; and it was even feared that the old and the new Iriſh would unite; on which account Sir Edward Bellingham was ſent over with a conſiderable force to that country. The earl of Deſmond was taken, but pardoned. An order arrived from the king for the uſing the Engliſh liturgy in the Iriſh churches.—But this was not done without many diſputes and animoſities. About this time the duke of Somerſet, the king's uncle, was beheaded, and this year the young Fitz-Gerald, heir to the houſe of Kildare, was reſtored to the favour of government, and created earl of Kildare and baron of Ophaly. The wars of the Iriſh continued, and Edward died at Greenwich in the 16th year of his age, and the ſeventh of his reign, not without ſome ſuſpicion of being poiſoned.

A ſhort uſurpation of the lady Jane Grey, daughter of the duke of Suffolk, now took place; but Mary's intereſt prevailing ſhe was proclaimed queen; and Lady Jane ſuffered decapitation, as our Hiſtory of England ſets forth.

Queen Mary, (though a Catholic) like her predeceſſor, was ſtiled ſupreme head of the church; but liberty of maſs was proclaimed to thoſe who choſe to uſe it, and the queen granted a general pardon to her Engliſh and Iriſh ſubjects.

Mary ſent orders for reducing the army in Ireland; but this was not done ſo low as to tally with her eſtimate, and it appeared, that the deputy and council acted wiſely in their variation from the letter of the order, as ſubſequent troubles there obliged them not only to augment it, but even to ſend for ſuccour from England.

When Sir Henry Sidney was lord chief juſtice, the queen, who had been married to Philip of Spain, and whoſe government was marked by furious bigotry, died without iſſue, in the forty third year of her age, and the 6th of her reign, A. D. 1515.

Elizabeth ſucceeded her ſiſter (though both could not be deemed legitimate) and was proclaimed queen in the 25th year of her age, at a time when ſhe little expected ſuch an event would take place.

Sir Henry Sidney being deputy, there were great diſputes between the houſes of Ormond and Deſmond. On laying their cauſe before the queen, it was agreed to be determined by commiſſioners whom her majeſty ſent over for that purpoſe.

At this time Shane O'Neal the legitimate ſon of the earl of Tyrone, ſeeing his baſtard brother Matthew, preferred before him, put him to death, and impriſoned his own father, who died in captivity. The lord deputy and he had a meeting, in which after pleading the juſtice of his cauſe, he was promiſed it ſhould be examined into; and thus they parted without coming to any determination. Afterwards this Shane, who valued himſelf on the name of O'Neal, which his father had renounced, taking offence at M'Carthy More's being created an earl, and ſome other matters, declared he would keep poſſeſſion of Ulſter, the kingdom of his anceſtors, by the ſword, though he had the offer of being made earl of Tyrone, if he would lay down his arms.

But after having carried on an unſucceſsful war, he made a journey to Clandeboy, intending to throw himſelf on the Scots for ſuccour. There he met Alexander Oge, who commanded a party, and reſtoring him his brother, whom he had formerly taken priſoner, was received with great cordiality. Nevertheleſs, Alexander being of a revengeful diſpoſition, treacherouſly maſſacred him and his whole company, and ſent his head to Dublin.

The country continued involved in civil war, chiefly on private pretences. James Fitz-Maurice of Deſmond, and the lord of Libnaw, M'William Oater, and O'Connor of Sligo, contending in different parts with all their might, while M'Carthy More, deſpiſing his new title of earl of Glencar, ſet up for king of Munſter, and began to invade the neighbouring lands. Turlogh Lynogh took on him the title of O'Neal in Ulſter; and though he had ſlain Alexander Oge, took 1000 Scots into his pay, and invaded the Ferny. As to the O'Connors and O'Mores, having the command of 1000 Gallowglaſſes, they threatened to ſpread devaſtation over O'Carol's country, and indeed wherever elſe they came.

There were likewiſe matters of diſpute in the cabinet, as well as in the field. Conteſted claims occaſioned much warm diſcuſſion at the council board. The parliament being called, the Catholics not approving of Stainhurſt the recorder, who was choſen ſpeaker, entered into many objections concerning non-reſidence of members; and as they ſaid, officers returning themſelves. One Hooker then getting up ſpoke much in favour of the queen's prerogative, and alſo caſt ſome reflections on the Iriſh, which only added fuel to fire, and cauſed ſeveral of the Catholic members to riſe in a tumult; ſo that he was obliged to be guarded to Sir Peter Carew's houſe, leſt violence ſhould have been offered to his perſon.

When matters were a little more ſettled, the parliament paſſed ſeveral acts, ſome of which were diſguſting to particular perſons and diſtricts. Malcontents abounded, the chief of whom was Fitz-Maurice, who complained among other matters, that his brother, John earl of Deſmond, was impriſoned. The earl of Glencar, titular king of Munſter, drew over the M'Carthies, and Fitz-Gerald, Seneſchal of Inniſkilly; and even Sir Edm. Butler, laying aſide his hatred to the Deſmond family, was ready to join in a revolt. Ambaſſadors were diſpatched to the pope and the king of Spain, complaining of the queen of England's tyranny, and the perſecution raiſed againſt their religion by her and her miniſters.

The lord deputy obſerving what was going forward, proclaimed the confederates traitors, took one of Sir Edmund's caſtles, and defeated 3000 Iriſh near Kilkenny. After this he made a ſucceſsful progreſs; and by means of the earl of Ormond, (lately arrived from England) received the ſubmiſſion of Sir Edmund Butler, and others of his relations, to all of whom he granted a pardon.

Turlogh Lynogh was on the point of making a great expedition againſt the Engliſh, when a wound that he received by chance prevented him at that time, and afterwards he entered into a treaty on terms, which were confirmed by the lord deputy.

But about this time the embaſſy to pope Pius V. produced a bull, calculated to keep alive confuſion and commotions where they already prevailed, and to kindle them where they did not exiſt; ſince in this bull the pontiff excommunicated Elizabeth, and abſolved her ſubjects from obedience.

At this period the queen granted Walter Devereux, lately created earl of Eſſex, a moiety of the Seigniores of Clandeboy, Ferny, &c. where however he was to maintain a certain number of ſoldiers at his own expence. There were many conditions in the agreement, which on the whole was highly favourable to Eſſex, who was made earl marſhal of Ireland, and borrowed 10,000l. of the queen for the expedition.

The lord deputy, Fitz-Williams, was not pleaſed at the idea of this ſort of rival power; though to quiet him, it was agreed, that the earl ſhould take out a commiſſion for him as governor of Ulſter. But he ſolicited his recal, knowing that complaints had been made in England againſt his adminiſtration.

Enquiries were made into the ſtate of Ireland; and Eſſex was ſent over with great parade. At firſt he was ſaluted by Brian M'Philemy, and other Iriſh chiefs, but perceiving his great military accompaniment they ſoon left him, and, as if flying for their ſafety, haſtened to arrage themſelves under the banners of Turlogh Lynogh O'Neal.

In effect, the earl ſucceeded not at all; for the Iriſh being up in arms on the one hand, and many of his own principal people deſerting him on the other, while his ſoldiers and treaſure was daily diminiſhing; after having taken a caſtle, and engaged in a few inconſiderable ſkirmiſhes, he ſolicited letters of recal, and was glad to get rid of his bargain.

In the mean time, the earl of Deſmond made his eſcape from the caſtle of Dublin, whither as ſome ſay, queen Elizabeth, after a conference, had ordered the captain of an Engliſh ſhip to convey him, at a time when he thought he was to be landed at a different place, to ſee a treaty duly performed which had been made in England.

One Surleboy had now laid ſiege to Carrickfergus, and the lord deputy, Sir Henry Sidney, found all the country laid waſte, except the quarter of the Scots. In fact, he muſt have been much embarraſſed in this expedition, if Surleboy had not quarrelled with Turlogh Lynogh; the conſequence of which was, that the Engliſh being at liberty to act againſt each diſtinctly, each thought proper to conclude a ſeparate treaty, which kept the province of Ulſter for ſome time in quietneſs. Nevertheleſs the uſual diſturbances reigned in the other diſtricts, and Walter Devereux, earl of Eſſex, having been perſuaded to make a ſecond expedition into Ulſter, was not at all ſupported; but, on the other hand ſo deſerted, and indeed ſo much inſulted by the court, that he was plunged in an abyſs of grief; of the effect of which joined to thoſe of a dyſentery, he died in Dublin.

The earl of Deſmond, who, in the courſe of his diſputes and appeals, had ſuffered ſome oppreſſions, and what he might perhaps eſteem equal to a breach of faith, ſeemed determined to turn the tables on the queen; yet, for the preſent, acted ſo artfully that his deſigns could not be diſcovered.

One Shikely, who had always entertained a notion, that he ſhould become a ſovereign prince, encouraged by the Spaniards and Portugueſe, was to have landed at the head of 500 men in Ireland; but not being able to withſtand an invitation of Don Sebaſtian, king of Portugal, to accompany him on his African expedition, the Portugueſe being totally defeated, he ſhared in the ill-fortune of that unhappy prince, being cut in pieces with all his ſollowers.—And ſo ended this plan of operation.

The fort of Carrigſoyle had been garriſoned by fifty Iriſhmen and nineteen Spaniards, but was taken, all found in arms being put to the ſword, and even the priſoners, not excepting the commander Julio, inhumanly executed in cold blood afterwards.

All the popiſh lords were now accuſed of wilful negligence in not proſecuting the inſurgents, obliged to put in bail, and ordered to maintain 2000 men, during the continuance of the war.

A body of Spaniards landing at Kerry, built a fortreſs, of which the earl of Ormond at firſt ſtrove in vain to diſpoſſeſs them; however, being afterwards blocked up by ſea as well as land, it was at laſt ſurrendered to the lord deputy.

A ſucceſſion of chief governors found the Iriſh affairs in much the ſame ſituation. Sir John Deſmond had been ſlain; but the earl of that name though reduced to great ſtraits, yet evaded his purſuers, till his neceſſities having occaſioned him to deſpoil a woman of her ſtock of proviſions, ſhe gave ſuch effectual information of his retreat, that he was traced and ſlain in a cabin in the wood, called Glenn Ginky, and his head cut off, which was afterwards ſent to England, and being ſtuck upon a pole, was ſet on London bridge.

Seventeen ſhips of the Spaniſh Armada, the defeat of which is too well known to be here particulariſed, were wrecked on the coaſt of Ireland in 1588, and the Iriſh not ſuffering them to be aſſaulted while claiming their protection, produced freſh matter of diſpute between the government and the Catholics, which latter kept their faith with their gueſts inviolable.

Tyrone came to England in perſon, and treated with Elizabeth. The treaty conſiſted of many articles, the principal of which was, "That he ſhould renounce the name of O'Neal for ever." He had offered hoſtages on his part, for the performance of the treaty, but theſe were to be given in Ireland. And when on his return, the lord deputy preſſed him upon the ſubject, he only returned evaſive anſwers; till, in conſequence of the Iriſh being in arms, the earl came to the council board, and there proclaimed his loyalty, juſt after tidings had been received of his brother's having beſieged Iniſkillin, and routed the Engliſh army. At this time 2000 Scots landed in the northern part of the iſland.

Yet Tyrone broke out into open rebellion, took Ardmagh, and every where by himſelf, his relations and partiſans, favoured the cauſe of the diſaffected Iriſh. He alſo defeated Marſhal Bagnal, in a pitched battle, the latter leaving 2000 ſoldiers dead on the field, and all their colours, artillery, and baggage, falling into the hands of the enemy.

The queen was much troubled at this defeat, and had already caſt her eyes upon the lord Mountjoy, with an intent of ſending him over as chief governor; but his intereſt failed before that of her great favourite, Robert Devereux, earl of Eſſex, who was appointed to that high office, his finances being well ſupplied, and having an army of 20,000 foot and 1500 horſe under his command.

Though he had it in charge to reduce Ulſter, he marched into Munſter with little ſucceſs, and was at laſt baffled by Owen O'Marr, and the new earl of Deſmond, (called the Sugan Earl), both of whom hung upon his rear for ſeveral days, and did him no ſmall damage. All this while he feared that both the Scots and the Spaniards had found means to ſupply Tyrone with proviſions, and that he was treating with them to aſſiſt him with forces to carry on his rebellion.

Finding that Elizabeth was diſpleaſed, (as ſhe had reaſon to be) with his miſconduct, Eſſex aſſured her majeſty by letter, that he would now march with all ſpeed to Ulſter, yet he firſt made an expedition to Leix and Ophaly, which ſo much diminiſhed his army, that he was obliged to ſend to England for a reinforcement. In the interim, Clifford, governor of Connaught, whom he had ſent to Belick, to diſtreſs Tyrone, was defeated and ſlain by the inſurgents, and his infantry would all have been cut in pieces, had they not been brought off by the horſe coming timely to their aſſiſtance.

But even when the ſolicited ſupply arrived, Eſſex ſtill neglected to proſecute, in a proper and ſoldier-like manner, the war againſt Tyrone; and at laſt, only marched with a body of 500 men to the borders of the province, where he held a parley, and concluded a truce with him for only ſix weeks, which either party was at liberty to break on giving the other fourteen days notice. And this truce was lengthened on from one ſix weeks to another.

The queen diſapproving this part of his conduct more than all the reſt, reproved him ſharply for it in a letter; the conſequence of which was that this infatuated man quitted Ireland, and preſented himſelf before the court, without waiting for his recal. This ſtep ſealed his ruin; for after having been provoked to break forth into open rebellion; and what was ſtill worſe, to ſpeak diſreſpectfully of his royal miſtreſs, his enemies ceaſed not purſuing this unhappy favorite, till he was tried, caſt, condemned, and finally executed in the Tower of London, (in conſequence of a ſentence paſſed upon him as a traitor), on Aſh-Wedneſday, in the year 1601.

Adam Loftus, lord chancellor, and Sir George Carey, treaſurer, being lords juſtices, Tyrone, who had not of late been accuſtomed to meet with any check, now aſſumed a haughty tone, declaring, that he never meant to lay down his arms till he had reſtored the independence of his country. However, he gave the notice agreed on, that he would break the truce, ſpirited up the people to inſurrection, depoſed M'Carthy More, placed Florence M'Carthy in his ſtead, took pledges of him whom they called, the White Knight, and of many others, whoſe zeal to his cauſe he doubted; plundering the lands of ſuch as refuſed to engage in his ſchemes, and thus making himſelf formidable to them.

Sir Thomas Norris, lord preſident of Munſter, died of a wound that he had received in a ſkirmiſh, and one of the commiſſioners of the province was aſſaulted and ſlain by M'Guire, as he was taking the air, near Cork. Carew was therefore appointed lord preſident of Munſter, and the queen ſent over Montjoy as lord deputy. This nobleman being at Kilkenny, was invited by the earl of Ormond to go with him a few miles to parley with Owen M'Rory O'More. He conſented, and the conſequence was, that he was taken priſoner by the Iriſh chief; and the lord deputy, together with the earl of Thomond, who accompanied him, would have experienced the ſame fate, had they not ſaved themſelves by flight, truſting to the ſwiftneſs of their horſes.

An unſucceſsful attempt having been made to intercept Tyrone, on his return from Munſter, the lord deputy now thought proper to change his mode of making war.—Breaking up the army he quartered the troops in garriſons, from whence, however, he could draw them together when he ſhould need their aſſiſtance.

Several ſkirmiſhes in different provinces; the ſubmiſſion of M'Carthy; and a deſign to take the Sugan Earl of Deſmond, which miſcarried, marked the remainder of this year. Deſmond was indeed afterwards taken, but reſcued by the Iriſh. The knight of the Glin's caſtle was taken; and the revolters, in general, continued in the field with various ſucceſs. James, ſon of Garret, earl of Deſmond, being in the hands of the queen of England, ſhe ſent him over honourably attended, to try whether he could not raiſe a party againſt the Sugan Earl. This adventurer was at firſt well received by the Iriſh; but no ſooner did they obſerve, that he went to a proteſtant church, than they inſulted and reviled him, plainly ſhewing him that he had little to expect from them, as they conceived a hatred againſt him, on the ſcore of religion.

Another attempt was made to ſurpriſe the Sugan Earl, who was then in company with Dermod Mac Gragh, titular biſhop of Cork; but the object of purſuit proved too nimble for thoſe that were in ſearch of him; while the biſhop eſcaped in the habit of a beggar.

When the lord deputy had again determined on a general hoſting, he marched toward Ardmagh, which he took, and afterwards engaged and defeated a body of the Iriſh, in what might perhaps be more properly termed a ſkirmiſh than a battle.

Great part of this year was ſpent in encounters of this ſort; in one of which prince Lacey was ſlain: and at laſt the lord deputy returned without having been able to force the revolters to a deciſive action.

The Iriſh of Connaught roſe, (Sir John Berkley, the preſident, being too weak to reſiſt them) and propoſed to invade Munſter, but to hinder them from attempting this, the preſident of that province ſent a thouſand foot, under the command of one Flower, by which timely interpoſition the deſign miſcarried, the enemy being defeated and moſtly diſperſed by Flower, who returned victorious to Limeric.

The preſident coming to Cork, uſed all the means that he could deviſe, to get the Sugan Earl ſeized, whom the White Knight, at laſt, having ſurpriſed, the priſoner was arraigned for various treaſons and condemned in Ireland; but he was ſent to England, together with Florence Mac Carthy, who had alſo been arreſted by order of the lord deputy.

It was determined at the ſeſſions holden at Cork to take into cuſtody all ſuſpected perſons, as the means of preventing a Spaniſh invaſion, which was continually threatened; as, without being pretty ſecure of aſſiſtance from the natives, it was concluded that the foreigners would not hazard a deſcent on the iſland.

However, notwithſtanding all precautions, a Spaniſh fleet arrived on the coaſt and landed a body of troops at Kinſale; on which a proper force was ordered to march againſt them.

But before the Engliſh who attacked the foreigners in Kinſale, had any proſpect of making themſelves maſters of the place, the earl of Tyrone, and O'Donnel, who had been joined by 2000 Spaniards, came in ſight. The conſequence was a great engagement between the armies; in which Tyrone's forces, amounting to about 7000 men, were routed with the loſs of 1200 ſlain and about 200 wounded. Don John of Aguila ſurrendered, and he and his Spaniards were carried on board Engliſh veſſels to their own country. The camp was broke up; and the rebellion of Tyrone drew towards its period. He was purſued from place to place till he withdrew to an inacceſſible fortreſs, and from thence he ſent an abſolute ſubmiſſion to the lord deputy who was returned to Dublin.

The ſpirit of revolt was now pretty nearly extinct, and the inſurgents were put to ſuch ſtraits by want, that more periſhed by famine than by the ſword.

But it is to be obſerved that though the fortreſſes of Danbay, Caſtlehaven and Baltimore were agreed to be delivered up by the Spaniards, yet the Iriſh, under O'Sullivan Beare, ſurpriſed the former of theſe, which was not retaken by the Engliſh without a moſt deſperate reſiſtance; the commander endeavouring by throwing a lighted match into a barrel of gun-powder, to blow up himſelf and them together as ſoon as he ſaw them enter. The whole province was ſoon after reduced to obedience, and all Ireland kept in awe by the armies of the Engliſh.

By the advice of her council the queen finally granted a pardon to the earl of Tyrone, but ſo much againſt her will, that ſome writers have conſidered it as haſtening her end; though it is pretty certain that ſhe never enjoyed herſelf after the execution of Eſſex. Having for a long time ſuffered ill health, and a dejection of ſpirits, Elizabeth after a reign more glorious perhaps to her ſubjects than happy to herſelf, expired on the 24th of March 1603, having previouſly named James the fifth of Scotland (the ſon of that queen Mary whom ſhe had beheaded) for her ſucceſſor.

BOOK III.

From the ACCESSION of King JAMES I. to the TREATY of LIMERIC in the REIGN of King WILLIAM III.

CHAP. I.

Diſpute between the Proteſtants and Catholics—King determines againſt the latter—Complaints, &c.—Sundry Events—The King's embarraſſed Situation—Arrival of the Pope's Nuncio—Ill Conſequences—Sent back with Shame and Diſgrace—Death of King Charles, &c.

KING James the firſt was deſcended from the Iriſh kings of Scottiſh race, a circumſtance which, he doubted not, would recommend him doubly to the attention, and give him a claim on the obedience of the Iriſh nation; or render them the more blameable if they ſhould oppoſe or perplex his government. Yet it is certain that the catholic religion there was in many places eſtabliſhed by force; and it was not without ſome difficulty (notwithſtanding the ſubmiſſion of Tyrone) that his majeſty was proclaimed in Ireland.

Montjoy having departed for England, Sir Arthur Chicheſter was ſworn lord deputy, who found trouble enough in trimming the ballance between the catholics and proteſtants, the former of whom by their own violent proceedings, and ſtill more by the relation of the unaccountable plot of the fifth of November, (though the ſcene was laid in England) loſt much of their credit on the other ſide of the water. Whether all the particulars relative to this plot were truly related or not, it is certain that ſome perſons in Britain loſt their lives for it, while many more ſuffered in their fortunes and reputation.

Plans for ſurpriſing the caſtle of Dublin were at that time talked of, and theſe tidings being tranſmitted to England, methods of prevention were adopted.

A parliament being called in Ireland, a violent diſpute aroſe between the proteſtants and catholics, chiefly on account of the choice of a ſpeaker: the latter being outnumbered, and Sir John Davis choſen, who had been nominated by the vice-treaſurer; when it was moved that thoſe who were in favour of Sir John Davis ſhould go out, the remaining members pretended that they conſtituted the real houſe, becauſe they were within doors, putting a ſpeaker of their own election into the chair, even kept him there by force. At laſt, after much conteſt, theſe catholics ſeparating themſelves, the lord lieutenant conſidering the majority as a legal houſe; the buſineſs went on without them.

But the ſeceders ſent petition after petition, complaint after complaint, to the court of London. On a day appointed, the king heard them with patience, and having deliberated on the ſubject of their remonſtrances, ſeems to have determined with candour, as appears from a ſpeech he made to them; which (with ſome pedantry) contained much of ſolid argument. In the iſſue, he determined againſt the catholics, whom he called but half-ſubjects; yet concluded by an engagement to redreſs ſome few real grievances, and aſſuring the complainants "that if, by their future behaviour, they redeemed "their former miſcarriage, he ſhould eſteem them "not only worthy of pardon, but alſo of favour "and cheriſhing." And the buſineſs of the parliament proceeded, after ſome diſputes concerning preference between the lord of Shane and the lord of Kerry, were ſettled.

Chicheſter, though a man of moderation, was charged by the Catholics with oppreſſing their religion, and by the Puritans with too much favouring it. Theſe circumſtances were of themſelves ſufficient to ſhew that he held the ballance with an even hand. He was ſteady and perſevering, and notwithſtanding the accuſations preſented againſt him was approved by his ſovereign; and on quitting his adminiſtration, and coming over to England, was created baron of Belfaſt; Thomas Jones and Sir John Denham being ſworn lords juſtices.

While Henry Carey, viſcount Falkland, was chief governor, died James the ſixth of Scotland and the firſt of England, properly ſtyled "A prince of greater talents than judgment; and, (notwithſtanding his boaſt of king-craft) poſſeſſed of more ſchool-learning than policy or penetration."

Charles, the only ſurviving ſon of the deceaſed monarch, ſucceeded, as at firſt it ſhould have ſeemed, under happy auſpices; but there were many latent cauſes which from the firſt, laid the groundwork of the Puritans in England, who now forming a very conſiderable body, threatened to diſturb the peace of the nation, which they quite deſtroyed in the ſequel; and the Catholics of Ireland meditated plans that ripened into future rebellion.

It was impoſſible for a year to paſs unmarked with ſome conteſt or complaint in Ireland; but that which laid the foundation of a ſcene of trouble, was a ſet of articles exhibited againſt Thomas Wentworth, earl of Strafford. The accuſation was managed by a committee of Proteſtants and Catholics, and the buſineſs was favoured by the Engliſh parliament, that body being grown diſcontented with the king's government.

On theſe charges the earl was impeached and condemned, and ſuffered as a traitor, on the 12th of May 1641, the king though he interfered in his behalf not having the ſpirit to grant a pardon to a man who, though he had acted amiſs, had laboured to ſupport the royal authority; and at the worſt, could only be candidly judged to have committed ſome miſdemeanours. But it was thus that Charles began ſharpening the axe to ſtrike off his own head.

The Iriſh parliament being adjourned, and all things, in outward appearance, quiet, on Saturday the 23d of October, in 1641, a moſt remarkable event happened, which was no leſs than an almoſt univerſal defection of the Iriſh, attended with great ſlaughter and confuſion. As religion was the cauſe aſſigned for this riſing, the old Engliſh families joined with the native Iriſh; and few of the Catholics remained ſteady to their allegiance.

The matter was diſcovered only the day before, by one O'Connally, and confirmed by others.—The effect of this was the preſervation of the caſtle of Dublin, which was intended to have been ſeized; but the Engliſh loſt almoſt all their other places of ſtrength in the kingdom. The inſurgents finally fell alſo upon the Scots; ſo that by the 1ſt of November, the Proteſtants had little left in Ulſter than Londonderry, Colerain, Inniſkilling, half the county of Down, and part of the county of Antrim.

While the lords juſtices, who had pardoned and rewarded O'Connally, were buſied in providing for the ſecurity of what yet remained, they were ſurpriſed to find it aſſerted by Sir Phelim O'Neale, and Rory M'Guire, then encamped at Newry, that they had a commiſſion from the king of England for what they done, of which they had ſent copies to their confederates.

The parliament in London hearing of theſe tranſactions, prevailed on Charles to put the management of the Iriſh war into their hands, and paſſed ſeveral votes for the proſecution of it; and the king ſent ſome arms to Sir Robert Stewart in Ulſter. But the rebels grew every day more powerful; and when they were accuſed of the maſſacre that had taken place, ſpoke of one intended by the other party; to prevent which, they ſaid, they had taken up arms, and called heaven to witneſs that they were not guilty of the blood ſhed, or likely to be ſhed on this occaſion.

Candour muſt own, that the government, had been for ſome time carried with a high hand, and ſuch ſtrictneſs exerciſed in regard to the Catholics, as might make ſome of them apprehenſive of future oppreſſion. Fears of this ſort being infuſed by the higher rank and the prieſts among the lower ſort of the people, had poſſibly ſome ſhare in promoting thoſe evils of which we are here giving a recital.

As to the maſſacre, after all that has been roundly aſſerted, it muſt be difficult to aſcertain the number of proteſtants that fell in the commotion; but that theſe have been moſt unreaſonably exaggerated, appears from an examination of the moſt authentic records. Nevertheleſs the murders and cruelties committed by the Iriſh on thoſe who unhappily fell into their hands, many of whom had never offended them, marked their perſecutors as men of blood, who deſerved the puniſhment that many of them afterwards experienced, and whoſe actions at the time deſerve to be recorded with infamy to poſterity.

After all, it is, however, probable there was ſome truth in the aſſertion, "That the Iriſh did "not proceed to the utmoſt extremities of cruelty, "till the lords juſtices, alarmed at what they heard "was already done, gave orders to fall upon the "Catholics, who in conſequence, (though the firſt "aggreſſors) on their part, continued the maſ"ſacre."

It was now found that, "the Papiſt Lords of the "Pale," as they were called, were not to be depended on, moſt of them refuſing to reſort to parliament: they met the inſurgents of Meath, and after a parley joined their party.

The enemy having by this time taken moſt of the walled towns in the kingdom, and drawn nearer to Dublin, that capital was almoſt blocked up on the land-ſide, while the Iriſh endeavoured by every poſſible means, to take Tredagh (Drogheda), which they had beſieged, and at this time, by adopting a ſtratagem, were very near ſucceeding.

Yet, in the midſt of this perplexity, it ſeems rather ſtrange, that in a pardon publiſhed, the time allotted for the Iriſh to come in, was too ſhort; above all, that it was limited to ſuch as did NOT poſſeſs a freehold, a ſure way to keep the higher orders in rebellion; and, in ſuch a country as Ireland, was it wonderful that the lower claſs ſhould continue to follow them?

The jealouſies between the king and parliament having begun before the commencement of the Iriſh war, though both profeſſed their deſires to ſuppreſs the inſurrection, little, compared to what might have been expected, was done towards promoting this end. The parliament believed, or affected to believe Sir Phelim O'Neale's aſſertion above recited. The monarch was jealous of parliamentary influence; ſo that neither party could be truly ſaid to be cordial in the matter. However, that Charles, at this time, had the greater wiſh to purſue it, appears by his meſſages to both houſes on the ſubject, which met only with croſs or vague anſwers, from a ſet of people who ſeemed more diſpoſed to oppreſs the innocent Catholics in England, than to ſuppreſs thoſe who had taken up arms in the ſiſter kingdom.

It would be tedious and unintereſting to purſue this conteſt ſtep by ſtep, as managed in the cabinet or in the field. From the former innumerable manifeſtos iſſued; in the latter, the ſucceſſes which were various, proved often too trifling to be recorded.

The Engliſh parliament now treated with certain Scottiſh commiſſioners, and a ſubſcription was opened, by which a number of adventurers were entitled to portions of eſtates, or indeed whole provinces declared to be forfeited, and conſequently to be confiſcated at the end of the rebellion. Of the prudence of this meaſure much has been ſaid; yet general as it was, perhaps it could hardly be proved any more politic than juſt, thus to give away the poſſeſſions of perſons, yet not legally convicted, and to leave room for a whole people to conceive that little leſs was intended than their extirpation.

Of this his majeſty expreſſed his doubts; and he was reviled for the ſuggeſtion.

The king afterwards expreſſed his willingneſs to ſuppreſs the revolt, by going over to Ireland in perſon; when the parliament, doubtleſs very wiſely and juſtly, voted that they muſt be enemies to the peace of England, who adviſed him to make ſuch a propoſal.

Theſe men proceeded at home from one demand to another. The king took ſome imprudent ſteps, of which they made every advantage. The ſovereign having reaſon to doubt the ſafety of his perſon in London, withdrew from the capital, and ſet up his ſtandard; and the demagogues prepared for war.

At Edgehill, Charles engaged his rebellious ſubjects, and after an obſtinate conteſt, in which 5000 men were ſlain, the loyaliſts were likely to have won the field; night parted the combatants, and though the earl of Eſſex, the parliament general, retired, yet both ſides claimed the victory.

In November 1641, the lords juſtices tranſmitted a petition they had received from the Iriſh Catholics, requeſting his majeſty to hear their grievances. A remonſtrance was preſented on their behalf to the parliament at Dublin; but party ſpirit ſo ſtrongly prevailed in that aſſembly, that ſome of the epiſcopalians and puritans quarrelled in arguing the ſubject, and broke up without doing any thing in the matter.

Nor did the Iriſh proteſtants fail to ſolicit their affairs in England with his majeſty, who returned a compaſſionate anſwer, as to the ſufferings they complained of; but gave them to underſtand, in effect, "that he had ſtrove in vain to help them." And now it was pretty clear, that the two parties having come to a rupture at home, thought more of ſelf-defence than of bettering the affairs of Ireland.

However, a body of Scotch having been tranſported to Ulſter, had Carrickfergus delivered into their hands, and made Colerain and the county round their quarters. Defeating the Iriſh, they took Newry, and put to death many of their enemies, their ſucceſſes continuing till Owen Roe O'Neal came over from the Continent, at whoſe arrival his countrymen were beyond meaſure rejoiced, as he was deſervedly eſteemed a good and experienced general.

In the mean time, the confederate catholics planned and inſtituted a ſort of republican government, which they intended ſhould laſt, at leaſt during the continuance of the war; though all this while they acknowledged king Charles for their nominal ſovereign, and ſhewed great marks of reſpect to his female conſort. They conſtituted a ſupreme council, iſſued many ordinances, with the concurrence of the clergy, reſpecting eccleſiaſtical, civil, and military matters; confirmed the league between the provinces, formed a great ſeal, and ordered a proclamation to be made, to all the adherents of the Engliſh of what nation ſoever, to come over to them, (the Confederates) by a certain day: and, finally, they ordered that the enemy ſhould not be called Proteſtants or Engliſh, but the Puritanical or Malignant Party.

The war was carried on with various ſucceſs; but, as might be expected from the numbers and union of their enemies, the Engliſh were hard preſſed though the parliament in their meſſage to the king, adviſing, and almoſt inſiſting that he ſhould not go over to that country, had aſſerted, that they had ſuch well grounded hopes of ſubduing the inſurgents.

Sir William Parſons being removed from his office, having become diſagreeable to many moderate perſons, on account of his attachment to the puritans, Sir John Borlace, and Sir Henry Tichburn, were conſtituted lords juſtices in his room.

Things verging faſt to confuſion in Ireland, the king was at laſt convinced, that it would be neceſſary to conclude a ceſſation of arms with the Iriſh catholics; yet he wrote four letters on the ſubject before any thing was reſolved on.

At length money falling ſhort, the marquis of Ormond made a motion that ſuch ceſſation muſt be agreed to, unleſs 10,000 pounds, (one half in money and the other in proviſions), could be raiſed and brought into the capital within a fortnight. The mayor of the city averred this to be impoſſible; the circumſtance was regiſtered, and, after ſome delays, the marquis agreed to meet, and treat with the rebels, on the 23d of June 1643.

How highly ſoever we may cenſure the Iriſh catholics in breaking out into rebellion; yet now voluntarily offering to become loyal ſubjects, it was not wonderful that Charles and his miniſters ſhould liſten to terms, the parliament attempting ſo little (after all their promiſes) to reduce them by force, and the king's troops waſting away in Ireland, while it was but too evident that he ſhould ſoon want their ſervices in England for his own protection.

After ſome diſputes, concerning titles, &c. the ceſſation of arms was agreed on, and Charles was moſt unmercifully vilified by thoſe whoſe conduct forced him into it, for having countenanced ſuch a meaſure; while they knew very well that, ſetting aſide the neceſſity of Charles's withdrawing his troops, they alſo intended to recall moſt of the Scots and Engliſh that had gone over thither on their account. And ſo the Engliſh parliament impeached Ormond, and nominally deprived him of his government.

All this time he was buſied in diſpatching troops to give aid to his royal maſter; the treaty of Uxbridge was the conſequence; and it is likely that more ſolid benefits would have followed if a greater force could have been ſent, at that time, to the king's aſſiſtance.

The ceſſation, after many diſputes, was at length ſucceeded by propoſals for a peace with the Iriſh. The ſuggeſtion at firſt met with many obſtacles, almoſt all of which were raiſed on the ſcore of religion; the Catholics inſiſting they would enjoy their mode of worſhip in its full ſplendour, and urging beſides the repeal of certain acts of parliament unfavourable to them. Theſe matters, together with king Charles's ſituation reſpecting his ſubjects in England ſerved to occaſion numberleſs delays in the nogociation, which took up the whole year, while the Engliſh parliament ſcrupled not to aſſert that neither the king nor his miniſters had any right to negociate at all.

But what at this time moſt contributed to impede the buſineſs was, the earl of Glamorgan (a catholic) in Charles's name, offered terms more favourable than any they perceived they had to hope for from the lord lieutenant. They in conſequence held off; and in the mean time ſome of the Puritan party in Ireland addreſſed the king to condeſcend ſo far as to break his word, and again to declare the confederates rebels.

However, notwithſtanding this ſecret buſineſs, a treaty was concluded between Ormond and the ſupreme council, which latter voted that 10,000 men ſhould be ſent to the king's aſſiſtance; but when the ſoldiers were ready there was no ſhipping; and when there was a probability of effecting their tranſportation, they were gone upon other ſervice. Thus this unhappy prince waited for Iriſh aid in vain, while his affairs every day aſſumed a worſe face in England.

At the latter end of the ſame year arrived the Pope's nuncio, after having been chaced by a parliament ſhip, by which if he had been taken, it would have been well for the royal party, and the confederates, as he acted diametrically oppoſite to the intereſts of both during his ſtay in the country. For he oppoſed the peace, when it was about to be generally proclaimed, brought over Owen Roe O'Neal, who had defeated the Engliſh and Scots, at Bemburg, and rendered that great victory uſeleſs. General Preſton too, who had appeared very forward to aſſiſt the royal cauſe, now deſerted it, and Dublin was threatened by the nuncio with a ſiege. The earl of Glamorgan's ſecret articles of peace were found among the papers of the archbiſhop of Tuam, and threatened to be publiſhed by the ſupreme council. Thus, in effect, nothing but confuſion prevailed in Ireland; while the king loſing town after town, and battle after battle; ſaw his hopes totally ruined by Naſeby fight, where Cromwell defeated him; and he then ſurrendered to the Scotch commiſſioners. This occaſioned ſome breach of the peace on his ſide, being in the hands of thoſe that diſapproved it. And Ormond himſelf at laſt yielded up Dublin, by Charles's permiſſion, to the parliament's forces, under the command of one Jones, becauſe the catholics on their part threatened to ſtorm it; and ſurrendering the regalia, withdrew himſelf honourably to England, according to the terms of the capitulation, in the beginning of the year 1647. All this to be attributed to the behaviour of the malicious and ignorant nuncio, by whoſe means Owen Roe O'Neal had even been perſuaded to join the parliament's forces.

After his retreat the affairs of the Confederates went on ſo ill, that they were once more willing to renew their treaties of peace; but ſcarcely knew to whom they ſhould addreſs themſelves, or how to procure the appointment of a lord lieutenant, as their delay of ſending ſuccours having ruined the king's affairs, he was by this time a priſoner in the iſle of Wight, having been delivered up by the Scotch, while it was too plain that Cromwell and his party were likely to carry all before them in England.

But at this time the earl of Inchiquin, who acted for the parliament, growing diſguſted with the proceedings of their party, finding he was likely to be ſupported by the Scotch Covenanters, who now began to be ſeparated from the Independants, concluded a ceſſation with the Iriſh. To this like every other meaſure that was really for the good of the country, the nuncio gave every hindrance in his power. But people's eyes beginning to be opened, this eccleſiaſtic now firſt found himſelf oppoſed, and that even by force. On this, he publiſhed an inſtrument beginning, "In the name of God: Amen:" wherein he piouſly exhorted thoſe who ſided with him, neither to regard the loſs of their own goods, the plundering thoſe of other men, "nor even "the ſlaughter of ſome, or perhaps of many in ſo "good a cauſe;" and the friars were every where enjoined to denounce damnation againſt all ſuch as had agreed to the truce.

In ſhort, the nuncio was never quiet till he had nearly ruined the affairs of the Confederates, and was ſent back with ſhame and diſgrace, and a number of charges preferred againſt him, to appear before his holineſs, who very ſharply reprimanded, when he ought to have puniſhed him ſeverely for his conduct.

The marquis of Ormond having, by his majeſty's deſire, met the Scotch commiſſioners, between them it was agreed that they ſhould make head in Scotland, while he, being once more appointed lord lieutenant, would uſe all his endeavours again to ſerve his royal maſter in Ireland.

Though the confederates wiſhed for a Catholic governor, yet they received Ormond with reſpect; and joining their forces, the combined armies poſſeſſed themſelves of almoſt all the walled towns, and at laſt advanced towards Dublin, which Jones had held ever ſince for the Engliſh parliament.

A prohibition arrived from the king, enjoining Ormond not to proceed any farther in concert with the Iriſh, but the latter did not at all regard it, as he had been previouſly warned to attend to no written order from his majeſty, whilſt under confinement; and the peace was finally ratified in the middle of January.

But before he could draw together any forces to ſend over for the deliverance of king Charles, that prince was butchered under all the forms of trial by his rebellious ſubjects. It will be needleſs here to dwell on the circumſtances of that tragedy. Suffice it to ſay, that the duke of Hamilton having been defeated by Cromwell, on his return victorious from the expedition, the Independants every where roſe ſuperior to the Preſbyterians, who, at this time, were willing to treat with their ſovereign.

Cromwell, therefore, advanced to Weſtminſter, where he purged the parliament as he termed it, of all but his own creatures, and the king having been ſeized at the Iſle of Wight, was brought to London, tried, caſt, and condemned, by what was called, a High Court of Juſtice; and after having ſuffered many outrages, was beheaded adjoining to his own palace of Whitehall; for a full relation of which we refer our readers to our Hiſtory of England.

WHEN the mournful news of Charles the firſt's death reached the prince of Wales at the Hague, he cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed by the ſtyle and title of Charles the ſecond, king of Great Britain, &c. but the parliament in England declared it high treaſon to acknowledge his title.

Ormond failed not to proclaim him in Ireland; the nuncio gone, yet more catholics came in; and the lord lieutenant proceeded in his deſign to beſiege Dublin.

That capital was accordingly inveſted, juſt at the time when tidings arrived that Cromwell intended landing at the head of 9000 men in Munſter, on which a conſiderable body of the army was detached to oppoſe him.

In the mean time, the ſiege proceeded; and it was generally thought that the city would have been taken; when, Jones's men by an unexpected ſally one morning, defeated the royaliſts and confederates ſo completely that they were obliged to raiſe the ſiege, to the great diſgrace of their arms in that quarter. This was that fatal defeat of Rathmines, which much reſembled that of Roderic monarch of Ireland; and this the Iriſh ſay was one of the moſt ſhameful that has been recorded in hiſtory.

Cromwell hearing of theſe things changed his deſign and landed, not in Munſter, but in Leinſter; he took Tredagh, (Drogheda) where he cruelly put the garriſon to the ſword, and made ſuch a progreſs in the country, that while the Iriſh were yet buſied in diſputes, they found themſelves blocked up in a corner of the iſland; and though Clanrichard a catholic was ſubſtituted as lord deputy, yet their affairs went to wreck, and finally they referred to a foreign prince, the duke of Lorrain, who offered certain conditions, the firſt of which was that of his being acknowledged Lord Protector of the iſland. But, it being found that the biſhop of Fernes, a late co-adjutor of the nuncio, had buſied himſelf in this matter, and that it was intended by his party to conclude the treaty in the name of the people of Ireland, this was objected to, and numberleſs diſputes aroſe, which ended in breaking off the treaty, while Cromwell, in whoſe favour Cork had revolted, purſued his conqueſts, ſtep by ſtep, till after a battle fought at Knocknaclaſhy, won by lord Broghill, Limeric and Galway were taken. And thus for this period the Iriſh war was ended.

It is eaſy for the reader to conceive that in any trials of ſuch of the Iriſh as had been concerned in the murders of proteſtants, many of them were convicted and executed. Among theſe was Sir Phelim O'Neal (ſo often mentioned in the courſe of the hiſtory.) It has been obſerved that this chief once pretended he had received his commiſſion from the late king: but this he now diſavowed, averring that he took the ſeal from a patent found at Charlemont, and then cauſed it to be ſtitched to a commiſſion written in Charles's name. To this aſſertion he adhered, though not only a pardon, but alſo the reſtoration of his honours and fortune had been promiſed him by the Puritan government, if he would only ſay he had his ſovereign's warrant for what was done. This ſolicitation was carried ſo far, that juſt as the executioner was about to do his office, a perſon came up who ordered him to ſtop, and then whiſpered with Sir Phelim, as was rationally ſuppoſed, on the ſame ſubject; ſince the latter anſwered aloud "that he "was obliged to the lord lieutenant, but could not "think of advancing any ſuch thing." Thus it was that not content with having put their king to death, theſe malevolent people uſed all poſſible means to fix a ſtigma on his memory.

Cromwell now ſwaying all, carried things with a high hand in England, and in Ireland ruled with a rod of iron. In the ſmall ſpace allotted this uſurper to reign he was amazingly ſucceſsful in his arms and negociations abroad, and triumphed over all obſtacles but ſuch as aroſe from his own evil conſcience. Clouds, ſuſpicions, the fear of aſſaſſination, and domeſtic unhappineſs, haunted him till his death, which happened in conſequence of a tertian ague (of which it had been propheſied that he ſhould recover), on the third of September 1658, in as violent a ſtorm as ever was known in Britain.

His ſon Richard, on his death, was nominated protector; but ſoon after depoſed, and reduced to a private man. Change ſucceeding after change, wearying the people with anarchy, paved the way for general Monk to bring in Charles the ſecond, who was at length reſtored, and proclaimed king on his birth-day, May 29, 1650.

On the acceſſion of this prince to the throne the Iriſh entertained great hopes, in ſome of which from the very ſituation of Charles's affairs, and in others from a want of care for their intereſt, they were diſappointed.

The ſovereign, who forgot not his being obliged to ſubmit to the covenanters in Scotland, the event of the battle of Worceſter, and his almoſt miraculous eſcape, ſeemed now inclined to temporiſe with the different parties, many of whom he ſuffered to criminate each other. While the court was all gaiety, this was a reign diſtinguiſhed by real or pretended plots of the ſubjects; and the infection in ſome degree reached Ireland, from whence on many accounts various petitions and remonſtrances were ſent by oppoſing parties.

In the mean time in England, the parliaments having latterly been diſobliging to Charles, he governed for ſome years without any ſuch aſſembly. The duke of York his brother was known to be a Catholic, and there were continual murmurs raiſed againſt him, and ſome troubles aroſe which William prince of Orange who had married his daughter after the concluſion of the war, was careful to prevent.

James was alternately baniſhed and recalled; but on the death of Charles the ſecond, on the ſixth of February 1684, aſcended the Engliſh throne, by the ſtyle of James the ſecond, his brother leaving behind him the character of a prince poſſeſſed of ſome virtues and many talents; but not at all remarkable for ſincerity; and conſtantly ſeen to ſacrifice his beſt qualities to extravagance and diſſipation.

There was great joy in Dublin when king James the ſecond was proclaimed there; and now numbers of the Iriſh from being the accuſed, turned the accuſers. After various changes the earl of Tyrconnel was appointed lieutenant general by the king, who had reaſon to think he might confide in ſuch a ſervant.

Though this reign had begun rather favourably in England; yet the prince making quick ſtrides to arbitrary power, and contrary to his royal word given, having diſcovered his intention of eſtabliſhing the Catholic religion throughout the three kingdoms, murmurs firſt, and afterwards commotions enſued. The duke of Monmouth, natural ſon of Charles II. in particular, ſtirred up a rebellion, but was defeated, and being made priſoner was executed as a traitor.

James now began to think his troubles were over; but his ſon-in-law William, prince of Orange, being continually addreſſed by the malecontents whoſe reſentment was kindled to the higheſt degree, liſtened to them, and only waited for an opportunity of appearing in their favour, and, as he ſaid, of redreſſing their grievances.

The cruelties of Kirk and judge Jefferies in the Weſt, and the arbitrary proceedings of the king in committing the biſhops to the tower of London, together with his egregious folly in endeavouring to convert his ſoldiers and ſailors, haſtened this matter. Juſt at the time when all were ready to quit James, William who had been for a while detained by contrary winds, at length obtained a proſperous gale which ſerved to land him at Torbay, while the Britiſh fleets remained in their harbours.

King James, who had previouſly refuſed an aid of French troops, had no other expectations but from his own ſubjects, and they being all offended, on the one hand, or intimidated on the other, fell away from him. Churchill, his favourite, the lord Cornbury, and laſt of all even his daughter Anne deſerted him. William proceeded to London; and at midnight, the king left the palace of St. James's by his order, not ſuffering the guards to reſiſt, only inſiſting to go to Rocheſter inſtead of Ham, to which the prince of Orange's people immediately (perhaps gladly) conſented.

It is well known that after an attempt of thoſe who found him out in diſguiſe to ſend him back again with honour, this infatuated monarch withdrew to France, whither he had already ſent the queen and prince, of whom ſhe was unfortunately for him brought to bed at the time when the biſhops were in the Tower, who ought to have been preſent at her majeſty's delivery. This occaſioned the report of a ſpurious offspring, a prejudice never thoroughly rooted out from the minds of the people.

When king James had retired, the lords and commons, after much debate, voted that he had abdicated the throne, and the prince of Orange and his conſort were proclaimed by the title of king William and queen Mary, the whole adminiſtration of government being veſted in William, who was determined, as he ſaid, to rule in his own perſon.

While the new ſovereign was providing for all things in England, James reſolved not to let ſlip the opportunity of trying his fortune in Ireland, for the preſervation of which country either through neglect or neceſſity his rival had but ill provided.

Tyrconnel there, who had kept the old army, ſpeedily raiſed new troops for his maſter, and every where defeated his opponents, the ſhattered remains of whom had withdrawn to Londonderry. This town James beſieged with a large army; but the garriſon animated by one Walker a clergyman held out in a manner almoſt unexampled, againſt ſword and famine, till they were victualed and relieved by general Kirk, who had gone over to William, and then the ſiege was raiſed, to the no ſmall mortification of the Iriſh.

By this time a parliament was called at Dublin, the act of ſettlement reverſed, pardons iſſued and acts of attainder paſſed, with ſome other buſineſs of the like nature: and about this time king James was invited and perſuaded to go over to Scotland, which if he had done it would probably have benefited his affairs more than remaining in a country the greater part of which was already reduced under his obedience.

While theſe things were paſſing, admiral Herbert attacked the French fleet near Bantry-Bay, but was defeated; ſo that all things ſeemed taking an unfavourable turn for William in this quarter.

Nevertheleſs he ſent general Schomberg over to Ireland with a large body of troops, who took Carrickfergus, and advanced towards Dundalk; but when he was afterwards met by Mareſchal Roſen who had aſſembled his troops near Drogheda, the former would by no means hazard a battle, but ſtrongly intrenching himſelf lay ſtill in his camp, while his ſoldiers were eaten up with diſeaſe; till at laſt both armies withdrew, without moleſting each other, into winter quarters. The Engliſh camp, on breaking it up, appeared like an hoſpital, and out of 15000 who at various times had entered it, about 8000 were numbered among the dead, and thoſe who were tainted with diſeaſes contracted in it, of which they expired ſoon after. One great cauſe of this unhealthineſs was accounted to be the reception of ſome of their friends from Londonderry, where ſickneſs and infection had prevailed during the latter part of the ſiege.

And now the Engliſh and Dutch united under Torrington and Evertſon, were defeated by the French fleet off Beachy-head; a number of the former being deſtroyed, and the latter retreating much worſted, while William was gone over in perſon to Ireland. The conſequence was that having followed Schomberg's track, the Iriſh retiring before him, he reached the banks of the Boyne, where his rival ſtopping, the armies came to an engagement.

This river the Engliſh were to paſs, and the Iriſh were to endeavour to defend it. The battle was long and bloody, in the courſe of it, Mareſchal Schomberg was ſlain on William's ſide with about 500 men, and moſt of the French Proteſtants whom he had brought with him cut in pieces or trod down by Hamilton's Iriſh horſe. But William ſo animated his troops, that at length they paſſed the river, overcame all obſtacles, and forced the Iriſh to give way, with the loſs of ſeveral perſons of note, Hamilton being taken priſoner and about 1500 men killed on the field of battle. It is worth remarking that Walker the clergyman who had ſtirred up the people of Londonderry to that obſtinate defence, was ſlain in this battle, and when William heard of his fate, he exclaimed, "Fool that he was! what had he to do there?" which was all the tribute he paid to his memory.

Here William twice narrowly eſcaped death, once before the battle, while he was riding along the banks of the Boyne reconnoitring, ſome field-pieces being diſcharged which killed one of his followers, and ſlightly grazed his ſhoulder. The other eſcape was in the heat of the fight, when one of his own dragoons was about to ſhoot him, miſtaking him for an enemy; but his maſter ſuddenly ſpeaking the dragoon knew his voice, and the miſchief was prevented.

After this defeat king James ſeemed to have loſt all hope. He fell back from paſs to paſs, reſolving to embark again for France, and he was confirmed in this reſolution by letters that Louis XIV. ſent him, deſiring he would leave the war to the management of his generals, and promiſing to land him at the head of 30,000 French in England.

Accordingly the king departed, and in his way falling in with ſome frigates that were ſent out with an intent of deſtroying William's ſhipping, this infatuated prince took them with him for his perſonal protection. But when Louis was appriſed of all that had paſſed, he retracted his offer on account of the wrong-headed behaviour of one whom otherwiſe he meant to ſuccour.

William having taken Tredagh, (Drogheda) as he had threatened the garriſon to put them all to the ſword, if they did not ſurrender immediately, and alſo made himſelf maſter of Wexford and Waterford, advanced to Limeric, round which the Iriſh forces were gathered. The town refuſing to ſurrender he ſat down before it with his army, but within three days afterwards Mareſchal Sarsfield having intercepted and deſtroyed a convoy, the garriſon making an obſtinate defence, he was at laſt obliged to raiſe the ſiege with loſs, and embarked for England.

The command devolved on count Solmes; and he ſoon afterwards quitting the army, it remained with general Ginkle, who received orders to finiſh the war at any rate.

Though king James had left his Iriſh ſubjects to themſelves, yet they reſolved on defence; and the more ſo, as William had excepted from a general pardon, "the deſperate leaders of the rebellion;" under which deſcription almoſt every leader might conceive himſelf to be included; and after the duke of Berwick had in vain endeavoured to bring them into ſome order, having given full vent to their exclamations againſt king James, they reduced themſelves under the command of Mareſchal Sarsfield.

Ballimore being ſurrendered to the Engliſh, Ginkle proceeded to attack Athlone, which he took with difficulty, as M. S. Ruth, a French general, covered it with his army.

S. Ruth and Sarsfield after this retired before the Engliſh towards Agrim; and having drained the garriſons, waited for the Engliſh there. Ginkle came up with them, and a battle commenced, the laſt that was ever fought in Ireland. The engagement was fierce and obſtinate, and much generalſhip diſplayed on both ſides: at length the day ſeemed ſo much to incline to the Iriſh, that S. Ruth threw his hat up in the air for joy, exclaiming, "Now will I drive the Engliſh to the gates of "Dublin." He ſaw where he could attack a body of them to advantage; but while he was deſcending from a height, to put this into execution, he was ſuddenly killed by a cannon ſhot; and Sarsfield, who next aſſumed the command, having been at variance with the French general, knew nothing of his plans or diſpoſitions, while the Engliſh purſued theirs, and after a ſevere conteſt gained a complete victory.

The Iriſh, together with their tents and baggage, loſt near 7000 men in the action and purſuit. The fugitives took ſhelter in Limerick, and Ginkle following, made his approach to the place, the greateſt part of the buildings of which, within ten days time, were laid in aſhes by the Engliſh bombs. After this he pretended to retreat, but returning, carried ſome of the outworks, with great ſlaughter of the Iriſh. At length diviſions prevailing among the beſieged, whoſe commander, and many of their officers were Frenchmen, a haſty reſolution was taken to capitulate; accordingly a capitulation was reſolved on, and accepted by Ginkle, in which the commanders of Limerick treated for the whole Iriſh nation. Theſe articles were agreed to on the 3d of October 1691.

The Iriſh proteſtants in general were much diſſatisfied with the terms acceded to, complaining that they ſeemed to be diſregarded, while the vanquiſhed catholics were indulged, and even ſuffered to tranſport themſelves into foreign countries.—But, not to mention that there appeared ſomething invidious in theſe complaints, it is not wonderful that William, having ſo many affairs on his hands, ſhould be willing to put an end to a war, which had occaſioned the expenditure of ſo much money.

A few days after the capitulation was ſigned, a French fleet of eighteen ſail, bringing ſtore of proviſion and ammunition, arrived on the coaſt. But now all things were ſettled, and the Iriſh war being ended, William became maſter of the three kingdoms, a circumſtance which forms a remarkable æra in the courſe of the hiſtory.

The Civil and Military Articles of Limerick, exactly printed from the Letters Patents; wherein they are ratified and exemplified by their Majeſties, under the Great Seal of England.

WILLIAM and Mary, by the grace of God, &c. To all to whom theſe preſents ſhall come, greeting. Whereas certain articles, bearing date the 3d day of October laſt paſt, made and agreed on between our juſtices of our kingdom of Ireland, and our general of our forces there, on the one part; and ſeveral officers there, commanding within the city of Limerick, in our ſaid kingdom, on the other part: whereby our ſaid juſtices and general did undertake that we ſhould ratify thoſe articles, within the ſpace of eight months, or ſooner; and uſe their utmoſt endeavours that the ſame ſhould be ratified and confirmed in parliament. The tenor of which ſaid articles is as follows, viz.

Articles agreed upon the 3d Day of October, 1691.

Between the Right Honourable Sir Charles Porter, Knight, and Thomas Conningſby, Eſq. Lords Juſtices of Ireland; and his Excellency the Baron De Ginkle, Lieutenant-general, and Commander in chief of the Engliſh army, on the one part:

And the Right Honourable Patrick Earl of Lucan, Piercy Viſcount Gallmoy, Colonel Nicholas Purcel, Colonel Nicholas Cuſack, Sir Toby Butler, Colonel Garret Dillon, and Colonel John Brown, on the other part:

In the Behalf of the Iriſh Inhabitants in the City and County of Limerick, the Counties of Clare, Kerry, Cork, Sligo, and Mayo:

In Conſideration of the Surrender of the City of Limerick, and other Agreements made between the ſaid Lieutenant-general Ginkle, the Governor of the City of Limeric, and the Generals of the Iriſh Army, bearing date with theſe Preſents, for the Surrender of the ſaid City, and Submiſſion of the ſaid Army: it is agreed, That,

I. The Roman Catholics of this kingdom ſhall enjoy ſuch privileges in the exerciſe of their religion, as are conſiſtent with the laws of Ireland; or as they did enjoy in the reign of king Charles the Second: and their majeſties, as ſoon as their affairs will permit them to ſummon a parliament in this kingdom, will endeavour to procure the ſaid Roman Catholics ſuch farther ſecurity in that particular, as may preſerve them from any diſturbance upon the account of their ſaid religion.

II. All the inhabitants or reſidents of Limeric, or any other garriſon now in the poſſeſſion of the Iriſh, and all officers and ſoldiers now in arms under any commiſſion of king James, or thoſe authoriſed by him to grant the ſame, in the ſeveral counties of Limeric, Clare, Kerry, Cork, and Mayo, or any of them; and all the commiſſioned officers in their majeſties quarters, that belong to the Iriſh regiments, now in being, that are treated with, and who are not priſoners of war, or have taken protection, and who ſhall return and ſubmit to their majeſties obedience; and their and every of their heirs, ſhall hold, poſſeſs, and enjoy, all and every of their eſtates of freehold and inheritance; and all the rights, titles, and intereſts, privileges, and immunities, which they and every one of them held, enjoyed, or were rightfully and lawfully intitled to, in the reign of king Charles II. or at any time ſince, by the laws and ſtatutes that were in force in the ſaid reign of Charles II. and ſhall be put in poſſeſſion, by order of the government, of ſuch of them as are in the king's hands, or the hands of his tenants, without being put to any ſuit or trouble therein; and all ſuch eſtates ſhall be freed and diſcharged from all arrears of crown-rents, quit-rents, and other public charges, incurred and become due ſince Michaelmas 1688, to the day of the date hereof: and all perſons comprehended in this article, ſhall have, hold, and enjoy all their goods and chattles, real and perſonal, to them, or any of them belonging, and remaining either in their own hands, or the hands of any perſons whatſoever, in truſt for, or for the uſe of them, or any of them: and all and every the ſaid perſons, of what profeſſion, trade, or calling ſoever they be, ſhall and may uſe, exerciſe, and practiſe their ſeveral and reſpective profeſſions, trades, and callings, as freely as they did uſe, exerciſe, and enjoy the ſame in the reign of king Charles II. provided that nothing in this article contained be conſtrued to extend to, or reſtore any forfeiting perſon now out of the kingdom, except what are hereafter compriſed: provided alſo, that no perſon whatſoever ſhall have or enjoy the benefit of this article, that ſhall neglect or refuſe to take the oath of allegiance, made by act of parliament in England, in the firſt year of the reign of their preſent majeſties when thereunto required.

III. All merchants, or reputed merchants of the city of Limeric, or of any other garriſon now poſſeſſed by the Iriſh, or of any town or place in the counties of Clare or Kerry, who are abſent beyond the ſeas, that have not bore arms ſince their majeſties declaration in February, 1688, ſhall have the benefit of the ſecond article, in the ſame manner as if they were preſent; provided ſuch merchants, and reputed merchants, do repair into this kingdom within the ſpace of eight months from the date hereof.

IV. The following officers, viz. colonel Simon Lutterel, captain Rowland White, Maurice Euſtace of Yermanſtown, Chievers of Mayſtown, commonly called Mount Leinſter, now belonging to the regiments in the aforeſaid garriſons and quarters of the Iriſh army, who were beyond the ſeas, and ſent thither upon affairs of their reſpective regiments, or their army in general, ſhall have the benefit and advantage of the ſecond article, provided they return hither within the ſpace of eight months from the date of theſe preſents, and ſubmit to their majeſties government, and take the above-mentioned oath.

V. That all and ſingular the ſaid perſons compriſed in the ſecond and third articles, ſhall have a general pardon of all attainders, outlawries, treaſons, miſpriſions of treaſon, premunires, felonies, treſpaſſes, and other crimes and miſdemeanours whatſoever, by them, or any of them, committed ſince the beginning of the reign of king James II. and if any of them are attainted by parliament, the lords juſtices, and general, will uſe their beſt endeavours to get the ſame repealed by parliament, and the outlawries to be reverſed gratis, all but writing-clerks fees.

VI. And whereas theſe preſent wars have drawn on great violences on both parts; and that if leave were given to the bringing all ſorts of private actions, the animoſities would probably continue, that have been too long on foot, and the public diſturbances laſt: for the quieting and ſettling, therefore, of this kingdom, and avoiding thoſe inconveniences which would be the neceſſary conſequence of the contrary, no perſon or perſons whatſoever, compriſed in the foregoing articles, ſhall be ſued, moleſted, or impleaded at the ſuit of any party or parties whatſoever, for any treſpaſſes by them committed, or for any arms, horſes, money, goods, chattels, merchandizes, or proviſions whatſoever, by them ſeized or taken during the time of the war. And no perſon or perſons whatſoever, in the ſecond and third articles compriſed, ſhall be ſued, impleaded, or made accountable for the rents or mean rates of any lands, tenements, or houſes, by him or them received, or enjoyed in this kingdom, ſince the beginning of the preſent war, to the day of the date hereof, nor for any waſte or treſpaſs by him or them committed in any ſuch lands, tenements, or houſes: and it is alſo agreed, that this article ſhall be mutual and reciprocal on both ſides.

VII. Every nobleman and gentleman compriſed in the ſecond and third article ſhall have liberty to ride with a ſword, and caſe of piſtols, if they think fit; and keep a gun in their houſes, for the defence of the ſame, or for fowling.

VIII. The inhabitants and reſidents in the city of Limerick, and other garriſons, ſhall be permitted to remove their goods, chattels, and proviſions, out of the ſame, without being viewed and ſearched, or paying any manner of duties; and ſhall not be compelled to leave the houſes or lodgings they now have, for the ſpace of ſix weeks next enſuing the date hereof.

IX. The oath to be adminiſtered to ſuch Roman Catholics as ſubmit to their majeſties government, ſhall be the oath above ſaid, and no other.

X. No perſon or perſons who ſhall at any time hereafter break theſe articles, or any of them, ſhall thereby make, or cauſe any other perſon or perſons to forfeit or loſe the benefit of the ſame.

XI. The lords-juſtices and general do promiſe to uſe their utmoſt endeavours, that all the perſons comprehended in the above-mentioned articles, ſhall be protected and defended from all arreſts and executions for debt or damage, for the ſpace of eight months next enſuing the date hereof.

XII. Laſtly, the lords-juſtices and general do undertake, that their majeſties will ratify theſe articles within the ſpace of eight months, or ſooner, and uſe their utmoſt endeavours that the ſame ſhall be ratified and confirmed in parliament.

XIII. And whereas colonel John Brown ſtood indebted to ſeveral Proteſtants, by judgments of record, which appearing to the late government, the lord Tyrconnel, and lord Lucan, took away the effects the ſaid John Brown had to anſwer the ſaid debts, and promiſed to clear the ſaid John Brown of the ſaid debts; which effects were taken for the public uſe of the Iriſh, and their army: for freeing the ſaid lord Lucan of his ſaid engagement, paſt on their public account, for payment of the ſaid Proteſtants, and for preventing the ruin of the ſaid John Brown, and for ſatisfaction of his creditors, at the inſtance of the lord Lucan, and the reſt of the perſons aforeſaid, it is agreed, that the ſaid lords-juſtices, and the ſaid baron de Ginkle, ſhall intercede with the king and parliament, to have the eſtates ſecured to Roman Catholics, by articles and capitulation in this kingdom, charged with, and equally liable to the payment of ſo much of the ſaid debts, as the ſaid lord Lucan, upon ſtating accompts with the ſaid John Brown, ſhall certify under his hand, that the effects taken from the ſaid Brown amount unto; which accompt is to be ſtated, and the balance certified by the lord Lucan in one and twenty days after the date hereof.

For the true performance hereof, we have hereunto ſet our hands,

Preſent	Char. Porter,
Scrayemore.	Tho. Coningſby.
H. Maccay.	Bar. de Ginkle.
T. Talmaſh.

And whereas the ſaid city of Limeric hath been ſince, in purſuance of the ſaid articles, ſurrendered unto us. Now know ye, that we having conſidered of the ſaid articles, are graciouſly pleaſed hereby to declare, that we do for us, our heirs, and ſucceſſors, as far as in us lies, ratify and confirm the ſame, and every clauſe, matter, and thing therein contained. And as to ſuch parts thereof, for which an act of parliament ſhall be found to be neceſſary, we ſhall recommend the ſame to be made good by parliament, and ſhall give our royal aſſent to any bill or bills that ſhall be paſſed by our two houſes of parliament to that purpoſe. And whereas it appears unto us, that it was agreed between the parties to the ſaid articles, that after the words Limeric, Clare, Kerry, Cork, Mayo, or any of them, in the ſecond of the ſaid articles, the words following, viz. " And all ſuch as are under their protection in the ſaid counties," ſhould be inſerted, and be part of the ſaid articles. Which words having been caſually omitted by the writer, the omiſſion was not diſcovered till after the ſaid articles were ſigned, but was taken notice of before the ſecond town was ſurrendered: and that our ſaid juſtices, and general, or one of them, did promiſe that the ſaid clauſe ſhall be made good, it being within the intention of the capitulation, and inſerted in the foul draught thereof. Our farther will and pleaſure is, and we do hereby ratify and confirm the ſaid omitted words, viz. " And all ſuch as are under their protection in the ſaid counties," hereby for us, our heirs and ſucceſſors, ordaining and declaring, that all and every perſon and perſons therein concerned, ſhall and may have, receive, and enjoy the benefit thereof, in ſuch and the ſame manner as if the ſaid words had been inſerted in the proper place, in the ſecond article; any omiſſion, defect, or miſtake in the ſaid ſecond article, in any wiſe notwithſtanding. Provided always, and our will and pleaſure is, that theſe our letters-patents ſhall be enrolled in our court of chancery in our ſaid kingdom of Ireland, within the ſpace of one year next enſuing. In witneſs, &c. witneſs our ſelf at Weſtminſter, the twenty-fourth day of February, anno regni regis & reginæ Gulielmi & Mariæ quarto, per breve de privato ſigillo. Nos autem tenorem premiſſor. predict. Ad requiſitionem attornat. general. domini regis & dominæ reginæ pro regno Hiberniæ. Duximus exemplificand. per preſentes. In cujus rei teſtimonium has literas noſtras fieri fecimus patentes. Teſtibus nobis ipſis apud Weſtmon. quinto die Aprilis adnoq. regni eorum quarto.

Military Articles agreed upon between the Baron de Ginkle, Lieutenant-general, and Commander in Chief of the Engliſh Army on the one ſide,

And the Lieutenant-generals de Uſſoon and de Teſſe, Commanders in Chief of the Iriſh Army, on the other; and the General Officers hereunto ſubſcribing:

I. That all perſons, without any exceptions, of what quality or condition ſoever, that are willing to leave the kingdom of Ireland, ſhall have free liberty to go to any country beyond the ſeas (England and Scotland excepted) where they think fit, with their families, houſhold-ſtuff, plate, and jewels.

II. That all general officers, colonels, and generally all other officers of horſe, dragoons, and foot-guards, troopers, dragooners, ſoldiers of all kinds that are in any garriſon, place, or poſt, now in the hands of the Iriſh, or encamped in the counties of Cork, Clare, and Kerry, as alſo thoſe called Rapparees, or volunteers, that are willing to go beyond ſeas as aforeſaid, ſhall have free leave to embark themſelves wherever the ſhips are that are appointed to tranſport them, and to come in whole bodies as they are now compoſed, or in parties, companies, or otherwiſe, without having any impediment, directly or indirectly.

III. That all perſons above-mentioned, that are willing to leave Ireland and go into France, ſhall have leave to declare it at the times and places hereafter mentioned, viz. the troops in Limeric, on Tueſday next in Limeric; the horſe, at their camp on Wedneſday; and the other forces that are diſperſed in the counties of Clare, Kerry, and Cork, on the 8th inſtant, and on none other, before Monſieur Tameron, the French intendant, and colonel Withers; and after ſuch declaration is made, the troops that will go into France muſt remain under the command and diſcipline of their officers that are to conduct them thither: and deſerters of each ſide ſhall be given up, and puniſhed accordingly.

IV. That all Engliſh and Scotch officers that ſerve now in Ireland, ſhall be included in this capitulation, as well for the ſecurity of their eſtates and goods in England, Scotland, and Ireland (if they are willing to remain here), as for paſſing freely into France, or any other country to ſerve.

V. That all the general French officers, the intendant, the engineers, the commiſſaries at war, and of the artillery, the treaſurer, and other French officers, ſtrangers, and all others whatſoever, that are in Sligo, Roſs, Clare, or in the army, or that do trade or commerce, or are otherways employed in any kind of ſtation or condition, ſhall have free leave to paſs into France, or any other country, and ſhall have leave to ſhip themſelves, with all their horſes, equipage, plate, papers, and all their effects whatever; and that general Ginkle will order paſſports for them, convoys, and carriages by land and water, to carry them ſafe from Limeric to the ſhips where they ſhall be embarked, without paying any thing for the ſaid carriages, or to thoſe that are employed therein, with their horſes, cars, boats, and ſhallops.

VI. That if any of the aforeſaid equipages, merchandize, horſes, money, plate, or other moveables, or houſehold ſtuff belonging to the ſaid Iriſh troops, or to the French officers, or other particular perſons whatſoever, be robbed, deſtroyed, or taken away by the troops of the ſaid general, the ſaid general will order it to be reſtored, or payment to be made according to the value that is given in upon oath by the perſon ſo robbed or plundered: and the ſaid Iriſh troops to be tranſported as aforeſaid; and all other perſons belonging to them, are to obſerve good order in their march and quarters, and ſhall reſtore whatever they ſhall take from the country, or make reſtitution for the ſame.

VII. That to facilitate the tranſporting the ſaid troops, the general will furniſh fifty ſhips, each ſhip's burthen two hundred tons; for which, the perſons to be tranſported ſhall not be obliged to pay, and twenty more, if there ſhall be occaſion, without their paying for them; and if any of the ſaid ſhips ſhall be of leſſer burthen, he will furniſh more in number to countervail; and alſo give two men of war to embark the principal officers, and ſerve for a convoy to the veſſels of burthen.

VIII. That a commiſſary ſhall be immediately ſent to Cork to viſit the tranſport ſhips, and what condition they are in for ſailing; and that, as ſoon as they are ready, the troops to be tranſported ſhall march with all convenient ſpeed, the neareſt way, in order to embark there: and if there ſhall be any more men to be tranſported than can be carried off in the ſaid fifty ſhips, the reſt ſhall quit the Engliſh town of Limeric, and march to ſuch quarters as ſhall be appointed for them, convenient for their tranſportation, where they ſhall remain till the other twenty ſhips be ready, which are to be in a month; and may embark on any French ſhip that may come in the mean time.

IX. That the ſaid ſhips ſhall be furniſhed with forage for horſe, and all neceſſary proviſions to ſubſiſt the officers, troops, dragoons, and ſoldiers, and all other perſons that are ſhipped to be tranſported into France; which proviſions ſhall be paid for as ſoon as all are diſembarked at Breſt or Nants, upon the coaſt of Brittany, or any other port of France they can make.

X. And to ſecure the return of the ſaid ſhips (the danger of the ſeas excepted) and payment for the ſaid proviſions, ſufficient hoſtages ſhall be given.

XI. That the garriſons of Clare caſtle, Roſs, and all other foot that are in the garriſons in the counties of Clare, Cork, and Kerry, ſhall have the advantage of the preſent capitulation; and ſuch part of thoſe garriſons as deſign to go beyond ſeas, ſhall march out with their arms, baggage, drums beating, ball in mouth, match lighted at both ends, and colours flying, with all the proviſions, and half the ammunition that is in the ſaid garriſons; and join the horſe that march to be tranſported; or if then there is not ſhipping enough for the body of foot that is to be next tranſported after the horſe, general Ginkle will order that they be furniſhed with carriages for that purpoſe, and what proviſions they ſhall want in their march, they paying for the ſaid proviſions, or elſe that they may take it out of their own magazines.

XII. That all the troops of horſe and dragoons that are in the counties of Cork, Kerry, and Clare, ſhall alſo have the benefit of this capitulation; and that ſuch as will paſs into France, ſhall have quarters given them in the counties of Clare and Kerry, apart from the troops that are commanded by general Ginkle, until they can be ſhipped; and within their quarters they ſhall pay for every thing, except forage and paſture for their horſes, which ſhall be furniſhed gratis.

XIII. Thoſe of the garriſon of Sligo that are joined to the Iriſh army, ſhall have the benefit of this capitulation; and orders ſhall be ſent to them that are to convey them up, to bring them hither to Limeric the ſhorteſt way.

XIV. The Iriſh may have liberty to tranſport nine hundred horſe, including horſes for the officers, which ſhall be tranſported gratis: and as for the troopers that ſtay behind, they ſhall diſpoſe of themſelves as they ſhall think fit, giving up their horſes and arms to ſuch perſons as the general ſhall appoint.

XV. It ſhall be permitted to thoſe that are appointed to take care for the ſubſiſtence of the horſe, that are willing to go into France, to buy hay and corn at the king's rates wherever they can find it, in the quarters that are aſſigned for them, without any let or moleſtation, and to carry all neceſſary proviſions out of the city of Limeric; and for this purpoſe the general will furniſh convenient carriages for them to the places where they ſhall be embarked.

XVI. It ſhall be lawful to make uſe of the hay preſerved in the ſtores of the county of Kerry, for the horſes that ſhall be embarked; and if there be not enough, it ſhall be lawful to buy hay and oats wherever it ſhall be found, at the king's rates.

XVII. That all priſoners of war that were in Ireland the 28th of September, ſhall be ſet at liberty on both ſides; and the general promiſes to uſe his endeavours, that thoſe that are in England and Flanders ſhall be ſet at liberty alſo.

XVIII. The general will cauſe proviſions and medicines to be furniſhed to the ſick and wounded officers, troopers, dragoons, and ſoldiers, of the Iriſh army that cannot paſs into France at the firſt embarkment; and after they are cured, will order them ſhips to paſs into France, if they are willing to go.

XIX. That, at the ſigning hereof, the general will ſend a ſhip expreſs to France; and that beſides, he will furniſh two ſmall ſhips of thoſe that are now in the river of Limeric, to tranſport two perſons into France that are to be ſent to give notice of this treaty; and that the commanders of the ſaid ſhips ſhall have orders to put aſhore at the next port of France where they ſhall make.

XX. That all thoſe of the ſaid troops, officers, and others, of what character ſoever, that would paſs into France, ſhall not be ſtopped upon the account of debt, on any other pretext.

XXI. If after ſigning this preſent treaty, and before the arrival of the fleet, a French packet-boat, or other tranſport-ſhip, ſhall arrive from France in any other part of Ireland, the general will order a paſſport, not only for ſuch as muſt go on board the ſaid ſhips, but to the ſhips to come to the neareſt port, to the place where the troops to be tranſported ſhall be quartered.

XXII. That after the arrival of the ſaid fleet, there ſhall be free communication and paſſage between it and the quarters of the aboveſaid troops; and eſpecially, for all thoſe that have paſſes from the chief commanders of the ſaid fleet, or from monſieur Tameron, the intendant.

XXIII. In conſideration of the preſent capitulation, the towns of Limeric ſhall be delivered and put into the hands of the general, or any other perſon he ſhall appoint, at the time and days hereafter ſpecified, viz. the Iriſh town, except the magazines and hoſpital, on the day of the ſigning of theſe preſent articles; and as for the Engliſh town, it ſhall remain, together with the iſland, and the free paſſage of Thomond-bridge, in the hands of thoſe of the Iriſh army that are now in the garriſon, or that ſhall hereafter come from the counties of Cork, Clare, Kerry, Sligo, and other places above mentioned, until there ſhall be convenience found for their tranſportation.

XXIV. And to prevent all diſorders that may happen between the garriſon that the general ſhall place in the Iriſh-town, which ſhall be delivered to him, and the Iriſh troopers that ſhall remain in the Engliſh-town and the iſland, which they may do until the troops to be embarked on the firſt fifty ſhips be gone for France, and no longer; they ſhall intrench themſelves on both ſides, to hinder the communication of the ſaid garriſons: and it ſhall be prohibited on both ſides, to offer any thing that is offenſive; and the parties offending ſhall be puniſhed on either ſide.

XXV. That it ſhall be lawful for the ſaid garriſon to march out at once, or at different times, as they can be embarked, with arms, baggage, drums beating, match lighted at both ends, bullet in mouth, colours flying, ſix braſs guns, ſuch as the beſieged will chuſe, two mortar-pieces, and half the ammunition that is now in the magazines of the ſaid place: and for this purpoſe, an inventory of all the ammunition in the garriſon ſhall be made in the preſence of any perſon that the general ſhall appoint, the next day after theſe preſent articles ſhall be ſigned.

XXVI. All the magazines of proviſions ſhall remain in the hands of thoſe that are now employed to take care of the ſame, for the ſubſiſtence of thoſe of the Iriſh army that will paſs into France: and if there ſhall not be ſufficient in the ſtores, for the ſupport of the ſaid troops, whilſt they ſtay in this kingdom, and are croſſing the ſeas, that, upon giving up an account of their numbers, the general will furniſh them with ſufficient proviſions at the king's rates; and that there ſhall be a free market at Limeric, and other quarters, where the ſaid troops ſhall be; and in caſe any proviſion ſhall remain in the magazines of Limeric when the town ſhall be given up, it ſhall be valued, and the price deducted out of what is to be paid for the proviſions to be furniſhed to the troops on ſhip-board.

XXVII. That there ſhall be a ceſſation of arms at land, as alſo at ſea, with reſpect to the ſhips, whether Engliſh, Dutch, or French, deſigned for the tranſportation of the ſaid troops, until they ſhall be returned to their reſpective harbours; and that on both ſides, they ſhall be furniſhed with ſufficient paſſports both for ſhips and men: and if any ſea commander, or captain of a ſhip, or any officer, trooper, dragoon, ſoldier, or any other perſon, ſhall act contrary to this ceſſation, the perſons ſo acting, ſhall be puniſhed on either ſide, and ſatisfaction ſhall be made for the wrong that is done; and officers ſhall be ſent to the mouth of the river of Limeric, to give notice to the commanders of the Engliſh and French fleets of the preſent conjuncture, that they may obſerve the ceſſation of arms accordingly.

XXVIII. That for the ſecurity of the execution of this preſent capitulation, and of each article therein contained, the beſieged ſhall give the following hoſtages —— And the general give ——.

XXIX. If before this capitulation is fully executed, there happens any change in the government, or command of the army, which is now commanded by general Ginkle; all of thoſe that ſhall be appointed to command the ſame, ſhall be obliged to obſerve and execute what is ſpecified in theſe articles, or cauſe it to be executed punctually, and ſhall not act contrary on any account.

CHAP. I.

An attempt to re-inſtate the exiled Prince—The hopes of the Catholics expire—Death of William—Events during Anne's Reign—Her Death—Rebellion in the North on George the Firſt's Succeſſion—Events during his Reign, and the Reign of his Son—A Tumult in Dublin—The Houſe of Lords broke open.

WILLIAM III. had no ſooner finiſhed his Iriſh wars, than he was alarmed with plot after plot among his Engliſh ſubjects. James iſſued declarations, and many waited for his arrival; but the defeat of the French fleet off La Hogue, which was to clear the way for the tranſports that contained the troops deſtined to aſſiſt the exiled prince, put an end to his hopes; and he retired to the monaſtery of La Trappe.

With this invaſion alſo expired all the hopes of the Catholics; and king James died at St. Germain's in the year 1700, after a ſhort and troubleſome reign, which was made ſo by his own miſconduct.

The Iriſh continued peaceably to ſubmit to his rival, who did not long ſurvive him; for having fractured his collar bone on the 21ſt day of February, he died of a fever, and Diarrhea, from the conſequent weakneſs, on the 6th of March following. He was a prince of great coldneſs, except only in war; and ſome thought he rather ſacrificed delicacy and decorum in driving his father-in-law from a throne, which in the firſt inſtance, he could not be ſaid to have been called to poſſeſs.—During his reign party animoſities ran high among his ſubjects, and at his death, though they were benefited by ſomewhat like a ſettled conſtitution, he left them involved in continental wars, and a cloud of doubts and perplexities.

Anne, princeſs of Denmark, ſucceeded in whoſe time the Britiſh arms arrived at the higheſt pitch of glory. In the year 1703, great diſcontents aroſe originating from the conduct of the truſtees for forfeited eſtates in Ireland. During theſe diſputes it having been ſuggeſted that the Iriſh wiſhed to conſider themſelves as independent, the parliament, in their addreſſes to the duke of Ormond, the lord lieutenant declared, "They held the kingdom of "Ireland to be dependent on the Imperial crown of "England," and then they proceeded with their buſineſs; afterwards, they enacted ſome ſevere laws againſt the Catholics; at laſt parties grew violent; but they were ſtopped in the midſt of their career by a ſudden diſſolution, which doubtleſs, was a wiſe healing meaſure.

In the mean time the trial of Dr. Sacheverel, for aſſerting the royal prerogative;—an attempt upon the life of Harley, (afterwards earl of Oxford) and a catalogue of Whig and Tory jealouſies, marked the temper of the people of England: and, on the firſt of Auguſt, 1714, died queen Anne, a princeſs poſſeſſed of many virtues, after having effected an union with Scotland, as we have obſerved in that Hiſtory, and humbled France by the prowes of her general, the duke of Marlborough. It was about this time that Doctor Jonathan Swift, roſe into great conſideration in Ireland, and at length became the chief patron of the Iriſh nation.

In purſuance of the act of ſucceſſion George the Firſt, elector of Hanover, having been previouſly proclaimed, came over to England, and took poſſeſſion of the throne. His ſeverities to thoſe who were deemed tories, and to many of the favourites of the late queen, occaſioned ſuch a ferment as cauſed a rebellion to be raiſed in the north, which proved dangerous to his crown. It was at laſt ſuppreſſed, and coſt the lives of ſome noble perſons, concerned whilſt others eſcaping wandered in perpetual exile.

In 1719, the queſtion of Iriſh independence was ſtrongly taken up; for Morrice Anneſley, appealed from a decree of the houſe of peers in Ireland; this the Engliſh lords reverſed, ordering that he ſhould be put in poſſeſſion of certain lands loſt by that decree. The barons of the Iriſh Exchequer obeyed the order; but the peers voted, "That they had acted derogatory to the king's prerogative in his high court of parliament in Ireland, and to the parliamentary rights and privileges of that kingdom." They committed the perſons in queſtion to the cuſtody of the black-rod, and then tranſmiited their complaints to England. The conſequence of all this was, a reſolution of the Britiſh peers, "That the barons of the exchequer in Ireland had acted with courage, according to law, in juſt ſupport of his majeſty's prerogative, and with fidelity to the crown of Great Britain; addreſſing the ſovereign to reward them with ſome marks of his favour. And, at length, a bill was brought in, by which the Iriſh houſe was deprived of all right to paſs ſentence, affirm, or reverſe any judgement or decree given in this kingdom. Thus was Ireland pronounced totally dependent, and that about a time when her parliament had paſſed many votes againſt perſons whom they deemed diſaffected to the ſtate: but the reign of George the Firſt was a reign of ſeverity.

This prince after having ſwayed the imperial ſceptre of Britain near thirty years, expired on the 11th of June 1727, as he was on a journey to viſit his Electoral dominions, in the 68th year of his age. He was eſteemed a good general; and ſome have marked him for a wiſe prince; he would certainly have had greater claim to the latter diſtinction if he had been more lenient, and had not affected to be the king of a party in a free country.

To him ſucceeded his ſon, proclaimed by the ſtyle and title of George the Second. In the beginning of his reign Ireland was peculiarly happy under the adminiſtration of lord Carteret, as we have ſince ſeen it under that of the duke of Northumberland. Indeed the Iriſh have often been branded as mal-contents, but ſince the acceſſion of the Brunſwick family to the crown, they had not generally proved themſelves ſo, without reaſon, ſo that at the time we ſpeak of, they all (the Catholics not excepted) were deſerving of indulgence.—Of their conduct at the preſent period, we ſhall ſpeak hereafter.

The reign of George II. was remarkable for the ſecond rebellion in Scotland, in the courſe of which Charles Edward Stuart twice defeated the royal armies, and at the head of a few highlanders, ill-armed and worſe diſciplined, made ſuch a progreſs as ſtruck a panic into the whole Engliſh nation. He was at laſt totally defeated; the duke of Cumberland, at the head of above 12,000 veteran troops, the rebels not amounting to two thirds of the number. The victor ſuffered his ſoldiers to diſgrace his conqueſt by their cruelty. The rebellion was ſuppreſſed, and many miſtaken perſons ſuffered on the occaſion, amidſt the inſults of the common people, who before had trembled at the tidings of their approach. The Iriſh as a nation had no ſhare in this inſurrection.

The peace of Aix-la-Chapelle put an end to the war with France, which produced this inteſtine commotion in Great Britain: but in another that ſucceeded, Ireland was threatened with an invaſion. At this time, many of the Proteſtants of the country grew jealous of Catholic neighbours; yet at laſt, it appeared, the latter were ſo far from entertaining any thoughts of joining the enemy, if the threatened invaſion had taken place, that the ſuſpected ſect were determined to prove ſtaunch to government. Some of the wealthier ſort had even offered to lend money for the ſervice of the public.

Yet the whole Iriſh nation appeared diſſatisfied with the conduct of the duke of Bedford. The populace riſing in Dublin, committed many outrages. They broke into the houſe of lords, and ſearched for the journals, which if they had found, they meant to commit to the flames. Fearing that an union between Great Britain and Ireland was deſigned, they ſwore numbers of the members of both houſes never to conſent to ſuch a meaſure. Many exceſſes were committed in this riot, and a gibbet erected to execute one gentleman, who narrowly eſcaped the fury of the enraged multitude. Nor did the lord lieutenant himſelf make ſuch a public departure from the kingdom as might have been expected.

George the Second died at his palace at Kenſington, on the 25th of October 1760. He was a prince of a good diſpoſition, but paſſionate, and fond of military parade, and by ſome thought to be too much attached to Hanover and Continental connections. However, by the aſſiſtance of good miniſters he carried on his laſt war with ſucceſs and glory, and expired generally lamented.

CHAP. II.

A ſatisfactory Change in Ireland—Corps of Volunteers formed—Sundry Events—Addreſs of the Delegates of Leinſter as tranſmitted to his Majeſty—Ireland gains an excluſive Right of Legiſlature and Judicature—Inſtitution of the Knights of St. Patrick—Affairs in an uncertain State—The Coalition oppoſed—Curſory Remarks—Wiſhes of the Iriſh—Their loyal Addreſs to his Majeſty.

GEORGE III. acceded to the throne in the midſt of victories and the acclamations of his ſubjects: yet the former coſt him dear, and the latter continued not ſo long as might have been expected. A peace as well as a change of miniſtry took place.

Frequent changes ſucceeded in England, with little advantage; but in Ireland there was one that proved very ſatisfactory during the viceroyſhip of the late duke of Northumberland, whoſe munificence, ſplendour, and above all the propriety of his adminiſtration will long be kept in remembrance. During this period, and till the open rupture with America, nothing more than the political differences of opinion, uſual among a free people, marked the counſels of Ireland, no ſhadow of diſcontent appeared among the people; nor any commotions but thoſe raiſed by the White Boys, and other banditti, the peſts of ſociety.

But the Americans having been declared rebels, and troops drawn from Ireland, in conſequence of the war, the natives of that kingdom formed themſelves into corps of volunteers, without regard to the idea of religion. Catholics and Proteſtants ſeemed to ſhake hands, and all this was avowed as done for ſelf defence in caſe of an invaſion. But during the progreſs of the unſucceſsful conteſt with the Coloniſts, many ſubjects were ſuggeſted in the Iriſh parliament, where Meſſrs. Flood and Grattan became great ſpeakers, wherein firſt the reſtriction of trade, and afterwards many other complaints were preferred. With regard to the former, it was almoſt totally done away, in effect, during lord North's firſt adminiſtration: but that miniſter, or any other might have perceived, that the ſiſter kingdom wiſhed for much more than this, nay was determined to uſe all her efforts towards gaining much more. Some of the Iriſh both within and without the walls of the houſe, giving hints that they depended on the volunteers, and as they had them only to thank for what England had already granted, ſo on them only they reſted their hopes of what they termed the future ſalvation of their country.

Such a mode of reaſoning, whilſt it could not be very agreeable to the Engliſh government, raiſed the volunteers (ſupported as they hoped to be by the people) high in their own eſtimation, and occaſioned them to go ſome lengths, which ſober men approved not, and in which they were not ſo far countenanced as they expected by parliament.

In the mean time the American war, which once had worn the face of ſucceſs on the part of Britain, through neglect of ſome, and groſs, perhaps wilful miſmanagement of others, began to change its appearance. The capture of Burgoyne's army, though an alarming circumſtance, had not yet left the royal cauſe ſo deſtitute, but that it might have been ſupported. But blunder after blunder abroad, while thoſe who called themſelves patriots at home encouraged the inſurgents, brought on the cataſtrophe of lord Cornwallis's ſurrender, that fatal blow which put an end to the exiſtence of the Britiſh empire in America; notwithſtanding a ſignal victory ſoon after gained by Admiral Rodney over the French fleet in the Weſt Indies.

While theſe things were paſſing, the Papiſts of Ireland had obtained privileges and immunities, with which the Proteſtants for the firſt time were pleaſed to ſee them indulged; becauſe, as they had declared, "The Iriſh Proteſtants could never be free, "while their Catholic brethren (as they now choſe to "call them), were held in ſhackles." Still they ſeemed to depended on the Iriſh volunteers, of whom many diſagreeable things being ſaid in Britain, they referred to an addreſs which they had formerly delivered to the earl of Charlemont, (in the year 1782) to be tranſmitted to his majeſty. The reader will beſt judge of the drift of this paper, and of its propriety, by peruſing the contents with attention.

Addreſs of the Delegates of Leinſter, delivered by the Earl of Charlemont to the Lord Lieutenant, to be preſented to his Majeſty.

WE, your majeſty's faithful ſubjects, the volunteers of the province of Leinſter, humbly beg leave to approach your majeſty with ſentiments of the moſt unfeigned loyalty, affection, and reſpect.

Strangers to adulation, we addreſs our gracious ſovereign in the open language of freemen, who have aſſerted their rights; and, uninfluenced, ſpeak the genuine ſatisfaction of their hearts at the attainment of their object.

Your majeſty's people of Ireland, feeling the ſame love of liberty which has ſo often diſplayed itſelf in the conduct of their fellow-ſubjects of England, have ſought only to be reſtored to that conſtitution, to which by right and compact they were entitled. The benign attention of your majeſty to the welfare of all your ſubjects, and the wiſdom of Great Britain, have acceded to our juſt requiſitions, and will have, by repealing the ſtatute of the 6th of George I. (when that meaſure ſhall be compleated) annihilated every claim of Britiſh legiſlation and juriſdiction over this country for ever, and as ſuch we hold it ſatisfactory. Viewing, therefore, the repeal as a total renunciation of a principle hoſtile to the rights of Ireland; relying with the moſt unbounded confidence on the national character, the ſincerity of Great Britain, and convinced that it is impoſſible our magnanimous ſiſter kingdom can ever entertain a thought of violating the faith of nations, by the revival of a claim ſo ſolemnly relinquiſhed, we are happy to declare, that all our jealouſies are at an end; and we chearfully unite our voice with that of our legiſlature, in aſſuring your majeſty, that when the objects contained in the late addreſſes of our parliament ſhall be finally accompliſhed, no conſtitutional queſtion between the two nations will any longer exiſt that can interrupt their harmony.

The natural current of our affections, long painfully reſtrained, now runs with redoubled force, to a nation whoſe intereſts, next to our own liberties, are the firſt wiſh of our hearts: Great Britain ſhall find that our power, ſo far from being diminiſhed, has derived new ſtrength from her juſtice; and the conduct of your Iriſh ſubjects will, we truſt, evince to your majeſty, that the firmeſt baſis of your throne is in the affections of a free people.

Animated with theſe ſentiments, we ſhall endeavour to ſupply by our exertions the abſence of thoſe troops which our parliament have offered to your majeſty to be employed againſt the common enemies of the empire; with the great charter of our liberties reared upon our ſtandard, the cauſe of Britain becomes the cauſe of Ireland, and we ſhall face the foes of both, determined with her to conquer, or with her to fall.

We cannot conclude this our humble addreſs, without offering to your majeſty the grateful tribute of our acknowledgments, for the late change which your majeſty has been pleaſed to adopt in your councils and miniſters; and for thoſe meaſures tending to public œconomy, and diminution of undue influence, which we have been taught to hope are to be extended to this kingdom; and we truſt the day is approaching, when corruption will be no more—when an adminiſtration compoſed of conſtitutional men, ſtanding on the ſolid ground of liberty, actuated by no object but public proſperity, will ſee a grateful and independent nation croud to its ſupport, and raiſe it ſuperior to any arts which would ſhake, or any props which would diſgrace it."

But the independance of the Iriſh legiſlature was the grand point, which it appeared that the parliament kept in view, whatſoever wild meaſures either the volunteers, or the people might be willing to adopt. Several votes for this purpoſe, and the ſtyle of their addreſſes confirmed their intention. They declared "That the Crown of Ireland was an IMPERIAL CROWN," they reprobated the idea of bills framed, or altered in England; and much oratory was diſplayed in both houſes on this occaſion.

Above all, the Iriſh could not endure the thought of reverſing any decree of their houſe of lords according to the act of the 6th of George I. already mentioned; and at this time Great Britain was not inclinable to diſpute claims. Accordingly a bill was brought into the houſe, for ſecuring to Ireland the excluſive right of legiſlature and judicature, a ſacrifice, which at one time could never have been expected to be made by Great Britain!

The reſignation of lord North, and altered councils, produced a peace with France and Spain, and alſo an acknowledgment of the independance of the Americans, which they had declared ſo long before, was now fully accorded to them by the king of Great Britain, preliminaries being ſettled in the year 1783.

In the month of March in the ſame year, was inſtituted in Ireland the new order of the knights of St. Patrick. His excellency the lord lieutenant, being preſented with the blue ribband and badge, as grand maſter. His grace the archbiſhop of Dublin, took the oath as chancellor of the order, and received from his excellency the purſe containing the ſeals; and the archbiſhop of Ardmagh, primate and metropolitan of all Ireland, was appointed prelate of the ſaid order, of which his majeſty's ſon prince Edward was received as a knight companion, the lord Muſkerry having been firſt knighted to act as proxy for his royal highneſs.

The death of the marquis of Rockingham having put an end to an adminiſtration from which great hopes had been formed, ſerved alſo to break a powerful party. A great earl high in office, was accuſed of duplicity, and a ſort of confuſion, for ſome time, reigned in the council; yet the nobleman in queſtion retained his influence, while he was reprobated by ſome of his former colleagues.

The hon. Mr. Charles James Fox, having filled the office of Secretary of State, various political manœuvres ſucceeded in the cabinet, but little was effected, that ſeemed to promiſe any benefit to the nation, whilſt a great part of the people diſſatisfied with the terms of peace concluded with America, now independant, and the other belligerent powers, ſuch a cenſure was paſſed as could not but be felt by thoſe who were concerned in the meaſure.

A kind of interregnum of adminiſtration having taken place, with which moſt people were diſſatisfied, there were thoſe who during this uncertain ſtate of affairs, reſolved to bring about a coalition between lord North and Mr. Fox's parties, which they aſſerted would be the only means on account of their reſpective intereſt and influence, to do a real ſervice to their country.

The heads of the parties in queſtion, however oppoſite they had appeared before, were now ready to ſubſcribe to this propoſition; and it was voted, "That an humble addreſs be preſented to his majeſty, requeſting he would be graciouſly pleaſed to take into conſideration the preſent calamitous ſituation of this country, occaſioned by a long and ruinous war; and that he would appoint ſuch an adminiſtration as ſhould deſerve the confidence of the people, and relieve them from the misfortunes under which they groaned."

To this addreſs his majeſty returned a favourable anſwer; yet the parliament ſeemed impatient till ſomething deciſive ſhould be done in a matter of ſo much importance. The final iſſue of this buſineſs for the preſent was the admiſſion of the former rivals lord North, and Mr. Fox, to a participation of miniſterial power, in which they were ſupported by the majority of the houſe of commons.

The latter of theſe had, at one time, appeared inclinable to attend to the affairs of Ireland; though, where there were ſtrong arguments uſed, he often avoided giving a decided opinion. But now a matter of greater importance occupied his mind and called forth the talents of his colleagues. This was no leſs than an alteration of the mode of government in India, which they concluded would take place, not conſidering the weight of that body which was to act againſt them as a counterpoiſe.

Lord Temple having been appointed lord lieutenant of Ireland, executed his high truſt with loyalty and integrity, and now returning to England, was ſucceeded by lord Northington; yet the affairs of that kingdom continued in a ſort of fluctuating ſtate as to politics, and the parties there ſeemed anxiouſly to wait the event of certain affairs in England, which were then drawing towards a criſis.

The coalition truſting to their ſtrength and united influence, had ſcarcely a doubt but that they ſhould carry all ſuch meaſures as they might think proper to adopt. Indeed their intereſt was powerful; but there were thoſe who reſolved to endeavour to ſhake it, and it was not long before an opportunity offered.

Mr. Fox having previouſly broke with lord Shelburne, at the death of the marquis of Rockingham, it appears pretty clear, that that nobleman was determined to thwart him and his party, and conſequently to oppoſe the coalition. We cannot ſuppoſe that either the hon. gentleman, or his noble colleague could be ignorant of this diſpoſition; but they ſtood on the baſis of ſecurity, as we have hinted, and proceeded accordingly.

Mr. Fox had always declared againſt "half-meaſures." He was an advocate for bold and open conduct, and for the time he held the reins went on in a rapid manner.

But, in the mean while, a ſort of diſlike, bordering on contempt of the coalition, was foſtered among the body of the people, at the ſame time that a party was formed in the cabinet under what ſome called ſecret influence, which had yet a more powerful operation.

Mr. Fox having brought in his bill, which tended to make new regulations in the mode of government in India, and in ſome meaſure to alter the charter, notwithſtanding this met with a ſpirited oppoſition, yet it paſſed the houſe of commons, and went to the lords, as it was thought with a proſpect of ſucceſs; but there it was thrown out; which ſome attributed to a ſecret influence, that overthrew the coalition miniſtry.

However that was, the taking the power ſo much out of the hands of the crown, and veſting certain perſons with ſo extenſive a patronage, were clauſes in it that many condemned; while the India company (of whom their debt to the revenue had been ſomewhat peremptorily demanded) cried out ſo loud as to make all the nation hear them.

The rejection of this bill was taken much to heart by the parties, the diſmiſſion of lord North, Mr. Fox, and their friends, from the miniſtry, was rather ſudden and abrupt; but ſuch reaſons were urged for it, that the king received the thanks of the people; and Mr. Pitt came into adminiſtration with great eclat, and was particularly complimented by the citizens of London.

A ſtrong party, however, was formed againſt him; the majority of the houſe of commons then being, deſired his removal; but as they had no ſpecific charges to exhibit againſt him, his majeſty reſolved to retain the ſervant of his choice, and the reſult in the ſucceeding year was the diſſolution of a parliament which had from the firſt of his entering into office, given him ſo much trouble by their oppoſition.

A new India bill was indeed afterwards framed; but there were almoſt as many objections raiſed againſt this as againſt the former; however the miniſter proceeded after he met the new parliament to carry almoſt every meaſure, which it was his ſincere deſire ſhould take place. This made it ſeem rather extraordinary, that a reform which he appeared to countenance, and for which he actually voted, was thrown out:—It afforded much matter for ſpeculation.

The buſineſs of the Iriſh, who were not yet ſatiſfied with what they had obtained, but thought they had ſtill farther claims on the juſtice of their ſiſter kingdom, was not much attended to by adminiſtration, but they promiſed to bring it forward in a regular manner at ſome future period. At the preſent he was chiefly taken up in projecting the new taxes, ſome of which, on being propoſed, afterwards, though the motion for them was carried, proved to be ſuch as tended to diminiſh his popularity.

While theſe things were paſſing the Iriſh parliament had done every thing to raiſe the ſpirit, and to encourage the trade and manufactures of the country. Linen had always been conſidered as the ſtaple commodity of Ireland; but now they turned their attention towards their ſheep-walks. It appeared, that they wiſhed to rival England in the woollen trade; it was ſuggeſted that they wiſhed to rival her in every thing. And the Iriſh volunteers propoſing to interfere in regard to a wiſhed for reform in parliament, and other matters which it could hardly be deemed their province to meddle with, the committee of forty-five corps aſſembled at Liſburn, diſpatched a letter to the duke of Richmond, in England, containing ſeveral queries, which his grace anſwered in a manner that ſhewed notwithſtanding the reſpect he profeſſed for the volunteers, and his good will to the Iriſh nation, that he did not deem ſuch an interference neceſſary.

Both houſes of parliament, aſſembled at Dublin, now tranſmitted, through the lord lieutenant, loyal addreſſes to his majeſty.

CHAP. III.

Various Reſolutions, &c.—Sundry Events to the preſent Time.

EARLY in 1784, the duke of Rutland was appointed lord lieutenant of Ireland, in the room of lord Northington; and repairing to that kingdom took the oaths, aſſumed his new dignity, and was inveſted with the collar of the new order of St. Patrick.

If the Iriſh patriots were all this while intent upon making claims and eſtabliſhing what they deemed the baſis of their liberty, the Engliſh government were not without able ſervants and ſtrong partiſans there: whilſt Mr. Grattan harangued on one ſide, Mr. Orde kept a watchful eye on the other; while adminiſtration did not appear at all backward in promiſing that every reaſonable requiſition which might come from Ireland, through a proper channel, and in a conſtitutional mode, ſhould be complied with.

Nevertheleſs intemperate proceedings were yet continued by ſome, and a printer being arreſted for a libel, an aggregate meeting, as it was called, was held at Dublin, and a petition framed (creating ſome grievances, and aggravating others) in order to be preſented to his majeſty; but it was not wonderful that the conſtitution ſhould not know of any ſuch aggregate body; and the petition ſucceeded accordingly.

Previous to this, the delegates of the volunteers at Dungannon had come to the following reſolutions, which we ſhall give here at length, as they appear to be the grounds on which the aggregate body formed the claims of their petition.

Reſolutions of the Delegates of the Volunteers of Ireland.

Reſolved unanimouſly,

I. That freedom is the indefeaſible birthright of Iriſhmen and Britons, derived from the author of their being; and of which, no power on earth, much leſs a delegated power, hath a right to deprive them.

II. Reſolved unanimouſly, That they only are free, who are governed by no laws but thoſe to which they aſſent, either by themſelves in perſon, or their repreſentatives freely choſen, ſubject to the controul and frequently returning into the common maſs of conſtituents.

III. Reſolved unanimouſly, That the majority of our houſe of commons is not choſen by the people, but returned by the mandate of peers, or commoners, either for indigent boroughs, where ſcarcely any inhabitants exiſt; or conſiderable cities or towns where the elective franchiſe is veſted in a few; who are thus ſuffered to place the higheſt truſts of ſociety, againſt the intereſt and will of the many, in the hands of men, who ſeldom act as if they conſidered themſelves accountable for their conduct to the people.

IV. Reſolved unanimouſly, That by the ancient conſtitution of parliament, elections for repreſentatives were for centuries annual, and in many inſtances more frequent, and the exerciſe of ſuffrage, among freemen, univerſal.

V. Reſolved unanimouſly, That every approach to thoſe fundamental principles, tends to a renovation of, not an innovation in, the conſtitution.

VI. Reſolved unanimouſly, That the elective franchiſe ought, of right, to extend to all thoſe, and thoſe only, who are likely to exerciſe it for the public good.

VII. Reſolved unanimouſly, That the preſent inadequate repreſentation, and the long duration of parliaments, deſtroy that balance, which, by our conſtitution, ſhould ſubſiſt between the three eſtates of the legiſlature; render the commons houſe independant of the people, procure certain majorities in favour of every adminiſtration; and threaten either an abſolute monarchy, or that ſtill more odious government, a tyrannical ariſtocracy.

VIII. Reſolved, therefore, That the preſent imperfect repreſentation and long duration of parliaments, are unconſtitutional, and intolerable grievances.

IX. Reſolved unanimouſly, That as the voice of the commons of Ireland is no leſs neceſſary for every legiſlative purpoſe, than that of either the king or lords; the people have a juſt and inherent right to correct the abuſes of repreſentation, whenever ſuch abuſes have ſo encreaſed, as to rob them of their conſtitutional ſhare in their own government.

X. Reſolved unanimouſly, That it is the intereſt of parliament itſelf to effect a ſubſtantial reform, as the very exiſtence of that aſſembly muſt become precarious when it ſhall loſe the confidence of the people, to whom originally it owed its creation, and from whom alone its powers were derived.

XI. Reſolved unanimouſly, That we ſolemnly pledge ourſelves to each other, and our country, to ſeek a ſpeedy and effectual redreſs of theſe our grievances, and to co-operate with our fellow-ſubjects, in every exertion neceſſary to obtain it.

We call for the aid of every upright ſenator; of every man, whether in Ireland or Great Britain, who bears or wiſhes to acquire the title of a freeman!

XII. Reſolved unanimouſly, That we have attended with admiration to the noble, though hitherto ineffectual efforts of thoſe illuſtrious characters and virtuous citizens, who in England and Scotland, ſtrenuouſly labour to procure redreſs of ſimilar grievances. May the examples of the ſiſter nations, mutually animate the inhabitants of each to perſevere with unremitting ardour, until the glorious labour be finally compleated.

XIII. Reſolved unanimouſly, That a committee of five perſons from each county, be now choſen by ballot, to repreſent this province in a grand national convention, to be held at noon in the Royal Exchange, Dublin, on the 10th day of November next; to which we truſt each of the other provinces will ſend delegates, to digeſt and publiſh a plan of parliamentary reform—to purſue ſuch meaſures as may appear to them moſt likely to render it effectual; to adjourn from time to time, and to convene provincial meetings if found neceſſary.

The following gentlemen are accordingly nominated, viz.

Antrim delegates.
Col. O'Neill
Lieut. col. Sharman
Col. Rowley
Capt. W. Todd Jones
Col. J. T. Jones

Armagh.
Earl of Charlemont

Col. Jn. Montgomery
Capt. Wm. Forſter
Col. Jas. Hamilton

Tyrone.
Col. Stewart
Lt. Col. Montgomery
Col. Jas. Alexander
Capt. Eccles
Lieut. col. Charleton

XIV. Reſolved unanimouſly, That it be an inſtruction to ſaid committee, that the delegates from each county do prepare, and carry with them to the national convention, an account of all the cities, towns, and boroughs in this province; the mode of election in ſuch as at preſent return members; as near as may be the proportionate number of Proteſtant and Roman Catholic inhabitants in each; and a conjecture of their comparative properties.

XV. Reſolved unanimouſly, That we are decided in opinion that the repreſentatives of the people ought not in future to conſent to any bill of ſupply, for a longer term than twelve months, nor more than ſix months, until complete redreſs of the aforeſaid grievances be obtained.

A ſpecific plan of parliamentary reform, being produced and read by the committee of correſpondence:

Reſolved unanimouſly, That ſaid plan be referred to the conſideration of the national convention.

The addreſs of the firſt regiment of the Iriſh brigade, to the chairman of this aſſociation, on the 13th of February 1782, being read:

Reſolved unanimouſly, That this aſſociation entertain the moſt grateful ſenſe of the approbation of that reſpectable body; that we rejoice in the acceſſion of, and we will be happy in co-operating with ſuch liberal and patriotic men, in effecting the compleat liberty and happineſs of the good people of this kingdom.

Reſolved unanimouſly, That the thanks of this meeting be preſented to lieut. col. Sharman and the gentlemen of the Committee of Correſpondence, for their great trouble in collecting information on a parliamentary reform, and for their abilities and zeal in digeſting matter for the meeting of this day.

Reſolved unanimouſly, That we lament that unavoidable buſineſs of conſequence prevented our late chairman, col. William Irwin, from attending this meeting, and that the thanks of this meeting be tranſmitted by our ſecretary to col. William Irwin, for his polite letter of excuſe, for his non-attendance this day.

Reſolved unanimouſly, That the thanks of this meeting be preſented to the lord biſhop of Derry, for his attendance and aſſiſtance in the buſineſs of this day; for his warm attachment to the volunteer cauſe; and for proving himſelf the ſteady friend to the liberties of Ireland upon all occaſions.

Reſolved unanimouſly, That the ſincere thanks of this meeting be returned to the inhabitants of Dungannon, for their very polite conduct, and to the Dungannon battalion for their vigilant conduct when on guard this day.

Col. Rob. Stewart having taken the chair:

Reſolved unanimouſly, That the particular thanks of this meeting be preſented to Col. J. Stewart, for his very great propriety of conduct in the chair.

To the Volunteer Armies of the Provinces of Munſter, Leinſter, and Connaught.

Fellow Subjects,

The tranſcendant events which our united efforts have produced, preſent an eminent inſtance of the protecting hand of Heaven;—whilſt the progreſſive virtue and general union among the people, naturally prompt them to revive the ſpirit of an unrivalled conſtitution, and to vindicate the inherent rights of men.

The moſt important work yet remains;—which neglected, our paſt attainments are tranſitory, unſubſtantial, inſecure!—an extenſion to thouſands of our beloved fellow citizens of a franchiſe, comprehending the very eſſence of liberty:—and drawing the line which preciſely ſeparates the freeman from the ſlave.

Suffer us, therefore, to conjure you by every endearing tie that connects man with man, with unceaſing zeal to purſue one of the moſt glorious objects that ever agitated the human mind: a reſtoration of virtue to a ſenate long unaccuſtomed to ſpeak the voice of the people; a renovation of the ancient balance of our government; and a firm eſtabliſhment of the firſt gifts of nature, on the ruins of an avowed corruption, at once the bane of morals, and of liberty.

From a grand national convention—diſtinguiſhed by integrity, and inſpired with the courageous ſpirit of the conſtitution—every bleſſing muſt reſult.

With one voice then—the voice of united millions, let Ireland aſſert her claim to freedom!

Through her four provincial aſſemblies let her temperate declarations flow to one common centre; and there, matured into an extenſive plan of reform, be produced as the ſolemn act of the Volunteer Army of Ireland; as a demand of rights, robbed of which, the unanimated forms of a free government would be a curſe; and exiſtence itſelf would ceaſe to be a bleſſing.

Friends and Countrymen,

The eyes of an enlightened world are this inſtant upon us! Munſter has in part, already led the way; and millions of our fellow-ſubjects of Britain, in whom the flame of liberty ſtill burns with luſtre, behold with delight our exertions in the common cauſe; and in our ſucceſs, ſee the certain harbinger of their own!

Let the reflection that Greece, the ſeat of liberty and ſcience; that Rome, the miſtreſs of the world; and that innumerable States, once flouriſhing and free, now lie proſtrate by the hand of tyranny, teach Ireland wiſdom. To our deliberate aſſemblies they convey awful warning to be ſpirited, unanimous, and firm; leſt the preſent wretched condition of other countries be ſoon the fate of our own!

May the Supreme Ruler of the univerſe crown his other bleſſings, by being preſent with us; by promoting union and the love of our country among all ranks of men; and by finally directing our exertions to virtue, liberty, and peace!

The ſpirit of theſe reſolutions the reader will probably think to be different from the addreſs before mentioned, which theſe volunteers had prepared to be tranſmitted to his Majeſty.

But now the Iriſh having cried out for protecting duties, and made ſeveral complaints relative to that trade, which they had but lately been permitted to ſhare in ſo extenſive a manner, it was judged neceſſary to form ſome regulations concerning this matter between the two countries, and accordingly the following Ten Propoſitions were introduced by Mr. Orde to the Iriſh parliament, on Monday the 8th of February 1784.

Reſolutions for the final adjuſtment of the Commerce of Great Britain and Ireland.

I. Reſolved, That it is the opinion of this Committee, that it is highly important to the general intereſt of the Britiſh empire, that the trade between Great Britain and Ireland be encouraged and extended as much as poſſible; and for that purpoſe, that the intercourſe and commerce be finally ſettled and regulated, on permanent and equitable principles, for the mutual benefit of both countries.

II. Reſolved, That towards carrying into full effect ſo deſirable a ſettlement, it is fit and proper that all articles, not the growth and manufacture of Great Britain and Ireland, ſhould be imported into each kingdom from the other reciprocally, under the ſame regulations and at the ſame duties (if ſubject to duties) to which they are liable, when imported directly from the place of their growth, product, or manufacture; and that all duties originally paid on the importation into either country reſpectively ſhall be fully drawn back on exportation to the other.

III. Reſolved, That for the ſame purpoſe it is proper that no prohibition ſhould exiſt in either country againſt the importation, uſe, or ſale of any article, the growth, product, or manufacture of the other; and that the duty on the importation of every ſuch article, if ſubject to duty in either country, ſhould be preciſely the ſame in the one country as in the other, except where an addition may be neceſſary in either country, in conſequence of an internal duty on any ſuch article of its own conſumption.

IV. Reſolved, That in all caſes where the duties on articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of either country, are different on the importations into the other, it would be expedient that they ſhould be reduced in the kingdom where they are the higheſt, to the amount payable in the other; and that all ſuch articles ſhould be exportable from the kingdom into which they ſhall be imported, as free from duty as the ſimilar commodities, or home manufacture of the ſame kingdom.

V. Reſolved, That for the ſame purpoſe it is alſo proper, that in all caſes where either kingdom ſhall charge articles of its own conſumption with an internal ternal duty on the manufacture, or a duty on the material, the ſame manufacture, when imported from the other, may be charged with a further duty on importation to the ſame amount as the internal duty on the manufacture, or to an amount adequate to countervail the duty on the material, and ſhall be entitled to ſuch drawbacks or bounties on exportation as may leave the ſame ſubject to no heavier burdens than the home made manufacture; ſuch farther duty to continue ſo long only as the internal conſumption ſhall be charged with the duty or duties to balance which it ſhall be impoſed, or until the manufacture coming from the other kingdom, ſhall be ſubjected there to an equal burden, not drawn back, or compenſated on exportation.

VI. Reſolved, That in order to give permanency to the ſettlement, now intended to be eſtabliſhed, it is neceſſary that no prohibition, or new or additional duties, ſhould be hereafter impoſed in either kingdom, on importation of any article of the growth, product or manufacture of the other, except ſuch additional duties as may be requiſite to balance duties on internal conſumption, purſuant to the foregoing reſolution.

VII. Reſolved, That for the ſame purpoſe it is neceſſary, that no prohibitions, or new or additional duties ſhould be hereafter impoſed in either kingdom, on the exportation of any article of native growth, product, or manufacture, from thence to the other, except ſuch as either kingdom may deem expedient from time to time, upon corn, meal, malt, flour, and biſcuits; and alſo, except where there now exiſts any prohibition which is not reciprocal, or any duty which is not equal in both kingdoms; in every which caſe, the prohibition may be made reciprocal, or the duties raiſed ſo as to make them equal.

VIII. Reſolved, That for the ſame purpoſe, it is neceſſary, that no bounties whatſoever ſhould be paid, or payable in either kingdom, on the exportation of any article to the other, except ſuch as are in the nature of drawbacks, or compenſation for duties paid; and that no bounty ſhould be granted in this kingdom, on the exportation of any article imported from the Britiſh plantations, or any manufacture made of ſuch article, unleſs in caſes where a ſimilar bounty is payable in Britain, on exportation from thence, or where ſuch bounty is merely in the nature of a drawback, or compenſation of or for duties paid over any duties paid thereon in Britain.

IX. Reſolved, That it is expedient, for the general benefit of the Britiſh empire, that the importation of articles from foreign States, ſhould be regulated from time to time in each kingdom, on ſuch terms as may afford an effectual preference to the importation of ſimilar articles of the growth, produce or manufacture of the other.

X. Reſolved, That for the better protection of trade, whatever ſum the groſs hereditary revenue of this kingdom (after deducting all drawbacks, repayments, or bounties granted in the nature of drawbacks) ſhall produce annually, over and above the ſum of   ſhould be appropriated towards the ſupport of the naval force of the empire in ſuch manner as the parliament of this kingdom ſhall direct.

There was much argument, and on Friday the 11th of February Mr. Forſter moved the reſolutions; the firſt ſix paſſed without a diviſion.

Mr. Gardiner moved an amendment to the ſeventh, that no propoſition exiſt in either country, on the ſtaple raw material.

Negatived by 178 to 28.

Mr. Forſter then moved the eighth and ninth, which paſſed without a diviſion.

The tenth he divided in two, and moved, "That this committee are of opinion, that, in order the better to carry this ſyſtem into execution, the national revenue ſhould be made equal with our expence." He ſaid, this was calculated to prevent our continuing that baleful cuſtom of running every year more and more in debt, and though it would certainly be the occaſion of making new taxes, yet he truſted they would be ſo framed as to render them very little burthenſome to the nation; he ſhould not at that late hour treſpaſs further than to acquaint them that he next intended to move, "That it is the opinion of this committee, that whenever, in time of peace the hereditary revenue ſhall, after the allowance for drawbacks, bounties, and premiums, in the nature of drawbacks, exceed the ſum of 624,000l. and at all times during a war, that then the ſum of   be allowed towards the maintenance of the navy of the empire, in ſuch a manner as the parliament of Ireland ſhall think proper.

The queſtion being ſeparately put on the two reſolutions, into which Mr. Forſter had divided the tenth, paſſed without a diviſion.

But the Engliſh miniſter did not eſcape cenſure for theſe propoſitions:—Firſt, as to the mode, becauſe he held them out to the Iriſh parliament, previous to that of Great Britain; and ſecondly, becauſe ſome of the articles were declared, and with juſtice, to be injurious to the Britiſh manufacture; a chamber of whom met, and much altercation paſſed on the occaſion.

The propoſitions, however, remained to be diſcuſſed at a future day; but few unprejudiced men expected any great matters from the reſult of a buſineſs ſo complicated, and which was to be compriſed in ſo narrow a compaſs.

In the mean time Dr. Price had favoured the Iriſh with the following very conciliatory letter:

Dr. Price on the Iriſh Delegates, Convention and Parliamentary Reform.

"All civil authority being derived from the people, and forfeited as ſoon as exerciſed in any other way than as a truſt from them, it is trifling to ſay, they have a right to petition for the correction of abuſes. Without all doubt, they (that is, a fair majority of them) have a right not only to petition, but to claim. And poſſeſſing this right, they muſt alſo have a right to aſſemble, for the purpoſe of exerciſing it, and to appoint delegates and conventions for collecting and concentrating their ſentiments. I have therefore been ſurpriſed to find, that the delegation for this purpoſe in Ireland, ſhould have been called illegal and unconſtitutional. If, indeed, this is true, it proves that the laws of Ireland eſtabliſh ſlavery, and that the conſtitution (in conſequence of an accumulation of abuſes) has deviated ſo far from its original principles, as to render a reformation abſolutely neceſſary, and the efforts of the people for accompliſhing it, their indiſpenſible duty. Such efforts, if conducted with temper and firmneſs, muſt in the end ſucceed; for it is impoſſible that the ariſtocratical deſpots, who have an intereſt in maintaining abuſes, and would keep mankind for ever in ignorance and abjectneſs, by giving the name of innovation to reformation, ſhould be able always to ſtand their ground againſt the general voice and requiſitions of an enlightened people. I hope, therefore, that notwithſtanding repeated diſappointments, the people of Ireland will perſevere. They have juſt now an encouragement of a very particular nature. Several of the friends of that parliamentary reform, for which they are ſtruggling, are now in power. A late event has ſhewn our ſovereign that he would be much greater and happier at the head of a real repreſentation of his people. Our prime miniſter has aſſured us, that he will exert all his abilities to obtain this object. The principal leader of the oppoſition, (Mr. Fox) concurs in this with the miniſter; and lord North himſelf, ſince his coalition with Whigs, may be expected to become a leſs violent enemy.

Theſe are circumſtances which render the preſent moment peculiarly favourable; and it ought to be anxiouſly improved. A liberal and virtuous people, contending earneſtly, and yet decently, and without tumult or riot, for the bleſſings of legitimate government, is one of the nobleſt ſpectacles that can be ſeen on this earth; may Britain and Ireland exhibit ſuch a ſpectacle, and never relax their zeal, till they have recovered their rights.

I am, Sir, with all good wiſhes,
Your moſt obedient and humble ſervant,
Newington-green, RICHARD PRICE."
March 5, 1785.
To Wm. Nicholſon, eſq. Dame-ſtreet,
Dublin.

Theſe were ſteps which needed not to have been taken to influence ſuch a nation as the Iriſh; and the wonder was, that the people did not farther tranſgreſs the bounds of order there; whilſt all the miniſter's abilities could not ſupport his former popularity at home, on account of the new taxes that he had levied on the people.—Nor did a Chamber of Commerce, that met in Ireland, give any other than an unfavourable opinion on the whole of his favourite propoſitions.

The people of that country, who, by this time had leiſure to conſider theſe offers, were perhaps the more jealous of them, as coming from the Britiſh miniſter. They declared likewiſe, that in ſome inſtances, while they ſeemed to hold out favour, if ſuffered to be paſſed into a law, they muſt affect that newly acquired independence of legiſlature, of which they were become ſo tenacious.—And the matter being thrown into the form of a bill, in Ireland, was, in effect, poſtponed by agreement.

But the Engliſh miniſter was not ſo to be repulſed. He brought on the propoſitions—they were altered and increaſed, as ſome wittily obſerved, like Falſtaff's men in buckram, and at laſt, after ſome further amendments, were paſſed by both houſes.—And thus far Mr. Pitt triumphed; but thoſe muſt have been ſhort-ſighted indeed, who could ſuppoſe that ſuch a triumph would be really permanent. Out of ten propoſitions had grown twenty, and in ſome reſpects, the very ground-work of them ſeemed to have been altered. What ſucceſs could rationally be expected on the other ſide of the water from ſuch a ſyſtem of proceeding?

It was but vain to alledge that the articles had been ſeparately deliberated upon here; ſince the main queſtion muſt be, how they would be ultimately received elſewhere; but politicians, like authors, are frequently found to be ſo fond of the child of their own brain, as not to perceive its deformities.

The conſequences were ſuch as are likely to attend premature propoſitions. After all the pains taken by the Britiſh miniſter and parliament, they were rejected in toto by the Iriſh; and perhaps both nations may be ſaid to have had a lucky eſcape; as all things conſidered, they ſeemed rather calculated to lay the foundation of future diſputes than to eſtabliſh any uſeful and laſting regulations. On the whole, affairs of this kind were better left to the legiſlatures of the reſpective kingdoms, ſince they are ſo far independent of each other, to ſettle as circumſtances ariſe, rather than to bind themſelves by articles of agreement which it may be found difficult to abide by hereafter.

In conſequence of this ſuppoſed victory gained by the patriots over the friends of government, illuminations were general throughout the city of Dublin, and bonfires blazed in every ſtreet. A duel was likewiſe fought between the attorney general of Ireland and Mr. Carron. The cauſe of their quarrel originated in the houſe. Each fired a brace of piſtols without effect, when their ſeconds interpoſed, and brought about a reconciliation.

A moſt ſerious diſpute now aroſe between the Earl of Donegal and lord chief baron Yelverton. The lord chief baron purchaſed from a gentleman, named Pottinger, a piece of ground which had been in poſſeſſion of his anceſtors for many years.

This piece of ground was ſituated in the county of Down on the banks of the river Lagan, and communicated with the town of Belfaſt by a narrow bridge.

The town of Belfaſt was the ſole property of the earl of Donegal, who had always refuſed to let what is called in Ireland an improving leaſe to any of his tenants, but ſet his leaſes up to ſale, and let the premiſes to the higheſt bidder, without any regard to the intereſt of the old tenants; which conduct, ſome years ago, gave riſe to a very ſerious inſurrection of ſeveral thouſand inſurgents, under the denomination of Hearts of Steel.

The lord chief baron, ſeeing the advantages which muſt ariſe from building a town oppoſite to Belfaſt, banked in a large piece of the ſea-ſtrand by a ſtrong mound, and marked out the place ſo incloſed into ſtreets, which he let to tenants on leaſes in perpetuity.

An elegant new town was riſing from this foundation, when a number of armed men, under the direction of the Seneſchal of Belfaſt, and the overſeer of the Belfaſt canal, came down from the inland country, and ſo far demoliſhed the works, as to let in the ſea.

The chief baron now remained on the ground to overſee the repairs, with friends prepared to oppoſe and repel any further attempts to injure him, and thus the matter dropped.

The following was his majeſty's moſt gracious anſwer to the addreſs of both houſes of parliament, in anſwer to their late addreſs on the French treaty:

"His majeſty returns thanks to the lords and commons of Ireland, for their addreſs on the treaty of navigation and commerce entered into between his majeſty and the moſt Chriſtian king; he conſiders all his ſubjects with the ſame paternal care; and it is with ſatisfaction he receives aſſurances that the lords and commons of the kingdom of Ireland will take ſuch meaſures as to give effect to the ſaid treaty."

On the 7th of May, 1787, his grace the lord lieutenant went in ſtate to the houſe of peers, and among other acts gave his royal aſſent to an act for continuing an act, intituled,—An act for facilitating the trade and intercourſe between this kingdom and England.—An act for buying and ſelling all ſorts of corn and meal by weight.—An act for badging the poor, and providing for them.

On the 14th he went again and gave the royal aſſent to the revenue act, the Mediterranean paſs act, the manifeſt act, and the fiſheries act; after which, proclamations were poſted up in the moſt public places in the city, that entries might be made of the articles therein mentioned to and from France, agreeable to the late treaty with that kingdom.

An outrage committed on the perſon of the young lord Gormanſton, was thus repreſented by the attorney general in the houſe of commons. "This young nobleman was clandeſtinely carried away in the month of December laſt. He was hurried through England with the greateſt precipitation, attended by a popiſh prieſt, and a military officer in the Auſtrian ſervice. From thence he was conveyed to France, and there for ſome time concealed in a convent. From thence he was conveyed to the principality of Liege where he is now cloſely kept, under the care of an old grandmother and an uncle. This uncle is next heir in remainder to the family eſtate, which is very conſiderable, being eſtimated at five or ſix thouſands a year. It is for the purpoſe of being educated in the principles of the Popiſh religion, that the minor was thus illegally forced over ſeas to a foreign country. Every poſſible meaſure has been taken to recover him that the laws warranted. An order from the court of chancery has been formally iſſued, under the broad ſeal of Ireland, demanding of the uncle forthwith to reſtore their minor lord. This uncle ſtyled himſelf Eccleſiaſtical Counſellor to the Prince of Liege, and, inſtead of ſurrendering the child, iſſued a manifeſto in anſwer to the order of chancery, couched in the moſt inſolent and imperious language he had ever heard or ſeen. The manifeſto ſet out in the following manner:

“ Whereas I Jericho Preſton, eccleſiaſtical counſellor and privy counſellor to his highneſs the prince of Liege, &c. having been ſerved with a ſcrap of parchment, with a bit of wax annexed to it—and being informed that the ſaid ſcrap of parchment was an order of the court of chancery of Ireland, and that the ſaid bit of wax was the broad ſeal of the kingdom of Ireland; and having queſtioned the meſſenger, whether he meant to ſubject me to a foreign juriſdiction, &c.? I do therefore proteſt againſt the authority or force of the ſaid ſcrap of parchment and bit of wax, &c.”

Now, if thoſe perſons, the attorney general ſaid, ſhould think proper rather to deſtroy the child than ſuffer him to be brought up in the principles of the Britiſh conſtitution, and in the Proteſtant religion, of which, however, he did not imagine there was the leaſt intention, but a poſſibility of it—the uncle, as next heir in remainder, would come in for the eſtate. It would be neceſſary, therefore, to paſs an act diſqualifying him from inheriting the eſtate in remainder; for perſons who commit outrage, and ſet the laws at defiance, ſhould never be ſuffered to enjoy their protection.

This affair was not only thought of ſufficient magnitude to engage the interference of this government, but alſo that of the Britiſh cabinet. The marquis of Carmarthen ſeriouſly took it up in his majeſty's name, and wrote to the prince biſhop of Liege, to cauſe that young nobleman to be delivered into the hands of ſuch perſons as his majeſty ſhould commiſſion to receive him. His highneſs returned for anſwer, that, as ſovereign of Liege, he was bound by the conſtitution, and could not decide on ſo important a matter without the concurrence of his council. His council, having ſince been conſulted, have declared, that, conſiſtently with the laws of the State, his highneſs could not force a Catholic out of his dominions, for the purpoſe of putting him into the hands of a Proteſtant to be educated.

His excellency the lord lieutenant was now taken dangerouſly ill at the Phœnix lodge. A day or two after his return to his reſidence, he complained of being feveriſh; upon his phyſicians being conſulted, their opinion was, that owing to the violent living his grace was obliged to ſubmit to during an excurſion of three months, together with hard riding, his blood was extremely heated. His grace had frequently travelled ſeventy miles a day on horſeback, during his abſence. On the 10th of October, eight days after the period of the tour abovementioned, his excellency's malady increaſed, ſo as to confine him to his chamber. The beſt ſkill was inſtantly called in; amongſt whom were Dr. Quin, Mr. Neale the ſurgeon, and others of the faculty. His diſorder growing more violent, the Doctors Warren and Knox were ſent to, and the latter gentleman was actually on his way to Holyhead. Skill, however, could have been of no avail. His excellency died on Wedneſday, October the 24th, at a little after nine o'clock in the evening. His body was opened early the next morning, when his liver appeared ſo much decayed and waſted as to render his recovery impoſſible. He met his death with the moſt philoſophic compoſure. He was ſenſible of his approaching end for many hours preceding his diſſolution, and expreſſed a wiſh to ſee the ducheſs; but added, to Dr. Quin, “ in point of time it will be impoſſible; I muſt therefore be content to die with her image before my mind's eye.” A ſhort time before he expired, he had an interview with ſome of his children, which was truly affecting. Her grace ſet out on Sunday morning (the 21ſt) at twelve o'clock, from the ducheſs of Beaufort's, on her way to Holyhead, and propoſed travelling night and day: and although three couriers were on the road with the unpleaſant intelligence, they all miſſed her grace, owing to her taking the Huntingdon road. A meſſenger was immediately diſpatched, by the ducheſs of Beaufort, to bring her back.—His grace was lineally deſcended from an Engliſh and an Iriſh prince, the former of whom was a viceroy univerſally beloved by the Iriſh nation, viz. Diarmurd M'Murchard, king of Leinſter.

On the 17th, the funeral proceſſion of his grace the late duke of Rutland commenced. It would be difficult to convey a competent idea of the ſolemnity and grandeur of the proceſſion, which exceeded every thing of the kind ever exhibited in this country. A decent ſorrow was viſible in every countenance that beheld it.

George, marquis of Buckingham, was now appointed lord lieutenant, in the room of his late grace.

On the 17th of January 1788, the parliament being met, his excellency went in ſtate to the houſe of peers, and being ſeated on the throne with the uſual ſolemnity, Scroope Bernard, eſq. gentleman uſher of the black rod, was ſent with a meſſage from his excellency to the houſe of commons, ſignifying his pleaſure that they ſhould immediately attend his excellency in the houſe of peers; and the commons being come thither accordingly, his excellency was pleaſed to open the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech from the throne:

My lords,

His majeſty having been pleaſed again to call me to the government of Ireland, I have received his royal commands to meet you in parliament.

At the ſame time that I feel myſelf highly flattered by this repeated mark of his majeſty's confidence, I muſt lament with you the heavy loſs which his ſervice has ſuſtained by the death of the duke of Rutland, whoſe public and private virtues had ſo deſervedly conciliated the eſteem and affections of this kingdom.

His majeſty is perſuaded that you will ſhare the ſatisfaction which he feels in the preſent ſituation of foreign affairs; and particularly in the reſtoration of the conſtitution and tranquillity of the United Provinces, favoured by the ſeaſonable and vigorous exertions which were made by his majeſty, and by the brilliant ſucceſs of the Pruſſian troops under the conduct of his ſerene highneſs the duke of Brunſwick. The meaſures which his majeſty has adopted on this occaſion have been productive of advantages which, while they have added to the luſtre of his crown, have materially promoted the eſſential intereſt of his dominions.

Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

I have ordered the national accounts and the neceſſary eſtimates to be prepared and laid before you; and, with the fulleſt confidence in your zeal and loyalty, I obey his majeſty's commands in recommending to you to provide for the public ſervice.

My lords and gentlemen,

My former experience of the affectionate attachment which his majeſty's ſubjects of Ireland have borne to his perſon and government, and the very particular intereſt which I muſt feel in your welfare, will never fail to animate my endeavours in purſuit of every object which may promote his majeſty's paternal wiſhes for the happineſs of this kingdom. With this view, I muſt more eſpecially direct your attention to the ſupport of that great ſtaple of your commerce, the linen manufacture, to the protection and regulation of the Proteſtant charter ſchools, to the ſecurity of the church of Ireland, and to thoſe principles which your wiſdom and humanity have already pointed out for the advancement of education and of uſeful knowledge.

I have ſeen, with particular ſatisfaction, your riſing proſperity, and the rapid increaſe of your commerce and manufactures; and I ſhall be anxious to co-operate with you in improving the advantages which the credit of the country muſt derive from the bleſſings of peace: But, while you are ſenſible of the value of theſe bleſſings, I am perſuaded that you feel the warmeſt concern for the honour of his majeſty's crown, and the general intereſts of the empire; and that there is no part of his dominions from which his majeſty would have received a warmer or more zealous ſupport, if he had judged it neceſſary to call forth into action the ſpirit and reſources of his people.

The addreſs of the houſe of commons to the king, a moſt animated and elegant compoſition, was as follows:

The humble addreſs of the knights, citizens and burgeſſes, in parliament aſſembled.

Moſt gracious ſovereign,

We, your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the commons of Ireland, in parliament aſſembled, beg leave to lay before your majeſty our unfeigned expreſſions of duty, loyalty, and attachment to your royal perſon, family, and government.

We cannot ſufficiently deplore the heavy loſs which your majeſty's ſervice has ſuſtained by the premature and much-lamented death of our late chief governor. The wiſe and ſteady courſe of his public adminiſtration had eſtabliſhed the tranquillity and exalted the credit of the nation; whilſt the amiable tenor of his private virtues had conciliated the love and eſteem of every rank and deſcription of the people. As long as the nobler qualities of the mind, the benevolent affections of the heart, affability in deportment, and complacency of manners, ſhall continue to warm the feelings and engage the attachment of a generous and grateful nation, the memory of the duke of Rutland will be preſerved and cheriſhed in the boſoms of Iriſhmen.

Amidſt theſe effuſions of our heartfelt regret, we acknowledge your majeſty's peculiar attention and regard to our ſituation in the re-appointing to be chief governor of this kingdom a nobleman who, during his former reſidence in Ireland, had exerted the moſt unremitting attention to its affairs and intereſts, and merited the ampleſt teſtimony of gratitude for the wiſdom and integrity of his government.

We fully participate in the ſatisfaction which reſults to your majeſty from the preſent ſituation of foreign affairs. We are ſenſible of the beneficial conſequences which have ariſen from the reſtoration of the conſtitution and tranquillity of the United States, favoured by the brilliant ſucceſs of the Pruſſian troops under the conduct of his ſerene highneſs the duke of Brunſwick; and we acknowledge the wiſdom of the ſeaſonable and vigorous exertions which were made by your majeſty during the courſe of thoſe events, and which have proved ſo materially conducive to the luſtre of your crown, and to the eſſential intereſts of your dominions.

Zealous for the honour of your majeſty's government, we ſhall chearfully provide the ſupplies that may be neceſſary for the public ſervice.

We entertain the higheſt ſenſe of gratitude for the aſſurances which we have received from the throne of your majeſty's paternal wiſhes for the happineſs of this kingdom.

We ſhall cultivate with earneſtneſs thoſe objects which have been recommended to our care, by directing our attention to the further extenſion of our linen manufacture, the protection and regulation of the Proteſtant charter ſchools, the ſecurity of the eſtabliſhed church, and to thoſe principles which wiſdom and humanity point out for the promotion of education and uſeful knowledge.

In reviewing the progreſs which our commerce, manufactures, and credit, have made under your majeſty's auſpicious protection and influence, we are ſtimulated to cheriſh, with increaſed aſſiduity, the bleſſings of peace.

We repeat, however, with chearfulneſs, our declaration to ſtand and fall with Great Britain. If the honour of your majeſty's crown, or the intereſts of your dominions, had obliged your majeſty to reſort to the ſpirit and reſources of your people, there is no part of your empire from which your majeſty would have received a warmer and more zealous ſupport than from your loyal ſubjects of Ireland.

E. COOKE, Cler. Parl. Dom. Com.

The following was his majeſty's anſwer to the above addreſs.

"His majeſty has received with great ſatisfaction the addreſs of the houſe of commons of Ireland; their expreſſions of loyalty and attachment to his royal perſon and government, and their aſſurances of zealouſly contributing to the ſupport of the honour of his crown, and the general intereſts of his dominions, excite ſuch emotions in his majeſty's breaſt as cannot fail to enſure an earneſt attention to their proſperity and happineſs, for the advancement of which it will always be his majeſty's deſire to ſecure to his faithful and loyal ſubjects the bleſſings of peace, and to encourage their commerce and manufactures.

"His majeſty is highly pleaſed with the affectionate attention which has been paid by the houſe of commons to the memory of their late chief governor, whoſe public and private virtues his majeſty does not doubt will long remain imprinted on the minds of his people of Ireland: However ſenſibly his majeſty may feel the loſs of ſo faithful a ſervant, he cannot but meet with much conſolation in the ſatisfaction which his people of Ireland receive in the re-appointment of the marquis of Buckingham to the government of that kingdom, whoſe diligence and zeal his majeſty is perſuaded will be conſtantly exerted for the promotion of ſuch meaſures as will beſt tend to their intereſts and proſperity."

On the 8th of March the houſe of commons received a meſſage from the lords, by two of the judges, that their lordſhips had paſſed an ingroſſed bill, for repealing the act of the 33d of Henry VIII. which reſtricted a native of that country from being lord deputy or chief governor of that realm, and deſiring the concurrence of the houſe; when the right hon. Mr. Secretary Fitzherbert informed the houſe, that he was directed by his excellency the lord lieutenant to acquaint the houſe, that his majeſty, having been informed of the purport of the ſaid bill, had conſented, ſo far as his intereſt is concerned, that the houſe might do therein as it ſhould think fit.

The following memorable tranſaction engroſſed much of the attention of the gentlemen of the long robe in this country, and was for ſome time the chief topic of converſation in England.

A record was made up for the trial of a cauſe of conſiderable importance in the county of Limerick. The judge of aſſize, who tried civil cauſes in the circuit in which Limeric lies, was Mr. Hamilton, one of the barons of the exchequer. When the cauſe in queſtion was called, the counſel for the plaintiff opened it, and ſtated to the court and jury the nature and particulars of the evidence that he intended to produce in ſupport of the claim ſet up by his client. The judge, after having ſuffered him, without interruption, to lay open his own caſe, ſaid, he perceived the trial would take up more time than he was at firſt aware of, or than he could ſpare; and therefore he directed the ſheriff to withdraw a juror, and to let the cauſe ſtand over to the next aſſize.

This was a proceeding in the judge, which, lawyers ſay, was very illegal, and unwarranted either by the commiſſions of juſtices of aſſize, or the practice of the courts in circuit. To perſons who are not of the learned profeſſion, it muſt appear a delay of juſtice, and conſequently an injury to the ſuitors, but more particularly to the plaintiff, as his counſel, under the idea that he was proceeding immediately to the trial, had been ſuffered to diſcloſe the nature of his evidence, and the names of his witneſſes; circumſtances of which the defendant might avail himſelf before the next aſſize, by tampering with the witneſſes, if it ſhould ſo pleaſe him, to the great prejudice of the plaintiff.

Whether this conduct was legal or not, was the queſtion brought before the parliament of this kingdom for deciſion; and, it muſt be owned, was very candidly given up. It was brought forward, by way of petition, from the party aggrieved; and ſupported by the counſel employed in the cauſe, who ſaid, he felt for the plaintiff at the time, and endeavoured to avert the reſolution of the judge; but the baron had made up his mind, from the neceſſity of going into the criminal trials, with the view of clearing the gaol. He ſaid, he meant himſelf to have brought the matter before a ſuperior court; but did not think it of importance enough to come before a committee of the houſe.

The attorney general roſe next, and frankly declared, that as to the diſcharging of a jury without the conſent of the parties, there is no man of profeſſional character that will defend or juſtify it; it was an illegal act, it was without precedent, and he truſted would never be repeated; but it was an error in judgment, an error ariſing from a good motive, a wiſh to diſcharge the gaol; and as it is not attempted to be juſtified, and as upon reflection the learned judge has altered his opinion, he wiſhed to have the matter buried in oblivion, becauſe there was no charge of any corrupt or diſhonourable motive; if there was, our reſolution ſhould be, to addreſs for the removal from the bench of any judge that could be guilty of corruption; but, in the caſe before the committee, the motive of the judge was moſt pure, though much miſtaken; therefore wiſhed the matter for ever buried in oblivion; and, that it might, he moved, that the chairman do leave the chair. The queſtion being put, it paſſed unanimouſly.

Univerſal conſternation now took place from the frequency and great amount of failures, which happened at this time. Very few bills were diſcounted by even the national bank, though the parties were poſſeſſed of ſolvency and character.

A violent debate took place, on February 7, 1789, reſpecting the regency buſineſs, on account of the then indiſpoſition of his majeſty. On the 11th, the houſe having met in committee, the right hon. T. Connolly moved, "That it is the opinion of this committee, that an humble addreſs be preſented to his royal highneſs the prince of Wales, humbly to requeſt his royal highneſs to take upon himſelf the government of this realm, during the continuation of his majeſty's indiſpoſition, and no longer, under the ſtyle and title of prince regent, in the name and ſtead of his majeſty, to exerciſe and adminiſter, according to the laws and conſtitution of this kingdom, all legal powers, juriſdictions, and prerogatives to the crown and government thereof belonging." After a long debate, this motion war carried without a diviſion.

A like addreſs, but more full, was moved, on Monday the 20th, in the houſe of Lords; and carried by a majority of nineteen. A proteſt, however, was entered againſt it by ſeventeen lords; and when the two houſes waited on the lord lieutenant to tranſmit their addreſſes, as uſual, to England, his excellency made the following reply:

"Under the impreſſion I feel of my official duty, and of the oath I have taken as chief governor of Ireland, I am obliged to decline tranſmitting this addreſs into Great Britain; for I cannot conſider myſelf warranted to lay before the prince of Wales an addreſs, purporting to inveſt his royal highneſs with powers to take upon him the government of this realm, before he ſhall be enabled by law ſo to do."

On the 21ſt, the following motion was put and carried in the houſe of commons, "That the houſe do preſent to his royal highneſs the prince of Wales an addreſs, beſeeching his royal highneſs to undertake the government of this kingdom during the preſent indiſpoſition of his majeſty, and no longer, under the title of prince regent of Ireland; and to exerciſe the ſame with all the royal authorities, juriſdictions, and prerogatives, belonging thereto."

The lord lieutenant having declined to tranſmit the addreſs, two members of the houſe of lords, viz. the duke of Leinſter and lord Charlemont, with four members of the houſe of commons, viz. right hon. T. Connolly, right hon. J. O'Neill, right hon. J. B. Ponſonby, and Mr. Stuart, member for the county of Tyrone, were deputed as commiſſioners to preſent the addreſs of the lords and commons of Ireland to his royal highneſs the prince of Wales. On the 25th, the above noblemen and gentlemen arrived in town for that purpoſe.

The refuſal of the lord lieutenant, occaſioned the cenſure of the houſe, and conſequently violent debates enſued.

The following is the joint addreſs of the lords ſpiritual and temporal, and knights, citizens, and burgeſſes of Ireland, in parliament aſſembled, to his royal highneſs George Prince of Wales:

"May it pleaſe your Royal Highneſs,

"We, his majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the lords ſpiritual and temporal, and the commons of Ireland in parliament aſſembled, beg leave to approach your royal highneſs with hearts full of the moſt loyal and affectionate attachment to the perſon and government of your royal father, to expreſs the deepeſt and moſt grateful ſenſe of the numerous bleſſings which we have enjoyed under that illuſtrious houſe, whoſe acceſſion to the throne of theſe realms has eſtabliſhed civil and conſtitutional liberties upon a baſis which we truſt will never be ſhaken; and at the ſame time to condole with your royal highneſs upon the grievous malady with which it has pleaſed Heaven to afflict the beſt of ſovereigns.

"We have, however, the conſolation of reflecting, that this ſevere calamity hath not been viſited upon us until the virtues of your royal highneſs have been ſo matured as to enable your royal highneſs to diſcharge the duties of an important truſt, for the performance whereof the eyes of all his majeſty's ſubjects of both kingdoms are directed to your royal highneſs.

"We therefore beg leave humbly to requeſt that your royal highneſs will be pleaſed to take upon you the government of this realm, during the continuance of his majeſty's preſent indiſpoſition, and no longer; and under the ſtyle and title of Prince Regent of Ireland, in the name and on the behalf of his majeſty, to exerciſe and adminiſter, according to the laws and conſtitution of this kingdom, all regal powers, juriſdictions, and prerogatives, to the crown and government thereof belonging."

Againſt tranſmitting this addreſs by parliamentary commiſſioners, a proteſt was entered, ſigned Mountmorris. A proteſt on the reſolution, declaring the right of the two houſes to declare a prince regent of Ireland, was ſigned by nineteen lords and ſix proxies. Upon the vote of cenſure on the lord lieutenant, eleven lords entered their proteſt, and ſix proxies.

On the 26th of February, the duke of Leinſter, earl of Charlemont, Meſſrs. Connolly, Ponſonby, O'Neil, and Stuart, were introduced to the prince of Wales, at Carleton-houſe, by lord Southampton, when they delivered the above addreſs from the parliament of Ireland.

His royal highneſs received them in the moſt polite and gracious manner, and was pleaſed to return the following anſwer:

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"The addreſs from the lords ſpiritual and temporal and commons of Ireland, which you have preſented to me, demands my warmeſt and earlieſt thanks. If any thing could add to the eſteem and affection I have for the people of Ireland, it would be the loyal and affectionate attachment to the perſon and government of the king my father, manifeſted in the addreſs of the two houſes.

"What they have now done, and their manner of doing it, is a new proof of their undiminiſhed duty to his majeſty, of their uniform attachment to the houſe of Brunſwick, and their conſtant care and attention to maintain inviolate the concord and connection between the kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland, ſo indiſpenſably neceſſary to the proſperity, the happineſs, and the liberties of both.

"If in conveying my grateful ſentiments on their conduct in relation to the king my father, and to the inſeparable intereſts of the two kingdoms, I find it impoſſible to expreſs adequately my feelings on what relates to myſelf; I truſt you will not be the leſs diſpoſed to believe that I have an underſtanding to comprehend the value of what they have done, a heart that muſt remember, and principles that will not ſuffer me to abuſe, their confidence.

"But the fortunate change which has taken place in the circumſtance which gave occaſion to the addreſs agreed to by the lords and commons of Ireland, induces me to delay for a few days giving a final anſwer, truſting that the joyful event of his majeſty's reſuming the perſonal exerciſe of his royal authority may render it only neceſſary for me to report thoſe ſentiments of gratitude and affection to the loyal and generous people of Ireland, which I feel indelibly imprinted on my heart."

The happy recovery of his majeſty, which was announced in the houſe of peers, the commons having been aſſembled by his excellency on the 14th of March, now terminated all this uneaſineſs. When his excellency retired, the lord chancellor having taken the woolſack, read the ſpeech again to the houſe; after which lord Hillſborough moved an addreſs to his majeſty on his recovery, which was agreed to nem. diſſ.

Lord Glandore then moved an addreſs to the lord lieutenant, thanking him for the gracious manner in which he had communicated his majeſty's wiſhes, and the early intimation of his majeſty's recovery. This was alſo agreed to nem. diſſ. and a committee appointed to draw up the ſame.

Similar addreſſes were moved and carried in the commons; and never were more loyal addreſſes penned, nor voted with more unanimity.

The following are his majeſty's anſwers to the addreſſes of the houſes of lords and commons of Ireland on that occaſion:

"His majeſty receives with the greateſt ſatisfaction the dutiful and loyal addreſs of the lords ſpiritual and temporal, in parliament aſſembled.

"His majeſty accepts in the moſt gracious manner the renewal of their profeſſions of affectionate attachment to his perſon, family, and government, and feels with the greateſt ſenſibility the joyful expreſſions of their hearts upon the interpoſition of divine Providence, in reſtoring him again to the perſonal exerciſe of his royal functions. The happineſs and proſperity of his faithful ſubjects in Ireland are objects very near his majeſty's heart, and he confides in the wiſdom of the parliament of that kingdom, that they will purſue ſuch meaſures as will enable him to fulfil his intentions of promoting the general intereſts of all his dominions."

"His majeſty thanks his faithful commons for their loyal and affectionate addreſs, and for their aſſurances of the ſincere and cordial ſatisfaction which they feel on the interpoſition of divine Providence, in removing from him the ſevere indiſpoſition with which he has been afflicted.

"Nothing can be more ſatisfactory to his majeſty than the diſpoſition expreſſed by the houſe of commons, chearfully to proceed in making ſuch proviſions as are neceſſary for the honourable ſupport of his majeſty's government.

"He receives with the greateſt pleaſure the acknowledgments of the houſe of commons of their ſenſe of the ſolicitude which his majeſty can never ceaſe to entertain for the intereſts of Ireland, as well as their profeſſions of reſpect and attachment to his perſon, family, and government."

The marquis of Buckingham having now reſigned, he was ſucceeded by John earl of Weſtmorland, who, on the 21ſt of January, 1790, went (for the firſt time) in ſtate to the houſe of peers, with the uſual ſolemnity, and the commons being ſent for, his excellency made the following ſpeech:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"The king having been graciouſly pleaſed to place me in the government of this kingdom, I have his majeſty's command to meet you in parliament; and it affords me peculiar ſatisfaction, that I enter upon the diſcharge of this moſt important truſt at a period when this country, in common with the reſt of his majeſty's dominions, is in the ſecure enjoyment of the bleſſings of peace, and of the ineſtimable advantages ariſing from our free conſtitution.

"This happy ſituation will undoubtedly encourage you to perſevere in the maintenance of good government, and to adhere to the wiſe ſyſtem of policy which has eſtabliſhed the credit, the induſtry, and the proſperity of your country, upon a firm and ſteady foundation.

"Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I have ordered the national accounts to be laid before you; and I truſt you will make ſuch proviſion as ſhall be neceſſary for the exigencies of the ſtate, and the honourable ſupport of his majeſty's government.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"Your zeal for the intereſts of this country will naturally direct your attention to whatever can increaſe the wealth and extend the induſtry of Ireland; her agriculture and linen-manufacture will claim your eſpecial care; and the inſtitution of the charter and other Proteſtant ſchools will, I am perſuaded, receive from you that conſideration which the intereſts of religion, and the good education of youth, peculiarly demand. I earneſtly recommend to your attention the improving and continuing ſuch laws as experience has ſhewn to be of national benefit; and I have the king's command to aſſure you, that ſuch meaſures as may contribute to that end will meet with his majeſty's moſt gracious concurrence.

"Impreſſed with a deep ſenſe of the diſtinguiſhed honour which his majeſty has conferred upon me, by my appointment to this arduous ſituation, I ſhall endeavour, with the utmoſt zeal and attention, to promote the happineſs and welfare of Ireland, fully ſenſible that I cannot otherwiſe hope either to render my ſervice acceptable to my ſovereign, or to inſure your favourable opinion and confidence."

In the houſe of lords, the addreſs was moved by the right hon. lord viſcount Powerſcourt.—In the commons, by the right hon. Mr. Longfield.

On the firſt day of meeting, the earl of Maſſareene took his ſeat in the houſe of lords. The late ſufferings of this noble gentleman are ſomewhat remarkable: he is a peer of Ireland, and head of the noble family of Skeffington. His lordſhip, in his early days, figured very conſpicuouſly in the walks of faſhion. When making the grand tour, ſoon after his coming into poſſeſſion of his family titles and eſtates, his lordſhip unfortunately at Paris became acquainted with a native of Tripoli in Syria, who, from his artful ſophiſtry, prevailed upon the noble lord to co-operate with him in a plan he had formed of ſupplying the kingdom of France with the article of ſalt, to be brought from the coaſts of Syria; and held out ſuch apparent advantages to be derived therefrom, as induced the credulous young nobleman to enter into engagements for the payment of ſuch ſums of money as might be neceſſary for the accompliſhment of the object.

In a very ſhort time after, the Syrian adventurer ſet ſail for Tripoli, and returned to Paris in due courſe of time, with ſuch flattering accounts of the ſucceſs of the expedition, as led lord Maſſareene to plunge himſelf into thoſe calamities which have proved the bane of the comforts which from his noble birth he had a juſt right to expect. After being ſome years confined in the Grand Chatelet at Paris, in a moſt unpleaſant ſituation to a man of any rank in life, the natural love of liberty ſo far prevailed as to lead his lordſhip to lay a plan for his eſcape to his native country; but the carriage which was waiting for his reception was kept ſo long hovering about the priſon, that it cauſed ſuſpicion among the gaol-keepers. His lordſhip was apprehended as he was entering the carriage, and immediately ſent into a dungeon many feet below the ſurface of the river Seine, upon which the Chatelet is built. He remained there in ſuch a ſtate of wretchedneſs, that his beard grew to a moſt immoderate length, and rendered him a moſt ſtriking picture of the viciſſitudes of human life. According to the arrangements made by his lordſhip, the debt would have been paid in the courſe of two years more.

When his lordſhip was freed from the Chatelet, he had nearly been ſtopped at Calais, on his return home. On landing at Dover, his lordſhip was the firſt to jump out of the boat, and in the fulneſs of his joy, and in gratitude to heaven for his deliverance, immediately fell on his knees, and kiſſing the ground thrice exclaimed, "God bleſs this land of liberty!"

Some ſhort time after lord Weſtmorland's arrival in Ireland, his excellency had a very narrow eſcape for his life. His lordſhip's horſe loſt his hinder footing at Ball's-bridge, and fell over; his lordſhip fortunately diſengaged himſelf, and received no other injury than a ſlight contuſion on the knee.

On the 23d of January, the ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, in his ſtate robes, attended by a deputation from the whole houſe, waited on his excellency the lord lieutenant, in order to preſent the addreſs to his majeſty, and alſo that to his excellency, which had been voted the preceding evening.

His excellency, after having informed the ſpeaker that he ſhould forthwith tranſmit the addreſs intended for his majeſty, returned his ſincere and cordial thanks for that preſented to himſelf; aſſuring, that the zeal he felt for the welfare of Ireland would actuate him at all times to purſue ſuch conduct as may deſerve confidence.

Soon after, Mr. Grattan having reprobated the corrupt ſyſtem of government, concluded a long ſpeech with the following motion:

"That the reſolutions of this houſe againſt increaſing the number of the commiſſioners of the revenue, and dividing the boards, be laid before his majeſty; with an humble addreſs, that his majeſty will be graciouſly pleaſed to order to be laid before this houſe the particulars of the repreſentations, in conſequence of which two new commiſſioners of cuſtoms have been added, notwithſtanding the reſolutions of this houſe; and alſo that his majeſty will be graciouſly pleaſed to communicate to his faithful commons the names of the perſons concerned in recommending that meaſure."

Mr. Connolly ſeconded the motion, which was ſupported by many ſtrong arguments; but, on a diviſion, adminiſtration had a majority of 55; the ayes being 80, the noes 135.

Two other motions of the like tendency have ſince been made in the houſe of commons, which have both met with the like fate.

In the houſe of lords, when the addreſs to his majeſty was preſented on the 22d of January, lord Portarlington moved the following amendment: "To lay before his majeſty the apprehenſions this houſe entertains of miniſterial influence; and its hope that his majeſty will remove them, by aboliſhments ſo unneceſſary, burthenſome, and alarming, &c.;" which being rejected, a ſtrong proteſt was entered in the journals, ſigned by ſix lords preſent, and two by proxy, viz. Cork and Orrery, Moira, Arran, Charlemont, Portarlington, Liſmore; Lemnſter and Roſs—by proxy.

In the houſe of lords alſo the duke of Leinſter moved, that the adviſer of his majeſty, in the deprivation of lord Strangford of a penſion granted at the requeſt of that houſe, had acted diſgracefully to the houſe, and unconſtitutionally and diſreſpectfully to his majeſty. This produced a debate; and, on a diviſion taking place, the motion was negatived by a majority of 20.

A warrant for a diſſolution of parliament was now received; but a moſt extraordinary charge was brought forward in the houſe of commons before the parliament was diſſolved. Mr. Coran offered to produce witneſſes at the bar, to prove the ſale of a peerage. The circumſtances were theſe: A new-created peer executed a bond to a certain major, for 5000l. The condition, that the obligee ſhould be created a peer on or before a certain time ſpecified in the bond. The creation took place, but not till ſome months after the time ſpecified—The money was demanded, but refuſed—The plea, non-performance of covenants. It was otherwiſe reported, the major betted his friend was made a peer before a certain time; the time elapſed before the peerage took place, conſequently the major loſt.

A new parliament was ordered to be holden on May the 20th, for which purpoſe writs were ordered to be iſſued March the 9th.

Great diſturbances now took place, ariſing from various cauſes.—A new machine called a gig, by the uſe of which one man could do the work of four, gave great offence to the lower claſs of people, who, fearing a ſcarcity of work, committed many outrages in the earl of Meath's liberty, and formed a deſign of murdering the inventor.

Another cauſe of diſcontent aroſe between the weavers of ſilk and the weavers of linen, the former having preſumed to work in the looms of the latter. The different bodies met, and fought deſperately, to the no ſmall terror of the by-ſtanders, till they were diſperſed by the magiſtrates, aided by the military.

An inſurrection of the journeymen ſawyers, for an increaſe of wages, was another cauſe—during this violent contention, one man was killed, and ſeveral deſperately wounded. A lady narrowly eſcaped being killed by a ball ſhot into her houſe, which grazed her ſhoulder.

Great riots alſo took place in ſeveral parts of the kingdom, in conſequence of the election of members to the new parliament. Colonel Maſſey being returned for the county of Limeric, the mob inſtantly attacked him and his friends, and it was with difficulty they eſcaped with their lives. They afterwards razed to the ground the houſes of many gentlemen who voted for him; among others, the beautiful ſeat of ſir D. Burgh, although lady Burgh, on her knees, prayed them to ſpare it.

On the 2d of July, the new parliament met, and his excellency the lord lieutenant went in ſtate to the houſe of peers, and opened the ſeſſion by an appoſite ſpeech, in which he acquainted both houſes, by his majeſty's command, with the riſe and progreſs of the diſpute with Spain, and of the armaments carrying on in the Spaniſh ports, "which had made it indiſpenſably neceſſary to give orders for making ſuch preparations as may put it in his majeſty's power to act with vigour and effect for the honour of his crown, and the intereſts of his people; fully relying on the parliament of Ireland for cordial and effectual ſupport, &c."

But, previous to the delivery of his excellency's ſpeech from the throne, the uſual forms of the lower houſe had paſſed, their ſpeaker choſen and preſented, and their attendance in the houſe of peers ordered and complied with; and the right hon. John Foſter, their late ſpeaker, placed in the chair, by a majority of 40.

On the return of the commons to their own houſe, the ſpeaker proceeded in the uſual manner to read the ſpeech.

Lord Headford then moved the addreſs; and Mr. Parry ſeconded the motion.

Mr. Grattan ſaid, that, he thought there could be but one opinion; and that was, for the addreſs to paſs. It did ſo unanimouſly, and next day lord Headford brought up the report from the committee appointed to draw it up, which was agreed to. As was alſo the report from the committee appointed to draw up an addreſs to his excellency the lord lieutenant.

The chancellor of the exchequer roſe; and now, he ſaid, the ſenſe of the nation being fully underſtood, he had only to move for a vote of credit for 200,000l. to put the kingdom in a ſtate of defence, and pledged himſelf that every penny of it ſhould be applied to the purpoſes for which it was granted.

This gave riſe to a ſhort converſation, in which the right hon. Brabaſon Ponſonby, Mr. Grattan, and Mr. Forbes, on one ſide; and capt. Burgh, col. Blaquiere, and the chancellor of the exchequer on the other, took part. The motion, however, paſſed without diviſion, and unanimity began now to reign.

On the 24th of July, his excellency terminated the ſeſſion of the Iriſh parliament with the following ſpeech from the throne:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I have great ſatiſfaction in communicating to you his majeſty's gracious acceptance of thoſe proofs of attachment, loyalty, and zeal, which you have manifeſted in your proceedings.

"Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"His majeſty commands me to return you his thanks for the means you have afforded him to provide for the extraordinary expences of government at this important criſis.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I am happy at this ſeaſon of the year to relieve you from attendance in parliament. I have no doubt of your continuance in that diſpoſition to aſſert and maintain the rights of the empire, which has ſo honourably diſtinguiſhed your conduct."

After which, by his excellency's command, the lord chancellor prorogued the parliament to Friday the 24th of September; but not till the 20th of January did it open, when his excellency went in ſtate to the houſe of peers, where being ſeated on the throne, he made the following ſpeech:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I have ſome pleaſure in acquainting you, by the king's command, that the differences which had ariſen between his majeſty and the court of Spain have happily been brought to an amicable termination. Copies of the declarations exchanged between his majeſty's ambaſſador and the miniſter of the catholick king, and of the convention which has been ſince concluded, will be laid before you.

"Had the honour of his majeſty's crown, and the protection of the rights and intereſts of the empire, involved this country in the calamities of war, the zeal manifeſted by all his ſubjects, and by none more than his loyal people of Ireland, had left him no doubt of the moſt vigorous and effectual ſupport. It is a ſource of peculiar ſatiſfaction to his majeſty, that thoſe objects have been accompliſhed without any actual interruption of the bleſſings of peace.

"Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I have ordered the proper officers to lay the national accounts before you, fully relying upon your accuſtomed zeal to provide for the exigencies of the ſtate, and the honourable ſupport of his majeſty's government.

"I have alſo ordered an account of the extraordinary expences of government, which have been incurred during the negociation with Spain, to be laid before you; and I truſt you will find that the confidence you repoſed in me has not been miſplaced.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"Your diſpoſition to facilitate the buſineſs of commerce, and to conſult the eaſe of the merchants, will induce you to conſider, and if poſſible to accompliſh, during this ſeſſion, ſuch regulations as may tend to ſimplify the collection of the various articles of the public revenue."

His excellency having retired, the lord chancellor read the ſpeech; and it was afterwards read at the table by the clerk.

The marquis of Waterford moved the addreſs to the king: and a noble earl, that of thanks to the lord lieutenant.

The addreſs in the houſe of commons was moved for by Mr. John Wolfe, and carried with little oppoſition.

In the houſe of lords, the right hon. John Bourke, earl of Mayo, having produced the royal patent, creating his father earl of Mayo, was introduced, and took the oaths; as was alſo the right hon. Arthur Acheſon, viſcount Goſford. The right hon. Robert Clements, baron Leitrim, took the oaths and his ſeat.

The univerſity of Dublin, in full convocation, unanimouſly conferred the honorary degree of doctor of laws on the right hon. Edmund Burke, as the powerful advocate of the conſtitution, the friend of public order, virtue, and the happineſs of mankind; and in teſtimony of the high reſpect entertained by the univerſity (which had the honour of his education) for the various endowments of his capacious mind, and for his ſuperior talents and abilities.

Mr. Grattan moved in the houſe of commons, on February 15, "That a committee be appointed, to enquire what legiſlative proviſions are neceſſary to be adopted by that kingdom with reſpect to the ſtipulations in behalf of his majeſty's ſubjects in the late convention with Spain." The motion was negatived by a majority of 137 to 80.

On the 16th, the ſame gentleman moved, "That the committee of trade do ſit, to enquire whether any legiſlative proviſions exiſt that may tend to prevent this country [Ireland] from enjoying the full benefits of her free trade." This was argued on the ſcore of the ſubjects of Ireland having a free trade to the Eaſt Indies. The principle ſeemed to be given up; but the expediency was combated, and negatived, 146 againſt 85.

The new eſtabliſhed police gave great diſſatiſfaction to the majority of the people. On the 1ſt of March, in conſequence of the annual maſquerade at the new rooms in Rutland-ſquare, they attended, armed as uſual with fire-locks and fixed bayonets. About ten at night an alarming multitude aſſembled to gratify their curioſity; but more to ſhew their contempt to the police, who began to exert their authority; when a riot began, and a ſort of battle was fought, in which the police were defeated, ſeveral killed, and the greateſt part who eſcaped with life wounded. It was owing to the perſonal exertions of lord Charlemont and Mr. Napper Tandy that any eſcaped.

On the 19th of the ſame month his excellency being ſeated on the throne, gave the royal aſſent to ſuch bills as had paſſed the lords and commons of Ireland; among which was a bill to facilitate the trade between Ireland and the united ſtates of America, and a bill for regulating the bounties on the exportation of certain manufactures of Ireland, and a bill for extending the trade of tobaccos, ſugar, and coffee.

This year was remarkable for unfavourable weather, which was exceedingly detrimental to the vegetation of the country. From the 16th to the 24th of May the weather was ſuch for wind and cold, as hardly any man remembered the like ſo late in the ſpring. Add to this, that, on Monday the 17th, a violent ſtorm exceeded every idea that could be conceived of the mild month of May, ravaging the gardens of every thing that was uſeful and beautiful.

On the 19th of September, the firſt ſtone of the new houſe of induſtry, on an extenſive plan, was laid by the right hon. Tho. Connolly, as the firſt mover of a bill for the eſtabliſhment of a regular ſyſtem for the ſupport of the poor of that kingdom.

On the 13th of October, a very heavy fall of rain began, which continued for twenty hours without intermiſſion. In conſequence thereof, many ſtreets in the city of Dublin were inundated; and that part of the Tholſel where the recorder's court is held, was ſo flooded, that it was found neceſſary to adjourn the court.

On the 19th of January, 1792, the houſe met purſuant to prorogation.

The following lords were introduced in the accuſtomed forms, and took their ſeats: right hon. William earl of Meath, by deſcent; right hon. Tho. viſcount Northland, by creation; right hon. Arthur, viſcount Harburton, by ditto.

Shortly after his excellency the lord lieutenant entered the houſe in the uſual ſtate, the cap of maintenance borne by the marquis of Waterford, the ſword by the earl of Miltown; the commons being ſent for, and appearing below the bar, his excellency delivered the following ſpeech:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I have it in command from his majeſty to acquaint you, that, ſince the cloſe of the laſt ſeſſion, preliminaries of peace have been ſigned between Ruſſia and the Porte, and thoſe powers are now engaged in negociation for a definitive treaty, which his majeſty truſts will compleat the reſtoration of tranquillity amongſt the different powers of Europe.

"His majeſty, convinced of the intereſt you take in whatever concerns his domeſtic happineſs, commands me to acquaint you of the marriage of his royal highneſs the duke of York and the princeſs royal of Pruſſia.

"Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I have ordered the proper officers to lay before you the national accounts; and I truſt you will make ſuch proviſions as are neceſſary for the exigencies of the ſtate, and the honourable ſupport of his majeſty's government.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"The conſtant attention you have ſhewn to the intereſt of Ireland, makes it unneceſſary to recommend to you a continuance of that wiſe ſyſtem of policy, from which your country has received ſuch ineſtimable advantages in the increaſe of her trade, her credit, and manufactures. It is equally unneceſſary for me particularly to point out the encouragement of your agriculture and attention to your linen manufacture. The Proteſtant charter ſchools and other charitable inſtitutions will receive your accuſtomed conſideration.

"You may be aſſured of my zealous co-operation to forward every meaſure that may contribute to the public welfare. I ſhall pay unremitting attention to the due execution of the law and the maintenance of good order and government, ſo eſſential to the continuance of that freedom, proſperity, and happineſs, which Ireland enjoys under his majeſty's auſpicious reign, and under our excellent conſtitution."

His excellency having retired, the earl of Carhampton moved an addreſs to his majeſty, which, as uſual, echoed the ſpeech, and offered the thanks of the houſe for continuing the earl of Weſtmorland in the government of this kingdom.

The duke of Leinſter oppoſed that part of the addreſs which thanked his majeſty for continuing the earl of Weſtmorland in the government of this kingdom; a nobleman (his grace ſuggeſted) who had obſtinately ſet his face againſt every meaſure propoſed for the advantage of Ireland.

The queſtion on the addreſs being put, it was carried by a majority of 26.

The motion was then referred to a ſelect committee, to prepare an addreſs accordingly.

Lord de Montalt moved an addreſs to the lord lieutenant of thanks for his ſpeech from the throne; which was alſo carried, and committed.

The ſame day, in the houſe of commons, lord Tyrone moved an addreſs of thanks to his majeſty. He profeſſed his inviolable attachment to the intereſts of Ireland, deprecating the diviſions which prevailed in the neighbouring country of France, which, he ſaid, were fomented by the influence of ſpeculative learning, and by deſperate men to whom the bleſſing of peace was peſtilence, and the beauty of order deformity. Such ſpirits there were in this country, but too contemptible to excite apprehenſions, and too impotent to reſiſt the ſtrong arm of the law, which could in a moment cruſh them.

Mr. Grattan roſe, and expreſſed his entire approbation of every part of the addreſs which meant to give aſſurance to his majeſty of loyalty and attachment to his perſon, crown, and dignity, and of their well-meant congratulations on the union of his royal ſon with the princeſs royal of Pruſſia; but he could not concur in that clauſe which went to thank his majeſty for the continuance of an adminiſtration whoſe meaſures he had ever conſidered as inimical to the intereſts of this country. Here he entered in detail on the various grievances of which the patriots of Ireland had long complained without redreſs, and concluded by declaring his diſſent to that part of the motion.

The chancellor of the exchequer, with much warmth, decried the accuſations levelled by Mr. Grattan at the conduct of adminiſtration, and conſidered his charges on the preſent night as a mere repetition of thoſe invectives which adminiſtration had ſuſtained in the laſt and preceding ſeſſions. He conſidered them wholly unwarrantable.

Sir Edward Newnham was ſorry to differ from his right hon. friend Mr. Grattan. On the preſent occaſion, he wiſhed the houſe would be unanimous in voting the addreſs, as the critical ſituation of the country, and the growing temper of the times, rendered it neceſſary that the parliament ſhould manifeſt to the whole kingdom their firmneſs to ſupport the powers of government, and maintain the principles of the conſtitution.

Mr. Sheridan oppoſed the ſame clauſe of the addreſs, and on the ſame principles as Mr. Grattan.

Mr. G. Ponſonby would not have ſpoken, but for ſomething which had fallen from his friend the hon. baronet (ſir Edward Newnham), reſpecting the critical ſituation and ſeditious temper in this country: for his part, he knew of no ſuch things.

Sir H. Cavendiſh threw out ſome ſevere charges on the language of Mr. Grattan, which Mr. G. rebutted with pointed acumen.

The addreſs was at length carried without a diviſion; as was alſo an addreſs to the lord lieutenant for his ſpeech from the throne.

On February the 27th, at half paſt five in the evening, as the houſe of commons were in committee, they were panic ſtruck by a voice from one of the ventilators at the top, communicating the dreadful intelligence, that the roof was in flames, and the dome ready to fall. The ſpeaker inſtantly reſumed the chair, and every member eſcaped as he could with the utmoſt precipitation. The gallery, too, was cleared with much more expedition than could have been imagined.

The fire increaſed with inconceivable rapidity; and in a few minutes the dome was completely concealed from view by a volume and flame of ſmoke, of which it is impoſſible to convey in words a tolerable idea. At half paſt ſix, all the combuſtible materials round the roof being conſumed, and the copper with which the roof of that ſuperb edifice was covered, being in part melted, and the reſt reddened to that degree that uſually precedes fuſion, it fell in. The exploſion of flame and ſmoke that followed exhibited a ſcene that has not inaptly been compared to an eruption of Veſuvius. Certain it is, that by a mind unaccuſtomed to the dreadful grandeur of volcanic eruptions, nothing can be conceived more tremendouſly magnificent. Every neceſſary precaution was uſed by the ſpeaker to preſerve the books and papers of the houſe. The fire-bells inſtantly rang on the diſcovery of the fire, and every exertion was immediately made to prevent its ſpreading.—Happily theſe exertions were ſucceſsful in preſerving the houſe of lords. The miſchief therefore was confined to the houſe of commons, which, with all its pomp of architecture, was reduced to a heap of ruins. A large detachment of horſe, and a regiment of infantry, attended during the night, to preſerve order. By theſe exertions the fire was got under by nine o'clock; and before one the next morning was nearly extinguiſhed.

Among the many who diſtinguiſhed themſelves at the fire, none was more conſpicuous than the duke of Leinſter, who laboured with indefatigable induſtry throughout the whole of the evening.

Of this noble edifice Sir E. Pierce was the original architect; but dying before its completion, the building was continued under the ſuperintendance of Mr. Burgh, then ſurveyor general, and father of the preſent accomptant general. It was finiſhed in 1731, and coſt 40,000l.

This accident was occaſioned by ſome plumbers at work on the roof, who are ſuppoſed to have made a fire to heat their irons on the copper directly under the ſhade from the cupola. The fire broke out at half paſt five, and at half paſt ſix the whole roof over the houſe of commons fell in; by the immediate aſſiſtance of the engines, no more was burnt than the round part of the houſe of commons; the porticos, the houſe of lords, and all the committee rooms are ſafe. A like circumſtance is ſaid to have occaſioned the deſtruction of old St. Paul's cathedral, which the plumber declared on his death-bed.

The next day the members aſſembled in the coffee-rooms, as the houſe had been entirely deſtroyed by the fire of the day before.

The ſpeaker ſaid he was happy to inform the houſe, that notwithſtanding the dreadful accident which had happened, none of the records of journals of the houſe were deſtroyed, except the roll which contained the ſignatures of the members, and which had been burned with the table upon the floor, in a drawer of which it lay. He bore the moſt honourable teſtimony to the ſpirited and perſevering exertions of the lord-mayor, alderman Warren, Mr. Sheriff Norton, and the gentlemen of the college in particular, and to the military who attended in general: the efforts of the people of all deſcriptions were moſt anxiouſly employed for the preſervation of the building, and the protection of every article of importance; their exertions had been crowned with a great degree of ſucceſs in preventing any further miſchief than had occurred.

The attorney-general moved for a committee of enquiry into the cauſe of the fire; which was ordered.

In the ſequel it appeared after a minute enquiry, that the fire was entirely owing to the accident above mentioned.

The Speech of the Right Hon. Mr. Speaker at the Bar of the Houſe of Lords, on preſenting the Bills of Supply of this preſent Seſſion to his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant for the Royal Aſſent.

' May it pleaſe your Excellency,

" The commons of Ireland attend with the ſupplies.

" While they may look back with a conſcious pride to their ſpirited and ſucceſsful meaſures for preventing an increaſe of the national debt, as one great cauſe of the extenſion of trade, agriculture, and manufactures, which has with a rapid and uninterrupted progreſs raiſed this kingdom to a ſtate of proſperity and wealth never before experienced in it, they know that the continuance of that proſperity would ſoon ceaſe if it were not cheriſhed and maintained by our moſt excellent conſtitution; a conſtitution in which liberty and order are ſo happily blended, that every ſubject equally enjoys their influence, and feels his perſon, his induſtry and property, equally and effectualy protected by it.

" Its preſervation therefore muſt ever be the great object of their care; and there is no principle on which it is founded ſo eſſential to its preſervation, nor more juſtly dear to their patriotic and loyal feelings, than that which has ſettled the throne of theſe realms on his majeſty's illuſtrious houſe: on it, and on the proviſions for ſecuring a proteſtant parliament, depends the proteſtant aſcendency, and with it the continuance of the many bleſſings we now enjoy.

" The bills which I hold contain the uſual grants, and I have the moſt ſincere happineſs in preſenting them to your excellency, whoſe knowledge of the true intereſts of Ireland, and whoſe anxiety to promote its welfare, has been proved to us by the firmeſt vigilance and prudence of your adminiſtration.

" Theſe ſupplies are contained in the bills which I have the honour of preſenting to your excellency for the royal aſſent."

Previous to this, Mr. Cuff ſtated in the houſe of commons, that a member, in conſequence of ſome words uſed by him in the courſe of debate, had been treated by a perſon out of doors in a manner highly derogatory to the privileges of that houſe. He then read ſome letters which had been addreſſed by Mr. James Napper Tandy (through the medium of col. Smith)

Smith) to Mr. ſolicitor general Toler, on account of certain alledged aſperities uſed by him toward Mr. Tandy's name in the courſe of the preceding Monday night's debate; which letter went to demand an explanation of ſuch language, whether or not meant as a perſonal offence. An explanation was refuſed.

Mr. Cuff having ſtated theſe circumſtances, it was ordered, that Meſſieurs Tandy and Smith ſhould be taken into the cuſtody of the ſerjeant at arms, and brought to the bar of the houſe.

The ſerjeant at arms being called, informed the houſe, that he had diſpatched three of the meſſengers attending this houſe to execute the order for taking into his cuſtody James Napper Tandy, one of whom being brought to the bar, informed the houſe, that he went to the houſe of James Napper Tandy in Chancery-lane, where he arreſted the ſaid Tandy, and ſhewed him the warrant and his authority; that the ſaid Tandy went into a parlour, as if for his hat, but ſhut the door, and made his eſcape, as he ſuppoſes, through a window.

Reſolved, nem. con. that James Napper Tandy having been arreſted by a warrant of Mr. Speaker, iſſued by the order of the houſe, and having made his eſcape from the officer who arreſted him, has been guilty of a groſs violation of the privileges of this houſe.

Reſolved, nem. con. that an humble addreſs be preſented to his excellency the lord lieutenant, that he will be graciouſly pleaſed to direct that a proclamation may iſſue for apprehending James Napper Tandy, with a promiſe of reward for the ſame.

Reſolved, nem. con. that James Napper Tandy, having preſumed to demand an explanation from John Toler, eſq. his majeſty's ſolicitor general, a member of this houſe, of words by him ſpoken in debate in this houſe, and thereby having attempted to violate the freedom of debate in this houſe, is guilty of a high breach of the privileges of this houſe.

Ordered, That his majeſty's attorney general do proſecute the ſaid James Napper Tandy for his ſaid offence.

The next day, Colonel Smith, of the independent Dublin volunteers, the gentleman who carried the intemperate meſſage from Mr. Tandy to the ſolicitor general, ſurrendered himſelf to the ſerjeant at arms, made the amende honourable at the bar of the houſe of commons on Thurſday laſt, and was diſcharged, after a gentle reprimand from the ſpeaker.

After this, a proclamation by his excellency the lord lieutenant was poſted up in ſeveral parts of the city, offering a reward of 50l. for apprehending James Napper Tandy.

On Monday April 16th, Mr. James Napper Tandy was arreſted by virtue of a proclamation from the privy council, and carried before the lord mayor of Dublin, and ſeveral aldermen. On his being taken, he denied the authority of the proclamation, and when he appeared before the magiſtrates, they expreſſed a wiſh to have nothing to do in the buſineſs; the perſon who apprehended him replied, that it was ſufficient for him that he had done his duty in producing the priſoner; he ſhould concern himſelf no further in the affair, but ſimply apply for the offered reward. On the recorder's being conſulted, Tandy was informed, that he was no longer a priſoner: he then wiſhed to give in his examination againſt the perſon who took him, charging him with an aſſault, and having held him in falſe impriſonment; this was refuſed on the part of ſeveral aldermen, but at length it was taken by one of them. On Wedneſday, however, he was again apprehended by an order from the houſe of commons, and being brought to their bar, and refuſing to anſwer the ſpeaker's interrogatories, was from thence committed to Newgate; from whence, however, he was liberated the ſame night, in conſequence of the prorogation of parliament.

On an addreſs received at Dublin by the ſociety of united Iriſhmen, from Napper Tandy, eſq. who is a member of that ſociety, ſtating the late proceedings againſt him as the cauſe of his abſence, the following reſolutions were inſtantly propoſed, and unanimouſly carried, viz. "That the power aſſumed by the houſe of commons to order the ſerjeant at arms to take into cuſtody a ſubject of this realm, not a member of that houſe, upon a complaint made by one of its members of a breach of privilege, without ſummoning the party complained of, to anſwer the complaint, is unwarranted by the laws of the land." 2. "That the proclamation iſſued in this caſe is not warranted by law." 3. "That the liberty of the ſubject is violated in the perſon of Mr. Tandy; that his cauſe muſt now be conſidered as that of the public, and brought forward to receive a judicial deciſion." 4. "That a committee of ſecrecy be appointed, to carry the laſt-mentioned reſolution into effect, and empowered to draw upon the treaſurer for ſuch ſums as it may require for that purpoſe."

This gentleman having been tried in June, before the court of king's bench, was acquitted, as the jury were of opinion that the letters to Mr. Toler did not amount to a challenge.

In July, a court-martial, compoſed of the field officers of the ſeveral corps of volunteers in Dublin, was held in Taylor's-hall, Back-lane, of that city, at the requeſt of colonel Tandy, to conſider of his late affair with Mr. Toler. After a long inveſtigation, the court-martial reported, "That colonel Tandy had, in every particular, after his taking up the affair, acted with the ſpirit becoming a gentleman and a volunteer; but that his entering into the affair was imprudent and unadviſed." Captain Edwards and major Aſhemurſt waited on lord Charlemont with the report, to which his lordſhip expreſſed his entire approbation.

One Knight, who apprehended James Napper Tandy, eſq. by virtue of the lord lieutenant's proclamation, having applied lately for the reward, was refuſed. He was afterwards tried before the recorder, for the aſſault on Mr. Tandy; when he threw himſelf on the mercy of the court; and Mr. Tandy and his counſel recommending a lenient puniſhment, he was fined ſix-pence, and ordered to be impriſoned three days.

The reſolutions of the grand juries in Ireland, againſt the meaſures now taken by the grand committee of Roman catholics, ſo provoked and irritated the latter, government were at a loſs what meaſures to purſue. The latter was ſo miſerably ſupported, that in the metropolis they had ſcarcely intereſt ſufficient to have the catholics oppoſed by the corporation of Dublin.

The great record-room in the parliament-houſe was fitted up as a temporary houſe of commons. It received, ſince the cloſe of the laſt ſeſſion, various alterations, in order to adapt it the better to the accommodation of the members. Theſe rendered it ſo convenient, as to make the delay in re-building and finiſhing the houſe of commons of much leſs moment.

About the latter end of this year, alarming and deſperate riots took place in ſeveral parts of Ireland. The dearneſs of proviſions, and the large quantities of grain exported, cauſed various mobs to aſſemble, for the purpoſe of preventing a further exportation of the wheat and flour.

On the 10th of January, 1793, his excellency the lord lieutenant went in ſtate to the houſe of peers, and opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne.

The riots in ſeveral parts of Ireland became now truly alarming. A number of low peaſants, who called themſelves defenders, roſe up againſt the military; ſome of the former, in this unequal conflict, loſt their lives, and others were committed to priſon; but this, inſtead of quelling, increaſed the tumult, for now upwards of one thouſand of their friends formed into a body, and, with five pieces of artillery, proceeded towards Dublin, to releaſe their comrades in the gaol of Kilmainham. An expreſs having been ſent to government, the military of courſe was ordered out to ſuppreſs the inſurgents. As they belonged to the loweſt order of the community, and were totally unacquainted with the uſe of artillery, the moſt melancholy apprehenſions were entertained that in the conflict many lives would be loſt. Theſe diſturbances cauſed the moſt lively emotions in the ſenate, which thereupon voted an addreſs to the lord lieutenant, that with their lives and fortunes they would ſupport government in the preſent trying and alarming criſis.

About the latter end of this month, the following remarkable circumſtance took place in Dublin. Early in the forenoon of a Sunday, a ſtrong detachment from the barrack marched into the little barrack-yard in the lower caſtle, where they remained under arms; at the ſame time a piquet of fifty alſo from the barrack took poſt on the glacis oppoſite the treaſury-terrace, where they plied their firelocks; this force was further ſtrengthened by a detachment of the artillery in the ordnance-yard, where two field pieces were drawn out of the arſenal. A city magiſtrate, attended by the police high conſtable, then proceeded to the parade of the liberty artillery, and goldſmith's volunteer corps—in St. Michael, Uppoles, Ship-ſtreet, where the magiſtrate in a friendly tone informed the volunteers on parade, about thirty in number, that they muſt not march in military array through the ſtreets, it being againſt the ſenſe and tenor of a government proclamation; and that, if they perſiſted ſo to do, their officers would be taken into cuſtody, and brought before the lord chief juſtice. The officers preſent ſaid, he might then apprehend them if he choſe. On this the magiſtrate withdrew; and after a long debate among the volunteers, it was determined they ſhould then diſperſe, which they accordingly did. Soon after, in conſequence of the above matter, a meeting of the deputies of the Dublin volunteer corps, ſtill embodied, took place at the royal exchange, when certain reſolutions were agreed to, and carried to the earl of Charlemont, commander in chief of the volunteers in Ireland, for his ſanction and approbation. As the matter was a new and very grave one, his lordſhip requeſted time to conſider it.

About the middle of the ſucceeding month, as a party of the Dublin rangers, volunteer corps, were paſſing through Capel-ſtreet, under arms, they were accoſted by the high conſtable of the Dublin police, attended by one of the inſpectors, who, ſeizing one of them, attempted to apprehend him; this was reſented by one of the volunteer's comrades by a ſtroke with the butt-end of his firelock. The volunteers then proceeded to a tea-houſe at Drumcondra, where they had agreed to breakfaſt. In the mean time the police-officer went to the caſtle, where a ſtrong guard from the piquet barrack, in the lower yard, and the horſe troop, was immediately turned out, and a magiſtrate having been procured to head them, they proceeded to reſent the outrage committed on the peace-officer; for which purpoſe they marched to Drumcondra, paſſing the houſe where the volunteers were at breakfaſt: theſe laſt, prudently availing themſelves of the inattention of the military, marched quietly back to town and diſperſed. Thus ended an affair that for three hours filled Dublin with inexpreſſible anxiety.

The infatuated banditti, ſtyled defenders, ſtill continued their predatory incurſions, notwithſtanding the checks they received. Their numbers and reſources were magnified in many reſpects: that of their poſſeſſing cannon proved to have no foundation; three or four pieces of ordnance, it is true, were dug up near the ſea-ſhore; but they were neither the property of, nor intended for, the defenders, but the guns of ſmuggling cutters, which the crews of theſe veſſels are in the practice of thus concealing from the revenue officers, until they are on the point of ſailing. The defenders, however, (as they called themſelves) ſtill continued to ſpread terror and conſternation throughout the kingdom.

On the 16th of Auguſt the lord lieutenant having deſired the attendance of the commons, the royal aſſent was given to twenty-nine public and ſix private bills; when his excellency was pleaſed to conclude the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"The wiſdom and firmneſs that have diſtinguiſhed your conduct during the preſent ſeſſion, and the attention you have afforded to the many important objects of your deliberations, demand my ſincere acknowledgments, and enable me to relieve you from further attendance in parliament.

"Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I have his majeſty's command to thank you for the liberal ſupplies you have voted for the public ſervice, and for the honourable ſupport of his majeſty's government. You may rely upon their faithful application.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"The wiſdom and liberality with which you attended to his recommendation in favour of his Roman catholic ſubjects, are highly pleaſing to the king. You muſt be fully ſenſible of his majeſty's gracious condeſcenſion in committing to your judgment the application of the hereditary revenue. And I am ordered by his majeſty to ſignify his approbation of the proviſions which have been made for the ſupport of his civil government, and the honour and dignity of his crown; and to expreſs his confidence that your liberal conceſſions to the Roman catholics, and the meaſures for the regulation of the public expenditure, and for the limitation of offices and penſions, to which his majeſty has been graciouſly pleaſed to conſent, with a view to the advantage of the public, will cement a general union of ſentiment among all claſſes of his majeſty's ſubjects in ſupport of the eſtabliſhed conſtitution. His majeſty has ſeen with real ſatisfaction, that friendly diſpoſition which has been manifeſted by the parliaments of Great Britain and Ireland, for ſtrengthening the connexion of the two kingdoms by mutual acts of conceſſion. I am authorized to acquaint you, that an act has paſſed the Britiſh parliament, to permit goods of Aſia, Africa, or America, legally imported into Ireland, to be imported from thence into Great Britain. This is a ſignal proof of her attention to your intereſts—whilſt the confirmation of the charter of the Eaſt India company, by the parliament of Ireland, diſplays on your part a cordial zeal for the ſupport of Great Britain, and a judicious conſideration of the great and eſſential intereſts of the empire. I am to make my acknowledgments for the many ſalutary laws you have enacted to ſtrengthen the executive government, which will materially tend to defeat the deſigns of the enemies to the freedom and happineſs of this kingdom. The apprehenſions of embarraſſment, which for a time hung over commercial tranſactions, were to me a ſubject of the utmoſt anxiety: and I am to return you my thanks for ſanctioning thoſe meaſures which I took in ſupport of credit, and which I truſt have had the happieſt effect in preventing the ill conſequences of ſuch apprehenſions. The ſpirit of diſcontent, which prevailed amongſt the lower claſſes of the people at the beginning of the ſeſſion, has burſt into acts of riot and inſurrection: and I have been under the painful neceſſity of employing his majeſty's forces, whoſe ſteadineſs and good conduct have on all occaſions been manifeſted, and by whoſe exertions the civil magiſtrates have been enabled, in a great meaſure, to reſtore the general tranquillity. Under all the circumſtances of the country, I thought it proper to call forth a very conſiderable portion of the militia of this kingdom. I am to expreſs his majeſty's approbation of a meaſure which affords at preſent material aſſiſtance, and lays the foundation of a permanent conſtitutional force, that has been found by experience, in Great Britain, a great reſource in public emergencies. His majeſty feels, with the greateſt concern, the expence brought upon his people by domeſtic diſturbance, added to the conſequence of a foreign war, into which we have been forced by the wanton and unprovoked aggreſſion of France; but you will reflect that you are contending for the preſervation of your property, and for the ſecurity of your happy conſtitution. The ſucceſſes, with which it hath pleaſed the Divine Providence to bleſs the arms of his majeſty and his allies, afford the beſt proſpect of a happy iſſue to this important conteſt; and it is his majeſty's earneſt hope, that a continuance of vigorous exertions will finally obtain a ſecure and laſting peace. I have entire confidence, that in your reſpective counties you will exert your utmoſt influence in maintaining the public tranquillity, and in carrying the laws into full execution. You may be aſſured, that I ſhall, on all occaſions, take the moſt ſpeedy and effectual meaſures, in the exerciſe of thoſe powers with which I am inveſted, for the repreſſion of outrage and tumult, and the protection of his majeſty's faithful and loyal ſubjects."

On the 21ſt of January, the parliament met, and his excellency was pleaſed to make the following ſpeech to both houſes:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I have his majeſty's commands to meet you in parliament. You muſt have felt, with the higheſt ſatisfaction, that, by the ſucceſs of his majſty's arms, and thoſe of his allies, the hopes of France, in their unprovoked declaration of war, to impair the ſtability, or ſhake the conſtitution of Great Britain and Ireland, have been utterly diſappointed.

"The forces of his majeſty and his allies are in poſſeſſion of many important fortreſſes which belonged to the French, and many of their oppreſſive and unjuſt conqueſts have been wreſted from them; and, whilſt the trade of the empire has been generally protected, the reſources which our enemies derived from their wealthy ſettlements and extenſive commerce have been almoſt entirely cut off.

"I have the ſatisfaction to acquaint you, that the ſpirit of inſurrection, which was for ſome time prevalent among the lower orders of people, is in general ſuppreſſed. No exertion ſhall be wanting, on my part, to bring them to a due ſenſe of order and ſubordination, and to prevent and puniſh the machinations of thoſe who may aim to ſeduce them from their accuſtomed loyalty into acts of ſedition and outrage.

"The law for rendering a militia in this kingdom effectual, has been carried ſucceſsfully into execution. I am happy to find that the people are at length fully reconciled to this inſtitution, which has already been attended by the moſt beneficial conſequences, in producing internal tranquillity, and contributing to the general ſtrength and forces of the empire.

"I am commanded to acquaint you, that his majeſty has appointed a commiſſion under the great ſeal, to execute the office of lord high treaſurer of this kingdom, in order that the payment of the civil liſt granted to his majeſty, and a regular appropriation of the revenue to diſtinct ſervices, may be carried into execution in a manner as conformable to the practice of Great Britain, as the relative ſituation of the kingdom will permit.

"Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I have ordered the national accounts to be laid before you, as well as eſtimates for the ſervice of the enſuing year. It is painful to me to obſerve, that the exigencies of the times will require a large ſupply and additional reſources; but when you conſider that this is a war of abſolute neceſſity, and that you are contending for your liberty, property, and religion, I doubt not that you will cheerfully contribute to ſupport the honour of his majeſty's crown, and the eſſential intereſts of the kingdom.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"The agriculture, the manufactures, and particularly the linen manufacture of Ireland, the Proteſtant charter ſchools, and various other inſtitutions of public utility, have ſo conſtantly received the benefit of your care and liberality, that I need not, particularly, at this time, inculcate their importance.

"His majeſty has the fulleſt reliance upon the loyalty and attachment of his people of Ireland. You are now, by the unjuſt aggreſſion of France, involved in a conteſt for your religion, for your conſtitution, and for the preſervation of every principle which upholds ſocial order, or gives ſecurity to your perſons or properties. In ſuch a cauſe, his majeſty has no doubt of being cordially ſupported, by the efforts of all his ſubjects, in reſiſting the deſperate deſigns of men, who are endeavouring to erect their own power and dominion on the ruins of law and order, and to involve every government of Europe in a general ſcene of confuſion and anarchy.

"His majeſty's object is peace; and he will exert himſelf, in conjunction with his allies, whenever an occaſion ſhall preſent itſelf, for obtaining this deſirable end, without ſurrendering the honour of his crown, or ſacrificing the preſent or future ſecurity of his people and of the reſt of Europe.

"You may depend upon my faithful repreſentations of your ſervices to his majeſty; and I will zealouſly co-operate with your exertions for the welfare and proſperity of Ireland."

A melancholy affair happened about the beginning of February: the hon. Richard Power, L. L. D. ſecond baron of his majeſty's court of exchequer, in Ireland, was drowned near the pigeon-houſe, Dublin. The jury ſat upon the body, and returned a verdict, Accidental Death. The baron's property in the Engliſh funds was eſtimated at upwards of 60,000l. The baron was uſher and accountant general of the court of chancery; by virtue of the latter office, all monies pending on ſuits in that court were lodged with him. A cauſe, we believe, of the Chandos family, having been twenty years in that court, lately came to a deciſion, and by virtue of a law, the claimant of the property demanded the intereſt which accrued upon the principal; this the baron refuſed, alledging that the principal only was adjudged; the party complained to the chancellor, and his lordſhip ordered the baron to appear perſonally in court to anſwer the complaint. This the baron's pride revolted at, having been a judge of many years ſtanding, even when the chancellor was a barriſter; but he was ready to account to the claimant, under his lordſhip's decree. The chancellor was inflexible, and allowed him five days to appear. On the third, the baron, after making his will, and leaving his papers in a regular manner, put a period to his exiſtence, by drowning himſelf at the above place.

On the 4th of March, the right hon. W. B. Ponſonby introduced his promiſed bill on the ſubject of a parliamentary reform in the Iriſh commons, on which a debate took place. At twelve the houſe divided on the motion of ſir Hercules Langriſhe, that the bill be read the ſecond time the 1ſt of Auguſt—Ayes 142—Noes 44—Majority againſt the bill 98.

Affairs now remained in the ſame way, and on the 25th of March his excellency put an end to the ſeſſion.

On the 28th of May came on in the court of king's-bench, the trial of John Rhab, printer of a newſpaper called the Northern Star, and twelve proprietors of the ſame, for publiſhing a libel, under the form of an addreſs to the people, from a ſociety ſtyling themſelves the jacobins of Belfaſt; in which it is aſſerted, that there is no national government in this kingdom, and ſeveral other matters, with intent to excite ſedition and tumult.

The attorney-general called witneſſes to prove the publication and the proprietary of the paper.

Mr. Curran, counſel for the defendants, ſubmitted to the court, that the proprietors came not within the ſcope of the information, being reſponſible only in civil and not in criminal caſes.

The earl of Clonmell was clearly of the ſame opinion; and, as the law in this caſe was on a criminal ſtatute, ſaid, he thought it his duty to continue it ſtrictly, eſpecially as that part which was mandatory on the printers and proprietors of newſpapers to ſwear to certain facts, and regiſter the affidavits, to ſtand in future as records of evidence againſt themſelves, was contrary to common law, which ſays, "No man ſhall be obliged to give evidence to his own crimination." His lordſhip, therefore, charged the jury to acquit the proprietors, as no evidence whatever of publication appeared againſt them. In the caſe of the king againſt Topham, reported in 4 Durnford and Eaſt, and cited by the attorney-general, his lordſhip obſerved, that there it appeared the proprietor had taken a very active part in the publication. The jury accordingly acquitted the twelve proprietors; but found the printer guilty.

The ſociety of united Iriſhmen becoming now very formidable, one evening in this month, alderman Warren, chief commiſſioner of the police, aſſiſted by the high ſheriffs, and Mr. Carleton, high conſtable, and a number of peace officers, repaired to the Taylors-hall, in Back-lane, and having diſperſed them, ſeized the books of their proceedings, and a number of printed papers addreſſed from the ſociety to the people of Ireland.

On the 1ſt of July, the Rev. William Jackſon was arraigned for high treaſon, and brought to the court of king's-bench. The charge ſtated, that he had come to Ireland with a treaſonous intent of learning the ſtate of the country, in order to communicate the ſame to France; that he conferred with perſons to induce them to conſpire againſt his majeſty's government, and that he promoted the ſending a meſſenger to France, in order to treat with them on the ſubject of invading Ireland. The priſoner pleaded Not Guilty.

Mr. Curran, his counſel, applied to the court for a further time, that might enable his client to obtain neceſſary evidence for his defence. A reaſonable time was granted, and the trial poſtponed until the 6th of November, as conſented to by the attorney general. It was afterwards poſtponed till the firſt Monday in the next term.

A further prorogation of parliament until the 2d of October took place. At this time a new arrangement for Ireland was in agitation, which was finally adjuſted towards the latter end of the year, and on the 10th of December earl Fitzwilliam was appointed lord lieutenant of Ireland; who, on the 22d of January, 1795, came in the uſual ſtate to the houſe of peers, and opened the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech from the throne:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"In obedience to his majeſty's commands, I reſort to your councils at a period, which, in a peculiar manner calls for the wiſdom and energy of parliament.

"His majeſty's determination is fixed, as long as he is ſupported by his faithful ſubjects. He never will be wanting to them, or to himſelf. His majeſty has no intereſt but that of his people—no views but for their happineſs—no object but their general ſafety.

"The uniform tenor of your conduct has demonſtrated, that you will not only be deſirous, but zealous to ſecond and emulate the magnanimity of a ſovereign, formed to lead a nation that has ever been as firm to aſſert its liberties, as affectionately devoted to a government, which maintains its own authority, for the ſole purpoſe of ſupporting thoſe liberties. As you are thus cordially attached to that ſovereign, and to the conſtitution, which it is his glory to protect, I have to announce to you, with true ſatisfaction, what you will hear with equal pleaſure, the intended marriage of his royal highneſs the prince of Wales with the princeſs Caroline Amelia Elizabeth, daughter of his moſt illuſtrious highneſs the duke of Brunſwick and Lunenburgh, a princeſs of that illuſtrious houſe, to whoſe mild and conſtitutional ſway theſe kingdoms are highly indebted for the bleſſings they enjoy. This marriage promiſes the perpetuation of the ſame bleſſings under the ſame houſe.

"I have it alſo in command to inform you, that his majeſty has concluded a treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, with the United States of America, in which it has been his majeſty's object to remove, as far as poſſible, all grounds of jealouſy and miſunderſtanding, and to improve an intercourſe beneficial to both ſtates. As ſoon as the ratification of this treaty ſhall have been exchanged, and I ſhall have received a copy of it, I will direct it to be laid before you, in order that you may conſider if it will be neceſſary to make any proviſions for carrying into effect a treaty, in which the commerce of this kingdom is ſo materially and extenſively intereſted.

"Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I have directed the eſtimates for the public ſervice, and the ſtate of the public accounts, to be laid before you.

"His majeſty has that aſſured confidence, grounded on a long and uniform experience of your loyalty, and your zeal for his ſervice, and the good of your country, that I think it unneceſſary to preſs you, in any particular manner, to make a proviſion adequate to the preſent awful ſituation of affairs.

"It is with pleaſure I acquaint you, that the proviſion will, in ſome degree, be facilitated by the circumſtance, that, during the exiſtence of ſuch a war as the preſent, the public revenue, together with the commerce of the kingdom, has kept up, and has been even augmented: advantages which are due to the care and vigilance of our ſovereign, in the general protection provided by him for all his ſubjects.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I earneſtly recommend to you a continuance of the laudable pains you have conſtantly taken to cultivate all your domeſtic advantages in commerce, in manufacture, and in ſuch public works as have appeared directed to promote thoſe important objects. Theſe are the true foundations of all public revenue and public ſtrength. Your endeavours have had their fruit. The great ſtaple manufacture of this kingdom has increaſed beyond the moſt ſanguine expectations; an advantage principally owing to the conſtant ſuperintendance and wiſe proviſions of the parliament of Ireland; and next to thoſe, to the aſſured liberal and moſt merited encouragement which it receives in the rich and extenſive market of Great Britain; a circumſtance tending to cement the union, and to perfect the harmony which happily ſubſiſts, and I truſt will ſubſiſt for ever, between the two kingdoms.

"Attached as you are to the general cauſe of religion, learning, and civilization, I have to recommend to your conſideration the ſtate of education in this kingdom, which, in ſome parts, will admit of improvement; in others, may require ſome new arrangement.

rangement. Conſiderable advantages have been already derived, under the wiſe regulations of parliament, from the Proteſtant charter ſchools; and theſe will, as uſual, claim your attention: but, as theſe advantages have been but partial, and as circumſtances have made other conſiderations, connected with this important ſubject, highly neceſſary, it is hoped that your wiſdom will order every thing relating to it in the manner moſt beneficial, and the beſt adapted to the occaſions of the ſeveral deſcriptions of men which compoſe his majeſty's faithful ſubjects in Ireland.

"We are engaged in an arduous conteſt. The time calls not only for great fortitude, and an unuſual ſhare of public ſpirit, but for much conſtancy and perſeverance. You are engaged with a power which, under the antient forms of its internal arrangement, was always highly formidable to the neighbouring nations. Lately, this power has aſſumed a new ſhape, but with the ſame ambition, with much more extenſive and ſyſtematic deſigns, far more effective, and, without compariſon, more dreadful in the certain conſequences of its eventual ſucceſs; it threatens nothing leſs than the entire ſubverſion of the liberty and independence of every ſtate in Europe. An enemy to them all, it is actuated with a peculiar animoſity againſt theſe kingdoms, not only as the natural protection of the balance of power in Europe, but alſo becauſe, by the poſſeſſion of a legal, humane and rational freedom, we ſeem to reproach that falſe and ſpurious liberty, which, in reality, is an ignominious ſervitude, tending to extinguiſh all good arts, to generate nothing but impiety, crime, diſorder, and ferocious manners, and to end in wretchedneſs and general deſolation.

"To guard his people from the enterprizes of this dangerous and malignant power, and for the protection of all civilized ſociety againſt the inroad of anarchy, his majeſty has availed himſelf of every rational aid, foreign and domeſtic.—He has called upon the ſkill, courage, and experience of all his ſubjects, whereſoever diſperſed, and you muſt be duly ſenſible, in ſuch a criſis as the preſent, which rarely occurs in the courſe of human affairs, of the advantage of his majeſty's thus endeavouring to profit of the united ſtrength and zeal of every deſcription of his ſubjects.

"I have to aſſure you of his majeſty's moſt cheerful concurrence in every meaſure which your wiſdom and comprehenſive patriotiſm ſhall point out for this ſalutary purpoſe.

"On my part, you ſhall find me, from principal and from inclination, thoroughly diſpoſed to concur with his majeſty's paternal wiſhes, and with the wiſe meaſures of his parliament. On a cordial affection to the whole of Ireland, and on a conduct ſuitable to that ſentiment, I wiſh to found my own perſonal eſtimation, and my reputation, in the execution of the great truſt committed, by the moſt beneficent of ſovereigns, to my care."

After his excellency had retired, an addreſs to his majeſty, expreſſive of their determination to ſupport his majeſty in the proſecution of the preſent war, in which Great Britain is engaged with France, was moved and carried.

As was alſo an addreſs to his excellency the lord lieutenant, for his excellent ſpeech from the throne.

Mr. Grattan now preſented a petition from the Roman Catholics of Dublin, the object of which was the total repeal of the penal code—it was ordered to lie on the table. Afterwards he preſented a petition from the Roman Catholics of Limeric, which was of a ſimilar tendency: alſo from the Roman Catholics of the following places: city of Kilkenny, town of Newry, city and county of Waterford, town and county of Roſcommon, county of Leitrim, town of Caſtlebar, Queen's county, town and county of Sligo, county of Mayo, town of Navan, town and county of Galway. All of them were received, read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Other petitions were likewiſe preſented of the ſame nature. In conſequence of theſe, Mr. Grattan brought in a bill on the 10th of February for the relief of his majeſty's Roman Catholic ſubjects. A violent debate took place, though there were only three opponents, viz. Mr. Ogle, col. Blaquierre, and Dr. Duignan—the queſtion being put, it paſſed, and leave was given to bring in the bill.

Unfortunate diſſentions now took place, and his excellency determined on reſigning, which occaſioned much conſternation in the houſe.

His excellency's reſignation being now determined, ſeveral ſocieties, eſpecially of the Roman Catholics, were zealous in paying their farewell animated tributes of gratitude and love. Earl Camden was appointed to ſupply his place: he arrived at Dublin March 31ſt, earl Fitzwilliam having departed the 25th, when he was received by the lord mayor, aldermen, ſheriffs, &c. and having taken the oaths in due form, was complimented by the nobility on his ſafe arrival.

The diſſatisfaction of the people did not as yet ſubſide; for immediately after as the lord chancellor was paſſing in the evening between ſeven and eight in his carriage through Dame-ſtreet, on his return from the Caſtle to Ely-place, a band of ruffians, who had been lying in wait at the end of George's-ſtreet, aſſaulted his lordſhip with a ſhower of ſtones, one of which unfortunately ſtruck him on the head, and wounded him over the left eye. His lordſhip ordered his carriage to ſtop; but the ruffians inſtantly diſappeared. He then proceeded to his houſe, followed by a number of the moſt reſpectable citizens. The feelings excited in every loyal breaſt, by the account of ſo baſe an attempt, was afterwards alleviated by the pleaſing intelligence of his lordſhip having received but a very ſlight wound.

Alderman James, a ſhort time after the attack had been made on the lord chancellor, ſeized one of the mob in College-green, who had a large ſtone concealed under his coat: he was immediately committed to priſon; and the tumults were at length quelled.

April 23d, after a trial which laſted from ten o'clock the preceding day till five this morning, the Rev. Wm. Jackſon was found guilty of high treaſon in the court of King's-bench.

Mr. Cockayne, attorney at law, of Lion's-inn, London, was the principal evidence againſt Jackſon. They had lived in habits of intimacy together for many years. Jackſon's letters when in France and elſewhere, paſſed through Cockayne's hands. Cockayne finding his own ſafety endangered, made terms with Mr. Pitt both for indemnification and reward: he continued a ſpy on Jackſon's actions, and ultimately eſtabliſhed his guilt. Jackſon's object was to obtain proviſions for the French from Ireland, and to corrupt the minds of the people of that country to invite an invaſion.

On the 30th, about 11 o'clock, he was brought up to the court of King's-bench, where an arreſt of judgment was to have been pleaded by his counſel; but ſcarcely had they begun in his behalf, when Mr. Jackſon, who was in the dock, was ſeized with violent emotions, and ſhortly afterwards dropped down and expired. It was imagined he took poiſon in the morning before he came into court.

Having now brought down the Iriſh Hiſtory, according to promiſe, to the preſent time, we ſhall conclude with our wiſhes, that all things may be adjuſted to the ſatisfaction of the ſiſter kingdoms, and that Ireland, content with the claims of juſtice, may ever remain happy under the protection of Great Britain.

ADDENDA TO THE HISTORY of ENGLAND.

IN the begining of the year 1795, Mr. Sheridan made a motion in the houſe of commons to repeal the act for ſuſpending the habeas corpus act, which after much debate was rejected by 185 to 41.

Several petitions for peace were preſented, but without effect.

Jan. 29, the bill for continuing the ſuſpenſion of the habeas corpus act paſſed the houſe of commons, there being, on a diviſion, 62 to 4; and, the ſame day, it was ſent to the lords, where, February 3, the earl of Lauderdale moved, as an amendment, that the words “ firſt of July” ſhould be inſerted inſtead of the laſt day of the preſent ſeſſion of parliament, which in the bill was the time fixed for the ſuſpenſion to expire. This amendment was put and carried, and the bill paſſed without a diviſion.

The next day, the following proteſt againſt the bill was entered on the journals:

Diſſentient, Die Mercurii 4 Feb. 1795.

I. Becauſe whatever pretence there may have exiſted in the laſt ſeſſion of parliament for ſuſpending the habeas corpus act, that pretence is now removed; the partial ex parte examination of the committees of parliament having been refuted by the verdicts of juries, who, with labour unexampled in the legal annals in this country, after duly weighing the evidence on both ſides, acquitted the perſons indicted for a treaſonable conſpiracy.

II Becauſe intentions hoſtile to the conſtitution being entertained by perſons, few in number, and devoid of weight and conſequence in the country, do not juſtify the depriving all the people of Great Britain of that ſecurity which our laws ſo anxiouſly provide for perſonal liberty.

III. Becauſe we find, that as ſoon as theſe plots and conſpiracies (which have heretofore cauſed the ſuſpenſion of the people's right to their habeas corpus) had been dealt with according to law, and that the conſpirators had been convicted and puniſhed, the danger being over, the ſuſpenſion had dropt. In the ſame manner, when the proved innocence of the accuſed have negatived the ſuppoſed conſpiracy, and when it is not even pretended that any new or other plot exiſts, to continue to ſuſpend this great and eſſential ſafegard of our freedom, is equally contrary to the example ſet us by our anceſtors, and inconſiſtent with that protection which, as legiſlators, we are bound to afford to the perſonal ſecurity of all our fellow-ſubjects.

IV. Becauſe we conſider that the national ſpirit of Engliſh freedom, to which was owing the high place that we once held amid ſurrounding nations, is either checked or deadened by cauſeleſs acts of deſpotiſm; or that the diſguſt neceſſarily generated by ſuch a conduct is likely (if any thing can produce ſuch an effect upon this free and enlightened nation) to raiſe a ſpirit of diſaffection even to the conſtitution itſelf.

V. Becauſe when we trace the hiſtory of the habeas corpus act, we find, among other ſecurities from oppreſſion, it was chiefly meant to enſure to the ſubject a ſpeedy trial, when accuſed of treaſon, or treaſonable practices, and to avert the tyranny of tedious impriſonment for thoſe crimes. We conceive, therefore, that if the legiſlature is, upon all occaſions of ſuſpicion of traiterous acts, to ſuſpend the operation of that moſt important and invaluable ſtatute, ſecurity to the ſubject muſt be removed at the very criſis, and in the very caſe when it was meant by the wiſe and enlightened framers of that law moſt to ſhield and protect him.

(Signed) GUILFORD,
NORFOLK, E. M.
BEDFORD,
LAUDERDALE.

The ſame day, in the houſe of commons, the chancellor of the exchequer brought down his majeſty's meſſage, relative to the Auſtrian loan, which the ſpeaker communicated to the houſe:

“ G. R.

“ His majeſty thinks it proper to acquaint his houſe of commons, that he has received from the emperor ſtrong aſſurances of a diſpoſition to make the greateſt exertions for the common cauſe in the courſe of the next campaign; but it is repreſented on the part of his imperial majeſty, that theſe efforts cannot be made without the aſſiſtance of a loan, which his imperial majeſty is deſirous of raiſing on the credit of the revenues of his hereditary dominions, under the guaranty of his majeſty with the concurrence of parliament, to the extent of four millions; and it is ſtated that ſuch a loan, in addition to his other reſources, would enable his imperial majeſty to employ againſt the common enemy a force of 200,000 men.

“ His majeſty is of opinion, that on theſe grounds ſuch an arrangement would be beneficial to the common cauſe; but his majeſty thinks that it would be ſtill more advantageous, if by the means of a ſimilar loan to a larger extent, the emperor ſhould be enabled to employ a force ſtill more conſiderable; and his majeſty has directed his miniſter at Vienna to expreſs his majeſty's readineſs to recommend to his parliament an arrangement founded on that principle.

“ Some temporary advance which his majeſty was induced to make for the immediate ſupply of the Auſtrian army, under the preſſure of unforeſeen circumſtances in the latter part of the laſt campaign, will be included in any arrangement of this nature.

“ As ſoon as the negociation is concluded, his majeſty will not fail to communicate the reſult to parliament. But as any meaſure of this ſort is neceſſarily connected with the conſideration of the proviſion to be made for the current year, his majeſty has thought it right not to delay making this communication; and he relies on the zeal and public ſpirit of his faithful commons, for taking ſuch meaſures as, on a full conſideration of all the circumſtances, they may think moſt conducive to the immediate intereſts of this country at the preſent conjuncture, and to the great object of re-eſtabliſhing, on ſecure and honourable grounds, the peace and tranquility of theſe kingdoms, and of Europe.

G. R.”

The chancellor of the exchequer moved that his majeſty's meſſage be taken into conſideration tomorrow.

The next day Mr. Sheridan ſaid, he felt it incumbent on him, previous to the conſideration of the Auſtrian loan, to move, that it be reſolved

“ That it appears to this houſe, that the king of Pruſſia received, from the treaſury of Great Britain, the ſum of 1,200,000l. in conſequence of the ſtipulations of the treaty concluded at the Hague, on the 10th of April, 1794; and that it does not appear to this houſe, that the king of Pruſſia performed the ſtipulations of that treaty.” This motion was ſeconded by Mr. Jekyl: the queſtion, after ſome converſation, was then put on the motion of the chancellor of the exchequer, to paſs to the order of the day—Ayes 128—Noes 33.

His majeſty's ſpeech being then read, Mr. Pitt roſe to move that it be now taken into conſideration, and in a ſpeech of great length, replete with argument, and animated with eloquence, inſiſted on the general policy of the meaſure of ſecuring ſome powerful continental connections, and ſhewed that we could look to none of equal power and means, or with the ſame degree of hope and ſecurity, as to his imperial majeſty; and concluded by moving an addreſs to his majeſty, grounded on the principal topics advanced in the courſe of his ſpeech, and aſſuring his majeſty of the cordial concurrence of the houſe, &c.

Mr. Fox, in a ſpeech of conſiderable length, delivered his ſentiments, which were decidedly againſt the meaſure: The preſent ſubject of diſcuſſion was one of a moſt momentous deſcription, take it in every point of view, and of a much more unfavourable deſcription than that of laſt year, the Pruſſian ſubſidy, inaſmuch as the ſum was much greater, and the ſecurity for the performance of the engagement to be entered into, conſiderably leſs. It was not one of the leaſt material points of the preſent queſtion to conſider the reſources of Auſtria, and its power as well as inclination to perform the ſtipulations of the propoſed contract. In his mind, it was out of that prince's power to do it, much leſs to furniſh another 100,000 men, on the ſum being made up to him ſix millions, as ſuggeſted by the right hon. gentleman. Such a ſuppoſition was chimerical: he was totally unable to do it.

Viewing the ſubject in this light, Mr. Fox ſaid, the propoſed meaſure met his moſt cordial diſapprobation; and concluded by moving an amendment, the effect of which tended to do away the ſpirit and tenor of the addreſs.

Meſſrs. W. Smith and Brandling alſo ſpoke; the former was decidedly againſt the addreſs.

A diviſion then took place, when there appeared in favour of the original addreſs 173; for the amendment 58; majority, 115.

On the 23d the houſe having reſolved itſelf into a committee of ways and means (Mr. Hobart in the chair) Mr. Pitt obſerved, that the ſubject to which he was now about to call the attention of the houſe neceſſarily branched itſelf into a variety of details, which he would endeavour to arrange under different heads, but principally confine himſelf to the immediate ſubject of the day.

Mr. Pitt then proceeded in the uſual manner to ſtate the different expences attending the navy, the whole amount of which formed a ſum of 6,350,000l. and the number of ſeamen to be employed no leſs than 100,000.

The next ſervice of which he eſtimated the charges, was that of our military eſtabliſhment, in which he compriſed the ordinary expences incurred in the plantations, the recruiting the militia, fencibles, &c. and the extraordinaries, which amounted to the ſum of 3,063,968l. 12s. 4d.

The next object of expenditure that came to be conſidered was the ordnance, which, being neceſſarily increaſed in proportion to the other objects, amounted to 2,321,000l. To theſe were added the ſeveral incidental charges for miſcellaneous expences, deficiencies, &c. which, conſidering the preſent preſſure of circumſtances, bore but a ſmall proportion to the increaſe, it being only 247,000l.

After enumerating the totals of the different ſervices of the current year, together with the deficiencies of grants, the proviſions to be made for the payment of Exchequer bills, and the deficiencies of the land and malt taxes, which in the aggregate conſtituted the ſupply, he ſtated it to amount to the ſum of 28,128,000l. To anſwer this expenditure, we were to look to the different ſources of the national revenue; and here Mr. Pitt detained the attention of the committee on the flouriſhing ſtate of all its branches, which he compared and contraſted with the ſtate of former years, and affirmed that it ſtood higher at preſent than at any antecedent period.

He then recapitulated the details of the ways and means, and ſtated the deficit, to meet which a loan was propoſed to the amount of above eight millions, to which there would probably be a neceſſity of making an addition. The conditions of the loan he could not but regard as fair and liberal on all ſides; to prove which he went into a nice minuteneſs of financial detail. The terms were was follow: 100l. in 3 per cents. which made 64l. 15s. 1-3d.—in the 4 per cents. 27l. 15s. 0d.—and in the long annuities, 8l. 1s. 6d.—in all 110l 11s. 6d.

Mr. Pitt next entered on the ſubject of the new taxes, a ſubject which, he confeſſed, gave him much anxiety and concern; but from which he was not a little relieved by the pleaſing conviction they were not calculated to preſs hard on the lower claſſes of the community, as they would principally fall on articles of luxury, and affect but in a very ſmall degree thoſe of eſſential or neceſſary uſe. The firſt article he had in view was that of wine, on which he would propoſe a tax of 20l. per ton, or 6s. per dozen, which, from the beſt calculations, he expected would annually produce about 500,000l.

The next was an additional tax on rum, brandy, and Britiſh ſpirits; viz. 8d. per gallon on rum, 10d. on brandy, and 1d. on Britiſh ſpirits; the produce of which would amount in all to near 259,000l.

An additional tax on licences for ſtills in Scotland would afford 15,000l.

He then adverted to the article of tea, and the various circumſtances which attended that branch of commerce. By a tax of 7l. 10s. per cent. which could not be regarded as a weighty inconvenience, the revenue would be benefited 180,000l.

On the articles of coffee, cocoa, &c. he would impoſe 6d. per cent. additional; which would bring in 40,000l.

The next tax would fall upon inſurances of ſhips, cargoes, and lives; from which would reſult a ſum of 160,000l. On other articles of ſmaller concern, viz. on raiſins, lemons, oranges, ſallad oil, waſte ſilk, coals exported, except to Ireland and our own colonies, rock ſalt, deals and fir timber, a ſmall increaſe of tax would afford 198,000l. He alſo deemed it no hard or unproductive tax to add ſomething to that already impoſed by ſtamp-duties, viz. on affidavits, writs, original agreements, indentures, probate of wills, and which would be found to produce 68,000l.

Mr. Pitt now turned to a ſubject which came particularly home to the members of that houſe, but which he was ſure no motives of perſonal intereſt would induce them to oppoſe: he meant the privilege of franking; a privilege to which, he ſaid, on a variety of accounts they were juſtly entitled. What he intended to propoſe could only tend to correct the abuſes of it, and reſtrain its too extenſive uſe. His regulations went to aſcertain the number of letters received from, or ſent to, the poſt in one day; alſo the number of covers they might contain, and the place of reſidence of the members whoſe ſignature they bore. From theſe regulations it was calculated there would ariſe the ſum of 40,000l.

Another article of a very different deſcription, and which thoſe who were fond of its uſe would not forego for a ſmall conſideration, he deemed a proper article of taxation, and that was hair powder. It was his intention, that all perſons who uſed that article ſhould take out a licence, coſting 1l. 1s. per annum; and, as the number of perſons uſing it were eſtimated at 200,000, it would produce the large ſum of 210,000l. As to men-ſervants, whom he hinted on a former occaſion to be a very fit object of taxation, he had not altogether forgot them; they were known to make no ſmall uſe of the article juſt conſidered, and it was proper their maſters ſhould pay for them, if they wiſhed them to indulge in the oſtentation of dreſs.

Mr. Pitt, having recapitulated the different ſum totals reſulting from theſe different taxes, concluded a long and able ſpeech by a variety of pertinent and forcible remarks on the ſtate and reſources of the country at large, and the neceſſity of proſecuting with ſpirit, vigour, and perſeverance, the preſent juſt and neceſſary war, as the ſole means of procuring that ſolid and ſecure peace which would enable them to enjoy all the bleſſings the nature of the conſtitution and of the country were calculated to afford us.

Mr. Fox obſerved, that in many of the points advanced by the right hon. gentleman he agreed with him, and alſo in many of his financial calculations; but what ſtruck him as moſt objectionable in the ſtatement, was that which related to the loan, particularly when he viewed it as a joint tranſaction with that propoſed to be furniſhed to the emperor.

Some farther explanatory converſation took place; after which the different reſolutions propoſed by the chancellor of the exchequer, and founded on his ſtatements of to-night, were agreed to by the committee, nem. con.

The next day, on motion of the chancellor of the exchequer, the ſum of 200,000l. was voted to his majeſty, to make good his engagements with the king of Sardinia; and the like ſum to the commiſſioners for reducing the national debt.

On the 24th, Mr. Hobart brought up the report of the committee of ſupply and ways and means; and the reſolutions being read a firſt time, Mr. Fox expreſſed a deſire to know the amount at which the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Pitt) ſtated the growing produce of the conſolidated fund for the current year.

Mr. Pitt ſtated it at about 2,235,000l.

On the reſolution reſpecting the limitation of franking, the houſe divided:—for it, 39; againſt it, 9: majority, 40.

A very long converſation enſued, in which Mr. Jolliffe, lord Sheffield, Mr. W. Smith, and others, took a leading part, and oppoſed many clauſes, and propoſed ſome amendments.

Mr. Pitt propoſed that ſingle incloſures only ſhould be exempted.

Mr. Thornton was for double incloſures; on which the houſe again divided:—for the amendment, 7; againſt it, 41; majority, 34.

The reſolutions were then read a ſecond time, and agreed to.

On the 5th of March the royal aſſent was given by commiſſion to the marine and land mutiny bill, county quota bill, and ſome private ones.

On the 16th, the royal aſſent was given by commiſſion to the following bills, viz. the loan, the wine duty, the ſpirits duty, the tea duty, and the ſhip owners bills, together with two or three of a private and inferior nature: alſo, on the 27th, to the amended county quota bill, the national debt bill, the exchequer credit bills, the additional cuſtom duty bill, and the ſallad oil duty bill.

On the third reading of the bill for limiting the privilege of franking, Mr. Dent took the liberty of mentioning that out of the 558 members, there were a few only who abuſed this parliamentary indulgence. For the purpoſe, therefore, of diſcovering thoſe who had been guilty of this abuſe, he moved, "That there be laid before this houſe an account of the number of letters, and the amount of their poſtage, for the laſt two years, directed to and from the different members, diſtinguiſhing the names of each individual.

Mr. Long thought that it would be impoſſible to gratify the hon. member to the full extent of his motion, which was afterwards negatived.

Mr. Dent then moved for an account of the number of letters franked to and from the different clerks of the public offices. The houſe having reſolved itſelf into a committee on this bill, a very irregular converſation took place on the weight to be allowed, whether one or two ounces: after which the houſe divided on the clauſe for limiting it to one ounce—Ayes, 96; Noes, 12; majority, 84.

Mr. Long then moved, "That the number of letters to be received by any one member in a day be fifteen:" Upon which the committee divided: for Mr. Long's motion, 34; againſt it, 31; majority 3.

On the 27th of March, the ſum of 2,500,000l. was granted to his majeſty to defray the neceſſary expences that might occur, or which the exigencies of affairs might require.

On the 30th, the order of the day being moved that the bill for impoſing a tax on perſons wearing hair-powder be read a third time, Mr. Pitt moved certain clauſes for excepting from the operation of this tax clergymen of all deſcriptions whoſe benefice or perſonal property did not exceed 100l. per. ann; alſo ſubalterns of the army and navy; and the corps of yeomanry and cavalry on days of exerciſe, or when called out on actual ſervice; after which the bill was read a third time and paſſed.

On the 6th of April, her royal highneſs the princeſs of Wales elect arrived. The marriage took place on the 9th: the ceremony was performed by the archbiſhop of Canterbury, aſſiſted by the biſhop of London; during the ſolemnization of which, the princeſs was attended by her bride's maids, and the prince by the bachelor dukes. At the concluſion of the ceremony, the royal pair returned to their reſpective ſeats, and their majeſties aſcended an elegant throne erected for the occaſion, on the right hand of the altar, when an anthem was performed; the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and biſhop of London, ſtanding during this time, the former on the right, the latter on the left ſide of the altar.

The evening concluded with very ſplendid illuminations and other public demonſtrations of joy, throughout London and Weſtminſter.

The following addreſſes were preſented to their majeſties, on the 17th, in conſequence of the royal nuptials.

To the king's moſt excellent majeſty.

The humble addreſs of the lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, in common council aſſembled.

Moſt gracious ſovereign,

We, your majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, in common council aſſembled, requeſt permiſſion to approach the throne with our warmeſt congratulations on the auſpicious nuptials of his royal highneſs the prince of Wales, with her ſerene highneſs the princeſs of Brunſwick.

We cannot but feel the moſt lively ſentiments of affection for a princeſs, bleſſed with every endowment to adorn her exalted ſtation; and form the happieſt preſage, that the endearing qualities of her mind will be matured by the benign influence of our moſt gracious queen, whoſe eminent example will be acknowledged and admired, as long as virtue can charm, or tranſcendent worth command imitation and reſpect.

Your majeſty's faithful citizens of London confeſs, with the moſt grateful emotions, the uniform and ſteady regard which your majeſty has evinced for the future intereſt of your people, by this happy alliance of the illuſtrious houſe of Brunſwick, devoted to the proteſtant cauſe, and anxious for the maintenance of thoſe its ſacred pillars—ſocial order and rational freedom.

At the ſame time that we look forward with ſolicitude and delight to the deareſt intereſts of our poſterity, we cannot be unmindful of our own immediate joy upon this feſtive occaſion, becauſe we have happily reſtored to us the fair repreſentative of a princeſs nearly related to your majeſty, and thereby inheriting a claim to that national regard and eſteem, which manifeſted itſelf in regret at the departure of her amiable mother from theſe kingdoms.

Permit us, ſire, earneſtly to hope that your majeſty, under whoſe mild and gracious government we have enjoyed the privileges of our fathers inviolate and ſecure, may have the felicity to ſee their royal highneſſes experience every bleſſing conſequent upon this moſt propitious event, and that your majeſty will believe the warm aſſurances of the citizens of London, uniformly and zealouſly to ſupport your majeſty's perſon, crown, and family, againſt all your enemies.

To the queen's moſt excellent majeſty.

The humble addreſs of the lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, in common council aſſembled.

May it pleaſe your majeſty,

We, his majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, in common council aſſembled, beg leave to congratulate your majeſty on the recent nuptials of his royal highneſs the prince of Wales, with her ſerene highneſs the princeſs of Brunſwick.

We felicitate ourſelves ſincerely on an alliance which muſt form ſo intimate a part of your majeſty's happineſs, more eſpecially becauſe your majeſty's virtues will, we truſt, be perpetuated to ages yet unborn, in the perſon of an illuſtrious princeſs, whoſe native goodneſs cannot but admire them, and whoſe exalted ſtation can find no model ſo perfect for emulation.

The loyal citizens of London, madam, therefore feel it their intereſt, as it is their gratification, to indulge themſelves in the ſanguine hope that her royal highneſs' moſt amiable endowments may long contribute to your majeſty's domeſtic felicity, and that the endearing qualities of her mind may long have the reciprocal pleaſure of contemplating your majeſty's example.

So ſhall this happy nation, long accuſtomed to behold its higheſt graces moſt conſpicuous on the throne, enjoy the hope of this ſolid advantage in reverſion for poſterity, that an equal pattern of royal goodneſs is reſerved for them to admire, and that they will regard with gratitude this very happy event.

On the 23d the lord-mayor, &c. waited on their royal highneſſes the prince and princeſs of Wales, at Carleton houſe, with the following addreſſes:

To his royal highneſs the prince of Wales.

May it pleaſe your royal highneſs,

The lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, in common-council aſſembled, beg leave to congratulate your royal highneſs on your recent marriage with her ſerene highneſs the princeſs Caroline of Brunſwick.

It is with extreme pleaſure and gratification that we behold your royal highneſs ſo impreſſed with affection toward his majeſty's moſt dutiful and loyal ſubjects, as to form the preſent happy alliance with a princeſs, illuſtrious in rank, and poſſeſſing every engaging quality of the heart ſuited to the important ſtation which ſhe fills, and calculated to remunerate with conjugal felicity the high honour of your royal highneſs' affection and choice.

The proſpect by this illuſtrious event of perpetuating the virtues of your royal houſe to poſterity, who ſhall know, equally with ourſelves, how to value the mild monarchy ſo admirably interwoven with our moſt excellent conſtitution, forms a material part of our happineſs.

Depending, as good ſubjects ever muſt, on the virtues of the royal breaſt, as eſſential to the ſplendour of a throne and the proſperity of a people, it is matter of great conſolation to us to reflect upon the invaluable example of your royal father, which, confirming the many graceful and amiable qualifications of your own mind, cannot but complete the royal character, and, in the fulneſs of time, muſt make your future people happy.

May your illuſtrious conſort long enjoy her exalted ſituation, and may a numerous progeny, from this auſpicious union, tranſmit the bleſſings under which we live to the end of time.

To which addreſs his royal highneſs was pleaſed to return the following anſwer.

My lord-mayor and gentlemen,

I am truly ſenſible of this mark of attention in the lord-mayor, aldermen and commons of the city of London, in common council aſſembled: I return them my ſincere thanks for their congratulations on the occaſion of my marriage; and it gives me peculiar ſatisfaction that they take ſo warm an intereſt in this event. I am much gratified by the expreſſions of their affectionate attachment, which convey ſo ſtrong a proof of their loyalty to the king, and of their zealous regard for my happineſs.

To her royal highneſs the Princeſs of Wales.

May it pleaſe your royal highneſs,

We, his majeſty's dutiful and loyal ſubjects, the lord-mayor, aldermen and commons of the city of London, in common council aſſembled, take the earlieſt opportunity to congratulate your royal highneſs on the happy occaſion of your marriage with his royal highneſs the prince of Wales.

Added to the intrinſic virtues of your royal highneſs, the high ſtation you are ſo well qualified to adorn, and your alliance with ſo diſtinguiſhed a prince, the heir apparent of theſe happy realms, your royal highneſs has alſo powerful claims to the affection of a grateful people, nearly related as you are to our moſt gracious ſovereign, the father of his ſubjects.

Permit, then, madam, the faithful ſubjects of the beſt of kings to aſſure your royal highneſs of their moſt ſincere veneration and eſteem, and to believe that as your intereſt is now united with that of our amiable prince, your happineſs will be by them conſidered and conſulted as one.

Long may your royal highneſs ſhare the joy of ſo ſplendid an union, and may our lateſt poſterity receive from you a continuation of thoſe bleſſings which only can be experienced under the government of a beloved and virtuous king.

To which addreſs her royal highneſs was pleaſed to return the following anſwer:

My lord-mayor and gentlemen,

I return you many thanks for your congratulations upon an event ſo intereſting to my happineſs, and ſo grateful to my feelings. My ſentiments will ever be the ſame with thoſe of the prince, and they have been already better expreſſed to you by him.

They were all received very graciouſly, and had the honour to kiſs their royal highneſſes' hands.

In the houſe of commons Mr. Pitt moved an humble addreſs to his majeſty on the marriage of the prince of Wales, which was prepared accordingly, and ordered to be preſented.

A like addreſs was alſo voted to her majeſty, and another to their royal highneſſes the prince and princeſs of Wales on the ſame joyful occaſion.

The hair powder bill was taken into conſideration by the houſe of lords, on April 23d. when the duke of Norfolk objected to the clauſe, which went to compel maſters of families to be reſponſible for the remiſſneſs of their ſervants who may offend againſt the act. His grace then mentioned ſeveral inſtances where maid ſervants, for whom their maſters muſt anſwer, would take every opportunity of uſing powder, though it was neither the intention of the ſervant herſelf to pay the tax, nor of the maſter to pay for her. He ſhould, therefore, propoſe, that this clauſe ſhould be rejected or modified. Earl Guildford agreed with his grace of Norfolk, and ſaid that he would vote for its omiſſion.

The lord chancellor ſaid, that the rejection of the clauſe would render the bill ineffectual, and the tax unproductive. Lord Sidney ſaid, that the tax was agreed by all to be a tax on vanity, he ſhould vote for the clauſe ſtanding in the bill.

Earl Moira ſaid his objections went to the very principle of the bill. This was one of thoſe taxes which was of a moſt delicate nature for the legiſlature to adopt, at a time when the ſentiments of Europe were in ſuch a ſtate as they were known to be. It went to divide and detach the people from one another by painful and invidious diſtinctions. And when taxes went ſo cloſe as to touch the innocent decorations of the perſon, he ſhould not be ſurpriſed if next ſeſſion a tax upon breeches ſhould be brought forward. He hoped this would not be conſidered as ridicule; he conſidered the matter too ſeriouſly to wiſh it. On the third reading, he would oppoſe it with every endeavour in his power.

After ſome further conſideration the houſe divided, when there appeared for the clauſe 11, againſt it 6.

The report was then made, received, and the bill ordered to be read a third time the next day.

Lord Mulgrave expreſſed his regret that he had not attended to the bill in its earlier ſtages, as he had every hope that their lordſhips would adopt, if not too late, a clauſe in favour of half pay officers, who receive a ſtipend of leſs than 100l. a year, ſimilar to that in favour of clergymen. Earl Moira approved of the propoſition.

On the 27th Mr. Pitt brought up a meſſage from his majeſty to the houſe of commons, (and a ſimilar one was brought up by lord Grenville to the houſe of lords) to the following effect:

" His majeſty relies on the liberality and affection of his faithful commons, and on the cordial intereſt which they have manifeſted on the happy event of the prince's marriage, that they will be ready to concur in ſuch a proviſion as ſhall be deemed neceſſary to ſettle an eſtabliſhment on the prince and princeſs of Wales, ſuitable to their rank and dignity.

On an occaſion ſo ſatisfactory in all other reſpects, his majeſty feels the deepeſt regret in communicating to the houſe, that the benefit of any ſettlement that may be made muſt fail in its moſt deſirable effect, if means be not provided to extricate his royal highneſs from the incumbrances under which he labours, to a great amount.

" Anxious as his majeſty muſt be to relieve the prince of Wales, his majeſty entertains no idea of propoſing the payment of his royal highneſs's debts in any other manner than by appropriating a part of his income, and the revenues of the duchy of Cornwall to the payment of ſuch debts; and his majeſty will be ready to co-operate in any plan which the wiſdom of the houſe may deviſe, for eſtabliſhing a ready and punctual order of payment, and for guarding againſt the poſſibility of the prince's being again involved in any ſimilar embarraſſments."

Mr. Pitt then moved, that the meſſage be taken into conſideration by a committee of the whole houſe on that day ſe'nnight. This produced a long converſation.

Mr. Stanley moved, that his majeſty's meſſage of the 21ſt day of May, 1787, and the addreſs of the houſe in conſequence ſhould be read.—He then ſaid, that after the aſſurances contained in that meſſage, the preſent application demanded the moſt ſerious deliberation. He meant no diſreſpect to his royal highneſs, but thought that a full attendance was requiſite, on a buſineſs of a nature ſo important as this was, in the preſent ſituation of the country. He concluded with moving, that a call of the houſe ſhould take place on that day fortnight.

This motion was ſupported by Mr. Grey, Mr. Curwen, Mr. Powys, Mr. Martin, and others; and oppoſed by Mr. Pitt.—General Smith, Mr. Buxton, Mr. Sumner, and Mr. Burden, alſo took part in the converſation which aroſe on the ſubject.

In favour of the call, the weight and importance of the queſtion, and the ſtate of the country, were forcibly urged—That a greater evil was to be dreaded from the want of œconomy in a prince, than even from the deſpotiſm of a king. That the particulars of theſe unexpectedly-increaſed debts ought to be ſcrutiniſed by that houſe, in duty to the nation. General Smith obſerved, that the income of 100,000l. now was not equal to 150,000l. at the time of the ſettlement of the late prince of Wales's marriage, and that therefore the allowance ought to be extended; and proviſion made againſt future requeſts of the nature now brought forwards. Mr. Pitt conſidered the propoſed call as tending to produce inconvenience—In anſwer to ſeveral enquiries, he ſtated the amount of the prince's debts to be between ſix and ſeven hundred thouſand pounds. He deprecated any minuteneſs of enquiry into the particulars, as indelicate and unneceſſary. He obſerved, that no greater income would be called for than that ſettled on the late prince of Wales. That, out of this, a conſiderable part would be appropriated for the liquidation of the debts, and that the prince would be content to decreaſe his ſplendour, and circumſcribe his income for this purpoſe. But that proviſions muſt neceſſarily be made by parliament for this appropriation. That the preſent was a moment in which we were peculiarly called on to ſupport monarchy againſt the open and inſidious attacks of its enemies.

Mr. Martin drily obſerved, that the way to make hereditary monarchy reſpectable, was to prevent its oppreſſing the people. The call of the houſe was at length agreed to, according to Mr. Stanley's motion.

In the houſe of lords, May 1, the following addreſs was moved by lord Grenville.

"That their lordſhips having conſidered his majeſty's gracious meſſage, take this opportunity of expreſſing to his majeſty their attachment to his perſon, and their endeavours to promote the happineſs of his family. That they ſhall take ſpeedy meaſures to extricate his royal highneſs from his preſent difficulties, ſecure him, as much as poſſible, againſt future ones, and furniſh to him an eſtabliſhment ſuitable to the reſpect, the dignity, and the honour of his exalted ſtation.

This addreſs was carried nem. con.

The royal aſſent was given by commiſſion, May 5, to the hair-powder licence, and ſeveral other public and private bills.

The commiſſioners were the lord chancellor, archbiſhop of Canterbury, and duke of Dorſet.

This act took place on the ſame day, but a kalendar month was allowed to take out a certificate, being one guinea each perſon. Among the exemptions are clergymen and diſſenting preachers, having leſs than 100l. per ann. ſubalterns, noncommiſſioned officers, and privates in the army, militia, marines, fencibles, and volunteer companies (of the latter all officers are exempt). Officers in the navy under the rank of commanders; all beyond two unmarried daughters in a family, if two are paid for. The chief of the penalties are 20l. for wearing powder without a licence, 30l. for ſelling, lending, or borrowing a certificate; officers neglecting their duty, 50l. &c.

About this time, terminated the impeachment againſt Warren Haſtings, eſq. which for length of time has exceeded any trial in the hiſtory of the world, having laſted ſeven years and three months. The following are the particulars: On April 23, the laſt and one hundred and forty-ninth day, the peers having aſſembled, proclamation was made in the uſual way, and Warren Haſtings, eſq. and his bail came into the court, and was directed to withdraw.

The lord chancellor then ſtood up, and ſaid, that the lords had upon Friday laſt reſolved that judgment ſhould be given this day on the charges of high crimes and miſdemeanors, brought by the houſe of commons againſt Warren Haſtings, eſq.

The following are the reſolutions which they entered into, and the queſtions to be put to the lords ſeverally:

Reſolved, by the lords ſpiritual and temporal, in parliament aſſembled, That the following queſtions be put to the lords in Weſtminſter Hall; viz.

I. Is Warren Haſtings, eſq. guilty, or not guilty, of high crimes and miſdemeanors, charged by the commons in the firſt article of charge?

II. Is Warren Haſtings, eſq. guilty, or not guilty, of high crimes and miſdemeanors, charged by the commons in the ſecond article of charge?

III. Is Warren Haſtings, eſq. guilty, or not guilty, of high crimes and miſdemeanors, charged upon him by the commons in the ſixth article of charge, in ſo far as relates to the ſaid Warren Haſtings having in the year 1772, 1773, and 1774, corruptly taken the ſeveral ſums of money charged to have been taken by him in the ſaid years, from the ſeveral perſons in the ſaid article particularly mentioned?

IV. Is Warren Haſtings, eſq. guilty, or not guilty, of high crimes and miſdemeanors, charged upon him by the commons in the ſixth article of charge, in ſo far as relates to his having, on or before the 26th of June 1780, corruptly received and taken from Sadanund, the Buxey of the Raja Cheit Sing, the ſum of two lacks of rupees as a preſent or gift?

V. Is Warren Haſtings, eſq. guilty, or not guilty, of high crimes and miſdemeanors, charged upon him by the commons in the ſixth article of charge, in ſo far as relates to his having, in October 1780, taken and received from Kelleram, on behalf of himſelf and a certain perſon called Cullian Sing, a ſum of money amounting to four lacks of rupees, in conſideration of letting to them certain lands in the province of Bahar in perpetuity, contrary to his duty, and to the injury of the Eaſt India Company?

VI. Is Warren Haſtings, eſq. guilty, or not guilty, of high crimes and miſdemeanors, charged upon him by the commons in the ſixth article of charge, in ſo far as relates to his having, in the year 1781, received and taken as a preſent from Nundoolol, the ſum of fifty-eight thouſand rupees?

VII. Is Warren Haſtings, eſq. guilty, or not guilty, of high crimes and miſdemeanors, charged upon him by the commons in the ſixth article of charge, in ſo far as relates to his having, on or about the month of September 1781, at Chunar, in the province of Oude, contrary to his duty, taken and received as a preſent from the Vizier the ſum of ten lacks of rupees?

VIII. Is Warren Haſtings, eſq. guilty, or not guilty, of high crimes and miſdemeanors, charged upon him by the commons in the ſixth article of charge, in ſo far as relates to his having firſt fraudulently ſolicited as a loan, and of his having afterwards corruptly and illegally taken and retained as a preſent or gift, from Rajah Nobkiſſen, a ſum of money amounting to 34,000l. ſterling; and of his having, without any allowance from the directors, or any perſon authorized to grant ſuch allowance, applied the ſame to his own uſe, under pretence of diſcharging certain expences ſaid to be incurred by the ſaid Warren Haſtings in his public capacity?

IX. Is Warren Haſtings, eſq. guilty, or not guilty,

XV. Is Warren Haſtings, eſq. guilty, or not guilty, of high crimes and miſdemeanors, charged upon him by the commons in the fourth article of charge, in ſo far as relates to the appointment of John Belly, eſq. to be agent for the ſupply of ſtores and proviſions for the garriſon of Fort William in Bengal, with a commiſſion of thirty per cent.?

XVI. Is Warren Haſtings, eſq. guilty, or not guilty, of the reſidue of the high crimes and miſdemeanors, or any of them, charged upon him by the impeachment of the commons?

Reſolved, by the lords ſpiritual and temporal, in parliament aſſembled, That the ſaid queſtions ſhall be ſeverally put in Weſtminſter Hall to each of the lords, beginning with the junior baron; and that the only anſwer ſhall be given by each lord in theſe words:—'Guilty, upon my honour;' or, 'Not guilty, upon my honour;' laying his right hand on his breaſt.

The lord chancellor held in his hand a liſt of the peers preſent, and who had taken their ſeats in their robes before the throne. Thoſe peers who did not mean to vote retired behind the throne.

The noble lord then began with the junior peer preſent, in the following manner:

George lord Douglas, is Warren Haſtings, eſq. guilty or not guilty of high crimes and miſdemeanors, charged by the commons in the firſt article of charge?—lord Douglas ſtood up, took off his hat, and laying his right hand on his heart, pronounced—Not guilty, upon my honour.

[The ſame queſtion was then put to the following noble lords, who gave the verdict annexed to their names in the ſame form.]

James lord Fiſe—Not guilty.
Charles lord Somers—Not guilty.
Francis lord Rawdon—Not guilty.
Thomas lord Walſingham—Not guilty.
Edward lord Thurlow—Not guilty.

Alexander lord Loughborough, the lord chancellor, pronounced—Guilty.

Thus, on the firſt queſtion, twenty-three peers pronounced Mr. Haſtings Not guilty. Six pronounced him Guilty.

On the 2d queſtion the numbers were the ſame.

On the 3d queſtion, he was unanimouſly declared Not guilty. The duke of Norfolk then retired behind the throne, and did not vote any more.

On the 4th queſtion, four peers pronounced him guilty—the earl of Carnarvon, earl Fitzwilliam, earl of Suffolk, and the lord chancellor; all the reſt not guilty. Lord Suffolk then withdrew.

On the 5th, 6th, and 7th, lord Carnarvon, lord Fitzwilliam, and the lord chancellor, guilty—all the reſt not guilty.

On the 8th, lord Carnarvon, lord Fitzwilliam, lord Mansfield, and the lord chancellor, guilty—all the reſt not guilty.

On the 9th, lord Walſingham, lord Carnarvon, lord Radnor, lord Fitzwilliam, and the lord chancellor, guilty—all the reſt not guilty.

On the 10th he was unanimouſly acquitted.

On the 11th and 12th, lord Carnarvon, lord Fitzwilliam, and the chancellor, guilty—all the reſt not guilty.

On the 13th and 14th, lord Carnarvon, lord Radnor, lord Fitzwilliam, and the chancellor, guilty—all the reſt not guilty.

On the 15th and 16th, lord Carnarvon, lord Fitzwilliam, and the lord chancellor, guilty—all the reſt not guilty.

As ſoon as they had gone through all the 16 queſtions,

The lord chancellor ſaid, it appears that there is a great majority for the acquittal of the priſoner on each of the articles; I am, therefore, purſuant to your lordſhips' directions, to declare that Warren Haſtings, Eſquire, is acquitted of all the charges of impeachment brought againſt him by the commons, and of all the matter contained therein.

Mr. Haſtings was then called to come into court: he came into his box, and knelt in the uſual way; the chancellor deſired him to riſe, and addreſſed him in theſe words:—

"Warren Haſtings, you are acquitted of all the charges of impeachment brought againſt you by the commons, and of all the matter contained therein; you and your bail, therefore, are diſcharged."

Mr. Haſtings bowed to the court.

The

In the month of May, captain Molloy was tried by a court martial, on two charges, the firſt was, that captain Molloy, of his majeſty's ſhip the Cæſar, did not, on the 29th of May, 1794, croſs the enemy's line, in obedience to the ſignal of the admiral; the ſecond, that on the firſt of June he had not uſed his utmoſt endeavours to cloſe with, and defeat the enemy.

Captain Molloy in his defence ſtated, that in conſequence of the long and painful agitation of mind he had laboured under, both before and ſince the commencement of the trial, his ſtate of health was ſo bad, and his body ſo impaired, that it would be totally out of his power to repeat the ſpeech with which he meant to addreſs the court. He begged therefore, that they would permit his friend to read his defence for him. Having granted his requeſt, Mr. Fielding, the barriſter, read a very able and eloquent ſpeech, of which the following is the ſubſtance:

"Before he entered immediately on the charges againſt him, he thought it neceſſary to expreſs to the preſident, and the gentlemen who compoſed the court, the ſtrong ſenſe he entertained of their manly, candid, impartial, and laborious inveſtigation of his caſe. He would ſay but little on the reaſons that had induced him to call a court martial; they were already before the court; but he could not avoid mentioning the aſtoniſhment with which he had been ſeized at the time he was firſt appriſed of the letter which had been tranſmitted from earl Howe to the lords commiſſioners of the admiralty, and in which his conduct was cenſured. He had never until that moment received the leaſt intimation from the admiral of any crime being attached to his conduct in the buſineſs of the 1ſt of June; on the contrary, the approbation of his lordſhip had been conveyed to him ſubſequent to the 1ſt of June, on the 13th of the ſame month, and of which he received an honourable teſtimony.

"He was ready to admit the facts that had been ſtated by the witneſſes on the part of the proſecution; but he totally denied the inferences that were drawn from them, or the opinions that had been given. It had not been in his power to tell what were the intentions of the admiral: before he imputed a voluntary neglect to the Cæſar, it ſhould have been proved that the other ſhips of his line, which had received the ſame orders with the Cæſar, had executed them. They had not, and it did not appear that they had received any damage to prevent them from doing ſo. Here captain Molloy entered into a minute detail of the ſeveral facts that had been ſtated by the witneſſes relative to the movements of the Cæſar on the 29th of May; from which it appeared, that ſhe had led the van that day, even after her main top-ſail had been ſplit; ſhe had likewiſe been engaged with the van ſhip of the enemy, the name of which was the Jemappe. The Cæſar did not quit her voluntarily, as would appear in evidence. On the 1ſt of June, the Jemappe did not appear in the enemy's line; and it is well known what kind of account had been given of her to the French convention.

"When he had received the ſignal to tack, he certainly did not obey; and for this he wiſhed to account: he was alſo charged with not having attempted to tack as the Queen Charlotte did, and with not coming to windward after wearing: but he would aſk, why did not the other ſhips do the ſame? He went down two-thirds of the enemy's line, until the Cæſar got under the ſtern of the Majeſtic.

"Neither for this, nor for diſobeying the ſignal to tack to windward, did the admiral give any notice, nor make any ſignal of diſapprobation. Was not that a proof that no blame was conſidered as attached to the Cæſar at that time? With reſpect to the opinions that had been ſtated, and the weight which they ought to be conſidered to poſſeſs, he would juſt ſay, that, for his part, he could not venture to account for the comparative ſituations and circumſtances of any of the other ſhips of the Britiſh line on that day, being ſo much occupied by his own ſhip. He believed they deſerved their ſhare of praiſe; but as to himſelf, he truſted he ſhould have ſufficient evidence to confirm his report.

"Having delivered his ſentiments on the affair of the 29th of May, he adverted to that of the firſt of June, which was the ſecond charge againſt him. But before he came immediately to that day, he ſhould ſtate what happened in the interval between it and the 29th of May. On the 31ſt of May, the admiral had ſingled him out to be the leading ſhip of the Britiſh van. Would he have done him ſuch honour, if he had diſapproved of his conduct on the 29th? His conduct on that day, therefore, he flattered himſelf, would not be condemned. But as to that of the firſt of June, the charge was directly for cowardice, a charge which he diſdained. He left it with the court to determine, whether, after having been 33 years in the ſervice, and in nine ſeveral actions, he was then, for the firſt time in his life, to be dubbed a coward, and made to ſuffer an ignominious death?

"His report, he ſaid, ſhould be met by a body of evidence that ſhould explain it fully; therefore, he would not then trouble the court by reading it. But he muſt advert to one circumſtance in it; fifteen or ſixteen men were killed on board the Cæſar, beſides many wounded. How was that to be accounted for, if ſhe had not fought as well as others?

"He entreated the court to conſider the ſerious conſequences of charges that ſtood contradicted by all the former actions of his life. He was then, for the firſt time, called a coward—he who had ſeen three and thirty years ſervice—who had fought in nine different engagements—who had received honourable teſtimonies of valour from earl Howe himſelf, from lord Hood, and from the late lord Rodney, whoſe teſtimonies ſtill exiſted.

After a trial of ſixteen days, the judge advocate read a paper which ſtated the purpoſe for which the court martial was called, the circumſtance which cauſed it, the names of the members, and the charges which they had to try.

The court having heard the evidence on the part of the proſecution, and that on behalf of captain Molloy, and having duly weighed and conſidered the ſame, were of opinion—

"That the ſaid charges have been made good againſt the ſaid captain Anthony James Pye Molloy. But having found that, on the ſaid twenty-ninth of May, and firſt of June, as well as on many former occaſions, captain Molloy's courage had always been unimpeachable—the court was of opinion, that captain Molloy, then commanding the Cæſar, ſhould be diſmiſſed from his majeſty's ſaid ſhip the Cæſar; and ordered that he be accordingly forthwith diſmiſſed."

By this ſentence, captain Molloy is ſtill entitled to his half pay, and eligible to ſerve his majeſty in another veſſel.

A moſt unfortunate accident took place about this time, by which many lives were loſt.

The Boyne, of 98 guns, captain Grey, on board of which, vice admiral Sir Richard King's flag was flying, by ſome accident caught fire, between ten and eleven o'clock in the morning. The occaſion of the fire it was impoſſible to aſcertain. The flames were ſo fierce, that the boats could not venture along ſide the ſhip, and thoſe men only were ſaved who could ſwim. All her guns were loaded, and as they became heated, they went off, the ſhot falling amongſt the ſhipping, and ſome of them even reached the ſhore, but without having done any damage.
